Cate groaned as the carriage pulled away. “No,” she moaned. “Come back!” Her bottom lip trembled as she slogged to the bed and sank onto it. Not only did an invisible barrier trap her inside this house, but it also prevented others from seeing or hearing her. How? What sorcery was this? Who were these people? And how could she fight against it?

* * *

Cate paced the floor of the bedroom as the sun descended in the sky. Celine had not returned. No one had visited the house. She had watched Duke Northcott depart in the early afternoon. His carriage traveled in the opposite direction of Dunhaven Castle. Where was he going, she pondered?

As the dust settled in his wake, Cate tried the door and window again. She could not budge either.

“Dembe!” Cate called as she banged on the door.

Footsteps climbed the stairs and approached her door. The lock clanked and the door swung open. “Yes, Miss Catherine?”

“Where has Duke Northcott gone?”

“Business, Miss Catherine. He will return in the early evening to dine with you.”

“Dembe, please,” Cate pleaded, “please, I cannot stay here. I’m frightened.”

“Perhaps some tea will soothe you, Miss Catherine,” Dembe offered.

Tears stung Cate’s eyes. “No, Dembe, no tea. Thank you.” Cate stalked away from him to stare out the window.

“I shall bring it in case you change your mind.” With that, the man exited. He returned in moments with a steaming cup of tea and set it on the small table before leaving Cate alone again.

As the sun dipped below the horizon, Cate spied Duke Northcott’s carriage return. He strode into the house. Thirty minutes later, he knocked at her door.

“And how are you feeling this evening, Catherine?” he inquired as he led her to the dining room.

“Frustrated,” Cate answered.

“I am sorry to hear that,” he said as she took her seat.

“Perhaps you can alleviate my frustration,” she said after a moment.

He raised his eyebrows at her and set down his fork. “What an interesting proposition. Continue.”

“Why have you brought me here?”

“My reasons are my own,” he answered. “I shall share them when the time is appropriate.”

Cate set her jaw as she considered her next question. “If you cannot answer that, perhaps you can explain to me what you are.”

“What I am?” he repeated.

“You caused me to faint with only a touch. You have created some sort of unseen barrier that prevents me from leaving the house even through an open door. I scratched you earlier with the knife and you healed immediately. These things are not normal.”

“Your intelligence impresses me, Catherine. Even in a frightening situation, you keep your wits about you. You pay careful attention to detail even under these ominous circumstances.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at him. “Compliments will not distract me from my question.”

He smiled at her. “You do not give up. Admirable. In different circumstances, we may have made fantastic allies.”

Cate cocked her head. “I cannot imagine ever aligning with you.”

“Never limit your options, Catherine. Life can offer us strange circumstances in which we must accept what we imagined we would not.”

“You have not answered my question,” Cate reminded him.

“You must accept that there are things in this world beyond what you may expect.”

“Such as?”

“Suffice it to say I possess several unique abilities that allow me to navigate the world differently than most others.”

“Unique abilities,” Cate repeated. “Such as the ability to heal your wounds in seconds?”

“Your interest in me is flattering, Catherine. And your curiosity in these affairs is a most attractive quality.”

“I only wish to learn the circumstances that surround me.”

“Oh, I do admire you, Catherine. Despite your assumptions to the contrary, I find you a most interesting woman.”

Their conversation continued through the meal but did not delve further into Duke Northcott’s strange abilities. Cate spent time after dinner reading in the sitting room before Duke Northcott returned her to her room, locking her in for the night.

* * *

Cate woke from a dreamless sleep before the sun crested the moors. With the candle burned down and only minimal light, she laid in bed as the sun rose. Painting the sky like a watercolor, the sun’s light brought her some solace. She imagined lounging in her own bed, surrounded by her two buddies, Riley and Bailey.

Tears threatened as she wondered if she would ever see them again. Marcus Northcott’s strange abilities baffled her. And what she couldn’t explain pushed her mind to explore places she’d rather it didn’t.

As the sun rose fully into the sky a quiet knock sounded at the door. The lock released and Dembe pushed the door open. He set a tray of breakfast on the small table near the door.

“Breakfast, Miss Catherine,” he announced.

“Thank you, Dembe,” she responded as she rose. “Is Duke Northcott not here?”

“Duke Northcott will return for dinner with you, Miss Catherine,” the quiet man informed her before pulling the door shut.

Cate eyed the tray and its carefully prepared meal. Perhaps a solitary breakfast was preferable, she pondered, as she took a bite of her poached egg. The downside to the solitude was her wandering mind.

When Dembe collected her breakfast tray, he brought several books to entertain her. Despite her best attempts, Cate found reading impossible. She resorted to pacing the floor, stopping occasionally to stare out the window.

After what seemed like an eternity, Dembe brought her afternoon tea. Cate settled onto the bed afterward. The waiting wore on her. What did this man want from her? Would she ever escape and see Jack again? Would they return to their time?

* * *

Cate's eyes fluttered open as the setting sun painted her room a brilliant shade of red. She pushed up to sitting, pulling her cheek from her tear-soaked pillow. She had cried herself to sleep hours ago after Dembe had brought her a small meal and warm cup of tea.

Cate sniffled as she scanned the room. A large box trimmed with a blue satin ribbon sat on the small table across from her. She rose and approached it. A folded note sat atop the white box.

Cate snatched it from the lid and flipped it open.

My dearest Catherine -

I look very much forward to dining with you this evening. I imagine the conversation we share will be illuminating. Please accept this dress as a token of my advanced appreciation for the evening. I expect to see you in it when I call for you.

~ Marcus

Cate frowned at the note. It read like something from a bad Lifetime movie. She had no desire to dine with the man, though she assumed she had little choice in the matter.

Cate slid the ribbon from around the box and pulled off the lid. A blue satin dress lay inside. Cate ran her fingertips across the fine material. In any other circumstance, this may be exciting. In her current predicament, it was anything but.

Cate pulled the dress from the box and laid it across the bed. She eyed the satin dinner gown. A rich blue color and trimmed with lace, the dinner gown was the picture of nobility in this era. She attempted to assuage her trepidation by distracting herself with the beauty of the dress. Though she could not repress the shudder that passed through her body as she pulled it on.

After dressing, Cate perched on the edge of the bed. She pulled the timepiece from beneath the bodice of her dress. A sudden urge to hide it overcame her and she shoved it into a pocket of the dress.

The sun sank below the horizon and darkness crept across the sky. Moonlight shone through the window.

A knock sounded on the door. The bolt clanked and the door pushed open. Duke Northcott strode into the room, his hands behind his back. He studied Cate, a smile crossing his lips. "I see you found my gift. I hope you appreciate it. You look lovely, my dear."

Cate did not respond. He narrowed his eyes at her. "Smile, dear. I have paid you a compliment."

Cate forced a weak smile onto her face as she held back tears. Pleased with her effort, Duke Northcott continued. "Good. Now, no woman is complete without some form of jewelry. I find this piece particularly stunning. And a perfect match to your blue eyes." He swung his hands from behind his back. They clutched a velvet jewelry box. He popped it open. A large sapphire necklace lay inside. Diamonds trimmed the teardrop-shaped sapphire.

Cate's eyes widened. No stranger to fine jewelry since her inheritance of Dunhaven Castle, this piece was spectacular. "If you'll allow me." He motioned for her to stand. Cate recoiled as his hands swept her hair away from her neck. The weighty sapphire pressed against her skin as he fastened the necklace behind her. "There." Cate spun to face him. "C'est magnifique, dear Catherine! Shall we?" He extended his arm to her.

Cate accepted it as the strangeness of her circumstances rattled through her mind. In another situation, Cate may find the man charming. When being held hostage, the sentiment was tempered by her discomfort and fear.

Duke Northcott seated her at the candlelit table and took his seat across from her. Dembe bustled about the room, delivering their first course. Cate sipped at the soup.

"Have you recalled any interesting tidbits about yourself you've forgotten to mention to me, Catherine?"

Cate glanced at him across the table. "No. I have hidden nothing from you."

"I find it difficult to believe a woman like you hides no secrets behind that beautiful facade."

"I am a simple woman. I have no secrets."

"Hmm," he murmured as he returned to his soup. "I visited the castle this afternoon."

Cate set her spoon down and raised her eyebrows at him. He glanced up at her. Satisfied he had captured her full attention, he continued. "The family is in quite a tizzy over your absence. I passed my condolences along to your husband through Douglas. I understand the poor man is quite upset."

"Are you telling me this to torment me?"

"Torment you? I assumed you'd be pleased!"

"Pleased?! Pleased that you've abducted me? Pleased to learn of the upset it's caused? Which part of what you've conveyed do you expect me to be pleased with?"

"Clearly your husband grieves your absence. He must care for you very deeply. I assumed this would please you."

"If you are concerned with pleasing me, you could let me return to him."

He chuckled at her statement. "You are a worthy sparring opponent, Catherine. You remind me of another woman with which I am acquainted."

"I assume the answer to that request is 'no.'"

"You assume correctly, my dear. Interesting or not, you are far too valuable to me to return."

"My husband has no funds to pay a ransom. I am not very valuable."

"It is not money I desire," he informed her. "You are valuable in other ways."

"What ways?" Cate inquired.

He offered a half-smile. "I prefer to keep those to myself for the moment. Unless, of course, there is something interesting you'd like to share with me in return."

Cate sighed and her shoulders sagged. "I do not understand what you expect me to share. I have lived a simple life. I do not have any secrets."

"Yes, so you've said. And perhaps you are being genuine. Perhaps not. Either way, I shall find the truth eventually. I always do."

He stared into her eyes as he spoke. Cate held back a shudder. They spent the rest of the meal conversing about polite topics. Cate found the juxtaposition of polite conversation with her circumstances jarring when she considered it.

After dinner, Duke Northcott invited Cate for a nightcap in the sitting room. Cate sipped at the brandy and stared at the flames dancing in the fireplace. A growing sense of dread filled her with every sip. What intentions did he have for her? At what point would he enact them? Could she play along long enough to keep herself alive to be rescued? Was a rescue even possible?

When she finished her drink, he relieved her of her glass. "You should rest, dear," he said.

"I am not tired," Cate countered. She preferred not to be locked in that bedroom again. And each minute that passed brought her closer to her doom, she fretted.

He offered her a brief smile. "I must insist, Catherine," he said. He approached her and caressed her cheek. Cate opened her mouth to protest, but no sound emerged. Her eyelids and limbs grew heavy, and her vision closed to a pinpoint. Her head lolled to her chest as she experienced the sensation of being lifted into someone's arms.

* * *

Cate's eyelids fluttered open. With bleary eyes, she took in her surroundings. Her eyebrows knit as she failed to recognize the location. Something cold and hard pressed against her back.

"Hello, Catherine," Duke Northcott said as he knelt next to her.

"Where am I?"

She pushed her hands to either side as she slid her eyes around to scan her new environment. Stone walls surrounded her as she lay on her back. Cate's eyes darted frantically as she attempted to make sense of it. Her stomach leapt into her throat as she realized she lay in the family crypt. Duke Northcott had placed her in one of the unused stone coffins.

"No," she cried as she attempted to sit up. Tears formed and escaped from the sides of her eyes.

He pressed her back into place. "Now, now, Catherine. Do not give in to panic. You are a stronger woman than that."

"No," Cate repeated. "Please, don't."

"I am afraid I must. Though it does pain me. You have such potential, Catherine. Perhaps in another circumstance."

Cate breathed raggedly as panic swept through her. She attempted to rise again but with a wave of his hand, Duke Northcott pinned her into place. Cate struggled to move, achieving nothing more than wiggling and squirming.

“I shall miss your feistiness.” He reached to her and pushed a lock of hair from her face. His hands fell onto the necklace. “Keep this as a reminder of me.”

“No, please,” Cate sobbed. “I am valuable. You said so yourself. Please!”

He smiled at her. “Yes, you are. We are about to learn just how valuable. Do not fear, Catherine. If your friends are as clever as I expect them to be, you shall not perish. If they are not, well... let us not speak of that possibility.”

He stood and stared down at her. “Goodbye, Catherine. For now. If you do hold a secret, I shall learn it. In time. Though at the moment, I have achieved my goal. Celine’s focus is centered on me. I shall cease my cat-and-mouse game with you. For now. I do hope we shall meet again.”

Cate’s eyes grew wide as he began to push the large stone over the top of the coffin. “No! NO!” she screamed.

Light narrowed to a slit before disappearing entirely as the stone cover came to its final resting place. Tears streamed from Cate’s eyes as she pounded against the cool stone above her. “No! No! Please! Duke Northcott!”

Cate bit her lower lip as she wept. She attempted again to shift the stone above her. She pushed at it, trying to move it from every angle. She pulled her knees up until they pushed against the stone above, but she could not budge it.

Cate let her limbs collapse as sobs wracked through her. When tears no longer flowed freely, Cate wiped at her face. She sniffled as she attempted to regain her composure. She took a deep, steadying breath. As she inhaled, her mind pondered the amount of air she may have remaining. Did she have hours? Twelve? More? Less?

Cate’s mind spun as she considered the duration of life she had left to live. She attempted to control her breathing, forcing herself to take shallower breaths. She closed her eyes and focused her attention. Her thoughts turned to Jack. He would be stuck here unless he could retrieve her remains. If they found what was left of her, he could retrieve the timepiece and return to their time. He could take care of Riley and Bailey.

The thought of the poor pups left behind brought fresh tears to her eyes. She fought against them, fought to maintain control of her emotions. Duke Northcott suggested she may be found. Was it false hope? No, she insisted. It couldn't be. Someone would find her as he hinted. They had to. She clung to that hope as she drifted in and out of consciousness.

Cate's head lolled to the side. A haze clouded her mind as she drifted in and out of a responsive state. A scraping noise filled her ears. She attempted to rouse herself, but her lightheadedness prevented her. Cool air brushed past her cheek. Garbled voices sounded overhead. Light and darkness played across her closed eyelids.

"Lift her out," a garbled female voice instructed.

Cate experienced the sensation of being pulled up. Arms wrapped around her, and she floated briefly before her body settled onto a hard stone surface.

"Is she alive?" a male voice posed.

"Come on, Cate, be okay," another clearer voice said. Cate recognized Damien's voice. She fought to regain her senses and open her eyes. Her head rolled from side to side, and she moaned. Warm skin touched hers. Fingers wrapped around her hand and squeezed. "That's it, Cate. Come back to us."

"Find Michael and Jack," Celine's voice said.

"You'll be all right?" Grayson inquired.

"Yes, bring them here. Quickly," Celine answered.

Cate moaned again, squeezing her eyes together. Her lips moved without forming words. After a moment, her forehead pinched and she forced out, "Damien."

A renewed squeeze of her hand. "I'm here, Cate. Can you open your eyes?"

Cate's eyelids fluttered open. The world blurred in front of her, and her eyes threatened to close. Celine leaned closer to her. "Take a deep breath and listen to the sound of my voice."

Cate concentrated on her voice as she breathed deeply. Celine whispered a few Latin words as she placed her palm on Cate's cheek.

Cate gasped for breath, her eyes opening wide and her muscles tensing. After a moment, she relaxed. Her breathing returned to normal, her vision cleared and her muscles relaxed. She glanced around at her surroundings.

She lay in the family crypt next to the coffin that had been her prison only moments ago. Damien and Celine knelt over her. Damien clutched her hand.

As she opened her eyes, he grinned at her. “Hey,” he said. “Welcome back.”

Cate focused on his face. Her lips trembled and tears formed in her eyes. “Hey,” she answered in a shaky voice. A tear escaped her eye and rolled down her cheek. Damien wiped it away.

“Don’t cry. You’re safe. Nothing is going to happen to you now. It’s okay, Cate.”

She smiled at him as she fought her tears of joy and squeezed his hand. “I didn’t think I was going to make it,” she choked out.

“We weren’t going to let you die,” Damien assured her. “Me, Michael, Gray, Celine, Jack, and his grandfather haven’t stopped searching for you since you disappeared.”

Cate’s brow furrowed at the statement. “Jack’s grandfather?” she murmured.

Damien smiled and nodded at her. “Yep. Stanley Reid. Nice fellow, it seems. Extremely worried about you though not more than Jack. Poor guy was beside himself.”

“He can’t return to our time without me,” Cate explained.

“I don’t imagine that was the reason for his upset. Besides, he could get home with Celine’s help which is how he got Stanley.”

Cate’s mind swam with the details, and she struggled to keep up with the conversation. “Just rest for a minute,” Damien soothed as he patted her hand.

Celine rubbed her cheek. “How are you feeling?” she questioned.

“Better,” Cate admitted. “Happy to be alive.” She pushed herself up to sitting.

“Careful, easy,” Damien warned.

“I’m okay,” Cate assured him. “I just...”

The mausoleum door burst open. Jack’s figure appeared limned in moonlight. He stopped at the door, peering into the vault. “CATE?!” he exclaimed as he searched for her.

“JACK!” she called, reaching her hand out to him.

He raced to her, skidding to a stop next to her and dropping to his knees. Damien retreated a few steps, allowing him access to Cate. He scooped her into his arms. His pounding heart thudded in his chest against Cate's ear. "Thank God you're okay," he gasped as he held her tightly. She wrapped her arms around him in a tight embrace. "I thought I'd lost you," he said as he released her and cupped her face in his hands. Tears shone in his eyes.

She grasped his hand in hers as fresh tears spilled onto her cheeks. She nodded, unable to speak as she considered the possibility that he nearly had, indeed, lost her. She swallowed the lump in her throat. "Are you okay?" Jack questioned.

"Yes," Cate choked out. "Yes, I'm fine."

"She's okay," Damien chimed in, putting his hand on Jack's shoulder. "We found her in time. She was a little groggy but she's okay."

"Great job, buddy," Michael said, clapping Damien on the shoulder.

Grayson entered moments later with a winded Stanley Reid. Cate could have cried again at the sight of him. "Mr. Reid!" she exclaimed.

He sidled to her and puffed a few breaths before he spoke. "Aye, lassie. You gave us all quite a scare!" Cate reached out and grasped his hand, squeezing it. He returned the gesture. "I am ever so glad you're all right, Lady Cate."

"I'm sorry. I..."

"You don't have to explain, Cate," Jack hushed her. "I'm just glad you're all right."

"No, you don't have to explain," Michael assured her. "We all know who is to blame and it's not you."

"I didn't tell him anything," Cate insisted.

"He does not know the secret?" Jack inquired.

Cate shook her head. "No."

"Great job, Cate," Damien said with a grin.

"Impressive, Catherine," Grayson added. "He is a difficult man to hide the truth from."

"He kept insisting I was hiding something. I just kept denying it. And eventually, he brought me here and put me in that..." Cate stopped before she voiced the word.

"At least he only suspected and did not know you were hiding something," Michael said.

"He said he used me to get to Celine. Why?" Cate questioned.

"It's a long story," Damien assured her.

“One not to be told now. You three must return to your time,” Grayson said. “Before any more harm befalls you at the Duke’s hands.”

“I agree,” Celine added. “You must return at once.”

“What about Douglas... our time rip problem...” Cate began.

“Douglas understands everything about the time rips, including where we came from,” Jack informed her.

“Celine has already enchanted his pocket watch, it’s finished,” Grayson added.

“And don’t worry about your problem,” Damien added. “We’ll be there tomorrow to help you with it.” He rubbed her shoulder and gave her a reassuring smile.

Cate glanced around at all of them.

“Come on, lassie,” Stanley said. “Time to go home.”

Jack climbed to his feet and offered her his hand. He pulled her to standing. “Easy,” he cautioned. “Can you stand?”

“Yes,” Cate said as she steadied herself on her feet.

“How do you feel?” Damien asked. “Faint? Can you walk?”

“I can walk. I’m a little shaky but I can make it.”

“You sure? I can carry you,” Jack offered.

The statement made Cate giggle. “I’m sure. Despite it being 1792, I do not need to be carried to the castle like a damsel.”

“Even so, I’d love to sweep you off your feet, Cate,” Jack joked.

“I’m glad to see you haven’t lost your sense of humor, Jack,” Cate teased.

“We should go,” Grayson urged.

The group filed out of the mausoleum. Dunhaven Castle dominated the landscape in the distance, its lights a beacon in the darkness. The sight sent Cate’s heart soaring. If she wasn’t so weary, she’d have run to the castle.

“What time is it? How long have we been gone?” Cate asked Jack as they trudged up the path.

“Almost one in the morning,” Jack answered. “You’ve been gone over sixty hours. Don’t worry, I’ve been back and made an excuse that you were in town and may be there for hours. If you returned for dinner, you’d be okay on your own.”

“Wow,” Cate mumbled.

“You sure you’re okay, Cate?” Jack asked as Cate stared ahead, lost in thought.

“Yeah, I’m fine. I just... I’m sorry you had to go through that,” Cate explained.

“I honestly am not sure how I held it together during that conversation with Mrs. Fraser and Molly,” Jack admitted. “But it’s nothing compared to what you’ve been through.”

Cate grasped his hand and squeezed it. “I’m fine.”

“A fact for which I am very thankful,” Jack said, returning the hand squeeze.

“As am I, lassie,” Stanley chimed in. “Though I must admit, it gave me quite a rush when we hopped back to another era.”

“A rush, Pap, really?” Jack inquired.

“I don’t hate time travel as much as you, Jackie,” Stanley said with a chuckle. “I rather enjoy it. When Lady Cate isn’t missing, of course.”

Jack wrinkled his forehead at him. Michael caught up to them and clapped Jack on the back. “I hate it as much as you do, pal. If you ever want to compare notes, give me a call.”

“I just might do that, friend,” Jack said. “I cannot understand how anyone enjoys this.”

“Oh, come on, it’s amazing!” Damien replied. “We’re living in another culture, basically.”

“I agree, Damien!” Cate said. “It’s fascinating! Outside of the kidnapping part.”

“You two can keep it,” Michael said with a roll of his eyes.

“He’s a real stick in the mud,” Damien complained. Cate giggled at the statement; one she’d often used to describe Jack’s resistance to time travel.

“Speaking of keeping things,” Jack said. “Where did you get this?” Jack pointed to the dress and necklace.

“From our mutual friend,” Cate said.

Jack raised his eyebrows. “He gave you a sapphire and diamond necklace? Is it real?”

“Oh, I’m sure it is,” Damien answered.

“It’s fairly heavy,” Cate added with a shrug. “He told me to keep it to remember him.”

“Oh, wow, this guy kidnaps you then gives you a gift to remember him by? What kind of psychopath is he?” Jack questioned.

“Don’t ask,” Michael called over his shoulder. “You really do not want to know.”

“He’s right,” Damien said with a shudder.

Cate’s glance flitted between both men. Both shared an intense hatred for Duke Northcott. After her trouble with the man, she could only imagine what they had endured at his hands.

They continued up the path toward the castle together. The group talked and laughed, relieved the ordeal was over.

As they rounded a bend in the path near a clump of trees, a man strode into the path in front of them. He clapped his hands in a slow, dramatic fashion.

The group ground to a halt as they came face to face with Marcus Northcott. “Well, well, I see the merry band has succeeded in retrieving dear Catherine. Bravo, Celine.”

Jack pushed Cate behind him, shielding her from the man. Michael and Damien filled in on either side of him to further cover Cate. Cate clung to Jack as she peered over his shoulder.

“No thanks to you, Marcus,” Celine spat at him.

“Au contraire, my dear. After all, I gave you the clue. I had high hopes you would find her. I preferred you did. I rather like Catherine.” Duke Northcott peered over the group and waved a hand to Cate. “Good to see you looking so well, my dear.”

“We need to get out of here,” Damien whispered to Michael.

“I’m all over it, buddy,” Michael said, his eyes darting around the area. “Make a break for those trees?”

“What? Are you crazy?” Jack breathed. “We can’t leave Celine alone with him.” Cate glanced around. Grayson and Stanley had fallen behind on the trek. She spotted them approaching. Grayson’s eyes went wide as he witnessed the scene. He pulled Stanley from the path, hiding him behind a large oak.

“Believe me, she’ll be fine,” Michael answered.

Damien reached back and grasped Cate’s hand as he began to inch toward the grove of trees.

“And where do you think you’re going, Mr. Carlyle?” Duke Northcott inquired. Cate jumped as a bolt of lightning sailed from Duke Northcott’s hand and struck the dirt next to Damien. He danced a few steps back away from it.

“Stop, Marcus,” Celine shouted. She flung a large blue ball of energy toward the man. He deflected it with some sort of ray.

Cate stared wide-eyed at the battle, her jaw hanging agape. She wondered if perhaps she had fallen asleep and was trapped in a dream. What was she witnessing? What were these people?

CHAPTER 30

Cate stared aghast at the battling between Marcus Northcott and Celine Buckley.

Marcus raised his eyebrows at her. “Oh, I think not, dear. I’m only warming up.” He cupped his hand. A crackling ball of light formed above it. Lightning blazed inside. Cate stood stunned at the sight. Duke Northcott lobbed the ball toward them.

Michael and Damien reacted quickly. Damien grabbed Cate by the shoulders and dragged her behind a large tree in the grove. Michael tackled Jack to the ground, rolling off the path with him and down a small grade.

The lightning ball exploded in a brilliant flash, charring the ground underneath it. Cate covered her mouth as a squeal emerged. “Get down!” Damien hissed as he pulled her lower.

“Celine!” Cate shouted.

“Shh, she’s fine! We’ve got to go!”

“No!” Cate argued. She attempted to stand and run to Celine, but Damien pulled her down.

She glanced across the path. Michael held Jack at bay, also. Michael emphatically gestured toward the castle as he shook his head, catching Damien’s eye. He motioned again toward the castle. Damien nodded.

“We can’t run away!” Cate countered. She struggled against Damien’s grip. “We must help Celine! We can’t leave her.”

“All right, Marcus,” Celine said. “If you insist on having this out, let’s.” She narrowed her eyes and swung her hands out to the sides. Her foot stomped on the ground as she let out a shriek.

Cate ceased grappling with Damien as she witnessed the scene unfold. Overhead the skies darkened. Black clouds obliterated the moon and stars. Thunder boomed and lightning tore through the sky. Celine's fingers crackled with electricity.

"As cool as this can be to watch, we need to get out of here," Damien urged. "As you can see, she's quite capable of taking care of herself."

Damien grabbed Cate's hand and pulled her away from the scene. They kept low to the ground as they raced toward the castle. Cate risked a glance back as the battle between Celine and Duke Northcott continued.

Lightning flashed between them. Balls of fire slammed into trees and charred them. Brilliant orbs of light flung in every direction. The dazzling display almost mesmerized Cate. Damien tugged on her arm, urging her to continue.

They hurried to the castle and Damien ushered Cate inside through the front door. She stood speechless in the foyer for a moment as she reflected on what she'd just witnessed. Booms of thunder and blasts of lightning still sounded, announcing the continuation of the battle outside.

Moments later, Michael ushered Jack through the doors. Jack's face betrayed his confusion and astonishment. "Cate!" he exclaimed. "Did you see that?"

"Yes," she nodded, her eyes wide. "What was that?"

"A battle between two supernatural beings," Michael informed him.

"And something you want to be far, far away from," Damien assured them.

"I'm not sure I can believe what I just saw," Cate responded.

"Me either," Jack agreed.

"You two time travel," Damien answered. "You can't honestly question the existence of other supernatural things."

"Oh, I can and I will!" Jack insisted. "Accepting time travel was one thing, this is completely bonkers."

"Bonkers or not, it exists," Michael answered. "And there is a dark side. One you want to stay away from."

"And one this secret needs protecting from. The fact that it's still hidden in our time suggests your family is very good at it," Damien said. "And now it's time for you two to go home."

“No,” Jack countered. “Pap isn’t here. I have to find him. Oh, what if he’s...”

Douglas emerged from the sitting room with Stanley. “Pap! Thank heavens!” Jack exclaimed.

“Yes, Grayson brought me here before returning to help Celine.”

“Oh, Catherine!” Douglas exclaimed. “Oh, how fortunate they have found you. I have been beside myself with worry. I wished to join the search though they maintained I should wait here. Dreadful business, this.”

“You three need to return home,” Damien said.

“Yes, with a device something like this!” Douglas exclaimed as he brandished the timepiece. Noticeably missing was the inscription. He grinned from ear to ear. “I was most pleased to learn I was correct. Much to Jaime’s chagrin.”

Cate smiled at him. “It is an incredible discovery, isn’t it?”

“Most definitely!” Douglas agreed. “Though Jaime views it as a burden, particularly given the circumstances surrounding us now.” Douglas turned serious for a moment. “Oh, Catherine, I am so very sorry about what happened to you. My own progeny stolen from under my roof. Perhaps Jaime has a point.” He turned pensive.

Cate clasped his hand in hers and patted it. “I am unharmed, Douglas. And while the secret must be protected, that doesn’t mean it can’t also be celebrated.”

Jaime joined them in the foyer. “Oh, Catherine, thank heavens! I have been worried about you.”

She smiled at him. “We found her in the nick of time,” Jack assured him.

“Good, quite good.” He clapped Jack on the back.

“Does he know?” Cate whispered to Douglas.

“Indeed,” Douglas confirmed. “Three generations of Reids from various centuries standing in my foyer. Incredible!”

Cate gazed at the scene. Stanley, Jack, and Jaime talked, smiled, laughed, and shook hands. Despite the gravity of the situation, they were incredibly fortunate.

“I hate to break up the family fun,” Michael interjected, “but you three need to go.”

Douglas spun to face Cate and took her hands in his. He studied her face, much like a father studying his child. “I wish we did not have to part so hurriedly. Though I hope when all has settled perhaps we may enjoy a more leisurely visit.”

“I look so forward to that, Douglas,” Cate answered.

“If you can convince Jack. He is, after all, a Reid.”

Jack stepped toward him and extended his hand. “Sir, after this visit, I will never view time travel in the same way. And I will likely complain but I will never object to visiting family. You exhibited a phenomenal level of understanding and assistance in a difficult situation. I will never forget it.”

“Anything for family, Jack,” Douglas said as he grasped his hand. “Now, I suppose you should be on your way.”

Cate nodded. “Yes, we should be,” Cate lamented, the familiar feeling of sadness creeping over her as she prepared to leave her family behind in another time.

“As I understand it, certain areas lead to and from certain time periods,” Douglas said. “Lead the way to your home.”

Cate gave an uncertain glance to Damien as she attempted to formulate the words to ask about his help in their own time. Damien beat her to it.

Damien grasped Cate’s hands in his. “Don’t worry, we’ll be right behind you. Well, sort of. We’ll see you tomorrow and we’ll get you all squared away with your little problem.”

Cate nodded again. “Okay, thank you. And thank you again for finding me. I...”

Damien shook his head as he interrupted her. “There’s no thanks necessary, Cate. I’m glad you’re safe.”

“You’ll be safer once you’re away from you-know-who,” Michael reiterated. “And as much as I’d like to continue sharing our mutual hatred of time travel, it’s time for you three to leave.”

The group said their goodbyes before Cate, Jack, Stanley, Douglas, and Jaime stepped from the foyer. Cate glanced back as they continued down the hall toward the library. Damien nodded and waved as he disappeared into the sitting room. She wondered if she’d actually see him the next day as he promised. It all seemed too strange for her to process.

She and Jack led the way to the library. Jack crossed the room and pressed the stone to trigger the mechanism to open Douglas’s laboratory. Douglas’s eyebrows raised as the bookcase swung open.

“The time rip is...” he began.

“In your secret lab, yes,” Cate finished for him.

A half-smile crossed his lips and he chuckled. "Fitting," he murmured.

The group descended the stairs into the cool air below. Cate held out the timepiece. Jack and Stanley both grasped it with her. "Goodbye, Douglas," she said.

"Goodbye, Catherine. And good luck," he answered.

Cate nodded and the three activated the timepiece. Cate smiled at Douglas just before he disappeared from her sight, replaced by a glaring light standing where he had stood only seconds before.

"Whew," Jack breathed as he pressed his hands over his chest. "It's good to be back."

"Aye," Stanley agreed. "Good to have the lassie back where she belongs." He squeezed her arm and gave her a nod.

"The lassie is quite glad to be back where she belongs, too," Cate said.

"You must be exhausted," Jack stated. "I'll tell Mrs. Fraser you're back but are feeling under the weather and going straight to bed."

"You'd better not," Cate warned. "That will send Mrs. Fraser into a tizzy, and she'll fuss over me to no end. I'll change and let her know myself."

"Cate, you've lived through days and only four hours have passed! You've got to be exhausted."

"Well, yes and no. I'm too wired to be exhausted. I feel like so much has happened. Would you mind if we had our usual post-time travel discussion? Mr. Reid, you're welcome to join us."

Stanley smiled at her. "Thank you, but I'll pass and leave you and Jackie to your discussion. This old man is heading home to sleep off the time lag!"

"I'll drive you," Jack said.

Stanley waved at him. "Bah, I'm not THAT old. I'll walk."

"Pap..." Jack began.

"Take care of Lady Cate," Stanley insisted. "I'll take a stroll through the property to the cottage before a nice long sleep. The fresh air will do me good. I'm glad you're okay, lassie." He winked at them before disappearing up the stairs.

Jack's eyes followed his departure. "He's one tough bugger. I am wiped out!"

"If you prefer to change and relax, we can postpone our discussion."

“No, like you, I am also wired. Some of the things we witnessed I’m not sure I can process. I’d feel better if we talked about it.”

“Okay, sounds good. Usual spot after we change?”

“Perfect. Unless you prefer to rest, I can come to you.”

“No, that’s fine. I’d rather make everything look as normal as possible for Molly and the Frasers.”

“Good idea. Okay, see you soon.”

Cate nodded and they parted ways. Cate pushed through the doors into her suite. Riley and Bailey lifted their heads from their fireside spot. Tears welled in Cate’s eyes as she spotted them. “Riley! Bailey!” she exclaimed as she rushed to them with her arms outstretched. She gathered both pups to her, showering them with kisses and ear scratches. Memories of her predicament rushed into her mind. She recalled wondering if she’d ever see her two beloved pups again.

She wiped a tear from her cheek as she pushed the disturbing memories away. She had survived. She would focus on that.

Cate forced herself to stand and change her clothes. The sooner she was back to normal, the better, she figured. Her eyes fell to the large gemstones as she pulled the necklace from around her neck. “Keep this as a reminder of me,” Duke Northcott’s voice echoed in her head. With a shudder, she dumped the piece in the bottom drawer of her jewelry armoire. Perhaps she could donate it for the auction at the President’s Ball.

Before meeting Jack, Cate navigated to the kitchen. She knocked on the door jamb. “Just wanted to let you know I’m back, though I’ll handle my own dinner.”

“Oh, Lady Cate!” Mrs. Fraser said. “No need. I’ve just finished preparing your dinner and was going to put it in the refrigerator with a note. You’ve saved me the trouble.”

“Thank you, though you didn’t have to do that,” Cate answered.

“We didn’t want you making cereal for dinner,” Molly said with a chuckle. “And besides, with me here full-time, if you’re late for dinner, I can always make it whenever you’re back.”

“Thanks, Molly. Though, again, not necessary. By the way, while I was in town, I got a text from...” Cate stumbled for a moment as she attempted to explain. “A friend. He is in Scotland and may stop in for a few days beginning tomorrow. I apologize for the short notice, he...”

Mrs. Fraser waved away Cate's concern. "No problem at all, Lady Cate. Your friend is most welcome in your castle anytime! Is he a picky eater? Any food allergies?"

Cate shook her head. "No, and he has a guest or two with him. With the short notice, I don't expect you and Molly to be responsible for meals. We can eat in town, or I can order in. Please don't go to any trouble."

"I'm starting to wonder if you dinnae like my cooking, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser teased.

"It's nothing like that," Cate assured her. "But with this last-minute development, I don't expect you both to be whipping up meals for a crowd on short notice."

Mrs. Fraser shook her head. "Two or three guests is hardly a crowd. Molly and I are quite capable and if you've no special requests, it should be an easy task. Molly and I will make up a few bedrooms tomorrow morning for them. I'll put them in the hallway near your suite."

"I am indebted to you both," Cate said. "And I can take my meal with me along with Jack's. After my surprise trip into town, we got behind on our discussions about the leak we've been dealing with."

"Dining in the library, is he?" Mrs. Fraser questioned.

"Yes, at my request," Cate said.

"Well, Molly can help you carry the trays. Are you feeling all right, Lady Cate?" Mrs. Fraser asked as Cate slid her tray off the counter.

"Yes," Cate assured her. "Just a little tired, but I'm fine!"

"Be sure you get plenty of rest tonight before your guests arrive! You don't want to catch a cold with all the entertaining you'll be doing."

"I will," Cate promised.

Molly followed Cate to the library with Jack's dinner tray. Both dogs raced ahead of them to greet Jack. "Special delivery," Molly said as she set the tray down for Jack.

"Thanks, Molly," Cate said before Molly slipped through the doors on her way back to the kitchen.

Cate collapsed into the chair next to Jack. He sank back into the armchair and slouched with a long exhale. "Did that just happen?"

"Which part?" Cate questioned.

"Any part. All parts. Every part," Jack answered.

Cate shook her head. "I've been wondering that myself. It's surreal."

"What was going on between those two... what did Michael call them?"

Cate's eyes widened. "Supernatural creatures," Cate answered.

"The guy threw a lightning bolt from his hand!" Jack exclaimed.

"And Celine can open time portals. Oh, and levitate light balls from her hand. She did it in the secret passage when Damien and I were hiding from Duke Northcott there. I nearly collapsed."

"I would have collapsed," Jack said. "I nearly did when she opened the time portal to send me back here. And gave me a charm to return to 1792 with Pap. And the other two with her. Just calm and casual like nothing's amiss. Hey, you two time travel, you should be okay with supernatural things!" Jack mimicked.

"So that's how you got back, huh? I was wondering. I can't believe we met other time travelers," Cate said with a shake of her head. "Though it explains a lot."

"It explains nothing. Things just keep getting more complicated."

"Well, it explains why I couldn't find anything on Michael Carlyle or Damien. First of all, Damien's last name is Sherwood, not Carlyle and second, the information I found on Michael Carlyle from the modern-day is correct. There wasn't a Michael Carlyle in 1792. It also explains the origins of both the warlock story with Douglas and the tales from town about the events on a certain March evening when the skies clouded, and lightning went from the ground to the sky."

Jack shook his head at the turn of events. "Yeah, every tale begins with a kernel of truth, I guess."

Cate nodded. "Those people witnessed the battle between Duke Northcott and Celine. So did we, up close and personal. Thank goodness for Michael and Damien who probably saved our lives."

"I like Michael. He seemed like a good guy."

Cate offered a wry glance. "You just like him because he hates time travel, too."

"Like I said, he seems like a good guy," Jack answered.

"Do you suppose they'll show up tomorrow? Damien and Celine? Michael, perhaps?"

Jack shrugged. "I'm not sure. I don't know what to expect. They insisted they would, and I sincerely hope they do because without them our problem isn't solved. Though I honestly cannot imagine they will just pop up at the door."

“How can Celine exist in 1792 and here? Does she time travel from the past to the future?”

“I suppose we’ll find out,” Jack answered. “Or not if they never show.”

Silence passed between them for a moment while each of them picked at their food. “Are you certain you’re okay, Cate?” Jack questioned after a moment.

“Yes,” Cate assured him. “I’m okay. Damien found me in time. I mean, I was in and out but...”

“No, that’s not what I mean,” Jack interrupted. “I mean like mentally also. You spent days with some supernatural creature. Did he hurt you? He didn’t throw any lightning bolts at you or anything, did he?”

Cate chuckled at the ridiculous-sounding statement. “No, no lightning bolts. We were talking and then he touched my cheek and I passed out. When I woke up, I was in a bedroom. Frightened but unharmed. He was actually charming in a strange sort of way.”

“Charming?!” Jack guffawed. “Are you crazy? This guy kidnapped you!”

“No, that’s not what I meant. For a deranged kidnapper, he was quite the conversationalist. An old-fashioned gentleman. I wonder what happened between him and Celine? And Damien and Michael?”

“I shudder to think you were forced into a conversation with that man. I’m glad we are away from him. I hope forever. It’s clear both the Buckleys and Carlyles detest him. Or rather the Carlyles and Sherwoods, or whatever. There has to be a strong reason.”

“Perhaps we’ll learn more tomorrow... if they show up.”

“I really hope they do. After all this, I hope our problems are all solved.”

“Me too,” Cate admitted. “Me too.”

* * *

Cate laid awake for most of the night. Tension lodged between her shoulder blades as she tossed and turned, unable to sleep. Would Celine and Damien arrive tomorrow? Would she slip away into another era before they came? Would another nightmare of the Duke disrupt her sleep? Perhaps her nightmares stemmed from the danger she faced from him. Perhaps now that she was saved and away from him, the nightmares would cease. They had solved one problem with ensuring Douglas had a method to control the time rips. Had they solved two and relieved her nightmares as well? Time would tell.

Still, the most crucial problem remained unsolved. Time rips opened and closed without warning, swallowing her, Jack, and now Molly. How much longer could they survive like this before tragedy struck?

As the sun rose over the moors, Cate rose from her bed and paced the floor of her suite. Whatever today brought, she prayed it moved them closer to a solution. Following breakfast, Cate took a stroll with Riley and Bailey. She stared out over the calm waters of the loch.

As they returned to the castle, the dogs bounded toward their favorite spot in the garden. Cate shooed them away before they could do any more damage, hurrying them into the castle's kitchen.

"How was the walk?" Molly asked.

"Pleasant, as always," Cate responded.

"Any word from your friends?" Molly inquired.

"No, nothing yet," Cate answered. "Unless they've popped in already this morning!"

"Nay, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser answered. "No one's arrived yet."

"Didn't they give you an ETA?" Molly questioned.

"They didn't. I'm not sure they knew how long it would take them to wrap up their business and get to Dunhaven," Cate fibbed. "I'm expecting them this afternoon, but I don't have a definite time."

"Well, either way, we'll be prepared," Mrs. Fraser answered. "I've got lunch planned for everyone and if we don't use it today, we can use it tomorrow."

"Thanks, Mrs. Fraser, you really are the best."

"Spending the day with your journals again?" Mrs. Fraser asked.

"Yes, they are fascinating," Cate said, though she didn't imagine she could focus on any work. "They will make a great addition to my book!"

"Anything about Douglas being a warlock?" Mrs. Fraser quipped.

"Sorry, no candid revelation about him being a warlock."

Molly bit her lower lip. Cate assumed she was fretting over her odd experience from two days prior. Molly had made no mention of her ghost sighting after the initial conversation, but Cate could tell it still bothered her.

“All just gossip,” Mrs. Fraser answered, waving her hand in the air to dismiss the rumors.

“Yep,” Cate agreed. “Well, I’ll be upstairs, and I’ll let you know if I hear anything from Damien!”

Cate wandered upstairs with the dogs in tow and settled in the library. She stared at the journals before paging through them. She opened a document on her laptop to continue typing ciphertext but found herself unable to concentrate. Instead, she opted for pacing the library floor.

Hours wore on as Cate waited for some word from Damien. She sat down at her laptop to email him multiple times before deciding against it. Morning crept to afternoon and Cate finished her lunch. After handing the empty tray to Molly, a knock sounded at the door.

“Got a minute?” Jack asked as Molly skirted past him.

“Yep. Come on in.”

“About the leak,” Jack said in a loud voice as he pushed the doors shut. Once closed, he spun to face Cate. “Anything?”

Cate shook her head. “Nope, nothing. Not even an email. I keep wanting to email him but I’m afraid of his reaction. What if this was all some kind of weird joke or odd coincidence?”

“He said he knew you, right?”

“Yes, he’s the one who sent the program.”

“That is an odd coincidence,” Jack said as he shook his head. “Perhaps too odd.”

“Do you think he was using me to get information or something?”

“To what end?”

“To learn about the time rips? I’m not sure,” Cate said with a shrug. “Nothing makes sense anymore. With everything that’s happened over the past few days, my mind is swimming. Up is down, left is right. I can’t make sense of anything.”

“After the past day. We’ve lived through days, but it’s only been a day here.”

Cate’s eyebrows shot up. “Perhaps that’s it. We lived through days. Perhaps when Damien said tomorrow, he meant tomorrow from the day we were living. Which is days from now.”

“Days where anything could go wrong,” Jack lamented.

Cate sighed. “Yep.”

“So, do we just wait for days?” Jack questioned.

“I don’t see what other choice we have.”

“And what do we do in days if they don’t show up then?”

Cate shrugged and opened her mouth to answer when a loud thud sounded at the front door.

CHAPTER 31

Cate raised her eyebrows and glanced at Jack. “Could it be?”

They hurried down the hall to the door. Cate’s heart hammered in her chest as she placed her hand on the door handle. She glanced at Jack who offered an encouraging nod.

Cate swallowed hard and pulled the door open. Her eyes went wide as a variety of emotions surged through her from shock to relief. Damien, Celine, Michael, and another man stood outside the door. They appeared identical, more or less, to when Cate had seen them less than twenty-four hours ago in another century.

“Hi, Cate!” Damien said with a broad grin. “Long time, no see!”

A moment of lightheadedness passed over Cate as she took in the situation. They had come. Perhaps now they could solve their problem.

“And not a moment too soon,” Jack answered.

“Yes,” Cate agreed. “Come in, please.”

Cate ushered them into the foyer. “The old place looks good,” Damien quipped.

“Looks better in this century if you ask me,” Michael said. He glanced at Jack. “I assume you have bathrooms.”

“That we do, mate, that we do!” Jack answered.

He and Michael shared a knowing glance.

“I hope you don’t mind,” Celine began. She sounded distinctly American, having lost all traces of any of the slight French accent she carried in 1792. Her blond locks now flowed freely rather than being pinned up in an upswept style and she wore modern clothes. Though nothing else about her had changed. "I brought Gray's cousin, Alexander, to help."

"Not at all," Cate answered. "We appreciate all your help. Gray..." Cate phrased the last word as a question, leaving his name hanging in the air.

"Is at home in Maine," Celine said with a smile, realizing the question Cate implied. "He can access Alexander's reference library if we need information."

She smiled at Celine then turned to Alexander, who extended his hand to shake hers. "Lady Cate," he greeted her in a crisp British accent. "A pleasure to meet you. I was most curious when I learned of your predicament."

"We hope you can help," Jack said. "Oh, by the way, Cate and I are the only two in the house who know the secret so, mum's the word." Jack held his finger to his lips.

"Got it," Damien responded.

"We're pretty good at secrets," Michael assured him.

"Shall we go into the sitting room?" Cate offered.

"I'll let Mrs. Fraser know everyone is here," Jack said. "You can explain the loads of fun we've been having with the time rips."

"Okay," Cate said with a nod.

Jack strode down the hall as the rest of the group shuffled into the sitting room. "He's not staying?" Damien questioned as he sat next to Cate on the loveseat.

"No," Cate said with a shake of her head. "It may appear a bit odd for my estate manager to stay while I'm entertaining."

Damien's brow furrowed. "Oh," he murmured. "I thought... never mind."

Cate cocked her head at him. "What?" she asked.

Damien shrugged. "I thought you two were actually married. It's just... weird to realize you're not and he's your estate manager."

"Ohhhh," Cate responded with a knowing nod. "Yes, we usually pretend to be a married couple when time traveling. It may look odd for a man and woman to be traipsing around the Scottish countryside unwed in past eras."

Damien smiled and nodded. "Good point. You two do a good job of it. Smart!"

Cate returned his smile.

"No more trouble with the Duke?" Michael inquired.

“No,” Cate answered. “Since we returned late yesterday afternoon, nothing.”

“We were worried he may have followed you here,” Damien answered.

“I’m glad he didn’t,” Celine added. “What can you tell us about the problems you’ve been experiencing with the time rips? We’ve filled Alexander in but it’s best if you reiterate the details. The last time I spoke with you was over two hundred years ago.” Celine chuckled at the last statement.

Cate remained silent for a moment as she processed Celine’s admission. The woman sitting in front of her had lived for over two hundred years. Or was she merely making a joke?

“For us, it was just yesterday,” Damien said. “But for Celine, it was two hundred years ago.”

Cate nodded and swallowed hard as Damien confirmed Celine’s age. She had, indeed, lived for over two centuries. The fact astounded Cate and she found it difficult to pull her thoughts together.

“Well...” Cate began before pausing as she attempted to collect her thoughts.

“Take your time,” Damien said, patting Cate’s arm. “It’s a lot to take in.”

Cate cleared her throat and began. “As Jack and I told you yesterday... or two hundred years ago,” she began with a nervous chuckle. “When I arrived at the castle, the time rips were controlled by the timepiece. To open a time portal, we’d activate the timepiece and be able to slip back and forth between eras.

“But then in the last two weeks or so, we’ve experienced some disruptions with the time rips. They open and close at random and we can’t control them with the timepiece. The timepiece still slows to represent the entry into the time portal, but we can’t open and close it like usual. Instead, we’re just sucked into the other time period and stuck there until we get pulled back.”

Celine narrowed her eyes and pursed her lips as Cate spoke.

“Does it happen in every rip location?” Damien questioned.

Cate shrugged. “I’m not sure. I haven’t ventured to all the locations where we know time rips exist, to be honest. Though it doesn’t always happen where there is a time rip. My bedroom is a prime example. It leads to 1925. Twice I’ve been sucked back there and returned within a few moments, but I've slept in that room for the past two weeks and all but two times remained in my own century.

"It has occurred in the rip leading to 1792 multiple times as well. And there's something else. It seems to be occurring in places where we didn't realize a rip existed. For example, the hallway leading to the library. We had no knowledge of a time rip there and several people have been sucked back in time. Of course, we do not have an exhaustive list so it may not be a new location."

"Hmm, so that makes it impossible to tell," Damien said. "Unless you spend a decent amount of time in the rip location it may not happen."

"As far as you knew there was no time rip in the hallway, right?" Michael questioned.

"Right. And it happens to everyone, even people without the timepiece. My housekeeper-in-training, Molly, got sucked into a time portal a few days ago. She swore she spotted a ghost. She has no idea a real, live woman stood in front of her and she was in another era."

"I'd like to see the locations, one where a known time rip exists and the other where you didn't realize one existed," Celine requested.

"Sure," Cate agreed. "If you'll follow me, I can show you one of each."

Everyone rose and headed toward the foyer except Michael. "You coming?" Damien inquired as he sat drumming his fingers on the chair's arm.

"Nope," he answered.

Cate furrowed her brow at his response. "It's not very far..."

Michael interrupted her. "I have no desire to be in a location where I could accidentally slip back in time with no way to return. I'll stay right here. Oh, unless you've slipped into another time period here?"

"No, we've never had it happen here," Cate answered.

"Yet," Damien said with a wink and a grin as he left a frowning Michael behind. "He has no sense of adventure."

Cate chuckled at the statement as they joined Celine and Alexander in the foyer. Cate led them down the hall toward the library. She stopped before they reached it. "This is the hallway where we've experienced a lot of activity. Prior to this, we didn't realize any time rips existed here, but both Jack and I along with Molly have slipped into the past."

Celine nodded as she glanced around the space. Cate remained silent for a moment as she watched Celine. After a moment, her eyes flitted around the space trying to determine what Celine was seeing.

Celine narrowed her eyes and reached her hand out. She spread her fingers, twirling them as she swiveled her wrist as though grasping something. Cate scrunched her eyebrows together and stared at the invisible item Celine grasped.

Alexander raised his eyebrows at her. "This wasn't here in 1792," Celine informed him.

"Interesting," he answered as he stared at her hand. "What are you seeing?"

"What are YOU seeing?" Celine asked, directing the question back to Alexander.

"A distortion," Alexander said. "Portals usually have smoother edges. This one is rough, distended."

"And spiked," Celine added.

Alexander narrowed his eyes and leaned closer to her hand. Celine grabbed his hand. "It's easier to feel them."

"Oh, yes," he answered as she guided his hand. "I feel them now."

Cate stared at the scene unfolding, unable to make sense of it. "This is..." she murmured under her breath, unable to finish the statement.

"Weird," Damien finished for her. "Yeah, I know. You get used to it. They are far more perceptive than we are about these things."

"Are the time portals you use invisible?" Cate questioned.

"No, not even to us. When Celine opens a time portal, you know it. The wind is howling. It sounds like a train coming straight for you and a giant black hole opens."

Cate raised her eyebrows at the description. "Wow. That's... well, I'm not sure I would have gotten Jack into one of those."

Damien chuckled. "Michael only went into one because Gray shoved us through while we were both still in shock over the whole 'witches and warlocks exist' thing."

Cate pursed her lips. "You seem to have lived quite an interesting life, Damien."

"And you don't even know the half of it," he said with an eye roll.

"Where is the other?" Celine inquired.

"In Douglas's lab. This way."

Cate led them into the library. "Wow! Great library!" Damien exclaimed.

“Thank you! I can’t take credit for decorating it, but I enjoy it quite a bit.”

Riley and Bailey stood and stretched from their spots near the fireplace. They each eyed the newcomers. Bailey sniffed in the air at them before giving a shrill bark. Riley offered a few yips too.

“Oh, dogs!” Damien exclaimed.

“Yep. Meet Riley and Bailey,” Cate said. “My two best buddies! Boys, quiet!”

“Are they friendly?” Damien asked.

“Yes,” Cate answered. “Just a little barky.”

Celine approached them, squatting down and extending her hand. She stared at each of them. The dogs seemed mesmerized by her presence. Both quieted, approached her, and sat as she scratched their ears.

“Now there’s a trick worth having,” Cate quipped.

She continued across the room and pressed the stone trigger on the fireplace’s edge to open the secret passage to Douglas’s lab.

Damien’s eyes grew wide, and his jaw dropped. “Wow, cool, a secret passage!”

Cate plugged in the lighting before they proceeded down the stairs. “This was Douglas’s secret lab. We discovered it a few months ago. The dogs kept barking at the bookcase. We assumed there was a leak somewhere but then we discovered all this.”

“Woowooow!” Damien breathed. He gaped around at the various contraptions Cate had sorted through. “Douglas was quite the inventor.”

“Yes, he was. I’m still sorting through his journals and notes, but he was quite a visionary.”

“No doubt the time traveling helped,” Damien answered.

“It’s likely, yes,” Cate responded. “This area contains a time rip. This is how we accessed 1792.”

Celine nodded. “Yes, I see it.”

“Is it like the other? Distorted?”

“Yes, it is,” Celine answered.

“And also has a few spikes,” Alexander chimed in.

“I studied a few of these when I visited in 1792. Would you mind if we wandered around and observed?” Celine asked.

“Not at all,” Cate answered. “Feel free.”

“Thanks.”

Celine and Alexander departed, leaving Damien and Cate alone in the lab. Damien peered around the space. "You can have a peek around if you'd like," Cate offered.

"Thanks!" Damien replied. "This is so cool. All these inventions in a secret lab!"

Cate didn't respond right away. "Oh, sorry. I didn't mean to treat your home like a curiosity shop," Damien added.

"No, not at all. I treat it like one!" They both chuckled before Cate continued. "I'm just... I find it interesting you are so fascinated by this."

"Why?" Damien asked as he studied the lightbulb prototype.

"You seem to have lived a life far more interesting than a few secret passages and some strange inventions."

"Ah, you mean the supernatural stuff," Damien conjectured.

"Right. I cannot imagine living with... well, whatever you live with on a day-to-day basis."

"You mean with the fireballs and time portals and stuff?" he inquired as he squinted at the staircase to nowhere.

"Yes, that. And the living for centuries. And the weird touch that makes you pass out. Duke Northcott did that to me twice."

"Yeah, Celine can do that, too. It can be helpful when you can't sleep! But it is super weird."

Cate nodded as Damien continued his exploration of the lab. "So, is Alexander..."

"A centuries-old warlock, too, yeah."

"But you and Michael are..."

"Just humans, yep," Damien said as he completed his circuit of the room.

Cate shook her head. "You say it all so matter-of-factly. I don't understand how you do it!"

"Well, when I first found out, I freaked out. But I've since gotten used to it. You get used to it," Damien replied. "And you have a freak out, albeit a more tempered one, every now and again when you find out about even more strange stuff you never realized existed."

His last statement produced a chuckle from Cate. "It's good to realize you aren't just cool as a cucumber while chaos reigns around you. I feel completely inept at dealing with this. The whole thing makes my brain hurt."

“It takes some getting used to. But at least now you know there are other people in the world dealing with the supernatural... oddities of the world. You’ll always have a friend in me... use us as a sounding board if you need one.” Damien gave her an awkward grin and a bit of color rushed into his cheeks. “Shall we head up? Maybe check on Michael?”

“Sure,” Cate agreed.

They climbed the stairs into the library and navigated to the sitting room. Cate pushed through the doors with Damien behind her. They found the space empty. Cate’s stomach turned over as she eyed the empty armchair across the room.

“Uh-oh,” she murmured as she glanced around in search of the man. “Do you think he tried to follow us or went for a walk? Or got sucked into a time portal we didn’t know existed?”

“Mmm, probably the former. Celine didn’t mention a time portal here. Let’s go check around for him,” Damien suggested.

As they re-entered the foyer, the sound of loud laughter reached their ears. Cate glanced up the main staircase, following the sound. Michael and Jack rounded the corner from the hall and descended the stairs. The two talked and laughed as though they were old friends.

“There you are!” Damien called.

“Yes, we were just taking the luggage up,” Michael said, thumbing toward the upstairs.

“Aye, and having quite the discussion,” Jack said as he continued to chuckle.

Michael clapped his arm around Jack’s shoulders and pointed his finger at him. “We have GOT to have this guy out to Bucksville. Especially right around the time you start discussing time travel as the solution to any problem we have. He can talk some sense into you.”

“Listen, mate, I’ve got the same problem here,” Jack said, motioning to Cate.

“It’s not that I mind using it as a method to solve problems, but I cannot fathom what these two enjoy about it,” Michael added.

“Neither can I. Though I must admit, meeting my ancestors has been well worth the inconveniences.”

Michael gave a half-smile. “Okay, you have a point there.”

“We’ve never met any ancestors,” Damien chimed in.

“If you have the chance, take it,” Jack said.

“Noted,” Michael replied. He faced Damien. “Where are Celine and Alexander?”

“Exploring the castle and studying the time rips.”

“Anything so far?”

“They are appearing in new locations than Celine noted in the 1700s and they are distorted and spiked.”

“What does that mean?” Jack questioned.

“No idea,” Damien said with a shrug. “But I’m guessing the spikes and distortions are what’s causing your problems.”

“What could cause new rips to appear?” Cate asked.

“What caused them to be there in the first place?” Michael inquired.

“I’m not certain,” Cate answered.

“Perhaps they always existed,” Jack suggested. “The land was considered cursed.”

“Alexander and Celine may have a better idea. We can connect over dinner and determine what they’ve come up with,” Damien suggested.

“Oh, could we keep dinner conversation time rip-free and save it for afterward? Then Jack can join, and the Frasers and Molly won’t overhear anything,” Cate said.

“Sounds good!” Damien responded.

“Would you like to head back into the sitting room?” Cate questioned.

“Would you mind if we took a look around the castle?” Damien inquired.

“Not at all. Would you like the full tour?” Cate asked.

“Sure,” Damien answered with a grin. “If you don’t mind!”

* * *

The group gathered in the sitting room following their evening meal. Mrs. Fraser and Molly provided them with hot cocoa and shortbread cookies as an after-dinner dessert as they settled in. After Cate assured her she could take care of the cleanup, Molly agreed to retire for the evening to read in her room.

Jack slipped into the room shortly after Molly’s departure. “I hope you didn’t start without me,” he quipped as he slid into an armchair near Cate.

“We wouldn’t dream of it,” Cate assured him. “Though I must say I’m more than curious about what you’ve found.”

“As am I, though I’m more interested in whether or not you’ve found a solution,” Jack added.

“A solution, no, but information, yes,” Celine answered.

Cate’s shoulders sagged a bit at her response. With no solution in sight from the only person who could help them, perhaps their problem would never be solved.

“Don’t worry. Celine will find one,” Damien assured her.

“What did you learn?” Michael prompted.

“A few things,” Celine began. “First, the portals, or time rips, as you call them, remain distorted as they were in 1792. This is what causes the time differential when you travel through them. That remains unchanged. Which explains why whenever the timepiece interacts with one it slows when you slip through.”

“Okay,” Cate said. “That makes sense.”

“The second major thing we learned is that new portals are opening in locations they did not exist in before,” Celine continued.

“Like the one in the hall to the library?” Jack inquired.

Celine nodded. “Yes. That one did not exist in 1792.”

“But others did? Beyond the rip we used to access that year?” Cate questioned.

“Yes,” Celine confirmed. “Several existed already in 1792, but there are far more now.”

“Since they are new, would the timepiece not control them?”

Damien shook his head. “That can’t be the problem,” he inferred.

Cate glanced at him and scrunched up her face. Damien explained, “If that was the case, you’d only slip into and out of new portals. But you’ve been slipping into and out of ALL the portals. Even the ones the timepiece used to control.”

“Right, D,” Celine confirmed. “Which leads me to our third discovery. The spikes surrounding the portals. They weren’t there in 1792. The time portals are morphing.”

“Morphing? How? Why?” Jack asked.

“We’re not certain why, perhaps due to the new portals emerging,” Alexander answered.

“Is there a way to re-enchant the timepiece to take the transformations into account?” Cate asked.

“That’s what we’re still figuring out,” Celine responded. “You said this has all occurred over the span of a few weeks?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod. “Actually, within two weeks.”

“Right, Monday marks two weeks since we’ve noticed the issues. The issue seems to be becoming more prevalent by the day.”

“So, this is progressing and fairly quickly,” Damien said.

“It seems to be,” Cate agreed.

“I’d like to assess where these time rips are tomorrow,” Celine answered. “If we can determine how they are morphing, if they are growing, how many are appearing, and whether or not the spikes resorb, we may have a better idea how to combat the issue.”

“How is this different from in Douglas’s time?” Cate questioned. “He also experienced random openings of the time rips like we are.”

“He did, yes,” Celine answered. “I enchanted the watch to hold them closed unless he opened them. Those portals were only distended, not spiked.”

“So, you need another enchantment,” Michael suggested. “One that handles whatever the spikes do.”

“Therein lies the issue,” Alexander commented. “Other than circumventing the current enchantment at times, we aren’t sure what the spikes do.”

“Any theories?” Jack questioned.

Celine and Alexander shared a glance.

“Nothing beyond pure conjecture,” Alexander said.

“That glance between you suggests more than pure conjecture,” Jack countered.

Celine heaved a sigh. “The working theory is that the portals are morphing and melding to become a universal time portal.”

CHAPTER 32

“A what?” Cate asked, her eyebrows shooting high.

“A universal time portal,” Celine repeated. “It’s a...”

“A portal that can access any point in time,” Damien finished for her as he stared into space, amazed by the idea.

“You mean... go anywhere in time?” Jack asked.

“Yes.”

“How? Would you just slip through the portal and end up in a random era?” Cate questioned.

“No, you’d need a mechanism to control when and where you’d travel to, right?” Damien conjectured.

“Yes, which explains why the timepiece doesn’t effectively work,” Celine answered.

Jack wiped his brow. “Universal time portal,” he repeated. “This is...”

“Amazing,” Cate finished for him. “Access to any time you want or need. Absolutely astounding.”

“A real game-changer,” Damien agreed.

“And a more dangerous secret,” Jack added.

“Yes,” Celine concurred. “Access to a specific set of years is one thing but access to any year is another. The secret must be kept as quiet as possible.”

“If that is what’s going on here,” Michael chimed in. “You said you weren’t certain, right?”

“Right,” Celine admitted.

“Okay, so assuming you are correct, is there a way you can control the universal portal? Some mechanism like the timepiece that can be used to open and close the portal and control the date you travel to?” Damien inquired.

“In theory, yes, though I’d need to do some research to get everything correct,” Celine answered.

“We plan to call Gray after our discussion and research some references in my library,” Alexander added.

Damien nodded.

“What if that’s not what’s happening?” Michael questioned.

“We’d have to determine why the timepiece is failing to control the rips, both old and new. In theory, it should interact with either. If they remain separate, we need to determine how to deal with the spikes to create a device that properly holds them closed unless activated.”

“But you believe you can find a solution, right?” Jack inquired.

“Yes,” Celine answered. “We can find a solution to control this.”

“How certain are you?” Jack asked. “I’m sorry,” he added, “I don’t mean to sound ungrateful or distrustful, but the stakes are high for us. If this continues, it puts everyone in the castle in danger and makes it far more likely the secret will be discovered. Short of shutting the castle down to any outsiders and telling anyone who sets foot inside the truth, there’s not much we can do.”

“I understand,” Celine answered. “But I’m certain. I’ve seen a universal time portal before. When I saw it, it had already finished its formation. But the descriptions of the melding rips into the universal portal match what we’re experiencing here.”

“So, you have some experience with this?” Cate asked with hope filling her voice.

“Yes,” Celine said. “Not with creating a device to interact with them but with the phenomenon itself. Though I’m confident we can get this under control.”

Cate breathed a sigh of relief at Celine’s statement. “Okay,” she said. “Thank you.”

“Yes, thanks,” Jack said. “Looks like we wait to see what’s happening tomorrow then.”

“Sounds like a plan,” Damien agreed. “Should we hit the hay for the night? I’m tired! We took a flight here. I haven’t used commercial air travel in a while.” He stretched and yawned.

Cate giggled as she nodded. “Sure, I’ll show you to your rooms.”

“Thanks!”

The group followed Cate upstairs and she pointed out their bedrooms. After a brief discussion with Celine about the best location to place a call to Gray, Cate and Jack departed, continuing to their bedrooms.

As they neared Jack’s door, Cate sighed. “So, what do you think?” she asked.

Jack shrugged and pursed his lips before answering. “I honestly don’t know. I hope they can fix this. They seem to think they can, and they did help Douglas, but maybe they’re being overconfident.”

“They seem determined,” Cate said. “They did show up as they promised. And Celine seems to have some knowledge of what’s happening.”

Jack shook his head. “Unbelievable,” he said.

“What is?”

“She’s seen one of these things before. A universal time portal? And there’s another one somewhere? And people time travel all the time. These people time travel all the time!”

“I know! My mind is swimming. All this time we assumed Dunhaven held this secret that existed nowhere else. I guess it was a rather narrow view of the world.”

“I suppose you’re right,” Jack answered. “It was rather naive to assume we cornered the market on time travel.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “They seem so savvy about all of this.”

“Well, I guess when you’ve been dealing with it for over two centuries, it’s second nature.”

Cate shrugged. “Michael and Damien are both human, so they couldn’t have been dealing with it for longer than they’ve been alive. They seem to take it in stride. At least Damien does. He talks about it like it’s normal.”

“Perhaps when you’re living with it on a constant basis, it becomes normal. Kind of like us and time traveling. A year ago, I’d have locked you in the looney bin if you’d discussed time traveling to solve a crime, now it’s barely shocking.”

“Maybe,” Cate said pensively.

“You okay?” Jack inquired.

“Yeah,” Cate said with a nod and a smile. “It’s just that this whole situation is still incredible to me. It’s hard to process.”

“I understand exactly what you’re saying. My mind can’t wrap around everything we’ve learned and experienced in such a short time. And now the universal time portal bombshell on top of it all.”

“Right! A universal time portal? I mean, my mind is racing in a thousand different directions at the possibilities of that but at the same time it seems too impossible to believe!”

“Why? We had time portals to specific years, why not one to any year?”

“I don’t know why that seems more improbable than the former, but it does. Perhaps they’ve got it wrong, though.”

“Time will tell. Pun intended, lassie,” Jack said with a wink.

“You should try your stand-up comedy routine on the newcomers.”

“Yeah, they seem to have a great sense of humor for the time travel jokes. Well, perhaps Michael does. He’d get it.”

“You really like him, huh?”

“Ah, yes. A fellow man who appreciates the downside of time travel as much as I do. Yes, I like him very much.”

“A comrade in arms, is it?”

Jack nodded. “It seems you’ve found one in Damien. I still think he likes you.”

“I think he’s just a nice guy who wants to help,” Cate countered.

“Well, either way, let’s hope he can. Or Celine can.”

“I’ll keep my fingers crossed,” Cate said as she flashed a set of crossed fingers. “I suppose we should head to bed.”

“You feel okay sleeping in a room with a morphing time portal?” Jack inquired.

“I guess so. Probably better than I did before.”

“Better than before?” Jack questioned.

“Yeah. At least if I disappear this time, Celine can send you back to find me!”

“Good point.”

“And besides, your bedroom isn’t very far from mine. For all we know, the time portal has already expanded well beyond the confines of my bedroom. You could get sucked back, too!”

“At least we’d be together in 1925 or wherever we got sent,” Jack conjectured.

“True. Well, anyway, if I don’t show up for breakfast tomorrow, ask Celine for help to come and find me.”

“Will do. Good night, Cate.”

“Good night, Jack.”

Cate continued down the hall to her bedroom suite. Riley and Bailey had already wandered into the bedroom and curled in their beds during her conversation with Jack. “You two are both lazy bones,” Cate said as she changed into her nightclothes. The comment earned a sigh from Riley and a sideways glance from Bailey and nothing more. “I don’t suppose you two have any insight on whether or not Celine and Alexander can help us.”

Bailey’s eyes closed to slits and Riley spun onto his back, his front feet reaching high in the air as he settled in for the night. “I guess that’s a ‘no,’” Cate said as she crossed the room toward her bed. “At least you didn’t end up filthy from digging in the garden today.”

As Cate crossed the room, she hesitated in front of her jewelry armoire. Her lips parted and her brow furrowed as she stared at the bottom drawer. She shook her head and took another step toward her bed before returning her gaze to the armoire.

Cate took a tentative step toward the jewelry box. Her hand lingered on the drawer’s pull. Her mind focused on the contents of the drawer. She attempted to push them aside. She’d rather dwell on her time rip troubles than this, but her mind did not allow her.

Instead, Cate pulled the drawer open and stared at the necklace laying inside. The sapphires and diamonds sparkled against the drawer’s black velvet interior. Cate ran her fingers over the necklace. The stones, cool to the touch, mesmerized her. “Keep this as a reminder of me,” Duke Northcott’s voice echoed in her brain.

Cate lifted the necklace out of the drawer and held it up. It sparkled in the light; the diamonds dancing next to the sapphires. Cate bit her lower lip. Would she suffer more nightmares about the Duke or had they solved this problem? Why had he given her the necklace? And why was she so drawn to it?

Cate held it up to her neck as she glanced in the mirror. She raised an eyebrow at her reflection. She’d never owned anything so ostentatious. Not even the jewelry she’d inherited was this extravagant. Perhaps that was the draw.

As she stared at her reflection, Cate's mind regressed to her time with Duke Northcott. After a moment, she shook the thoughts loose from her head. No, she promised herself, she wouldn't dwell on it. The events still disturbed her. There was no reason she should be drawn to this necklace. It only reminded her of her frightening experience.

Cate shoved the necklace into the drawer and slammed it shut. She swallowed hard as her fingers lingered on the drawer pull, threatening to open the drawer and retrieve the necklace again. With a determined step, Cate pulled herself away from the armoire and climbed into her bed.

With any luck, she'd have a nightmare-free night again. And with a little more luck, she'd have a safe home tomorrow.

* * *

Cate stretched and yawned as she meandered down the hall for her pre-breakfast walk with the dogs. A night of tossing and turning as she pondered her predicament left her feeling drained. Riley and Bailey bounded in front of her, scurrying down the main staircase's thick carpeting and disappearing into the hallway leading to the library.

Cate raised an eyebrow at their path as she padded down the stairs. This was not the usual circuit to the outside. She plodded down the remaining step and turned the corner into the hallway.

She spotted Riley and Bailey in a perky sit at Celine's feet. They stared up at her as though waiting for instructions. Alexander scratched Riley's head.

"Good morning," Cate called. "You're both up early."

"Good morning," Celine answered followed by Alexander. "Yes, trying to get a handle on where we're at with the time portals today."

"It seems you've garnered a few adoring fans," Cate said.

Celine glanced down at the pups with a smile. "What cute fans to have!" Riley leapt to his hind legs to receive a head scratch from Celine.

"I'll let you finish your exploring. We can discuss your findings after breakfast."

Cate called the two reluctant pups away from Celine's side and out the front door. As she rounded the castle, she found Damien wandering in the back garden.

“Good morning,” she greeted him. “Wow, you’re all early risers.”

“Good morning, Cate,” Damien said. “Yeah, I don’t sleep much. My mind never shuts off.”

“I understand completely,” Cate responded. “I’m the same. I had a miserable night last night.”

“Worried about the time portals?” Damien inquired.

“Yes, and a few other things.”

“Don’t worry too much about the time portals. Celine and Alexander will fix it. What else was on your mind? Oh, sorry, you don’t have to answer that. I don’t mean to overstep,” Damien said as they followed the dogs around the castle’s exterior.

“No, it’s fine,” Cate said. “You have a lot of confidence in Celine, huh?”

“I do. She’s never let me down and she’s well-versed in a good many things like this.”

“Sounds like she’s at least got some experience with a universal time portal.”

“She probably saw one when she was engaged to the Duke.”

Cate ceased walking a moment. “Celine was engaged to Duke Northcott?”

Damien nodded as he waited for Cate to catch up.

“Yep. For three years before she married Gray.”

Cate’s jaw went slack as she processed the information. “I told you it was a long and complicated story.”

Cate shook her head. “You aren’t kidding.” She paused for a moment before adding. “That was the other thing keeping me up last night.”

“Our long and complicated story? It could probably fill a book or maybe be a whole series,” Damien said with a chuckle.

“While the details of your long and complicated story did cross my mind, it was more Duke Northcott who kept me tossing and turning.”

Damien halted and spun to face Cate. “What do you mean?”

“Nothing specific. Perhaps I was just worried I’d have another nightmare about him. Before I went to sleep, I took out the necklace he gave me. Something compelled me to want to see it.”

“Compelled you?”

“Yeah, it was weird. And I kept hearing his voice over and over telling me to keep the necklace as a reminder of him.”

“Did you have another nightmare after that?”

“No,” Cate admitted. “Though I may not have slept enough to have one.”

“But you’ve had nightmares involving him before?”

“Yes, for months. It became almost a nightly occurrence. Though I had no idea who he was. I only realized it was Duke Northcott when I met him.”

“What were the dreams like?”

“Varied with the consistent theme of Duke Northcott chasing me.”

Damien pursed his lips and narrowed his eyes as Cate continued. “At first they centered around the library. The nightmares began before we found the secret passage to Douglas’s lab and the time rip to 1792. Then he began to appear in them. He’d chase me or grab me and begin dragging me away.”

Damien halted and spun to face Cate. “Cate, get rid of that necklace. And forget about the Duke.”

“I’d love to,” Cate admitted. “I’m just not sure my mind will let me. With any luck, the nightmares are a thing of the past. I’m hoping my encounter with him relieved them.”

“I’m sorry you had to go through that. If we could have prevented it, we would have. It must have been terrifying.”

“It was. I’m trying not to dwell on it.” A moment of silence passed between them before Cate spoke again. “Hey, can Celine heal herself? Like if she gets cut or something?”

“Yeah, why?”

“I nicked Duke Northcott with a knife while trying to escape and he bled for a second before the wound disappeared. I’ve been wondering if I was seeing things.”

“Oh, wow! I’m impressed! That was really, really brave, Cate! You went after him with a knife?” Damien chuckled. “I’d have paid to see that.”

“It wasn’t that impressive. And it obviously didn’t work,” Cate lamented. “Anyway, I hope I’m rid of him.”

“He is trouble. If you start having nightmares again, please let me know. The last thing you need is the Duke poking around at you with no one to help.”

“I have Jack,” Cate reminded him.

“Jack has no experience with that man and is no match for his supernatural powers. Just do me a favor and promise me if you have even a whiff of a nightmare, or he starts pervading your thoughts, or anything involving him, you'll call me. Or text me. Or email. Or whatever form of communication you prefer."

Cate chuckled at his long-winded request. "I promise I will contact you. Knowing me, I will use all the communication methods."

"Fine by me, send out an alarm on all channels. Just don't go it alone, deal?"

"Deal," Cate promised. She scanned the horizon. "Where did those two get off to?"

"Uh-oh. I wasn't paying attention, I'm sorry. I didn't see. I hope they didn't go too far or run away!"

"No," Cate said. "They're around here somewhere. And I have a good idea where. Follow me."

Damien followed Cate around to the side garden. A yip sounded from within the bushes.

"Sounds like you were correct," Damien said.

"And I'll bet they're both digging a nice hole right over here," Cate continued as they rounded the hedge.

Cate stopped dead and put her hands on her hips.

She raised her eyebrows and stared at the two dogs as they stood near a growing hole. "Just as I suspected," she said to them.

"Found an old bone?" Damien suggested.

"I have no idea, but they're always here digging around and staring at this spot. Come on, you two, let's go." Cate ushered them back toward the castle with Damien's help. The two entered the dining room for breakfast, meeting Michael, Celine, and Alexander.

Following the meal, Celine suggested they discuss their latest findings. They agreed to meet in the hallway outside the library after Cate retrieved Jack.

With the two dogs following Celine as though she were a large, juicy steak, Cate slipped down the stairs and started down the hall to the kitchen. Voices floated from inside. By the sounds of it, she'd catch Jack before he went outside.

She quickened her step, determined to catch him before he left. The voices turned from incoherent to intelligible words.

"... have any updates?" Mrs. Fraser inquired.

"Not beyond what I've already shared," Jack answered.

"And you're sure they're doing the special thing on it?"

“Aye, called twice to confirm.”

“Good, there is no room for error,” Mrs. Fraser chimed in.

“We need to figure out how we can keep this secret,” Molly said.

CHAPTER 33

“I agree,” Jack began as Cate neared the door. “We’ve really got to... CATE!”

“No, we can’t tell... CATE!” Molly exclaimed as Cate entered.

“Hello,” Cate said as she scanned their faces. “Everything okay?”

Everyone murmured an affirmative response, all speaking at once.

“What would be wrong?” Molly added with a nervous chuckle.

Cate shrugged in response. “You seemed a bit surprised to see me.”

“Well, you’ve got guests. We assumed you’d be with them. You startled us, is all,” Mrs. Fraser said. “Is there something you need? Tea, perhaps?”

“No, thanks, Mrs. Fraser. I just wanted to steal Jack for a moment. About the leak. Celine noticed it this morning, I wanted you to take a peek.”

“Oh, sure, absolutely. Let’s head up right now.”

“Okay. You could finish your discussion first and then head up if you’d prefer.”

“Discussion? What discussion, no discussion here,” Jack babbled.

“We weren’t even talking,” Molly added.

“Right,” Cate said with a knitted brow. “Well, let’s head up then.”

Jack and Cate proceeded up to the main floor and met the others in the hallway. Michael stood several feet from the group.

“Better safe than sorry,” he noted as they passed him.

“So, you’ve found something?” Jack inquired as they approached the others.

“Yes,” Celine said. She strode several feet away, stopping nearer to the library door.

“Yesterday, the time portal ended about here.”

“Yes, I remember that’s where you were when you said the portal was distended and spiked,” Cate answered.

Celine nodded as she stalked several feet closer to them. “Today, the portal ends here.”

Jack raised his eyebrows at the change. “That’s a growth of several feet.”

Celine nodded. “At least,” she confirmed. “In less than twenty-four hours.”

“What does this mean?” Cate inquired.

“I’m almost one hundred percent certain my theory is correct. This is becoming a universal time portal.”

“So, they’ll need a new mechanism to control it,” Damien commented. “Something that can control where they go when entering in addition to keeping the portal closed.”

“Right,” Celine confirmed. “And I need to modify the enchantment to hold this shut unless opened. It’s a bit trickier with a universal time portal than one leading to the same date in another year, but it’s doable.”

“What do you need from us?” Jack inquired.

“Some time. We’ll need to make sure what we’re doing works. As the portal grows, the spikes are lessening. I’d like to get a better idea of the final form. I’ll continue to observe this today while we create a solution to control this,” Celine answered. “And I’ll also need a device that can accept a date input.”

“Okay,” Cate said with a nod. “Is there anything we can do in the meantime other than find a new device?”

Celine shook her head. “No, we’ll keep an eye on all the portals and once we’ve got a solution, we’ll test it out on whatever device you give me and hopefully be all set!”

“Test it out?” Jack questioned. “As in, activate it and time travel?”

“Pretty much,” Celine confirmed.

Jack heaved a sigh.

“I’ll test it,” Damien offered.

“No, no,” Jack replied. “It’s our issue, we’ll test it, but thanks.”

“In the meantime, try to relax,” Alexander said.

Jack nodded. "Easier said than done."

"And possibly easier outside of the castle walls," Cate suggested. "Would you two like to take a trip into town? There are no time portals there." She directed her final statement to Michael.

"Best idea I've heard all day," Michael answered.

With Jack heading outside for some groundskeeping, Cate, Michael and Damien headed to town for most of the day. They returned just before dinner. The group gathered in the dining room for the meal.

"Any news?" Cate inquired.

"The portals seem to be stabilizing," Alexander mentioned.

"That's good, right?" Cate asked.

"Yes, very. The spikes are receding which means the portals will be less volatile. I expect the spikes will be gone tomorrow."

"Portals?" Damien questioned. "There are still multiple, they didn't merge."

"Yes and no," Celine answered. "I detected a portal in the hallway overlooking your back garden that seemed to be a universal portal in one direction only."

"That's correct," Cate answered. "You can return to your own time from wherever you are in that hallway."

"That portal has merged with the portal in the hallway outside the library. They now form a universal time portal in both directions that spans from the back hallway through the secret passage we used to escape Marcus and into the hallway near the library. But the other portals still exist and lead to their respective years."

"Are they also less volatile?" Michael inquired.

"They seem to be stabilizing. You shouldn't get sucked into them at random anymore and the original timepiece should still control them without any issues," Alexander explained.

"But it will not control the new one?" Cate asked.

"No," Celine said with a shake of her head. "For that, we'll need a new controller."

"Will this do?" Damien questioned. He pulled a gold pocket watch from his hoodie pocket. "It's not a family heirloom like yours but it's similar. Small, easy to hide, and has a date function."

Celine eyed it over Damien's shoulder. "Yes, that should work."

Cate stared at the gold pocket watch as Damien flipped it open. Similar to hers, though missing the distinctive crosses on the top, it would provide an excellent new controller for the time rips.

“When did you...” Cate began.

“You were speaking to the shop owner in the antique store, and I found it. I wanted to surprise you! I hope you like it.”

Cate smiled at him. “Thank you, Damien. I love it. I’ll always remember you when I use it.”

“Looks like we’re set,” Celine said. “Alexander and I will work on creating an enchantment to close the universal portal and use the new timepiece as the controller.

It will also work for the old time rips, though you won’t need to set the date for those.”

“Great! I can’t wait to tell Jack. Maybe we’ll all rest a little easier now.”

* * *

When Cate emerged the next morning from her bedroom, she found Jack pacing the hallway outside her suite.

“Hey, everything okay?” she asked.

“Couldn’t sleep. I’m anxious. Do you think they can solve it?”

“Celine seemed confident. I guess we’ll find out today.”

Jack nodded and held up his crossed fingers.

“Let’s hope.”

“I’ll get an update at breakfast. Let’s meet in the library hallway after and see where they are.”

“Sounds like a plan. Hey, we’ll miss you at breakfast today.”

“I’ll miss you all, too. But I’ll schedule one with you once our new friends have departed.”

“I’ll let Mrs. Fraser know so she’s not startled by your request on an off day,” Jack joked.

“I can’t miss my staff breakfast for the week!”

When Cate reached the dining room, she found herself alone. She hadn’t run into any of her guests outside on her walk with the dogs nor on her way out.

Instead, the new gold timepiece lay at her seat with a sealed envelope next to it with CATE scrawled across it.

Cate pulled the envelope open and flicked open the note.

Cate -

Here is your brand-new time travel device! Celine and Alexander worked through the night to make sure we had this under control.

Michael and I tested it thoroughly with both the old time portals and the new universal one. Works like a charm! We may have scared a person or two when we popped in out of thin air, oops.

Just kidding! The advantage of time travel in the middle of the night is there aren't a lot of people wandering around the halls.

We also noted the time portals are still distended, so your time difference still exists. We tested this too. It still seems to be about one minute in the present to every fifteen minutes in the past. At least some things didn't go haywire!

Anyway, we'll probably sleep in, but rest assured, no one will disappear into any random time portals anymore! See you later, alligator. Sorry that was lame.

See you later, Damien

P.S. I had Celine and Alexander recreate the look of your old timepiece with the new one. No one will suspect you've replaced it!

Cate's heart skipped a beat as she read the note.

She picked up the new timepiece and held it in her hands. The two crosses now graced the top of the pocket watch. She opened the cover, finding the familiar engraving on the inside.

Only the face differed now. A smile formed on her lips as she lifted the original timepiece from around her neck.

Cate opened the clasp and slid the original pocket watch from the chain, replacing it with the new one. She slid the original timepiece into her cardigan pocket. She'd need to discuss with Jack what to do with it.

As she pondered the question, Mrs. Fraser and Molly popped into the room. "Lady Cate! You're all alone!" Molly exclaimed.

"Yes, I am," Cate confirmed. "It looks like everyone is sleeping in." Cate waved the note in the air before sliding it into her pocket. "So, I'm on my own. Mind if I join you for our usual breakfast?"

"We never mind if you join us, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser answered.

“Here, let me take something off your hands,” Cate said, reaching for the water pitcher from Mrs. Fraser. “I’m terribly sorry you had to drag all this up for nothing.”

“The exercise didn’t hurt me! It’ll keep me spry at my age.”

“You aren’t THAT old, Mrs. Fraser,” Cate countered.

“Tell that to these old bones,” she said as they descended the stairs.

“Lady Cate!” Jack exclaimed from his seat at the table. “Fancy meeting you here.”

“She got ditched,” Molly joked with a giggle.

“It’s true,” Cate confirmed as she slid into a seat across from Jack. “I found a note saying everyone else decided to sleep in, so it looks like I’ll get my regular staff breakfast after all!”

“Lucky us,” Mr. Fraser said.

Cate grinned at him as Mrs. Fraser put the final preparations on their breakfast. “I’ll put this away for the sleepyheads to eat later,” she said as she stowed the fruit plate and yogurt in the refrigerator.

The group settled in for their breakfast. The tension that hung over Cate for the past several weeks eased away as she no longer worried they may all disappear. She itched to tell Jack the good news.

After the group finished their meal, Cate requested Jack’s presence upstairs.

“About the leak?” Jack inquired as they headed out the kitchen door.

“Yep,” Cate confirmed. “We may have it under control.”

They continued down the hall and ascended the staircase. As Jack pushed the door shut, he twisted to face Cate. “Are you serious?” he whispered.

Cate nodded. She pulled the note from her pocket and handed it to him. “I found this at my seat this morning along with the new timepiece. It seems they fixed the problem.”

“And this is the new one?” Jack questioned as he motioned to the timepiece around Cate’s neck.

“Yes. I switched them out this morning. I have the old one in my pocket. We’ll need to find a safe place to keep it.”

“The safe,” Jack suggested. “It should be secure there.”

“That’s what I was thinking,” Cate agreed.

Jack stared at the note for another moment. “Hmm,” he murmured. “Do you think this is it? Problem solved?”

“It should be,” Damien said with a yawn as he stumbled down the main staircase. He smiled at them. “Good morning.”

“Good morning,” Cate answered. “And thank you!” She held up the timepiece.

“You’re welcome. Feel free to test it yourselves, but Michael and I did a pretty thorough analysis last night in a few locations, both old and new.”

“We just may do that,” Jack answered. “Not that we don’t trust you. It’s just that...”

“You want to see it for yourselves, so you’ll rest easier. No, I understand,” Damien answered.

Cate smiled at him. “After a few weeks of time troubles, it would be nice to verify that we’re firmly in control again.”

“Sure, give it a go!” Damien said. “Oh, one thing I forgot to put in my note. In the old time rip locations, you don’t need to set the date. The timepiece will just transfer you to the same date in the other year no matter what you input. In the new time rip, the one that extends from the library to the back hall, you’ll need to set the watch’s date before activating it. You’ll then return to that date at the same time of day as when you activate it. So, for example, if it’s 8 a.m. and you set the date for June first, 1834, you’ll go back to June first, 1834 at eight in the morning.”

Cate nodded. “Got it.” She glanced at Jack. “Want to try it now?”

“As much as I don’t want to, yes, I do. Like you said, it would be nice to confirm we’ve got this solved.”

“Oh,” Cate said as they began to part ways. “Mrs. Fraser has breakfast in the fridge for you.”

“Great! I’m starving. I’ll just pop down and grab it if you can point me in the direction of the kitchen.”

“You can go through the door in the dining room, down the stairs and hall straight into the kitchen.”

“Got it,” Damien answered. “Thanks!”

Damien spun on his heel and continued down the hall to the dining room. Cate turned to Jack with her eyebrows raised. “Ready?”

“As I’ll ever be. Let’s test this bad boy out!”

“Wow, you almost seem enthusiastic.”

“If Michael was willing to test this out for us, then I should be!”

“Should we start with a new time rip or an old one?” Cate asked as they headed down the hall.

“An old one,” Jack responded. “If it works there, I’ll feel a smidge more confident that we won’t get stuck in the new one.”

“Don’t trust them?”

“I do, I just can’t believe we have a universal time portal and it’s working.”

Cate chuckled as they entered the library. “Douglas’s lab?”

“Sounds good,” Jack agreed. “We can easily tell if it’s working if the lights go out!”

They opened the bookcase and descended the stairs. Cate held out the new timepiece. Jack wrapped her hand in his. Her eyes flitted up to Jack. He offered an encouraging nod. Cate took a deep breath and focused on the timepiece. In unison, she and Jack rubbed the face to activate it.

Within seconds, the second hand began to slow. The lights flickered then blinked off, disappearing from their sight. Darkness surrounded them.

“Looks like we made it,” Cate said.

“Yep,” Jack answered, still clutching her hand.

“Good enough or did you want to take a peek around and verify this is 1792?”

“I’m happy to assume it is,” Jack answered. “Let’s head back and try the universal location. Unless you have an objection.”

“No,” Cate said. “I trust that it is.”

They reset the timepiece and returned to their time. The blaring lights announced their arrival in the correct year.

“Well, we know the return trip worked,” Jack said with a sigh of relief.

They climbed the stairs and headed to the hall. “Should we try this here?” Cate questioned.

“Didn’t Damien or Celine mention a secret passage?”

“Yes,” Cate answered. “It’s here.” She led him through the halls to the trigger. Cate pulled the scone on the wall and the hidden panel swung open.

“Perhaps we should duck in there and try it. Less chance of running into someone.”

“Good idea,” Cate answered. “Oh, do you have your cell phone on you? We may need a flashlight.”

“Got it,” Jack said as he dug in his pocket for the flashlight and toggled it on.

They stepped into the dark passage and pushed the panel shut behind them. “What year should we try?”

“An old one,” Jack answered.

“Really? Have a fondness for the olden days, huh?”

“It’ll be easier to tell if we’re actually back in an old time. There won’t be any lights on the walls.”

“Okay,” Cate answered as Jack aimed the flashlight at the timepiece. “How’s March 30, 1803?”

“Sounds like a perfect date to me!”

Cate set the date and held out the timepiece.

“Okay, here goes nothing.”

Jack pushed out his lips as he stared at the timepiece for a moment before he grasped it. They activated the mechanism and waited as the second hand slowed.

“Seems to have worked,” Cate whispered as the second hand crept around the face.

“Yeah,” Jack said with a nod. “Now to check if we’ve made it to where we expected.”

“Check your cell phone.”

“For what? The latest news from 1803?”

“No. You should have lost your Wi-fi signal when we slipped back.”

“Oh, right.” Jack toggled on his display. “Yep, it’s gone.”

“Okay, let’s check the hallway.”

“Where’s the trigger to get out?” Jack inquired.

“I’m not sure,” Cate answered. “We wandered through the passage for a while before we ended up in the mausoleum. We never went out this way.”

Jack shined the light on the wall near the secret panel. They studied the area before they found a small handhold on the panel. Jack curled his fingers around it and pulled. The panel lurched open a slit.

Light streamed into the passage. Cate peeked into the hallway. Candlelight flickered against the walls. “Candles!” Cate exclaimed in a hushed whisper.

“Yeah,” Jack responded, peeking over her head. “So, we’ve traveled somewhere back in time.”

“How can we tell if it’s 1803?”

“Find a newspaper and check the date?”

Cate bit her lower lip. That would require them to traipse through the castle. They weren't dressed for the occasion which was only the first issue with the plan.

As Cate considered the plan, a giggle sounded in the hallway. Cate peered into the hall, spotting a small child toddling down. Dark curls adorned his head. He wore a wide grin as he continued to patter toward them.

A woman rounded the corner. "Look! It's Olivia!" Cate breathed.

"I see her," Jack answered.

"And that little boy must be..."

"Finlay MacKenzie, just where do you think you're off to?" Olivia said.

The child let out another giggle before Olivia caught up to him and scooped him into her arms. Another woman followed her. "My apologies, Lady MacKenzie," she said as she collected the boy from Olivia. "He is quite energetic and insisted on finding his father."

"It is quite all right, Nanny Mae. Children are permitted a bit of mischief once in a while."

As they disappeared from the hall, Cate pushed the panel closed. "Well, that confirms what we needed to know for the most part. If that was Finlay MacKenzie we're in 1803. He was born in 1801 and he looked to be about two. That would put us where we thought we were."

"Do you want to confirm the exact date?"

"It's too risky," Cate answered. "We shouldn't be wandering around the castle. Especially in these clothes!"

"What's this I hear? Cate Kensie not being impulsive enough to roam around another century?"

"Is this Jack Reid arguing to parade around another time period?"

"Indeed it is, lassie. I want to be sure this thing works before we use it and get into more trouble than we're after!"

"Okay," Cate answered. "How do you propose we find a newspaper?"

"There should be one in town."

"How are we going to get to town? In these clothes? There has to be a better way."

"I'm sure they have one in the castle, I'm just not sure where. Douglas would have read it, surely."

"That's it!" Cate said, snapping her fingers.

"What's it?"

“Douglas! If we can find Douglas, we can ask him. He’s aware of time travel. He knows us. He wouldn’t question us showing up and asking the date!”

“Okay, great. The question is: can we find him?”

“We can try!” Cate said. “It was just after eight when we arrived. At this time of the day, Douglas was likely finishing breakfast and heading to his office.”

“Let’s try there first. We’re not far from it.”

Cate nodded and found the handhold in the panel.

She slid it open a few inches and they perused the hallway, finding it empty.

“Let’s go as quick as possible,” Jack said, grabbing Cate’s hand.

He led her into the hall. They rounded the corner and sprinted down the hall to the office. The door was ajar. Jack peered in before pushing through the door.

“Douglas, pardon the interruption,” Jack panted as he pushed the door shut behind Cate.

Douglas leapt from his seat, his eyes wide.

“Jack! Catherine!” He studied them up and down.

“Hello, Douglas,” Cate said. “Sorry to barge in like this but we needed your help.”

“Of course, anything. What is it? Are you in some sort of trouble? Is it Duke Northcott again?”

“No,” Cate assured him. “We’re not in any trouble. We’ve had some developments with the time rips in our time and we’re hoping to assess whether or not we’ve got the situation under control.”

“Developments? How interesting! What has happened?”

“New time rips have opened. We’re investigating where they lead,” Cate answered.

“Could you tell us the date today?” Jack inquired.

“Yes, of course. Today is 30 March, the year of our Lord, 1803,” Douglas answered.

Jack breathed a sigh of relief and glanced to Cate. She nodded to him with a closed-mouth smile. “Judging by the expressions on your faces, I’d say that answer was what you hoped to hear.”

“It is,” Cate answered. “Exactly what we hoped to hear. Thank you.”

“Yes, thank you, Douglas. For everything,” Jack responded. “We won’t take up any more of your time. And we’ll leave the way we came.” Jack offered a wink.

“So soon? Oh, what a shame. I had hoped to visit with you again.”

“Perhaps another time when we’re more appropriately dressed,” Cate said with a chuckle.

“Let’s plan for it, Catherine. I do hope to visit with you again.”

Cate grasped his hand in hers and squeezed it. “I promise we’ll visit soon.”

As Cate and Jack prepared to depart, a knock sounded at the door. Everyone froze.

CHAPTER 34

Douglas pressed a finger to his lips before he called, “Yes?”
“Lord MacKenzie,” Wilson’s voice answered. “I have your morning post.”

“Oh, of course,” Douglas called. “Just a moment.” He eyed Jack and Cate. “You must hide!”

“Where?” Cate whispered.

“Behind the door, I shall only open it a crack.”

Cate nodded and she and Jack hurried out of sight as Douglas inched the door open. “I’ll take them, Wilson, thank you,” Douglas said as he reached through the door.

Cate spied the butler’s confused expression through the small crack. “Yes, of course, m’lord.”

“Oh, Wilson, would you please fetch me a cup of tea.”

“Right away, m’lord,” Wilson said with a nod as he spun on his heel to retreat to the kitchen.

Douglas slammed the door and spun to face Cate. “Give him a moment to clear the hall, then it should be safe.”

They waited a moment before Douglas peeked into the hallway. Finding it empty, he nodded to them. “Go now,” he urged.

Cate smiled and nodded to him as Jack grasped her hand and tugged her into the hallway.

Douglas gave her a smile and a nod as she spun to leave the room. “Oh, Catherine?” Douglas called before they stepped from the room.

“Yes?” Cate asked as she twisted to face him.

“I left you a note in my journals as Damien suggested. I hope you found it.”

“I’ll check for it the moment we’re back,” Cate answered.

He smiled and offered another nod. “Goodbye, Catherine. And good luck.”

“Thank you,” she said. “We’ll see you soon.”

After peeking into the hall again, they snuck to the secret panel and slipped inside. Together, they activated the timepiece and returned to the present.

“Are we back?” Jack inquired as the second hand sped up to its normal speed.

Cate grasped the panel and inched it open. She peered into the hallway. Damien meandered around near the passage.

“Yep, we are,” Cate answered. She pulled the panel open and stepped out.

“Whew,” Damien exclaimed. “You scared me!”

“Sorry,” Cate said. “I figured you were waiting for us.”

“I was. Everything go okay with your tests? Went to the right date, returned all right, no problems?”

Jack joined them in the hall, pocketing his cell phone. “Yes,” he answered. “Seems to work as you said.”

Damien beamed at them. “You should be all set now!”

“Yes,” Cate agreed. “Damien, you saved me and my home. Saying thank you feels so trite but thank you.”

“Really, no thanks is necessary. I’m glad we could help. And if you have any trouble at all, we’re just an email, text, or call away.”

“I’m so glad this is over,” Jack said. “We can get back to normal life again without worrying about people disappearing.”

Michael strode toward them, a bag slung over his shoulder. “Everything working okay?” he asked as he approached Damien.

“Perfectly,” Cate answered. “We were just thanking Damien, though the simple words don’t feel like enough.”

“No problem at all,” Michael assured her.

Cate eyed his bag. “Going somewhere?”

“Home,” he answered. He pointed to Damien. “I brought your bag down for you, too.”

“Already?” Cate exclaimed. “Can’t you stay a few days at least? Enjoy the castle a bit? It’s the least we can do for all your help!”

“Sorry,” Damien answered. “Duty calls.”

“Trouble at home?” Jack questioned.

“When isn’t there,” Michael said with a chuckle and a roll of his eyes. “You ready?” he inquired of Damien. “Celine and Alexander are waiting in the foyer.”

“Yep.”

“We’ll at least walk you out,” Cate said.

They navigated to the foyer, meeting Celine and Alexander. Luggage sat near the front door. “Everything okay?” Celine asked.

“Yes, the timepiece works great, thank you!” Cate responded.

“If you have any trouble at all, just contact us,” Celine replied. “But you should be in the clear from here on out.”

“I told Damien that a simple thank you just isn’t enough. We’re eternally grateful to you for all your help.”

“No, thanks is necessary,” Celine assured them.

An awkward silence passed over the group. “Are you certain you can’t stay a few days?” Cate inquired.

“Yes, our apologies for rushing off, but we do have a situation brewing at home.”

“I understand,” Cate answered. “Good luck with it. If there’s anything we can do to help, please ask.”

“Yeah, we definitely owe you,” Jack added.

“Thank you,” Celine said with a smile.

“Well, it was lovely to meet all of you despite the circumstances we were in,” Cate said.

Everyone exchanged their goodbyes, shaking hands with each other. As Damien said goodbye to Cate, he added, “It was great to meet you, Cate. Don’t hesitate to call if you need anything. I’m serious.”

“Let’s plan to keep in touch,” Cate answered.

“Deal.”

As she stepped away, she overheard the conversation between Michael and Jack. “If you ever need to vent about time travel, text me,” Michael said.

“You may be inviting more trouble than you bargained for,” Jack said.

“Believe me, you can’t hate it more than I do, buddy,” Michael retorted.

The two shared a chuckle over their mutual dislike for visiting other centuries before parting ways. Cate and Jack followed the foursome outside, waving as their car pulled down the drive.

They stood for another moment as the car disappeared toward the town of Dunhaven.

“Did that just happen?” Jack asked after a moment.

“Yep, I’m pretty sure it did,” Cate confirmed. They waited another moment before Cate spoke again. “Well, I guess it’s time to get back to normal around here.”

“Sounds like a great idea to me. What’s your plan? Long walk to the loch? Reading in the library? Working on your book?”

“First, I’m going to lock this guy in the safe,” Cate said, holding up the original timepiece. “Then, I’m going to check the journals for that letter from Douglas. And then, maybe I’ll take that relaxing walk!”

“Mind if I tag along on the first two? As protector of the secret, I’d like to ensure the safety of the original timepiece.”

“Of course,” Cate answered as she strode down the hall.

“You know, as protector of the secret AND you,” Jack said as they walked, “you really put me through it this time.”

“Sorry about that,” Cate responded.

“It’s okay. I’m only teasing,” Jack said. “But, Cate, if anything had happened to you...”

He stopped and stared into her eyes. His lips attempted to form words but none came.

“Cate, I...” he began.

“Nothing happened to me,” Cate interrupted. “Let’s focus on that.”

“You’re right,” he said with a nod.

They entered the office. Cate’s mind recalled their encounter with Douglas in this room less than an hour ago as she crossed to the wall safe. She typed in the number then pressed her thumb onto the digital fingerprint scanner. The door released and swung open.

Cate pulled the original timepiece from her pocket. “You served us well,” she said as she placed it inside the safe.

“Now, it’s time for a new era,” Jack said as they closed and locked the safe.

Cate sighed. "Well, that should do it! Let's check for Douglas's note."

She led the way to the library. Douglas's journals were scattered across the desk.

Cate plopped into the chair and grabbed the last journal. She scanned the pages for any hint of the note Douglas mentioned.

"Here," Jack said after scanning journal number ten.

"This could be it." He pointed to letters scrawled on the last page of the final journal.

"Maybe!" Cate exclaimed. "This page is blank in all the other journals."

She opened Damien's program on her laptop and copied the text from the page. She clicked the button and waited as the program worked. In moments, decrypted text appeared.

"This is it!" Cate exclaimed as she scanned the first few words.

Dearest Catherine,

I hope you have found this note and are well in your time. The situation still astounds me at times though the good fortune to have met a descendent, however far removed, will remain a high point in my life.

I do regret the trouble you experienced while visiting my time and hope it has not followed you to yours. More than that, I hope it has not soured you on time traveling as I do desire to meet with you again. How extraordinary to share a conversation or break bread with my progeny.

Rest assured, Grayson and Celine Buckley along with her cousins, the Carlyles, have made sure I can control the time rips and have protected me from any harm from the foul Duke Northcott.

Perhaps this will be the end of the rumors of hauntings within these halls, though I doubt it. A new set of gossip abounds in the town already following the night you returned to your time.

No matter, we know the truth. And we shall remain the sole keepers of that truth along with the Reids. The secret shall remain protected through the generations.

Remember, Catherine, only travel for good, never for personal gain, do no harm, and do not travel to a time in which you already exist. Also, there is a distortion in the time rip, causing the time you travel from to move slower than the time you visit. These were the rules imparted to me by the BUCKLEYS and that I shall impart to my heir and on down the line until it is imparted to you.

As a MacKenzie, you have a solemn duty. Though one I view as a privilege. I hope you will, too.

Good luck, Catherine.

And goodbye.

Yours,

Douglas MacKenzie

A smile crossed Cate's face as she read the note.

"And there it is," Jack said. "Looks like the Buckleys solved all our problems!"

"He really was an interesting man," Cate said as she stared at the screen.

"Yes, he was," Jack agreed. "He'll make a great addition to your book, minus the time travel stuff."

"I'll be sure to leave that part out. But his inventions alone are worth several chapters!"

"And now you have time to explore them without worrying about disappearing into another time period!"

"Yep," Cate said with a grin. "But first, I think a nice long walk is in order. What do you say, boys?"

Riley and Bailey leapt to their feet, ready to enjoy the grounds. "I'll escort you out. M'lady," Jack teased with an extravagant bow.

Cate chuckled as she proceeded in front of him and to the front door. As she opened the door, both dogs raced past her and into the yard. They rounded the corner as Jack and Cate stepped on the path.

"We really should make good on that promise to visit Douglas," Jack said.

"Wow, I'm impressed!" Cate exclaimed as they meandered the path toward the side garden. "Jack Reid suggesting time travel."

"It is a gift. And I'd like to live life to the fullest. Particularly since one of us almost didn't get that opportunity."

"I'd really rather not dwell on how close I came to not seeing another birthday. Though, for whatever reason, I kept the necklace Duke Northcott buried me with. Damien told me to get rid of it. I don't know why I didn't. It is a beautiful piece of jewelry. Maybe I'll give it away as an auction item at the President's Ball. But for now... I don't know..." Her voice trailed off.

"I would get rid of that thing long before the ball. Damien's right. Speaking of, odd people, those Buckleys and their friends."

“Definitely. The lives they must lead are...” Cate’s voice trailed off as she tried to formulate an appropriate comparison.

“The stuff you read in books or see on TV,” Jack finished.

“Good description,” Cate replied.

“At least our lives can now return to normal,” Jack said. “Only the odd, controllable time travel trips now.”

Cate nodded with a chuckle as the side garden came into view. Her eyes scanned the horizon for the dogs. She stopped in her tracks as she spotted them. Her lips parted as her jaw went slack.

“What is it?” Jack inquired as he noted the expression on her face.

She swallowed hard. In response to his question, Cate raised her arm and pointed toward the dogs.

Jack followed the direction of her finger, his eyes going wide at the sight. Cate stumbled two steps forward as she raised her hand to cover her mouth. “Riley! Bailey! Leave that,” she choked out in a shaky voice after a moment.

The dogs dropped the item they play-fought over and bounded to Cate. Cate scooped Bailey into her arms as she continued toward the now-larger hole near the bushes. Jack grabbed Riley and followed her.

“Oh,” Cate groaned with a frown. “Now we know why they’ve been digging.”

“Yep,” Jack answered.

They approached the discarded “toy” and stood over it, each of them staring down at it. In contrast to the bright green of the springtime grass, lay a collection of white bones. Cate’s eyes swept across the object from top to bottom. She identified a radius, ulna, wrist bones, and hand bones that extended to skeletal fingers.

“Someone’s buried in your side garden, Lady Cate,” Jack noted.

“Yes, but who?”

“Another mystery,” Jack answered with a deep sigh. “So much for getting back to normal.”

* * *

THE END

A SPY AT DUNHAVEN CASTLE

A CATE KENSIE MYSTERY

For Catherine Marie HuWalt, named after my grandmother who provided the model for Cate Kensie

CHAPTER 1

Cate shivered despite the warmer spring weather. She pulled her cardigan closer around her as she bit her lower lip.

“It’s definitely human,” the police officer said, as he bent over a set of white bones exposed in the soil of Dunhaven Castle’s side garden.

“We suspected as much,” Jack answered.

The man stood and brushed the dirt from his fingertips. “We’ll get someone up here to remove the remains. I’m no expert, but I’d venture to say they’ve been here a while. We’ll send them out for analysis, but I wouldn’t hold your breath on any major findings. These cases are pretty difficult to make headway on.”

“Thanks, Ben,” Jack said, extending his hand for a shake.

Ben Thomson nodded and offered to see himself off the estate, disappearing around the corner of the castle.

Cate sighed and pressed her hand to her forehead. “That poor person,” she lamented. “Killed and buried in a garden like they were meaningless.”

“Well, they’ve been found now,” Jack said.

“Yes, thanks to Riley and Bailey.” The two small dogs, who had been shut inside the castle walls after digging up the skeleton, had made the gruesome discovery.

Cate stared at the makeshift grave with its white bones poking through the dirt, contrasted by the bright spring grass. She narrowed her eyes at it.

“Caaaate,” Jack warned.

“I wonder...”

“Caaaaaate,” Jack chided.

“Who it is,” Cate finished.

“Cate! Now, don’t go starting your wondering. Every time you wonder, we end up in a whole host of trouble.”

“My wondering has solved more than one mystery at Dunhaven Castle and has righted several wrongs.”

“And it’s also gotten you nearly drowned, both of us shot at, and you nearly killed when that psychopathic supernatural...” Jack stumbled around for the word, “creature,” he finally spat out, “put you inside a coffin! We’ve done our fair share of righting wrongs. Including the last wrong we righted.”

“Yes, at least we’re no longer in danger of disappearing into another century,” Cate agreed. She stared down at the timepiece around her neck – a new pocket watch pendant. It had the ability to control the new universal time portal which had emerged within the castle walls.

After months of slipping in and out of other eras at whim, Cate and Jack, with the help of an odd set of new friends from across the pond who called themselves the Shadow Slayers, managed to tame the time rips.

Jack nodded in agreement. “Yes, thanks to our other unique friends in the supernatural world. Speaking of, did you get rid of that necklace?” Jack referred to the ostentatious sapphire and diamond necklace Duke Marcus Northcott gave Cate when he had held her hostage in the 1700s. Despite the negative memories associated with it, Cate kept it in her jewelry box. She found herself unable to part with the priceless object, though this had little to do with the value. For some reason, Cate felt a strong draw to it.

Cate avoided his stare, scuffing her foot into the grass. “Caaaaaate,” Jack prodded.

Cate pulled her lips back into a half-grimace. “No, I didn’t.”

“Why not? That madman nearly killed you! Cate, get rid of it.”

“I will. I just... I’ll give it to Mrs. Campbell for the auction at the Presidents’ Ball. I’m sure she’ll be thrilled with it.”

“No,” Jack disagreed. “Get rid of it now. Chuck it in the bin, toss it in the loch, anything. Just get it out of the castle.”

“If I do that, I’ll need a distraction, so, it’s a perfect time to dive into a normal mystery!”

Jack started to nod, then quickly turned his motion into a head shake. He puckered his lips. “Why would you need a distraction?”

“That necklace is... I told you, I feel some connection to it. Getting rid of it will be difficult. So, I’ll need a distraction. And this mystery is the perfect thing!”

“Now, Cate...”

“Jack! There’s a body in my garden! This will be the talk of the town. And with the upcoming party, we need some answers!”

“That is where you’re wrong. The party is in six weeks. All the rumors will have died down by then.”

“Yes,” Cate agreed, “because we’ll have solved the case.”

Jack shook his head at her. “Oh, Lady Cate, there’s never any stopping you, is there?”

Cate raised her chin and smiled at him. “Nope!”

“Well, I suppose I can hope this is an open and shut case by the police and we’ve got no investigating to do.”

“We’ll see,” Cate said, as they began their hike back to the castle.

“I’ll put some temporary fencing around the crime scene to keep the dogs away from it until they remove the bones.”

“Thanks. They’ve done enough damage already.”

“See you later, Cate,” Jack said with a salute, as she ducked through the castle’s front doors. Her two furry friends, Riley and Bailey, bounded toward her.

“Hello, boys,” Cate said, as she crouched to ruffle their fur. “Well, thanks to you two, we have another mystery to solve. Jack’s eternally grateful.”

Riley kissed her on the cheek in response. “He’s putting up a fence to keep you two out of there until the police can remove the bones.”

“Oh, what a terrible thing,” Mrs. Fraser said, as she passed through the foyer. “Has little Benny left?”

“Little Benny?”

“Aye, the officer.”

“Oh, right,” Cate said.

“He’ll always be little Benny to me. I can remember him being just a wee lad and now he’s a police officer. Investigating a body in the garden!”

“He’s sending a team to remove the remains and then I guess they’ll do an investigation. Try to identify who it is. He didn’t hold out a lot of hope since it’s a cold case.”

Mrs. Fraser shook her head with a somber expression on her face. “Well, I suppose at least once the body’s been removed, the poor person can be properly laid to rest.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “Will you be taking your dinner in the library tonight?”

“Yes,” Cate said, with another nod. “Thanks, Mrs. Fraser.”

Mrs. Fraser continued down the hall, disappearing down the stairs leading to the kitchen. Cate checked her timepiece. She had some time before dinner.

She raised her eyes up the massive main staircase, following its red-carpeted stairs up to the next floor. She bit her lower lip as she ascended the staircase, the dogs trailing behind her. Cate stared upward as her fingers absentmindedly caressed the banister on the way up.

She wandered through the halls and pushed through the doors to her private sitting room. She navigated across it and into her bedroom. Her eyes fell on the large jewelry box standing against the adjacent wall.

Cate crossed to it. With a tilt of her head, she gazed down at a drawer just above the curved legs. Her fingers lingered on the drawer pull as her mind conjured an image of the jewelry piece inside. She pictured the eleven sapphires surrounded by diamonds creating the collar of the necklace. From it hung a large teardrop sapphire, also encrusted in diamonds.

She swallowed hard as she recalled receiving it while held captive at Duke Northcott’s rented home on the outskirts of Dunhaven in 1792. Her eyebrow arched as she remembered him sweeping her hair away to fasten the clasp. Her pulse quickened as his voice echoed in her mind. “Keep this as a reminder of me.”

Cate slid the drawer open. The necklace lay framed by the black velvet inside the drawer. Cate reached for it. Her fingertips glided across the jewels. She stared unblinking at its opulence. The gems sparkled in the light. Her fingers lingered on the large central sapphire.

Cate’s breathing turned ragged, and her heart thudded in her chest. Her mind went blank and all she could see was the necklace. The world melted away around her.

Something touched her leg. Cate’s brow furrowed, but she continued to stare at the necklace. The sensation on her leg continued. Cate tore her eyes from the shiny object and glanced to her side. In an instant, her mind snapped back to reality.

Riley stood on his hind legs, his front feet planted on Cate's thigh. "Hey, buddy," she said with a smile, as she reached to scoop him up.

"Lady Cate?" she heard Molly's voice call. "Lady Cate? Yoo-hoo!"

Cate slammed the drawer containing the necklace shut and hurried to her sitting room.

A smile spread across Molly's face as she spotted her. "There you are."

"Yes, I just ran to freshen up."

"Must have been some refresh," Molly said. "It's after five!"

"What?" Cate questioned. She glanced at her timepiece. She'd come upstairs shortly after four. She hadn't spent an hour here. The watch's face told a different story. The second hand ticked by, and the others indicated a time of 5:04 p.m. Cate winced at the watch.

"Something wrong, Lady Cate?" Molly asked.

"No, just lost track of time."

"Oh, well, I'm not surprised," Molly said, waving her hand in the air. "You're always doing that with your research and whatnot. Anyway, nearly time for your dinner. I just wanted to check to see if you wanted blueberry pie or cherry. Mrs. Fraser and I made both."

Cate nodded and smiled as she crossed the room. "Uh, blueberry, thank you," Cate said. Her mind flitted back to the blue jewelry steps away. She shook her head, clearing the image from her mind. With it pushed aside, she followed Molly from the room, Riley in her arms and Bailey in tow behind her.

* * *

Cate awoke the next morning with the alarm screaming in her ear. The sun was already peeking over the moors in the distance. Cate slapped the alarm to silence it before pushing up to sit. She dangled her legs over the edge of the bed. Cate's eyelids threatened to close as she rubbed her face.

She sat for another few moments in an exhausted stupor before she finally rose and padded to the bathroom, hoping a shower could help clear her head.

When Cate emerged dressed for the day, she still struggled to stifle a yawn. What had left her so exhausted, she wondered, as she roused the dogs from their beds? After breakfast, Cate joined Molly and Mrs. Fraser in the kitchen for a cuppa, craving the caffeine.

“When are the police returning for the...” Molly paused, her eyes darting side-to-side before she whispered, “bones.”

“Today,” Cate announced, after a sip of the sweet tea.

“Ugh, terrible business,” Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate nodded. “Yes, I agree.”

“I, for one, will be glad when the bones are gone.”

“Me too,” Cate admitted. “Jack put up a temporary fence, so the dogs don’t get at it again.”

Molly shivered.

Mrs. Fraser eyed her. “Someone walk over your grave?”

“No,” Molly countered, “Cate walked over someone else’s and now their bones are laying in the garden.”

“Superstitious, Molly?”

Molly pursed her lips and shrugged. “Maybe a little.”

Mrs. Fraser chuckled. “Well, the bones will be gone soon enough.” She patted Molly’s arm.

“Not soon enough.”

“You’re really worried!” Cate said, peering over her teacup.

Molly’s eyes widened. “There is a body buried in the side garden. Someone was probably murdered and dumped in a shallow grave there. And now her sorry excuse for a resting place has been defiled. This is the perfect recipe for a ghost.” She slapped her hand against the table with a determined expression.

“There are no such things as ghosts, Miss Molly,” Mrs. Fraser said.

Molly didn’t respond. Cate narrowed her eyes at her friend.

Mrs. Fraser continued, “In all my years at Dunhaven, I have never encountered so much as a stray wisp of smoke, let alone a ghost. It’ll be all right.”

“After creepy Douglas and his devil-worshipping, I just feel unsettled.” Molly’s eyes grew to the size of saucers, and she focused blankly at the table in front of her, before she snapped her eyes up to Cate’s. “You don’t think... ohhhhh.” She groaned and shook her head.

“Don’t think what?” Cate asked.

Molly swallowed hard and leaned forward. She whispered, “That Douglas killed her during one of his satanic ceremonies?”

CHAPTER 2

Cate cocked her head and frowned. “No. In all the research I’ve done, nothing has given any indication Douglas was a devil worshiper, nor that he engaged in any strange ceremonies, nor that he killed anyone!”

“But...” Molly flicked her eyes to Mrs. Fraser. “Emily’s story...”

“Was just a story, Molly,” Mrs. Fraser assured her.

“With Damien’s help, I translated all of those journals. They detailed his experiments, all of which were pretty standard scientific stuff. No weird occult obsessions or anything.”

Molly’s forehead wrinkled as she processed Cate’s statements.

Cate bit her lower lip, her face pinching with concern. When the time rips were misbehaving, one had opened and swallowed up an unsuspecting Molly. She had slipped back to some unknown century and encountered a castle resident wandering through the hall. “Molly, is this about the...”

“No,” Molly interrupted before she went further. “No. And it’s okay. I told Emily.”

“Aye, and I convinced her she did not see any woman roaming the front hallway.”

“Now that I think about it,” Molly explained, “I’m pretty sure I saw a curtain fluttering or something similar. Definitely not a woman.”

Cate smiled and nodded. “Good. Because this castle is not haunted.”

“I’ll still be glad when the bones are gone,” Molly said.

“Mrs. Fraser,” Cate said, “do you know of any disappearances? The police said not to expect much in the way of solving this, but my curiosity is piqued.”

Mrs. Fraser narrowed her eyes and focused her gaze at a random spot in the air. After a moment, she shook her head. “None that I recall. We haven’t had a murder or missing person in Dunhaven in my lifetime.”

“At least we’re living in a safe town, even if there are ghosts,” Molly said with a chuckle.

“There are no ghosts!” Cate insisted. “Though, you’re right. While it’s good to know Dunhaven is safe, it’s really puzzling. If incidents are that rare, you’d think this would be easy to track.”

“Perhaps it will be, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser said, as she began to clean up from their tea.

“Let’s hope so! I’d really like to have some closure. And someone else may be looking for it, too.”

“I think young Jack would just like the bones out of the garden, especially with the party coming up.”

“Ha!” A sarcastic laugh burst from Cate’s lips. “He said we have plenty of time before the party.”

“Aye, we do. But six weeks will be gone in the blink of an eye.”

“I agree. And if this hasn’t happened in a while in Dunhaven, it will be the talk of the town.”

“You know it, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser said, pointing to her.

“Well, I suppose I should get out to the garden. The police should be here soon to exhume the body.”

Molly groaned. “Can’t be soon enough.”

“Why don’t you leave the dogs with us?” Mrs. Fraser suggested. “I’ll spoil them with a few nice bones. Of the regular kind – not the human kind.”

“And a few extra treats,” Molly said.

“Thank you so much. I’d really prefer them to be in here than bounding around trying to steal someone’s remains.”

Cate left her two furry friends with her two human friends as she stepped from the kitchen into the bright sunshine. She shielded her eyes as she began her walk toward the side garden.

A bright orange plastic fence was strung around the makeshift grave. Jack stood nearby with the DCI Ben Thompson, who had done the initial assessment yesterday.

“Good morning,” Cate called to them.

“Good morning,” Ben answered.

“Hello, Lady Cate,” Jack said. “No dogs today?”

“Mrs. Fraser and Molly are watching them. So we won’t have any rascals running around trying to snag any of the bones.”

“I understand it was your dogs who unearthed the remains,” Ben said.

Cate nodded, pressing her lips together in a thin line. “Yes, they did. They’ve been digging in the spot for weeks and yesterday before we called you, they pulled a few of the... well, they pulled some of the remains out.”

Ben pursed his lips and nodded. “You know, Lady Cate, you really do not need to be here. I understand this is very upsetting.”

Cate forced a weak smile. “It’s okay. I’d like to be here.”

“All right,” he said. “We’re going to get started then.”

Within moments, Cate’s quiet side garden turned into a flurry of activity. An entire crime scene unit descended on the sight. Photographs were taken from every angle. A tarp was laid out, and the crime scene unit meticulously began to lay out the skeleton and recreate the body.

The process took hours. Cate stared at the bones laid on the tarp. She wrapped her arms around her and bit her lower lip. The forensics team continued to poke at the gravesite.

Cate crinkled her brow. “Are they missing something?” she asked Ben.

“Checking for anything else, like jewelry or a weapon. Anything we can use to either solve the case or identify the person.”

Cate nodded in understanding and returned her gaze to the bones in front of her. Jack approached her. “You okay, Lady Cate? I can handle the rest if you’d like to head in.”

“I’m okay. Just wondering who this poor soul was,” Cate answered.

“It is a shame,” Jack admitted.

“With any luck, the police can identify her.”

Jack side-eyed her. “Her?” he questioned, glancing at Cate.

“The skeleton looks small. I’m just making an educated guess.”

Jack raised his eyebrows and cocked his head. “Good assessment. I guess we’ll find out if you’re right soon enough.”

“Mrs. Fraser said she can’t recall any murders or disappearances in her lifetime, so if it’s not a common occurrence, it should be easy, right?”

“Right,” he agreed. “My fingers are certainly crossed. If the police can identify this person, we’re in the clear from any of your harebrained schemes.”

“My schemes are not harebrained,” Cate argued.

“They’re half harebrained at best. Plus, I’d like to avoid... well, you know,” Jack said, raising his eyebrows at Cate.

She smiled at him. “So, you’re already considering it to solve this mystery, huh?”

“I am not. I’m already thinking of ways to avoid it.”

Cate arched an eyebrow, a playful grin on her face. She nodded in response.

“What?” Jack questioned.

“Nothing.”

“That look was not nothing, Lady Cate.”

Cate shrugged and held in a giggle. “Methinks the gentleman doth protest too much.”

“Oh, ho, ho, very funny, Lady Cate. Don’t quote Shakespeare to me. I’m being serious.”

“Shakespeare is always serious. Hamlet was very serious.”

Ben wandered toward them, ending their conversation. “We’re just about finished. We’ll be out of your hair soon.”

“And you’ll let us know if you find anything?” Cate questioned.

“As a courtesy, yes, I’ll let you know.”

“We appreciate it,” Jack said, shaking hands with the man.

“Well, I suppose that’s that. Now we wait,” Cate said.

“Aye,” Jack agreed. “And I can take down the orange fence.”

“Yep,” Cate said. “I’ll bet the dogs will be all over this on their next trip out.”

Jack checked his watch. “I suppose it can wait until after lunch. I’m starving!”

“You’re always starving,” Cate said.

They began their walk back to the castle’s kitchen door. “That’s the only plus point to time traveling,” Jack said. “Double the meals.”

Cate shook her head at him. “At least you’re finding a silver lining.”

* * *

When Cate sat down at her computer after lunch, she found her mind wandering back to the body in the garden. Her lack of focus made it impossible for her to work on her book detailing the castle's former occupants. Instead, she opted for a long walk with the dogs. She allowed them plenty of time to sniff around the newly disturbed dirt.

"No more bones, boys," she told them, though they now seemed interested in the smells left by the live humans who visited earlier today. "If only you two could give us a hint about who this was."

Riley wandered to Cate's side and stared up at her. "Yes, Riley, another mystery. And I can't stop wondering who this person was and how she ended up in our garden."

Riley offered a small whine in response. Cate tore her gaze from the dirt patch where the body had been only hours ago and ruffled the fur on Riley's head.

"Let's go do some research," she suggested. She called to Bailey and the three of them returned to the castle. Cate threaded her way through the halls to the library.

As she crossed to her desk, her eyes fell on the bookcase concealing the passage to Douglas's secret laboratory. Her mind skipped to a different era. She smiled to herself as she recalled meeting the castle's builder and her ancestor.

The smile slowly faded as she recalled the other events of 1792. A shiver shook her, and she ceased walking. The memory of being entombed alive in the family's crypt by Marcus Northcott embedded itself in her mind. She swallowed hard as she recalled cool stone pressed against her back and the sensation of being confined. His voice echoed in her head. "I'm finished with you, for now." Her lower lip quivered in response to the recollection of being plunged into darkness as the stone coffin's lid slid over top.

She twisted her head and her eyes slid upward. The urge to see the necklace he had given her overcame her. She took two steps toward the hallway before she stopped. Her mind clouded and pain shot across her forehead. She pressed her fingertips against her temples as she squeezed her eyes shut.

Cate blew out a long breath. She opened her eyes to find two furry faces staring up at her. She gave them a weak smile. "I'm okay," she said, in a shaky voice. She wrapped her arms around her midriff and rubbed her arms. Goosebumps pocked her skin.

She shivered again and bit her lower lip as she stumbled to the desk across the room. Cate collapsed in the chair and covered her face with her hands. Being haunted by the disturbing memory of being buried alive was not surprising. However, being drawn to the necklace she wore during the escapade bothered her. Why would she long to see an item associated with so much torment?

A cold, wet nose nudged at her arm and a set of tiny paws rested against her thigh. She uncovered her face and found Riley and Bailey watching her.

No matter the circumstances, her two dogs could always soothe her. She pulled them both onto her lap and snuggled them close. She offered them both a kiss on the head. Riley returned the gesture, giving her a lick on her cheek.

“Thanks, buddy,” she said, as she rubbed his back. “I’ll be okay. I just need to get some distance from it.” She nodded as though trying to convince herself. “Maybe the necklace reminds me that I didn’t die.”

Bailey cocked his head at her words. “Yeah, even I think that’s a weak argument, Bailey.”

She sat for another few moments enjoying the comfort of her two pals. “Maybe what I need is a new project. And maybe the body in the backyard is just the thing.”

With another kiss on the top of each of their heads, Cate sent the two pups off for a nap by the fire. She popped open her laptop and waited for it to wake.

As the laptop performed its start-up tasks, Cate swiped at her cell phone. She found a new text message waiting. Cate smiled at the screen as she tapped to read the text from Damien Sherwood. His help during the last crisis at Dunhaven Castle had been invaluable, and the pair had promised to keep in touch.

Hey Cate, just checking in to see how things are going with you. No more trouble with wonky time portals, I hope.

It was nice of Damien to check in, Cate mused, as she typed a response. No more time portals appearing at random. Thanks for checking! Just a skeleton in my garden.

She set the phone aside and tapped into her email account, finding it filled with mostly junk. Her phone chimed as she finished deleting her junk mail. She found another text from Damien.

A skeleton in your garden? Seriously? Like a human one? Seems like you have your hands full.

Cate responded: Yes, a human one. I really hope we can find out what happened and who it was. I feel terrible about it.

As Cate considered researching her current problem, Damien responded with lightning speed. Speaking of feeling terrible... I hate to bring this up but... any more nightmares? And did you get rid of that necklace?

Cate pursed her lips. She hadn't suffered from a nightmare last night, though it may be too soon to tell if she was rid of them for good. The trickier question concerned the necklace. Damien shared the same sentiments as Jack did about the ostentatious object. She struggled to explain away her reasoning for hanging on to the item.

She answered: No nightmares last night. Let's hope the trend continues!

Within seconds, she received a response. I noticed you didn't answer about the necklace.

Cate puckered her lips. Damien was too clever for his own good, she noted as she typed back to him. Didn't chuck it yet, but I'm going to get rid of it soon!

An incoming text popped onto her screen before she could toggle off her display. Don't wait. Get rid of it NOW.

Cate clicked off her phone and set it on the desk next to her laptop. She pulled up her search engine, but before she could type a word, her phone chimed again.

I'm serious, Cate... get rid of it, don't wait. And don't ignore me.

The message from Damien was followed by an emoticon with the tongue sticking out. Cate replied assuring him she was not ignoring him and that she would get rid of it. Her mind added the word "eventually", but she left that out of her message.

Her mind turned toward the necklace. No one wanted her to keep it. Why didn't she get rid of it like they asked of her? Perhaps she was too stubborn for her own good. Perhaps it was their insistence that held her back and made her want to keep it until she got rid of it on her own terms.

Perhaps it was something else. Her brain clouded as she dwelled on the necklace, its diamonds and sapphires sparkling in her mind's eye.

CHAPTER 3

She shook her head to clear her mind, pushing images of the necklace away. “I can’t get rid of it yet,” she mumbled aloud.

With her mind made up, she pushed herself to focus on her laptop. Cate began with a series of Google searches regarding missing persons in Dunhaven. Several results populated on her screen. Several of the top hits were about missing people, but not within the vicinity of Dunhaven. Cate continued to sort through the list of results, finding it offered little in the way of information.

She refined her search and scanned the new list of results. Nothing pointed her toward any information regarding the body. It appeared Mrs. Fraser was correct. People didn’t disappear in Dunhaven.

Cate leaned back in her chair, tenting her fingers. She narrowed her eyes as she considered other avenues to pursue. With no news stories from Dunhaven regarding missing persons, who could the individual buried in her backyard be?

Cate pulled a sheet of paper from the desk drawer and jotted down a few notes.

Person not from Dunhaven - no news reports of a missing person - at least not recently

Cate tapped the pen against her lips. She added: Could the disappearance be older than news reports listed online?

She made a note to inquire with Mrs. Campbell at their meeting tomorrow. Perhaps they had old news articles predating those on the internet that could identify the person.

A new idea occurred to Cate, and she jotted down the words: Someone from out of town?

Perhaps, Cate ruminated, the disappearance was not of a Dunhaven resident. Perhaps the person was visiting on vacation, in town for business or some other reason when they were killed. Then a record of them should exist. Surely, someone reported them missing at some point.

She may need to expand her search into neighboring towns. What if the person came from even further than that? She'd cross that bridge if she came to it.

Cate leaned forward and began to type another search when the doors to the library opened. Molly carried a tray with Cate's dinner.

"Time to quit working and eat!" she announced.

"I wasn't getting very far anyway," Cate admitted, as she stood and stretched.

"Working on the book?" Molly asked.

"No. I was actually trying to see if I could find any information on our former side garden resident."

Molly winced. "I'm not sure I want to know, but did you find anything?"

"Not a thing. Though I'm not sure what I expected to find."

"Well, I'm certain you'll solve it eventually," Molly said. "I've never known Cate Kensie to be stuck for long."

Cate offered her a smile as she settled into her leather armchair. She hoped Molly was correct. She really wanted to solve the mystery of the garden guest.

* * *

Cate's heart beat hard against her ribs. Her pulse raced. Her breaths came in short, shallow gasps. She struggled to move, but found herself unable to.

The figure of Marcus Northcott loomed over her. He spoke, promising her he was finished with her. For now. He pressed his hand over the necklace, his icy fingers brushing against Cate's skin.

"Keep this to remember me by," he said.

He grasped the stone lid and began to shift it over the coffin's top. Her lower lip quivered as tears clouded her vision. It narrowed to a pinpoint as darkness closed in around her.

The cold stone of the coffin pressed against her. Her arms were pinned at her sides. The weight of the sapphire and diamond necklace pressed against her collarbone. The pressure from Duke Northcott's hand as he placed it against the necklace lingered on Cate's skin. It felt as though his icy fingerprints were burned into her skin.

"Help!" she screamed. "Help me! Don't leave me here!"

The tears spilled from her eyes and ran sideways down her face, wetting her hairline. "Please, don't leave me," she whimpered again.

* * *

Cate gasped as her eyes shot open. She gulped air, her eyes darting around her bedroom. She squeezed her lips together, forcing herself to slow her breath. She fumbled with the lamp on her night table, knocking it over as her trembling hands attempted to flick it to the on position.

The two lumps on her bed shot up to standing. Riley hurried to Cate's side and Bailey offered a yip in response to the crash.

"Sorry, guys," Cate said with a wince. She pushed herself up to sit and dangled over the side of the bed to grasp the lamp. She grabbed it by the shade and hauled it upward, setting it upright on the table.

With a groan, she covered her face with her hands before sliding them over her hair. Cate settled back into her pillows. Out of the corner of her eye, she spotted her dream journal. The details of her nightmare flooded back into her mind. She bit her lower lip as her fingertips glided over the smooth, cool cover.

Cate pulled the book onto her lap and flipped through the pages. Page after page flashed in front of her eyes. Written words in her own handwriting outlined months of terrifying dreams involving Marcus Northcott.

Should she detail this nightmare in the journal? It involved Marcus Northcott. They all involved Marcus Northcott. That was the only similarity to the others, though.

Unable to fall asleep, Cate grabbed her pen and began to write. While she did not find it abnormal to suffer from a nightmare about the frightening ordeal she'd just experienced in 1792 at the hands of that man, she hoped it had nothing to do with the others in the journal.

She desperately wished her bad dreams were over and her latest one was merely a remnant of a terrifying experience. She snapped the journal closed and slid it onto her night table. She reached for the light, but changed her mind, deciding to leave it on as she tried to drift back to sleep.

After a few moments, she braved it, flicking off the light and plunging the room into darkness. In the quiet blackness, she stared out the window at the starry sky.

The glow of the half-moon cast long shadows across her floor. She found herself unable to close her eyes. Fear still coursed through her veins.

She reached toward her bare neck framed by her flannel pajama collar. She rubbed her fingers along her collarbone. The image of the sapphire necklace flashed through her mind. Her thoughts dwelled on the jewelry.

Her eyes flicked to the jewelry box across the room. She focused on the bottom drawer. After a moment, she rose from the bed and wandered to the wooden armoire. The drawer slid open, and she spied the sparkling jewelry even in the darkened room.

Cate reached for it, letting her fingertips glide over the smooth, polished stones. She curled her slender fingers around the center stone and lifted the necklace from the drawer. With it clutched to her chest, she strode back to bed, climbed in, and nestled under the covers.

Holding the necklace close to her heart, she closed her eyes and drifted off to sleep in minutes.

* * *

When Cate awoke the next morning, the sun was already cresting the moors. It painted the sky a brilliant shade of red and purple. Cate rolled onto her back and took a deep breath. She became aware of her hand, balled in a fist with the sapphire necklace still clutched within her grasp.

The memory of her dream and subsequent reaction flooded back into her mind. Why had she risen and retrieved the necklace? And why had it seemed to calm her?

Cate recalled drifting off to sleep shortly after returning to bed with the necklace. Perhaps she'd just been too weary to do anything but fall asleep then, Cate ruminated. Maybe the necklace was unrelated to her falling asleep.

Cate stretched and climbed from her bed. She deposited the necklace in the bottom drawer of the jewelry armoire, before continuing on to begin her day.

Instinctively, she found herself returning to the spot where the bones had been exhumed the previous day. As the dogs chased each other around a row of bushes, Cate stared at the dirt.

"Who were you?" she whispered. "And what happened to you?"

With no answers forthcoming, Cate returned to the castle for a warm breakfast before her morning meeting with Isla Campbell.

While scheduled for nine, Cate had no doubt she'd see Mrs. Campbell at the stroke of 8:45 a.m. The party planning whiz barreled up the driveway in her sleek black car, her brakes screeching to a halt at precisely quarter to nine.

The slight woman flew from her car and raced to her backseat to gather her materials. "Oh, Lady Cate," she exclaimed, as she pulled folders, fabric swatches, a calendar, a tote bag filled with hidden items and more from her car, "I cannot begin to tell you how excited I am."

"I can imagine. Landing the Presidents' Ball is quite a feat, I'm told," Cate answered. "Can I help you with anything?"

"Oh, no, no, no. I've got it!" She kicked the door shut and turned to face Cate with a grin. "Ready!"

Cate led her into the sitting room. Mrs. Fraser already waited with a tray of tea. "I beat you to it, Lady Cate," she said. "Already brought tea. And Molly's tried her hand at these new lemon crisps. I put some shortbreads out, too, just in case, but I think you may enjoy these."

"Oh, Emily, hello," Mrs. Campbell said. "Got the youngster showing the old dog some new tricks, eh?"

Cate bit her lower lip and offered a slight shake of her head toward Mrs. Fraser. By the woman's expression, she was sure Mrs. Fraser was fuming. Molly would get an earful about the "ninny" the moment Mrs. Fraser returned to the comfort of her kitchen.

"Not really," Mrs. Fraser said. "I'd not be much of a baker if I'd never heard of a lemon crisp before. Just allowing the 'youngster,' as you put it, to spread her wings and bake something of her choosing. She's got to have a signature item."

Mrs. Campbell offered a tight-lipped smile that bordered on a smirk and a shoulder shrug before plopping onto the loveseat. She began arranging her party planning paraphernalia around her, putting a nonverbal end to her conversation with Mrs. Fraser.

"If you need anything else, Lady Cate, just ring."

"I will, thank you, Mrs. Fraser. Please tell Molly the lemon cookies look delicious and, of course, I can't resist your shortbreads."

Mrs. Fraser offered Cate a smile, before retreating through the doors leading to the back hall.

Mrs. Campbell continued to lay out her materials before snatching a large leather folder from her tote bag. She unzipped it, revealing a notebook and pen inside. After removing the pen, she drew in a deep breath, exhaled sharply, and raised her eyes to meet Cate's.

Cate smiled at her. "Where would you like to begin?" Cate asked.

"Well," Mrs. Campbell began, "I hate to begin here, but I feel as though I must."

Cate's mind shot forward, preparing for what she believed was inevitable.

Mrs. Campbell leaned forward and whispered, "The body." She pursed her lips and raised her eyebrows.

"Yes, of course," Cate answered. "The remains have already been removed, so that won't be an issue. And..."

"It's not just the bones," Mrs. Campbell said. "It's the rumors, of course. A body... found on the grounds of Dunhaven Castle." Mrs. Campbell pulled the corners of her mouth into a frown and shivered dramatically.

Cate opened her mouth to respond, when Mrs. Campbell continued. "It's simply ghastly!"

"Well, if anyone can turn this around, I'm certain you can," Cate said. "And as Jack pointed out, we have six weeks before the anniversary party and nearly three months before the Presidents' Ball. The rumors should have run their course by then."

"Let's hope," Mrs. Campbell said.

"On that note," Cate said, before they moved on to other topics, "I wondered if you could be of any assistance with identifying the remains."

Mrs. Campbell furrowed her brow, and she shook her head as though shocked. "How could I possibly help?"

"Well, you are always a wealth of information to assist me with my castle research. I wondered if you may have any information on unsolved disappearances, new or old, that may explain who this may be."

"I don't know of any castle occupants who went missing; certainly none of the earls or countesses," Mrs. Campbell said.

"I haven't come across anything of that nature either. Though I haven't come across anyone who's gone missing in the Dunhaven area," Cate answered.

"No, disappearances are not common here," Mrs. Campbell agreed.

"I can't help but be curious," Cate prodded. "I feel somewhat responsible since the poor person was found on my property."

"Oh, don't be silly, Lady Cate. Certainly, no one blames you!"

"Still, I'd like to learn as much as I can. Would you mind helping me track down any news stories that may be relevant?"

"I shall have the assistant librarian gather any materials that may be applicable!"

"Wonderful. Do you mind if I stop in tomorrow to pick them up?"

"Not at all! I'll text her right now." Mrs. Campbell tapped at her phone before setting it down and smiling. "There we are."

"Thank you so much, Mrs. Campbell."

"I am always happy to be of assistance."

"Now, about the party," Cate began.

She was interrupted by Mrs. Campbell's waving finger. "Oh, this is far more than a party," Mrs. Campbell corrected. "The Presidents' Ball is an event!" She waved her arms in the air with flourish to punctuate the statement. "It takes place over the span of several days..."

Cate was exhausted already. Mrs. Campbell continued on with her explanation: a formal dinner Friday evening, an auction and ball on Saturday with various other side events, and a brunch on Sunday to close the event. The line-up did little to alleviate Cate's apprehension. She smiled as detail after endless detail paraded through her mind.

Mrs. Campbell seemed to have a handle on everything, as usual. She suggested castle tours, garden tours, a photo opportunity with Cate, a garden tea party, an evening concert, and more. Cate's eyes bulged at the amount of planning it would take the pull this off. The ever-confident Mrs.

Campbell seemed unbothered by the level of preparation, stating simply, “I want to make this the best Presidents’ Ball the association has ever experienced. I want it to be talked about for years to come.”

“Well, I certainly think it will be that!” Cate answered, after she detailed her itinerary.

“Now, I’ve got a great deal to coordinate, but do you mind if I take up just a tad more of your time to go over a few minor things for your anniversary party?”

“Not at all!” Cate answered.

They spent another hour discussing modifications and details for the party six weeks away. After that, Mrs. Campbell seemed satisfied with their work. Cate showed her out, waving as she shot off down the driveway on a mission to find the perfect something-or-other for one of the parties.

Cate glanced down at her timepiece hanging from her neck. The noon hour approached. Her rumbling stomach also announced the time. She returned to the sitting room and grabbed the tea tray before heading downstairs to lunch with her staff.

She giggled as she heard Mrs. Fraser’s voice filtering down the hall as she approached the kitchen.

“... cannae believe she is still here. That infernal woman does not understand how to be respectful of other’s time. I only hope she won’t be joining us for lunch. Or worse, make poor Lady Cate late. The poor girl is likely starving.”

“I had plenty of cookies to tide me over,” Cate remarked, as she entered the kitchen and set the tray on the counter.

“Ah, Lady Cate, thank goodness she’s finally left you alone,” Mrs. Fraser said.

“It was a doozy of a meeting, that’s for sure,” Cate answered, as Molly cleared the tray.

“What did the party czar do today to upset you, Mrs. Fraser?” Jack inquired, as he pushed through the door with Mr. Fraser trailing behind him. “I could hear you all the way outside most of the morning.”

The statement elicited another chuckle from Cate.

“She called me an old dog!” Mrs. Fraser exclaimed, snapping her dishtowel against the counter. “The nerve of her. Calling me old and a dog.”

Jack lifted his eyebrows at the statement.

“She asked if Molly was showing the old dog a few new tricks with the lemon crisps.”

“Ohhh,” Jack said, with a nod of understanding.

“That’ll be the day,” Mrs. Fraser said with a harrumph. “I know all the tricks there are to know. And don’t you forget it!” She wagged her finger at Molly.

“I have no doubt, Mrs. Fraser,” Molly answered.

Jack plopped into his seat at the table. “And what outrageous requests does she have for these parties?”

Cate sighed as she eased into a chair across from Jack. “Well, she asked how quickly an oak tree grows.”

Jack furrowed his brow. “Why?”

“She hoped you could plant one now and that it would grow large enough in six weeks to hang a swing from for a photoshoot.”

“Is she insane?”

Cate shrugged. “I told her I did not believe that was likely. Then she asked if it was possible to uproot a large enough tree and transplant it.”

“That does it,” Jack said, slapping his hand against the table. “She’s certifiable.”

“At least no snow machine.”

“No,” Jack answered, “but it will be summer for both parties. I’m surprised she hasn’t asked us to harness the sun and pull it closer to ensure warm weather.”

“There were some discussions about contingency plans for inclement weather. She has a large number of events scheduled outside. She said since Mr. Fraser seems so talented with his garden designs perhaps he’ll enjoy the challenge of creating a magical garden display for each party.”

“I suppose I should take that as a compliment,” Mr. Fraser said in his soft-spoken manner.

“Wait until you hear what she wants before you decide,” Jack cautioned.

“For the anniversary party she requested something along the lines of The Secret Garden,” Cate said with a shrug. “And for the Presidents’ Ball, she said ‘whimsical fairyland, like in Dance of the Sugar Plum Fairies.’”

Mr. Fraser’s eyes widened, and he cocked his head. After a moment, he blew out a breath. “I’ve got some ideas. I’ll sketch them up.”

“You never cease to amaze me, Mr. Fraser,” Cate said.

“As long as you like them, Lady Cate, that’s all that matters.”

“Because we know Mrs. Campbell will never be satisfied,” Jack added.

“It’s pretty bad when it’s easier to impress a countess than a librarian,” Molly said.

“And I’m still raw over her calling me a dog,” Mrs. Fraser added, as they set the lunch on the table.

“Speaking of,” Cate said, “where are the dogs?”

CHAPTER 4

Everyone glanced around the room in search of the two missing pups. “Oh, there’s one,” Jack joked, pointing at Mrs. Fraser.

She swatted at him with her dishtowel. “Watch yourself, young Jack, I don’t have to hold my temper with you like I do with her.”

Jack held his hands up to defend against the flying towel as he laughed. “I’m only joking, Mrs. Fraser. Anyway, I think you’d better ready your fighting skills for Lady Cate. It seems you’ve lost her dogs.”

“Those two rascals are somewhere about,” Mrs. Fraser said. “They went tearing out of here about fifteen minutes ago. I assume they heard something.”

“Oh, no,” Jack groaned. “I hope it’s not another body.”

“You and me both!” Cate exclaimed as she rose from the table. “That’s another thing Mrs. Campbell is having a fit about.”

“Really?” Molly inquired.

“Yes. The rumors and all of that after we found a body on the grounds. She doesn’t want it to dampen the festivities. I told her it would die down before the first party.”

“News doesn’t always die down in Dunhaven,” Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate called down the hall to both dogs. “Really?”

Mrs. Fraser gave a slow shake of her head and puckered her lips. “Didnae you figure that out when everyone here knew the story about Douglas and the odd occurrences here?”

“Good point,” Jack said, as Cate gave another call down the hall. “Everyone knows about devil-worshipper Douglas and that’s been over two centuries.”

“Aye, and it still hasn’t died down,” Mrs. Fraser answered.

“You have a point,” Cate answered. The sound of claws and scampering feet echoed through the kitchen. Two small dogs scampered into the room moments later. “There you are! And where have you two been this time?”

“Finding a secret passage?” Mrs. Fraser inquired.

“Digging up bones?” Jack asked.

“Chasing ghosts?” Molly questioned.

“Probably just being rascals,” Mr. Fraser ended with.

“Definitely that,” Cate answered, pointing at Mr. Fraser. “Look at you two.”

A sheen of dust covered Bailey’s gray fur, making him a shade lighter than normal and a cobweb clung to Riley’s face, haphazardly draped from the top of his head and down his ear before hooking onto a whisker and dangling from his chin.

Cate swiped the cobweb away while Molly dusted Bailey with a rag.

“Ah, they look like you, Lady Cate, when you’ve been crawling around in a closed-off area.”

“Yes,” Cate agreed. “I wonder what closed-off area they managed to get themselves off to.”

“We may have to follow them next time,” Molly suggested. “Maybe they found something cool.”

“Looks like all they found is dirt,” Mrs. Fraser said. “We may want to have the CLEANING company follow them.”

Cate chuckled at the suggestion as she returned to her seat. “I hope the police can figure out who this is. Maybe that will put an end to the rumors.”

“They didn’t seem to be too certain they’d find anything,” Jack said.

“No. I asked Mrs. Campbell to put together a list of articles about disappearances in the area that may connect to it. We’ll see what she comes up with.”

“Well, if there’s a dark secret lurking, you’d better believe Isla Campbell knows all about it,” Mrs. Fraser said.

“That’s what I’m counting on, Mrs. Fraser,” Cate said with a wink.

* * *

Cate spent her afternoon working on her manuscript. After her visit to 1792, she had a wealth of information and insight on the castle's builder, Douglas MacKenzie. Though she found it easy to detail Douglas from a personal perspective and her writing flowed easily, her mind continued to return to the latest mystery.

Even after climbing into bed after a long evening stroll around the property, Cate's mind couldn't settle. It bounced from topic to topic. She began first with the skeleton in the garden. She pondered who it could be and why they were buried there. She wondered if they'd ever determine answers to those questions and strategized ways to search for information.

Her mind turned to another topic, as her fingers absentmindedly caressed the soft fur on Riley's head. Where had her two friends disappeared to earlier? They usually did not roam around the confines of the castle. What had drawn their attention? Perhaps they'd heard Cate call her goodbye to Mrs. Campbell and sought her out. Cate shook her head. That didn't seem likely. Surely she would have run into them if that was the case.

Cate rolled her head to the side and glanced down at Riley and Bailey. "Where did you two disappear to today?" she whispered. Riley adjusted his head, his dark eyes peeking at her before slowly drifting shut again.

With no answers, Cate closed her eyes. Thoughts whirled through her mind. Images flashed past: the garden, Riley's cobwebbed face, Bailey's dusty back, a skeleton, a mysterious shadow of a person, a lightning bolt, a fireball, the family crypt, a blue satin dress. Cate drifted to sleep as her mind focused on one image. A blue sapphire and diamond necklace.

* * *

The alarm chirped, stirring Cate from a sound sleep. Blindly, her fingers found the clock and silenced it. With a deep inhale, Cate rolled onto her back and stretched.

As she reached overhead, something smacked against her headboard. The scraping sound caused Cate to snap her eyes open. She glanced up at her fist. Something dangled from it. Cate pulled it toward her chest and sat up. She reached for her lamp and flicked it on, squinting against the bright light that filled the room.

Cate's lips parted as she stared at the item in her hand. The large teardrop sapphire gleamed in the light. The smaller sapphires, surrounded by diamonds, dangled from her open palm.

Cate swallowed hard, the crease between her eyes deepening as she stared at the necklace. "How did I get this?" she whispered.

Cate went over the events of the previous night in her mind. She'd drifted off to sleep pondering the mystery of the skeleton and the dogs' disappearance. Her mind had flitted from thought to thought after that.

She recalled thinking about the necklace before falling asleep, but she did not recall rising from her bed and retrieving it.

She must have done it, she assumed. She must have risen at some point and wandered over to get the necklace, then crawled back in bed with it. Perhaps she was half-asleep when she did it. Perhaps she had sleepwalked. A frightening thought, but she couldn't explain it otherwise.

Cate stared down at the sparkling gems. A shudder shook her body, and she discarded the necklace onto her comforter, shoving it away. She drew her knees to her chest and stared at the rejected item.

After a moment, she snatched it and hurried across the room. She shoved it into the bottom drawer of the jewelry armoire and slammed the drawer shut. With a deep exhale, she spun around and leaned against the heavy wooden furniture piece.

Jack's words rang in her mind. "Get rid of it."

Cate shook her head and left the armoire behind in favor of a shower. Her mind could not process disposing of the necklace now.

* * *

Cate emerged into the bright spring sunshine. The dogs raced ahead of her, frolicking in the cool breeze. Cate watched them as they played tug-of-war with a wayward branch Bailey found. Riley snagged it from within his brother's iron-jawed grip and pranced away with his prize as Bailey chased after him. Soon, the branch lost its luster for both dogs, and they scampered away in search of something else to play with.

Cate smiled at them as they danced around the back garden. She raised an eyebrow as she gazed out over it, wondering what plans Mr. Fraser may create to bring a magical theme to her two upcoming events. In six short weeks, Cate would be celebrating her one-year anniversary as the Countess of Dunhavenshire.

She still recalled the moment she'd arrived in the back of Mr. Smythe's black rental car. Even after a year, Cate couldn't believe the turn of events in her life. She twisted to take in the castle behind her. Cast in yellow hues of the rising sun, the castle gleamed at her like a magical fairy tale.

She smiled at it, before turning back to clap her hands and call the dogs back. She'd take a long walk with them after breakfast before she traveled into the quaint town of Dunhaven to pick up the articles Mrs. Campbell put together for her.

After her morning trek around the property, Cate headed into town, parking near the town's center and enjoying a walk along the streets in the brisk air to the library.

"Hi," Cate greeted the assistant behind the desk with a broad smile. It was the same girl who she'd spoken with shortly after she'd arrived. The girl had never quite forgiven her for strong-arming her into borrowing materials from the library that were not meant to be lent out.

"Lady Cate, how can I help you?" she said, her lips set in a firm line, one eyebrow arched.

"I believe Mrs. Campbell had a packet for me to pick up?" Cate said.

"Lady Cate!" Mrs. Campbell called from her office behind the desk. "Good morning!"

"Good morning, Mrs. Campbell. I was just asking Beth about the packet you put together."

"Yes, of course!" Mrs. Campbell swiped the folder Beth pulled from under the desk and held it out toward Cate.

Cate reached for it, but Mrs. Campbell pulled it back. "Now, there's not much," she said, cocking her head and tapping the slim folder. "I told you there was nothing untoward that happened in Dunhaven." She waved a finger in the air. "Well," she added, "nothing untoward except some of those goings-on in the castle." She offered a coy smirk.

"Well, I suppose there has to be some excitement!" Cate said, with a hollow chuckle. "And again, thank you for putting together whatever you could find."

"Have you heard anything about the case?"

"Not yet. I hope to hear soon."

"I certainly hope we hear before the party so the matter can die down."

“I won’t let up on them until we get somewhere.”

Mrs. Campbell gave a nod of approval toward Cate and relinquished the folder to her.

“See you next week, Lady Cate. Wednesday, 9 a.m. sharp!”

“See you then!”

Cate offered a wave as she pushed through the doors into the cool Scottish morning air. She resisted the urge to claw through the folder and determine if anything could help identify the body removed from her garden. Instead, the shops caught her eye.

She shoved the folder into her tote bag and decided to spend the rest of her morning shopping. She strolled into one of her favorite boutique shops, carrying everything from handmade gifts to mainstream products.

“Lady Cate!” Harry, the shop owner, greeted her. He stared down at the floor, searching around her feet. “Where are my two favorite buddies?”

“Back at the castle, enjoying being spoiled by Mrs. Fraser and Molly,” Cate answered. “How are you, Harry?”

“Doing just fine. And you?”

“I’m doing very well, thank you.”

“Getting ready for that big party?”

“I am,” Cate said with a nod. “Will you and Helen be attending?”

“We wouldn’t miss it.”

“Good, I’m so glad. I can’t wait to see everyone there!”

Harry’s wife, Helen, emerged from the backroom. “Oh, hello, Lady Cate,” she greeted her.

“Hello!”

“Can’t wait to see everyone at the party?” she asked.

“Yep. I’m really looking forward to it.”

“Aye, I think everyone in town is. Although, I hope you’re prepared for the rumors.”

“Helen!” Harry whispered harshly.

“Well, it’s best she knows!”

“I assume this is about the latest discovery in the garden.”

Helen nodded. “Aye, the body is the talk of the town. And everyone has an opinion.”

Cate squeezed her lips together and nodded. Helen leaned closer to Cate. “They’ve got it pegged to a mistress of Randolph Mackenzie, killed in a fit of rage.”

Cate raised her eyebrows and held back a sigh. Randolph's reputation as a womanizer couldn't be further from the truth. She was nearly certain he was not the murderer.

"Or the bones of a human sacrifice of Douglas MacKenzie," Harry chimed in.

Cate's eyebrows fell and scrunched together. Another unlikely culprit, her mind echoed. Douglas had been about as much of a devil worshipper as a priest.

"Or the thief from the 1925 heist met a gory end."

Cate knew this was not the truth. "Didn't the theft turn out not to be a theft, but a misplacement of the jewelry?" she asked.

"So they say," Helen answered, crossing her arms over her chest. "I say they found those jewels and killed the person who took them."

"Now, Helen," Harry began.

"It's all right, Harry. Everyone has a theory."

"Do you?" Helen inquired.

"Sadly, no," Cate said. "I would very much like to find out what happened."

"But those answers may be buried in the past just like that body," Helen said.

Cate nodded. Buried in the past wasn't quite as much of a challenge as most people assumed. She just needed a hint as to when they were buried.

"Well, I hope they find something out," Helen said. "I'm sure either way, it'll be the talk of the town for years to come."

Cate spent another few moments chitchatting with the couple before she said her goodbyes. On her way out the door, something in the display window caught her eye. She cocked her head and studied the display.

Afraid of things that go bump in the night? Catch them on video!

"What's this, Harry?" Cate asked pointing to the small cube.

"Oh, that's a motion cam," he answered.

"A what?" Cate asked. "Sorry, I'm not great with technology."

Harry rounded the counter and approached Cate, picking up the colorful little cube. "It's a little camera. It connects to an app on your phone and alerts you when there's motion. It also records anything it sees and stores it for you to review later." Harry pulled the sign down and tossed it aside. "Ignore that. A bit of left-over marketing from All Hallow's Eve last year."

Cate lifted the cube from his hand and studied it. She handed it back and said, "I'll take one. Are there instructions for setting it up on your phone?"

"Aye," Harry said, as he grabbed a packaged one from under the display and set the display model back onto its perch. "And I can help you if you have a minute."

"Got ghosts, Lady Cate?" Helen inquired.

Cate laughed. "No, but it may be handy to keep an eye on the dogs."

"Oh, a nanny cam," Harry said with a chuckle, as he processed the sale. He pulled the box open and removed a small set of instructions, along with the cube and a short cord. "Now, this is your plug. And this little button up top is how you turn it on and off." Harry toggled it on, and a small blue light bloomed to life on top. He pressed the button again to turn it off and unfurled the instructions. "Now, have you got your phone?"

"Yes," Cate said, readying it.

"Okay, scan this QR code here and it'll take you to the app you need. Okay, good. Press to download it." He continued to walk Cate through the steps to create an account. "Now, when you get home, set it up wherever you'd like. Turn on the camera and open your app. The camera should spring up on here and you can connect them. Oh, you'll also need your wifi password."

"I've got that," Cate assured him.

"If you have any trouble, give me a call, I can talk you through it." Harry packaged everything up into the box and dropped it into a small shopping bag. "Have fun watching the pups!"

"Thanks." Cate accepted the proffered bag and headed out of the shop. After a bit more window shopping, she climbed into the car and headed back to the castle.

Cate greeted her excited pups with hugs and kisses before settling down for lunch. She stared at the thin folder from the library as she blew on her first spoonful of tomato basil soup. After her first bite of the sumptuous soup, her eyes fell to the bag next to her feet. Foregoing the articles, Cate pulled the miniature camera cube from inside and unboxed it. She glanced at the instructions as she finished her meal.

After Molly collected her tray, Cate grabbed the camera cube, her phone, and the instructions and wandered to her bedroom. The two pups followed her, but disappeared before she reached her suite.

She offered a surprised chortle when she realized she was alone. “Where are those two off to now?” she questioned aloud. She glanced at the blue cube in her hand. “I may need more of these!”

Cate entered her bedroom and glanced around the space. She crossed to a large dresser near one corner of the room and set the cube on the top. She aimed it at her bed, plugged it in a nearby outlet, and toggled it on. She swiped at her phone and selected the camera app she’d downloaded earlier. After a few moments, she managed to get the camera synced with her phone. The display bloomed to life on her screen. A video feed showed her standing in front of the camera, phone in hand.

Cate stepped aside and maneuvered the camera to have a view of most of the room. With the task complete, Cate toggled off her phone display and returned to the library.

The room was empty. Cate narrowed her eyes at the space before she retreated, heading down to the kitchen.

“Oh, hello, Lady Cate,” Molly said. “What’s up?”

“Are Riley and Bailey here?” Cate peered over the counter.

“Nope, not here.”

“Hmm.”

“Lost track of the little buggers?” Mrs. Fraser inquired.

“I did. I went upstairs after lunch and lost them somewhere along the way. I thought they may have run down here to pester you ladies for a snack.”

“No, haven’t seen them.”

“I’m surprised given that you made tomato basil soup. You know how Riley is about tomatoes. He can’t get enough of them.”

“That is so funny,” Molly said with a chuckle. She wiped her hands on a dishtowel. “Did you want me to help you look for them?”

“No,” Cate said. “They’re around here somewhere, I’ll find them.”

“If you don’t, let us know and we’ll help you look,” Mrs. Fraser offered. “Or better yet, get young Jack after them. Riley adores him.”

“He really does,” Cate said. “I’ll let you know if I can’t find them, but they couldn’t have gotten too far.”

“It’s a big castle,” Molly said with a shrug.

“Yeah, but a lot of it is closed off. Unless they’ve learned how to open doors.”

“There’s a scary thought,” Mrs. Fraser chuckled.

“We’ll find out!” Cate gave them a wave and headed back upstairs. She called the dogs as she walked, checking in the sitting room and the library again. With no sign of them, she ascended the stairs and retraced her steps to her bedroom. She found no sign of them there or along the way.

Cate scanned the hall outside her bedroom as she pondered where to look next. She bit her lower lip, forcing the growing panic down as it rose inside her.

“They couldn’t have gotten far,” Cate said to herself. Her mind spun in a thousand different directions. Had they found a hiding spot? Were they stuck somewhere? What if they were hurt?

Cate blew out a long breath. They were fine, she assured herself. The castle was huge. She could be missing them. They could be upstairs while she was down and downstairs while she was up. Maybe they climbed to the tower.

Cate roamed around to the tower stairs, continuing to call to them. She stared up the circular stone steps before she climbed them. The tower room door was closed at the top, but Cate still pushed it open and glanced around the space.

No dogs there. She returned to the hall below and descended the back stairs to the main floor.

“Riley! Bailey!” Cate shouted as she snaked through the halls.

She passed another hallway and glanced down its length. At the end, two large wooden doors led to an unused wing of the castle. She’d barely explored this area outside of a cursory walkthrough.

The doors were closed and locked; they couldn’t have gotten into the other wing. Cate took another step to continue down the hallway before she backed up. She glanced at the doors again. Was there a crack of light between them? She’d never noticed that before.

Cate hurried down the hall toward the other wing. As she approached, it became obvious one of the doors stood ajar. Perhaps this explained the dogs’ mysterious disappearance.

“Riley! Bailey!” Cate shouted as she approached the doors. She grasped the handle and began to swing the door open when two furry faces darted into the hallway. Riley wagged his feather-like tail as he stared up at her. Bailey offered a view of his bottom teeth in an awkward but heart-warming “smile.”

“There you are!” Cate exclaimed. She placed her hands on her hips and stared down at the two pups. “Is this where you’ve been sneaking off to?” She glanced into the large hallway beyond the doors. “We’re going to have to remind Jack to lock this! He must have left it open.”

At the mention of Jack’s name, Riley danced on his hind legs, his tail waving rapidly. “Yes, your friend, Jack, has given you some fun places to nose around, but not anymore!”

Cate grasped the doorknob and began to push the door shut. She stopped, her forehead wrinkling. She hesitated with the door still ajar. Something caught her attention. A familiar smell floated past her nostrils. She couldn’t place it. Why would any smell other than mustiness be wafting from the closed-off wing?

CHAPTER 5

Cate leaned into the wide hall past the doors and sniffed. Nothing more than stale air sailed through her nose. She straightened and pushed the door closed. She'd caught a whiff of something. But the scent was gone. What was it? And where had it come from?

She couldn't answer those questions. Instead, she opted to return to the library with her buddies to peruse the articles from Mrs. Campbell.

After returning to the library, Cate sank into the oversized leather armchair near the fireplace. She retrieved the folder of articles from the coffee table and flicked it open. Five pieces of paper spilled from it. She glanced at the empty interior searching for more. The minimal amount of results was a disappointing start to say the least.

The first article detailed a missing person's case from the 1970s in the neighboring town of Canberry. The write-up detailed a missing girl, aged eighteen, who disappeared from a local festival. Her absence was first reported by her younger sibling. The child, eight at the time, was found wandering around the festival alone. When asked where her older sister was, the child could not answer. She claimed the sister, named Evelyn, told her to wait near the carousel until her parents found her. The girl, however, was attracted by a large display of teddy bears and left the spot to explore the games. Other details at the time of writing were few.

Cate considered the story. Could a girl from Canberry end up buried in her garden? Perhaps, but by whom and why?

Cate flipped the page and found her hopes were dashed. The next article discussed Evelyn's return. After being found two towns away in the apartment of a man five years her senior, she had reluctantly returned to her parents' house. After a long questioning, Evelyn admitted she had not been abducted, but rather ran away with the man and intended to marry him.

Alive and well, at least at the time of the article's writing, Cate assumed she was not the woman buried on Dunhaven grounds.

She moved to the next article. A routine death in Dunhaven became a mystery when the body disappeared from the morgue. Seventy-two-year-old Duncan MacAllister died from a heart attack while dining alone in his home on 19 February 1958. While there was nothing mysterious about the manner in which he died, when his younger sister appeared at the morgue two weeks after his death to claim his body, she was informed the body was missing. She had been out of the country at the time of her brother's death and only learned of it upon her return.

An investigation was launched, but the body was not found. An obscure reference in the logbook showed an unintelligible name scrawled on 20 February. The attendant on duty recalled the man who collected Duncan's body to have said he was a cousin. The attendant could not recall the man's name nor any other details. The body was never found.

Could Duncan MacAllister have been the man buried? Why? Who would bring a dead body to Dunhaven, and for what purpose? Gertrude's mother, Mary, was the caretaker at the time. She couldn't have done it. Did someone on the property? If the bones turned out to be from a male, Cate decided she would ask Jack's grandfather about it.

She turned to the second to last article. Two tiny paragraphs skimmed over a story about a potential missing woman. Cate scanned it, noting a familiar name. Amelia MacKenzie, her great-grandmother, told the local press the woman, a traveling companion of hers, had merely left her employ. The reporter suggested the story to be more untoward, claiming the woman fled the castle in the middle of the night, though Amelia denied the allegation.

Cate set the article aside. As interesting as it may have been to the locals, she did not believe Amelia would lie to cover up any inappropriate behavior. Most likely, the local gossip mill had worked overtime, turning the small tidbit into an international story, just as they had with both Douglas and Randolph MacKenzie.

She skimmed the last article. This one showed some promise as a potential solution. A local man went missing in the 1840s. Evidence suggested the man may have fallen in with the wrong lot. An associate claimed he saw him leaving town, saying he preferred to lie low for a while. Still, others claimed he was a victim of “something strange at the castle.” His disappearance was never resolved.

Molly flitted into the room carrying a tray laden with dinnertime goodies. “Mmm, is that pie?” Cate inquired. She shoved the copies into the folder and set it on the table.

“Yes, it is. Lemon meringue. Wanted to make good use of our lemons.”

“I cannot wait to taste it. The lemon cookies are fantastic!”

“Thank you!” Molly said, beaming at the compliment. “Enjoy!”

“Thanks, you too!”

Molly flitted from the room. Cate dug into her dinner as she considered the articles. None of them offered any assistance in identifying the victim. The best option was the centuries-old unresolved disappearance. If the remains were identified as belonging to a male, they may be on to something.

With her meal finished, Cate gathered her tray and headed down to the kitchen.

“The pie was excellent,” she announced as she entered.

“Oh, thanks, Lady Cate!” Molly said, as she leapt from her seat to grab the tray. “You didn’t have to carry this down.”

“It’s fine, I needed to stretch my legs.”

“Any articles identify the uninvited garden guest?” Mrs. Fraser inquired.

“Not really. There weren’t many and there was no smoking gun, that’s for sure.”

“I’m not surprised,” Mrs. Fraser answered. “I told you not much happens in Dunhaven. I cannae even begin to guess who that may be!”

“We may never know,” Cate said with a shrug. “Though I hope we find out. Oh, Jack, before I forget, the door to the unused west wing is unlocked.”

Jack’s brow furrowed as he took another bite of his pie. “Really?” he inquired.

“Yeah. That’s where the dogs disappeared to, probably both times.”

Jack set down his fork and pushed his plate away. He stood, withdrawing a set of keys from his pocket. "I'll go lock it now."

"I'll walk you up," Cate said.

They climbed the stairs to the main floor. Jack rustled through the keys. "I'm not sure how this happened. I didn't unlock that door recently."

"You must have forgotten to lock it the last time you were in there," Cate said with a shrug.

Jack shook his head. "No, I never forget to lock it. In fact, I remember locking it. I went in there three weeks ago and I distinctly remember locking it."

"Wow, good memory," Cate said.

"Don't credit me too much, Lady Cate. I remember locking it because the damned key got stuck and I cursed it while I tried to jiggle it loose."

Cate raised her eyebrows. "Maybe your curse turned it into a magical door that opens and closes on its own."

Jack gave Cate a sour look. "I'm not magical like our friends across the pond."

"Maybe they enchanted it," Cate said with a chuckle as they reached the doors.

Jack studied them. "You're sure these were open?"

"Yep," Cate said. "Both dogs came running out."

Jack shoved a key in the lock and turned it. He jiggled the doorknob and waved a hand at it. "There we are," he said. "Locked. With you as my witness."

Cate nodded. "Thanks, Jack."

"So, nothing in those articles?"

Cate shook her head and shrugged. "No. One of them was a girl from Canberry who resurfaced – turns out she was with a boyfriend. Another was a man who had a heart attack, and his body went missing from the morgue. But there's no reason to believe someone brought him here. The third was a woman who was presumed missing. It was during World War II, and Amelia said she simply left. The only possible lead is a man in the 1840s who disappeared."

"He sounds like our best lead."

Cate nodded. "And it's tenuous at best."

"Aye. Well, maybe the police will have some information for us."

"Let's hope so," Cate said.

“Well, good night, Lady Cate.”

“Good night.”

Cate returned to the library for the rest of the evening. She re-read the articles, finding nothing new. After spending some time with a novel, she corralled the dogs upstairs to her bedroom.

Cate bit her lower lip as she stared at the small cube on the dresser in the corner of the room. She licked her lips as her finger hovered on the power button. Perhaps this wasn't a good idea.

She pulled her hand away. It wouldn't hurt, however creepy it seemed to have a video of her sleeping.

“All right, boys,” she said, as she crawled between the sheets. “Let's see how much you two walk around at night.” She laughed nervously as she shot a glance toward the camera.

Cate flicked the light off and slouched further down the bed, relaxing into her pillows. The blue light glowed across the room. Cate stared at the pinpoint of color. As she pondered what she'd see on the camera the next morning, she drifted off to sleep.

Cate awoke the next morning as her alarm sounded. With a groan, she rolled over and turned it off. She opened her eyes and found Riley staring at her. “Hey, buddy,” she said with a yawn. “Sleep well?”

As she stretched, she uncurled her fist. The sapphire necklace dropped from her hand to the duvet below with a thump. Cate sucked in a deep breath as she sat up. She ruffled the fur on Riley's head. “I see we had another active night. I guess I'll find out more when I review my camera footage.”

Riley side-eyed Cate as he yawned. “I'm not looking forward to it either, buddy.”

Bailey climbed to his feet, stretching, and sitting next to Cate. She gave him a good morning pet before she climbed from her bed and headed into the bathroom for her morning routine.

Cate glanced at her phone several times. It beeped often, alerting her to movement in the room. Each time she considered watching the video feed, her mouth went dry, and her heart skipped a beat. She had no recollection of retrieving the necklace, yet she held it in her hand when she awoke. At some point in the middle of the night, she must have climbed from her bed to retrieve it.

Cate put off the task of watching the video until after she ate her breakfast and took a long walk around the property with the dogs. As she settled in the library with a warm cup of tea, Cate stared at her phone. She blew out a long breath. “Okay, Cate,” she whispered to herself. “All you’re going to see is you wandering to the jewelry box and getting the necklace. It can’t be that bad.”

Cate toggled on her phone and selected the app. She had several alerts. Many of them were from her waking hours. She scrolled through the list, finding a timestamp shortly before midnight.

Cate pursed her lips and tapped the button to access the video feed. The video began with Cate sitting in bed. The camera must have detected her sitting up and toggled on. On the video, Cate stared ahead, motionless. After a moment, she peeled back the covers and swung her legs over the side of the bed.

She stood, gawking blindly ahead. After a moment, the video showed Cate shambling forward. Her arms hung limply at her sides as she wandered across the room. She stopped at the jewelry armoire.

With unmoving eyes, Cate reached down until her fingers struck the drawer pull. She slid it open and grasped the sapphire necklace from the velvet interior. Pushing the drawer shut, she straightened, clutching the necklace closer to her chest.

Cate watched as her video counterpart stood still for another moment before she began her slow trek across the room.

On the video, Cate paused at the doors leading to her sitting room. Her head swiveled toward them. Cate’s brow crinkled and she squinted at her face on the screen, green from the night vision. On-screen, her forehead wrinkled.

“What was I staring at?” Cate whispered.

As if on cue, her video doppelgänger’s lips moved. Cate dropped the phone into her lap as her jaw unhinged.

CHAPTER 6

Cate swallowed hard and recovered the phone, which now showed her continuing on her journey back to bed.

Cate pulled the video's counter back. Her former self sped backward. She played the video again from the spot where she'd stopped at the sitting room doors. Cate stared at the video as her image's lips moved.

Cate rewound again. She squinted at her lips, trying to make out the word. She tried five times before she gave up.

Cate clicked off her phone's display and set it on the desk. She bit her lower lip as she considered the video. Was someone in the other room? Who? What had she seen or heard while sleepwalking?

Cate spent a few more moments ruminating about the source of her speech in the video. A chime from her phone drew her back from the maze of her thoughts.

Did you get rid of that necklace?

Cate smiled at the text from Damien.

I'm working on it, she responded.

His response was delayed a moment. After five minutes, a new text appeared on her screen. Hmmm... any nightmares?

Cate responded with a "no" and a smiley emoticon.

That's good news! Damien messaged.

After a moment, he added: Don't think I won't ask about that necklace again.

Cate laughed at his message. I'm counting on it. How are things on your side of the pond?

Damien responded: I'm pretty sure I could write another book about our current adventure.

The comment elicited another chuckle from Cate, and she sent him a laughing emoji before turning her attention to her research. Before long, her focus shifted to the folder with the five articles detailing disappearances in the Dunhaven area.

Cate shuffled across the library and retrieved it. She re-read each article twice more but found no new clues to help her. Perhaps she could use these articles as a springboard for more research. She collected them and returned to her laptop.

She shuffled through and found the article about the disappearance in 1840. Cate scanned the story's details. With a fresh page in her notebook, she jotted down several key pieces of information. The man, named Angus Williams, had moved to the tiny town of Dunhaven ten years earlier. He'd been taken on to work at the Bailey farm and had stayed in his position for the entire decade he'd lived in Dunhaven. Most described him as quiet. Cate noted the dates of his arrival and departure.

A local told the reporter covering the story that Angus had been gambling and made a few enemies. He stated he'd seen the man with a sack tossed over his shoulder, walking out of town. When he spoke with him, Angus told him it was best he leave town for a while.

He was never seen or heard from again. Cate typed his name into the search bar of her browser. It wasn't an uncommon name, making most of the results she found useless. She tried to track down more information by adding Dunhaven to the search. It produced no results.

Cate searched for a more obscure result trying "1841 missing man Dunhaven." She found nothing, not even the article produced by Mrs. Campbell.

She was at a dead-end. If they wanted more information about Mr. Williams, they'd have to travel back to 1841 to get it, she mused. She wouldn't be opposed to the trip, though she was certain Jack would be.

Still, she understood his concern, and if the body buried in her backyard did not belong to Angus Williams, there was no reason to visit that time period.

Cate tried a few extra ill-fated searches before she determined this line of work was a dead end. Her lunch arrived and she abandoned the nonproductive task in favor of eating.

Her phone chimed. A message from Jack awaited her.

Anything from the police?

Not yet, she wrote back.

Jack sent back a straight-face emoji with the message: Hopefully soon!

Cate sent a message indicating agreement. Her mind turned from her fruitless search to her odd overnight behavior. Her thumb hovered over the cell phone's power button. After a moment, she swung it over to the screen and tapped to bring up the video. She viewed it several times, still not able to determine what her on-screen self muttered before wandering back to bed.

Cate sighed as she allowed her phone display to time out. Two nights in a row, she had climbed from her bed to retrieve that necklace. What drew her to it? And what caught her attention during her trance-like state?

Perhaps she should take everyone's advice and get rid of the necklace. She bit her lower lip as her stomach fluttered at the thought. Why was she so adamantly opposed to the idea? Was it the mere value of the object that held her back? It must have been. The necklace had to be worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, or rather pounds. This must be the reason for her reluctance, she attempted to convince herself.

The shrill ringing of her phone pulled Cate from her ruminating. An unknown number appeared on her display. Cate considered leaving it go to voicemail. Her finger hovered over the Decline icon.

She shook her head, realizing it may be the police with information about her latest discovery on the property. With a flick of her finger, Cate swiped the Accept button and pressed the phone to her ear.

"Cate Kensie," she said.

"Hi, Lady Cate," Ben's voice answered her.

"Oh, hi, Ben!" she said.

"I figured I'd give you a call and go over some of the information we've come up with on your unwanted garden guest."

"You found something?" Cate asked, as she scurried to the desk and shuffled through her drawer for a sheet of paper and a pen.

"Not really, but we do have some information."

"Oh," Cate answered, the disappointment in her voice obvious.

“I figured I’d pass it along before you called me to ask. I ran into Jackie this morning and he assured me you’d be after me for information.”

“He’s correct,” Cate said, sinking into her desk chair.

“Okay, here goes.” She heard a few papers shuffle, before the detective’s voice took on the monotone sound of someone reading the words from a page. “Uh, the vic was... oh that’s victim to you as a layperson, Lady Cate.”

“Yes, thank you, I realized,” Cate said, as she bobbed her head around in an unseen signal for him to get to the point.

“Oh, great. Big true crime fan, huh? Well, anyway, the bones of the victim belong to a female. Adult. On the smaller side, probably about five foot three or four, give or take.

“Uh...” He paused as he shuffled his papers again. “Let’s see here. Nothing definitive on age yet but the examiner puts a rough estimate at seventy to eighty years or so, again, give or take.”

Cate scrunched her face. “The bones belonged to someone who was seventy to eighty years old?”

“Oh.” Ben chuckled before continuing. “No, no, not the age of the vic. The age of the bones. The examiner figures them to have been in the ground for about seventy to eighty years.”

“Ohhhh,” Cate said as realization dawned on her. She jotted down on her paper: Adult female, 5’4”, 70-80 years ago.

“Right now, that’s about all we have.”

“Did the medical examiner determine a cause of death?” Cate queried.

Papers rustled. “Ah, yeah.” Another pause. “Blunt force trauma to the head. Skull was cracked and collapsed.”

Cate winced at the detail, her stomach rolling.

“Could that have happened postmortem?” Cate said, hope lacing her voice.

“No,” Ben answered immediately. “M.E.’s certain it was the cause of death, not postmortem damage.”

Cate sighed.

“That’s about it, then. Unless you have anything else, Lady Cate...”

“Actually,” Cate said, interrupting him. “I was wondering if this coincided with any open cases you had on the books.”

“Eh, what do you mean?” Ben inquired.

“Well, you know this was a female from about seventy-five years ago.”

“Give or take,” he said.

“Right. Were there any missing persons cases opened around that time that could help identify the victim?”

“Oh, ah, right. No, nothing.”

“You did go back through the records, didn’t you?”

“We did. There were no unsolved cases in Dunhaven from that time.”

“So what are our next steps?”

“Well, you have no other next steps, Lady Cate. I will widen my net, see if we can identify this person. Obviously, we won’t have DNA on file that could help, but I’ll dig deeper to see if there’s a missing person who fits the bill in the nearby area.”

“Please let me know if you find anything.”

“I will do that, Lady Cate,” Ben said.

“Great, thank you so much for the information.”

“You’re welcome, and you have a great rest of your day.”

They finished with parting pleasantries and Cate ended the call. She sighed as she stared down at the mostly blank page in front of her. One solitary line graced the top.

Cate reviewed what few details she had gleaned. She added the cause of death to the information, grimacing again as she wrote it.

She realized the information shared by Ben meant her top theory – that the deceased was Angus Williams – was now dashed by the revelation that the body belonged to a woman.

Cate flipped open the folder of articles from Mrs. Campbell.

The missing eighteen-year-old from Canberry was now more likely given her gender, however, she had been found, which ruled her out. Duncan MacAllister, Dunhaven’s disappearing corpse, could also be eliminated based on his gender, as could Angus Williams. Which left Cate with only one option. The missing woman with whom Amelia was acquainted.

Cate re-read the article again, noting the date. The date 23 September, 1942, topped the copy of the newspaper article.

Not trusting herself to do the calculation in her mind, Cate used her cell phone’s calculator. She stared at the result. The date was seventy-eight years ago. It fit within the time frame Ben had given her.

Could this woman be the one they’d just exhumed from her side garden?

* * *

Cate awoke the next morning exhausted. As sun streamed through her window, she rolled over with a groan. Clutched in her hand for the third morning was the sapphire necklace.

The appearance of the necklace surprised her since she didn't think she'd gotten enough sleep to have sleepwalked.

Cate had spent most of her previous night tossing and turning as she considered the lack of information about their garden guest. Who could she have been? Would they ever find out? The span of a decade was a long time. She and Jack couldn't search the entire time period for clues about the woman.

As Cate rose from her bed and returned the necklace to its drawer, her mind raced through the same questions it had the previous night.

The lack of information stumped her. Surely a missing person's report existed for this person. Perhaps they were casting too narrow of a net. Perhaps she'd traveled from somewhere further than the towns in the small radius around Dunhaven.

That explanation could be easily remedied by considering a larger net around the town when searching for missing persons cases ranging from 1940 to 1950. Surely with that date range and a larger search area they'd come across something to explain the body.

Another notion occurred to her. What if the body belonged to someone who had never been reported missing? Cate had assumed the person would be missed by a loved one. However, what if the killer was the loved one? Could a jealous husband have offed his wife, buried her at Dunhaven and then told a tale that his wife had run off?

Cate hated to admit it, but it was plausible. And it meant their search would be all the more difficult. With a sigh, she attempted to determine a method for tracking down a missing person who had never been considered missing.

* * *

As Cate strolled around the property following breakfast with the pups, her mind stretched for solutions. She came to none as she approached her favorite spot on the property. Jack stood near the water.

“Hey, what are you doing here?” Cate called to him as he stood under the large tree on its banks.

The dogs raced ahead to give Jack a hearty hello.

“Lady Cate! What are you doing here?” he asked, his eyes wide with surprise.

“Uh,” Cate hesitated as she formulated a response to the question, “I always come here.”

“But I didn’t think you’d be here this morning.”

Cate furrowed her brow. Jack was acting a bit strange, she thought. Why?

“Everything okay? You seem... distracted.” She noticed his hands hidden behind his back. “What are you hiding there?”

“Hiding? Nothing. I’m not hiding anything.” He chuckled nervously as he slipped his hand into his pocket.

Cate offered a confused smile. “Anyway, as I said, I’m surprised you’re here and not breathing down Ben’s neck about who our garden guest is... or was.”

“Oh, I heard from him yesterday, though it didn’t seem to help much in identifying the person.”

“Oh?” Jack inquired.

“Yeah, I didn’t want to bring it up at dinner last night. But Ben called me yesterday afternoon. He said they determined the bones belonged to a female, about five foot four in height. On first inspection, it appears the bones had been buried for seventy to eighty years. And the cause of death was blunt force trauma to the skull.”

Jack winced before he nodded. “Do they have any leads?”

“Not a one,” Cate said, with a wistful expression. “I went through the articles from Mrs. Campbell, but none of those were helpful.”

“Not even a hint of a lead?”

Cate paused for a moment, her face scrunching in thought.

“What is that famous Cate Kensie brain mulling over?”

“Nothing,” Cate said. “The only lead I had went up in smoke when Ben said the corpse was female. There was a man in the 1840s who left town. Some people believe he was murdered. I thought perhaps he was our victim, but obviously, he’s not.”

“He also doesn’t fit within the time frame they gave for when the bones were from.”

“No,” Cate said, as she tapped her lips in thought.

“Is there something else?”

“Not really.”

“Not really means something is on your mind.”

“There was one article from around that time period. In 1942, a woman went missing. However, Amelia said she merely left for another position. So, it’s not much of a lead and apparently the girl wasn’t even really missing.”

“Amelia, as in your great-grandmother, Amelia?”

“Yep.”

Jack puckered his lips as his head bounced around. “And it’s not likely Amelia would lie. At least, we have no reason to believe so.”

“No. She was nothing but honest with us when we met her.”

“But?” Jack asked.

Cate shook her head. “But nothing. She probably isn’t our gal. We may never know who it was.”

“Cate Kensie giving up? I can’t believe my ears.”

Cate shrugged. “I was up most of the night. Outside of expanding our radius for missing persons reports in the 1940s to 1950s and getting a hit there, we may be dealing with someone who was never reported missing.”

“You mean like someone killed them then told a different story to anyone who asked?”

“Right. Maybe a jealous spouse whacks his wife on the head, then tells everyone she ran off with the neighbor or something similar. Which makes it impossible for us to track.”

Jack nodded. “That it does.”

Cate sighed and they stood in silence for a few moments.

“Well, I suppose the only way to get any answers might be to discuss it with people from that era,” Jack said.

Cate crinkled her forehead and glanced up sharply at Jack. “Are you saying...”

“Yes, I’m saying maybe we should do a little time traveling so we can solve this.”

Cate stood in stunned silence, her jaw hanging open.

“Yes, I am suggesting time travel.”

Cate's eyebrows raised toward her hairline.

"Oh, stop gawking at me and just tell me how much you appreciate my suggestion."

Cate giggled and offered him a smile. "I really do appreciate it," she answered. "But now my mind is spinning in a thousand different directions. Where do we start? With whom?"

"Perhaps Amelia is a good place to start. We know Rory and Anne, Amelia and Lucas. Get the dates from that article and we'll start there. If they have no leads, we'll go forward a couple of years and try again."

"Look at you, Jack Reid! Skipping through time!"

"After what we witnessed in the 1700s, I guess I'm ready to live a little."

"Well, I am pleasantly surprised and very pleased by your suggestion! I'll get the information from the article and try to find anything else that may help. When do you want to go?"

"How's Monday?" Jack suggested.

"Sounds perfect! That'll give me some time to dig up some information so we can tackle this!"

"Sounds like a plan. Well, I'll leave you to your loch. M'lady." Jack gave her an extravagant bow before he retreated toward the castle.

Cate sank to the ground below. Both dogs gathered around her. "Well, what do you think, boys? Do we stand a chance solving this mystery?"

Riley cocked his head to the side and stared at Cate. Bailey offered his paw. "I'll take that as a vote of your confidence!"

Cate spent another thirty minutes staring out over the loch and watching the clouds meander through the sky. When she became chilled, Cate stood and brushed herself off. "Come on, boys, let's head back and do some work."

Cate, Riley, and Bailey took a winding path back to the castle, pushing through the front door into the enormous foyer. The dogs raced away as they entered the castle. Cate flung her hands out. "Now where are you two going?"

With a roll of her eyes and a shake of her head, Cate navigated to the library. She sighed as she collapsed into the desk chair. She glanced to the folder of articles on the desk as she removed her phone from her pocket.

Her eyes lingered on the cell phone. After a moment, Cate illuminated the display and swiped at the screen to access the cube camera's app. A colorful circle spun around the screen as Cate waited for the list of recent videos to load. She bit her thumbnail wondering what she would find. She assumed the list would be long since she'd spent a large portion of the night tossing and turning.

The screen darkened for a moment before a list of videos filled it. Cate sucked in a breath as she scrolled through the list. She deleted any before midnight since she had definitely been awake through those, and she had no inclination to watch herself toss and turn in bed.

Cate tapped the first video available after midnight. She viewed the short clip of her rolling from one side to the other before smashing her pillow into a ball and squeezing her eyes shut.

She clicked the trash can icon to delete the less-than-useful video. She moved on to the next to find a similar episode replaying on the screen. With a sigh, Cate trashed it along with the third video.

She tapped the next one listed. Occurring just after two in the morning, Cate stared at her sleeping self. Her eyebrows lifted as her on-screen self's eyes shot open. Two eerily lit, glassy balls stared at the ceiling before she slowly rose to a sitting position. Staring straight ahead, her form peeled back the covers and swung her legs over the side of the bed. She hesitated a moment before standing and shambling to the jewelry armoire.

As usual, the video version of Cate pulled the lower drawer open and retrieved the ostentatious necklace. She clutched it in her hand, holding it close to her chest as she wandered back across the room. She froze in front of the doors leading to the sitting room.

Cate tapped at the screen, wondering if the video was frozen as her counterpart stood stock still. Still playing, the video showed her frozen for several seconds, before her head whipped in the direction of the sitting room.

Cate bit her lower lip as she squinted her eyes at the scene unfolding on her phone's display. On-screen, Cate's lips curled into a partial smile, and she reached her hand toward the sitting room. A moment later, she disappeared from the camera's view.

Cate's heart pounded in her chest as she watched herself disappear from view. The video clip ended, and Cate shook her head as she hurried back to the list of videos.

She tapped on the next video. The timestamp indicated it occurred about twenty minutes after the one she'd just viewed. Cate watched the short clip of Riley stretching before he settled back down into a ball with a sigh.

Outside of Riley and Bailey, the large bed remained empty. She'd disappeared in the wee hours of the morning for more than twenty minutes.

Another video occurring about thirty-five minutes after her disappearance appeared next. Cate played it. A shadow crossed the bed and within seconds, Cate's wandering form reappeared on camera. Still carrying the necklace, she crossed the room and climbed into bed, pulling the covers over her and drifting off to sleep.

Cate toggled off her phone's display as she let her gaze drift out the window. Where had she been for thirty-five minutes? What or whom had she smiled at before she disappeared? She shuddered as a chill passed over her. What was happening to her?

CHAPTER 7

The arrival of her lunch roused Cate from her pensive state. She'd made little progress on determining where she may have roamed to in the wee hours of the morning. And she'd done absolutely nothing regarding gathering information on the lead Jack suggested they follow about the garden guest.

Cate slumped into the armchair as she poked at the food on her plate. She eyed her cell phone warily, as though it caused the disruption overnight. The flames leapt in the fireplace across from her, catching Cate's attention. The dogs had returned from wherever they'd raced off to as she worked her way through the videos and were now snuggled near the warm fire.

An idea formed in her mind as she polished off the last bites of her meal. A smile spread across her face, and she sat up straighter. "What do you say we take a trip into town, boys?"

Riley perked up when Cate asked again, this time mentioning the car. After Molly retrieved her lunch tray, she headed to the car with both pups and drove the short distance into town, finding a parking space near the town's center. She took a leisurely stroll through the streets, allowing the dogs to explore even though she had one destination in mind.

They reached their target and Cate ushered the dogs inside.

"Well, Lady Cate!" Harry greeted her. "Back again so soon? And with the two laddies this time. Hello, boys." Harry rounded the counter and offered two treats to each dog. They scarfed them down in seconds.

“I figured I owed the boys a visit,” Cate answered.

“Aye, I missed them last time.”

Harry squatted down to give both dogs a hearty ear scratch.

“Did you get your camera set up?”

“I did,” Cate replied. “I actually came in to purchase another one. It works like a charm, and I’d like to set a few more up.”

“Oh? Well, we’ve got plenty in stock,” Harry said. He straightened and grabbed another from the display.

“And do you happen to have any of those cameras that hang from a dog’s collar?”

“We do,” Harry said. He wandered across the store and pulled an item from a hanger. “Dogs running off on you?”

“Not really,” Cate said. “But it’s a big place and I’d like to see what they do when they’re not lounging in front of a fireplace.”

“Well, this’ll do it,” Harry said, waving the packaging in the air. “Did you want one or two?”

Cate considered it. “I’ll take the one for now,” she answered. “So far, I think they’re sticking together. If I find out otherwise, I may be back.”

Henry nodded and rang up the purchase. “Which one of you nice laddies is going to be the volunteer for this?”

“Probably Riley. Bailey gets a bit fussy about clothes and collars. He won’t move very far if he has to wear a tie or a shirt.”

“Oh? Do you mind your clothes, Bailey?” The little dog wagged his pigtail at the mention of his name. “But not you, eh, Riley?” Riley cocked his head.

“No, Riley enjoys dressing up,” Cate said with a chuckle.

“No wonder,” Harry said, eyeing Riley. “You looked very dapper at the Christmas party, young sir.”

Riley cocked his head at Harry and gave a small yip. “I agree,” Harry said.

Cate raised her eyebrows.

“The laddie says he looked so fine he deserves another treat,” Harry explained.

Cate chuckled. “Oh, I’ll bet he did.”

Harry bagged Cate’s purchases and gave another treat to the two dogs before they said their goodbyes. “Now you two behave yourselves. Your mam has a way to keep an eye on you now.”

“Listen up, boys,” Cate said, “I can follow you wherever you go!”

After a few moments of small talk, Cate left the shop with her purchases. She found herself both excited and frightened. The prospect of seeing who or what was beyond her bedroom in the middle of the night was daunting, however, being able to follow the dogs to their secret spot could prove fun.

After a brief walk through town, she returned to the castle. Cate spent the remaining time before dinner setting up her additional camera in her sitting room. When she had it finished and set on the mantle to capture both the door to her bedroom and the door to the hall, she stepped back and stared at it.

“What will you show me, I wonder?” she said aloud. Two tiny feet pressed against her thigh. Cate glanced down to find Riley standing on his hind legs. Bailey stood next to him. “Don’t worry, I’ll save your camera setup until tomorrow. You’re off the hook.”

Riley’s tail waved back and forth. Cate scooped him into her arms and wandered to the chaise. Bailey jumped up next to her and she pulled him onto her lap. She balanced both dogs on her legs as she pondered what she might find on her video list tomorrow morning.

With no answers forthcoming, she left her room behind in favor of the library for her dinner. When she returned, she eyed the new camera warily. She bypassed it, trying to push it out of her mind as she continued to her bedroom.

As she slipped between the sheets, she focused on the blue light shining at her. She swallowed hard and closed her eyes.

* * *

Cate stretched as her Sunday morning alarm beeped. With an hour’s extra sleep on her staff’s day off, the sun was already beginning its ascent into the morning sky, painting it deep shades of purple and red.

Cate reached her arms overhead, uncurling her fingers. She glanced toward her headboard. Her hands were empty. No necklace lay discarded on her pillow. She glanced at her sides, finding nothing. The fleeting idea that she had remained abed for the entire night flitted across her mind.

The hope was short-lived as Cate pushed herself to sit, feeling something shift on her neck. She glanced down, reaching to her collarbone.

Her fingers caressed the thick gemstones comprising the necklace. Cate's heart sank. Not only had she arisen from her bed and retrieved the necklace, but in this instance, she had donned it during her sleepwalking escapades.

Cate reached to the nape of her neck and worked to unclasp the necklace. She pursed her lips as she stared down at it after freeing it from her neck. She shook her head. What would the cameras show her? She wasn't certain she wanted to find out what they'd caught.

She put it off, electing for breakfast and a morning walk. As she settled in at her desk in the library for a check of her email, Molly popped her head in.

"Hey, Lady Cate!"

"Hi, Molly. Going to join me for some reading on your day off?"

"Nope, I'm heading out. I just wanted to see if you wanted to come with me."

"Where to?"

"I'm going to head to..." Molly paused as she consulted a marked page in her tour guide. "Fyvie Castle. It's a bit of a drive, but I'm up for it!"

Cate glanced at her laptop and took a deep breath. "Well, I had planned..." She stopped short and narrowed her eyes. She twisted to face Molly. "To heck with what I planned! Sure, I'd love to go with you. As long as you're driving."

"Still worried you're going to drive on the wrong side?" Molly asked with a laugh.

"Something like that. Also, I'm terrible at following those GPS things."

"I'd be happy to drive."

Cate glanced at the bag sitting next to the desk. "Would you mind giving me a few minutes to set up this camera?"

"Sure! I'm in no rush! What is it?"

"A pet camera. It goes on your pet's collar, and you can see what they're up to and where they're going."

"Oh, neat!" Molly said. "Worried the boys will get up to something naughty when we're gone?"

"Mmm, no," Cate said, as she pulled the camera from the package along with the instructions. "Just curious as to what they get up to."

“Oh, gotcha.”

“Let me run up and grab Riley’s bowtie collar to slip this on.”

“Okay, I’ll read the instructions.”

Cate hurried up the stairs and dug through Riley’s things in her bedroom, retrieving his plaid bowtie. When she returned to the library, Molly had the camera in setup mode. With her help, Cate connected it to her phone’s app. She slipped it onto the collar and snapped it around Riley’s neck.

“All right, boys. Behave yourselves! Molly and I will be back later!”

With kisses on their furry heads, Cate and Molly headed out to the car for the drive to Fyvie Castle.

“So, have you been to Fyvie Castle before?” Molly asked, as she aimed the car toward Dunhaven.

“No,” Cate answered. “I haven’t done much traveling. We came straight to Dunhaven with Mr. Smythe, and I never left.”

“Lady Cate, seriously?” Molly inquired. “You’ve lived in this amazing country for almost a year, and you’ve never gone further than Dunhaven?”

“I’m not very adventurous,” Cate said. “Driving around in a foreign country is a little overwhelming to me.”

“Not me! You couldn’t hold me back!”

Cate chuckled. “I don’t intend to! Though, on a serious note, I am glad you are enjoying the country so much.”

“Oh, I am! And now I can strong-arm you into enjoying it, too!”

“I do enjoy it! I enjoy Dunhaven Castle and its grounds. And it’s even got a loch. What more could I ask for?”

“It’s still nice to see other things. Oh, speaking of lochs – how about a trip to Loch Ness?”

“That’s quite a bit further than Fyvie,” Cate responded.

“It is, but not that far!”

“I guess compared to some of the drives across the pond, it is relatively close,” Cate answered.

As they fell into silence, Cate checked her phone.

“Are the dogs exploring?” Molly questioned.

“Nope,” Cate answered. “Those two lazy boys are lounging in the library.”

“Sounds about right.”

Cate clicked off the display and returned to enjoying the scenery. As the trip progressed, she and Molly discussed the Scottish countryside, castles, Molly's move, and Scottish cuisine.

Molly followed the signs for Fyvie Castle as they approached. They drove down a narrow street lined with box hedges. Molly slowed as they reached the entrance where a green sign announced Fyvie Castle & Garden.

The car passed through the open black iron gates between two stone pillars. They continued up the winding road.

"Look, Lady Cate!" Molly said, pointing out her window. "They've got a loch, too!"

"So they have," Cate replied. "I think Dunhaven's loch beats this one."

Molly chuckled. "But they've got ducks!"

"They can keep the ducks. Riley and Bailey would have a field day chasing those poor things around if we had them."

Molly continued up the road. The paved portion gave way to a gravel drive, reminding Cate of her own driveway. Molly navigated to the car park.

The large, beige, stone structure rose in front of them as they walked through the garden to the castle entrance. Cate glanced out across the flat grounds. It was so different from Dunhaven's rolling hills.

After paying the entrance fee, they began their self-tour of the castle's interior. They wandered through the ornately decorated rooms one after another.

"Hmmm," Molly murmured about halfway through their tour, "I think I prefer Dunhaven."

Cate smiled. "I'm glad. And to be honest, so do I!"

"It's beautiful here but..."

"It's not home."

"No, and that hallway with the huge tapestry is kind of tight. As is this bed." Molly grimaced at a rather uncomfortable-looking four-poster bed.

"Well, now that we're sure we've cornered the market on castles compared to Fyvie, should we head outdoors for a walk?" Cate suggested.

"Absolutely. And we'll stop in the tearoom before we leave for a nice meal before heading home."

Cate answered with a nod as her phone chimed. Molly raised an eyebrow, but didn't pry.

“Oh, it’s an alert from the doggie cam,” Cate said, as she tapped the notification.

“On the move?”

“Probably stretching,” Cate said with a laugh, as they exited the castle into the bright sunshine.

The camera loaded and Cate stared at the screen. An awkward bobbling video played on the screen.

“Still in the library?” Molly inquired, as she peered over Cate’s shoulder.

“No,” Cate said, “I don’t think so.” Her brow furrowed as she attempted to make out the image on the screen.

“Wow, this is harder than I expected.”

“Yeah,” Cate admitted. “I don’t see things from floor level so I’m really having trouble figuring out where they are.”

“Oh, there’s Bailey!” Molly said, pointing at the furry form jetting past Riley on the screen.

“Where’s he in such a hurry to go?”

The camera darkened as Riley put his nose to the ground, tilting the lens toward the floor. The angle snapped upward before abruptly changing directions to race down a hallway.

“What was that?” Cate inquired.

“What?”

“When the camera angle changed from the floor view, I saw something.”

“What did it look like?”

Cate shook her head, staring off into space.

“What? Furniture leg? Wall?”

Cate pursed her lips, before she said, “No. It looked like a person’s feet.”

“What?” Molly asked, slowing to a stop as Cate continued to stare at her screen.

“It looked like someone’s feet and legs.”

“It couldn’t be.”

“No, unless...”

“Unless what?”

Cate tapped around on her phone. “Unless Jack’s at the castle. That would explain their sudden urgency to run around. I’m texting him now.”

“Oh, yeah, that could be it.”

They wandered around the property as Cate waited for a response. Cate’s phone chimed as they strolled past the loch. She stopped mid-stride.

“What?” Molly asked.

“He’s not there.” Cate snapped her gaze up to Molly’s face.

Molly winced, then shook her head. “Wait. No one could be there.”

“No one should be there.”

“No one can be, right? Who would be there?”

“I’m not sure, but I swear I saw someone’s legs.”

“Do you want to head back?”

Cate pressed her lips together as she gazed over the water. She swiped her phone open and accessed the pet cam app. Her eyebrows raised. “Well, it looks like they’re back in the library, lounging by the fireplace.”

Molly nodded and gave Cate a closed-lipped smile.

“So, I guess we’re good!”

“We can go if you want...”

“No,” Cate said, with a shake of her head. “I probably saw something else entirely, like a table leg or something. I’m not ruining our trip. They seem fine. And if someone was in the castle, I don’t think they’d be lounging in the library.”

“No, they’d be barking at the top of their lungs.”

“Yep,” Cate said with a chuckle. “So, let’s keep enjoying the scenery, and then I believe you promised me a trip to the tearoom.”

“I did indeed!”

They wandered around the property, taking in all the sites along with several pictures and selfies, ending their meandering at the tearoom for sandwiches and indulging in dessert. The trip wasn’t complete without a stop in the gift shop. Molly made a few purchases before they strolled to the car to return to Dunhaven.

* * *

“Well, that was a nice trip,” Cate said, as they climbed from the car back on the grounds of Dunhaven.

“Yeah, it was!” Molly agreed. “I’ll make a traveler out of you yet.”

“Oh? Got another castle trip planned already?”

“Give me the week to figure it out. I’ve got an entire list for us to get through, and now with the weather improving, I’m going to hold you to that promise to explore Scotland with me!”

“Okay,” Cate laughed.

“I’ve even got some dog-friendly spots for us.”

“I’m sure the dogs will love you for that.”

They pushed through the front door of the castle. Both dogs plowed toward them, leaping up on their hind legs as they excitedly wagged their tails.

“Well,” Molly said, as she knelt down to greet the dogs, “everything looks okay.”

Cate nodded. “I must have been seeing things.”

“I doubt that. I just think things look so different from their perspective that it was easy to think that’s what it looked like.”

“Well, how about a nice walk, boys?” Cate asked.

“Whew, I’m beat from walking, so I’ll leave you to it. I’m going up to make a plan for the summer months for us using my guidebooks!” Molly flashed her a grin.

Cate returned the expression. “I’ll look forward to seeing your proposal.”

After removing Riley’s bowtie, she ushered the two dogs out into the late afternoon air, allowing them to frolic as the sun marched toward the horizon. The two pups wrestled around on the ground before darting off to chase each other around the grass.

Cate stared at the camera she’d shoved in her cardigan pocket as she allowed the dogs some time to run. What had she seen on the camera that she’d mistaken for someone’s legs?

Table legs didn’t make sense. It looked like shoes and pants, not wood. The glimpse had been fleeting; perhaps she’s misconstrued it. Though, with no expectation of someone being in the castle, she couldn’t imagine she had concocted the image in her mind.

She scrolled to the footage on her phone and replayed the video. She paused it when the supposed person appeared. It looked like a blur on her screen. Cate played that portion of the video five more times. She couldn’t make anything out. The scene played out too fast to be certain of anything.

With a sigh, Cate clicked her phone off and returned to watching the dogs play. Her mind listed the things she needed to do before she turned in for the night. One of the tasks was to watch the camera footage from her two cube cameras. She dreaded it.

She allowed the dogs as much time as they wanted, putting off making any discoveries of her overnight excursions. When the chill in the air finally drove them in, Cate settled in the library. She shoved her phone aside, deciding to summarize the information from the news clipping on the missing woman from 1942.

Cate noted the article was written in late September. The woman, named Ruth Harper, had not been seen in several days. She had traveled to Dunhaven Castle as a companion to Amelia MacKenzie. The servants reported they had not seen her since Thursday, four days prior to the article's writing. Cate noted the date of her disappearance along with her name and connection to Amelia.

The gossip in town prompted the reporter to inquire at the castle. Servants claimed the woman had not returned one evening, despite all her things remaining in her room. Her personal belongings had later been removed, though no sign that Ruth had returned existed. The household staff believed her disappearance warranted investigation, though the family disagreed.

Amelia MacKenzie had volunteered the information that the woman had sought employment elsewhere. The matter was dropped by the police after this admission.

It wasn't much to go on, Cate thought, as she stared down at the minimal scrawl on her paper. Questions filled her mind about the woman. Perhaps she and Jack should return to the castle before Ruth's disappearance. This may be the fastest way to gather information about her.

Cate noted that they should return in mid-September. She folded her notes and stuffed them into her cardigan pocket. As she flicked the folder containing the articles closed, Cate eyed her phone with antipathy.

With a deep inhale, she pulled it over and opened the camera app. "Moment of truth," she said, as she selected the camera in her bedroom first. Cate dismissed a few videos from her waking hours before she found one from 12:46 a.m.

With pursed lips, she tapped to play it. Once again, she slowly sat up in her bed, staring straight ahead. After a moment, she rose and wandered to the jewelry box, removing the sapphire necklace. As she strode across the room, her on-screen self stopped at the doorway to the sitting room. Her head turned slowly toward it, and she wandered off camera. The video ended.

Cate returned to the list of videos. The next one in the list had a timestamp of 1:34 a.m. She tapped it and watched as her former self wandered back into the room. This time, the necklace was no longer clutched in her hand. Instead, she now wore it around her neck.

Cate shook her head. She'd been gone for almost an hour. Where had she gone for that amount of time?

CHAPTER 8

She backed out of the video and selected the other camera. Cate scrolled to the video at 12:49 a.m. The footage showed her wandering from the bedroom into the sitting room. She ceased walking for a moment, freezing next to her chaise. She continued to stare blankly ahead, her arms hanging limp at her sides. The necklace sparkled in her hand even in the dim light.

After another moment, on-screen Cate resumed her shambling, continuing across the room to the closed doors leading to the hallway. She stopped at the obstacle, her face inches from the closed door. After a moment, she pawed at the handles, fiddling with them blindly until the door popped open.

Cate swung the door open and disappeared into the hall. She lost sight of herself, and the recording ended. She shook her head as she played the next video, occurring around one-thirty in the morning. She, now necklace-clad, wandered through the open door and the room.

Cate bit her lower lip as the recording offered her little information. The only thing she'd gleaned was that she was roaming around the castle farther than she'd expected. But she had no indication of where she may be going or what was drawing her there. Whatever it was, it was not in her sitting room.

Cate contemplated her next steps as she gathered the dogs for one last romp outside before retiring to her suite. She could place the camera in another location, but where?

The nightmares she'd suffered from for the past several months all occurred in the library. Perhaps that was a prime place for the second camera.

When Cate returned to the castle, she collected the camera from her sitting room and moved it to the library. The blue light glowed at her, bathing the bookshelf around it in blue. She checked the display on her phone. Positioned across from the door, she could see most of the room including the entrance.

Satisfied with her work, Cate returned to her bedroom to turn in for the night.

* * *

Cate awoke early the next morning with a small ball of fur nestled next to her. While Bailey remained curled in a ball near her knees, Riley had snuggled under her chin. As she stretched and opened her eyes, Riley tilted his head and glanced at Cate, offering a lick to her cheek.

"Good morning, buddy," she said, before kissing him on his furry head. "What's with the snuggles? Not that I'm complaining."

Cate propped her head up on her hand as she gave Riley a nice belly rub. As she settled into her lean, a bulky item shifted on her neck. Cate reached for it, discovering the necklace hanging around her neck again.

"This is getting old," she said to Riley with a sigh.

Cate reached behind her for her phone. "Let's see what I did last night."

In short order, Cate found the usual video of herself wandering to the jewelry armoire, retrieving the necklace then leaving the room.

Timestamps indicated she returned almost an hour later. Riley had snuggled near her after her escapades, likely wanting to ensure she didn't sneak away again without his knowledge.

Cate shook her head as she toggled to the other camera. "Let's see if I'm wandering in the library."

Riley cocked his head at her statement. The video list loaded. Cate frowned at the screen. She tilted her head and swiped down to refresh the list. No new videos appeared. The list of videos from today remained empty.

Cate clicked her phone off and bit her lower lip as she tapped the phone against her chin. "Not to the library," she murmured. "So, where did I go?"

Cate pondered other places to position the camera. Did her roamings have nothing to do with her nightmares? If they were unrelated, she had no clues as to where she could be disappearing during her midnight romps.

After a few more moments spent petting Riley, Cate rose and readied for her day. Jack proposed they travel back to 1942 today. She felt ill-prepared for the trip. They had no idea if the lead they were following was even relevant.

Cate hadn't created a plan of action for them to follow. They'd merely be gathering some information, though what information was relevant, she couldn't say. They couldn't very well ask the woman if she planned to disappear in a few days.

Still, perhaps there would be something that would point to the impending trouble.

After a romp outside with the dogs, Cate shuttled them into the kitchen.

"Good morning, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser said. "I heard you explored the Scottish countryside yesterday!"

"We did!" Cate said with a grin.

"And we'll be doing more if I have anything to say about it!" Molly exclaimed.

"She'll run you ragged, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser teased. "I hope you saved up your energy over the winter."

Cate chuckled.

"Don't worry," Molly said. "I've built in rest days that coincide with some of the parties. We don't want Lady Cate too tired to celebrate her one-year anniversary!"

"Nay, we don't," Mrs. Fraser said. "Mrs. Campbell will never forgive us!"

"I'll save Loch Ness until after the anniversary party. You know, in case the monster gets us," Molly said with a giggle.

"Oh, Loch Ness, I haven't been there in a long time. Perhaps Mr. Fraser and I will tag along with you on that one. If you don't mind, that is."

"Oh, that would be so fun!" Molly said.

"I think so, too!" Cate agreed. "We could make a day of it. Maybe even a weekend. We'll invite Jack, too. My treat!"

"Oh, no, Lady Cate. We cannae take you up on that."

“You most certainly can!” Cate countered. “We’ll do it to celebrate my anniversary – after the party, of course.”

“Of course,” Molly and Mrs. Fraser agreed.

“It’ll let all of us have some time off. No cooking for either of you, no yard work for Mr. Fraser and Jack. Just a nice peaceful weekend.”

“Wow, Lady Cate!” Molly squealed. “You’re getting wild and crazy!”

“Lady Cate, wild and crazy?” Jack inquired, as he entered with Mr. Fraser. Riley and Bailey raced to greet the two men.

“That she is!” Molly confirmed. “We went to Fyvie Castle yesterday and I’m planning more outings for us over the spring and summer. Lady Cate suggested we take a weekend to Loch Ness. Give everyone a little getaway and break.”

“Wow, Lady Cate leaving the county! Get out! I can’t believe my ears.”

Cate turned from ladling her oatmeal into her bowl. “Very funny, Jack,” Cate groaned. “I left the county yesterday!”

Jack retrieved a bowl of oatmeal, saying, “That’s the first time since you got here!”

“I’m not very adventurous,” Cate said with a shrug.

“Mmm-hmm,” Jack murmured, giving Cate a knowing glance.

“Speaking of adventurous,” Molly said, as they all sat down with their breakfast. “Any word on that body?”

Cate nodded. “Yes,” she said. “I spoke with the police, and they don’t have many leads. They identified the body as belonging to a female from about seventy to eighty years ago. That’s about it.”

“They can’t connect it to any unsolved disappearances?” Molly asked.

“Not yet,” Cate answered.

“I cannae imagine they would. I told you, there have been no disappearances in the area for as long as I can remember.”

“Seventy to eighty years ago is a bit beyond your memory, Emily,” Mr. Fraser said with a chuckle.

“Aye, it is, but in a town like Dunhaven, they’d still be talking about it into my teen years if it occurred a few years before my birth.”

“You’re right there,” Mr. Fraser agreed.

“Nay, you’re not,” Jack argued.

Mrs. Fraser glanced sharply at him as he ate a spoonful of his oatmeal.

Jack swallowed and said, “They’d still be talking about it to this day.”

Mrs. Fraser chuckled. “I dare say you’re right, young Jack.”

“You know it,” Jack said with a wink.

“So, what now? Are they just giving up?”

Cate shook her head. “No. They’ll expand their search, but it could be quite a process.”

“Well, I hope they figure it out. That poor girl deserves better,” Molly said.

The conversation on the body wound down and they discussed their trip to Fyvie Castle. The Frasers and Jack chimed in with suggestions for other locations to add to Molly’s list.

As breakfast ended, Jack stood and said, “Lady Cate, might I have a moment of your time for some, uh, estate business?”

“Sure,” Cate said, understanding his statement to mean much more than estate business.

They made their way upstairs to the library. Jack shut the doors behind them as they entered. “I figured we’d better discuss a plan before we jump back to the 1940s,” he said.

Cate nodded. “We don’t have much to go on, I’m afraid. I’m not even certain the woman in question will be there when we hop back. But we have to start somewhere.”

“What date do you propose we go to?”

“I’m thinking mid-September. The woman, Ruth Harper, travels to Dunhaven with Amelia sometime in September. The article was dated September twenty-third, and stated she hadn’t been seen in several days. So, she had been there since September nineteenth at least, and I don’t think she disappeared on her first day in town. At least, that’s not the impression I got.”

“Okay, so we head back around maybe September sixteenth?” Jack asked. “That’s three days before her disappearance.”

“Okay, yes, they should be there.”

“And we’ll gather some information. Maybe speak with the family?”

“Yes, although...”

“What?”

“We’ll be talking to Rory and Anne again,” Cate said. “And Amelia. They should recognize us. But they’ve aged. We have not. It’s been almost twenty years and we don’t look any older.”

“Rory will understand.”

“Yes, though I’m not sure how to handle Amelia and Anne.”

“We’re going to have to do the best we can do. Perhaps we should avoid them at first. We may be able to determine what’s going on just by speaking with Rory.”

“Okay, let’s go with that plan for now,” Cate agreed with a nod. “And obviously, I’ll have to play Mrs. Jack MacKenzie again, since it would be a terrible shame if we’d gotten a divorce before 1942.”

Jack chuckled. “It would be. Especially given what a lovely husband I am.”

“Exceptional,” Cate agreed.

“All right, seems we have our plan. Should we go after lunch?”

“Sounds like a plan!”

Jack gave her a nod and spun to give the dogs a goodbye pat. His brow furrowed as he caught sight of the blue light shining from one of the bookshelves.

“What’s that?” he questioned, approaching it.

“Oh, uh, doggie cam,” Cate answered. “I can access it from my phone and check on them.”

“Ah, okay then,” Jack said with a nod. “You two had better behave yourselves. Lady Cate has eyes on you even when she leaves the county.”

Cate shook her head at him. “I’m never going to live that down, am I?”

“Never, Lady Cate.” Jack strode to the door. “Oh, one last thing,” he said, turning to face her. “Did you order the fish and chips while you were out?”

“No!” Cate answered. “I had a sandwich and a piece of cake.”

Jack’s eyebrows shot up. “Why, Lady Cate, I’m not certain I even know who you are anymore.”

Cate chuckled at him. “I’ll see you later, Jack.”

“You know it,” he called, as he disappeared down the hall.

Cate stared at the camera for a moment longer. A pang of guilt settled over her as she realized she’d just lied to Jack. She didn’t really lie, she told herself. She could use the camera to check on the pups. And she didn’t see a point in telling him about her sleepwalking. When she had something solid on the matter, then she’d tell him, she reasoned. Until then, it would remain a pet camera.

Cate spent the morning hours attempting to find more information about Ruth Harper. She located birth records for several Ruth Harpers, but could not pinpoint which may be the correct one. With no knowledge of the woman's age, Cate could not determine which belonged to their target.

She spent another hour searching for photo albums to find any clue as to the woman's identity, but she found none. With a sigh, Cate settled in for lunch, and her mind turned to another mystery.

The blue light on the camera across the library glowed at her. Where was she disappearing to when she roamed the castle at night? Perhaps she should move the camera to a hallway or the foyer.

Her brow furrowed as she tried to discern her sleepwalking target. If not the library, which her subconscious mind had dwelled on for months, where?

After her lunch, Cate snatched the camera from the shelf and strolled down the hall to the foyer. She set the camera on an entry table, aimed at the main staircase.

"Lady Cate," Jack said as she adjusted it, monitoring its view on her phone. Startled, Cate jumped and pressed her hand to her heart.

"Oh, Jack, you startled me."

"Moving the puppy cam?"

"Huh?"

Jack pointed toward the camera cube.

"Oh, right, yeah."

Jack cocked an eyebrow.

"I just wanted to see if they come through here while we're gone."

Jack pursed his lips and nodded.

"Anyway," Cate said, "ready?"

"I just need a change of clothes," Jack said, as they mounted the stairs.

"I found some," Cate said. "I'm not sure if they're 1942, but they'll definitely pass for the 1940s. There must have been a rip to the 1940s somewhere in the castle."

"Ah, good."

"I set them out in the bedroom you normally use," Cate said.

"Okay. I'll change and await your call, m'lady," Jack said with a bow.

"All right. Go slow, I've got to tame this hair into some sort of 40s style."

"Don't forget your wedding ring and a few fake wrinkles so we look older."

"I'll skip the wrinkles, but thanks for reminding me about that ring."

Jack and Cate parted ways. Cate hurried into her suite and to the bathroom. She began with her hair, forming rolls on each side of her face. She uncapped a tube of red lipstick, popular during the era, and smeared it across her lips.

When she was finished, she pulled on a belted navy skirt suit and pair of peep-toed t-strap heels. Cate glanced in the mirror as she made her final adjustments. Satisfied, she hurried out to the jewelry armoire and found her faux wedding band, slipping it onto her finger.

She paused for a moment. Her fingers fell to the bottom drawer. Her breathing slowed and her vision narrowed to a pinpoint. Her fingers curled around the drawer pull.

A knock roused her from her trance. She shook her head, blinking her eyes as she sucked in a breath. She ripped her hand away from the knob and adjusted her skirt. "Coming!" she shouted.

With a deep breath, Cate left the jewelry armoire behind and hurried across her sitting room after she grabbed her envelope-style purse from the bed.

Cate pulled the door open to find Jack waiting in his 1940s duds complete with a boxy jacket, cuffed pants, and fedora.

"I feel like a gangster," Jack said.

"Come on," Cate said. "This has to be much better than the 1700s."

"Oh, aye," Jack admitted. "I'm much more comfortable without my short trousers and tights. And you, Lady Cate, seem to look stunning in any era."

"You're such a charmer," Cate said.

"Let's sneak down the back stairs and into the hidden passage."

"Okay," Cate said with a nod.

They wound through the halls and down the back stairs. Cate pulled the wall sconce, popping open the secret passage. A damp chill swept from within the passage as they stood in front of it. Cate shivered. The memory of hiding here from Marcus Northcott swept through her.

"You okay?" Jack inquired.

She forced a smile on her face and nodded. They stepped into the passage and pulled the panel shut behind them. Jack toggled on a pocket flashlight as Cate set the timepiece to September 16th, 1942.

"Ready?" she asked.

"I guess," Jack said.

“Second thoughts?”

Jack wiggled his eyebrows. “No, but time travel gives me the willies.”

“Easy trip, remember? Information gathering only.”

“Right,” Jack said with a nod. They both wrapped their hands around the timepiece and, with a deep inhale, rubbed it, opening the time rip and slipping back to 1942.

In the darkened passage, Cate and Jack struggled to determine if the shift had worked.

“I guess we’re back,” Cate said.

Jack clicked off the flashlight and wandered to the panel, blindly feeling for the release. After finding it, he inched the panel open and peered into the hallway. With a shrug, he closed it. “I guess,” Jack said. “Everything looks eerily similar.”

“The price we pay for only traveling back seventy-odd years.”

Jack snapped the flashlight on and shined it under his chin. “To a time with modern amenities.”

Cate chuckled at his fearsome expression. “Come on, we can head out through the crypt, and no one will be any the wiser.”

“No more sneaking around the hallways and risking getting caught!” Jack exclaimed.

“Nope. Instead, we get to sneak through a dark, creepy cave and into a crypt.”

Jack ceased his walking for a moment and grasped Cate’s hand. “Hey, are you sure you’re okay going that way? We can sneak through the halls if you’d rather.”

Cate smiled weakly at him and squeezed his hand. “Thanks, but I’m okay. Ancient history, right?”

“Yes and no,” Jack said. “It may have occurred in 1792, but it was only days ago for us when that bastard put you in a stone coffin and left you to die.”

“Technically he put me in there and then gave you the clue to find me,” Cate said, as they started down the passage.

“Bull,” Jack retorted. “I’m not falling for that excuse. He’s not forgiven on a technicality.”

“Well, either way,” Cate answered. “I didn’t die.”

“Thank heavens,” Jack said, with another squeeze to her hand. “Wow, it’s dark in here. How did you make it through in 1792 without a flashlight?”

“Celine’s magical version of a flashlight is actually much brighter than the one you’ve got,” Cate explained, referencing the ethereal blue-white bulb Celine was able to create from thin air. “One of her many talents.”

Jack screwed up his face. “I’ll say. This is an LED!”

“She’s got that beat.”

They continued through the dank passage. “It should start sloping upward when we’re approaching the crypt,” Cate said.

Within a minute, Cate’s legs worked to walk uphill.

“Should be getting close,” Jack said.

They approached an enclosed space.

“Okay, where’s the crypt?” Jack inquired.

Cate adjusted Jack’s hand to aim the flashlight above them. A block protruded above their heads with a ring. “Pull that and we’re free.”

Jack yanked the ring down. A clank sounded followed by a screech. Fresh air rushed in, and daylight lit the chamber. Jack clicked off the flashlight and they stepped into the next chamber.

Jack side-eyed Cate as she stared at the coffin where she’d been buried alive. She swallowed hard and offered another weak smile. “I suppose Douglas is in there now.”

“Doesn’t make it any easier, Cate.”

“I’m okay. But let’s not linger here.”

Jack nodded and they exited the mausoleum onto the gravel path outside. Jack removed his hat and dusted it off. “Got dirt on my gangster hat.”

“Perhaps we should take an indirect route to the castle. We’ll just look around and see if we can determine who’s here.”

“Sounds like a plan.”

They strolled down the path. The castle rose on the horizon as they wound away from it toward the back of the property. Cate’s brow furrowed as she glanced down the hill behind the castle. “What’s that?” she inquired.

“Why, Lady Cate, don’t you recognize your own loch?”

“Not that,” Cate said with a shake of her head, and a tongue-in-cheek annoyed glance to Jack. “That!” She pointed to another structure tucked behind the castle to the right of the loch. A large, green tent-like structure stood on a flat area of land.

Jack scrunched his eyebrows together as he ceased walking. He shielded his eyes staring at it. "I'm not sure."

"It looks like a tent," Cate said.

"Aye, but a rather large one. Like for an event."

"Yes and no," Cate answered.

"What do you mean?"

"Can you imagine Mrs. Campbell putting up a green tent?"

Jack considered it. "No," he admitted, "I can imagine the sheer shock on her face when she saw that color."

Cate giggled. "And then the green-around-the-gills panicked expression when I suggest we use the red napkins anyway, despite the green walls."

"Lady Cate, if we put a green tent like that up for a party, we'd be wallpapering the inside."

"I have no doubt."

"Maybe we can get a closer look from the loch."

Cate nodded and they wandered down the path to the loch. The large tree nearby, full of foliage, provided the perfect hiding spot to spy on the temporary structure.

Cate and Jack sheltered behind it, eyeing the large green blob. After a few moments, two women emerged from inside. They strode purposefully toward the castle. A man wandered out ten minutes later.

"Who are those people?"

Jack shrugged. "I'm not certain. They certainly aren't anyone we know."

"No, that wasn't Anne or Amelia. Nor is that man Lucas or Rory."

"Could it have been Oliver or Charles?"

"I suppose the man could have been Oliver. He'd be twenty-eight by now. My grandfather, Charles, would be seventeen. He may or may not be here. But that still doesn't explain the women."

"Nor what they're doing there." Jack pressed his finger to his chin. "Could one of the women be Mary?"

"Oliver's wife?" Cate inquired. "I'm not certain when they met, but if I recall their age difference correctly, she'd only be eighteen right now. I can't recall exactly the age she married, but I'd be surprised if it was this early."

"We'll ask Pap when we go back."

"Okay," Cate said.

“Oi! What are you two doing there?” a voice from behind them called.

CHAPTER 9

Jack and Cate spun around to find a small child, about five or six, staring at them. He pointed a stick menacingly in their direction.

“I said, what are you two doing there?”

“Oh,” Jack said, approaching him slowly, “hello, there, little fellow.”

“Don’t little fellow me!” the child said with his eyes narrowed. “I asked you a question!”

“We were just enjoying the view,” Jack said.

The boy narrowed his eyes further. “You were looking at the tent, weren’t you?”

Jack squatted down as he spoke. “We were. You’re a very perceptive laddie.”

“Aye, that I am. Why are you so interested in that tent?”

“Do you know what the tent is for?”

The child eyed Jack for a moment before he answered. “Aye, I do. Why?”

“Would you like to share that information?”

“Are you Nazis?”

Jack’s eyes went wide at the question, and he glanced back at Cate. With a scrunching of his eyebrows, he returned his attention to the boy. “No,” he answered with a chuckle.

“It’s not a joke. If you’re not a Nazi, why aren’t you volunteering for your country, strapping lad like you?” The boy gazed down at Jack’s feet. “Got flat feet?”

“No, I haven’t got flat feet. You ask a lot of questions for a little boy.”

“Then why aren’t you fighting for the crown?”

“Ah, well,” Jack began.

“He’s nearsighted,” Cate interjected.

“Oh,” the boy said. “Can’t fly with the RAF then. But you could volunteer for the army. I would if I was old enough. I’d be right there on the front lines killing them Nazis right and left.” He swung the branch around to showcase his fierce skills.

“Well, I have other contributions to make,” Jack said.

“Oh, intelligence, are you? That why you’re asking about the tent? What’re your names?”

“I’m Cate and this is Jack. And yes,” Cate said. “Is that a group of codebreakers in there? That’s what we’re looking for.”

“Aye, codebreakers, they are. Working on the Enigma code.”

Cate smiled, not just at the answer, but at the idea. Dunhaven Castle was a miniature Bletchley Park. Codebreakers were given room and board along with security here while they worked to keep allied convoys safe by decoding intercepted German messages.

“Thank you,” Cate said. “You’ve been very helpful.”

“You sure you’re Allies?”

“Certain,” Cate said. “I’m an American!”

“Aye, that you are, lassie. About time your lot joined our efforts. Say, what time is it?”

Jack glanced at his wristwatch. “It’s quarter to four,” he said.

The boy winced. “Yikes. I’ve got to get back before my Da leaves! Good to meet you!”

The little boy trotted down the path. Jack rose to stand and called after him. “Before you go, what’s your name, son?”

The boy spun around. “Stanley!” he shouted, as he offered a salute. “Stanley Reid!” The boy spun back toward the castle and darted down the path.

Jack’s jaw dropped open as he stared after the boy. Cate covered her mouth which hung agape. She grasped Jack’s bicep and squeezed.

Jack whipped his head to stare at her. He blinked as he processed the statement. “My Pap just called me a Nazi and asked if I had flat feet.”

“Well, he is only five,” Cate said, barely holding in a chuckle. “But he called me lassie, just like he always does.”

"I can't believe he's always been that ornery. I thought it was old age."

"Apparently not," Cate answered. "I guess he's always been a character."

"I'll say," Jack said with a shake of his head.

"At least he told us what the tent is for," Cate said.

"I'm not quite sure I understand what he meant."

"It's an intelligence hub. Think Bletchley Park. Large properties like this offered a place for a group of codebreakers to stay and live while they worked to decipher coded messages from the Germans. Sometimes they even served as airbases. The codebreakers worked to prevent attacks on Allied convoys by the U-boat Wolfpacks. Dunhaven Castle must be assisting with the war efforts. A property this far north was probably a great area to house them for safety. Plus, in 1942, the messages became indecipherable for a period. They needed all the codebreaking help they could get."

"Oh," Jack said, with a nod of understanding. "So our girl could be one of the codebreakers."

Cate's brow crinkled. "Amelia said she worked for her, so probably not. But she could have been killed by someone in that tent. Still, it doesn't provide us with much information."

"No, it doesn't, but we've now got a new lead to follow."

Cate nodded. "Maybe we should head back."

"Okay. You follow up on this while we decide how best to explain our youthful appearances to people who aged twenty years."

Cate nodded in agreement. "I suppose we should sneak back in using the crypt, though we'll have to figure out how to open the passage from this side."

"No time like the present," Jack said, offering his arm.

"Technically, we're in the past, but sure," Cate said as she accepted it.

"Witty, Lady Cate. My humor is rubbing off on you."

They returned to the crypt. Cate's eyes roamed over the stone interior. "I've never actually entered the passage from this side," she admitted.

"I suppose now's as good a time as any to find the opening," Jack replied.

"It's a ring on the other side."

"The only ring I see in the lion's mouth there." Jack pointed up at the decorative lion.

Cate smiled and nodded. Jack reached up and tugged. His grin turned upside down into a frown when nothing happened.

"I really thought that would work."

"Me too," Cate answered. "It always works on TV."

"We live wilder lives than people on TV," Jack said, as he tugged on his collar.

"I beg to differ," Cate said. Any further comment was drowned out by a droning overhead.

"What is that?" Jack asked.

Cate stepped out through the gate and glanced upward. "Jack, look!" She pointed skyward as Jack joined her.

Four RAF fighter planes flew overhead. "Are those..." Jack asked, as he shielded his eyes against the bright sun.

Cate nodded, her skin turning to gooseflesh. "Royal Air Force."

"What are they doing here?"

"Protecting the intelligence post, perhaps," Cate suggested.

Moments later, the squadron, flying in finger-four formation, split apart. The planes darted in different directions.

"What's going on?" Jack inquired.

A new sound joined the buzzing of the RAF fighters. "There!" Cate exclaimed. Four differently configured planes sped in from the south.

"Who are they?"

"By the looks of the planes, that's the Luftwaffe!" Cate exclaimed. "Oh, Jack, we're about to see a dog fight up close and personal!"

Jack's eyes went wide as the four German planes split apart in pursuit of the RAF. Bullets strafed from the eight aircrafts. The planes darted through the sky, diving and climbing, doing barrel rolls, and chasing each other in hot pursuit.

Two RAF fighters managed to corner one of the German planes. One plane open-fired. A black line of smoke trailed from the German plane as the pilot fought to bring the plane down safely in enemy territory.

"Oh, a hit!" Jack exclaimed. "Now they've got the advantage."

Cate nodded and continued to watch the fray. Another pair of pilots battled it out on the far side of the castle. Again, the RAF pilot outmaneuvered the less-agile German fighter. Another black streak smoked through the sky, this one ending in a fiery explosion as the plane hit the ground.

The remaining Luftwaffe planes hightailed it away in the direction they'd come. As the skies quieted, Jack murmured, "Wow," in an astonished whisper, adding, "I can't believe we just saw that."

"Yeah," Cate answered. "I still have goosebumps."

"Good job by our boys!"

Cate nodded as they ducked back into the crypt. "The RAF planes were far more agile in dog fights. They had an advantage. It was still an awesome sight to see some of those maneuvers."

"I agree, Lady Cate," Jack said. "Maybe this time travel stuff isn't all that terrible after all."

Cate lifted her eyebrows and grinned at him. "I'm so glad it's growing on you."

"Now if we can only find the entrance, we can enjoy it from our own time."

"I really thought the ring in the lion's mouth would be it," Jack said with a shake of his head.

Cate pressed a finger to her lips as she surveyed the space. "Too obvious, I guess," she murmured.

"I was okay with how obvious it was," Jack said, as he poked around searching for another option.

Cate chuckled at the statement as she zeroed in on a large ring attached to the head of the middle stone coffin. "Maybe this," she said.

She wrapped her fingers around the ring and tugged. It gave way slightly. Her features scrunched as she struggled to pull the ancient mechanism further. Jack grabbed hold of the ring to assist.

It broke loose and triggered the doorway into the passage. "Success," Jack said, as they darted inside and closed the panel.

They wandered through the tunnel back to the house, resetting the watch and returning to their own time. They emerged from the secret panel and took a back stairway upstairs to change.

"Well, I suppose there's no need for our usual post-time travel trip analysis meeting," Jack said, as they traversed the halls.

"Not unless you'd like to discuss running into your grandfather when he was five."

"I'd really rather not. I found it a little disturbing. Pap was a tough little bugger."

Cate giggled. "He was. I can't believe he accused us of being Nazis."

“At least he didn’t insult your feet.”

Cate continued her chuckling. “Anyway, you’re off the hook. I’ll get started on researching the intelligence base at the castle and see if I can find any leads there.”

“Let me know what you come up with, Lady Cate,” Jack said.

“I will.”

After donning her twenty-first-century clothes, Cate wandered to the library for a brief research session before her dinner. Much of what she read she already knew. Deciphering German messages was a large focus of the war efforts. So-called Wolfpacks of German U-boats prowled the waters and attacked allied supply ships. Determining the location of these Wolfpacks on any given day could help turn the tides of the war or could sink the Allies’ efforts, quite literally.

As such, mathematicians were housed at estates such as Bletchley Park and put forth phenomenal efforts to break the German Enigma code. Submarine crews often risked their lives to overtake a U-boat and retrieve the Enigma machines for codebreakers to study.

While having Enigma machines was helpful, the machine settings were changed daily and based on secret keys distributed in advance, making messages difficult to decrypt.

On her initial search, Cate found little information specific to Dunhaven Castle. However, she became swept away with the fascinating stories of the work intelligence analysts did to aid the war efforts. She marveled at the lengths some people went to to help the war efforts.

When dinner interrupted her research, she set the laptop aside for the day and enjoyed her meal. After an evening walk with her pups, Cate settled in her sitting room with a hot chocolate and a mystery novel.

As she readied for bed, Cate bent down to remove the bow-tie collar she’d placed on Riley earlier. “Did you get up to anything interesting today, Riley? I forgot to check your camera feed. Well, tomorrow’s a new day.”

The small camera dangled from Cate’s fingertips as she crossed the room. The blue glow of her own monitoring device caught her eye. She stared at it for a moment, wondering if she’d wander around the castle again tonight.

“Where am I going?” she murmured to herself. Cate glanced down at the collar camera still clutched in her hand. An idea formed in her mind, and she narrowed her eyes at the small device.

Within twenty minutes, Cate was climbing into bed with the pet collar camera dangling from her wrist on a bracelet. As she lay back amidst her pillows, she stared down at the small item strapped to her.

“I wonder what you’ll show me tomorrow,” she asked aloud, as she relaxed into sleep.

CHAPTER 10

Cate awoke with a start. Sweat beaded on her forehead and she gasped for breath. The sun painted the morning sky a deep shade of red. Cate grasped her clock and checked the time. Fifteen minutes remained before her alarm would signal her to get up.

Cate collapsed back into the pillows as she caught her breath. She searched her mind for what disturbed her sleep. She didn't recall having a nightmare. What caused her to break into a sweat? What caused the shortness of breath?

With no answers in sight, Cate stretched and climbed from her bed. She blew out a long breath as she clutched at her neck, finding the familiar sapphire necklace hanging there. As she pulled on her robe, she caught sight of her other accessory.

Cate bit her lower lip as she stared at the camera attached to her wrist. Perhaps she'd get some answers from the video feed this morning.

Cate delayed her findings into her overnight excursions until after breakfast. After moving the camera from the foyer back to the library, she settled into her desk chair. As she slouched down, she eyed her phone. She stared at the blank screen. Her finger tapped against the power button as she attempted to muster the courage to view the video.

After a hard swallow, Cate toggled her phone on and navigated to the camera's app. A list of videos filled her screen. She clicked on one showing Dunhaven Castle's estate from a dog's perspective. The camera bobbed around as Riley frolicked through the back garden.

Cate smiled at the video as she caught sight of her legs and a bashful Bailey trotting next to them. Her brow furrowed and she stopped the video. This had been a similar angle to the video she'd swore she saw legs in while she and Molly were visiting Fyvie Castle.

She stared at it for a few more moments before she realized she was stalling from the task at hand. Cate pursed her lips as she returned to the video list and scrolled through it. She found one with today's date. The timestamp read 1:37 a.m.

Cate sucked in a breath and tapped on the video. It took her several seconds to acclimate to the video's perspective. At her hip level outside of some bobbling around of her right arm, things appeared very different.

Cate squinted at the phone as her bobbling hands settled back at her sides, following what she assumed to be clasping the sapphire necklace around her neck. She recognized the sitting room as her on-screen-self wandered through it. The camera angle became frenetic as Cate turned the door handle and pulled her suite's doors open.

Cate stared down the length of the hall as the bobbling video continued. "Where am I going?"

She covered her mouth as the video captured her threading through several hallways in a seemingly random pattern. Cate wandered down a set of back stairs. She continued her aimless wandering until she reached a set of doors to the closed-off west wing. She paused for a moment before she continued along the hall.

After a few more moments of wandering, the camera faced another set of doors. Cate recognized the entrance to the ballroom. The camera approached the large double doors. The picture bobbed again as Cate flung the doors open. The turning of her wrist spun the camera. It caught on the ring used to attach it to the bracelet. Now angled upward, Cate could see bits and pieces of her face.

The night mode toggled on as Cate stepped into the darkened ballroom. Her face lit in an eerie green, her eyes forming two piercing dots as they scanned the space.

The video moved as Cate wandered to the center of the ballroom. She spun in a slow circle, her eyes searching. After two full turns, she stopped.

"I'm here. Where are you?" her on-screen counterpart said.

Cate's brow furrowed as she pondered the meaning of her sleepwalking-self's statement. Another moment passed, before the Cate on screen whipped her head toward something. From the odd angle of the camera, Cate detected a smile forming on her lips. She took a step toward whatever she focused on when the camera froze.

“What?” Cate asked, tapping at her phone’s screen. “No!”

Her heart sank as she attempted to find more of the video. No other footage existed, including her return trip to bed. The next video on the list was of her awakening earlier this morning.

Cate sat in stunned silence for several moments as she pondered the meaning of the latest revelations. Who was she searching for? Her mind leapt to an answer. It was one she did not like.

A knock on the library’s open door snapped her out of her ruminating. She glanced at the door to find Jack leaning in.

“Lady Cate, lost in thought?”

Cate didn’t respond for a moment. She flicked her gaze to the phone. The wrinkles in her forehead deepened as she directed her gaze back to Jack.

“Cate?” he questioned, his face quickly turning to a mask of concern as he approached her. “Are you okay?”

She shook her head as she rose from the chair.

“Did you find something on our lady?”

“No,” Cate answered. “We’ve got another problem, Jack.”

“Oh? Find another body in the garden, did you?”

Cate tried to force a smile at the terrible joke as she shook her head, but it faltered, and she glanced down at the phone still clutched in her hand.

“Cate, you’re scaring me. What’s wrong?”

Cate swallowed hard, bringing her eyes to meet Jack’s for a brief second. She licked her lips as she pondered the words.

“I’ve been sleepwalking,” she settled on.

Jack’s brow furrowed and he blinked his eyes a few times before cocking his head. “Oh,” he said, after a moment, “so you’re tired? Is that what’s got you so down?”

Cate shook her head. “No,” she admitted. “It’s not that.”

“Then what?” Jack prodded as Cate continued her reluctance.

She glanced to her phone again before returning her gaze to Jack. “It’s not normal sleepwalking,” she reported.

Jack’s eyes widened and darted around the room. “Ooookay,” he said. “Are you doing strange things? Like wandering around naked or something?”

The comment made Cate chuckle despite her trepidation. “No,” she gasped out.

“Then what? Maybe you should sit down and explain it to me,” Jack said, leading her to one of the leather armchairs near the fireplace. He eased her into it and plopped into the chair adjacent to hers.

Cate bit her lower lip before she proceeded with more details. “I keep getting up and retrieving that necklace...” she began.

Jack let his head fall onto the chair behind him with a sigh. “Oh, Cate, you need to get rid of that damn thing.”

“Yes, I’m starting to agree with you,” Cate admitted.

“Although, it’s not that terrible. Why has it got you so disturbed?”

“Well, there’s more,” Cate said with a frown. “It started with me simply wandering in my sleep to the jewelry armoire, retrieving the sapphire necklace and returning to bed. I’d wake up with it clutched in my hand. But then...” Her voice trailed off.

“Then?” Jack prodded.

“Well, then things took a turn for the stranger. And after I pick up the necklace from the jewelry box, I wander around the castle for a while.”

Jack sat for a moment, processing the information before he shook his head. “If you’re sleepwalking, how do you know what you’re doing? Do you wake up somewhere else?”

Cate shook her head and waved her phone in the air. “No. Those doggie cams aren’t really for the dogs. I’ve been using them to track my movements around the castle. And last night I strapped the collar cam to my wrist, so I had a record of where I went.”

Jack leaned forward, placing his elbows on his knees. “How long has this been going on, Cate?”

“Since our last trip to 1792.”

Jack scrubbed his face with his hands.

Cate continued her explanation. “I started out with a camera in my bedroom.” She toggled it on to show Jack the videos. “At first, I just wander to the jewelry armoire and remove the necklace and go back to bed.” She toggled into a video showing her zombie-like self wandering around her bedroom.

“But then,” Cate continued, “I saw this one.” She tapped the screen to display the video where she wandered into the sitting room.

“So I bought another camera.” Another video played on the screen, showing her wandering through the sitting room and out into the hall.

“Which led me to move the camera here because I assumed this phenomenon was tied to my nightmares about the bookcase. Or rather, I assumed this replaced those nightmares since I haven’t suffered from them since this began.”

Jack gazed over at the camera cube now across the room. “So, did you come in here?”

Cate shook her head. “No. No video of me coming to the library. I wasn’t sure where to put the camera next, so I tried the foyer, but nothing there, and then last night when I was removing the collar cam from Riley, the idea struck me to attach it to myself. Then I could essentially follow myself around at night.”

Jack gave her a sideways glance. “It disturbs me how scientific you are about this, Cate.”

Cate shrugged. “It seemed the best way to collect evidence. Anyway, this is the video from last night.”

“And this is the collar cam?” Jack inquired.

Cate nodded as she pressed play on the video. Jack accepted the proffered cell phone and watched the video play. Cate leaned over his shoulder as she offered commentary.

“Okay, likely I’m fastening the necklace,” she said, as the camera bobbed around, covered by her hair at times. “And now, here we go into the sitting room and down the hall.” The camera bobbed around as Cate plodded down the hall past Molly’s room and turned into another hallway.

“Where are you going?” Jack inquired.

“Same question I had,” Cate said. She speeded the video until she arrived at the ballroom doors.

“Ah,” Jack exclaimed, as Cate allowed it to play at normal speed. “You want to have a party.”

The video continued as Cate entered the ballroom and began to spin in a slow circle. “What are you doing?”

“Just keep watching,” Cate said.

Jack returned his attention to the screen and watched as Cate stopped. “I’m here. Where are you?” her voice questioned from the phone.

Jack’s face became a mask of confusion. “Where’s who?” he asked. A moment later, the corners of Cate’s mouth turned up and she stared at something. Or someone. As she took another step, the video froze.

“Why did it stop?”

“I’m not sure. But there are no other videos after that. Not even of me returning to bed.”

“Did you?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod, as she plopped into her armchair. “I woke up in my bed this morning, so I got back somehow.”

Jack pursed his lips and stared at the image frozen on the screen. “Who are you looking for, I wonder?”

Cate stared blankly ahead as he spoke. “Him,” she murmured.

“Huh?”

Cate blinked slowly as she focused on nothing in front of her. Her senses dulled and her world slid away.

Suddenly, her body jolted. She blinked a few times as she focused on what was in front of her. Jack knelt in front of the chair. His hands gripped her upper arms tightly. The wrinkles on his forehead and the pained expression on his lips hinted at his worry.

“Cate?” he said.

“What?” she answered. “What’s wrong?”

Jack’s eyes widened. “What’s wrong? I asked who you may be looking for, and you murmured some response and then you just turned into a zombie! I couldn’t get a response from you.”

CHAPTER 11

Cate drew in a deep breath. “I don’t remember any of that.”

Jack crept back to his armchair and perched on the edge of it. He shook his head. “Cate, I think we need to get rid of that necklace.”

Cate nodded. “I’m inclined to agree with you. It obviously has some strange effect on me.” Cate pondered for a moment before adding, “I guess I could call...”

“Cate, no,” Jack interrupted. “Get rid of it. Stop putting it off, or letting someone else handle it.”

“I’m not putting it off but... what am I going to do with it?”

“Chuck the damn thing into the loch.”

Cate winced. “I hope I don’t try a midnight diving excursion to get it back.”

“That settles it,” Jack said, pounding his palms on the chair’s arms. “I’m going to stay here until we’re sure you’re back to normal. We’ll make sure all the doors are locked so you can’t get away and harm yourself. And we’re tossing that necklace right now.”

Jack stood and held his hand out to Cate. “What, now? Like now, now?”

“Yes, like now, now, Lady Cate. Hop to it and get that cursed thing out of your jewelry box.” Jack shook his head. “No, scratch that. I’ll go with you. Before you put it on and start wandering around again.”

Cate grasped his hand, and he pulled her up to standing. She offered a defeated nod and led the way from the room. They traversed the halls to Cate’s suite.

“How will you explain staying here?” Cate inquired.

“I suppose I’ll invent another problem to deal with,” Jack answered.

“Another leak, huh?” Cate said.

“Something like that,” Jack answered.

“Darn leaky roofs on these old places,” Cate said with a chuckle.

“At least it works in our favor,” Jack replied, as they reached Cate’s sitting room. Jack hovered at the door to her bedroom as she stalked across the room and pulled open the drawer. Her eyes fell onto the extravagant necklace. Her fingers reached out to caress the gems. She arched an eyebrow as the world around her seemed to fall away.

After a moment, she blinked several times. Only black velvet stared back at her.

“We’ll have none of that,” Jack said, as he swiped the necklace from the drawer. “I can’t wait until this thing is gone.” He dangled it in the air before shoving it into his pocket. “Let’s go.”

Cate nodded and they snaked through the halls and onto the grounds after collecting the dogs. Cate took a deep breath as they began their walk to the loch. When they arrived, her stomach filled with butterflies. She bit her lower lip as Jack removed the jewelry piece from his pocket.

He closed his fist around it and raised his hand high.

“Wait!” Cate exclaimed.

“What?” he asked, lowering his hand to his side.

Cate grasped hold of it and pulled his fingers back. “Maybe we shouldn’t throw it into the loch. It really is beautiful. Perhaps...”

Jack yanked his hand away. “No more, Cate. It’s going to the bottom of that loch today. It’s a cursed thing, no matter how pretty it is.”

Jack pulled his hand back and threw it overhand. Cate’s heart somersaulted with the necklace as she watched it arc in the air before descending toward the water. It plopped into the still surface. Concentric circles radiated from where it bobbed for a second before slipping below the water.

Jack nodded his head as the waters calmed again. “Done.”

Cate stared at the spot where the necklace had disappeared. Jack glanced at her. “How do you feel?”

Cate raised her eyebrows and drew in a deep breath. “Better,” she said. “I think.”

Jack smiled at her. “Good. And I’ll stay the night just in case. But let’s hope that puts an end to your troubles.”

Cate returned his smile and nodded. “Yes. Let’s hope my sleepwalking days are over. Maybe now I can make some progress on our girl.”

“Nothing yet?” Jack asked, as they began their walk back to the castle.

Cate shook her head. “No. Though, I’m afraid I got caught up in reading some of the history of the time. World War II is one of my favorite periods to study.”

“A war buff? I’d never have guessed.”

Cate nodded with a coy grin. “Maybe you’d like to borrow my Battle 360 DVDs,” she said.

Jack chuckled at Cate’s comments as they reached the castle.

“All right, Lady Cate,” Jack said, as they stepped into the foyer. “As long as you feel okay, I’ll leave you to your work. I expect a full report on Ruth Harper later today.”

“Aye, aye, sir!” Cate said with a salute. “And yes, I feel fine. I only seem to have an odd reaction when I see that necklace. Now that it’s gone, let’s hope that’s all behind me.”

“Fingers crossed, Lady Cate,” he answered as he backed down the hall.

Cate ushered the dogs into the library. With a short amount of time before lunch, Cate opted for busy work rather than diving into any research on Ruth Harper. Instead, she grabbed her cell phone.

She frowned at the picture on the screen. Her frozen image standing in the ballroom faced her. She quickly tapped her home button to remove the image and navigated to her text app. After selecting the appropriate message thread, Cate typed: You’ll be happy to hear we’ve gotten rid of the necklace.

She tapped the arrow button to send the message. Within a few moments, a bubble appeared with three dots, indicating a response being typed. Cate smiled as Damien’s answer appeared: Way to go, Cate!

The two conversed through Cate’s lunch. She avoided telling him about her sleepwalking drama, feeling a bit guilty keeping it from him, particularly after he asked about her nightmares.

She reported she had no trouble with them after her return from 1792.

Celine says hers never stopped. She thought I should warn you, just in case you experience a similar thing.

Cate responded: Really? I had one nightmare about being trapped in the coffin, but nothing since.

Damien's answer confirmed his earlier message. Yeah. Celine said she's had the nightmares for over two centuries. I hope you don't. Not have them for two centuries, that would be impossible for you as a human. I mean I hope you don't have them anymore. Celine's are on and off, though, so if you start having nightmares again, it may be normal.

Cate's forehead crinkled as she processed the message. What about Duke Northcott affected both her and Celine? Perhaps she should say something to Damien about the sleepwalking. Maybe he could tell her how to stop it.

Cate began to type a message but then erased it. She'd sleep on it and decide about sharing the information with him later. She toggled off her phone after sending a simple "Thanks!" and finished her lunch.

She settled in at her desk after a hearty meal, prepared to work. She spent the better part of the afternoon attempting to track down information about the intelligence base on Dunhaven Castle's grounds or anyone named Ruth Harper.

Cate found a number of references to women named Ruth Harper. She sorted through the hundreds of results, removing those who did not fit the time frame first. She trimmed her list down by removing anyone who could not have been at Dunhaven Castle in 1942. When she finished, she had a handful of women left.

Cate stared at her list of four women. She'd dive deeper into researching each of them tomorrow to determine if any could be the Ruth Harper buried on Dunhaven's grounds.

Cate closed her laptop as Molly delivered her last meal of the day. She spent the meal and her evening pondering if she'd wander the castle again tonight. Jack followed Molly into the library when she arrived to remove Cate's tray.

He waited for Molly to disappear down the hall before he spoke. "How you feeling?" he asked.

"Fine," Cate said. "No ill-effects. Jack, you really don't have to stay if you don't want to. I can put the camera on myself again and..."

"I'm not going to argue with you, Cate. I want to stay. I've already told everybody about our leak."

Cate smiled at him. "Okay. Thanks, Jack. Hopefully, we'll have a quiet night."

"My fingers are crossed. I'd still put the camera on. Just in case."

They spoke for a few more moments before Cate retreated to her suite with her book, hoping to relax before she went to bed.

As she crawled between the sheets, her camera accessory hanging around her wrist, she hoped for a good night's sleep.

* * *

Cate awoke the next morning before her alarm. After a stretch, she reached to caress her neck. The memory of Jack tossing the necklace into the loch flooded into her mind. She must have had a peaceful night's rest, she thought with a smile.

She rose from her bed, humming as she went about her morning routine. As she pulled on her boots, she pondered the song she'd been humming. It occurred to her that she couldn't recall the name of the tune, nor where she'd heard it.

With a shrug, she finished dressing and took the dogs out. As they romped in the yard, Cate checked her cell phone. A few videos existed on both cameras. Cate swallowed hard as she saw the list. Had she climbed from her bed despite the absence of the necklace?

She toggled off the phone, putting the discovery off until after breakfast. Following the meal, she settled in the library. Rain pelted the windows outside and thunder rumbled in the distance. Cate sighed as she toggled on her cell phone.

She jumped in her seat as a knock sounded at the door.

"Sorry," Jack said, holding his hand out. "You okay?"

"Yeah, you just startled me."

"How did you sleep?"

"I'm about to find out," Cate said, wiggling her cell phone at him.

"Want me to leave?" Jack inquired.

Cate shook her head. "No. In fact, I'd prefer you to stay. I'm interested but more than a little nervous to find out what happened last night."

"So, there are videos?"

“Yes. Though they could be as mundane as me turning over in bed or Riley stretching.”

“Let’s find out.”

Cate accessed the cube camera first. The few videos from overnight showed Cate rolling over, fluffing her pillow, and adjusting her covers. One video showed Bailey climbing to his feet and stretching before curling in a ball to continue sleeping.

Cate smiled as they played the last video. She had not climbed from her bed. She had not roamed the castle. She hadn’t tried to dive into the loch to retrieve the necklace. She breathed a sigh of relief. “Thank goodness,” she said, as she tossed her phone onto the desk.

“Looks like our leak is fixed!” Jack exclaimed. “Now we can focus on our 1942 problem.”

“On that note, I’ve got some research to do! I narrowed down the Ruth Harpers from the United Kingdom to four possibilities. I plan to flesh out the details on each today to see if they could be our girl. Of course, Ruth could be from another country, so if none of these pan out, I suppose I should expand my search.” Cate pressed her finger to her lips as she vetted her thoughts.

“Well, I’ll leave you to your work, Lady Cate,” Jack said with a smile.

Cate smiled. “Wish me luck!”

“Good luck, Lady Cate.” He offered her a wave as he backed through the door. Cate took a deep breath as another clap of thunder boomed. Riley climbed to his feet, his tail between his legs instead of arched high above his back in its usual position. He scampered across the room to Cate with a whine.

“Aww,” Cate said, as she scooped him up. “It’s just a little thunder, buddy. Nothing to worry about.” He licked her cheek. She smiled at him and kissed the fur on top of his head.

A loud bang sounded. Cate jumped again, before realizing it was her door knocker. “I’m getting as jumpy as you, Riley,” she said, as she carried the small dog with her to the front door.

“Who could that be?” she asked him as the knocker sounded again, echoing in the foyer. “Coming!”

Cate pulled the door open to find the mail carrier.

“Top o’ the morning to you, Lady Cate,” Otto said. “And hello. Riley, right?”

“Hi!” Cate greeted him. “Yep, this is Riley. For once he’s not barking at you.”

Otto chuckled. “Oh, I dinnae mind. Little fellow’s doing his job and protecting his castle, aren’t you, little fellow?”

“I’m certain he’d agree.”

“I’ve got a package for you. Special delivery. Marked ‘Handle with Care,’ so I dinnae want to leave it out in the rain. I suppose I could have run it around back to Mrs. F but...” His voice trailed off as he glanced to the skies.

“I’ll save you the steps and keep you dry,” Cate said.

“I much appreciate that, Lady Cate.” He handed the package over to her.

“Thank you,” Cate said with a smile. “Stay dry!”

He nodded and hurried back to his car as Cate closed the front door. She stared down at the wrapped box. Brown paper covered it. Her name was scrawled on top. No return address was written.

Cate turned it over, searching for the sender. She found no other marks outside of her address and the postage.

“Wonder what this is?” she asked Riley, as she juggled both him and the box on their way back to the library.

With the small dog balanced on her lap, she settled at her desk. She rummaged through the desk drawer for a pair of scissors and flipped the box over to begin removing the brown paper.

Riley became restless as Cate jostled him around working to remove the wrapping and leapt down. With no hints of thunder in the past few minutes, he decided to brave it and settle in for a nap near the roaring fire.

Cate freed the box from the paper and studied it. The nondescript brown cardboard container gave no clues as to the contents. Cate sliced open the packing tape sealing the top. A few packing peanuts spilled over the top as she pulled it open to find a cream-colored box wrapped in a blue satin ribbon inside.

“What is this?” Cate inquired aloud, as she lifted the fancy packaging from within the plain cardboard box. A few more peanuts spilled to the floor. Cate scooped them up before continuing, afraid the dogs may find them an interesting snack.

She pushed the box to the side and stared at the ribbon-adorned cube. Cate grasped one of the tails from the bow and pulled, unfurling the ribbon. She shimmied the thick box top off of the package and peeked inside.

Blue tissue paper obscured whatever object lay there. As Cate pulled it back, the crease between her eyebrows deepened. A miniature wooden piano sat inside.

“Where did this come from?” Cate asked herself. Riley popped his head up and sniffed. The object didn’t seem to faze Bailey. “I didn’t order this.”

Cate checked the brown paper to verify her name and address before she removed the item to examine it further.

A winding key protruded from the underside of the piano. Cate wound it. No music played.

“Hmm,” Cate murmured. “Oh, maybe the lid has to be open.”

Cate traced the outline of the lid, finding a finger notch to open it. As she lifted the lid, tinkling music began to play. The tune seemed familiar, but Cate couldn’t place it.

She lifted the lid a bit further when something inside caught her eye. Cate’s jaw dropped open and her heart pounded. She gasped, leaping onto wobbly legs as she backed away from the desk. Her sudden movement brought both dogs to their feet and knocked the piano-shaped music box off its perch on the desk.

It clattered to the floor, landing on its side. The lid popped open, and the contents of the interior spilled out, skittering across the hardwood floor and landing next to Cate’s feet.

Tinkling music filled the air again as Cate stared in horror at the item below.

“No,” she whispered. “It can’t be.”

Cate squatted down and scooped up the object. With trembling hands, she brought it closer to her face. Her breathing turned ragged as her mind confirmed what she suspected.

In her shaking hands, she held the sapphire necklace she and Jack discarded less than twenty-four hours ago.

CHAPTER 12

Cate's lower lip trembled, and she pressed a palm against her forehead. She stood motionless, the latest turn of events rendering her speechless. Her brain failed to process what she stared at or comprehend how it could happen.

Cate collapsed into the desk chair as Riley and Bailey joined her. She dropped the necklace on the desk in favor of cuddling the two dogs. A tear fell onto her cheek and Riley offered her a kiss, sensing her upset.

"I'm okay," she said with a sniffle. "Thanks, buddy."

Bailey stared at her, his ears wiggling up and down as he attempted to determine the source of Cate's distress.

She stared over at the music box, still playing its tune. She leapt from her seat and snapped the lid shut as she realized why she recognized the tune. The little music box played the same tune she'd been humming this morning.

Cate bit her lower lip hard as tears filled her eyes. Emotions overcame her and a sob escaped her lips. Tears flowed down her cheeks as she clutched the piano against her chest.

Warm arms embraced her, and she glanced up to find Jack. The concern on his face was obvious. "Cate?" he whispered.

Cate gave in to another moment of weakness, squeezing her eyes shut, causing more tears to fall to her cheeks as she let her head rest against Jack's shoulder.

“Oh, now, it can’t be as bad as all that, can it?” Jack inquired as he rubbed her shoulder.

Cate swiped at the tears glistening on her cheeks. “Sorry,” she choked out. “I’m sorry.”

“It’s okay, Cate,” Jack said as she pushed away from him. He gave her back a gentle rub. “What happened?”

Cate swallowed hard and blew out a long breath. She retrieved a tissue and composed herself. “I’m sorry,” she said again. “I don’t know what came over me. I just panicked.” She held up the piano with both hands. Jack studied the item.

“A package arrived this morning. Addressed to me. This was inside,” Cate explained.

“And it brought you to tears? Is it from one of your parents?”

Cate shook her head. “I’ve never seen it before in my life. But that’s not what brought me to tears. It was what was inside of it.”

Jack grabbed the piano from Cate and glanced at it. He lifted the lid and music filled the air again. “Close it, please,” Cate said. “Something about that song bothers me.”

Jack snapped the lid closed. “I don’t see anything inside.”

Cate pulled the item off the desk. “It fell out when I had my moment. This was inside.”

Cate raised her arm, letting the sapphire necklace dangle from her fingers. Jack’s eyes went wide and his face blanched three shades lighter than normal. “No,” he said with a shake of his head, his jaw gaping open.

“That’s about the reaction I had. And then some,” Cate said, still sniffling.

Jack set the music box down on the desk and grasped the necklace. His head shook as he studied it. After a moment, his eyes met Cate’s. “No, this can’t be.”

“And now you know why I was so upset,” Cate said. “I watched you throw that into the loch yesterday. And today, it arrives in a music box. A music box playing a song that I happened to be humming this morning before I received it.”

“I need to sit down,” Jack said. Jack wandered to the leather armchair and plopped into it. He stared straight ahead, the necklace still threaded through his fingers. His brow wrinkled. “I threw it away. I know I did. I watched it sink.”

"I was a witness," Cate said, as she eased into the armchair next to him, tucking her feet under her.

Jack stared wide-eyed at the necklace again. "How could this happen?"

Cate shrugged.

"There couldn't possibly be two of these, could there?" Jack inquired. "It's identical. And worth a fortune. Who would have two made?"

"What are the chances even if there are two that the second one arrives the day after we discard the first? This can't be a coincidence."

"I'm afraid it's not," Jack said. "But I have no idea what to do about it."

Cate pursed her lips as she sorted through options for tackling the problem. No solutions came. "If we throw it away again..."

"I'm afraid it'll come right back like a boomerang," Jack said, as he grimaced at the necklace. "There's no guarantee that will work. In fact, I'd say we're inviting more trouble by doing it."

"Inviting more trouble?"

"Cate, someone sent you that package. And you've been roaming the halls looking for someone. Who? Him! Northcott! Who else can do this?"

Cate sucked in a shaky breath as she shook her head. "So, what do we do?"

"Call Damien," Jack said. "Maybe he knows how to handle something like this."

Cate hurried across the room to grab her phone. Jack tossed the necklace onto the coffee table in front of him. "You're right. He's the best resource we have for anything Duke-related. Although I did tell him we got rid of the necklace yesterday and he didn't warn me about this. He did warn me my nightmares may continue." Cate tapped around on her phone.

Jack screwed up his face. "He warned you your nightmares may continue?"

Cate nodded as her thumbs flew across her virtual keyboard. "Yes. He said Celine's have never stopped and she wanted me to know now that I've had a... negative experience with Duke Northcott, I may be haunted forever by it."

Jack sighed as Cate toggled off her phone. Seconds later, it rang. "Wow, that's service," Cate said, as she swiped to answer the call.

"Hello," she said.

"Hey, Cate. Got your message. What's up?"

“Hey, Damien. Thanks for calling. Is it okay if I put you on speakerphone? Jack’s with me.”

“Sure, Cate,” Damien answered. “Everything okay?”

Cate toggled on the speakerphone and Jack offered a hello. After Jack and Damien exchanged pleasantries, Cate launched into her story.

“Everything’s okay, sort of. We’ve just had an... incident and I wondered if you may be able to offer us any insight on this.”

“Incident?” Damien questioned. “That sounds ominous.”

“Well, I told you yesterday that we got rid of the necklace.”

“Yep,” Damien answered. “Best thing you could have done.”

“Well,” Cate said with a sigh, as she considered which details to reveal first. “Yes and no.”

“What do you mean?”

“The necklace was having an odd effect on me, which is what prompted us to take rather extreme measures to rid ourselves of it.” Cate recounted the tale of her sleepwalking, increasing from retrieving the necklace and returning to bed and ending with her search for someone in the castle’s main ballroom.

“Like I said,” Damien responded, “best thing you could have done is get rid of it.”

“There’s more,” Cate said. “And this is actually what prompted the call.”

“Okay?”

Cate took another deep breath. “Jack threw the necklace into the loch yesterday. I watched him do it.”

“Way to go, buddy,” Damien cheered him.

“Thanks. Unfortunately, it failed to solve the problem,” Jack answered.

“Are you still sleepwalking, Cate? Oh, no,” Damien said. “You didn’t sleepwalk into the loch, did you?”

“No,” Cate answered. “But this morning a package was delivered. It contained a piano-shaped music box. And inside the music box, I found the necklace.”

“What?” Damien exclaimed. “Are you sure?”

“Positive. Same necklace. Same design, same sapphires. If it’s not the same necklace, it’s a carbon copy of it.”

Cate heard rustling on Damien’s end of the line. “Can you hang on the line for a sec? I’m going to run this past Celine.”

“Sure. And thanks.”

“No problem, Cate.”

Cate heard a knock and then Damien and a woman conversing. “Okay, I’ve got you on speakerphone with Celine and Alexander. Can you tell them everything you just told me? Sorry to make you go through it again but, it’s best if the details come from you.”

Cate relayed the odd tale of the reappearing necklace to the newcomers on the line. At the conclusion of her tale, the line went quiet for a moment before Celine spoke.

“I’m really not surprised. This fits pretty well with Marcus’s standard operating procedures. What puzzles me is why he’s pursuing this, though.”

“Has the necklace had any odd effects on you since its reappearance?” Alexander inquired.

“Other than my fleeting moment of panic when I saw it again, no. But I’ve had it less than an hour.”

Another pause before Celine spoke again. “I can speak with Marcus about it. I’m certain he won’t admit to anything, but perhaps if he’s warned that we’re aware of the situation, he won’t pursue it further.”

Cate’s brow crinkled at the comment. “I really don’t want you to have to deal with him, Celine.”

“It’s fine,” she answered. “He won’t hurt me. Though, as I said, I doubt he’ll admit anything to me.”

“Anything you’d suggest in the meantime?” Jack asked. “I’d throw this bugger in the loch again, but I’m not certain it would do any good.”

“You have a safe, right?” Damien asked.

“Yes,” Cate answered.

“Lock it in there for the time being? You can’t get to it then, so if it’s causing your issues, maybe not being able to retrieve it will help.”

“Excellent idea, Damien,” Alexander said. “And we’ll work on things on our end. I’ll search for a way to destroy an enchanted item.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped at the conversation, both in exasperation at the words “enchanted item” and with relief for the help. “Thank you,” she murmured.

“You’re welcome, Cate,” Damien said. “And try not to let it bother you. I know that’s a weird thing to say, but we’ll figure it out. And remember, not every enchanted object is bad. You’re wearing one of the good ones around your neck right now.” There was a brief pause, before Damien added, “Oh, not to creep you out. I can’t see you. I’m just assuming you’re wearing the timepiece Celine enchanted.”

The extra explanatory comment gave Cate a chuckle. “Thanks, Damien. I needed that laugh.”

“Hang in there, Cate. We’ll get back to you soon.”

They said their goodbyes and Cate ended the call. She sat with her brow crinkled as she held the phone in her lap.

“You okay, Cate?”

She nodded. “Yeah, I’m just again blown away by how odd their lives are.”

“Yet they act like it’s totally normal,” Jack voiced in response.

“Yes!” Cate exclaimed, pointing a finger at Jack to punctuate her statement. “I don’t understand Celine talking to Duke Northcott. They seemed to be extremely acrid toward each other when we saw them last. Then again, I don’t understand any of this.”

Cate popped up from her seat and paced the floor behind the chairs. “The natural assumption is I’m seeking Duke Northcott, right?”

“I can’t figure out who else it would be,” Jack admitted.

“But why would I seek him out? Why am I seeking a man who almost killed me?” Cate asked.

Jack rose from his chair and stopped her pacing. “I don’t know, Cate. But I think we should do what Damien suggested and lock this necklace up in the safe. It seems to have some strange effect on you. And I also think I’d better plan on staying another night or two.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “Why did we ever think it would be as easy as tossing that thing in the loch?” Cate asked.

“Well, I must admit, I never expected this turn of events,” Jack said, motioning toward the necklace laying on the table.

“Neither did I. Let’s hope locking it up produces a better result.”

Jack swiped the large necklace off the table. “What about that?” he asked, pointing to the music box still on the desk.

“Maybe we should take it, too,” Cate said.

Jack nodded as Cate grabbed it from the desk. Leaving the pups behind, they ambled down the hall to the first-floor office. Cate unlocked the password- and thumbprint-protected safe and they stowed the items inside.

As Jack closed and locked the door, he shot Cate a sideways glance. “You okay?”

“Better now, actually,” Cate said. “At least they’re locked away where hopefully they can do no harm.”

Jack nodded at her.

“Time to do some work on our mystery!” Cate exclaimed, forcing a grin onto her face.

“If you need anything, Cate, and I mean anything – even if something just feels slightly off to you – call me, okay?”

“I will,” Cate promised.

Jack gave her a closed-mouth smile and a nod. He stepped toward the door. Cate remained still, staring at the safe. “You coming?”

“Yep,” she said, as she spun around. She smiled at him as they made their way into the hall and parted ways.

Cate arrived at the library and plopped onto the desk chair with a sigh. The packaging from her surprise gift still sat on top of the desk. With a frown, Cate gathered it and delivered it to the kitchen trash bin. She collected a cup of tea and returned to her work.

With her laptop open, Cate shuffled through the notes she’d compiled yesterday on Ruth Harper. She began with the first woman on her list. Born in 1920 in Edinburgh, this Ruth Harper lived with her parents, Elizabeth and William Harper, until her marriage in 1941, when she became Ruth MacArther.

Cate frowned at the marriage certificate information. After an hour of seeking reports, she’d been led to a dead-end. To be thorough, Cate checked that the woman remained married in subsequent years. She managed to follow her through the 1970s, when Ruth Harper MacArther passed away.

Cate scratched the woman off her list. If she married in 1941, she almost certainly wasn’t at Dunhaven Castle as a traveling companion in 1942 using her maiden name, particularly if her spouse remained alive.

“On to the next,” Cate said aloud.

She spent the rest of her morning tracking down information on her next potential suspect. She found nothing definitive before her staff lunch in the downstairs kitchen, and left the project in favor of her meal and a walk before returning in the mid-afternoon.

Cate stretched and settled in at her laptop. She found her eyelids growing heavy and a yawn escaped her lips. As the afternoon hours waned, she managed to find a death certificate for her current person of interest.

The second Ruth Harper had died in 1962. Given this information, she couldn't have been killed and buried at Dunhaven Castle in the 1940s. And since they clearly had this Ruth's body with a cause of death listed as "Stroke," she had not gone missing and been declared dead.

Cate put a thick strike through this woman's name and stretched before moving on to the next. As she pulled up the third Ruth Harper's birth records, a chill passed through her.

Cate shivered and wrapped her cardigan around her. She glanced to the fire, expecting to find it dying. Instead, a healthy orange glow emanated from inside the hearth.

Perhaps the steady rain that now fell from the gray skies added an extra chill to the air. Cate tossed another log onto the fire before returning to her work.

After several minutes of pawing through census records, Cate shivered again. She wrapped her sweater around herself again and moved closer to the fire, pulling a blanket over her lap.

Before she could settle in again, both Riley and Bailey leapt to their feet. "What is it, guys?" Cate inquired.

Both dogs stared at the closed library doors. Cate set her laptop down and flung her blanket to the side. She crossed to the door and peeked into the hall.

"Nothing's there!" she said.

Riley cocked his head at her before he stared into the hall again. Bailey sidestepped to get a better look into the hall. An icy blast of air washed over Cate, originating from the hall. As Cate peered through the doors again, both dogs bolted into the hall.

"Where are you two going?" Cate inquired, as they darted past her and fled down the hall.

"Riley! Bailey!" she shouted after them. The two pups turned the corner and continued to run headlong toward some unknown target.

Cate's shoulders slumped and she followed them into the hall. "Riley! Bailey!" she called again.

She turned the corner, finding them nowhere in sight. "Where did they run off to?" she asked herself, as she continued down the hall's length in search of them.

As she passed the office containing the safe, her footsteps slowed. She stared through the open door at the large black object.

Her head lolled to the side as she focused on the dark vault. The world melted around her. Her vision outside of her focal point blurred. Noises faded away, replaced by a light tinkling. She hummed along with the tune as she took a step toward the safe.

Her senses dulled as the music filled her mind.

CHAPTER 13

The corners of her mouth turned up as she lost herself in the tinkling tune that played in her mind. She closed her eyes and reached her hand out. An image formed in her mind. A room. Soft light glowed from above her.

“I’m here,” she mumbled.

“Lady Cate?” Jack’s voice called.

Cate’s smile faltered and her brow furrowed as the image splintered. In an instant, everything faded away. She jolted back to reality with a start.

The fog cleared from her mind, and she twirled to find Jack standing a few paces down the hall from her.

She sucked in a few breaths, her eyes darting around as her mind recovered.

Jack approached her. “Cate? You okay?”

“Yeah,” Cate assured him.

“What are you doing here?” Jack asked, his gaze flicking toward the safe.

Cate swallowed hard, following his eyes before she returned her gaze to Jack. “I was looking for the dogs.”

Jack’s eyebrow arched. “In the office?”

Cate offered a chuckle. “Ah, no. Well, yes. They darted around the corner, and I haven’t seen them since. I’m not sure where they are.”

“Well, they’re not in here,” Jack said, pulling the office door closed. “Want me to help find them?”

Cate pursed her lips and shook her head. “No, I’m sure they’ll turn up. I’m happy to wander the halls for a bit in search of them, though. I’m not making it very far with my Ruth Harper research.”

“No progress?” Jack inquired as they strode down the hall.

“Yeah, I crossed two of my four off the list so far. I guess that’s progress. Of the negative kind.”

“Progress is progress, I guess,” Jack said, as they rounded the corner into another hall.

“Well, two down, two to go. I think I’ll take a break for the night though and try again tomorrow.”

“Sounds like a plan,” Jack said.

The sound of skittering paws reached their ears. Riley and Bailey bounded around a corner and down the hall.

“There you are!” Cate exclaimed, as they raced toward them.

“Hey, Sir Riley, just where did you and your brother get off to?” Jack inquired, lifting the small dog into his arms. “You had poor Lady Cate worried!”

“Not worried, just curious!” she said as she scooped up Bailey.

“It’s almost time for dinner. Heading back to the library?” Jack asked.

“Do you think anyone would mind if I joined you for dinner?”

“No, not at all, Lady Cate,” Jack said. “Are you sure you’re all right?”

“I guess I’m just a little spooked by the events earlier today, to be honest. I’d love a distraction. Not that dining with everyone is just a distraction but...”

“I understand, Lady Cate. You don’t need to explain.”

They snaked through the halls and down to the kitchen.

“Hi, everyone,” Cate said, as she set Bailey on the floor near the warm stove.

“Lady Cate! To what do we owe the pleasure?” Mrs. Fraser inquired. “I hope you haven’t come down here in hopes of wrangling your own tray from Molly and carrying it upstairs.”

“No. I’ve actually come down in the hopes of saving everyone a trip and eating here.” Cate paused for a moment. “That is if no one minds.”

“Not at all,” Molly said with a smile.

Mrs. Fraser flicked her gaze to Cate and arched an eyebrow. “I dinnae mind. Are you sure you’re feeling all right, Lady Cate? You look a bit pale.”

Cate planted herself at the table. "Mrs. Fraser, I always look a bit pale."

"Paler than normal," Mrs. Fraser corrected, shooting her another look.

"Too much work and no play," Jack said as he settled across from Cate and rubbed Riley's belly.

"Probably," Cate said.

"Well," Mrs. Fraser said. "Young Jack told me about the leak. I'm concerned your worry over this old place is going to have you down with something, Lady Cate."

"Oh, I'm sure it'll clear up. I trust Jack."

"Mmm, I'm not saying you don't, but it is a lot to carry."

"Oh, Mrs. Fraser, just tell her," Molly said.

Mrs. Fraser harrumphed at Molly.

"Tell me what?" Cate asked, a concerned expression on her face.

"Miss Molly and I were discussing the leak. And I was concerned about something happening in the middle of the night. Young Jack would have his hands full. And..." Her voice trailed off.

"Oh, Mrs. Fraser," Molly said with a chuckle, as she set a salad in the center of the table. "Lady Cate, she wants to stay in the castle with Mr. Fraser in case the leak springs up."

"Oh," Cate said, "why didn't you just say so! Of course, you can. You know you're always welcome here."

"Well, I dinnae want to invite myself into your home," Mrs. Fraser said.

"Don't be ridiculous," Cate said, with a wave of her hand. "You don't need to ask. You can stay anytime you'd like! Bad weather, good weather, leak, no leak. I'm happy to have people here!"

Mrs. Fraser smiled at her as she settled in at the table.

"And I'm busy making sure Cate's not all work and no play," Molly said. "I'm almost done with our itinerary for the next few months!"

"What's on it?" Mr. Fraser inquired.

Molly rattled off several places. "And there's tons more. That's just what I remember off the top of my head. If anyone is interested in going with us to any of these, just let me know!"

"When do you have Loch Ness scheduled?" Jack inquired.

Molly responded, "September. Is that good for everyone? I figured after both parties would be a good time for a rest."

"Aye, perfect," Jack agreed.

“Yes, a nice respite after the Presidents’ Ball and before the second annual Halloween Ball,” Cate said.

“Oh, no, please don’t tell me she’s already brought that up,” Jack said.

“She has,” Cate said with a laugh. “Her words were ‘bigger and better.’”

“Oh, I’ll bet they were,” Jack said with a groan.

The conversation centered around the upcoming events and how Dunhaven Castle was quickly becoming the party capital of the area.

“Soon, you’ll be renting out for weddings,” Jack said.

“No,” Cate answered, with her eyebrows hiked high. “That’s where I draw the line.”

“Aw, come on, Lady Cate,” Jack teased. “Every little girl dreams of a fairy tale wedding at a castle. Are you going to crush their dreams?”

“I just might,” Cate said with a chuckle. “I’m not certain that’s something any of us want to get into.”

“Not me,” Mrs. Fraser said. “I would want no parts of people traipsing everywhere here for their wedding.”

“Aye, I agree with Emily,” Mr. Fraser said. “These grounds are unspoiled. And I like them that way.”

“Me too,” Cate said with a smile. “While I don’t mind the parties, I’m not sure I want those interruptions on a regular basis.”

“Well, you have our support on that decision, Lady Cate,” Jack said with a nod.

With the matter settled, they steered the conversation to other topics. The shared dinner allowed Cate to push both mysteries from her mind. She hoped the meal provided her with enough relaxation to fall asleep quickly. She’d even avoided asking Mrs. Fraser about the intelligence base so as not to stir up her mind.

She spent the rest of the evening helping Mrs. Fraser settle in while Mr. Fraser retrieved their things.

As she climbed into her bed and slipped between the sheets, she worked to push any remnants of the two dilemmas away.

The moon hung low in the night sky as Cate stared out over the moors, bathed in an ethereal white light. She turned onto her side, squeezing her eyes shut. Within moments, she was spinning the other way. She spent the first hour tossing and turning in search of a comfortable sleeping position, but found none.

As she flopped onto her back, Cate's mind centered on one thing. The piano-shaped music box currently housed in the downstairs safe. The little tinkling tune ricocheted in her mind. It was a lovely little tune, Cate thought. Perhaps it could help her sleep. Yes, she mused, the little tune may help her fall asleep.

Cate rose from her bed and wrapped her robe around her, shoving her feet into her fluffy slippers. She shuffled across her room and threaded through the halls toward the back stairs. After padding down them and to the office, Cate flicked on the light, her attention focused on the safe across the room.

Movement caught her eye, and she leapt back a step, her eyes wide with fear and her heart pounding. After a moment, she breathed a sigh of relief with her hand pressed against her chest.

"Lady Cate," Jack said, as he rose from the desk chair. "Fancy meeting you here."

"Oh, Jack, you scared me. What are you doing here?"

"What are you doing here?" Jack shot back.

"Uh," Cate said, giving a hard swallow. "I was just going to double-check that the music box and necklace were still in the safe."

"They are," Jack assured her, stepping between her and the safe.

Cate smiled at him. "Good. That's good."

"You can sleep soundly knowing they are still locked up tight."

Cate licked her lips and nodded but didn't budge. Jack raised his eyebrows at her, crossing his arms over his chest. "Did you need something else?"

"No," Cate said, with a slight shake of her head. After a moment, she added, "I couldn't sleep."

Jack's expression softened. "Care for a cuppa and a biscuit?"

"Umm," Cate hedged. "No, thanks."

"Okay, though I can't believe you're turning down one of Mrs. Fraser's shortbreads. But okay. How about if I walk you back to your room?"

"That's not necessary," Cate said with a chuckle.

Jack narrowed his eyes at her. "Cate, did you come down here for the necklace?" he asked.

"No," Cate said with a shake of her head. "You know what, I think I will take you up on that offer."

Jack nodded his head and led Cate from the room to the kitchen. Cate gave one wistful glance at the safe as Jack flicked off the room's lights.

"You sure you're okay, Cate?" he asked, as they traversed the halls.

"I'm sure. Just couldn't sleep," Cate admitted.

Jack bustled about the kitchen making Cate a late-night cup of tea. As they cleaned up, Jack inquired, "Do you think you can sleep now?"

Cate stretched and faked a yawn. "I think so. Thanks, Jack." She took a few steps toward the door.

"Wait just a moment, lassie," Jack said. "I'll walk up with you."

Cate shoulders slumped, but she twisted to face Jack, plastered a smile on her face and nodded. Jack accompanied her on the walk upstairs, eyeing her as she waved goodnight and closed the door to her suite.

The smile quickly faded from her face as the door shut. She puckered her lips and narrowed her eyes. She inched sideways away from the door but remained with her ear pressed against the wall leading to the hall. After a few moments, she heard the click of a door closing.

A grin formed on her lips. She waited an extra few seconds before she crept back to her door and eased it open. She peered into the hall. Jack's door was closed.

Cate swung her door open further and tiptoed into the hallway. She crept past the bedrooms used by Jack, Mr. and Mrs. Fraser and Molly. As she slipped past the last doorway, she picked up her pace, hastening down the remainder of the hall and around the corner.

She skidded to a halt, her arms held up in defense, as a large dark figure approached her. Hands clamped down around her shoulders and she was driven back several steps. She let out a yip as she fought to free herself.

"Going somewhere, Lady Cate?" Jack inquired.

She gasped in a breath before she explained. "Yes, I thought we may have left the stove on..."

"No, you didn't," Jack interrupted.

"Yes, I..."

"You know very well I turned the stove off. And the water. And put everything away."

"I didn't..."

"Cate," Jack said, his hands still firmly clasping her shoulders, "you're not telling the truth. You're after that necklace, aren't you?"

"No, I'm not!" Cate exclaimed, wrenching herself free from his grasp.

“No? Then what? Why are you sneaking around the halls at this hour?”

“I’m hardly sneaking,” she said, crossing her arms. “I couldn’t sleep, and I often walk the halls. I’m usually not policed though.”

“I’m sorry,” Jack said. “I don’t mean to police you. I’m just worried, that’s all.”

“There’s nothing to worry about,” Cate answered. “I’m just restless.”

“That necklace is having a terrible effect on you. I think we should remove it from the house. I’m not sure Damien’s suggestion is helping.”

“No!” Cate shouted. She lowered her panicked voice before continuing. “I mean, it’s not that. It is, but not in the way you think. And even if it was, is it really hurting me? All I do is put it on and wander around.”

Jack cocked his head and narrowed his eyes. “Cate, you have no memory of anything you do while you’re wearing it. You’re wandering could get you harmed. And who are you looking for? What happens if you find him? I don’t want you lost for days again. Cate...” His voice trailed off.

Cate bit her lower lip as tears formed in her eyes. “I don’t want that either.”

Jack put his hands around her shoulders again. “Oh, Cate. If the necklace is bothering you, just tell me.”

“It’s not,” she admitted. “I’m being honest. I just...” Cate’s voice trailed off as she considered admitting her desire to hear the music box. “I guess in a way, it is. I just want it dealt with and off our minds.”

Jack nodded and sighed. “Me too, Lady Cate, me too. And until then, I don’t want anything to happen to you.”

Cate stared up at him for a moment. “Well, I guess roaming the halls isn’t helping to solve anything. I’m going to go back to bed and try to get some sleep.”

“Okay.”

“You should, too. Really, I’m fine. I feel terrible keeping you awake.”

Jack smiled at her. “I’m okay, but I am going to bed. I hope you sleep, Lady Cate.”

Cate smiled at him before she strode down the hall and entered her bedroom for the third time that night. She leaned against the door as she sighed and stared up at the ceiling.

A thudding pounded at her temples. She hated lying to Jack, but she couldn’t tell him the truth. He’d never let her near the music box even if she was honest.

Cate stalked to her chaise and sank onto it. She cupped her chin in her palm and steadied her elbow on her knee. She checked the timepiece before she returned to staring at the door.

Cate waited an hour before she crept to the door again. With a quick peek into the hall, she stepped out and eased the door shut behind her. Her eyes studied each door. Satisfied no one lurked behind one waiting to spring out at her, she tiptoed down the hall.

She approached the corner slowly and peered around it. No one stood in the hallway this time. The corners of her mouth turned up again as she hurried down the hall, back stairs and to the office.

Devoid of anyone, she flipped the lights on and hurried to the safe. She tapped in the five-digit code and pressed her thumb against the scanner. A beep sounded and the light changed from red to green. Cate's heart skipped a beat as she anticipated collecting the music box. Her breathing increased and she grinned as she pulled the safe door open.

CHAPTER 14

Her smile faded, concern creeping into her features as the interior of the safe came into view. Her lower lip trembled as her brow furrowed. Her breath caught in her throat and her stomach turned over.

“No!” she exclaimed, reaching into the safe and shoving items around. “Where is it?”

She stared in at the nearly empty interior. Her old timepiece sat on the top shelf, a few folders of important paperwork lay below. But the music box and necklace were gone.

“Looking for something, Lady Cate?” Jack inquired from behind her.

Cate spun to face him, a frown on her lips. “Where is it?” she demanded.

“Somewhere safe.”

Cate pressed her lips together into a thin line. Her hands balled into fists. “Where?” she asked again, her voice quavering.

“Cate...” he began.

“No!” she interrupted. “I want it.”

Jack approached her, holding his hands in front of him. He shook his head. “Cate...” he tried again, keeping his tone as even and soothing as he could. He placed his hands on her shoulders. “Leave it alone.”

Tears formed in Cate’s eyes. “I want it. I need to see it!” she said, as a sob formed.

“No, Cate,” Jack answered. “It’s not safe for you to see it.”

“I just want the music box, that’s all,” Cate said.

“I realize you’re going to hate me for this, Cate, but I don’t think I should.”

Cate bit her lower lip as she sucked in a shaky breath. “I know,” she said, her face a mask of pain. After a moment, she grasped Jack’s arm. “What’s wrong with me?”

“Nothing,” he assured her, as he pulled her into an embrace. Cate laid her head on his chest as she fought back tears. “Let’s get you another cup of tea.”

She pulled back and shook her head. “No, I’ve kept you up half the night already. I’ll just go back to my room.”

“It’s fine, Cate,” he assured her, grasping her hand and tugging her from the room.

“Wait,” she said, stepping back to close the safe.

After making a cup of tea, Jack and Cate settled in the generous leather armchairs in the library. Jack built a fire. They attempted to sort through some of their mystery from decades ago. With the conversation, Cate eventually dozed off in her armchair.

* * *

Cate’s eyes opened slowly as dull light streamed in through the large library windows. She blinked several times as she oriented herself. After peeling her face from the leather chair, she stretched and yawned.

She peered around in the dim light. Jack’s sleeping form huddled in the armchair next to her. With another stretch, Cate pulled back the blanket Jack must have draped over her at some point and rose to stand, her arms reaching high overhead.

After another yawn, she rubbed at her face before folding the blanket and giving Jack a soft shake.

“Huh? What?” he asked.

“Jack,” she whispered. “It’s morning.”

Jack’s eyes opened and he blinked a few times, searching the space. He offered a sleepy sniff before he stretched and yawned. “Good morning, m’lady,” he said as he stood.

“Good morning,” she said, as she folded his blanket. “Thanks for covering me last night.”

“You’re welcome. You finally fell asleep around one.”

Cate heaved a sigh. “I’m sorry,” she said. “I just couldn’t get my mind off that music box.”

“It’s okay, Cate. It’s not your fault. With any luck, we’ll get some information from Damien today, and maybe we can put this thing behind us.”

Cate yawned again. “Gosh, I hope so. I don’t want to keep you up for another night.”

“Don’t worry about that Lady Cate,” Jack said with a half-smile. “I just don’t want to see you so upset.”

“It’s odd,” Cate admitted. “At times it doesn’t bother me, but then it will pervade my thoughts. I can’t stop thinking about that music or hearing it in my head. It’s like a craving where I need to hear the music box.”

Jack narrowed his eyes. “What about the necklace?”

Cate shook her head. “That didn’t seem to be on my mind. Just the music box.”

“That’s odd,” Jack said. “Are both enchanted?”

Cate shrugged. “Maybe once I had the music box I would also want the necklace. I’m not sure.”

“I’m not sure I want to find out,” Jack admitted.

“Me either.”

“Will you be all right for now?”

“So far, so good,” Cate said. “I feel fine. No overwhelming urges to claw through the walls to find the music box.”

“Well, given the rain today,” Jack said, eyeing the dark clouds, “I can keep an eye on you.”

Cate sighed and rolled her eyes. “I never thought at this age I’d need a babysitter.”

“You also never thought you’d time travel or meet a warlock, but here we are.”

The last statement earned a chuckle from Cate. “Very true,” Cate said. “Anyway, I’m fine for now, but I’ll see you later for whatever it is you’re doing inside today.”

“Maybe I’ll build a puzzle,” Jack quipped.

Cate raised her eyebrows. “Oh, taking a vacation day, huh?”

“Sick day. Someone kept me up half the night.”

Cate offered him a wry glance and a head shake. “See you later, Jack.”

Cate wandered up to her bedroom, finding her two furry friends still sprawled on her bed. Bailey lay stretched on his side, and Riley, in true Snoopy style, lay on his back, his front legs stuck in the air, his floppy ears flung out across the duvet.

“Glad to see you two had no trouble sleeping without me,” she said, as she stalked into the room.

At the sound of her voice, Bailey’s tail gave a weak wag. Riley spun onto his belly and glanced up at Cate. “I’ll be ready soon,” she announced, as she sauntered around the room for her morning routine.

When she was finished, she ushered the dogs outside before her breakfast. The warm smell of cinnamon greeted her the moment she stepped back inside through the kitchen door.

“Mmmm, that smells amazing, whatever it is,” Cate said.

“Snickerdoodles,” Molly reported, as she peered in through the oven’s window.

“That’s what happens when I stay at the castle,” Mrs. Fraser said with a nod. “I’m up early baking.”

Cate crinkled her forehead. “You’re up early baking even when you don’t stay,” she said.

“Aye, but I’m baking more. Snickerdoodles and shortbreads. Seems someone’s been robbing my tin! I’d wager it’s young Jack.”

Cate winced. “And me,” she admitted. “I had a sleepless night, and Jack and I may have hit up the cookies once or twice.”

Mrs. Fraser’s eyes went wide in mock surprise. “Lady Cate! I’m shocked!”

Cate chuckled.

“More problems with the leak last night?”

“No,” Cate admitted. “But both of us found ourselves roaming the halls just in case.”

“Well, I hope my shortbreads helped put you back to sleep.”

“They did,” Cate assured her, as she collected her tray before ascending to the library to eat.

Cate stared out over the gray skies as she ate. Thunder rumbled in the distance, giving Riley a start. When the grumble died down, he flopped back down for a morning nap next to Bailey, who remained unbothered by the noise.

Cate popped her laptop open as she ate to check her emails. She fought to keep her mind off of her evening escapades the previous night. Where had Jack hidden the necklace and the music box, she wondered? And how had he anticipated that she'd search for it?

She supposed her recent obsession with the necklace, coupled with its mysterious reappearance was enough to warrant his actions. She hoped it didn't make the situation worse. Cate leaned back in her chair, studying the clouds zipping past the window. Images of her roaming the castle, pawing through every imaginable hidden area bounced around in her mind. She pictured herself returning to her bedroom with cobwebs in her hair and dirt smudges on her cheeks.

She shook the images from her mind as a knock sounded at the door.

"Still feeling okay?" Jack asked as he strode in.

"Yes," Cate answered with a nod.

"Molly'll be up soon to get your tray. She's taking cookies out of the oven. I didn't wait in case..." He didn't finish the statement.

"It's fine," she said, with a wave of her hand. "I was just pondering my behavior last night and wondering if it will worsen."

"How so?" Jack asked, as he opened a cabinet in the library and removed a box.

"Obviously I was intent on finding that music box last night. How far will I go? Will I begin roaming the halls and secret passages? Clawing at the walls?"

"Hmm, good question. I hope not, but now that you know it's hidden, will you go to extreme measures to find it?"

Molly flitted into the room as Jack finished his statement. "Good morning, again," she said in her cheery voice. "Looks like you won't be able to take your morning walk of the property."

"No," Cate said, with a dejected shake of her head. "Oh well, maybe I can make a killing on my research."

"What are you on to now?" Molly asked.

"World War Two era Dunhaven," Cate reported. "I think there may have been an intelligence base here."

"Really?" Molly asked, her eyebrows shooting upward. "That's interesting."

“Yes, I’m only just scratching the surface, so I have plenty more to learn.”

“Well, I’ll leave you to it. That is if Jack doesn’t take up all your time discussing estate business.”

“Estate business is just as important. Perhaps more so!”

“Uh-huh,” Molly said, with a wry glance at him. “Better you than me, Lady Cate.” She winked at Cate before disappearing through the door with the tray.

Cate closed the doors behind her as Jack settled into his favorite armchair.

“I sometimes feel bad about how good we are at lying to people,” Cate said with a sigh.

“I’m not lying. I’m working on Dunhaven Castle.”

Cate scrunched up her face at the statement. Jack pulled the lid off his puzzle box and flashed it at Cate. A large picture of Dunhaven Castle graced the front. A printed yellow puzzle piece announced the one thousand pieces to be found inside the box.

“Where did you get that?” Cate inquired.

“Mr. Smythe gave it to me for Christmas,” Jack answered. “Him and his puzzles. I think he was rather regretful to give it away and not complete it himself.”

“When you’re finished, you can break it apart and put it back in the box for him to complete the next time he’s here,” Cate said.

“If I finish, Lady Cate, if.”

Cate chuckled at his statement as she settled in at her desk. Jack twisted to eye her. “I thought you’d help me,” Jack said.

“Maybe later,” Cate said. “I hope to figure out if one of these Ruth Harpers is the one we found in the garden first.”

“Oh,” Jack groaned, heaving a large sigh. “I’m on my own. I hate puzzles.”

Cate glanced over her shoulder. “Get all the edge pieces out first and build that. Maybe by then I’ll be finished.”

Jack offered another sigh as he sorted through pieces. “You know, I feel perfectly fine. You don’t have to stay and build that puzzle.”

“Sure, sure,” Jack said. “And then I’ll be changing a light bulb and see you wandering past in search of the music box.”

“Just hop off the ladder and grab me then.”

“Very funny, Lady Cate,” Jack said. “No chance. I’m not taking a chance I don’t see you in time and you get hurt. Plus, I’d like to gather as much information about what’s happening from the moment it happens.”

“What do you mean?” Cate asked.

“I mean, is there some trigger that causes you to turn from Lady Cate to Zombie Cate? A noise, a scent, something you see.”

“Oh,” Cate said, nodding in understanding.

“I hope Damien and his friends come up with something for us, but if they don’t, I want to have as much information as possible to create a backup plan.”

Cate nodded again. “Thanks, Jack.”

“Well, I’m tasked with protecting you and I’m not about to fall down on the job.”

“I think when that pact was made, they didn’t anticipate enchanted music boxes and warlocks.”

“Doesn’t matter,” Jack said, as he dug through pieces in the box. “Time travel, warlocks, enchanted music boxes, white water rafting, rock climbing...”

“Whoa,” Cate said, waving her hands in the air. “I’m drawing the line at enchanted music boxes. No white water rafting or rock climbing for me.”

“Fair enough,” Jack said. “To be honest, I’d rather not rock climb either. I don’t even like flying, let alone dangling from a rock.”

Cate chuckled. “Okay, I’ll leave you to your edges.” She spun to face her laptop, tapping around to open her notes and several websites.

Cate spent several of the morning hours tracking down information on her last two leads. The first woman married in 1947, had three children, and passed away in the 1970s. Cate scratched her name off the list and moved on to her last Ruth Harper.

Born on 1 February, 1919, Ruth Harper disappeared shortly after. Cate’s pulse quickened as she searched for records and found none. Perhaps this was her Ruth Harper. No marriage records existed for the woman, so her name had not changed. No death records existed in the UK. Could this Ruth Harper have come to Dunhaven and disappeared, therefore never having a death certificate recorded?

CHAPTER 15

Cate bit her lower lip as she searched for more information on the promising lead. A sigh emanated from the other side of the room.

Cate glanced at Jack, who frowned down at the pieces spread across the table in front of him. Riley lounged on his lap.

“I hope you’re having more luck than me,” Jack said.

“I may be!” Cate answered. “I have a Ruth Harper who has disappeared.”

“That sounds promising!”

“I have a few more places to check for her, but I think so. No luck with the puzzle?”

“The edge pieces all look alike. I can’t even tell the corners apart. And Riley isn’t much help.”

“Sorry,” Cate said. “I think Bailey is more of the puzzle solver.”

“Do you want to help, Bailey?” Jack prodded. The dog lifted his gray and white head and glanced sideways at Jack before he lowered his head to the floor. “I’ll take that as a no.”

“I’ll help you as soon as I’ve finished here.”

“Thank goodness,” Jack said. “Otherwise, I’m fairly certain I’ll fail miserably.”

“If I’ve found our lady, I will happily help!”

Cate returned her attention to her laptop. With no marriage records or death records in the UK for her latest Ruth, she double-checked the census reports. Born in 1919, her first census report following Ruth’s birth was dated 1921. Nearly two-year-old Ruth was reported as living with her parents, Theodore and Elizabeth Harper. Other children listed within the home included Ruth's six older siblings: Stephen, Lois, Henry, Harriet, Evelyn, and Eleanor.

No mention of the Harpers was made in the subsequent census of 1931. Cate expanded her search to several other venues. A frown crossed her face as she came across Ruth Harper's name in another database.

She pulled up the record and compared it to the 1921 census. One Ruth Harper was listed arriving at Ellis Island in October of 1925. She traveled with her mother, Elizabeth, and six siblings. They were to join their father, Theodore, already stateside since 1922.

Cate's shoulders slumped. No marriage or death records existed in the UK for this Ruth Harper because she had emigrated to the United States at the age of six.

Cate followed up on US records, finding that Ruth did not return to her home country, but remained in the United States for the duration of her life.

With a groan, she closed her laptop and scratched the last name off the list.

"That sounded terrible," Jack said, as he studied the table, his chin resting in his palm.

"There goes my last Ruth Harper," Cate said, as she stood and stretched.

"What happened to her?"

"She went to the United States at the age of six."

"Darn her," Jack said, sliding puzzle pieces aimlessly around.

"She was my best lead," Cate said as she flopped into the other armchair, pulling her legs underneath her.

"None of the others are any good?"

"Nope," Cate answered. "They've all got solid death records and marriages that rule them out." She shook her head. "And now this one had to go and move on us."

"Traitor," Jack said, with a shake of his head.

"So, as usual, we'll be exploring in the past with little to no clue as to what may have happened."

"No different from usual. Hey," Jack said, snapping his fingers, "you don't think she's..."

"She's what?" Cate inquired, screwing up her face as she picked up the puzzle's box top.

Jack pursed his lips before continuing. “Maybe I’m way off-base but... the last time you couldn’t find anything about the people from the past, it was because half of them were immortals, and the other half were time travelers.”

Cate furrowed her brow. “But...” She shrugged as she parsed through it. “Okay, she couldn’t be an immortal, otherwise...”

“She wouldn’t be dead,” Jack said.

“Right,” Cate answered. She connected two edge pieces together and slid them to attach to a corner piece.

Jack wrinkled his nose at Cate’s progress.

“But...” Cate continued, the crease between her eyebrows deepening as she stared at the pieces. “I suppose Ruth Harper could be a time traveler.”

“Which means Ruth Harper could be a fake name and you could be looking for the woman in the wrong century.”

Cate snapped another three pieces together and slid them across the table. “How common do you think time traveling is?” she questioned, pulling several puzzle pieces toward her and studying them.

“I’m not sure,” Jack answered. “Maybe this is a question for Damien. Do you think he’d have any insight?”

“Maybe,” Cate said, adding more pieces to her three-piece chain.

Jack’s jaw unhinged. “How are you doing this?”

“Doing what?” Cate asked, as she shoved a lock of hair behind her ear and crossed the room to retrieve her phone from the desk.

“Building this puzzle? It’s impossible.”

“It’s definitely difficult,” Cate admitted, as she swiped into her phone, “but not impossible.”

“All the pieces look the same!”

“No they don’t,” Cate replied with a chuckle. “See, these two fit – see how the shapes are the same?”

“No,” Jack said, with a shake of his head.

Cate shrugged as her thumbs flew across her virtual keyboard. “I’m good at puzzles.”

Jack continued to try his hand at fitting edge pieces together while Cate fired a message across the pond. “I sent a message to Damien about your theory.”

Cate managed to finish one entire edge before her phone chimed.

“I’m really starting to detest your puzzle-building skills, Lady Cate,” Jack said as she fiddled with her phone. “You make it look way too easy.”

Cate shook her head at him and studied her phone. “Okay, Damien says it’s not very common, though given the history surrounding Dunhaven, he wouldn’t be surprised.” Cate frowned. “Which means we’ll be doing most of our work back in the past.”

“No change from normal then,” Jack said with a sigh.

“It’s amazing how much history is lost over the years,” Cate said in agreement, when her phone chimed again. “It’s another message from Damien. He says that reminded him of another solution to our problem. Getting rid of an enchanted object is no small feat, but lessening the effects may be possible if we simply go back to another time period.”

“What?” Jack said, his expression incredulous.

Cate lifted a shoulder and offered him a confused glance. “He’s typing again. But yes, his first message says they haven’t made any progress so far because enchanted objects are difficult to destroy. He’s assuming the duke’s enchantment would be fairly powerful given what they know about him. He also says Celine’s inquiry fell flat.”

Jack pursed his lips as they waited for the next message to come through. A new bubble popped onto the screen and Cate studied it. Her posture stiffened and her jaw dropped open.

“What is it?” Jack inquired.

Cate shook her head and blinked her eyes at the message as if to confirm what she was reading. She stammered around for a moment, before she explained her shocked expression to Jack.

“He says…” Cate paused and gave another shake of her head. “I can’t believe I’m about to read this statement to you. He says, and I’m quoting here, ‘It worked for Michael when he was bitten by a vampire. We went back to the 1790s and he had no ill-effects like he did in our current time.’”

“What?” Jack exclaimed. “Bitten by a vampire? Is he joking?”

“I don’t think he is,” Cate said, with a shake of her head.

Jack took a deep inhale, his eyebrows raised high. “Well, I suppose that’s a solution then,” he said, after a few moments of silence. “We can hope our time travel keeps the enchantment at bay.”

Cate nodded in silent response. Another moment passed before Jack spoke again. “Why do they say those things like it’s completely normal?”

Cate chuckled. "I'm not sure, but they must lead fantastically interesting lives. I cannot even imagine."

"I don't want to imagine. The revelation of time travel was enough for me. I nearly lost my marbles when we added the existence of supernatural creatures. And now this?"

Cate shrugged again. "I suppose vampires are not much of a stretch when you consider we've met supernatural creatures in the form of witches and warlocks."

"I hope they keep them on that side of the pond," Jack said with a shiver.

Cate returned to working on the puzzle after sending a brief reply text to Damien.

"I suppose given your lack of progress on research and Damien's latest message, we should discuss returning to 1942," Jack said.

"Yes," Cate agreed. "And it seems like we'll have to take our chances with showing our too-young faces to the family."

"Aye. Information is in short supply," Jack agreed.

"Should we go today?" Cate asked. "Or are you calling in sick for that, too?"

Jack sucked in air before he replied. "Well, I usually like twenty-four hours' notice so I can fret for a full day before a trip, but I suppose there's no time like the present. Particularly if it prevents you from going haywire over that music box and necklace."

"After lunch then," Cate proposed.

Riley lifted his head from Jack's knee and glanced at the closed library door. His nose wiggled as he sniffed the air. "What is it, Sir Riley? Lunch on its way already?" Jack asked as he stroked his back.

Bailey rose to his feet, stretched, and stared at the door. Riley leapt from Jack's lap and circled around the chairs to stare at the door again. His feather-like tail gave a slow wag as he continued to sniff.

"What's with you two?" Cate asked.

"They must smell something fantastic from the kitchen," Jack suggested.

"This is the first time they've ever acted like this," Cate said.

Riley raced to the closed doors and scratched his paw against it. He stuck his nose in the small crack between the doors and sniffed. Bailey hurried toward the doors, sticking his nose underneath to sniff.

Cate crinkled her brow before she glanced at Jack and shrugged. She shuffled to the doors and pulled them open. The dogs raced from the library and disappeared down the hall.

“Headed for the kitchen?” Jack inquired, as he snapped two puzzle pieces together.

“No, the opposite way, actually,” Cate said as she stared after them.

Jack glanced at her and raised his eyebrows. “Why?”

“I have no idea,” Cate answered.

Jack stood with a huff. “And just as I was making progress on this puzzle.”

“You can stay and keep working,” Cate said.

“No thanks, Lady Cate. I’d rather find out why your dogs are racing around the castle.”

“Maybe you don’t,” Cate said, as she stepped into the hall. “Last time they were interested in something, they found a body.”

“Very true, Lady Cate, very true. Let’s hope they haven’t found another.”

“Though I suppose it’s best to know if they have,” Cate said, as they rounded the corner into the hallway containing the office she’d raided last night.

They continued through the hallways as Cate called to the two pups. They turned the corner and passed through another hall. The dogs raced toward them. Riley leapt onto his hind legs, dancing in front of them with excitement.

“What’s got you all riled up, buddy?” Cate inquired.

Bailey pranced around at their feet, before letting out a long howl and jumping to his hind legs to wave his front paws.

“My goodness, Bailey! Why are you singing?” Cate inquired of him.

His curly tail wagged excitedly.

“What’s got them so wound up?” Jack inquired.

“I’m not sure,” Cate admitted. She continued a few paces down the hall toward where they’d come from. Her footsteps slowed as she approached the end.

“What is it?” Jack asked, noting her hesitance.

“The door to the west wing is open again!”

“What?” Jack exclaimed, hurrying down the hall to catch up with Cate as she approached the open west wing doors. The dogs trotted behind.

They approached the double doors. One stood partially ajar.

"I locked this!" Jack said, his brow furrowing.

"I watched you," Cate responded. The two dogs stared into the large hallway beyond the door. Bailey's tail gave another wag and the two of them barreled through the open doorway and down the hall, disappearing around a corner. "This must be where they're going. How long has it been open again, I wonder?"

"I've no idea, but I don't like this. I locked this door. And this is the second time we've found it open. And what are the dogs after in there?"

"Should we follow them in to find out?"

"Yes, I think so," Jack answered with a nod of his head.

Cate ventured in through the door with Jack behind her, still studying the unlocked and open door. He swung the door shut behind them and jiggled it. "Seems to latch properly."

"Perhaps the lock isn't working," Cate suggested.

"Even if that were the case," Jack answered, "how are the dogs opening it? It's latched." He jiggled the door again. "It's not opening even with me pushing on it. So a gust of wind blowing it open doesn't make sense. And besides, where would there be a gust of wind here? This wing is closed off."

Cate tried the door handle herself. It held firm. "It makes no sense. How is the door getting opened then?"

"I don't know. But I don't like it."

"Well, I suppose we won't solve that mystery at the moment. Perhaps we'll determine the source of the dogs' interest, though."

Jack gave the door another leery glance as he swung it open again and continued down the long hall with Cate. Large windows allowed light to filter into the massive hallway. The chandeliers hanging from above remained dark as they continued to the corner they'd seen the dogs disappear around moments ago.

As they rounded it, the two furry animals raced toward them.

"Where were you?" Cate asked. While still excited, they were not as exuberant as they had been moments ago. Riley leapt onto his hind legs, placing his paws on Cate's thigh in a request to be picked up.

"Show me where you were first," Cate tried.

Riley pawed at her again. "Come on, buddy, what's so interesting over here?"

Bailey stood firm, glancing around but appearing uninterested in anything at the moment. Cate gave in and lifted Riley into her arms. "I suppose we'll have to explore on our own since neither of you are talking," Cate said.

Jack scooped up Bailey and patted him on the head. The little dog bared his bottom teeth in what Cate termed a "smile." "It looks like Bailey isn't going to help either."

Cate shook her head. "No, we're on our own. If we're lucky, maybe we'll stumble across whatever caught their interest and they'll perk up."

They wandered down the length of the hall. Cate peered into a few darkened rooms, but nothing stirred Riley, who lounged in her arms on his back like a baby. While Bailey curiously peered around from Jack's arms, he remained indifferent to their surroundings.

They continued around the hall, peeking into a music hall along the way. A large white sheet covered a grand piano near an ornate white and gold-trimmed fireplace. White walls, decorated with gold filigree and gold chandeliers graced the space.

Cate strode into the ornate room, gazing up at its tray ceiling decorated with gold trim, and the polished parquet floors, still gleaming despite the age.

"Wow," she murmured as she exited the space.

"Don't let Mrs. Campbell see this," Jack said, as he pulled the door shut behind them.

"No kidding," Cate said.

"She'll have ten concerts scheduled before the year is out."

"I'm surprised she hasn't mentioned exploring these wings for the Presidents' Ball," Cate mentioned, as they meandered further down the hall.

"Give her time. She's probably working on that right now. You haven't met with her for over a week, so I'm afraid to find out what she has in store for your next meeting."

"I'm surprised she hasn't scheduled it already," Cate said, as they approached a set of ornate gold doors.

"She's probably texting you as we speak," Jack said.

Cate chuckled at the statement, mostly because it was likely true. She couldn't imagine making it through the week without hearing from Mrs. Campbell.

“Actually, I wouldn’t be upset about hearing from her. I’d like to ask her about wartime Dunhaven. Sometimes she’ll have a tidbit or two that will help us in our investigation.”

“Aye, that she may,” Jack said.

“And honestly, I’m not sure I would object to opening this wing for the party.”

“Now you’re talking crazy, Lady Cate,” Jack objected.

“I’m not. That room is beautiful. It should be used!”

“So it was,” Jack admitted. “Though I’m not certain I want strangers traipsing all over the castle.”

“I think it’s worth a mention to Mrs. Campbell,” Cate said, as Jack swung open the curved gold door and they entered the large space. “Though I’m certain I’ll regret it later.”

Cate scanned the new space. Riley fidgeted in her arms as she stepped inside. “Wow,” Cate said, her voice echoing off the golden walls. Accented in red and teal, large columns rose from the mirrored floor to hold the gold-paneled ceiling at bay.

In Jack’s arms, Bailey also wriggled around. They each set the dogs down. Riley and Bailey pressed their noses to the floor and raced around the room.

“Is this the source of their curiosity?” Jack asked.

Cate’s eyes still studied the room. Riley crossed the room and pawed at something, but left it within seconds in favor of pummeling Bailey, who offered a playful growl from his play-bow stance.

The two dogs frolicked around the room as Cate’s brow furrowed. A scent wafted to her nostrils: musky, warm and sweet. Cate’s mind scrambled to place the scent. Images flitted around on the edge of her brain, just out of reach.

CHAPTER 16

The golden room sparkled in front of her. Her senses dulled and a tinkling sound replaced the noise of dog claws scraping against the slick surface. Jack's voice echoed, sounding distant and static-filled.

Cate's body jolted. "Cate!" Jack said again. Cate blinked and sucked in a breath as the other world shattered to pieces around her.

The confused expression on her face deepened as she stared up at Jack. With his hands on her shoulders, his face was filled with concern. Riley and Bailey stood at her feet, peering up at her.

"What?" she inquired.

"What? What happened?"

Cate lifted a shoulder and dropped it in response. "I'm not sure what you mean."

"I asked you a question and you didn't answer. You were standing there like a zombie. I had to shake you to get any response."

"I don't remember any of that. Just..."

"Just what?" Jack asked as her voice trailed off, leaving the statement unfinished.

Cate's gaze fell to the shiny floor. She caught a reflection of herself in it. A flash of blue caught her eye. She tilted her head further, searching for the color.

"Cate!" Jack shouted at her again, grasping hold of her before she pitched forward, headfirst, toward the floor below.

"Huh?" Cate said.

“That’s it. I think we should leave.”

Cate swallowed hard. “I’m sorry,” she said. “I thought I saw something in the floor.”

“Saw something?”

“In the reflection. Blue.”

“Blue?” Jack asked as he searched around the space. “Like the color there, near the ceiling?”

Cate shook her head. “No, blue. Like sapphire blue. It floated past in the reflection like fabric fluttering in a breeze.”

Jack’s eyebrows twitched as he shook his head. Neither of them wore blue, and no blue items existed within the space.

“I don’t see anything blue, but like I said, I think we should leave. You nearly took a header into the floor, Cate. You were like a zombie again.”

Cate scrunched up her face. “But why?”

“Maybe it’s another attack from the music box?” Jack suggested. “Either way, I’d like to get you back to the main castle.”

Cate shook her head as Jack stepped toward the exit.

“No. It’s something about this room,” she insisted. She spun to search it again. “But what?”

Jack approached her, eyeing her then the space. “Something about this room?”

“Yes,” Cate said. “I...” Her voice cut off again.

“You what? What is it, Cate? Tell me whatever you’re thinking so we can figure this out.”

She sucked in a few breaths before shaking her head again. “It’s gone.” With a glance at Jack and a sigh, she added, “I can’t remember anything now.”

Jack rubbed the back of his neck as he considered the latest twist. “Come on,” he said after a moment. “Let’s get you back to the library. It’s nearly time for lunch. We can discuss this while we eat.”

He gently grabbed hold of her arm and tugged her away from the space. The two small dogs followed them as they closed the room again and threaded through the halls of the unused wing.

As they re-entered the main structure, Jack ushered the dogs through the doors and closed them. He tested the latch, ensuring it held as he pulled against the door. With another shake of his head, he said, “No sense in locking it, I suppose.”

“No,” Cate said with a sigh. “And maybe no sense in closing it. Someone keeps opening it and unless Riley and Bailey have discovered a way to open doors, it’s not them.”

Cate wrapped her arms around her midriff as she bit her lower lip and stared at the mysterious doors to the west wing. Jack wrapped his arm around her shoulders and led her away from the space. “Come on,” he prodded.

Cate shook her head. “What is going on here?” she asked, her voice filled with worry. “Doors opening unexpectedly, a room that makes me a zombie...”

“I’m not sure, Cate. I hope our mysterious friends across the pond have some answers. Perhaps we should update them.”

“Well, I guess we don’t know for sure it’s the room. Maybe it was the music box.” Cate ceased walking and stared up at Jack. “Did you hide it there?”

“I’m not telling.”

“I’m not trying to wheedle its location out of you. But if it’s hidden near there, perhaps it’s a proximity thing. And it could explain the door being open. If you accessed the west wing recently, perhaps the latch didn’t work, or the lock stuck?”

Jack shook his head. “Sorry, Lady Cate. I wish that could explain it but no, I did not put the music box anywhere near that spot, and I did not go into the west wing since the last time we locked those doors.”

Jack’s admission dashed Cate’s theory.

“And don’t you go feeling proud of yourself for ruling out an entire wing to search for your music box. I could always move it,” Jack said, wagging his finger at her.

The comment elicited a chuckle from Cate. “Duly noted. I just can’t figure out what that room would have to do with anything. I’ve barely ever been in it. I think once when I went through the castle after I first moved here. I have no reason to be drawn to it. I can’t make sense of any of this.”

“We’ll figure it out, Cate. Together. Just take solace in the fact that this time, no one is disappearing into other time periods.” He grabbed her hand and led her further down the hall.

“That’s some consolation. Though this time, I’m disappearing. Into some kind of trance.”

“There you are!” Molly exclaimed as they rounded the corner, heading toward the library. “I brought your lunch and found the place empty!”

“Sorry,” Cate said. “The dogs have been running around all over the place and we followed them.”

“Oh? What were they after? I hope not another body.”

“No,” Cate said, with a wave of her hand and a chuckle. “No bodies. Though we never did figure out what gave them the zoomies.”

“Hopefully they’ll be ready for a nap so you can enjoy your lunch.”

Cate ushered them in through the double doors with a nod in agreement at Molly’s statement.

“Oh,” Molly said to Jack as he passed her, “Mrs. Fraser said don’t get used to this treatment. You’re not lord of the manor.”

Jack chuckled at her. “I would never,” he promised. “Only when Lady Cate and I have pressing business.”

Molly gave him an amused glance and nod before she disappeared down the hall, leaving them to their lunch.

“You know,” Jack said, as he pushed a crouton around in his tomato basil soup, “I never thought I’d look forward to time travel, but I am!”

“Really?” Cate asked.

“Aye, if it solves your zombie problem, I am.”

Cate scrunched up her face in thought. Jack reached over and patted her arm. “It’ll be okay, Cate. I was only joking. Well, half-joking. If time travel works the way Damien seems to think it will, I won’t mind. It’s killing two birds with one stone.”

Cate gave him a weak smile. “I don’t know what to think,” Cate said. “I can’t believe time travel is a solution to whatever is happening to me. But Damien seemed certain.”

“I suppose we’ll find out.”

“At least it will take my mind off of whatever is going on with me. I wish we had more clues.”

“We’ll find them, Cate,” Jack assured her.

They finished their lunch and parted ways after delivering their trays to the kitchen. The task ahead rumbled through Cate’s mind as she pulled on her 1940s style dress. What would they find when they arrived at the castle? And would they pull off their subterfuge with those they had met twenty years earlier?

Cate hoped to avoid the family as much as possible. Much to her chagrin, however, it appeared that would be impossible. With no information about Ruth Harper, they would be forced to speak with at least Rory to learn anything about the woman.

Cate slicked on her bold red lipstick and pressed her lips together to distribute the color. Perhaps they could claim fantastic genetics for why they remained youthful in their appearance. She hoped the changed hairstyle and makeup provided enough difference that they weren't questioned.

Perhaps her recent brush with death even added a few gray hairs and wrinkles. Cate's mind flitted to the encounter. She swallowed hard as she recalled the cold stone of the tomb closing around her. She sensed the weight of the necklace on her neck and the icy cold touch of Duke Northcott's fingers against her skin. His voice echoed in her mind.

She fought to steady herself as her mind began to slip toward the necklace and then the music box. Cate pressed her hands against her ears as tinkling music filled the air around her.

"No!" she shouted, with a shake of her head. She stared at herself in the mirror. Movement caught her eye. She spun to search behind her. As she broke eye contact with the mirror, her mind cleared.

The tinkling music died down and the sensation of the necklace pressed against her collarbones passed. Cate sucked in a long breath as a shudder passed through her body.

"What's happening to me?" she whispered aloud.

Tears stung her eyes, and Cate bit her lower lip as she fluttered her eyelashes. After blowing out a shaky breath, she risked a quick glance into the mirror for a make-up check. Finding nothing amiss, she heaved another sigh, smoothed the skirt of her dress, and pushed her shoulders back.

She and Jack had a murder to investigate. That should be her focus. She stepped into her bedroom and grabbed her vintage purse before meeting Jack outside her suite.

"Ready?"

Cate gave a tight-lipped smile and a nod.

"You sure?" Jack asked.

"Yes," Cate said. "I can't wait, actually."

"Did something happen?" Jack inquired, as they traversed the halls to the secret passage outside of the library.

Cate swallowed hard and offered a sheepish grin. “Another incident where I really wanted to find the music box. It’s almost all-consuming and I can barely think of anything else.”

Jack arched an eyebrow. “Let’s hope Damien is correct about the effects of time travel on enchantments.” Jack ceased walking for a moment as they entered the hall containing the library. “Wow, I can’t believe that statement even came out of my mouth.”

Cate giggled at him. “You mean about hoping time travel solves our problems?”

“No, I mean about how easily I just mentioned time travel solving problems with enchanted objects. Lady Cate, before I met you I would have told anyone else all that was a bunch of hogwash. Now, I deal with it on a regular basis. And even more frightening, it’s becoming normal!”

“Anyway, let’s hope Damien’s correct.” She reached to the sconce and tugged on it.

They slipped into the secret passage, pushing the panel closed behind them. Jack toggled on a small flashlight and Cate held out the timepiece.

She set the date to September 17th, 1942. Jack closed his hand around hers and they activated the timepiece. As the secondhand slowed and 1942 settled around them, Jack blew out a breath.

“Well,” Jack said, as he pointed his flashlight’s beam toward the passage leading to the crypt, “here we go.”

Cate drew in a sharp breath.

“You okay?” Jack asked.

“Yes,” Cate said. “It’s amazing.”

“What is?”

“Always feel so clear-headed! Even if I think about the necklace and the music box, I don’t experience that fuzzy headed feeling or the overwhelming urgency to seek it out.”

Jack stared at her for a moment before he shook his head. “I can’t believe that worked.”

“Me either,” Cate admitted. “But it’s like night and day.”

“Well, I suppose in addition to solving a murder, we also have found a temporary solution to your troubles.”

Cate nodded as they reached the crypt. “Yes. I hope it buys us enough time to sort that situation out entirely. I really hate what it’s doing to me.”

“I can imagine.” Jack reached above his head and tugged on the metal ring. The secret panel in the crypt swung toward them. They exited into the bright sunshine beyond. “Whew! I always forget we’re going to fall, not spring.”

“Yes, the new ability to travel to any date we want may become confusing.”

“I was just getting used to the idea of traveling to the same date in another year, but a different day of the week...”

“And now you’re faced with different day, date and season!” Cate said, lifting her eyebrows and offering him a coy grin.

“At least I’m faced with the old Cate Kensie! You’re right, the difference is night and day!”

Cate sighed as they stepped onto the pathway outside the crypt. “I’m not sure if I find it encouraging or frightening that even you notice the difference.”

“Let’s take it as encouraging and leave it at that.”

Jack gazed around as they made their way up the path. “Gee, I hope I don’t run into Pap again.”

Cate couldn’t help but laugh. “I don’t think it’s funny, Lady Cate. He’s likely to have me arrested. My own grandfather, turning me in as a Nazi.”

“I’m sorry, but when you refer to that child as Pap it really makes me laugh.”

“I’m glad it makes someone laugh. I, personally, am not amused that at five years old, Pap can still get over on me.”

“He’s probably already a better dancer, too,” Cate said, with a coy glance at him.

Jack shook his head at her attempted humor. “What a comedian. I’m beginning to regret my statement about being faced with the old Cate Kensie.”

They wound their way around the loch. Cate gazed at the large tent, shaded by Dunhaven Castle. “I hope Rory can provide us with some preliminary information,” she said, as she watched several individuals bustle to and from the temporary canvas structure.

“Me too. I suppose the best course of action is to ask to speak with him first.”

“Yes,” Cate agreed, as they rounded the castle and approached the front door. “Let’s hope we learn something.”

Jack used the brass lion's head door knocker. "Here's the first test. If Benson looks strange at us, we're sunk."

Jack plastered a grin on his face as the door swung open before Cate could respond. A middle-aged man in a butler's uniform stood at the door. "Yes?" he inquired.

"Hello. Jack and Cate MacKenzie to see Rory MacKenzie."

The man's eyebrows raised. "Is Lord MacKenzie expecting you, sir?"

"No," Jack answered, "though I'm certain he'll recognize our name as we've met on several occasions before."

"Perhaps if you could check with Mr. Benson, he could verify that my husband is Lord MacKenzie's cousin," Cate chimed in.

The man shifted his glance to Cate. "Mr. Benson has retired. I am the new butler, Smithers. You must have visited Lord MacKenzie quite a while ago."

Cate nodded. "Yes," she answered. "Nearly twenty years, actually."

"I see," the man said. "Please come in and I shall discuss the matter with Lord MacKenzie."

"Thank you," Jack said, as he ushered Cate into the foyer in front of him and followed her through the large front doors.

The man showed them into the sitting room, closing the doors behind them.

"I guess Benson won't be a problem," Cate said.

"Apparently not," Jack agreed as he sank onto the updated couch. He wiped at a bead of sweat forming on his brow.

"Take it easy, Jack," Cate said, as she plopped next to him and patted his knee. "Rory should remember us. And we don't need to explain our rather youthful appearances to him."

Jack nodded and they waited for several more tension-filled moments before the doors to the foyer popped open.

CHAPTER 17

As the doors to the sitting room opened, Cate stood, recognizing Rory immediately. His tall form, slightly more sturdy than lithe now, was hidden under a new style of suit. His once dark hair now had streaks of gray, though it remained unruly. And his piercing blue eyes were unmistakable.

He stood in the doorway, his face a mask of surprise and glee. A grin formed on his lips, spreading wider as he stepped toward them. “Jack and Cate MacKenzie!” he exclaimed.

Jack stood next to Cate, returning the man’s smile. “Hello,” he said.

“I’m amazed!” He studied them up and down. “When Smithers told me, I couldn’t believe it was true! Yet here you stand! Oh, what a lovely surprise.”

Cate smiled at Rory’s enthusiasm. The picture of politeness and always the optimist, Rory’s welcome gave her the boost she needed.

“I hope you don’t mind us dropping in unannounced,” Jack said.

“Not at all,” Rory answered, still staring at them with a silly grin. “After that spot of trouble you got us out of, I hoped to see you again. After years passed, I figured I wouldn’t. But here you are again. One of life’s little surprises!”

Cate smiled at him. “We’re sorry it took so long but...” Her voice faded as she glanced to the open doors leading to the foyer.

Rory understood her silent signal and pushed the doors closed.

“Thank you,” she said. “For us, it’s only been a few months,” Cate explained.

“How interesting,” Rory said. “I’m not much of a traveler myself, but it’s entirely fascinating to me that you’re visiting me nearly twenty years later for me, though only a few months for you.”

“We hope that doesn’t cause any problems,” Jack said with a wince. “Though it is rather unavoidable.”

“Well, certainly no problems with me,” Rory said. “And Anne is away at the moment visiting her parents in the countryside and will be for the next several weeks.”

“Oh,” Cate said, relief coursing through her, “that will make things easier.”

“The only other person in the house with me is Oliver, and I doubt he’d remember you clearly enough to question your ages. Why the last time you saw him he must have been only a small boy.”

“About ten, yes,” Cate answered.

“And now he’s approaching thirty!” Rory said, his eyebrows raised high. “Nearly an old man like me.” He chuckled at his joke. Cate also offered a giggle, more so at the different views of age in a different era.

The conversation lulled for a moment and Rory took the opportunity to bring up the subject on everyone’s mind.

“I assume you’re here for a purpose?”

“We are,” Cate said, with an apologetic glance.

“Please, you do not need to explain it to me, though I’ll do all I can to help.”

“Thank you. On that note, you mentioned Anne being away, but is Amelia here?”

“Funny you should mention that,” Rory said, waving a finger in the air. “I received correspondence very recently from her. She is traveling to Dunhaven and plans to arrive tomorrow. What a coincidence you should mention her.”

Cate held in another giggle at Rory’s naïveté.

“Of course,” Rory continued, “if you prefer to avoid her, I shall make no mention of your arrival to her.”

“No, quite the opposite, actually,” Cate said. “I hoped to speak with her.”

“Oh!” Rory said with a nod. “Well, it seems you shall be in luck tomorrow then.”

“Good,” Cate said. “And if you wouldn’t mind us ‘staying’ at the castle again...” Her voice trailed off as Rory waved his hand in the air at her.

“Oh, of course, of course. You needn’t ask. I shall have the room prepared at once. I can arrange the one you used before, though will that pose a problem with returning to and from this time period? I’m not certain of the location of the time rip leading to this year.”

“It won’t pose a problem at all, thank you,” Cate said, omitting the information about the latest developments with the time rips.

“Wonderful,” Rory said. “I shall see to it then. And how I look forward to spending more time with you. Oh, I’m afraid dinners are a rather bleak affair these days what with the war effort, but we shall scrounge up something lovely, I promise.”

“I’m sure it will be fine and of course, the draw is spending time with you and your family,” Cate said. “And on that note, I spotted a tent outside. I understand it has something to do with the war effort.”

“Oh, yes,” Rory confirmed. “Yes, we’re hosting several ladies and gentlemen who are working on those codes. Enigma machines I believe they’re called. A terrible business, this war. It was the least we could do to provide them with a place to stay and work. They’re a smaller branch of those working at Bletchley Park. My contribution, however small, to the war efforts.” He shoved his hands into his pockets and offered a weak smile.

“It’s more than small,” Cate assured him.

“Would you like to see it? I could show you.”

A smile brightened Cate’s features. “If you have a moment and wouldn’t mind.”

“Of course!” Rory said. “Just allow me to retrieve my hat.”

The man disappeared from the room, leaving Cate and Jack alone.

“Nice to see time hasn’t jaded him at all,” Cate said.

“Still the same old Rory, that’s for certain,” Jack agreed.

“I hope you don’t mind the tour of the intelligence tent, but I thought it would be fascinating to see.”

“Not at all, Cate,” Jack said. “We can spend as much time as you like here.”

Cate gave him a tight-lipped smile, understanding his meaning. He preferred not to return to the present where she suffered from some unknown ailment. She appreciated his sacrifice.

Rory returned a few moments later and led them from the castle and to the hut.

They entered the space. Temporary lighting hung overhead. A large board held a tacked-up map and several other pieces of information. Multiple tables were set up around the space. Paperwork covered most of the wooden surfaces. Men and women bent over the papers, pencils in hand, working to uncover patterns in the messages that could be used to crack the Enigma code.

Large baskets sat in the middle of the table with information waiting to be processed. A blonde woman, her hair styled in two large rolls and pulled back into a low bun, smiled at them as they entered.

“Hello, Miss Haverford,” Rory said with a wave.

“Hello, Lord MacKenzie,” she said, with a nod in a crisp British accent. “And again, please, Rita is just fine.”

“Miss Haverford was one of our earliest transplants with the intelligence unit.”

“How fascinating,” Cate said to the woman. “How did you become involved with the work?”

Her red lips formed another curt smile. “I’ve always been good with mathematics. And with my knowledge of the German language, it was a good fit.”

“Oh, you speak German,” Cate remarked.

“I do,” the woman answered. “My mother was German.”

Cate gave her a nod.

“Fascinating work, really,” Rory said to them. “I can’t make heads or tails out of it, but they seem to be making some headway. Sadly, not enough to cease all the attacks on our allied shipments.”

“No and the code has become rather tricky of late, but we’ll keep at it,” Miss Haverford added to Rory’s statements.

“Thank you for letting us drop by,” Cate said, as Rory led them from the tent.

“Well, it wasn’t much of a tour, but I don’t like to interrupt their work.”

“Very important, yes,” Jack said. “Thank you for showing us.”

“Oh, of course. And I’ll see you back tomorrow?” Rory inquired as they pushed into the castle’s entryway.

“Yes,” Jack assured him.

“Wonderful. I’ll see to your room and look forward to visiting with you again tomorrow. Maybe then you can meet Oliver.”

“We’ll look forward to it,” Cate said.

They said their goodbyes promising to return tomorrow. As Rory disappeared up the steps, Cate and Jack slipped into the secret passage to return to their time.

After changing into their normal clothes, they met in the library. Jack studied the puzzle as Cate meandered into the room. “I hate this puzzle,” he announced.

“Maybe it’ll grow on you, like time travel,” Cate quipped, as she settled into the armchair and slid a few pieces around.

“How do you feel?”

“Fine,” Cate admitted. “The time travel did remove the odd haze in my brain while we were there. When we got back, it’s better than it was, but I feel it slightly.”

“At least it relieved it somewhat,” Jack said with a shrug. “Maybe the more you do it, the better it will be.”

“I hope so,” Cate said. “Although, I’ll be on pins and needles until tomorrow.”

“Oh? Over the idea that the haze may return?”

“No, over seeing Amelia again, and hopefully, meeting Ruth.”

“I see.”

“We’re days before her supposed disappearance. And we have no information.”

“I hope to find some soon,” Jack said.

“So do I. Without it, we may never uncover the truth.”

“No, but at least we’ll have hopefully helped your issue.”

“I’d like to do both,” Cate said, as she finished one edge from corner to corner.

“I understand. Let’s hope tomorrow’s meeting is enlightening.”

“If it isn’t...” Cate paused and sighed. “We could be barking up the wrong tree. We could be in the wrong year with the wrong woman entirely!”

Jack nodded. “Aye, that could be true. Though I hope it isn’t. But you’re correct. We have no real proof that this woman actually disappeared.”

Cate gave him another sigh before returning her attention to the puzzle.

They spent the remainder of their rainy afternoon filling in the puzzle with Cate building toward the middle while Jack continued to frown over his edges, before finally fitting them together and finishing the outline. A celebration ensued over the small amount of progress.

With the rain turning to drizzle and finally ending as the afternoon hours waned, Cate took the opportunity to allow the dogs to stretch their legs before she returned to the library for dinner. With her current state of mind improved, Jack opted for dinner with the staff rather than eating upstairs with Cate.

Cate found her mind wandering more to the mystery in 1942 than anything else. Though it was a welcome change from her cloudy mind, her frustration over the lack of information bubbled inside her. They could be spending their time working an angle that had nothing to do with the body.

Cate frowned as she considered starting the process over again. But where, her mind pondered? Or when? With no reports of missing people fitting the description, they’d have no leads.

The mystery of their uninvited garden guest may go unsolved entirely.

A knock at the door returned her attention to her current surroundings. Jack poked his head in. “Everything okay in here?”

Cate smiled at him. “Yep,” she said with a nod. “Just contemplating our mystery and hoping we solve it.”

“Any haze? Overwhelming urges to roam around the castle? Music playing in your mind?”

“None of that! Damien was correct about the time travel helping.”

“Have you heard from him?” Jack asked, as he eased the doors shut behind him.

Cate checked her phone. “No, nothing. And I hate to keep asking him about progress.”

“Well, with the current upturn in your mental capacity, we probably can wait until tomorrow to see what they’ve come up with.”

Cate nodded her agreement, and spent the rest of her evening in the library swapping her attention between a mystery novel and the puzzle. The combination seemed to keep any mental fog at bay.

She gathered both dogs as evening turned to night and headed to her suite with the hopes her garden guest mystery didn't keep her awake.

After saying good night to Jack, she continued to her sitting room, pressing the doors shut behind her. Riley and Bailey raced ahead of her to the bedroom. An excited yip sounded, and she heard the sounds of both dogs climbing onto the bed.

"You guys must be really tired!" Cate called, as she approached the double doors leading to her bedroom. As her large bed came into view, Cate ceased walking. Her heart skipped a beat and her stomach dropped. Her breath caught in her throat as her eyes widened at the sight.

With a furrowed brow, she took a slow step forward, her head shaking. "No," she whispered.

Riley and Bailey stood in the middle of the bed, staring at a collection of objects sprawled across the foot of it. Their attention flicked to Cate as she stepped inside. Riley's feather-like tail waved in the air and Bailey gave two clipped swats of his curly tail.

Cate's lower lip trembled as she approached the foot of the bed. Riley stretched out on his belly, his tail still waving. With a trembling hand, Cate reached out toward the objects. As her fingers caressed one, she pulled her hand back as though she'd been burned by it.

They weren't figments of her imagination. They were real.

On the bottom of her bed lay a red rose, the sapphire necklace, and the piano-shaped music box.

CHAPTER 18

A grimace formed on Cate's lips as she stared at the array of items spread on her bed. Her pulse raced and her breathing turned ragged as her mind shot in a thousand directions pondering the situation.

She spun toward her sitting room, intent on reporting the incident to Jack. As she took a step toward the other room, an icy cold breeze tickled her skin. The hair on the back of her neck stood up and her flesh puckered into goosebumps.

She ceased walking, her head slowly swiveling to glance over her shoulder. Her clenched lips parted slightly as she stared at the objects. She inhaled a deep breath and stepped toward the bed. Her fingers caressed the sapphires before she snatched them off the bed, clutching the necklace to her chest.

She twisted the winding mechanism and propped open the lid of the miniature grand piano. Soft tinkling music filled the air, causing the edges of her lips to curl upward in a slight smile.

She pulled the small music box onto her lap as she sank onto the edge of the bed. A thought pervaded her mind. She had to find it. The blue dress. She had to find it.

Her mind made a mental inventory of the castle. Where had she put the dress? She had to find it. She rose from the bed and stalked across the room.

The music box tinkled away as she crossed her sitting room and flung open the door. She shambled down the hall as she considered the best place to begin her search.

A noise buzzed at the back of her brain. She wrinkled her forehead, attempting to concentrate on the music. The noise sounded again. Her footsteps slowed as she struggled to identify the sound. The tinkling music began to slow.

Cate's body shook. She blinked several times as her hand searched for the winding key.

"Cate!"

She recognized her name being called. It sounded like the speaker was far away and underwater. She shook her head and again searched for the winding key.

Her body jolted again. "Cate!"

She glanced up, finding a face in front of her. "Jack!" Her eyebrows shot up and she grinned at him. "You're back!"

Jack's brow furrowed. Cate flung her arms around him in a hug. She pulled back still smiling.

"Back? Cate?" Jack stared down at the objects clutched in her hands. "What's going on? How did you get those?"

"Now you can help me," Cate continued to babble. "I have to find it. I can't remember where I put it."

Jack grasped hold of Cate's shoulders. "Cate! Get hold of yourself! What are you talking about?"

"The dress. I have to find it. I have to find it before he comes."

The last few notes of music floated from the dying music box.

Jack shook his head at her as she turned the key again. He attempted to wrestle the box from her grip.

"No!" she shouted, yanking it back. "I need it! I've always loved it."

"Cate, what are you talking about? You just got this."

"No, I've had it since..." Her forehead wrinkled as she searched her mind for the detail. "Since..."

She shook her head, becoming perturbed by her memory loss.

"Cate," Jack said, squatting down to stare into her eyes. "Listen to me. There is some enchantment on this thing, and it's making you crazy."

"No," Cate argued. "No, it helps me. It relaxes me."

Jack swallowed hard and bit his lower lip.

"Will you help me?" Cate asked.

Jack narrowed his eyes at her. "Okay, sure. What do you need help with?"

“I have to find the dress.”

“What dress?”

“My blue dress. For the ball. I can’t remember where I put it.” Cate continued down the hall.

“Where did you see it last?”

Cate’s forehead crinkled. “I’m not sure.” A pained expression crossed her face, and she stared up at Jack.

“Okay, it’s okay, Cate. We’ll find it.” Jack held his hands out in front of him as though surrendering. “How about if we leave these things here, though? You can’t look for anything when you’re carrying so many things.”

Cate glanced down at the music box and necklace. “But...”

“They’ll be here when you come back. But it’ll be easier to find the dress.”

Cate’s eyes slid sideways as she considered the proposition. Jack eased the music box from her hands and set it down on the floor. He carefully unfurled her fingers from around the necklace and laid it on the music box.

He breathed a partial sigh of relief as he wrapped an arm around Cate’s shoulders and guided her away from the objects. He led her downstairs and into the library. Embers still glowed in the fireplace, casting the room in a dim, orangish light.

Jack guided her to the armchair near the fireplace and eased her into it. He perched on the edge of the table, keeping his hands firmly grasping her upper arms.

He studied her face.

“I don’t think the dress is here,” Cate said.

“No, but we need a break to think about where we should look.”

Cate nodded.

“While we think, can you tell me what the dress looks like?”

“It’s satin. Sapphire blue.” Cate paused. Her forehead wrinkled again as she searched her memory for more details. After a moment, her breathing turned ragged, and a pained expression wrinkled her nose. Her face blanched. And she glanced to Jack with fear in her eyes. “I can’t... the music box... I should get it.”

“No, it’s okay, stay here,” Jack insisted, keeping his grip firm on her.

“Ugh,” she moaned as she bent forward, rubbing her temples.

“It’s okay, Cate. It’s okay,” Jack said, rubbing her arm.

After a few moments, Cate sucked in a deep breath and straightened. Her brow furrowed again as she glanced around the room then focused on Jack. She tilted her head at him, a worried expression replacing her pained one. "Was I roaming again?" she inquired.

"Cate?" Jack said, sitting up straighter. "Is it you?"

Cate pressed back against the chair behind her as she processed his statement. "Yes. Who else would it be?" Her eyes grew wide. "Jack, what's going on?"

Jack blew out a relieved sigh. "I'll explain everything in a second, just let me take a minute to be grateful you're back to normal you."

"You're scaring me," Cate said.

Jack blew out another breath. "Somehow you got a hold of the music box and necklace."

"What?" Cate asked, her voice incredulous.

Jack nodded. "I have no idea how. I hid it in the locked east wing. I won't say where beyond that. But there's no way you could have gotten it from there. But you definitely had it. You were wandering around the halls babbling about finding a dress."

"A dress?" Cate pursed her lips in thought. "That seems vaguely familiar. But beyond that, I can't remember anything. How did I get the music box?"

"What's the last thing you remember?"

"Going into my sitting room. The dogs ran into the bedroom and when I went in, I saw everything on the bed. The necklace, the music box, and a rose. That's the last thing I remember."

Jack swung from the table into the armchair next to her, still perched on the edge.

"Where is the music box now?" Cate inquired.

"I managed to wrestle it off you. It's in a hallway upstairs."

Cate shook her head. "Jack, if this music box keeps appearing, there's going to be no keeping me from it."

"I agree. No matter what we do, you end up with it. We're going to have to mitigate your symptoms as best we can while we figure this out, because there's no keeping it away."

Cate nodded.

"There's something else," Jack said, wringing his hands.

"What?"

“In addition to the strange comments about searching for your ball gown, you made a few other bizarre comments.”

“Such as?”

“You said you needed the music box because you’ve always loved it.”

“Always? I just got it.”

“That’s what I thought, too.”

“Is there something else?”

Jack remained silent for a moment, staring at his feet.

“Jack?”

He shrugged. “Maybe it’s nothing, but you seemed surprised to see me. You said I was back. I didn’t know what that meant, but it was very odd.”

“Perhaps because I was in a trance, I was surprised to see you, since it seems I’m almost closed into my own mind.”

Jack shrugged again. “Maybe,” he said. “And maybe I’m reading into things too much, but it seemed very, very odd to me. Though you may be correct. It took me a few minutes to get a response from you.”

“Really?” Cate inquired.

Jack nodded. “Aye. I kept calling to you and finally you acknowledged me. But it took a few tries.”

Cate shivered, more from the unknown than the cold. “What’s happening to me?”

“I don’t know, Cate, but we’ll figure it out.”

“How?” Cate cried.

Jack considered it for a moment. “As much as I hate to say this, we may need to let you slip into one of these trances and see what it is you’re trying to do.”

The worried expression returned to Cate’s face as she considered the theory. “I’m not sure that’s a good idea. What if you can’t get through to me next time?”

“Perhaps we can use the time travel solution as our backup,” Jack proposed. “If you don’t snap out of it, I’ll drag you into one of the time rip locations and we’ll go back in time.”

Cate remained silent for a few minutes. “This sounds like the worst plan ever.”

Jack leapt from his seat and paced the floor behind them. “I know, Cate, I know. But I’m not sure what other choices we have!”

“Okay, okay, let’s just calm down a minute,” Cate said, noticing Jack’s obvious agitation.

Jack continued his anxious pacing, biting his thumbnail as he marched back and forth across the room.

Cate rose and stopped him from his pacing. “Jack,” she said, pausing to sigh before continuing, “we’ll figure this out. I’m not sure how, but I know we will. Maybe it’s best if we let things take a more natural course.”

Jack tilted his head at the statement, setting his mouth in a firm line. “I really don’t like to leave things to chance.”

“I don’t either, but I’m afraid if we force things…” Her voice trailed off and tears shined in her eyes. “Jack, what if I disappear entirely? End up locked in my own mind?”

“I won’t let that happen, Cate.”

“You may not have a choice.”

Jack shook his head and pulled Cate into his arms. “I’m not going to lose you, Cate.”

Cate sniffled as a tear fell to her cheek. She wrapped her arms around Jack’s waist. “Thanks,” she squeaked.

She spent a few moments with her head resting against his chest before she pulled back, wiping the wayward tear from her cheek. She blew out a shaky breath.

“How are you feeling now?”

“Okay,” she admitted.

“Do you think you’ll be able to get any sleep?”

“Maybe,” she said. “I’ll try.”

“If you prefer to stay here, I’ll wait up with you.”

Cate shook her head. “No. But don’t tell me which hall we left the music box in. And maybe you should lock the doors to my sitting room.”

“Lock you in?”

Cate shrugged her shoulders. “I’d feel better if you did.”

“Okay,” Jack said. “Sounds like a plan.”

They returned to the upstairs hallway and parted ways at Cate’s suite, with Jack locking the door after she entered the room. She squeezed her eyes shut as she heard the lock engage behind her.

“Good night, Lady Cate,” Jack’s muffled voice called, before she heard him retreat down the hall and enter his own bedroom.

With a deep, steadying breath, Cate returned to her bedroom. The two dogs tossed the rose around on the bed. “Hey!” Cate exclaimed. “Stop that!”

She snatched the rose from them and collected the wilted petals that had fallen from the flower. She tossed them into her trashcan before changing clothes and climbing into bed. Her mind replayed the earlier events of the evening. She tossed and turned as worry consumed her.

Her mind focused on the music box after a while. She found herself calmed as she continued to concentrate on the item. She closed her eyes and pictured it in her mind. The tinkling music echoed in her brain.

Cate drifted off to sleep as the music soothed her frayed nerves.

* * *

Cate awoke the next morning feeling relaxed. She lounged in bed as the first hints of sunlight brightened the room. Cate rolled onto her back and closed her eyes, focusing on the tinkling music filling the room.

After a few moments, she rolled to her side, glancing at the piano-shaped music box perched on the edge of her nightstand. The music was beautiful. She reached out to caress the raised lid of the tiny piano as it played away.

A knock sounded at her sitting room door. Cate lifted her head to glance out of the bedroom door. She pushed herself up to sit and pulled her robe around her. As she slipped into her slippers, she hummed along with the music box.

She stepped into her sitting room as she heard the lock of her door disengage. The door popped open an inch. “Cate?” Jack called in.

“Come in,” Cate said, waving him into the room.

“Good morning,” Jack said. “How are you feeling?”

Cate shrugged, scrunching up her mouth into a pucker. “Another feel perfectly fine,” Cate answered, “but there’s been another new development.”

Jack’s lips formed an “o”, and he paused for a moment before speaking. “I’m not certain I want to find out, but I suppose I have to.”

Cate motioned for him to follow her. She stopped in the doorway leading into her bedroom. Both dogs leapt up at the sight of Jack, Riley’s tail waving in the air at him.

Cate motioned toward the nightstand.

Jack's face whitened and he approached the tinkling object, staring down at it.

CHAPTER 19

With wide eyes, he shifted his gaze to Cate. “I would say this can’t be, but I’m starting to learn it can with this thing.”

Cate crossed her arms over her chest and nodded. “I found it there this morning when I woke up.”

Jack stared at her. “You’re not a zombie.”

“No, I feel okay, actually. Well-rested and very content.”

“And your door was still locked this morning,” Jack noted as he rubbed his chin.

“Yep. I have no recollection of getting out of bed. And even if I did, I couldn’t have gotten out of this room, unless my zombie-fied self knows of a secret passage.”

“Anything on your cube camera?” Jack inquired.

“Let me check,” Cate said. She stalked across the room and grabbed her cell phone. “No videos beyond the ones triggered this morning.”

“Hmm, not even when the music box appeared?”

“Apparently not,” Cate said. She flashed the phone’s screen toward Jack. “Nothing listed overnight at all. Not even me rolling over in bed.”

“I suppose we can view this as progress. You’ve got the music box here and you’ve not gone crazy.”

“I don’t see the necklace. Perhaps it’s the necklace that causes my odd behavior.”

“But it was the music box you were after a few times.”

Cate leaned against the door jamb and shrugged. “I can’t figure it out.”

“Well, I hope you stay this way. It’ll be one less thing to worry about,” Jack said.

“Me too. I guess I’ll get dressed. Hopefully, you don’t find me wandering the halls soon.”

Jack nodded. “Perhaps the time travel did do you some good. Hopefully, today’s trip will help, too.”

“Fingers crossed,” Cate said, before Jack left her alone to finish her morning routine.

The little music box seemed to play on an endless loop without Cate winding it. She left it still playing its tune, ushering the dogs out of the room and down the stairs for a quick walk before breakfast.

Cate found herself surprisingly alert during the morning hours. Her phone jingled shortly after 9 a.m. Cate recognized Mrs. Campbell’s number and accepted the call.

“Lady Cate!” the woman exclaimed through the phone’s speaker after Cate picked up. “Why, I feel almost odd not having met with you in over a week!”

Cate chuckled at the comment, feeling as though she’d escaped an obligation. “With the way you streamline the process, Mrs. Campbell, we are well ahead of schedule for both parties.”

“About those,” Mrs. Campbell began, “I have several things we should discuss.”

“Of course, Mrs. Campbell,” Cate said, twirling her pen in her hands. “When would you like to meet?”

“Would Monday work? It’s not our usual day but...”

“Yes, that will work fine. 9 a.m.?” Cate queried.

“Perfect!”

“Oh, Mrs. Campbell,” Cate said, before the woman could end the call. “Could I ask you a quick question while I have you on the line?”

“Of course!” Mrs. Campbell answered.

“I’ve come across some information about World War II-era Dunhaven. Did you know there was an intelligence base here?”

Mrs. Campbell paused for a moment. “Oh, well,” she stammered around. “Well, no! I most certainly was not aware of that!”

“Hmm,” Cate murmured at the development.

“This is... well...” After a few moments of hemming and hawing, Mrs. Campbell exclaimed, “Quite frankly, I’m in shock! Where did you come across this information?”

“Oh, uh, a personal source from Rory MacKenzie, the estate’s proprietor during the war.”

“I can’t believe this! I’m going to go through the information I’ve amassed. Surely there must be some trace of this somewhere!”

“I’d appreciate you sharing any information you find. I must admit I was surprised when I found out, too.”

“Leave it to me, Lady Cate. I shall get to the bottom of it!”

They said their goodbyes and Cate ended the call as a knock sounded on the door. Jack peeked inside. “Still okay?”

Cate smiled and nodded. “Yep. I’m not sure you will be, though.”

“What now?” he asked, slipping inside the door.

“That was Mrs. Campbell.”

“Oh no,” Jack said, his shoulders slouching. “Now what? A waterslide? Move a beach grain by grain for a luau? Shift the west wing out of the way for another garden?”

“None of those things, though she’s requested another meeting. She probably heard you telling me not to tell her about the west wing’s music room, and now she wants to use it.”

“Tell her it’s gone missing.”

“I’m not sure she’ll buy that story, but listen to this. I asked her about the intelligence base here, and she’d never heard of it.”

“Is it that surprising?”

“Mrs. Campbell not knowing something major about the castle? The poor woman was flabbergasted.”

“You make a good point. Mrs. Campbell prides herself on being the end-all, be-all on information about Dunhaven Castle.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “She had the scoop on Douglas, Randolph, and Rory’s theft – but she didn’t know there was an intelligence base here during the Second World War?”

“Well, she had most of her information wrong on all of those fronts.”

“But,” Cate countered. “She had information. Wrong or not. It seems odd that she has no information at all. Not even an odd rumor about it.”

“Perhaps she’ll find some,” Jack said.

“I guess we’ll find out. I meet with her on Monday.”

“I’ll prepare myself for the outrageous to-do list I’m certain she’ll have.”

“See you later this afternoon for our daily time travel trip?”

“I don’t like when you say it that way, but yes, see you after lunch. If you need anything before then, I’ll be in the back garden. The one without the body.”

Cate nodded as Jack slipped through the door, easing it shut behind him. Cate spun to face her laptop. She hoped to track down some information on the intelligence base at the castle, finding it odd that even locally, it did not have a reputation.

After several internet searches, though, Cate began to wonder if her eyes had deceived her. Perhaps they’d entered some kind of alternate universe when they’d visited 1942 Dunhaven. No mention was made of the intelligence base. Outside of the famous Bletchley Park, the majority of the discussion about intelligence efforts in 1942 centered around the unreadability of the German code.

With a sigh, Cate closed her laptop and glanced at the two dogs lounging on the rug near the fireplace. “Want to head out for a walk?” she inquired.

At the special word, Riley and Bailey leapt to their feet, ready to go. Cate spent an hour outside with them enjoying the cool, but sunny, spring morning.

As they settled by the loch, Cate pulled her phone from her pocket. Accessing her messaging app, Cate typed a message to Damien: Good morning, hope everything’s okay on your side of the pond. A few updates here: that music box is persistent. It shows up in my bedroom no matter what we’ve tried. We’ve locked it in a safe, Jack’s hidden it and we even left it in a hallway at one point. Every time it winds up back in my bedroom.

She clicked off her phone’s display after sending the message and wrapped her arms around her bent knees. White clouds floated by in the azure sky. Cate followed their journey across the sky in the reflective surface of the loch.

She turned her mind to another question. What was it about that room that excited both her and the dogs?

“Think, Cate, think,” she murmured to herself, as she forced her mind to search for anything that happened during her zombie episodes.

“What about you two?” Cate asked the dogs. “What draws you to the west wing?”

Bailey climbed onto her lap and sat down, staring at her. Riley settled next to her, laying on his belly and watching the loch.

“Not talking, huh?” Cate asked as her cell phone chimed.

She swiped at it and read the message from Damien. Seriously? A persistent bugger, isn't it? Not much progress on our end. Enchantments can be really tricky, especially when we don't know what we're dealing with... well, we know WHO we're dealing with no matter what he says, but his knowledge is pretty extensive. I don't mean to sound so dire, we'll figure it out. At least nothing terrible has happened yet. I mean... I don't mean like this is trivial, but a reappearing music box doesn't seem too dangerous.

Cate smiled at the babbling message. It brought a smile to her face. She could imagine nervous, introverted Damien attempting to get his thoughts across and be supportive, while also trying to stop her from worrying.

Cate sent a return text to him. Yeah, nothing terrible so far. Is there something I should be watching for though? I've been wandering around the castle. When I wander around, Jack said I'm almost unresponsive like a zombie. He said I keep saying strange things. She perused Damien's message again before adding: And what did you mean by "no matter what he says"?

She sent the text and laid back on her elbows. Her mind searched for answers as she detailed the situation to Damien and planned future texts to explain her meaning.

Two return texts followed in rapid succession. Celine talked to the Duke again about the situation and he said it wasn't him... riiiiight like I believe that.

His second text said: What types of strange things? Do you remember anything from your roaming?

Cate answered both his questions, informing him of her lack of memory and her obsession with finding a dress and being ready for some unknown event, along with her surprise to see Jack.

As she waited for a response, she continued to ponder his other admission. Celine had discussed the matter with Duke Northcott. Cate couldn't even begin to fathom how that conversation unfolded. To begin with, Celine could barely stomach the sight of the man when she'd last seen them together. Now, Damien acted as though they spoke regularly. And his denial of involvement floored her. How did people lie so easily? Then again, she and Jack were becoming pros at it, too.

Damien answered, seeming unsurprised by anything she told him. Any idea what dress you're looking for or why? I'm not shocked you were surprised to see Jack. That's pretty common in what you're suffering from.

Cate screwed up her face at his words. She responded: Pretty common? I can't even begin to imagine the lives you and your friends lead, Damien. I'm worried about disappearing into my own mind. And I'm still stuck on the conversation with Duke Northcott. Did Celine just ask him straight out and he denied it?

The web grew more complex at every turn and Cate's head began to ache as she strove to find meaning in what was happening to her or Damien's odd explanations. She began to long for her trip to the past to give her mind a chance to relax.

Damien's response further confounded her. His first message tackled her symptoms. Celine went through a few episodes like this (she's fine, fully recovered). It usually means something or someone is drawing you to something. With Celine, it's usually the Duke, though we have seen a few other things. Can you do me a favor and give Jack my number in case he finds you unresponsive and can't pull you out of your trance? I know he has Michael's but I'd feel better if he texted me too.

Cate's stomach turned at the message. She noticed his deliberate avoidance to address her worry about disappearing inside her mind. In fact, if anything, his message alluded to the fact that she could.

A second message appeared as she fretted over the first message's meaning. Yeah, Celine asked him outright. He said "Whatever Catherine is experiencing is a result of her own doing" ... yeah, I'm sure you cursed yourself

An eye-roll emoji followed the message.

Cate stared at the screen, her jaw hanging open. She read the words over and over again. "Whatever Catherine is experiencing is a result of her own doing." What did that mean? Cate had no hand in this. She did not enchant the necklace and she did not send herself the music box. She'd never seen it before it arrived earlier this week.

Tension pooled at Cate's temples as she struggled to make sense of the conversation. Perhaps she should return to the castle. She could run the conversation past Jack and see if he could offer any suggestions.

Gathering the dogs, Cate returned to the castle an hour before lunch. She wandered past the closed door to the west wing. Riley stopped at the doors to give them a sniff. Cate's hand hovered on the handle. With a flick of her wrist, she twisted the knob and pulled the door open.

The two dogs raced down the wide hall, disappearing around the corner. Cate followed them, hurrying down the hall. By the time she rounded the corner, the dogs had already scurried out of the second hallway.

Cate raced down the length of it, pausing at the end to listen for any sounds of the dogs. She gulped in a breath of air, holding it while she strained for any trace of a sound. A small yip drew her attention.

Cate swung a left and rounded another corner. Both dogs stood at the gold doors she and Jack had entered yesterday. Riley pawed at them and whimpered.

"Is this where you're always off to?" Cate inquired. The little dog glanced up at her before he pawed at the door again, offering another groan.

Cate pushed open one gold door. Both dogs dashed into the oversized space. Cate followed behind them. She scanned the room's decorative elements with a suspicious eye. She'd drifted away from reality yesterday when they'd been in this room. Had that been coincidence or not?

Cate pulled her sweater tighter around her as she watched the dogs frolic in the space. Riley zoomed around the room in large circles, his lips pulled back in an opened-mouthed grin. Bailey studied the floor with interest, pawing at it occasionally when he caught sight of himself in the shiny reflection.

Suddenly, both dogs ceased what they were doing and stood at attention. They stared at one wall, their eyes fixed on the same spot. Both of them raced toward it, standing and waiting while they stared at what seemed to be nothing. Riley whined at the wall, tilting his head as though expecting something to happen.

Cate's breath caught in her throat. The tinkling music played in her mind. She inhaled a sweet, musky scent. The world around her seemed to fade. Colors melted together as a new image formed. A windowless space. Warm light glowed overhead.

Cate glanced up as her eyes tried to focus. Stars twinkled over her head. Was she outside? Her fingers found her collarbone then glided across the large gemstones of a necklace. Cate glanced down as she clutched at a heavy jewelry piece.

She blinked a few times as she tried to make sense of what she saw. Sapphire blue material covered the length of her body. She could have sworn she'd put on a pink sweater earlier.

Cate shifted her gaze forward as she attempted to determine her location. Images swept past in a dizzying array. She worked to focus on what was in front of her. A blur of blue met her gaze.

Stepping toward it, Cate blinked hard and focused on what was in front of her. As the room's details filled in, she found a mirror facing her.

Clad in a sapphire blue ballgown, Cate stared into her own blue eyes. With her hair in an upswept style, she looked ready for an evening event. The large sapphires sparkled around her neck.

Another whiff of the musky smell passed under her nostrils. A shadow crossed behind her in the mirror. "I'm here," she murmured.

A muffled voice responded. She fought to understand the words. She spun to search behind her. The motion made her dizzy and the world began to go dark. "No!" she exclaimed. "I'm here!"

She experienced the sensation of falling, before her body jolted.

CHAPTER 20

Cate blinked her eyes a few times, finding one of the room's ornate columns filled her vision.

"Cate!" Jack's voice called. Her body shook again.

Cate twisted her head to face him. "I have to find my dress," she murmured.

"What? Cate! Snap out of it!"

"I have to be ready."

"Cate!" Jack shouted, giving her another firm shake.

Cate reached out to the pillar to steady herself. She fluttered her eyelashes as the room came back into focus. Nausea made her stomach somersault, and she gulped in air. With a deep breath, she glanced around. Jack stood in front of her, concern etched into his features.

"Cate?"

Cate grasped his forearm to steady herself. "I'm okay," she said, still gulping in breaths. "What happened?"

"I think I should be asking you that."

"After my walk with the dogs, I came here to explore. I don't know what happened after I got into this room." She furrowed her brow in concentration. "The dogs were playing, then suddenly, something caught their attention. And after that, everything went black."

"You don't remember anything else?"

"No, nothing."

"When I came in, I found you staring at this column."

Cate glanced at the pillar next to her. "This wasn't where I was when the dogs reacted to whatever they heard or saw."

"Where were you?"

Cate pointed to a spot several steps away. "Over there."

"Okay, so you were wandering again."

"But why here? Does this pillar have any meaning, or did I run into it or what?"

"I'm not sure," Jack said, studying it. He ran his hand along it in several places before he shrugged. "We should get back for lunch before Molly wonders where we are. We can discuss this over our meal."

Cate nodded and called the dogs to follow them. With a last wistful glance at the wall, Riley and Bailey followed them from the room.

Cate remained silent for most of the walk back to the library. Molly delivered lunch for her, and Jack and she settled into her armchair with the warm soup.

"Still feeling wonky?" Jack inquired.

"No, just wondering what is happening to me."

Jack pulled his lips to the side in a half-frown. "I'm not sure, but it doesn't seem we can prevent it, outside of time traveling." He twisted to face the camera that still sat on the library shelf. "But we can monitor it."

Cate followed his gaze, understanding dawning on her. "We can put the camera cube in the new location I seem to be so fascinated with."

"Aye, and I'll put the app on my phone so I will be alerted if you wander there. We can also use the collar cam. You probably should wear it at all times, and I should have access to the feed."

Cate rolled her eyes and slumped her shoulders at the suggestion. "Reduced to wearing a collar cam. What has my life become?"

"Well, if there's no stopping you from prowling around the castle, at least we'll try to learn something from it."

Cate sighed. "I don't disagree. I just... feel odd wearing the doggy cam so you can keep an eye on me like a wayward child."

"Maybe we'll solve the case and be done with this, and you can return to being an adult," Jack said with a wink.

They sat for another moment in silence before Cate spoke again. "What I can't understand is what is drawing the dogs there?"

"Maybe there's a can of Alpo hidden behind the wall," Jack said.

“That would explain it, but fails to explain my obsession with the same space.”

“Do you like Alpo?”

“Not particularly,” Cate answered. “Though in a pinch...”

Jack grimaced and Cate chuckled. “I’m only kidding,” she said.

“Good thing. I thought you were serious. Given your proclivities toward cereal and peanut butter sandwiches, I worried you may have tried it for a quick meal.”

“Going back to the subject at hand, Riley’s extremely excited by whatever is there. Same with Bailey.”

“Scent of another dog? Animal?”

Cate shook her head. “No, he acts like...”

“Like what?” Jack prodded as her voice trailed off.

“Like he does when he sees me or you after we’ve been gone. Whatever is there, Riley’s extremely happy about it.”

“I hope we find out soon.”

“I updated Damien on the situation earlier.”

“Oh? Did he have any insight?”

“Nothing that I could make heads or tails out of. His comments bordered on bizarre.”

“No surprise there,” Jack said with a chuckle. “Their lives are bizarre.”

“Same thing I said. Wait, let me read you a few of his statements. Maybe you’ll be able to decipher some meaning.”

Jack nodded as Cate tapped around on her phone to pull up the messages. “Did he manage to make you feel any less anxious about what’s happening to you?”

“If anything I feel more anxious,” Cate said.

Jack winced. “Now, I can’t wait to hear what he had to say.”

“First, he says Duke Northcott denied any involvement, which blew my mind to begin with, because I’m still trying to figure out how they’re having casual conversations with this man when Celine couldn’t stand the sight of him last time we saw them together.”

“They asked him?”

Cate shrugged. “He said Celine did and his response was... wait, let me find it. Here. ‘Whatever Catherine is experiencing is a result of her own doing’.”

Jack's eyes went wide, and his jaw dropped open. "What? What the heck does that mean?"

Cate shrugged again. "First of all, how is this your own doing? Second, why are they discussing it with him? And how..." Jack massaged his temples. "Never mind. I'm not sure I'll ever figure those people out."

"That's only the first cryptic thing. Not only is this my own doing, but when I mentioned what happens to me, specifically the zombie walking and the strange statements I've made, he answered that it was pretty common."

Jack's shocked expression failed to fade with the latest revelation. Instead, his eyes darted around the room as though he searched for the meaning of the words.

"Okay, well, I suppose we could take that as a good thing."

"While I understand what you're saying, he then went on to ask that I pass along his number to you, and if you can't pull me out of one of my trances to text him and Michael right away."

"That sounds scary."

"Same thing I thought. That was after I asked him if I could disappear into my own mind. He didn't say yes, but he didn't say no either."

"You've really done it this time, Cate," Jack said, with a shake of his head. "And to think less than a year ago I thought my biggest issues were going to be time travel."

"I haven't done anything! Contrary to Duke Northcott's accusation, I did not do this to myself!"

"That guy has some nerve, huh? What an odd thing to say. Then again, I'm still shocked they went and asked him about it. Perhaps he was, too, and just lied to cover his tracks."

"I'm having a hard time imagining a man like Duke Northcott shocked about anything. He seems like the type of guy who always has the upper hand. What I can't figure out is why he'd do this to me? I have no importance in the grand scheme of things. Why?"

"Perhaps you're more important than you think, Lady Cate. You do own a castle that allows for time travel."

"True."

"Or perhaps he enjoyed tormenting humans. Maybe it's a favorite pastime."

Cate grimaced at the words.

“Sorry,” Jack said. “Maybe once we get to the bottom of what’s happening to you, we’ll know the why.”

They finished the last scraps of their lunch. “Well, what do you want to do first? Set up my child monitoring system or go to 1942?”

“Decisions, decisions. Let’s get the time travel out of the way and set it up when we get back. I don’t want to take a chance on you disappearing into your mind again when we go back to that room.”

Cate nodded. “Sounds like a plan.” She shook her head as she stood from the chair.

“What?”

“I feel like I’m on the verge of remembering something and I just can’t get there. My mind won’t make the last connection. I remember nothing that happens to me during those blackouts, but I feel like I’m so close to remembering something.”

“Maybe it’ll come to you when you least expect it.”

“Maybe. Well, I’ll meet you in the hall as soon as I’m ready.”

“See you then!”

They parted ways to change for their trip. As Cate entered her bedroom, her gaze fell upon the music box. It stood silent despite its little lid being open. Cate approached the small item and studied it. She lifted it in her hands and turned the winding key. Music filled the air.

The tinkling sound eased the tension from her temples. She smiled down at the little item as she set it down on her nightstand.

She slipped off her shoes and padded into her bathroom to ready for the trip. Her mind relaxed as the music floated through the air. She considered the task ahead of her. Would they learn anything today about the woman they suspected had been buried in the side garden?

They had a slim window in which to gather information. Cate hoped they could determine what happened. A piece of her wondered if they could prevent it. Would it change history? Would solving the murder be enough? If faced with the opportunity, could Cate let a woman be murdered and secretly buried without attempting to help her?

Questions blazed through Cate’s mind as she pulled on her dark-colored dress. She stepped into her bedroom and pulled on her retro-style shoes. Cate stood and her gaze fell to the jewelry box. She crossed to it and pulled open the bottom drawer.

Cate pursed her lips as she stared down. Limned against the black velvet, the stunning sapphire necklace sparkled in the light.

“So, that’s where you’ve been,” Cate murmured as she caressed the item. Something in the large center stone caught her eye, and she leaned closer to study it.

Her mind sorted through images until it settled on one: a room with soft, twinkling stars casting a warm glow overhead. Mirrored panels were set between tall decorative pillars. A colorful floor painted the space with warm-colored images of unicorns sailing with the clouds. The music played behind her, and she experienced the sensation of twirling.

Cate blinked rapidly as the image faded away. The sapphire settled back to its dazzling blue color. She swallowed hard as she straightened and slid the drawer closed.

“Where is that room?” she whispered to herself.

A knock sounded at the doors to her suite. Cate grabbed her purse and hurried from the bedroom. Another mystery awaited.

She pulled the doors open to find Jack waiting in his 1940s-style suit. Two suitcases, packed earlier by Cate, sat just inside the door. Jack grabbed hold of them both. The grin on his face faltered as he glanced over her and into her bedroom. “Is that thing still playing?”

Cate gave him a sheepish glance. “I wound it.”

Jack closed his eyes for a moment before responding.

“Before you say anything,” Cate rushed to say, “I just...”

“Couldn’t help it,” Jack finished for her. “I know, Lady Cate. I know. If that little bugger can find its way back to you no matter where we put it, I can imagine we’re fighting a losing battle.”

“That’s not all,” Cate said, as she stepped into the hall with him, grabbing one suitcase. “The necklace is back, too.”

Jack’s shoulders slumped at the admission as Cate continued. “Safely tucked in the jewelry armoire where I’ve always kept it.”

“I suppose at least you’re still normal. Thank heavens for small mercies.”

“There’s still more,” Cate said with a wrinkled nose.

CHAPTER 21

Jack side-eyed her with wide eyes.
“On an impulse, I opened the drawer and found the necklace. I thought I saw something in the large sapphire in the center. When I inspected it, an image of a room formed in my mind.” Cate did her best to describe it. “Do you know of anywhere in the castle like that?”

Jack shook his head as he rubbed his chin with his free hand. “No, it doesn’t ring any bells.”

Cate sighed as they descended the stairs. “I thought if we could find it, maybe we could discover more about what’s going on.”

“I hate to say this, Lady Cate,” Jack said, as Cate pulled on the sconce to open the secret passage. “But what if...”

“Yeah?” Cate asked, stepping into the darkened passage.

“What if it’s a room only in your mind?”

Cate sighed as the darkness closed in around them when Jack pushed the panel shut. “I suppose if that’s the case, you’d better keep Damien’s number handy.”

Jack flicked on his flashlight and reached out to squeeze Cate’s arm. “Let’s hope it’s not,” he said. “And now, let’s get to 1942 and solve our other mystery.”

Cate and Jack activated the timepiece and slipped back to another era. Cate smiled at Jack, happy to leave the problems of the present time behind.

“Feel better?” Jack asked, as the timepiece finished its cycle, indicated by the second-hand crawling around the face.

“I didn’t feel that bad before, honestly,” Cate admitted. “Just a little... off.” They followed the passageway toward the crypt at the other end.

“Maybe the curse you hexed yourself with is wearing off.”

Cate rolled her eyes. “How ridiculous,” she said. “How could I be the source of this?”

“You spent a good amount of time with Duke Northcott,” Jack began.

“Don’t remind me,” Cate groaned.

“Were there any clues about this? Anything he said that could help us?”

“No,” Cate said, flinging her arms out then letting them slap her thighs. “I’ve been over and over the conversations we had. I can’t imagine why he’d waste time on me, to be honest.”

“He seemed awfully interested in you in the 1700s.”

“According to everyone else involved, he merely wanted to create a ruckus to draw Celine’s attention to him.”

“Perhaps he’s trying that angle again?”

“Why use me an ocean away? Why not Damien or Michael?” Cate shook her head. “It doesn’t make any sense.”

“None of this does, I agree.”

“The only thing that sticks in my head is when he told me to keep the necklace to remember him. It’s so odd. But it really doesn’t help.”

They reached the end of the passage and Jack opened the panel leading to the crypt. “The entire situation is odd. He’s a warlock. That’s more than odd. He kidnapped you for some unknown reason. Odd. He gave you a necklace likely worth thousands of pounds to remember what must have been the worst experience of your life. Only one word for it, Lady Cate: odd.”

“You know what else is odd,” Cate said as they exited the crypt into the sunny September day. “The fact that I can’t find any information about this intelligence post.”

“Maybe all these people are time traveling warlocks,” Jack suggested as they walked the path toward the castle. “And that’s why there’s no information on them.”

“I can’t believe I’m about to say this, but you make a point.”

“Cate, I was only joking.”

“I know, but that’s a fantastic way to check this out from another angle. I can ask for some names of those who work there and track them back through the records. Thanks, Jack! I'll work on that when we get back. Gosh, I hope I find something! This could be the key we're looking for!"

"Gosh, I hope we don't run into Pap. I've been sweating bullets about traveling to this time period ever since that first day."

"We avoided him once already, let's hope our luck holds out. And speaking of, maybe we should ask him about the intelligence base. He obviously knew about it."

"He was only five. He couldn't have known much."

"He knew enough to frighten you into not wanting to run into him again."

"Good point. I'll ask him when we get back. That'll be my contribution to the research."

"Invite him to dinner tonight," Cate said. "We can ask the whole group."

"Aye, that sounds like a good plan."

"Okay, one thing settled. Now, let's work on finding out who ended up in the side garden."

They approached the castle. Cate handed her bag off to Jack and used the door knocker. Smithers opened the door within moments.

"Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie," he said with a smile. "Come in. Lord MacKenzie told me to expect you. Oh, please, sir, allow me to take the bags."

"I can..." Jack began as the man wrestled the bags from his grip.

"No trouble at all, sir. I shall inform Lord MacKenzie of your arrival and then place these in your suite. Lord MacKenzie informs me you stayed there in the past. I trust you can find your way there when the time is appropriate?" He phrased the last statement as a question.

"We can, thank you," Cate said, as she strolled into the sitting room.

"At least he was friendlier today," Jack said as he paced around the room.

"I thought you were going to fight him on the bags."

Jack offered a chuckle as their conversation was interrupted by Rory's arrival. "There you are!" the man said with a grin. "I wondered all night if I'd dreamt you. I'm so pleased you have returned. Has Smithers handled your things?"

"Yes, he took the bags up. Thank you," Cate said.

“I told him to inform Amelia of your arrival. I’m certain she’ll want to see you. She arrived just before lunch.”

“I’m looking forward to seeing her again, too,” Cate said, her stomach flip-flopping at the prospect. Her great-grandmother would now be almost twenty years older, while Cate remained almost the same age. “It’s a shame we won’t be able to see Anne.”

“Oh, yes, she’ll be so sore when she finds she’s missed you. I’m quite surprised, actually, Amelia asked to visit and didn’t elect to travel to Anne’s parents’ country home.”

“Oh?” Jack inquired, prodding for more information

“Mmm, something about being in the area and wanting to show the property to her traveling companion.” Rory waved his hands in the air. “In any case, I’m pleased to have her here. The castle is far too quiet with just Oliver and me.”

A woman arrived in the open doorway to the foyer. Cate recognized her great-grandmother immediately. Streaks of gray at her temples and a few added wrinkles changed her appearance slightly from the last time Cate had seen her.

“Cate! Jack!” Amelia said, a smile lighting up her face.

“Amelia!” Cate said as the woman rushed toward her and pulled her into an embrace. She pushed away, holding out Cate’s arms and giving her a once over.

“My goodness, you look splendid. I’d swear you haven’t aged a day, Cate,” Amelia said before pulling Jack into a hug.

“Oh, it’s been more than a day,” Cate said with a nervous chuckle.

“And you, you handsome devil,” Amelia said to Jack. “You two must be living the right kind of lives!”

Smithers appeared at the doorway.

“Tea,” Rory requested, before motioning for everyone to take their seats.

Jack issued a nervous glance toward Cate. They’d pulled off their subterfuge for now. Amelia chalked up their youthful appearances to a trick of time.

“How lovely for us all to be together again,” Amelia said. “Such a shame Anne couldn’t be here.”

“Mmm, I said the same,” Cate said, as she sat across from the woman. “Rory tells us you’re here to show someone the estate?” She hoped the question wasn't too obvious, but she desperately needed information quickly.

"Oh, yes, Ruth Harper. She's a traveling companion of mine. Lucas insisted I have one, what with the war going on. He works in the Ministry of Defense now, you know. And he absolutely detested the idea of me traveling alone, though I had to get out of London."

"Oh, I hadn't realized Lucas did that type of work. And I agree, a smart move to leave London," Cate said.

"Whereabouts are you now, Jack? Still in land?" Rory questioned.

"Oh yes," Jack answered. "Though I suppose in a bit of a lull given the current state of affairs." Cate offered him a smile and a nod as he gave her a sideways glance to check his story.

"Oh, I can imagine. How dreadful this all is," Rory said, wringing his hands.

Smithers arrived with the tea and Rory busied himself playing host. Cate attempted to steer the conversation back to Amelia's traveling companion.

"Has Ruth been with you long?" Cate inquired.

"No, only a few months," Amelia said. "She's quite a smart girl, very personable. I'm very much enjoying working with her."

"Working with her?" Cate questioned.

"You know, traveling and such. We get on well and so on. You'd quite like her, Cate."

"I'm certain I would. I'd love to meet her."

"We'll have to arrange it."

"Ask her to join us for dinner tonight, Amelia," Rory said. Cate's pulse quickened as she awaited Amelia's answer.

"Oh, shouldn't we keep it family?"

Rory shook his head as he responded. "Some of the wonderful folks from the base will be joining us. The more the merrier."

"Oh! How lovely. I shall definitely invite her then."

Conversation turned to their activities over the years. Cate's grandfather, Amelia's son, Charles, returned to a boarding school in the English countryside for the term. He'd finish his final year there before going on to university.

Cate and Jack made up a few interesting tidbits about travel to fill in gaps in the conversation. The party broke up in the mid-afternoon with promises to continue their discussions over dinner.

Cate and Jack retreated to their bedroom suite. Jack tossed himself onto the chaise and scrubbed his face.

“Thank heavens Amelia thinks we’ve just got good genes,” he said.

Cate paced the length of the room, lost in her thoughts.

Jack propped himself up on his elbows. “Cate? You haven’t gone funny on me, have you?”

“No,” she said as she twirled around to amble in the opposite direction.

Jack raised his eyebrows as she spun to face him again. “Anything you’d like to share?”

Cate puckered her lips. “Amelia said she enjoyed working with Ruth.”

“So?”

“Why phrase it that way? That was odd.”

“You’re reading into things. I mean, the girl is literally an employee. She just accompanies Amelia wherever she goes for pay. So it’s not that odd of a phrase.”

Cate’s mind continued to churn. “Even if you don’t think the phrase is odd, think about the timing. Amelia loves working with her. And in two days she’ll leave for another position. Something doesn’t add up here.”

“Amelia likes working with Ruth. We don’t know Ruth likes working for Amelia.”

Cate sighed. “I guess. I can’t wait to meet her. I’m going to try to pry some information from her so I can track her down.”

“Go get ‘em, tiger,” Jack said with a grin.

Cate glanced out of the window. “Want to take a walk?”

“I was comfy where I was,” Jack protested.

“Okay, I’ll leave you lounging. I’m going to poke around the intelligence tent.” Cate strode to the door with a determined step.

“Are you serious?” Jack asked, bouncing up from lounging to sitting.

“Yes. Maybe I can find something out that will further my research.”

“Wait, wait,” Jack said, groaning as he pulled himself up to standing. “I’ll come with you.”

“You don’t have to. I’ll be perfectly fine.”

“Famous last words. The last time I let you out of my sight on one of these trips a warlock kidnapped you.”

“Let’s hope that doesn’t happen again,” Cate groaned, as she pulled the door open.

“I’m going to hedge my bet,” Jack answered her.

Cate and Jack strolled through the halls and wandered into the bright sunshine outside. As they rounded a corner of the castle, a small boy leapt from a tree across the property.

“Oh, no,” Jack groaned. “Hurry up before he spots us.”

Cate couldn’t help but chuckle. “Too late,” she said, as the little boy’s face scrunched up as he shielded his eyes and glared at the pair of them. He raced up the hill toward them.

“Great! I should have stayed behind.”

Cate patted Jack’s arm. “Let me do the talking.”

The little boy skidded to a stop in front of them and poked a finger toward them. “You two again, eh?”

CHAPTER 22

Cate winced at the little boy in front of them, holding up her hands. “Guilty.”

Stanley raised his eyebrows. “Have you come to join the others at the base?”

“That’s where we’re headed right now.”

“Oh, lollygagging, huh?”

“What?” Cate inquired with a small laugh.

“You don’t seem to be in a hurry. Haven’t you got work to do? My Da says they’re having a terrible time with the codes. And another convoy was attacked as a result.”

“That’s terrible. I’m not certain we’ll be of much assistance. We’re actually visiting Jack’s cousin, Lord MacKenzie.”

“Oh. I didn’t realize you were MacKenzies.”

Cate smiled and nodded. “Yes, we are.”

Stanley eyed Jack head to toe. “You don’t look like one,” he said. “In fact, you remind me of my Da.”

Jack chuckled nervously. “You don’t say, laddie.”

Stanley stood firm in his words. He crossed his arms and stared at Jack again. Suddenly, his expression changed. “Got to go!” he shouted. With a twirl, he was gone, racing down to the tree and scampering up into its limbs.

“I saw that!” a Scottish accent said behind them.

Cate and Jack spun to find Lachlan Reid, Stanley's father, and Jack's great-grandfather, striding down the path toward them.

"Jack and Cate," he said, recognizing them. "Rory told me you were here. Wonderful to see you again."

"Thanks," Cate said with a grin as Jack shook Lachlan's hand.

"I see you've met Stanley." He pointed to the tree.

"Aye, we did."

"I hope he hasn't been too much of a bother. He can be a little prickly."

"I'm used to it," Jack said.

"Still irascible in your time, is he?"

"Oh, you know it," Jack said with a chuckle.

"Well, I won't interrupt your walk. Hope to see you again, though."

With a wave, Lachlan strode toward the tree, leaving Jack and Cate to continue their walk to the tent.

They overheard him demanding Stanley come down from the branch he perched on and that he hoped he hadn't been bothering the MacKenzies.

"I was not!" they heard the little boy shout as he shimmied down the tree.

Cate couldn't hold in a giggle. "He really is a character," she noted as they approached the canvas hut.

"You'd almost suspect he's a MacKenzie with that cheek," Jack said, with a shake of his head.

"Very funny, Jack. We're not that cheeky of a bunch."

"Oh, really?" Jack questioned playfully. "Tell me that again when we're in our own century. It's thanks to you cheeky buggers that we're able to do this, after all. Jamie was thoroughly against it if you recall."

"And it's a good thing we can," Cate said. "Look at all the good we've done!"

"Yeah, I'm just waiting for the moment something terrible happens."

"Don't be a negative Nellie," Cate warned, as they closed the gap and arrived at the tent. Cate pushed through into the interior, blinking as her eyes adjusted from the bright sunshine to the dim light inside.

A few people worked away at the tables; others bustled around the make-shift room. A blonde man passed them, slowing his step and staring at them.

"Can I help you?" he asked in a British accent.

“Hi,” Cate said. “Maybe. I’m Cate MacKenzie and this is my husband, Jack.” Jack waved and nodded. “We’re cousins of Lord MacKenzie. He showed us the base yesterday. And I was wondering if anyone could provide us with more information.”

“Oh,” the man said, his brow wrinkling as he scratched his head, “well, I’m afraid there isn’t much information I can share. It’s all classified, you see.”

“I don’t mean the messages, but just some information about how you came to be here.”

“Oh, right. Well, I suppose I can share that much. Actually, we come from all over. I’m from Kent. My parents emigrated from Germany when I was six. So, I grew up speaking German. And I’m very good at pattern detection. At least I’d like to think so.” The man gave an awkward laugh.

“How interesting,” Cate said. “So, are you a mathematician?”

“Yes, I was recruited out of a college by the Defense Ministry at the start of the war. Initially, I was based in London, however, with the blitz, several of us were moved.”

“So, all of you came from London originally?”

“No, just Victor and me. I’m Hans, by the way. Hans Schmidt.”

“Nice to meet you, Hans,” Cate said. “It must be difficult moving here and working with a new group.”

“It can be, though everyone here is quite professional. A large portion of our group went to Bletchley Park. We were split in the event that something should happen. A sort of a ‘don’t put all of your eggs in one basket’ approach.”

“I see. Very smart.”

Hans smiled and nodded. “Well, we won’t keep you from your work any longer,” Cate said. “Thank you so much for explaining everything.”

“You’re very welcome,” Hans said with a nod of his head. He strode away, taking a seat at the table and shuffling through several papers.

Jack and Cate exited into the bright sunshine. “Well, did you learn what you wanted to?” Jack inquired.

“Hans didn’t give me much to go on, but he did say some of them came from London.”

“How does that help?”

Cate shrugged. “Maybe it doesn’t, though we do have one name and half of another. Perhaps I can track information on Hans and use it to link to Ruth in some way.”

“Do you believe they’re connected?”

“It’s a long shot, but we have to start somewhere. And if Ruth disappeared and ended up murdered and buried in the garden, someone here killed her. So, someone is connected to her.”

“Could have been a crime of opportunity,” Jack suggested.

“As in a random person here is a killer and kills Ruth for no reason?”

“Sure. She’s in the wrong place at the wrong time, maybe.”

Cate considered it, then shook her head. “It doesn’t add up. There has to be a motive beyond it.”

“Maybe she saw or heard something she shouldn’t.”

“Okay, so the killer has no prior connection to Ruth, but she overhears or sees something she shouldn’t and he…”

“Or she,” Jack added.

“Right, he or she strikes, kills Ruth and buries her in the garden.”

“The garden burial suggests it wasn’t pre-planned.”

“I agree. It suggests the killer acted in haste and dumped the body in the most readily available space. It wouldn’t be questioned because there’s planting being done there.”

“So now that I’ve blown your tenuous chance at tracking down information to bits, what would you like to do?”

“You haven’t blown it to bits,” Cate said with a chuckle. “I can still use the information Hans gave me to try to ferret out a clue as to what Ruth may or may not have heard.”

They slipped back inside the castle. “And let’s hope we gather even more information at dinner tonight. Then, I can track down all the leads when we get back.”

“Wait for dinner, then,” Jack concluded from Cate’s statements.

“Right,” she said with a nod, as they threaded through the halls and back to their suite.

Cate spent the short time before the meal pacing the floor. “It’s amazing how reliant we’ve become on the internet,” she lamented as she made her twelfth trek across the floor. “I feel practically helpless here.”

“What did they do in a time before Google?” Jack asked.

“It was called a library, I think,” Cate joked.

“I suppose we could have gone into town to the library. I wonder if there’s a 1942 version of Mrs. Campbell there, waiting to spring a random party on an unsuspecting castle owner.” Jack rubbed his chin in faux thought.

“There may be, in which case we’d draw too much attention. Plus, we don’t have enough time before dinner.” Cate checked the clock on the mantle. “I suppose we should be getting ready, in fact.”

After a change of clothes, Jack and Cate made their way to the sitting room, finding Amelia there with a woman. Her dirty blonde hair was pulled back in a neat bun. Large eyes and red lips were set in a round face. Cate pegged her to be in her mid-thirties.

“Jack, Cate! I hope the rest of your afternoon went well,” Amelia said.

“It did,” Cate answered, hoping she wasn’t too obvious when eyeing Ruth.

“This is my traveling companion, Ruth Harper. Ruth, this is Jack and Cate MacKenzie, distant cousins of Rory’s.”

“How lovely to meet you both,” Ruth said.

Rory entered the room moments later, followed by Rita Haverford, Hans, and a tall, well-muscled, dark-haired man. Rory introduced the unknown man as Victor Richard. Cate assumed he was the Victor mentioned earlier by Hans when they’d visited the intelligence hut.

As Rory introduced Hans, Cate said, “Nice to see you again.”

“Oh, I hadn’t realized you two knew each other,” Rory said.

“We met earlier this afternoon,” Cate explained. “Hans was kind enough to tell us more about the formation of the base.”

Hans smiled broadly at her. “Well, I’m afraid I wasn’t very much help, but I’m glad to know I provided you with some information.”

After a few more minutes of small talk, they shuffled into the dining room. “We’re evenly split between genders, so seating should be simple,” Rory said. “Anne would be so proud of me.”

“I shall be sure to inform her of your balanced dinner prowess when I see her next,” Amelia said as they sat down.

Cate found herself sandwiched between Hans and Victor. Jack, across the table from her, sat between Amelia and Rita. Cate flashed Jack an “oh well” look as they both found themselves separated from Ruth.

Cate began her pre-meal discussion with Hans. “Hello, again, Mrs. MacKenzie,” he said with a shy smile. “I do hope you are enjoying your stay at the castle.”

“Yes, I am. And what about you. You said you’re from London originally?”

“Oh, no, Kent.”

“Oh, right. Yes, your initial base was in London.”

“Yes, that’s right.”

“This must be quite a change for you then.”

“Oh, quite. None of the conveniences of the modern city, though also none of the drawbacks.”

“So, you’re enjoying the quiet countryside?”

“Well, it’s quieter. We still have the occasional flyovers. In fact, there was a dog fight nearby recently.” The man pulled his lips into a thin line. “I’m sorry,” he said, after a moment, “bad memories from London.”

Cate offered him a consoling glance. “Forgive me for bringing it up. We don’t have to discuss it further.”

He twisted the corners of his mouth into a tight smile, though a pained expression still shined through his features. Amelia turned toward Jack for a conversation, and Cate took the opportunity to end her awkward discussion with Hans and turn her attention to Victor.

“Hello, I’m Cate.”

“Lovely to meet one of Lord MacKenzie’s relatives. The poor man has been overrun by us of late, I’m afraid.”

“I’m sure he doesn’t mind,” Cate said. “The work you’re doing is so vital. I know Lord MacKenzie is very pleased to do anything to help the war effort. So, where are you from originally? Hans said you came from the London office. Was London also your home?”

“No, I’m originally from Leeds. Born and bred.”

“Oh!” Cate furrowed her brow in mock confusion. “So, no German connection?”

“Heavens no!” Victor exclaimed with a chuckle.

“So, how is it that you can decipher the German missives. Or am I being short-sighted in terms of how the intelligence works?”

“Not at all. I took three years of German in my uni days.”

“I see. Well, that explains it. And are you also a mathematician?”

“Yes, with a concentration in the study of codes.”

“And Hans said you worked together in London?”

“Yes, we did. We were both in the London office since the start of the war until we moved here. Our building was destroyed in a blast.”

“Oh, I’m so sorry to hear that.”

Another awkward end of the conversation as Smithers entered with a footman and the first course. Cate glanced across the table, her eyes widening at the scene. Rita leaned indecently close to Jack. With her elbow propped on the table, she rested her chin in her hand, her head cocked flirtatiously. She batted her eyelashes at him as she lifted a shoulder and offered him a pout, letting her free hand fall onto his forearm.

Cate narrowed her eyes at the woman. Jack glanced at Cate. She offered him an unimpressed glance. Jack offered her a “what?” expression and a shrug. Cate puckered her lips and shook her head.

“Oh, please tell Mrs. Bakewell the soup smells divine,” Rory said.

Cate softened her expression and smiled at Rory. Perhaps now the conversation could include the whole table and she’d learn more about Ruth. She was certain Jack didn’t learn much from Rita beyond how quickly the woman could flutter her eyelashes.

At the first break in the conversation, Cate interjected a question for Amelia. “Have you been traveling very much, Amelia?”

“Mmm, quite a bit, yes.”

Cate found it odd given the current state of affairs. Usually, in wartime, activities were quelled. “And do you enjoy the traveling, Ruth?” Cate inquired.

“I do, yes. I’ve always been a bit of a rolling stone, I suppose. So the travel suits me.”

Cate smiled at her. “And where are you from originally?”

“Manchester,” Ruth said, without skipping a beat.

“Are your parents still there?”

“No. They both passed away when I was nineteen.”

“Oh, what a shame. Both my parents passed when I was young as well.”

Ruth offered her a polite smile. Cate narrowed her eyes at the reaction. Given that information, she thought there would have been a reaction of kindredness between them.

“No other family?” Cate pressed.

“One brother. His plane went down over Germany last year, though.”

“Oh, how tragic. I’m so sorry,” Cate said. She returned to sipping at her soup. Her conversations were winding up awkward at every turn. At this rate, she’d never discover any information.

She allowed the rest of the dinner conversation to be led by Rory and Amelia. Cate detected no awkwardness between Amelia and Ruth that would suggest the woman would suddenly leave her position. Amelia had told the reporter she left for a better job. What position would be “better,” particularly when she’d indicated her love for travel?

Cate mulled it over as the conversation continued around her. The party broke up early, with the codebreakers turning in for a long day of work the following day. Cate and Jack chatted with Amelia and Rory for another few moments before excusing themselves for an evening walk.

They returned to the crypt, entered the secret passage, and in short order were back in their own time period.

“Meet in the library as usual?” Jack asked, as they took the back stairs up to the bedrooms to change.

“Sure,” Cate said.

Jack narrowed his eyes at her curt response as they wound through the halls. “You feeling okay?”

“I’m fine,” Cate said, attempting to keep her annoyance in check. “See you soon.”

Cate slipped into her bedroom, making her way straight to the music box. She wound it and set it on the nightstand to play as she changed back into normal clothes. The music soothed her frayed nerves.

Her conversations had been a bust. She hoped whatever small details she’d gleaned could lead them to a breakthrough, though she didn’t hold out much hope. She wondered if Jack had learned anything. Her eyes narrowed, and she frowned as she recalled buxom blonde Rita gushing over him at the dinner table. The nerve of the woman to openly flirt with someone else’s husband. She reminded herself she and Jack weren’t married, though Rita wasn’t aware of that fact.

Perhaps they could solicit some information this evening at the staff dinner. As she finished dressing, Cate closed her eyes and let the music melt away any tension. Her odd statement to Jack was proving true. She did love the music box.

Reluctantly, she left the tinkling object behind and made her way to the library. She found Jack wrestling with Riley over a toy, while Bailey gnawed on the ear of a stuffed moose.

Cate collected a notebook and pen before collapsing into her armchair. She began jotting notes.

“This looks promising,” Jack said.

“I’m just jotting down names and the few bits of information I got from them to help me find information.” She finished her list and glanced at Jack. “Did you happen to get any information from Rita, or was it all batting eyelashes and rubbing your forearm?”

An amused expression crossed Jack’s features. “Why, Lady Cate, whatever are you talking about?”

“I’m talking about Rita Haverford shamelessly flirting with a married man.”

“I wouldn’t call it flirting.”

Cate screwed up her face. “What would you call it?”

“She seems very friendly.”

“I’ll say.”

“I’m starting to believe you’re jealous, Lady Cate.”

“I just don’t like the type of woman who would flirt with another woman’s husband. Especially when the woman is right there!”

“Oh, right.”

“Look who’s talking. I still haven’t heard the end of calling Grayson Buckley handsome.”

“Nor of your budding relationship with a certain shipbuilder of yore turned modern-day computer scientist.”

“Anyway,” Cate said, getting the conversation back on track, “did you learn anything from blonde and buxom?”

“Yes. She told me how much she enjoys long walks on the beach and roses.”

“You’re kidding?”

Jack chuckled. “Yes, I am. She wasn’t that obvious.”

“I should hope not!”

“And to answer your question, no. I did not find out much from Ms. Rita Haverford. She had a way of steering the conversation back to me at every turn.”

“And neither of us were sitting near Ruth, so we couldn’t grill her.”

“I’ll try tomorrow if she’s at dinner. And I’ll keep away from Rita before she ruins our marriage.” Jack made a frightened face.

“I’m certain Anne would feel the same way if she saw the looks Rita gives Rory.”

“Really?” Jack questioned.

“You didn’t notice her perk up yesterday when we went to the tent? That demure smile she gave him? And with her behavior earlier, I’d say she does this a lot.”

“Maybe she’s just a flirt.”

Cate tapped her pencil against the notepad. “Well, this isn’t much to go on, but I suppose it’s a start. I’ll have to work fast, though, we don’t have much time.”

“Maybe we’ll learn more tonight at dinner.”

“That’s my sincere hope.”

“Until then, let’s set up the cameras for later.”

“Good idea.”

They spent the remaining time before dinner adding the camera apps to Jack’s phone and testing them. Jack also placed the camera from the library in the large room the dogs and Cate continued to frequent, suggesting Cate stay away from the space for the time being.

With the collar cam attached to a bracelet, they were set to monitor any of Cate’s movements overnight.

As they finished the tasks, a knock sounded at the door. Cate ushered a waiting Stanley Reid into the foyer.

“Hello there, lassie,” he said, as he removed his hat.

“Hi, Mr. Reid. I’m so glad you could make it.”

“I’ll never turn down Emily’s cooking,” Stanley said. “And I hear the whippersnapper from across the pond isn’t so bad at it either.”

“Molly is a fantastic cook and baker,” Cate agreed.

“We should head down,” Jack said.

“Oh? I thought I was early,” Stanley said.

“I’m hungry, though,” Jack answered.

“Okay, okay. Though I doubt you’ll hurry Emily along if she’s not ready.”

“I can try,” Jack said.

“And how are you feeling, lassie?” Stanley inquired of Cate. “Jackie said you were having some issues?”

“Oh, I’m okay. Just experiencing a few strange incidents stemming from the necklace I returned with from 1792.”

“From that odd Duke fellow?”

“Yes,” Cate said, as they descended the stairs.

“Well, I hope you sort it out soon. And keep me in the loop, especially if I can be of any help in figuring things out. I love a good mystery.”

“What’s a mystery?” Emily said as they entered.

Stanley winced and shot Cate an apologetic glance.

“An intelligence base at Dunhaven Castle in World War II,” Cate answered, covering their conversation.

Mrs. Fraser stopped in her tracks, her brow furrowing. “Well, that was before my time, but I cannae say I’ve ever heard of it.”

Mr. Fraser concurred. “Aye, me neither.”

“I’ve come across a reference to one,” Cate mentioned. “It would have been during Rory’s time. But Mrs. Campbell hadn’t heard of it either.”

“Well, there’s your answer, Lady Cate. If the busybody herself doesn’t have the scoop, no one does,” Mrs. Fraser said with a nod, setting a salad on the table and greeting Stanley.

“How about you, Pap?” Jack said. “You go back that far. You remember an intelligence base here at the castle?”

Stanley wrinkled his face in thought. “You know, for the longest time as a child, I thought there was. But my Da said no.”

Cate and Jack shared a glance. Young Stanley Reid had most certainly been aware of the intelligence base. They’d discussed it.

Stanley chuckled for a moment before he continued. “I must have made up a fantastical story about that. Years later, well after the war, I asked my father about it. ‘There was no intelligence base here, you daft bugger,’ he said to me.

“And I said, ‘Yes, of course, there was. In a big tent behind the castle.’” Stanley chuckled again. “He said my little mind was making up stories. For the longest time, I really believed Dunhaven was the center of intelligence for the Crown. Ah, the stories a young laddie will make up to entertain himself.”

Cate’s mind processed the information. She smiled at Stanley as the conversation turned to another subject. Why had Lachlan lied to Stanley? As a child of only five, his memory may be hazy enough to pull it off, but Cate was well aware of its existence. And of Lachlan’s knowledge of it. What were they trying to cover up by denying it existed? Was it murder?

CHAPTER 23

Cate and Jack walked Stanley upstairs after their dinner. “Where’s your car, Pap?”

“I walked,” the man said, raising his chin with pride.

“Why?” Jack said. “Now you’ve got to walk back.

“Aye,” the man said. “Good exercise for me.”

“And good exercise for me worrying something will happen to you on the way back.”

Stanley gave Jack a roll of his eyes. “I’m not a wee child, Jackie. A little walk won’t hurt.”

“I’ll drive you.”

The man waved away the offer. “I’ll send you a text when I get there.”

“No,” Jack said. “I’ve got enough worries without adding to the pile. Come on, you can get your exercise walking to get the car with me.”

“If you don’t mind, I’ll tag along,” Cate said. “There’s something I’d like to discuss with you.”

They stepped out into the cool spring air. “What is it, lassie? Your troubles with that madman?”

“No,” Cate said as the gravel crunched beneath their feet.

“I know what it is,” Jack said, with a glance at both of them.

“Oh, do you, smart guy? Do you mind sharing it?”

“It’s about the intelligence base,” Cate said.

“I already told you. There was no intelligence base on the property. Sorry, lassie.”

“But there was,” Cate said. “We’ve seen it.”

“And even better, Pap, so have you,” Jack said.

Stanley ceased his walking and shifted his gaze between them. “What?”

“As a matter of fact, we talked to you about it,” Jack said.

Stanley’s face turned into a mask of confusion.

“You probably don’t remember,” Cate said. “You were only five. But we’ve spoken to you about the tent in 1942. You told us it was an intelligence base.”

“Right after you asked me if I had flat feet or if I was a Nazi,” Jack added.

“And Rory MacKenzie confirmed the tent was an intelligence base. We’ve been inside it. We’ve spoken to the people who worked there.”

Stanley took a moment to process the information. He stared into space as he started to slowly shake his head. “But Da said...”

“I know what Lachlan told you, Pap, but there was an intelligence base there. One he was very much aware of.”

“Why would he lie?”

Cate shared a glance with Jack before she turned her gaze back to Stanley. “I’m not sure. But there was most certainly a base on these grounds in 1942.”

“Can I ask what you two are doing in 1942?”

“Investigating a murder,” Jack said, as they reached the garage.

“We think the body from the garden was buried in that time frame. We started with that year since a woman went missing from Dunhaven Castle. It was explained away, but we didn’t have any other leads. When we arrived, we found an intelligence base. What I can’t figure out is why there is no record of it. And now I’m further baffled by the fact that your father told you it didn’t exist.”

“I don’t know what to say,” Stanley said, as they slid into the car and Jack pulled down the driveway. “I just can’t believe Da would have lied to me.”

“Perhaps he didn’t have a choice. But the question is why did they have to keep it secret? It couldn’t have been confidential information,” Cate said. “People would have been aware of its existence. Why deny it?”

“I wish I could tell you, lassie, though if you learn anything, I’d appreciate hearing about it. So, all that time I thought there was a base, I was right. Oh, why did you lie, Da?”

Cate flicked her eyes to Jack. “Don’t get too upset over it, Pap. It could be for any reason.”

“Perhaps a similar reason to why you couldn’t share the information about the time travel secret with us when I first came. There must be a reason. As soon as we find out, we’ll let you know.”

“Thank you. I appreciate that, lassie.”

They dropped the older man off at his cottage and started their return trip to the castle. “Gosh, I feel terrible about bringing this up to your grandfather,” Cate said as they pulled away from the small house.

“Why?”

“Well, his father lied to him. I shouldn’t have pushed it. He thought he’d just made it up in his mind, and now he is wondering why Lachlan lied to him.”

“There’s a reason, you can be sure of it. And I’d like to know what it was. We need to get to the bottom of this.”

“I agree. Do you think the covering up of the base could be connected to the murder?”

“As in, they shut down the base and didn’t speak of it again after the murder?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod.

“That seems a stretch, even if they were related. Surely, they would just remove the person responsible and keep the base operational.”

Cate pursed her lips as she considered it. “Yeah, you’re probably right. So, we may have two mysteries on our hands here.”

“Looks that way,” Jack said, as he eased the car into the garage.

“Well, I hope we can solve one or the other soon,” Cate said, as they wandered back to the castle in the waning light.

“I’d also like to solve our present-day mystery,” Jack said.

Cate sighed as she considered heading to bed for the night. She wondered if the camera app would awaken Jack as she wandered around the castle babbling nonsense.

She rubbed the back of her neck. “I just hope we like the ending.”

Jack wrapped his arm around her shoulders. “It’ll be okay, Cate. I won’t let anything happen to you.”

Cate gave him a nervous smile and a nod. Though she worried they may not have a say in the final outcome.

* * *

Cate heard the tinkling music emanating from the music box even before she opened her eyes. Despite the trepidation it caused, she found herself enjoying the music and feeling comforted by it. She rolled over and stared at the music box on her nightstand.

The music began to slow. Cate pulled herself up to sit and grabbed the small object, turning the winding key again. Odd that it played all night long but sometimes needed wound to continue. She set the musical item on her nightstand and rose from the bed. As she lifted her hand from the piano, her fingers brushed against the tiny keys.

The small keyboard lifted up before clapping back into place with a small thud. Cate cocked her head at the piano and squatted down to study it at eye level. She reached her thumb toward the keyboard and gently pushed it upward. The keys swung upward revealing a small cubby.

A yellowed piece of paper lay within the well. Cate carefully lifted the scrap of paper from within the piano's hiding spot with her thumb and forefinger.

She unfolded the small paper fragment. Her eyes bulged at what her brain registered on the page. She dropped it, scrambling back a few steps and clutching her abdomen. The small sliver fluttered to the floor, landing face up.

Cate continued to stare at the black ink on the page. "You've always loved this," it read. Cate recognized the statement as something she'd imparted to Jack in one of her trances. She also recognized something else about the note. It was written in her own handwriting.

Damien's text flashed through her mind. She recalled his quote from Duke Northcott. "Whatever Catherine is experiencing is a result of her own doing."

She sank onto the bed and allowed her mind to dwell on the only question she could come up with: what was going on here?

A knock sounded at her door, and she hurried to open it. "Good morning, Jack. Did I wake you last night?"

"No," Jack said. "You were surprisingly quiet. I'm shocked, actually."

"Perhaps it was because of the time travel," Cate said.

"I almost hoped you had woken me last night."

"Why?"

“We’re no closer to a solution.”

“That’s not exactly true,” Cate said.

“Oh? Something happen that I don’t know about?”

Cate nodded and motioned for him to follow her. “This morning, I woke up to the music box playing. Surprise, surprise. Anyway, I touched it, and the keys moved. Upon further inspection, I found a hidden compartment.” Cate snatched the paper from the floor where it had fallen moments ago while the dogs raced to Jack’s side.

“Good morning, boys,” he said, ruffling their fur.

“This was inside.” She passed the note to Jack.

He read it aloud: “You’ve always loved this.” He screwed up his face. “That’s almost exactly what you told me while you were in your trance.”

Cate nodded. “I know. And here’s an even creepier part.”

Jack studied the note for another moment before flicking his gaze to Cate. “Which is?”

“That’s my handwriting.”

Jack’s eyes shifted back to the note. “Are you sure?”

“Positive. I recognize my own writing. Which makes the statement Damien passed along from Duke Northcott even more disturbing.”

“Cate,” Jack said with a tilt of his head. “You can’t be serious. You aren’t doing this to yourself.”

“How do you explain this then? The same statement I made to you, written by my own hand.”

“Impossible. This looks old. Look at the paper.”

“I know that, but...”

“But what? You wrote that note to yourself a hundred years ago?”

“It’s not like we don’t have that capability, Jack.”

Jack pursed his lips. “But you haven’t done it. You don’t remember it. You couldn’t have done this.”

“Then how do you explain it?”

“That warlock probably can pull this off with the snap of his fingers. It’s a trick. To play with your mind.”

“Why?” Cate asked.

“That I don’t know. But I know you didn’t do this.” He handed the note back to her. “And I’m glad the effect of this thing seems to be waning. I’d venture to say this little note is a desperate attempt to try to revive the effect this thing has on you.”

Cate rubbed her fingers along the text. "I hope you're right."

"Well, think about it. You didn't sleepwalk last night. You didn't even get up to get the necklace from the jewelry armoire. Let's hope this thing has run its course."

Cate nodded. "Fingers crossed."

Jack squeezed her shoulder. "I'll let you get dressed for breakfast. See you downstairs?"

"Yep," Cate said with a smile.

She dressed to the strains of the music box. Her conversation with Jack played over in her mind. Perhaps he had a point. Her wandering through the castle at night had become less frequent.

Still, something nagged at her. Could it be that easy? Could the enchantment have simply "run its course?"

This may be a question for Damien. After Cate let the dogs out, she sent a quick text to Damien. Still the middle of the night in Maine, she doubted she'd receive an answer for several hours.

Just as an update, no weird sleepwalking last night. Jack suggested the effect could be waning. Is that possible? Thanks!

Cate shoved the phone into her pocket and shooed the dogs into the castle. She planned to take her breakfast to the library and begin work on tracking down any leads from those she'd met in 1942.

Cate pulled her laptop open the moment she got to the library. She began a search for Ruth Harper using the little bit of information she'd listed on her notepad. She found no record of a Ruth Harper with a brother, older or younger, from Manchester between the ages of twenty-five to forty.

Cate expanded her search to find a male and female with the last name Harper who passed away between the years of 1921 and 1936. She found no deaths matching the description.

With a sigh, she moved on to the next name on this list. She searched for Victor Richard from Leeds. It quickly led to a dead end.

She began to wonder if Jack's theory, however fantastic it sounded, was true. Perhaps these people were time travelers or immortals.

Halfway through her search, her phone chimed. Damien must also be an early riser, she thought, as she spotted his name on her phone's display.

I'm glad to hear things have settled down. Umm... I'd keep an eye out still, don't let your guard down.

Cate typed back: That sounds ominous. Do these things not wane?

She received a quick response. I've never seen that happen. There's usually some culmination. That being said, I'm still a newbie to this world, too. It very well could happen!

Cate bit her lower lip as she typed her response. You say Celine suffered from a few similar incidents. What was the culmination of those?

Three dots appeared as Damien typed. They disappeared with no message replacing them. They appeared again. The dots toggled on and off three more times before a message finally came through.

Ummm, well her situation was sort of different, so I'm not sure we can directly compare the two. In fact, it may be best not to. Do you happen to have a doctor there who can hypnotize you and see if you can tell them anything while you're under?

Cate stared at the odd message. "Hypnosis?" she questioned aloud. "Is he serious?"

With a shake of her head, she typed back: No, I don't have a doctor like that.

She tapped the phone against her chin as she considered his message. She typed another message and sent it. It seems like you're avoiding telling me what happened with Celine.

Damien responded: No, just hard to explain over text.

Moments later, she got another message: I can call if you have a minute?

Cate blew out a long breath as she typed an affirmative and waited for her phone to ring. She answered it on the first jangle.

"Hey, Damien," she said. "Thanks for calling, and sorry if that message sounded rude or pushy."

"Hey, Cate," Damien's voice answered her. "No, it's no problem at all. You're almost as good as Celine at catching me when I'm not being completely upfront."

"I just wanted to know if there's anything I should look out for. You said Celine has experienced this. How did it end for her?"

"Well, I mean, she is completely different from you. And she's experienced things similar to this, but not exactly identical."

"What were the similarities and differences?"

A knock sounded and Cate peeked at the door. Jack waved. She motioned for him to enter. "Hey Damien, before you start, can I put you on speakerphone? Jack's here."

“Sure, Cate.” Cate toggled on her speakerphone.

“Hi, Damien.”

“Hey, Jack. Uh, so similarities and differences between your situation and Celine’s. Well, in one instance when she had these sort of trancelike blackouts, she was poisoned, and you haven’t been, so that’s not similar.”

“Wait,” Jack said. “Are we sure she hasn’t been poisoned? How can we be sure?”

“Um, well,” Damien stammered, “pretty sure because you’d be dead already.”

“But Celine didn’t die,” Jack said.

“Celine’s not human. Anyway, um, the other time she didn’t really have trances, but she kept having these attacks. Physical symptoms where she’d get headaches or nausea. Again, not similar to yours in symptoms.”

“Well, I have had some of that, but I’m not certain it’s related to my trances. I think it’s related to stress. Mostly I’ve just been wandering around in a trance. What happened to her in that instance?”

Silence met her question.

CHAPTER 24

“Damien? Are you there?” Cate questioned when he didn’t respond.

“Yeah,” his voice squeaked. “Uh, that time she was kidnapped by the Duke.”

“What?” Cate said, her eyes going wide.

“Yeah, umm, it was proximity to him causing her attacks, until he finally just nabbed her.”

Cate shot Jack a glance.

“Okay, so could that be what’s going on here?” Jack inquired.

“No. I mean, the Duke’s not there. He’s here, so it’s not proximity.”

“If he disappears, can you let us know? He’s kidnapped Cate once already. I don’t want him to do it again.”

“Sure thing, no problem. It’s too bad you can’t get a better handle on this through hypnosis.”

“Is that a typical approach you use?” Jack said.

“Yep. Millie – she’s a doctor, she lives with us, she does it all the time. You try to induce the trance in a controlled setting and see what happens.”

“We’ll keep that in mind. I was hoping this was blowing over,” Jack said.

“Yeah, that’s what Cate said. Though these things tend to come in waves, so I’d stay vigilant for now. But like I said, the Duke was completely unhelpful, which isn’t surprising. But if he suddenly disappears, you’ll be the first to know.”

“Thanks, Damien,” Cate said. “By the way, time travel did alleviate some of the symptoms.”

“Oh, really? That’s great! Well, you can always do that until we can figure this thing out! Oh, the other thing you can try is asking Cate leading questions when she’s in a trance.”

“Leading questions?”

“Yeah, like why she thinks you wouldn’t be there or what year it is. That kind of stuff. It’s sometimes helpful in determining what you’re dealing with. Not like crazy helpful, but it may give you some ideas as to what’s going on.”

Jack nodded. “Okay, I’ll try that, though I’m hoping I don’t find her in any trances.”

“Fingers crossed, but if you do, you have some strategies.”

“Okay, yeah. Well, thanks for the call, Damien. I’ll keep you informed,” Cate said.

“Sounds good. Hang in there, Cate. We’ll figure this out.”

They said their goodbyes and Cate ended the call.

“Great, time travel is our solution to this!” Jack exclaimed, as she shoved the phone in her pocket.

“Or hypnosis.”

Jack shook his head. “So, he thought there was no chance it was just running its course?”

“He didn’t seem to think so. That’s what I texted him about. Your theory. I figured if anyone knew if that could happen, it would be Damien. And once again, after speaking with Damien, I feel worse.”

Jack put his hands on his hips and drew his lips into a thin line. “Could we try the hypnosis thing?”

“What?” Cate inquired. “Are you serious?”

“How hard could it be?” Jack asked. “Look at the sparkly thing and relax, I’ll count backward. You’re hypnotized.”

“I’m not certain it’s quite that easy.”

“Let’s try it.”

“Are you serious?”

“Why not? What’s the worst that can happen? I fail miserably.”

“Fine. I’m not getting anywhere with the research anyway,” Cate said with a huff.

Jack pulled out his phone and performed an internet search on hypnosis. "Okay, I'm ready. Ah, give me your timepiece."

"This is ridiculous," Cate said.

"Just give it to me." He wiggled his fingers at her, signaling her to hand it over.

Cate removed the chain from her neck and passed it to Jack. "Okay, now you sit here in your chair. Get comfy. Just relax. And now look at the pocket watch. Focus on the pocket watch." Jack set the timepiece into motion, swinging it back and forth like a pendulum. "You're getting sleepy. You're feeling very relaxed. Close your eyes."

Cate's eyes drifted closed.

"You're feeling more and more relaxed. I'm going to count backward from ten. And when I reach one, you'll be completely relaxed." Jack began his countdown. When he reached one, he asked, "Are you relaxed, Cate?"

Cate sat motionless in her chair. After a moment, one eyelid popped open. She shook her head.

"Damn it," Jack said with a sigh. "Okay, it's not as easy as it looks."

Cate opened both eyes and chuckled, as Jack collapsed into his chair and passed the timepiece back to her. She looped it over her head. "Don't feel bad. When I first came, I considered holding a seance."

"That does make me feel better, actually."

"Damien makes a few compelling points about the differences in what I'm experiencing. So, there's a chance you're still correct. We have no idea what's going on here."

Jack sighed. "Well, on to another subject. You haven't found anything in your search?"

"Nothing but dead ends. No Ruth Harpers matching anything she told us. No Victor Richard either. I was about to move on to Hans and ravishing Rita."

Jack chuckled at Cate's nickname for the blonde looker. "I'll check back with you later. As long as you're feeling okay."

"I feel fine. The time travel really does seem to have helped," Cate said.

"See you before lunch for a progress report."

Cate nodded and sank into the desk chair as Jack disappeared from the room. She began her search with Rita, finding no one matching her description in any records. With a deep sigh, she tried Hans's name. Much to her surprise, several records popped up. She found a birth record for Hans Schmidt in Germany along with immigration paperwork in 1920 showing their move to the United Kingdom, settling in the Kent area.

Cate tracked the man through the 1921 and 1931 censuses. The next census would not take place until 1951 due to the war. After another hour of searching, Cate managed to find him alive and married and living in post-war Kent with his wife and two children. She traced him through history until he died in 2005.

Cate noted all the information, pleased to have found something. At least they could verify one person was a normal human who lived a normal life. But where were the others?

Cate let her pen tap her lips as she considered the latest development. Why could she find Hans and no others? Was there some credence to Jack's theory that they were not humans? Was that possible? Just how many supernatural creatures were lurking around the globe, Cate pondered?

She picked up her phone to text the question to Damien, feeling slightly guilty about bombarding the poor man with questions. She stared out the window for a moment, contemplating her next move. She hated to bother him, yet he had encouraged her to use him as a resource. And he seemed eager to help. And he was far more knowledgeable than either she or Jack in these matters.

She decided to text him and pulled the phone toward her. As she toggled on her display, she caught movement in the reflective surface. Cate twisted to glance behind her. She found nothing.

She clicked off the display and stared into it, searching for the source of the movement. As she was about to give up, she caught sight of a dark figure behind her.

Her heart stopped and she spun to search behind her. With ragged breathing, she scanned the room. Nothing. Her brows knit tightly together, and she glanced into her phone's dark display again. The room appeared normal.

A chill passed through her as she settled back in her seat to text Damien. She wiggled her shoulders as she clicked on her display. She bit her lower lip and rubbed the back of her neck. Her skin turned to gooseflesh.

She shook her head and tossed the phone onto the desk. She rose from her chair and wandered from the library. She made her way upstairs via the main staircase and took the most direct route to her bedroom.

When she entered, she twisted the winding key on the piano music box before she stalked across the room and retrieved the sapphire necklace. She clutched it in her fingers and held it to her chest as she closed her eyes.

The tinkling music filled her mind and she swayed to the music. Snippets of images flitted through her mind. A glimpse of a sapphire blue dress swinging in the air. The sapphire necklace sparkling under warm lights that glowed from above her. A hand reached for hers. Fingers stretched toward her.

Her lips curled in a smile at the memories. She opened her eyes and stared down at the sapphires in her hand. They sparkled in the light. She spun and eyed the music box. After she clasped the necklace around her neck, she collected the music box from her night table and wandered from the room.

* * *

Cate awoke in the west wing. Jack hovered over her. "Cate!" he shouted, worry creasing his face.

"Jack?" she inquired in a hoarse voice, as she lifted her head.

"Yeah," Jack said, "it's okay. You're okay."

Cate pushed up to sit.

"Easy," Jack said, his arms outstretched in the event that she collapsed.

"What happened?" she asked, glancing around. The dogs crowded around her. She stroked their fur as she attempted to recall anything that happened. Her fingers found the sapphires around her neck after a moment. The music box sat in the middle of the room. It wound down, tinkling out its last few notes.

Jack collapsed to the floor next to her and blew out a long breath.

"Jack?" Cate prompted.

"What's the last thing you remember?"

Cate pursed her lips, considering it. "Uh, I thought I saw something reflected in my phone's screen in the library. Then after that, I couldn't settle. I went upstairs, wound up the music box and picked up the necklace. That's the last thing I remember." She looked around again. "How did I get here?"

Jack pursed his lips and hesitated before he responded. "Perhaps it's best I show you."

He tapped around on his phone for a few seconds before he brought up one video. "I got an alert on my phone that you were moving." He swung the display toward her and showed her the collar cam feed. The camera bobbed around before falling to her side. She approached the music box, at the camera's level, and picked it up.

She crossed her bedroom and walked through the suite. The door swung open as she approached the hall.

"Cate?" Jack's on-screen counterpart inquired. "What are you doing?"

"I have to go," Cate said.

"Go where?" Jack inquired.

"I have to go," Cate repeated.

"Why are you wearing that necklace?"

That question did not garner a response. "Can you tell me the year?"

The question stopped Cate in her tracks. Her brow crinkled before she took another step forward. Jack grasped her arm. "Cate, what year is it?"

Cate considered it again. Her eyes searched around her as though she wasn't sure.

"I have to go," she said again.

Jack shook his head but allowed her to continue. She wound through the halls as the music box continued its tune. Jack followed her, reaching into his back pocket for his cell phone. He toggled into his camera and hit record.

"Okay, this video may show a better view," he said. He swapped the video for the one he'd recorded himself.

On-screen, Cate continued her wandering down the hall. "It's 11 April," he narrated. "It's about eleven in the morning. I found Cate nearly unresponsive. As you can see, she has the music box and the sapphire necklace. The only thing she'll tell me is she has to go. She hasn't said where she's going. I asked her the year; the question seemed to give her pause, but she didn't answer it."

Jack followed her down a set of stairs. She aimed toward the west wing's doors. Both dogs sat at attention at the entrance. She pawed at the door and pulled it open. The dogs raced ahead of her as she continued her slow shamble.

After a few moments, they wound around to the large room they'd entered on many occasions before. The dogs already stood inside. They sat staring at the far wall as though it held a secret.

"Okay," Jack continued his narration, "we're at a room in the west wing. She's come to this room several times. I found her in one of these trances here once before."

Jack kept the camera trained on Cate as she shuffled across the large space. She stopped in the room's center.

"I'm here," she said. "Where are you?"

"Cate, who are you looking for?" Jack tried.

Cate spun in a slow circle, searching the space. After two and a half full rotations, she stopped. Her eyelids slid open and closed in slow motion. After she set the music box down, she stalked to one pillar and circled it.

She stopped on the side facing where Jack stood. She stood for several moments staring at the pillar. After a moment, she reached out and touched it. She stood frozen with her hand pressed against the pillar. Unblinking and unmoving, she appeared statuesque.

Jack paused the video. "Cate..." he began.

"What?" Cate asked.

"It gets a little weird after this."

CHAPTER 25

Cate flicked her gaze from the screen to Jack's face. "This is where it gets weird? What, the weird slow blinking as I spin in circles and my best impression of a statue isn't weird enough?"

Jack licked his lips as he offered an amused scoff. He cocked his head and nodded. "It gets weirder. I'm just warning you."

Cate inhaled deeply and bit her lower lip. "Okay, warned." She turned her attention back to Jack's phone. He tapped the play button and the video continued.

The camera angle shifted as Jack circled around Cate. She remained still, her hand pressed against the pillar and a blank expression on her features.

After a moment, she lowered her arm and turned slightly toward Jack. Her expression softened and her lips curled into a smile. Her gaze lifted slightly above her. She raised her arms, her right floating in the air near her face and her left cupping an unknown object with her palm facing her belly.

Her feet moved as she held her arms in position. She circled around the room in a waltz with some unknown partner.

Cate covered her mouth with her hand as she watched herself float around the room in time with the tinkling music. The video followed her as she made wide arcs around the large space, twirling a few times between box steps.

She continued the waltz for two minutes before she began to slow.

Jack clicked the video off. "And that's about it."

“Jack,” Cate said. “How did I end up on the floor?”

“Doesn’t matter,” he said.

“It does,” she answered. “I can take it. Please, I need to see it.”

Jack huffed but gave in and played the video.

On-screen, Cate continued to spin for a few more seconds, slowing her motion. Her smile was replaced by a worried expression. She stopped spinning and her brow furrowed.

“No,” she said.

“What’s wrong, Cate?” Jack inquired.

“No, I’m not ready.” She glanced down at her clothes. “I need the dress.” She puffed out a breath. “I need the dress. I need the dress. The dress. I... need...” Her words slowed before slurring. Her eyelids grew heavy, and her eyes rolled back as she began to slump to the floor.

The camera bobbed and pointed at a blurred floor as Jack raced toward Cate. He caught her before she hit the floor and eased her to the floor. “Oh, Cate,” she heard him say, as the video shut off.

“That’s it,” Jack said. “You woke up a few moments later.”

Cate sighed and shook her head. “What is happening to me?”

Jack clutched his phone and climbed to standing. He pulled Cate to her feet. “I’m not sure, but I’m going to send this video to Damien. But first, I think we should get you back to the library.”

Cate nodded. They began the walk back with the dogs trotting behind them. “I don’t know how I feel about sending that to Damien,” Cate admitted on the walk.

“It sounds like he’s seen stranger,” Jack said.

“Still,” Cate said, “it’s sort of embarrassing.”

“It’s not. And it’s proof of what’s happening that they may be able to use to research more.”

“I know,” Cate said. “It’s just odd.”

They returned to the library and Cate collapsed into her armchair. Her fingers found the sapphire necklace. With a frown, she unclasped the necklace and tossed it onto the coffee table.

“So much for this waning,” she lamented.

Jack tapped around on his phone. “One thing’s certain. For once, I can’t wait to time travel.”

Cate offered a sharp laugh at the statement.

“You okay?” Jack inquired.

Cate nodded. "Yeah, I'm fine. No residual effects from the strange experience."

"Okay, video sent," Jack reported.

"Thanks, Jack," Cate said. She reached for his hand. He grasped hers and squeezed.

"We'll get through this, Cate. I promise."

"Thanks for your help," Cate said with a smile.

"Hey, we're a team," Jack confirmed. "Reids and MacKenzies. Centuries-worth of problem-solving is on our side."

Jack's phone chimed. He pulled his hand from Cate's and swiped at his phone. "It's Damien."

"Anything?"

Jack's thumbs tapped a response. "He asked if either of us have any idea what dress you're looking for. I said no."

"A blue dress," Cate murmured. "Sapphire." Cate stared ahead at the necklace as snippets of the dress floating in the air flashed through her mind.

Jack wiggled his eyebrows. "How do you know? I thought you didn't remember anything."

"I catch visions of it now and again. There's more just beyond that, I know it, but my brain can't access it."

Jack stared at her. "When did you see the dress?"

"I think I've been seeing it on and off. I think in addition to the dress, there's a room I'm searching for. I just get snippets of it."

"It's not the room you've been going to?" Jack inquired.

"Not to my knowledge, but it has to be connected."

Jack sent another text to Damien, recapping the latest from Cate. He received a reply immediately. Jack reported the message to her. "I'm showing this to Celine and Alexander and passing along the other details. Will let you know what we come up with."

Jack settled back into his chair, a pensive expression on his face. After a while, he said, "Well, I suppose there's one good thing to come out of this."

Cate shot him an incredulous glance. "And that is?"

"You're waltzing skills are coming along nicely, Lady Cate."

"Too bad the same can't be said for your comedy skills," Cate retorted, an amused grin on her face.

“Well, I suppose we should have our lunch and then do our duty and head back to solve our other mystery.” Jack rose to his feet with a groan. “I never thought murder would be the more innocuous of the two issues we’re facing.”

“I’m not certain it’s the more innocuous, but it may be the one with the lower stakes. At least for me, personally. I’d love to know who is in the grave, but I’d also love to stop losing my mind.”

“You’re not losing your mind, Cate,” Jack said, with a squeeze of her shoulder.

With a faint smile, she grasped his hand and squeezed. “Thanks, Jack. Enjoy your lunch.”

“You want me to stay?”

She shook her head. “No, I’ll be okay. And you can monitor me in spirit with my doggy cam.” She offered him a wink.

“Aye, so I can. Okay, enjoy your lunch, then,” Jack said. He strode from the room as Molly slipped inside.

“Perfect timing, I see,” she said. “Jack’s leaving to let you enjoy your lunch.”

“Thanks, Molly,” Cate said.

“WHOA!” Molly exclaimed. Her eyes widened as she stared down at the coffee table, her mouth forming a wide “o.” “Where’d that come from?”

“Oh,” Cate said, swiping the necklace from the table. “Ah, it’s a really old piece given to a MacKenzie in the 1700s. I considered giving it away for an auction item.”

Molly’s jaw dropped. “Are you serious? I can’t even begin to imagine what it’s worth.”

“Well, it’s worth some sentimental value, too, and I decided I couldn’t part with it.”

“I don’t blame you,” Molly said. “I’d never give that up. It’s absolutely stunning.”

“Thanks, Molly,” Cate said. “It really is a beautiful piece. And don’t worry, I’m not giving it up.”

Molly smiled and nodded at her. “Hey, how about a road trip tomorrow?” she questioned as she set the tray down. “I’ve got the next place on our list all ready.”

“Oh, uh,” Cate stammered.

“You should go, Cate,” Jack called from the doorway where he still hovered.

“See, even Jack agrees,” Molly said with a smile.

“Well,” Cate hedged. “I should...”

“Oh, come on, Lady Cate,” Jack heckled her. “Live a little.”

Cate glanced at him, and he gave her an encouraging nod.

“Okay, then. I just didn’t want to hone in on your day off.”

“Nonsense!” Molly exclaimed, with a wave of her hand. “I can’t wait for a nice girls’ trip.”

“And leave the dogs with us,” Jack said. “We’ll watch ‘em. Both of the Frasers and I will be here, so we’ve got it handled.”

Cate smiled and nodded. “Well, looks like it’s all set, then!”

“Great!” Molly said with a wide smile. She spun on her heel and pointed out the door to Jack. “Out, you. Let Lady Cate enjoy her lunch!”

Jack raised his hands in defeat. “Okay, okay. Just remember who was instrumental in convincing Lady Cate...” she heard him reply as they made their way down the hall.

Cate pulled the lunch tray onto her lap. Her eyes fell onto the sapphire necklace. What was happening to her? Why did the music box and necklace seem to affect her so strangely sometimes, but in others she remained completely normal, even soothed by the items?

The Duke’s words rang in her mind. “Whatever Catherine is experiencing is a result of her own doing.” What did it mean? Was it him she searched for? Was it him she called out to when in her trances? But why?

* * *

Cate stared out of the library’s window at the garden beyond. Her mind struggled to find the meaning in any of the muck she waded through concerning any of her mysteries. The chiming of her phone pulled her mind from its wandering. A text from Damien showed on her preview screen.

Hey Cate, how you feeling?

Cate smiled at the simple message. He’d gotten the video of her and thought enough to check in with her after to see how she felt. She sent a return message: I'm okay. I feel fine right now. Thank you for checking. How embarrassing to have to send that video over.

Cate added a face-palm emoji to the end of her message.

A quick response answered her: Not at all! Don't feel that way. Also, you're an awesome dancer!

The comment gave her a chuckle. Jack said the same thing. I guess there's my silver lining!

Damien answered: Seriously, Cate, don't feel bad. This helps a lot because we can see exactly what's happening and research it. We'll get some answers soon. In the meantime, maybe plan a time travel trip to ease your nerves!

Cate responded: Way ahead of you... Jack and I are doing a little traveling this afternoon!

That's awesome! Get your mind off all this and enjoy!

Cate replied with a "will do!" before returning to her lunch. After a few bites, her phone jangled next to her. Assuming it was Damien, she grabbed it. "Wow, did he find something already?" she murmured, as she swiped to answer the call without glancing at the display.

"Hello," she said.

"Lady Cate!" Mrs. Campbell greeted her.

"Oh, hello, Mrs. Campbell," Cate said, surprised to hear the woman's voice when she expected Damien's.

"I hope I'm not catching you at a bad time," the woman said, noting the confusion in her voice.

"No, not at all. I'm just having lunch."

"Oh, well, I'm sorry to interrupt your meal, but I did want to pass along a smidge of news I found after digging into the intelligence base rumor."

"No interruption at all. What did you find?"

"Well, straight after our discussion, I delved into any records I could find. None of them had any references to an intelligence base."

"Hmm," Cate murmured, as her mind pondered why all references were squelched from the records.

"But I am not a quitter! I called a friend with access to the Ministry's records."

"No mention there either?" Cate inquired, questioning her own sanity in the matter.

"Yes and no," Mrs. Campbell said.

Cate's brow furrowed at the statement. "That sounds intriguing."

"Very. And what I found out from my friend is even more so."

"Oh?" Cate inquired.

"It seems an intelligence base did reside on the grounds of Dunhaven Castle for a short time in 1942."

Cate's heart skipped a beat. So there had been a record of it somewhere. She wondered why the references were so obscure.

Mrs. Campbell continued, "It was dissolved in September of 1942 after it was discovered to have been infiltrated by a German spy!"

"What?" Cate cried, shock apparent in her voice.

"Yes," Mrs. Campbell said. "Quite an affair apparently, and very quickly disbanded and forgotten about. No one mentions it as it was considered quite a black eye on the intelligence community, and Dunhaven, too. A spy living at Dunhaven Castle! Can you imagine!"

"I can't. I'm quite surprised," Cate said. "Did they identify the person?"

"Not to my knowledge. That's all the information my contact could dig up. But anyway, I wanted to pass it along because I thought perhaps you'd want to leave it out of your book. For the reputation of the castle."

"Yes, thank you, Mrs. Campbell, that's quite interesting and very helpful."

"Oh, you're very welcome. And rest assured, Lady Cate, I will not breathe a word of this to anyone," Mrs. Campbell said.

Cate held in a chuckle at the statement, realizing by this time next week, everyone in the Highlands should know about the botched intelligence base at Dunhaven Castle.

The two women spoke for a few more moments about their upcoming meeting before Cate ended the call. As she took the last few bites of her lunch, Cate mulled the latest information. German spies at Dunhaven Castle during the war? This could explain several things, including the lack of records on some of her targets.

Someone, or more than one someone, was a German spy. Someone wasn't who they said they were. The question was: who?

CHAPTER 26

Cate pondered the question as she slid her tray onto the coffee table in front of her. The necklace caught her eye again. She pocketed it as Molly strolled into the room to retrieve her tray. Moments later, Jack slipped in.

“You okay?” he asked as she sat with her chin in her palm.

“Yeah,” she responded. “Damien checked on me while you were out.”

“Oh? Did they find anything?”

“No, but he wanted to make sure I was okay after what he saw on the video. And he assured me they’d get to the bottom of it.”

“Well, so far they’ve got a good track record. They fixed Douglas’s problem and ours, too.”

Cate nodded. “I got some other information, though, that you’d be interested to hear.”

“Really? Did you find something on one of our forties friends?”

“Yes, I did,” Cate said. “But there’s even more than that.”

She rose and retrieved her notes from the desk. “I wasn’t able to find anything about Ruth, Rita, or Victor, but I did manage to track Hans from birth to death.”

“Okay, Hans is human. Now, what about the other three?”

“Well, I may have an explanation for that, and it doesn’t involve immortality.”

“I’m all ears.”

“Mrs. Campbell just called me. I asked her to look into the intelligence base.”

“And?”

“She has a friend...”

“Of course she does,” Jack groaned.

“Her friend looked into some records and found there was an intelligence base on the grounds in 1942 for a very short time. It was disbanded in September 1942.”

“Why?”

“Because it had been infiltrated by German spies.”

Jack’s eyes went wide. “Spies?”

Cate nodded, a grin on her face. “Which explains why at least one of these people has no records!”

“Because they’re lying about who they are,” Jack said.

Cate bobbed her head up and down.

“So, are all three of them spies?”

Cate lifted a shoulder in response. “Mrs. Campbell had no information on the individual accused. It could be one of them, or all three of them. I’m not sure. But it marks progress and explains a number of things.”

“Aye, it does. And it explains why Lachlan lied to Pap. They likely did not want that news out, especially during the war. It really makes the intelligence effort look bad.”

Cate nodded. “Perhaps we should let Stanley know what we think then head back and see if we can crack this spy ring!”

“Okay,” Jack said, pulling out his phone. “Though I have to point out that we should be extra cautious. We’re not equipped to be in the middle of a spy ring, Cate. And this murder very well could be related to it.”

“I agree,” Cate said. “Though I’d still like to go back. As Damien pointed out, it may help with my mania.”

Jack chuckled. “Don’t call it that. You’re not a madwoman.”

“Yet,” Cate said.

“We’ll call it mania when I have to lock you in the tower.”

“Let’s hope it doesn’t come to that.”

“Okay, I sent Pap a text and explained the spy situation. Ready to go?”

“I am,” Cate said.

“Oh, where’s the necklace.”

Cate patted her pocket. “Here. I swiped it before Molly spots it again.”

“Good thinking. The last thing we need is her innocently trying it on and beginning to suffer from the same fascination as you have.”

Cate nodded in agreement as her fingers caressed the necklace in her pocket. “I trust Molly wouldn’t do that, but she may pick it up to take a closer look. I don’t want to take the chance that something happens to her.”

Jack nodded at her assessment.

“I’ll dump it back in my jewelry armoire.”

“Okay. Well, I’ll go change and knock when I’m ready.”

They made their way upstairs and Cate entered her suite. The piano-shaped music box, last left on the floor in the west wing, sat in its usual spot on her nightstand.

Cate sighed at it as she slipped the necklace into the bottom drawer of the jewelry armoire. The little music box was quite persistent in returning to her, magically showing up on its own like an obedient boomerang. The idea she had the ability to enchant an object to continuously return to her bedroom almost made her chuckle. How ridiculous, she thought as she styled her hair.

She pulled on a pink dress and peep-toe mules. Music began to float from her bedroom. The music box had engaged itself and began to play. Cate stepped into her bedroom as she readied her purse and stared at it. Why did it only affect her at certain times?

A knock sounded at her door. With another mystery to resolve, she hurried across the room to meet Jack. They made their way down to the secret passage and set the timepiece to September 19, 1942. Within moments, they stood hidden inside World War II-era Dunhaven Castle.

After sneaking through the passage to the crypt, they stepped into the gray day. Angry storm clouds rolled across the sky. “Looks like a storm’s blowing in,” Jack noted. “We’d better hurry.”

Cate agreed and they hurried across the property in search of the safety of the castle. Wind whipped wildly as they pushed through the doors into the foyer.

Large raindrops pelted the roof and windows as thunder rumbled. “Just made it!” Cate said, as Jack pushed the doors closed.

“Aye, good thing, too. This looks to be a bad one.”

“Indeed,” a male voice said behind them. Cate spun to face the speaker, finding a man near thirty behind her. With medium brown curly hair and dark eyes set in a round face, his resemblance to Rory made Cate certain he was Oliver MacKenzie. "You must be Mrs. and Mrs. Jack MacKenzie."

"We are," Cate answered with a smile.

"Oliver MacKenzie," the man said, extending his hand to Jack.

"Jack MacKenzie, your very distant cousin, and my wife, Cate. Please, call us Cate and Jack."

"Lovely to meet you. My father has nothing but good things to say about you."

"We met you once before," Cate said, "when you were about ten."

"I have very little recollection of it, I'm afraid."

"I wouldn't imagine you would have much memory of us," Cate said, as they strode to the sitting room. "I believe we only spoke for a few moments."

"Ah, memory of you specifically, no, but knowledge of you, yes. My father still discusses how you saved the day with the missing jewelry."

Cate smiled. "I was so pleased we could help."

"Well," Oliver said, "can I offer you anything before I depart? I'm off on some business. Too bad the weather had to turn nasty. It will make the driving treacherous."

"No," Jack said. "We're perfectly fine, thank you. We may spend some time in the library to pass the hours before dinner this evening. Will you attend?"

"No," Oliver said with a shake of his head. "I shan't return until day after tomorrow. But I am so pleased to have caught you before I left."

"We're glad to have had the chance to say hello again, too," Cate assured him.

The man said his goodbyes and left them in the sitting room.

"Okay, what do you really want to do?" Jack asked.

Cate shrugged. "I'd like to gather some information on our three suspects, but short of visiting the intelligence tent, I'm not sure where we'd find them."

Jack glanced out the window as rain poured from the skies and winced.

"I, too, would prefer to wait until the rain stops."

"Library it is, I suppose," Jack said.

Cate considered it, staring at the pattern on the area rug below her feet as she contemplated it. After a moment, she raised her eyes to Jack's. "Wait!" she exclaimed.

“What?”

“I have an idea. It doesn’t help us with solving the murder, but it may help with our other problem.”

Jack furrowed his brow. “You mean your mania, as you call it?”

“Yes! I’m always drawn to a room in the west wing, and whenever I go there in our time, I have strange attacks, visions, trances...”

“Waltzing,” Jack added.

“Right. And as a result, we’ve avoided the space as much as possible. But I may not be affected in this time period. Perhaps we should try to explore it here rather than in the present.”

Jack pursed his lips as he rubbed the back of his neck while considering the prospect.

“Okay,” he agreed. “We can try. But at the first sign of you going haywire, we leave. The last thing we need is a trance during a time travel trip.”

“Deal,” Cate said.

She looped her arm through Jack’s, and they wandered through the castle halls and to the doors leading to the west wing.

“I wonder if it’s locked,” Jack said, as they approached the large, thick wooden doors.

“I don’t suppose you brought your keys in case it is?” Cate questioned.

Jack reached in his pocket and flashed a set of keys. “Ask and you shall receive, Lady Cate.”

“Oh! Prepared! Nice!”

“Did you expect anything less?”

Cate shrugged.

“Your lack of faith in me is a little disturbing, Lady Cate,” Jack said, as he grasped the door handle and tugged. To their surprise, the door opened.

“Hmm, not locked in this era,” Cate noted.

“I’m surprised. I didn’t think the west wing was used much after Ethan’s time.”

“Still, maybe they didn’t lock it until a later period,” Cate said, stepping into the wide hall.

Jack side-eyed her. “Any weirdness?”

“Nope,” Cate said. “I feel pretty good when I time travel. No haziness, no odd thoughts. But here’s something interesting. When I went to my room to change, the music box was back, sitting on the night table as usual.”

“After we left it in the west wing,” Jack noted.

“Right. It appeared back in my bedroom. And it started to play on its own. But I had no issues with it. Nothing. In fact, it seems to be soothing to me. It helps me sleep, it eases my headaches, it oddly seems like I do love it. Like my note said.”

“I’m not convinced that note is from you, Cate.”

“It was in my handwriting.”

“I’m certain a man who has the ability to throw lightning bolts from his hands can fake someone’s handwriting.”

“Good point,” Cate said, as they turned the corner into another hall.

Jack ceased walking, cocking his head to the side as he scrunched his brows together. He pressed a finger to his lips. Cate inched closer to him, and her eyebrows shot up.

“Do you hear that?” Jack whispered.

Cate nodded. “Voices,” she breathed.

They listened for another moment before Cate pointed a finger toward the music hall. Jack agreed with a nod, and they crept toward the double doors.

Cate motioned for Jack to inch the door open, but he refused with an emphatic shake of his head. Garbled voices floated on the air as they pressed against the doors.

Cate mimed for them to round the corner and listen at the second set of doors. Jack nodded and they crept down the hall and approached the other double doors.

The heated voices became clearer as they pressed their ears to the door.

“NO!” a male voice shouted. “This is wrong!”

A female voice shot back, “It isn’t.”

“You are mistaken,” the man answered.

“Am I? Prove it.”

After a moment, the man answered, “I can’t.”

“Just as I thought.”

“No, it isn’t at all what you thought. These people have become my friends. Though there isn’t much to be done about it now.”

“There is too much at stake for this second-guessing,” the woman said.

Cate’s eyebrows shot skyward, and she glanced to Jack. She mouthed the word, “spies,” to him.

He nodded.

“I won’t do it. I can’t!”

“You must.”

Another pause before the man said, “All right.”

“Then we proceed as planned.”

Footsteps punctuated the last statement and Cate and Jack scurried to the corner to peek around it. The doors burst open as the woman exited first. Cate’s jaw unhinged as she saw Ruth stalk from the room. Several moments later, Hans strode out of the doors and down the hall.

Cate glanced at Jack. Had they just witnessed two German spies at Dunhaven Castle?

CHAPTER 27

“Let’s head to our suite,” Jack suggested as the supposed spies left the west wing behind.

Cate nodded, abandoning her plan to study the room to which she was drawn. They waited a few moments before they wound their way from the west wing into the main castle and up to their bedroom.

“Wow!” Cate exclaimed as Jack closed the doors behind them.

“My sentiments exactly, did we just witness a meeting of spies?”

“That’s what I’m thinking!” Cate played the conversation over in her mind.

“So, what happened?” Jack inquired as he stalked around the room, rubbing his chin.

“Ruth and Hans are in on it together,” Cate surmised. “He has admitted connections to Germany. He was born there. Perhaps he has family there, still.”

“But Hans seems to be having second thoughts.”

Cate nodded. “He talked about his time in London with Victor briefly at dinner. Perhaps the time he spent with them made him rethink his allegiances.”

“But Ruth is insistent on forcing his hand.”

“It would explain why the code is indecipherable in this time. It’s actively being destroyed by Ruth and Hans,” Cate said.

“It also explains her position with Amelia.”

Cate bit her lower lip. Jack added, "I'm certain Amelia had no knowledge of this." Cate nodded at his statement. "Ruth likely saw her position as useful to her cause."

"And perhaps even Lucas's ties to the Ministry of Defense," Cate said.

"Right."

Cate furrowed her brow again. "What I find odd is Ruth tying herself to Amelia, though. Surely she has less freedom because of it."

"But a great cover. And perhaps she is adept at manipulating Amelia without Amelia realizing."

Cate nodded. "Yes. Maybe I can get some information from Amelia at dinner. Or you if you sit by her. Ask where she's traveled and see if you can ferret out who suggested the places or how their trips came about."

"On it," Jack said with a salute.

"Hopefully you'll get a seat near Amelia. And ravishing Rita can keep her hands to herself."

"You know," Jack said, "when you had a male interest, I told you to use your female charms to gain information."

Cate offered an unimpressed glance. "Damien was not a male interest nor was he as licentious as Rita."

"Oh, right," Jack said. "He was a male. And he was interested. Plus, he still texts you! Talk about rakish!"

"Damien is far from rakish. He is a wonderful friend."

"I'm only teasing you, Lady Cate. Though I am starting to think you may be a wee bit jealous. And I must say, it really is quite a boost to my ego."

Cate offered him a half-smile. "I'm so glad to be of service. Just be careful around her, I don't think she's as innocent as Damien."

"Don't worry, Lady Cate. I'd never ruin our marriage over the likes of her." Jack winked at her.

"I'd better change for dinner," Cate said, checking the time.

After they both changed clothes, Cate and Jack threaded through the halls and down to the sitting room. Rory, Ruth, and Amelia waited there for the others.

After greetings around the room, Cate and Jack sank onto the loveseat across from Ruth and Amelia.

"What frightful weather," Rory commented, as he poured drinks for Cate and Jack.

“Oh, yes, just terrible,” Amelia commented. “What a shame Oliver had to travel in it.”

“Mmm, yes,” Rory agreed.

Cate used the comment as an in to discuss more with Amelia. “And will you be traveling again soon?” she inquired.

“Perhaps,” Amelia said. “I’m waiting on word now from Lucas. If he’s able to make a trip up, we’ll stay. Otherwise, we may be off again!”

“And have you done much traveling before coming to Dunhaven?”

“Oh, yes,” Amelia said. “We’ve done a great deal.”

“You must be worn out!” Cate said.

“Not really, I find it invigorating. It’s so easy to be down given all the events surrounding the war. It takes my mind off things.”

“How do you decide where to go?” Jack inquired, picking up on Cate’s line of questioning.

“Oh, wherever the wind takes us,” Amelia said with a chuckle as Rita and Victor entered the room.

The conversation ended with the new arrivals. Rory suggested they head into the dining room.

“Oh, shouldn’t we wait for Hans?” Cate inquired, hoping to have the opportunity to converse with him.

“He sent word he isn’t feeling well and won’t attend,” Rory answered.

Cate knit her eyebrows at the development. She glanced at Jack then flitted her gaze to Ruth. The woman offered no reaction to the announcement.

They shuffled into the dining room and took their seats. Cate noted the way Rita slid into a seat next to Jack, nearly tripping Ruth to claim the seat. Ruth stepped two seats over, sitting on Jack’s other side. At least one thing went right, Cate thought. She hoped Jack could learn something from the woman.

With the unbalanced party, Cate found herself seated between Victor and Amelia. She’d use the conversation to try to pry any information she could from Amelia.

Amelia began her conversation with Cate, including Rory in the mix. The addition of Rory slightly dampened any chance Cate had to inquire about Amelia’s travel plans.

“What a shame the weather is so dreary,” Rory said. “I hope it hasn’t ruined anyone’s plans.”

“Not at all,” Cate assured him. “Amelia, what about you?”

“No, I spent the day reading.”

“Does Ruth enjoy days such as this or does she prefer to be on the move?”

“Oh, I’m certain she didn’t mind. I believe she spent some time exploring the castle.”

“You should have told me,” Rory said, “I would have given her a tour.”

“I’m quite sure she did not mind wandering about on her own.”

Amelia glanced down the table, noticing Victor lacked a conversation partner. “Oh, dear, it seems Mr. Richard has been left alone!” Amelia noted to Cate.

Cate switched her direction to speak to Victor. She glanced across the table, noting Rita playing up to Jack, inserting herself into Jack’s conversation with Ruth.

“Oh!” Cate exclaimed, loud enough to be heard across the table. “Had I realized Rita turned the wrong way, I would have included you in our conversation.”

Rita gave Cate a cold glance before offering her an equally frigid smile and retorted, “Victor and I spend all day together. There’s really nothing else to talk about.”

“My mistake,” Cate said, “I thought you’d be far too busy with code-breaking to talk.”

“Perfectly fine, Mrs. MacKenzie,” Victor said, ending the polite bickering between the two women. “After all, I’m certain you’d like to spend some time conversing with your family.”

Cate smiled at him. “Do you miss yours very much being stationed here?” she inquired of him.

“Yes, though we must all make sacrifices in the face of adversity such as what we suffer.”

Cate smiled and nodded at him. Throughout her degree work, she’d only read about the adversity faced during this time. It was another matter entirely to stare at it straight in the face. How much more difficult that adversity would be when someone sabotaged your efforts for the opposite side, Cate reflected.

Cate gazed at the empty chair, now dragged away from the table and the place setting removed by Smithers. Had Hans avoided the meal because of his confrontation with Ruth? Would that confrontation lead to murder?

If so, it was a murder never avenged, as Hans had lived his entire life normally, as evidenced by the records. Cate's eyes slid sideways to the man on her right. Why had she not found him in the records? Or Rita? Were their names changed to protect their identities after the base was shut down?

Dinner continued with little other discussion that would shed any light on the circumstances surrounding the upcoming murder. After a brief nightcap, Cate and Jack returned to their own time via the universal time portal in the secret passage.

"See you in the library," Jack said, as they parted ways to change.

"You bet!" Cate answered, darting into her suite.

The moment Cate set foot into her bedroom, the music box across the room began to tinkle. Cate shot the object a glance. "You're persistent, I'll give you that. But I've been time traveling, so your effects are diminished!" she shouted triumphantly, as she pulled off her dress and slipped back into her normal clothes.

After a moment redoing her hair in the bathroom, she reentered the bedroom with her eyebrows raised at the little device. "No time for a trance now; we're on to something!" she called, darting across the room and making her way down to the library.

The dogs stood on each side of Jack's armchair as he petted them both. "Well, that was quite a trip!" Cate exclaimed.

"Aye. And it's very nice to see you so chipper because of it."

"I can't believe Ruth is a spy. Poor Amelia. I'll bet she told the paper Ruth left for a better position just to keep everything hush-hush and save face."

"Aye, same reason they nixed any mention of the intelligence base overall."

"Do you think we can't find any information on Victor and Rita because their names were changed to protect them after Ruth's murder?"

Jack pursed his lips as he considered it. "Could be. Though was anyone aware of Ruth's murder?"

"Maybe not, though her disappearance could have led to the outing of the spy ring. Did you learn anything at dinner?"

"Not much. Ruth is extremely good at hiding what's going on."

"I'd imagine she would be. Also, I'm sure your conversation was squelched by Rita." Cate pursed her lips in a half frown.

Jack rolled his eyes. "You may have a point about our cheeky friend. She seems to have a real affinity for pushing herself in."

Cate considered it. While annoyed, she still found the situation odd. The woman went overboard to insert herself into a conversation with a married man. She exhibited extremely poor behavior. It seemed unusual. Perhaps subtly wasn't her strong suit.

"I wonder if there's another reason for her overly keen interest."

"Outside of my roguish good looks, wit, and charm? You may be reaching, Lady Cate."

"Well, she seems rather obvious. Even for a flirt."

Jack shrugged. "What would it be?"

"Do you think she's on to Ruth?"

"Oh, I wonder," Jack said as he considered it. "Perhaps she's the one who outs the discovery."

"I wonder what causes Hans to kill Ruth."

"Assuming that's what happens."

"Yes," Cate agreed, "assuming. He seemed exceptionally upset with her today. Does he just snap? He seemed too gentle."

"I suppose that's why he's a good spy. He seems banal, innocent, safe. People confide in him, and he uses it to his advantage."

Cate shook her head. "I spent most of my dinner wondering how people could do that. I'm not sure I have it in me."

"I suppose they believe they're doing it for the right cause and their country."

Cate remained silent for a moment before Jack spoke again. "Cate, are you sure you want to pursue this?"

"We need to know what happened. Ruth didn't deserve to be killed and buried with no one knowing."

"She likely has no family looking for her and the man we suspected murdered her is dead, too. And she was a spy."

"I know. But she still didn't deserve to die. Plus the time travel is a great diversion from our other problem."

"Good point. Okay, well, I suppose we're off the hook tomorrow with your girls' day out. We can head back on Monday."

"That sounds good."

"You know, speaking of our other problem, I think your day out will do you good. That's why I encouraged you to go."

“I figured,” Cate said. “I caught on when you insisted. At first, I didn’t think it was a good idea, but maybe getting away from the castle will help.”

“It can’t hurt,” Jack said. “I assume you won’t drift into any trances and wander around someone else’s castle.”

“Let’s hope not. That would be even more embarrassing than my waltz.”

“Well, either way, I think you should enjoy your day off.”

“I’ll try,” Cate said with a nod.

Jack climbed from his chair with a groan, leaving her alone for the remaining afternoon and evening hours. After a quick check-in before bed, Cate, Riley and Bailey headed to her suite. The now-familiar music already played in greeting. The dogs settled in as Cate readied herself for the night.

With a pause at the jewelry armoire, Cate pulled the necklace from the drawer and continued across the room to climb into bed, still clutching the ostentatious item. As the little music box filled the air with its music, Cate drifted off to sleep, exhausted from the extra hours added to her day.

Cate awoke the following morning to the tinkling sounds of the music box. The little musical item had played throughout the night, though Cate had slept soundly. Her hand contained an indentation in the shape of the large central sapphire of the necklace.

Cate sat up, wiggling her fingers to loosen them. She reflected on her peaceful night as she eyed the small piano. There seemed to be no rhyme or reason to when the item affected her.

Though whatever triggered her odd affliction seemed to be worsening. She’d risen from retrieving the necklace and returning to bed, to roaming the halls, to full-blown delusions.

As Cate climbed from bed and padded to the bathroom, she tried to recall any details from her trances. Cate glanced into the mirror as she pulled her clothes on. Visions of the blue dress had pressed into her mind yesterday. Where had they come from?

And a room. She vaguely recalled a room. What room? She forced herself to recall details from the episodes. After a moment, another thought danced across her mind. She hurried to her bedroom and retrieved the sapphire necklace. She clasped it around her neck and returned to the mirror, staring at it.

“Think, Cate, think,” she willed herself. She crinkled her brow as she focused on the necklace, her fingertips finding the central blue stone. She blinked slowly as her mind regressed to another memory. She swept her hair up behind her, holding it in place with one hand. Her head tilted as her mind's eye found what she sought.

A room. With mirrored walls and pillars between them. She wore a satin sapphire blue ball gown. Warm lights shaped as stars hung overhead. Music played and the room seemed to spin.

A cold, wet nose snapped Cate back into reality. Riley stood with his paws planted on her thigh, nudging her free hand.

Cate fought to keep the image in her mind as her focus returned to the present.

"Just a second, buddy," Cate said, as she raced to her bedside. She dug into the drawer of her nightstand and retrieved her journal and a pen. Shuffling through to the first empty page, Cate wrote the details she remembered in the journal that had been used to write about her nightmares of Duke Northcott.

A knock sounded at her door as she scribbled the last piece of information across the page. "Coming!" she shouted, a grin on her face as she perused her efforts to remember something. She hurried to the door in her sitting room and flung it open. "Come in!" she said to a waiting Jack. The dogs scampered over to offer Jack a hearty hello.

"Well, what a greeting! Lady Cate is chipper this morning. I suppose this is directly related to the excellent night's sleep you got last night?"

"I did have an excellent night's sleep, but it's more than that."

Jack's gaze fell to the sapphire necklace around her neck.

"Oh," Cate said, realizing she still wore it. She unclasped it and placed it on the side table near her chaise. "Not that. But related to that. I remembered something."

"Remembered something?"

"Yes, the vision or memory of the room I'm searching for. Remember yesterday I couldn't recall any details of it? But I did remember the dress was blue. Well, this morning, I managed to remember what the room looks like. I wrote it down in my journal."

She handed it to Jack, and he perused the description, his lips curling into a confused expression. "Mirrored walls with stars for lights?" he questioned.

"Yes."

"I don't know of any room like that in the castle," he answered.

“Neither do I, but it must be what I’m searching for. It was very clear this morning.”

“Are you certain it wasn’t a figment of your imagination? Something your mind created to fill in the gap?”

Cate shook her head. “I don’t think so. I’m not that creative,” she said with a coy grin. “I’ll admit the vision of it I had was fleeting, but still I got enough to get a description.”

“I’m not sure how it helps,” Jack said.

“Me either,” Cate admitted. “But I feel like it’s a breakthrough all the same. At least I’m remembering something. What it means, I don’t know.”

“That’s a curious statement,” Jack said after a moment.

“What is?”

“You’re remembering something,” Jack said. “But, to your knowledge, you’ve never had this dress or been to this room.”

Cate pondered it for a moment, her eyebrows shooting upward at his assessment. “You’re right. I’ve never been in this room. Just as I have no knowledge of ever writing that note to myself or of the music box, yet I seem to think I’ve had it in the past. In my trances, I act like I have seen it before.”

“Aye, and other details are distorted. Like you act like you’re surprised to see me.”

“But the vision I had this morning felt like a memory. It’s as though I was remembering something that happened in my past. Like my graduation or a major life event.”

Jack puckered his lips as he processed the information. “Are these false memories somehow planted in your mind?”

Cate’s features fell into a frown. “From the time I spent with Duke Northcott.”

“Did he do anything to you then?”

“No,” Cate answered. “Well, not to my knowledge. But I was gone for sixty hours. And several times, I fell asleep after drinking tea.”

Jack breathed out a deep sigh. “I wonder if he drugged it.”

“And then used my unconscious state to slip false memories into my mind?”

Jack shrugged. “Could be.”

Cate stalked around the room as she pondered it. “I suppose your theory could be correct. Though again, why?”

“That I cannot answer.”

They spent a few moments in silence before Cate shrugged. “Well, I don’t suppose we’ll get any further with this. But at least we’ve made some progress. Very little, but some.”

“More than we’ve made before,” Jack agreed. “And now, we’d better get the pups outside and you to your breakfast. You’ve got a big day today!”

“Right. Maybe I should cancel. Spend more time...”

“Now, Lady Cate, I won’t hear of it. This will be a nice break for you.”

“Oh, well since you insist, then okay!” Cate said with an amused smile.

“I do. And you should listen!”

Cate saluted. “Aye, aye, sir!” she said, before calling the dogs and ushering them through the halls and outside.

After her breakfast, she piled into the car with Molly and waved goodbye to the dogs and Jack as Molly pulled down the drive. “Where are we headed today?” Cate asked.

“Ellon Castle Gardens,” Molly informed her. “It looked pretty in the guidebook. I hope it’s nice.”

“I’m sure it will be.”

“Though no match for Mr. Fraser’s gardens, surely.”

“He’ll be happy to hear you say that,” Cate said.

“You know, I’m not going to other places because I don’t love Dunhaven,” Molly mentioned.

“I know that, Molly,” Cate answered. “You just love to explore. And the country is certainly beautiful enough to do that.”

“I just wanted to make sure you know that.”

Cate squeezed Molly’s arm. “I know that. You love Dunhaven. Bodies in the garden and all.”

“It’s such a shame they never found anything else about that poor person.”

Cate nodded. “Yeah, it is.”

They continued along their journey, arriving in the late morning at the castle gardens. After their stroll through, Molly suggested they grab lunch. They settled on their choices and gave their order to the waitress. As she left, Molly tapped around on her phone.

“Looking for another attraction?”

“No,” Molly said, as she slid the phone away. “Just checking the time.”

They made conversation about Molly's upcoming plans, Cate's first-year anniversary party, and more as they ate. Molly checked her phone several times during the meal. Cate found it odd. Molly usually never fiddled with her phone, preferring the human contact, and not needing the crutch of technology to achieve it.

"How about dessert?" Molly asked, as they finished up their meals.

"Sure," Cate said, assuming Molly had her eye on something scrumptious.

Molly checked her phone several more times as they ate the dessert. She pushed the pie slice around on her plate, dragging out the experience rather than digging in.

"Coffee?" she asked afterward.

"No, thanks. I'm about to burst. But if you'd like some, I'm happy to wait. I don't have any plans today!"

Molly gave her a nervous chuckle. "Uh, no, it's fine."

As the waitress returned to their table, Molly reversed her decision, requesting coffee. She meandered through the cup, sipping at it as if she hoped to make it last as long as possible. As she finished the last of it, the waitress returned with their check.

Cate paid the bill, despite Molly's protests, and they left the restaurant. After a quick consultation of her phone, Molly slid behind the wheel. "Mind if we take a bit of a drive? I'd like to see more of the country out this way. Unless you're in a hurry to get back."

"No, no hurry here."

They spent the early part of the afternoon driving around the eastern coast near Aberdeen. Molly pulled over several times to snap pictures. It didn't escape Cate that she also checked her phone outside of her camera app, too.

After an hour and a half of seemingly aimless driving, Molly said, "Well, I guess we should head back."

"Okay, sounds good to me."

Cate settled into the passenger's seat and let Molly program in Dunhaven Castle as their next destination. They pulled into the driveway in the late afternoon.

Cate made her way to the library, finding Jack, Mr. and Mrs. Fraser, and both dogs waiting there.

"Hi," she said as she entered. "Helping Jack with that puzzle?"

“What puzzle?” Mrs. Fraser inquired as Molly appeared at the door. She glanced at Jack and raised her eyebrows. Jack gave her a slight nod.

“Lady Cate,” Molly began, laying a hand on her shoulder.

“Yes?” Cate asked. A sinking feeling welled in the pit of her stomach. Why did this seem strangely like an intervention? Perhaps Jack was more concerned about her behavior of late than he let on. Did he tell the others?

CHAPTER 28

She glanced around at the others who had risen to stand. A nervous smile crossed her face and she swallowed hard. “Your one-year anniversary as Countess of Dunhavenshire is coming up. And we know it’s not until June, but...” Molly continued.

“We couldn’t wait any longer,” Mrs. Fraser jumped in. An excited grin filled her face. “And we didn’t think you should have to wait all the way until June.”

“Wait for what?” Cate asked.

“We got you a gift,” Jack said.

“A gift? You didn’t have to do that.” Cate’s shoulders slumped in relief.

“We did,” Mrs. Fraser insisted with a curt nod.

“That’s the weird vibe you’ve been getting from us the past few months,” Molly said.

Cate lifted her chin and pressed her lips together as understanding dawned on her. Memories of odd, interrupted conversations floated into her mind.

“Aye, we were picking out the perfect one, discussing it and deciding on everything and so on,” Mrs. Fraser said. “Then young Jack had to order it.”

“It arrived a few days ago and we hid it. Then we had to get it ready. Hence the long drive around the Scottish countryside today,” Molly said with a laugh.

“That’s why you kept checking your phone.”

“Yes,” Molly answered. “A certain two someone’s took longer than I bargained for.”

“It had to be perfect,” Mr. Fraser said.

“And I had to drive practically back to the States to give you time to get it there,” Molly teased with a tongue-in-cheek grin.

“Anyway,” Mrs. Fraser said. “It’s ready. But you’ll have to go outside to see it.”

“Okay,” Cate agreed.

The group gathered in front of the castle.

“Close your eyes,” Jack instructed.

“Really?” Cate inquired.

“Yes!” Molly insisted.

“All right,” Cate said, with a roll of her eyes. She squeezed her eyes closed.

“It’s a bit of a walk,” Jack said as he scooped her up.

“Whoa!” Cate exclaimed.

“And no opening your eyes.”

“I voted for a blindfold,” Mrs. Fraser said.

“I’m keeping them closed!” Cate exclaimed, as she hung onto Jack.

They walked for a bit before Jack carefully set her on the ground. Molly’s hands covered her eyes as her feet touched the ground. “I’m not peeking!” she insisted.

“Just in case,” Molly said. “Ready?”

“I’ve been ready since you made me close my eyes at the front of the castle,” Cate said with a chuckle.

Molly removed her hands and Cate blinked her eyes open. They stood at the loch. Under the large tree nearby sat a beige two-seater bench.

Cate’s jaw dropped open and her eyes lit up at the sight. “You got me a bench to sit on!”

“Aye, no more sitting on the ground,” Jack said with a grin.

“And,” Mrs. Fraser added, giving it a push, “it rocks.”

A smile beamed from Cate’s face. “It does!” She ran her hand along it.

“And it’s made from Polywood, making it impervious to weather,” Mr. Fraser chimed in.

“Give it a try, Lady Cate!” Molly exclaimed.

Cate rounded it, noting the final touch. “It has my name on it!” she said as tears pricked her eyes. Engraved in one of the Plywood planks was the message: Lady Cate's thinking spot.

She slid into the seat and set the glider in motion.

"Thank you, everyone," she said with a smile. "Though you didn't have to do this. And you didn't have to keep it a secret. Poor Molly had to drink cold coffee just to drag out our day."

Molly chuckled. "It was terrible. But all in the name of the secret!"

"We did so have to keep it secret," Mrs. Fraser said. "Though I was the one who suggested we give it to you early. Not only because you could use it, but because I doubted some of us could keep quiet long enough." She eyed Molly and Jack.

Molly shrugged. "I can't help it!"

"Well," Cate answered, as she set both dogs on the bench next to her, "I certainly can use it, so thank you. And I love it!"

She rose from the bench and gave each of them a warm hug and another thank you.

"Well, I suppose we should go and allow Lady Cate to enjoy her new gift in peace," Mrs. Fraser suggested.

"No," Cate said. "As excited as I am to sit and look over the loch, I'm coming back with you."

"You still have some time before the sun sets," Molly said.

"I know. And I'm very excited to use my gift. But I'd rather spend the time with the people who got it for me. Who's up for a little ice cream to celebrate?"

Cate spent the rest of her day enjoying time with her friends. After insisting on a pizza order for dinner and following up with ice cream, they spent the time talking, laughing, and even making some progress on Mr. Smythe's puzzle of Dunhaven Castle.

The smile hadn't faded from Cate's face even as she climbed into bed. The little music box added to her jovial mood, providing lovely background music as she slid between the sheets.

She turned onto her side to stare at the outline of the piano, limned in the moonlight streaming from the window. With the sapphire necklace clutched in her hand, she closed her eyes and drifted off to sleep.

* * *

Cate startled awake. She gulped in air as she glanced around the room, trying to orient herself. She was curled in her armchair in the library, a blanket draped across her. A fire glowed in the fireplace. Jack snored softly in the armchair next to her.

Cate struggled to recall how she came to be here. As she fidgeted in her seat, Jack shifted, his eyes opening. He blinked a few times, then straightened in his seat. "Cate?" he said, rubbing his eyes, sleep still lacing his voice.

"What happened?" Cate inquired. Her hand found the sapphire necklace clasped around her neck.

"You were in another trance," he answered, as he rubbed his eyes and stretched.

"What did I do this time?"

Jack grabbed his phone and pulled up his camera app. "The app notified me of your movements. I found you in the hall." He tapped the play button.

Cate, clad in her robe and slippers, wandered down the hall. The necklace was already clasped around her neck, its sparkling sapphires and diamonds peeking from under her robe's collar. She held the music box in her hands. "At least I had the good sense to put on my robe and slippers," Cate said with a sigh.

On-screen, Jack asked Cate where she was going. "I have to find it," she murmured.

"What are you looking for, Cate?"

Cate rounded a corner. "Cate? What are you searching for? I'd like to help."

"I have to find the dress," on-screen Cate answered.

"That dress again," Cate said, as she watched herself on the video.

"Keep watching," Jack said.

Cate wandered around the castle, stopping at a few doors before she shook her head and continued. After a few stops, she ducked inside a room and rustled through a trunk.

"Where did I put it?" she lamented.

"Do you remember where you saw it last?"

Cate stood still for a moment, unresponsive. "Cate? Do you know what year it is? Can you hear me?"

Cate approached a mirror and stared into it. Jack crossed behind her. Cate caught sight of him, spinning to face him. "Jack! You're here!"

“Yes. I’m here, Cate. Do you know where here is?”

“Of course, I do.” The smile faded from her face. “I have to find my dress.”

“I’d like to help you.”

Cate held up a finger. “I have an idea!”

The video bobbed as Cate spun on her heel and hurried from the room. Jack raced behind her. She threaded through the halls, arriving at the stairs leading to one of the turrets. Cate stared up the stairs before she hurried up them.

Jack followed her. Cate flung the door at the top open and scanned the room. The large wardrobe stood against the opposite wall, as it had for centuries. Trunks and boxes littered the rest of the space.

Cate scanned the room before she hurried to the wardrobe. She pulled it open. Inside, a neatly folded sapphire blue dress sat. Setting the music box down in the wardrobe, Cate grasped it and pulled it from the wardrobe. A smile lit her face.

“I found it!” she said as she spun to face Jack. She held up the dress in front of her with a wide grin. Red roses embroidered with chenille thread trimmed the silk sapphire dress. With short sleeves and a silk ribbon under the bust, the skirt flowed down into a flowy, trumpet bottom.

“It’s lovely, isn’t it?” Cate asked.

“It’s very pretty, Lady Cate,” Jack answered.

“I looked pretty in it when I wore it last,” Cate said.

“When did you wear it last?” Jack inquired.

“To the ball,” she answered.

“What ball, Cate? When?”

Cate’s brow furrowed as she considered the question. “It was...” The crinkle in her brow deepened. Her breathing turned ragged, and a pained expression crossed her face. She shook her head before she clutched at it. “I can’t...” she croaked.

She slid to the floor, still clutching the gown. The video cut off.

“You passed out and I carried you here. I didn’t know what state you’d wake up in, so I didn’t want to leave you alone.”

Cate sighed. “Thank you. I’m so sorry to have ruined your night’s sleep.”

“It’s no bother, Cate,” Jack said.

“So, I found the dress.” She pulled the phone from Jack’s hand and rewound the video. She paused it as she held the dress against her and stared at the image frozen on the screen.

“Appears so. Have you ever seen it before? I haven’t, you didn’t wear it to any of the balls you’ve hosted.”

“No,” Cate answered as she studied it. “It looks like its early 1800s, maybe a decade or so after the turn of the century.”

“Could it be before the turn of the century? Maybe the 1790s?”

“It’s hard to say without a better look, but I’d say this looks later than that. The puffed sleeves and length suggest that. Though I can’t be sure. Even so, I never wore this dress when we traveled to 1792.”

“No, you didn’t. The color is similar to... never mind.” Jack waved his comment away.

“It’s okay, you can say it. It’s similar to the dress Duke Northcott gave me.”

Jack nodded. “Aye.”

“A fact that hasn’t escaped me,” Cate said. “Is it still in the tower?”

“Aye,” Jack said. “Should I move it?”

“No,” Cate said. “No, I don’t want to spend more nights roaming the castle in search of it.”

“But perhaps giving it to you will make this worse.”

“And perhaps it will bring us more information.”

“Or maybe a trance you don’t come out of.”

“Either way, hiding it or moving it doesn’t seem to work. If it’s anything like the other items involved, it’ll just show up in my bedroom.”

“Good point. We’re fighting a losing battle.”

“Did you send the video to Damien?” Cate inquired, changing the subject.

Jack shook his head. “No, I didn’t think it shed any additional light, but I can if you’d like.”

“It may not matter.” Cate glanced to the clock on the mantle. It read 5:47 a.m. “It’s the middle of the night there now. We can wait.”

Jack nodded.

“I suppose it’s time to get up for our day, though,” Cate said after a moment.

With a yawn and another stretch, Jack agreed with a nod.

“You feel okay to go back to your bedroom?”

“Yep. Other than a mild haze, I’m fine. It’s so odd.”

“Okay, see you at breakfast, then.”

Cate climbed the stairs to her bedroom. Both dogs still lounged in bed, barely moving when she crept into the room. The music box sat on her nightstand again. “Made your way home, huh?”

Riley lifted his head and gave her a sleepy glance before he collapsed back onto the bed. Cate removed the necklace and stowed it in the jewelry armoire. It appeared the dress hadn’t wandered to her bed mysteriously. She supposed she should retrieve it and put it somewhere closer to avoid roaming around the castle in a trance.

She’d do it later in the morning, she decided. First, she planned to have breakfast with her staff, followed by a long walk and a relaxing rock on her new gliding bench by the loch.

After her leisurely breakfast and stroll, Cate climbed the tower stairs. The door at the top still stood open from her escapade last night. With some trepidation, she climbed the final few stairs and glanced into the tower room.

Across the room, a silk dress lay sprawled on the floor. Cate drew in a deep breath as she stared at it, before crossing to pick it up. The fabric, soft and silky, was of a high quality. The dress must have been expensive in its time. Cate studied it again, pulling her cell phone from her pocket and comparing the features of the dress to photos of dresses from various eras. She narrowed it down to the 1810s, as she suspected.

She shoved her phone back into her pocket and swept the dress into her arms, carrying it down to her suite. She pushed into her sitting room and wandered to the bedroom. Standing in front of the full-length mirror, she held the dress in front of her.

The blue brought out the blue in her eyes. The neckline seemed to be tailored to perfectly outline the sapphire necklace. Cate wandered to the jewelry armoire and pulled the necklace from the drawer. Returning to the mirror, she held it up with the dress. It matched perfectly in shape and color.

She stared into the mirror. The image of the room entered her mind again. The world around her began to transform. A musky scent filled her nostrils. Candlelight lit her face. She wore the dress and the necklace. Her hair was pulled up with curled tendrils framing her face. A blue silk ribbon and strand of pearls decorated the elaborate curls arranged on her crown.

A garbled voice spoke to her. “Ready, my dear?” it said.

Cate turned to the side and stretched out her arm, reaching for whoever spoke to her.

“Cate,” Jack said.

Cate’s eyebrows squished together as lightheadedness swept over her. She shook her head, making the dizziness worse. Her knees began to wobble, and her legs turned to jelly. She stumbled forward a step before her world went black.

CHAPTER 29

Cate awoke on her bed with Jack's concerned face hovering over her. "Cate?" he questioned as her eyelids fluttered open.

"Jack?" she questioned, her voice hoarse. "What happened?"

"You were staring in the mirror holding up the dress and the necklace. And then you collapsed."

Cate attempted to sit up, but a wave of dizziness passed over her. She collapsed back to the pillows.

"Easy, Cate." Jack palmed his phone and tapped around.

"What are you doing?"

"Calling Damien."

"No," Cate said, placing her hand on his. "I'm fine, just a little lightheaded."

"Cate, this is getting more and more serious by the minute. Now you're passing out every time you experience one of these trances."

Cate eased herself up to sit. "The dizziness is passing," she reported as her mind churned.

"What is it?" Jack asked as she sat pensively.

"Can I see the video from last night?"

Jack opened his camera app and handed it to her. She replayed the video three times. She swiped back to the previous video, speeding through her waltz around the west wing's massive space. She grabbed her phone, opened the camera cube's app, and found the video from her bedroom camera today. She played it twice.

“What is it, Cate?”

“Every time I collapse, it seems to be when I’m trying to recall details or physically trying to reach something in the trance.”

Jack considered the statement, rubbing his finger along his chin. “What are you saying?”

“That my passing out is related to a break in continuity in my trance. When a question is asked that I can’t answer or there is an object that I can’t reach, it must cause some issue with my mind and I just implode, for lack of a better word. Fainting is the body’s way of ‘resetting,’ like rebooting a computer.”

“So, your brain is resetting because it can’t access whatever it needs to.”

“Right, that’s my theory.”

“I think we should pass that along to Damien.”

“Okay,” Cate said. “I’ll text him.”

Jack blew out a long breath as Cate typed out the message.

“I can’t believe I’m saying this, but I can’t wait until we time travel after lunch. At least then you’re normal and I don’t have to worry about you passing out.”

“No, we only have to worry about figuring out if Hans killed Ruth and why,” Cate said.

“Never thought I’d see the day where murder was the least of our problems.”

“Things sure have taken an odd turn since we met the Buckleys,” Cate said, as she slid off the bed and stood.

“You okay?” Jack inquired.

“Yeah, no dizziness or weak legs.” Cate crossed the room and snatched the dress and necklace off the floor where they’d landed when she’s taken her nosedive. With them both put away, Jack walked her down to the library for her meal.

As she ate, her cell phone chimed with a message from Damien. Seems to be getting worse but the good news is we may be getting closer to a solution. Will let you know more when we have it. In the meantime, any chance you can stay in the past for a bit?

Cate chuckled at his message. The idea of asking Jack to stay in the past for longer than a few hours at a time was almost comical. Cate answered by thanking him and telling him she’d be spending at least a few hours there today.

They continued with a brief conversation as she finished her meal. Jack met her immediately following lunch and they headed upstairs for the normal routine of changing clothes and meeting outside her door, before traversing into the secret passage and slipping back to September 20th, 1942.

“At least the weather’s better,” Jack said, as they stepped into a cloudy, but dry day.

“Yes,” Cate said. “One day before the disappearance.”

“I suppose we should keep our eyes on Ruth. See if there are any additional clues to why Hans murders her.”

“Perhaps he decided not to go through with the spying. He didn’t seem keen on it yesterday.”

“No, but that’s what makes it even more curious.”

“How so?”

“If he’s opposed to spying because he feels these people are his friends, you’d think he’d object to murder.”

“Perhaps she forced his hand. Or it was an accident and he panicked.”

“We’ll do our best to find out.”

Cate nodded as they reached the castle and entered.

“Hey, we never got the chance to check out the room in the west wing yesterday,” Cate said.

“Want to try it now? We’ve got some time to kill.”

“Sure,” Cate said.

They threaded through the halls on their way to the west wing and entered through the large double doors. “Didn’t need my keys again,” Jack noted.

“Rory seems like he wouldn’t lock up unused wings.”

“You’re right. He has a rosy view of the world. He probably doesn’t see the need.”

They wound toward the room Cate seemed drawn to in the present. As they passed the music hall, Cate inched to the doors and pressed her ear against them.

“Just checking,” she said, as she flicked her gaze to Jack. After a quick peek inside, they continued down the hall.

Voices floated through the air as they rounded the corner. The door to the large hall stood open a crack. Cate stopped walking, her eyes widening as she glanced at Jack.

He held a finger to his lips, and they crept forward. Cate peeked through the crack in the door. Ruth stood inside, her arms crossed as she stared up at a man. To Cate's surprise, the man was not Hans. Victor Richard stood inside the room, his hands clasped behind his back as he stared at Ruth with a sour expression.

Cate's jaw unhinged as she glanced at Jack. Jack returned the surprised expression, and they returned their attention to the conversation in the room.

"How did this happen?" Ruth inquired.

"I don't know," Victor answered.

"You were supposed to prevent this from happening!" Ruth exclaimed. "Hans never should have had access to those communiques."

"I've done my best. I can only do so much before people begin to suspect."

Cate furrowed her brow at the conversation. Was Victor also a part of the spy ring?

"Tell that to der Fuhrer when he demands to know why the code, which has gone indecipherable for months, has now suddenly become readable to the British."

Victor wrinkled his nose at Ruth's statement. "I'll handle it," he growled.

"You'd better. Because if that message ever reaches Bletchley Park, it will ruin our chances for victory."

"It won't," Victor spat.

"We'll see. If it does, it'll be you whom I hang this noose around. Your days with the Reich are finished!"

Ruth took a step toward the door before Victor grabbed her arm. "Careful who you threaten, Brigitta. I worked hard for my place in the party. I'm not going to let it all go for naught because of you."

Cate began to fall backward as Jack tugged her away. They hurried as silently as possible down the hall and Jack pushed her through the doors into the music room before easing them shut behind them.

"OMG," Cate mouthed to Jack.

He nodded but held his finger to his lips again. High-heeled shoes clicked off the tile floor as Ruth, or Brigitta, stormed past the room. More footsteps followed, signaling Victor's return to the main castle.

They waited several more moments in silence before Jack inched open the door and peered into the hall.

“Looks clear,” he said.

Cate nodded and they navigated through the halls to their suite in silence. “OH MY GOODNESS,” Cate burst, as Jack closed the doors behind them.

Jack shook his head in disbelief.

“What is going on here?” Cate inquired, as she sank onto the chaise.

“Victor is a spy, obviously,” Jack said.

“Yes, and so is Ruth. Or Brigitta, or whatever her name really is; that much is clear. But what is Hans?”

“Also a spy?” Jack inquired.

“He can’t be. He’s the one who discovered whatever the Reich didn’t want him to.”

Cate pondered the latest information. “Yesterday, we assumed Hans and Ruth were the German spies. But today it seems like it’s Ruth and Victor.”

“Oh! I’ve got it!” Jack exclaimed. “Ruth is a double agent!”

“Possibly, yes. But which side is her true affiliation with? And what did she want Hans to do that he seemed to refuse so vehemently?”

“Maybe they’re both spies – Hans and Victor – and she’s playing them against each other for her own gain,” Jack suggested.

Cate bit her lower lip. “This is becoming very tangled. And now it is much less clear who killed her.”

“After the conversation we just heard, it very well could be Victor.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “Yes, in fact, I’d say he may be the more likely culprit. And it would explain why there’s no information on him. Victor Richard is not his real name.”

“Neither is Ruth Harper,” Jack noted. “I wonder if you’d get anywhere with Brigitta.”

Cate fell silent as the facts bounced around in her head. “There’s one other person whose name I couldn’t find anywhere either. Rita. Could she be connected?”

Jack threw his arms in the air as he paced the floor. “How many bloody spies are there here?”

“I’m not sure, but I think we should speak with Amelia.”

“And tell her what? Your traveling companion is a Nazi spy and so are a few other people, we’re just not sure who yet?”

“Something like that,” Cate said.

“Cate! We can’t!”

Cate’s shoulders slumped. “Jack, if they succeed, this could ruin the war efforts.”

“They don’t succeed, though, right? We know this.”

Cate considered it. “Yes, eventually Bletchley Park managed to work through whatever stymied their efforts in the early parts of this year and decipher the Enigma code, but...”

“But?”

“But what if that was only because whatever message Ruth said couldn’t get to Bletchley did get to Bletchley?”

“Because Ruth was killed,” Jack said.

“By Hans!” Cate exclaimed. “Hans kills her to make sure the message gets through.”

“A likely scenario. And one we shouldn’t disturb by talking to Amelia. In fact, I’m leery about disturbing things more than we have already.”

“Do you want to go home?”

Jack considered it. “I don’t want to go if it’ll mean you’ll suffer from another trance.”

“Okay,” Cate said. “Then let’s stay for dinner as we planned and head back after.”

Jack nodded. “Okay.”

They bided their time, pacing the floor of their suite as they waited for the dinner hour to approach. As Jack escorted her down to the sitting room for cocktails, Cate felt unease creep into her shoulders. They were immersed in a web of spies, secrecy, and deep state secrets big enough to commit murder over. She offered a nervous glance and fleeting smile at Jack before they stepped into the sitting room.

They were the last to arrive at the party. Cate swore a pall hung over the room. She sipped at her sherry as she eyed the four suspects in the room. Which of them were allies? Which were foes? And which would turn out to be a murderer?

Cate found herself distracted through most of the dinner. Conversation was stilted on her part by her general unease. With Rory on one side of her and Hans on the other, Cate struggled to make polite conversation as her mind churned through the latest developments.

Across the table, Cate noted Rita managed to wrangle the seat on Jack's left again, while Amelia sat on his right. That left Ruth sandwiched between Hans and Victor. The irony did not escape Cate as she watched the woman converse with both men. Which was she betraying? Which would murder her?

Cate and Jack retired shortly after dinner and returned to their own time.

"Whew," Jack exclaimed, as the second hand returned to normal speed, indicating their arrival in the present. "What a day."

"I agree. I'm exhausted just thinking through the possibilities."

"Should we talk through them and then a plan for tomorrow?"

"Okay," Cate said.

They parted ways, reconvening in the library after they returned to their normal duds.

"My mind is racing in a thousand directions," Cate admitted, as she plopped into the armchair.

Jack sighed. "Yep. We thought we had this all figured out and then Victor decided to be a spy."

"I couldn't help but notice the irony of Ruth sitting between Victor and Hans," Cate said.

"And here I figured all you noticed was Rita finagling a seat next to me for the third night in a row."

"That didn't escape me, either," Cate said with an unimpressed glance. "And speaking of Rita, what is her deal? How is she involved?"

"Maybe she isn't," Jack suggested.

Cate narrowed her eyes at the statement. "Doubt it," she retorted. "I couldn't find her in any records, either."

"Working off that theory, perhaps Hans is British intelligence and isn't our murderer."

"Because we found him under his real name?"

"Aye. The others are using assumed names, obviously."

"Which you think makes them the more likely suspects for the murder," Cate surmised.

Jack nodded.

"So, what's our next move?" Cate asked.

"Well, I suppose we should go back and at least ensure whatever message must get to Bletchley from Dunhaven makes it there via Hans, or whoever."

“And hopefully discover a murderer, too.”

“We’ll head back tomorrow, same time as today?”

“It seems to be the most active time.”

“Okay, sounds like a plan,” Jack said.

* * *

Cate spent the remaining afternoon hours searching for any information on German spies in the World War II era. In particular, she searched for any names that may be familiar, such as Brigitta. She found little information and gave up in favor of dinner and an evening walk.

She stared up at the castle on her return trip. Would they solve the mystery in 1942? And would she experience another trance tonight?

What if she became stuck in it this time? With the dress, music box and necklace, did she have all the components she needed to be sucked into her own mind? Worry grew in her and her shoulders tensed as she approached the castle’s facade.

With a deep breath, she pushed inside. Whatever she was dealing with, she’d have to face it one way or another. She just hoped she liked the outcome.

CHAPTER 30

Cate's eyelids fluttered. She blinked slowly as her senses began to return. With bleary eyes, her gaze darted around as her pulse quickened and she gasped in breaths.

"Easy, Cate," Jack said.

She clutched his arm, her head in his lap. "What happened?" she whispered.

Cate recognized her surroundings. She laid on the floor in the large hall in the west wing. Jack sat with her cradled in his arms.

"You had another episode," Jack said.

Cate glanced down at her attire. No longer clad in her pajamas, she now wore the sapphire blue dress. The necklace hung around her neck. Her hair had been pulled up into an upswept style.

"Looks like it was a doozy," she said, as she surveyed her attire.

"Outside of your rather formal attire, it was much the same as it was before. I caught up to you in the hall. You wandered here and started pawing at the pillar. You kept saying you had to find it."

"I must be searching for the room," Cate said, pushing herself up to sit.

"Easy."

"I'm okay. And I feel ridiculous laying on the floor. Why do I think the room is here?"

"I'm not certain. I've checked that pillar and I don't see anything odd on it."

Cate reached her hand out. "Help me up," she asked.

Jack climbed to his feet and pulled Cate up to stand. She approached the pillar and studied it, reaching out and touching or pushing various pieces.

"I don't see anything either," she admitted. "What snapped me out of it this time?"

"You got exceptionally upset about 'finding it' – or rather not finding whatever it was you were searching for. You were near tears and then you collapsed."

Cate inhaled deeply. "I wish I would have found it. This is getting old."

"Cate, I'm not sure I want you to find this room or whatever you're looking for. I'm afraid of what's going to happen when you do."

"Maybe I'll finally snap out of this nonsense."

Jack approached her and took her hands in his. He shook his head, worry creasing his forehead. "Cate, I'm afraid of what may happen to you," he said, his voice just above a whisper.

Cate squeezed his hands. "That's not going to happen."

"Isn't it? How do we know that?"

"Damien never mentioned it as an outcome."

"That doesn't mean it won't happen," Jack said.

Cate sighed as Jack pulled her into an embrace. "I'll always fight to come back," she said.

She glanced up at him. He stared down at her. He cupped her face in his hands. After a moment, he said, "We probably should go."

Cate nodded as she reached up to squeeze his hand. "With any luck, we can get a few more hours of sleep."

"Again, I find myself looking forward to going back to the past. It's the one place you're safe."

They strode from the room. "I'm safe here, too, Jack," Cate reassured him. "I'll always be safe with you here. Reids and MacKenzies, remember?"

"I appreciate the vote of confidence, Cate. But I feel like I'm failing miserably at protecting you."

"You're not. We'll be okay. As long as we're together." Cate gave his hand another squeeze before they parted ways.

As Cate closed the door to her suite, she collapsed against it with a heavy sigh. Her mind spun to the future. She squeezed her eyes shut as Jack's statement rang in her mind. What would happen once she found that room? Was Jack correct? Would she disappear into her own mind?

* * *

Cate arose early the next morning. She hadn't had much luck sleeping after the incident with the dress. She spent most of the remaining wee hours of the morning pacing the floor of her suite. She'd removed the collar cam from around her wrist so the camera would not alert Jack to her restlessness.

She dozed off on her chaise for a few moments before the sun rose over the moors. The moment the light began to paint the morning sky brilliant shades of pink and red, she rose and dressed for her day. Anxiousness filled her, not only about her current issues with the west wing and sapphire dress and necklace, but also concerning their trip to 1942.

What would they find? Could they ferret out the murderer? Questions surged in Cate's mind as she took the dogs for an early morning stroll, settling on her new bench to watch the sun rise higher into the sky.

Jack strolled to her location by the loch before she'd returned to the castle.

"Morning," he said as he approached her.

She offered him a weak smile. "Good morning." She patted the bench next to her.

Jack eased onto it, searching her face for any clues about her well-being. "I'm fine," she said before he could ask.

"Did you get any sleep?"

"Not really. You?"

"I stared at my phone all night in case you needed me."

Cate drew her lips into a thin line. "I'm sorry."

"It's not your fault, Cate," Jack said, as he settled back onto the bench and stared at the sunrise.

Cate blew out a long breath. "I can't wait to go back to 1942, though I'm afraid of what we'll find there, too."

"Like I said, at least in 1942 I know you're safe. Now, we better be getting back for breakfast before Mrs. Fraser starts to worry."

"We do not need that," Cate said with a chuckle. "Come on, boys."

She and Jack returned to the castle and Cate collected her breakfast and headed to the library. She toyed with the puzzle pieces as she attempted to focus on something other than the two major issues looming in her life. As mid-morning approached, her phone chimed.

Cate found a message from Damien. Hey Cate, how are things?

Cate smiled at the message, though her smile quickly faded as she considered her answer. Thanks for checking. Things have been better. I had another episode last night.

Damien responded quickly. Sorry to hear that. What happened?

Cate typed up the gory details, sending a message containing as much information as she could. I put the dress on, pulled my hair up, put on the necklace and headed for that room in the west wing. Jack said I kept insisting on finding something and became really upset when I couldn't find whatever I was searching for. Then I passed out. I have no memory of this at all. I woke up on the floor.

Damien responded a few moments later. I'm sorry this is happening to you, Cate. Can I ask you a few questions about it? We may be on to something here. If you're not up to it, that's fine.

Cate answered: I'll answer anything you want, ask away! And THANK YOU for all this help.

A message came back a moment later: Of course, Cate! We're happy to help. Alexander and I have been pouring over his reference library and we found a few leads. I just need more information to narrow it down.

Another text came shortly after the first. Any headaches?

Cate searched her memory. Not consistently. In a few of the trances, I seem to have experienced some pain but nothing before or after the episodes or in general, no.

Damien answered a few moments later. Okay, next question. Dizziness?

Cate nodded as she typed into her phone. Yes. I did experience that after collapsing the other day. I had to lay down for a few moments after the episode. This last time Jack wouldn't let me sit up until I had fully recovered so I'm not sure.

Damien responded: Okay, noted. Nausea?

Cate shook her head and typed: No (thankfully!).

Damien returned her message with a smiley emoticon followed by another question. Lack of focus or clouded mind?

Cate answered: Yes, definitely. It does clear with time travel but sometimes I can't focus, and it seems like those are the times when I've slipped into a trance while awake. Much of the time, I slip into them when I'm asleep.

Damien answered: Okay, so most instances are nocturnal.

Cate typed: Yes, though I have slipped into them while awake a few times.

Damien sent another message to clarify. And you've lost time in every instance, right?

Cate confirmed the lack of memory or "time losses" in every instance. She also included the details of what she recalled in terms of what the room she sought, and the other odd comments she'd uttered during her trances.

She followed up with a final message stating: I don't understand why I seem to have "memories" that aren't mine?! These feel like memories, but I've never had a dress like this, never had this music box, never went to the 1810s. Why am I acting like I have?

After a few moments, Damien responded: It may be connected to what's happening to you. I don't have any more questions right now, but this will help us sort through the possibilities. We have a few leads. I'll get back to you as soon as we search them all out INCLUDING solutions!

Cate sent a "thank you" back in all capitals before returning to her puzzle. She found herself unable to focus, though she wasn't certain that it was a side effect from whatever she was suffering from or the general tension of the two mysteries.

Cate rubbed at the back of her neck as her mind shot in several different directions. She considered returning to the west wing to seek answers while she was more awake and cognizant. The concept of disappearing into herself before she ever determined what happened in 1942 stopped her.

Instead, she frittered away her hours with another walk outside and a long contemplation near the loch. She forced her lunch down and sat drumming her fingers on the desk as she awaited Jack.

He appeared in the doorway moments after Molly collected her tray and she leapt from her seat. "Ready?"

"Uh, I guess," Jack said. "I hoped to find out how you were feeling and how your morning went first."

"It was okay. I talked to Damien. He asked me a bunch of questions about my symptoms. He said they had a few leads and would be back to me soon with an answer and a few solutions. Here's to hoping!"

Jack nodded. "Let's hope. Okay, I guess we can get going then."

Cate led the way and they separated to change clothes, meeting in the hall and heading to the secret passage and 1942.

Cate blew out a long breath as the timepiece slowed. "Moment of truth today," she said.

"Aye. Should we head to the west wing again?"

"Maybe third time's the charm," Cate said. They reached the end of the passage, and exited the crypt into the bright sunshine beyond.

Jack nodded and they started up the path to the castle. After a moment he puckered his lips and flicked his glance to Cate. "Wait, did you mean third time's the charm for exploring that room, or getting information about our spies?"

"Either? Both. Doesn't matter, it'd just be nice to move forward on some front."

"I agree. Boy, I hope we don't find Rita and Ruth engaged in an argument there."

"Why?"

"Because then we'll have another suspect, and we may never know who did it. There'll be too many to keep an eye on."

"Who's our first priority to track?"

"I'd say Victor," Jack said. "He's definitely on the German side."

"Which may also be Ruth's side."

"Good point," Jack said. "So maybe it should be Hans."

Cate nodded. "Though he really doesn't seem the murderous type."

"So, Victor?"

Cate opened her mouth, flicking her gaze to Jack. "No," he answered.

"I didn't say anything yet."

"We're not splitting up!"

Cate grimaced. "I didn't suggest that."

"No, but you were about to. And that's not happening. Every time we have ever split up it's been a disaster."

"All right. It's just like you said, there are too many people to keep an eye on."

"So, we'll have to go with the most likely suspect. Which I still say is Victor."

"I'd agree," Cate said, as they pushed into the castle.

"Oh golly, I've won a debate with Lady Cate. I'm in shock."

"That's very funny, Jack. Come on," she said, leading him through the halls toward the west wing.

“You know, I have to say, this is the first time I’m enjoying time travel with you.”

“Oh really? Is it because there’re bathrooms and electricity?”

“No, it’s because I’ve won a debate and you are normal in this time.”

“Sorry I’m abnormal in the present,” Cate lamented, as they strolled down the wide entrance to the west wing.

Jack put his arm around Cate’s shoulders and gave her a squeeze. “I like you either way. I just like not having to worry about you here.”

They slowed as they approached the first entrance to the music hall. Cate pressed her ear to the door before easing it open. They stepped into the empty room, their footsteps echoing off the large space.

“On to the famous grand hall!” Jack said.

They left through the second entrance in the music hall and snuck down the hall. They stopped several feet from the golden doors and strained for any sounds. None came so they continued toward the doors, still moving as noiselessly as possible.

Cate pressed her ear against the door then shook her head at Jack. She eased one door open, peering inside. After shifting her gaze around as much as the crack allowed, she eased the door back further. They found the room empty.

“I’m not sure if I’m pleased or not about finding no one here,” Cate said, her voice echoing in the large space as they stepped inside.

“Feel okay?” Jack inquired, shooting her a sideways glance.

“Yep. This room doesn’t seem to have any weird effects on me here.” Cate shrugged as she approached the pillar she seemed to be drawn to in her time.

She studied it again. Nothing new jumped out at her. Jack joined her, feeling around on the pillar for any secret triggers or compartments.

“I don’t see anything, Lady Cate.”

“Neither do I,” Cate admitted. She sighed and glanced around the space, searching for anything to clue them in to what she sought in this room.

“The dogs were at this wall,” Cate said, stalking across the room.

She ran her hand over it, hoping to find some clue as to what was behind it. Jack approached and pounded against it. “This is an interior wall,” he said. “There could be something behind it.”

“I don’t see a trigger,” Cate said.

“How could you with all this gold covering the walls?”

Cate shrugged as she tugged at a wall fixture. After a moment, she frowned and spun around, leaning her back against the wall as she crossed her arms and huffed.

“Maybe the trigger is somewhere else in the room?” Jack said, phrasing it as a question.

Cate lifted her eyebrows. “Maybe,” she murmured. “Though why am I drawn to that pillar?”

“Cate, you’re in a trance. Who knows if you’re thinking straight?”

“I’m thinking straight enough to come here!” she countered. “To put on a necklace, and to get dressed!” Cate shook her head in frustration.

“I know you’re frustrated, Cate, but we’ll figure something out.”

She nodded, her arms still folded tightly over her chest and flicked her gaze across the room. Her brow crinkled and she cocked her head. “What is that?” she questioned.

Across the room, a dull spot broke up the otherwise shiny, reflective flooring. “What’s what?” Jack inquired, following her gaze.

“That spot on the floor,” Cate answered as she stepped toward it.

As she approached, she discovered it to be a small scrap of newspaper. Cate snatched it from the floor. The side facing her contained a partial date: ber, 21, 1942. An imprint indicated a message had been scrawled on the back. She flipped it over to read.

Meet me at 10 p.m. in the folly. Urgent. Mission-critical.

CHAPTER 31

Cate's eyes went wide, and her eyebrows shot toward her hairline. "Jack!" she exclaimed as he joined her, peering over her shoulder at the note.

"Do you think this was from today?" Jack inquired.

"Yes," Cate said, flipping the paper over. "It's from the paper printed today."

"Aye, so it is. Who do you think it's from?"

"I'm not sure," Cate said. "But this is our first solid clue as to where we may learn just what happened to Ruth Harper."

"Guess we'll head to the folly tonight and unmask a killer."

Cate nodded her agreement. She glanced at Jack's watch. "It's almost half-past three. We've got a few hours to kill."

"Aye, I suppose we'll do that in the comfort of our suite. Unless you'd like to continue poking around in here."

"I don't see the point. And I don't want to be in here if a pair of spies attempt to use it for a meeting spot."

"Good point. Let's go."

They threaded back through the halls and slipped into the privacy of their bedroom suite. A note from Rory awaited them.

"Oh, no," Jack groaned as he read the note.

"What is it?" Cate asked, her stomach somersaulting. She leapt from her seat on the chaise. "Is it Ruth? Have we missed it?"

"No, he's canceled dinner."

Cate puckered her lips in an unimpressed expression.

“He says we can request a tray be brought up, but Amelia’s plans are up in the air, and she may be leaving tonight or tomorrow morning.”

Cate furrowed her brow. “Leaving? Do you think this sudden change in plans is due to whatever is going on with Ruth?”

“I’d say it’s tied together. She must be a master manipulator to get Amelia to do her bidding.”

Cate sighed. “And we won’t have a chance to discuss this at dinner.” She bit her lower lip as she stared into space, her mind churning. “Perhaps we should seek out Amelia. Maybe she’ll give us some information.”

Jack considered it for a moment. “We may gain some information as to why Amelia is leaving and what prompted it, but I’m not sure it helps us.”

“I’d like to try,” Cate said.

“I don’t want you going alone. Though I suppose it would look odd for us both to go.”

“Well, in the interest of saying goodbye, you could tag along.”

“You may get more information out of her if I wasn’t there. How about this, I’ll walk you to her suite and leave you there. Only if you agree to come straight back here when you’re finished.”

“I promise,” Cate said.

“No racing after clues on your own,” Jack warned.

“I said I promise!” Cate exclaimed.

“Yes, I know. But I also know if you get a whiff of a clue, you’ll go darting off after it and I’ll be left out of all the fun.”

“I won’t dart after anything. But I would like to say goodbye to Amelia, even if I don’t get any information from her.”

“I understand,” Jack said with a nod. “Well, come on, then.”

Cate slipped her hand into the crook of his arm, and they proceeded to the suite Amelia usually occupied when they stayed at the estate. The door opened a few moments after Cate knocked on it. Ruth stood inside.

“Oh, hello, Ruth,” Cate said. “Is Amelia here? Rory left a note saying you may be leaving soon, and I hoped to speak with her.”

“Oh, yes, she’s here.” Ruth stepped aside to allow Cate to enter.

“I’ll see you later, dear,” Jack said, as he waved to her and departed down the hall.

Cate swallowed hard as she stood face to face with the woman who so easily lied to those around her.

“Amelia!” Ruth called into the bedroom. “Cate is here to see you.”

Amelia emerged carrying a dress a few moments later. “Cate! How lovely to see you.”

“Sorry to interrupt, I realize you must be quite busy, but Rory said you’re leaving?” Cate phrased the remark as a question, hoping to solicit some information.

“Oh, it’s no bother. I would have asked to have a tea since we’ll miss dinner this evening, though, you’re usually out in the afternoons. Ruth, would you be so kind as to ring for tea?”

“I’ll request it straight from the kitchen. I have a few things I need to take care of.”

Amelia nodded at the girl as she slipped from the room. “Come in, I’m just throwing a few things into the suitcase. Then we’ll sit down and have a nice cuppa when the tea arrives.”

Cate followed her into the bedroom. “Can I help with anything?”

“Oh, no, I’ve got it all under control. I am so used to traveling, this is becoming second nature to me.”

“What prompted the sudden change in plans, if you don’t mind my asking?”

Amelia offered her a shrug as she continued to fill her suitcase. “We had no definite plans when we came. An opportunity came up to meet with Lucas on some travel he’ll be doing, and we decided to take it.”

“Oh, how nice. It’s too bad Lucas’s business couldn’t bring him here. We would have loved to see him again.”

Amelia gave her a brief smile. “I’ll pass along your regards. I’m certain he’ll be sore he missed your visit.”

A maid arrived with tea and Amelia gave her packing a break as she settled onto the settee in the sitting room with a warm cup of tea. Cate sat next to her, considering ways to tease more information from Amelia.

“So, where are you off to now?”

“We’ll meet Lucas in Northampton.”

“Oh, you’ve got quite a ways to go then,” Cate said.

“Yes, hence our rather dubious plans about the time at which we’ll depart. We’ll only have a short window to catch Lucas, so we must plan accordingly.”

Cate furrowed her brow at the statement. “Oh, my, it sounds almost as rigid as a train schedule.”

Amelia gave her a hearty laugh. "Close," she said, still chuckling. "Such are the times. What about you and Jack? How long will you remain at Dunhaven?"

"We'll be going in short order, as well. I'm so pleased we had the opportunity to see each other again."

"As am I. Lucas will be so jealous when I tell him who I've seen!"

Cate smiled at her, wishing she had the opportunity to see her great-grandfather again, too. Amelia used Cate's silence to transition into other topics as they finished their tea.

"Well," Amelia said as they finished their tea, "I suppose I should get back at it. I'm just waiting on word from Lucas, so I'd like to be ready."

"I understand," Cate said, setting down her empty teacup and standing. Amelia pulled her into an embrace.

"Oh, it was lovely to see you again, Cate. And I do hope we'll be able to get together after this terrible business is over with and truly enjoy each other's company."

"I do, too," Cate said. She gave Amelia's arm a squeeze, before she offered her a final smile and backed away. With a last wave, she disappeared into the hall.

With a tear-filled sigh, Cate navigated through the halls back to her suite. She found Jack napping on the chaise. Cate took the opportunity to pace the floor in the bedroom, not wanting to wake Jack from his slumber.

After forty-five minutes, Cate heard movement from the sitting room. As she approached the doorway, Jack sat up and stretched. He yawned before he smiled sleepily at her. "Oh good, you're back."

"I've been back for almost an hour. I didn't want to wake you since I've been doing a wonderful job of keeping you awake at night."

"I'm just pleased you came straight back! Did you learn anything?"

Cate shrugged. "Not much. According to Amelia, they're leaving because they have a chance to meet with Lucas in Northampton."

"So Amelia is the one who made the decision?"

"Seems to be."

"Hmmm, that wasn't what we suspected."

"No, but now that I think about it, perhaps that's what precipitated this note," Cate said, unfurling the paper she had stuffed in her pocket. "Maybe Ruth sent a message to one of the men to up the timeline of their mission given her imminent departure."

“Could be. Wonder what causes whoever to kill her then?”

“I’m not sure, but her death must be the reason Amelia is still here in a few days.”

“Aye, her plans must change after Ruth disappears.”

Cate sighed. “Well, I suppose we’ll find out tonight. But for now, should I ring for dinner?”

“Best idea I’ve heard all day.”

* * *

Cate and Jack spent the early evening hours eating sandwiches sent up from the kitchen, taking turns staring out the window and pacing the floor as the sun lowered in the sky.

At promptly 8:30 p.m., Jack suggested they make their way to the folly. “We’ll have a long wait, but I’d rather be there and hidden away in case anyone arrives early.”

“I agree,” Cate said. “Plus I couldn’t stand being cooped up in that room anymore. I just want to get going.”

“It’s not going to make time go any faster, Lady Cate.”

“I know, but at least I feel like we’re moving now!”

“And now we’re going to stop moving,” Jack said, as they approached the folly. He glanced around the surrounding area to check for any watchful eyes before they ducked inside. As they entered the darkened enclosure, Jack flicked on his flashlight.

“We can hide here,” he said, motioning to a partial wall separating the interior.

Cate grimaced at it. “Shine the light behind there before I go in.”

“Why?”

“I’m afraid of critters.”

Jack swept the beam behind the wall. “Just a few wayward leaves and dirt.”

Cate, still frowning, kicked around the leaves before she squatted behind the wall. “Don’t trust me?”

“I don’t trust rodents,” Cate said. “Can you see me?”

“No, totally hidden,” Jack said, before clicking off his flashlight and settling onto the floor.

After twenty minutes, Cate fidgeted.

“Stop squirming around,” Jack whispered.

“I can’t help it! My legs are giving out.”

In the dim light, Jack screwed up his face, glancing at her.

“Sit down!” he breathed. “Are you going for the world’s record for squatting?”

“I was...”

“Afraid of critters, right,” Jack noted. “Do you want to sit on my lap?”

“No,” Cate said with a groan. “I’ll brave it.” She sank to the floor. Latticework at her eye level allowed her to see through into the main chamber of the folly.

They waited another twenty minutes before footsteps on the stone steps outside sounded. In the waning light, Cate grasped Jack’s forearm and squeezed. She hoped she could hear over the loud thudding of her heart in her ears.

In the dim light, the form of Ruth appeared limned in dying twilight. It couldn’t be that close to ten. Why had Ruth come so much earlier?

As she entered, she flicked on a lantern, holding it high as she glanced around the space. Cate held her breath as Ruth spun in a slow circle. She focused on the half-wall, studying it for a moment before stepping forward. Jack slid his arm up and squeezed Cate’s hand in his.

Shoes sounded on the stone outside. Ruth spun to face the incoming party. Cate pursed her lips to stop herself from gasping as the bright lantern shone on Hans’s face. He held one hand up to block the bright light, his other hand clutched something.

“Did you bring it?” Ruth asked.

He nodded, still holding his hand up to the light. Ruth held her hand out. “You’re doing the right thing,” she assured him.

He shook his head as he lowered his hand. “I can’t believe it,” he choked. “He saved my life when our apartment building was hit.”

“Of course he did. He needed you,” Ruth said, a coldness in her voice.

“Anyway, I put everything in there you requested.”

Ruth nodded. “And Victor?” she inquired.

“I gave him the fake report as you requested.”

“Good,” she said.

He pursed his lips, staring at the ground. “You’ve done your country a great service,” Ruth added. “I’ll certainly pass that along.”

He gave her a slight nod. “Dismissed,” she said with finality.

Hans turned on a heel and disappeared through the opening. Ruth set the lantern on the half wall directly above Cate and Jack. Cate winced at Jack as they tried to stay out of sight.

She shuffled through the papers. After a moment, she pulled her blouse from within her skirt. Stretching behind her back, she wiggled an identical folder from under her chemise. She set it on the stone bench and slid the folder received from Hans under her camisole. She quickly tucked her blouse into her skirt and adjusted the sweater she wore.

After the swap, Ruth perched on the edge of the stone bench and checked her watch. Cate glanced at Jack and shrugged. She pointed to her bare wrist in a silent question. Jack motioned the time to be ten to ten.

Cate nodded. Her mind screamed with the details of the incident. So, Hans did not kill her. The killer must be the person she was meeting at ten. The killer must be Victor.

Time seemed to stand still, but at long last footsteps sounded again on the steps outside. Cate’s heart pounded in her chest. If they were correct, they would soon witness a murder. Jack must have sensed her apprehension. He reached out and grasped her hand. She clung to him, suddenly unsure she wanted to be here. She fought to keep her breath shallow and steady.

Ruth stood as the figure appeared in the doorway. Victor wandered inside.

“You summoned me, Brigitta?”

“I have intercepted the report from Hans.” She waved the folder in the air. “I will destroy it and pass along a fake, thus meaning the code will remain indecipherable.”

Victor wiggled his eyebrows at her. “So you managed to pull it off.”

“I did. And now your cover can remain intact. I expect you to do a far better job in the future with making sure the code remains unreadable.”

Victor narrowed his eyes at her. “I don’t imagine I’ll be here long.”

Ruth raised her eyebrows at the statement. “Oh?”

“No. Not when I deliver the information you were supposed to retrieve. Give me the folder.”

Ruth offered him a harsh cackle. “I am capable of doing my job.”

Victor removed a gun hidden in his jacket. “That may be, but I prefer to see the job through myself.”

Ruth remained calm despite the pistol being aimed at her. She flicked her gaze from the gun's barrel to Victor's face. "Put that away."

"Give me the folder."

"Fine," Ruth said. She passed the folder over to Victor. He glanced through it then tucked it under his arm, training the gun on Ruth again.

"You got what you wanted. Though don't think I won't report this little incident to our superiors."

"That's where you're wrong, Brigitta."

Ruth cocked her head, and Victor smirked at her.

"I have high aspirations. And I won't have them ruined by a little tufthunter like you. I don't trust you, you see. So, I think I'll up my chances of success."

Without another word, Victor fired his weapon. An expression of shock covered Ruth's face as she glanced down at her blouse. A wet red spot bled through the cloth. Ruth pressed a hand to her stomach. Blood glistened on her fingers as she pulled it away. A moan escaped her lips and she collapsed to the ground, slumping to the floor.

CHAPTER 32

Cate's muscles stiffened and Jack cupped a hand over her mouth. "Shhh," he whispered in her ear, as he pulled her closer to him.

"Goodbye, Brigitta, or whoever you are," Victor said with a sneer, as he stowed his gun in his jacket. "Now, I'll be the hero."

A voice sounded behind Victor. "I'm sorry, Victor. But I can't let that happen."

With furrowed brows, Victor spun to face the newest addition to the party. Rita stepped into the light from the lantern, gun drawn and pointed at Victor.

"Rita," he said.

"Oh, come now, Victor. I'm certain you've already deduced Rita Haverford is not my real name."

Cate's eyes went wide, and she squeezed Jack's arm.

Victor raised his eyebrows. "I've never suspected you of anything disingenuous."

"Well, then I'm very disappointed in you. I thought you were smarter than that."

Victor glanced back to Ruth. "I suppose you were in league with her."

Rita shook her head. "No."

"Well, then maybe you'll be interested in discussing a partnership. I'm certain we can come to some arrangement that will be mutually beneficial for both of us."

Rita pressed her lips into a thin line and shook her head. "Sorry, Victor, but there are larger things in motion here. And unfortunately, you're collateral damage."

With that Rita squeezed the trigger of the gun. The muzzle flashed as the bullet discharged. Victor grunted as the bullet struck him square in the chest. Rita aimed a second time and fired again as Victor dropped to his knees.

This one hit him square between the eyes. He flopped forward, his eyes still staring blankly ahead. Cate squeezed her eyes shut as a tear rolled down her cheek. With Jack's hand still clasped firmly over her mouth, she managed to keep her shocked squeal inside.

Two men appeared as Rita pulled the folder from the floor. "Bury him in the side garden."

"What about her?" one man asked.

"Leave her. Let her partner find her. They'll assume Victor killed her and fled, leaving us undetected."

The man nodded as he grabbed Victor under one arm. The other man grabbed him under the other and together, they dragged him from the folly, his feet making a sickening smacking sound as they slapped off the stone steps outside.

Rita spun on her heel and departed from the folly, leaving the lit lantern still shining inside.

Cate's chest heaved as she tried to gasp in breaths. Jack kept a firm hold on her for several more moments until he was certain no one would return.

"Stay quiet," Jack cautioned as he released his grip on her.

"What just happened?" Cate whispered, as she wiped at her tear-stained cheeks.

A groan interrupted any response Jack could offer. With wide eyes, Cate shuffled on her hands and knees around the half wall and over to Ruth.

Cate rolled her onto her back and stared down at the blood spot as her hands searched for her carotid artery. "Oh my God, Jack," Cate exclaimed. "She's alive! We have to help her!"

Jack pulled off his jacket and shoved it against Ruth's wound. "We've got to keep pressure on the wound."

"One of us has to go for help," Cate said.

"No, we can't split up, Cate," Jack insisted.

"Jack..." Cate began when a shout interrupted her statement.

Both Jack and Cate spun to face the entrance. Amelia stood in the doorway, her hand covering her gaping jaw. She rushed forward. "What happened? Is she alive?"

"Yes," Cate exclaimed. "Yes, she's alive. She's been shot. By Victor Richard. He's a German spy! And he was shot and killed by Rita. We have no idea who or what she is!"

"I know about Victor," Amelia answered, as she pulled Jack's hands away and ripped open Ruth's blouse. She shoved up the chemise to assess the wound.

"She'll need surgery," she said matter-of-factly. "We'll need to get her to a hospital as quickly and quietly as possible. Jack, I'll need your help."

Jack nodded, prepared to carry the woman. Before he could lift her, Ruth's eyelids fluttered open. She moaned in pain.

"Sarah? Sarah," Amelia said, leaning forward to stroke her hair. "Easy. You've been shot."

"F-F-Folder," Ruth stuttered.

"Shhh, don't try to speak," Amelia said.

Ruth gave a hard shake to her head. "Hans, folder. Must deliver."

"I'll handle it, Sarah."

"She had a folder from Hans. She hid it behind her back under the camisole," Cate explained.

"What?" Amelia said, as Ruth's eyes fluttered open and closed. She rocked, attempting to move. "Help me. Gently roll her."

Jack eased her over and Amelia reached to her back. She pulled a folder from a small wrap around her midriff. Amelia paged through it as Jack eased Ruth back to the floor.

"Oh my God," Amelia said with a gasp. She flicked her gaze to Cate. "And you say this is from Hans?"

Cate gave her a shaky nod. "Yes," Cate said. "Hans gave that to Ruth or Sarah or whatever her name is. Then she took another folder identical to this one from under her blouse and replaced it with this one. She gave the other folder to Victor. That's who shot her."

"Jack, Cate, I need you to do something for me."

"Anything," Cate said.

"Name it," Jack added.

"I need you to take this folder and deliver it."

“What?” Cate answered, her eyes wide and her eyebrows squashed together.

“This contains the information needed to decipher the Enigma code. This must get to Bletchley Park. Sarah and I were supposed to deliver it, that’s where we were going. Obviously, we can’t go now. You must take it. Please, it could decide the outcome of the war.”

Cate flicked her gaze to Jack then back to Amelia. Was she hearing correctly? Was her great-grandmother a spy?

Cate’s lower lip bobbed up and down as she tried to formulate a response. Amelia continued in the absence of her response. “I’ll contact Lucas, let him know the change of plans.”

“Lucas?” Cate finally managed to squeak out.

“Yes,” Amelia confirmed. “Lucas, Sarah, and I work for the intelligence effort. We suspected a German spy ring operating here at Dunhaven. Victor Richard, aka Victor Richter, works for the enemy. He attempted to keep this information from ever being discovered. Please. You must deliver it.”

Cate’s head slowly nodded. “Okay,” she said.

Amelia nodded. “Come along. I’ll get you along your way.”

“What about her?” Jack inquired.

The question was answered by the appearance of Rory and Hans.

“Oh, Rory, Hans, thank goodness. Please help me with Ruth. Cate and Jack found her here. She’s been shot. She needs immediate medical attention, but we must keep the matter private. I must attend to something else immediately.”

“I understand,” Rory said, as he took over for Jack.

“Cate, Jack, come with me,” Amelia said.

They followed Amelia from the folly. She led them to the garage, grabbing the keys to one of the vehicles. She led them to it before she spun and held the folder out to Cate. She pressed it into her hands and squeezed.

“Take this to Bletchley Park. Ask for Alan Turing. Give it to no one but Alan. Stop for no one. Watch your backs. There are many people who want to ensure this never reaches Mr. Turing and his fantastic machine.”

Cate nodded as she stared down at the folder, speechless.

Amelia set her foot on the running board of the vehicle and hiked her skirt. Cate’s eyes bulged as her great-grandmother pulled a weapon from her garter. She passed it off to Jack. “Take this. Stay safe.”

Jack nodded as he accepted the weapon, sticking it in the waistband of his pants.

“Be safe, Cate and Jack.” Amelia pulled open the door and loaded Cate into the passenger’s side, as Jack slid in behind the wheel. Amelia hurried from the garage, returning toward the folly as Jack eased the car onto the gravel drive and aimed for Dunhaven.

Cate sat silent and stunned as Jack drove. After a moment, she gasped out, “What just happened?”

“I’m not one hundred percent sure,” Jack answered, “though I am certain driving this is not going to be as easy as I hoped.”

Cate glanced at him. “No power steering,” Jack commented.

“Right,” Cate said. She glanced at the folder in her lap. “Jack, Amelia... my great-grandmother is a spy.”

“Aye. I did not see that one coming,” Jack answered as the gears ground. Jack winced. “Haven’t driven a manual in a while.”

Cate continued to parse through the details of what they’d just witnessed. “So, Amelia and Lucas are spies. And Ruth or Sarah worked with them.”

“And Victor was a German spy.”

“Right. Ruth must have been a double agent, ferreting out the German spy embedded at Dunhaven.”

“Aye, that seems right.”

Cate paused a moment. “So, who is Rita?”

“That I’m not sure. She didn’t seem to have a side. She didn’t care what happened to Ruth or Victor.”

Cate’s brow furrowed. “She killed Victor and Ruth is still alive.”

“Right,” Jack confirmed.

“But...” Cate paused as she put together the pieces. “But the person in the grave we found was a woman. Ruth’s height. Victor is a man and much taller. Yet he’s the one buried in that grave now.”

Cate’s eyes bulged and she sucked in a gasp as she glanced sharply at Jack. “Jack,” she said, breathlessly, “did we just change history?”

Jack considered Cate’s question. With a sigh and a shake of his head, he responded, “I don’t know if we did, but Rita definitely did.”

“Why? What happened? Who is Rita?”

“I’m not certain,” Jack answered, his eyes never leaving the road. “What did she say to Victor about suspecting Rita wasn’t her real name?”

Cate bit her lip, trying to recall the details. The conversation happened less than an hour ago, yet it felt as it had happened ages ago. “She said there were larger things in motion. What does that mean?”

“I’m not certain, but for now, we need to focus on getting that folder to Bletchley Park.”

Cate glanced down at the folder in her lap and nodded. “Yes. I can’t believe this. We’re delivering a piece of intelligence to Alan Turing. This is...”

“Frightening.”

“I was going to say amazing, but that word works, too.”

“So, this Turing guy...” Jack began, his hands wiggling the wheel to keep the car steady.

“Is well known for his work in deciphering the Enigma code,” Cate answered. “His work led to the development of modern computer science.”

“I see,” Jack said, glancing in the car’s mirror.

“To meet him will be...” Cate struggled to find the words. “I’m speechless.”

Jack didn’t respond.

“Sorry, history geek stuff,” Cate added, glancing at him. “Is the driving really difficult?”

Jack shook his head, glancing in the mirror again. “No, but I swear this car has been following us since we left Dunhaven.”

Cate glanced back behind them, finding a pair of headlights shining toward them. “Maybe it’s a fluke.”

“Maybe,” Jack said.

Cate tried to keep her pulse in check as Jack veered off onto another street and the headlights followed. She flicked her gaze to Jack who studied the lights, too, and winced.

“I don’t like this,” Jack said.

Cate stared down at the folder in her lap. “Neither do I,” she said. “Not when we’re carrying information that could affect the outcome of the war.”

“Aye, that’s my thoughts exactly.”

They continued along their route, making their way south toward London. As they reached a lonely stretch of road, the car behind them inched closer. Jack pressed the accelerator, speeding up as much as the car would allow. The tail car kept pace with them.

“Great,” Jack muttered.

Cate removed the papers inside the folder and stuffed them into the blouse of her dress as the car veered around them and fought to gain on them.

“Cate, hang on to something, he’s going to hit us.”

Cate clutched for anything to brace herself. In a car with no seatbelt restraints, a wreck could be devastating.

The other car pulled level with them. Jack tried to drop back but the car swerved, crunching their front bumper on the driver’s side. Jack swerved to maintain control from the hit.

“Hang on,” he said through clenched teeth.

“What are you going to do?”

“I’m going to hit him back,” Jack announced, as he mashed the accelerator to the floor and swerved toward the other car.

The sickening scrape of metal-on-metal tore through the air, causing Cate to wince as her body jarred from the impact. A moan escaped her, and Jack flicked his eyes to her before returning them to the road.

“You okay?”

“I’m fine,” she gasped.

“This guy isn’t going to stop.”

Cate shook her head. “No,” she cried, and swallowed hard. “I’m not sure what to do.”

“How good are you at jumping from a moving vehicle?” Jack inquired as they continued to drive neck-in-neck with the other car.

“Are you serious?” Cate asked incredulously.

“Yes,” Jack said. “We need to get out of this car. He’s not going to quit until we’re...”

Jack’s statement was interrupted as a bullet smacked into their hood. Jack cursed under his breath.

“Yes, I can jump from a moving car,” Cate said, her eyes wide as she stared at the bullet hole.

Jack nodded. “There’s water coming up. I want you to jump out now. I’m going to drive the car into the lake. I’ll meet you back here as soon as it’s clear. Stay off the road and out of sight.”

“Jack!” Cate exclaimed.

“No, Cate. We can’t risk those papers getting wet. You go now.”

Cate nodded and swallowed hard. “Okay. Good luck,” she said, squeezing his arm.

She spun and cracked her door open. The ground passed underneath her at a dizzying clip. She bit her lower lip hard and flung herself out, rolling across the ground and knocking the air from her lungs. Jack continued on as though she'd never budged. Her door swung shut as the car continued to barrel down the road.

As soon as she was able, Cate scrambled off the roadway and into the field beyond. She hurried across the darkened landscape, running low to the ground until she found a large tree. With some difficulty from her t-strap pumps, she managed to scurry up into the cover of the full leaves.

The two cars careened down the road. Jack took another hit as the car smacked into him again. The car flailed as though he couldn't maintain control. It swayed dangerously close to going off the road. The other driver took advantage as they entered a curve and swerved toward Jack. The other car hit Jack's car hard. He failed to recover from the hit, and his car rode roughly up over a small embankment, crashing through a wooden fence, before it sailed airborne over the edge of the hillside and smacked into a small loch.

Cate winced at the sight as she clutched the tree branch under her. The other car ground to a halt, then reversed. A man hopped from the passenger side and scurried up the embankment. Cate's heart dropped. She heard the crack of a pistol as it fired four shots.

CHAPTER 33

Cate covered her mouth as a horrified squeal emerged. “Jack,” she breathed, as she watched the other man wait a few moments before he returned to the waiting vehicle. The car sped off into the night.

Cate trembled as she sat in the tree, waiting to be sure the car did not return. When it seemed safe, she scrambled down, falling the last few feet onto her rear. She clambered to her feet and hurried to the loch, staying off the road.

“Jack!” she called in a hushed tone as she reached it. The car still bobbed in the water with only its rear end visible. Bubbles escaped around it as it continued to sink into the waters.

Cate hurried around the water’s edge as she searched for signs of life.

“Jack!” she tried again. She searched the water in the dim moonlight. Her breathing ragged, she picked her way to stand on a rock nearby and search the area.

A dark figure approached from her left. Cate scurried off the rock and began to retreat, when she heard a familiar voice. “Lady Cate!” Jack whispered.

Cate’s heart soared as the sound of her heartbeat filled her ears. A tear escaped to her cheek, and she hurried toward the figure, colliding into him as she flung her arms around his neck.

“Jack!” she exclaimed. “Oh, thank heavens. When he fired that gun...” Cate cried, pulling away from him.

“It’s okay. He shot randomly. I stayed hidden for as long as I could to make him think I was dead. And two shots he fired on your side of the car.”

Cate nodded as she pulled him into another embrace. She leaned back as the icy water from his soaked clothes began to penetrate her dress. “You’re soaked.”

“Aye. Thank goodness it’s warm.” Jack glanced around. “We need to find a place to hide while we regroup.”

“There’s a barn over there,” Cate said, pointing behind Jack. “I saw it when I climbed into the tree to hide.”

Jack nodded as they set off toward the barn. “Climbed a tree? Lady Cate, I can’t believe it.”

“I’ll admit it was better than taking a dip in the loch,” Cate said.

They reached the barn and slipped in through the partially open barn door. Jack pulled Cate toward a stack of hay bales and plopped onto the hay-strewn floor. Cate joined him.

“Now what?” Cate inquired.

“I’m not sure,” Jack said with a sigh, as he wrung out the bottom of his shirt.

“We can’t walk all the way to Bletchley Park.”

“No,” Jack admitted with a sigh. “But we’ll have to figure something out.”

Cate shook her head as her heart sank. “Should we walk back to Dunhaven?”

“We’re too far for that, too,” Jack admitted.

“Do you know how to steal a car?”

“No! Why would I know how to steal a car?”

“I don’t know!” Cate said. “I’m just throwing out suggestions.”

Jack sucked in air. “It’s not a terrible one. I suppose if we find a car, I can try to steal it.”

“In the name of national security,” Cate said.

“For now, I think we should get some rest.”

“Don’t you think we should keep moving?”

“No, I think we should get some rest and move on in a few hours. We’re in a safe spot at the moment, let’s take advantage. We don’t know the next time we’ll be able to rest.”

Cate nodded as they settled back against the hay bales. She bit her lower lip as Jack’s hand found hers in the darkness and squeezed. “Lady Cate?”

Jack whispered.

“Yeah?” Cate answered.

“Time to hit the hay,” he said. She heard the small snicker from him.

“Oh, Jack,” Cate said. “Your humor hasn’t improved.”

“I couldn’t resist,” he said.

Exhaustion crept over her, but every noise startled her. Eventually, her eyelids became heavy, and she drifted off to sleep, her head lolling onto Jack’s shoulder.

* * *

Cate awoke with a start. It took her a moment to recall where she was. Dim light from the early morning sky filtered in through the small opening in the barn doors. She glanced down at Jack’s sleeping form. Cate stretched and considered trying to go back to sleep, but nervousness prevented her from doing that. Instead, she gave Jack a gentle shake until his eyes opened. They darted around for a moment before they settled on Cate.

“Good morning,” Cate said.

“Good morning, Lady Cate,” Jack said with a sleepy smile.

“We should go,” Cate said.

Jack pulled himself up to sit. “You’re right. I don’t want to get caught by an angry farmer.”

Cate grimaced at him. “Yikes! You’re covered in hay!”

“I wouldn’t point fingers, Lady Cate,” Jack said, as he pulled a piece of straw from her hair.

They rose and removed as much debris as possible from their clothes before they slipped into the brightening day and set off on foot.

“We should stay away from the road,” Jack said. “In case they come back in the daylight to search for our bodies.”

Cate nodded and shivered at the events of the night before. “Did your clothes dry?” she asked, as the sun rose in the east.

“Mostly,” Jack answered.

“Looks like it’ll be a nice day. I hope it doesn’t rain.”

“You and me both,” Jack said. “I’d like to stay dry today.”

They continued over the rolling hills as the sun crept up higher in the sky. As the hour approached 8 a.m. a droning noise filled the air.

“Do you hear that?” Cate scanned the skies as they crested a hill, shielding her eyes.

“Aye. Planes.”

“There!” she exclaimed. “An entire squadron.”

“Friendlies or no?” Jack inquired.

“RAF,” Cate said as they came closer.

“Wonder where they’re going?”

Cate stared at the several sets of planes in Finger-four squadron formation. “There’s so many. They must be heading out on early morning patrols.” She paused as a thought formed in her mind. “Which means…” She flicked her gaze to Jack, her eyebrows raised, and the corners of her mouth turned up in a slight smile.

“There’s a base nearby,” Jack said with her.

“Yes!” she exclaimed.

“And what better place to hitch a ride to Bletchley Park than at a Royal Airforce Base?”

“Come on,” Cate said, pointing southeast. “They came from that direction.”

They quickened their pace and hurried in the direction they’d spotted the planes coming from. The walk took the better part of the morning. The planes returned as the sun rose overhead and the lunchtime hour approached, flying low over their heads as they approached their base.

“Whew, this took way longer than I hoped,” Jack said.

“Tell me about it. These are the worst shoes in the world,” Cate complained.

“Do you need a break?”

“No, I just want to get there.”

“Want me to carry you? You can hop on my back.”

“I’ll save that in case I can’t make the last leg. We should be getting close. Did you see how low they were flying?”

“Aye,” Jack said.

They crested another hill, spotting a large structure in the distance. “There,” Cate said. “That must be it.”

“Looks like a large estate.”

Cate nodded. “They’re probably using it as a base.”

“Not too much further at least.”

They continued, aiming for the large home on the opposite hill. They circled around the walled estate, finding two uniformed servicemen patrolling the entrance.

“Hey!” Cate exclaimed as she spotted them. “Excuse me! We need your help!”

Both men stiffened their postures as Cate and Jack hurried toward them. One held up his hand, signaling them to stop. “Ma’am, I’m going to ask you to stop right there. This is a RAF military base. We do not allow civilians.”

“We’re not civilians,” Cate explained. “We’re completing an assignment from the Ministry of Defense. We have information that must get to Alan Turing at Bletchley Park from the intelligence outpost at Dunhaven Castle.”

The man narrowed his eyes, flicking his gaze to his partner before returning it to Cate.

“We were followed last night,” Jack explained. “The base there has been infiltrated by a German spy. We lost our vehicle. But we need to get the information there immediately.”

“What’s the name of your superior?”

“Lucas MacKenzie,” Cate reported.

The soldiers shared another glance, before one spun and faced the interior of the estate’s grounds. He called to someone and waved them over.

“These two say they are carrying sensitive information to Bletchley Park. Say they’re on orders from Lucas MacKenzie.”

The new man nodded and sprinted back toward the manor home. After a few moments, he returned. “Commodore said to bring them in.”

The patrolling servicemen nodded and waved Cate and Jack over. One held up his hand to stop them before they entered. “We have to search you.”

“Okay,” Cate said. The soldier paused as he reached the papers under her dress. “That’s the papers we’re delivering.” The man raised his eyebrows at her. “If I may,” Cate said, reaching into her dress and producing them.

The man nodded at her, and she stuffed them back into their hiding spot. “Go ahead in.”

The third man led them up the long driveway and into the large home. A few airmen lounged in a sitting room off the foyer. The soldier they followed marched them down the hall to a small office. A uniformed man stood behind a desk, bent over a map with several other officers.

“Here they are, sir,” the man reported with a salute.

“That you, Corporal,” the man said with a nod, dismissing him. He eyed Cate and Jack. “Have a seat.”

“With all due respect, sir, we don’t have time to have a seat. We must get these papers to Bletchley Park. We’re already behind thanks to an incident last night with German intelligence,” Cate said.

The man narrowed his eyes at her.

“She’s right,” Jack chimed in. “There was an incident at the Dunhaven outpost. The woman originally set to deliver this information was shot by a German spy. When we received our instructions and left Dunhaven, we were followed, ran off the road and then shot at.”

“That’s quite a story.”

“And you can confirm it all with Lucas MacKenzie. He is our contact in the Ministry of Defense. Please, sir, we must get this information to Alan Turing.”

The phone rang as the man considered their story. He snatched the receiver from the cradle. “Yes?” He paused, his eyebrows flicked upward. “I understand. Yes.” His gaze settled on Cate and Jack. “Right away. Thank you.” He replaced the receiver and stared at Cate and Jack again. “It seems your story checks out.”

Cate breathed a sigh of relief.

“Can you spare a vehicle then, sir,” Jack asked,” so we can continue on our way?”

“I don’t think so, Mr. MacKenzie,” the man said. “It seems the papers you carry could change the outcome of the war. It is imperative Bletchley receive them as soon as possible. We’ll fly you there.”

Cate swallowed hard. “Uh,” she began, as the Commadore shouted to someone outside. The man hurried to receive the orders rattled off by his commander.

Wide-eyed, Cate glanced at Jack who shrugged. “I don’t think we have a choice,” he said.

Before she could say anything else, Cate and Jack were ushered from the room, outfitted in a parachute – which caused Cate’s stomach to somersault as the airman fastened it to her – and hurried out the door to a frenzy of activity. Men raced around the yard, prepping planes, and scrambling to start them.

The airman led them to two turret fighters sitting side by side. A man in a flight suit offered Cate a wide grin and stuck his hand out. “Cate, I presume?”

Cate nodded, unable to get out any words. “You’ll be flying with me. I’m Flight Sergeant Roberts. This is my gunner, Flight Sergeant Wilson. He’ll be sitting this one out while you take his seat. I understand we’re carrying quite a sensitive piece of intelligence.”

Cate stared up at the aircraft in front of her. She crooked a finger toward the craft. “In that?”

Flight Sergeant Roberts patted the plane’s side. “She’s a good plane.”

“Isn’t there one where we could sit in the back?” she questioned as another pilot introduced himself to Jack.

“You are going to sit in the back, my dear.”

“With the gun?” Cate yelled over the drone of engines springing to life.

“Don’t worry, Cate. They’re sending plenty of fighters with us. They can handle the Jerrys if we encounter them.”

Cate stared up at the plane, unblinking before she flicked her gaze to Jack. He offered her a wide-eyed and frightened shrug.

“Let’s get you in, Cate. Step right up here on the wing and scramble up in there.”

Cate fought to steady her legs as she clambered up onto the wing and slid into the tight space of the gunner’s seat. Claustrophobia set in, and the plane wobbled as Sergeant Roberts scrambled into his seat. Cate’s stomach flip-flopped as the plane rumbled to life. She glanced to Jack in the plane next to her, her face filled with the dread of leaving the ground.

Cate heard the radio spring to life as planes began to enter the air. “Section leaders, we are a go. Repeat we are a go.”

“All right boys, we are escorting an important package to Bletchley. We cannot fail. Protect Yellow three and Blue three at all times.”

Cate grasped hold of anything she could find, squeezing her eyes shut as the plane lurched forward.

The drone of the engines was deafening. Cate swallowed hard and squeezed her eyes shut for a moment.

“This is Yellow three, package is loaded. Ready to roll,” Cate’s pilot muttered into the radio.

“Yellow leader, ready to roll.”

“Blue three with secondary package loaded. Ready.”

“Blue leader ready.”

From the conversation, Cate surmised she was in the plane referred to as Yellow three while Jack rode in the plane using the call sign Blue three.

“This is Red leader; we are ready to escort.”

“Green leader, ready to escort.”

Planes rumbled down the makeshift airstrip. Four planes took off, keeping to a Finger-four squadron formation. Cate’s plane lumbered behind two others and in minutes, they were airborne, trailing on the right side of their squadron leader with a plane flanking them as a wingman.

A report of quiet skies came over the radio as the other planes joined them, forming a wall of aircrafts across the skies. An incessant buzzing filled the air.

“Let’s hope it holds.”

After five minutes, Cate began to relax, releasing her white-knuckled hold on her seat.

“How you doing back there, Cate?” the pilot called.

“As good as can be expected,” she shouted back.

“That’s a girl.”

They sailed along through the skies for thirty additional minutes before a loud call came across the radio.

“This is Red leader, we got Jerrys coming in at our nine o’clock.”

CHAPTER 34

Cate's muscles stiffened at the news, and she searched the skies in the indicated area. In the distance, a contingent of planes approached.

"Green leader, engaging." Four of the sixteen planes veered off their formation, taking off toward the Luftwaffe fighters.

"Red leader, engaging." Four more planes broke off.

The remaining eight planes stayed the course as fighting broke out to Cate's right. Guns blazed and planes rolled and dove as they tried to shoot each other down. Chatter came across the radio as pilots warned each other or congratulated each other on avoiding or shooting down a German plane.

Four planes approached them steadily. Cate sat up straighter as she noticed they were German, not RAF.

"We got incoming, look alive, boys."

The German planes buzzed past them. Muzzle flashes burst as they strafed the RAF fighters while passing over.

"Yellow two, let's get 'em," the squadron leader said, as the two planes broke off. "Yellow four stay with the assets."

"Blue two and blue leader engaging."

Planes shot around the sky, diving and rolling as Cate attempted to keep track of them.

"This is yellow four, I've got one on my tail."

Cate checked the skies to her left, noting the Luftwaffe plane tailing their wingman.

“I got ‘em, in my sights. Hammer down,” someone answered. Shots burst from a plane lined up behind the German fighter. “Hit!”

“Nice one!”

Black smoke poured from the German plane as it dropped from the sky. Cate swallowed hard, and let her head rest against the plane’s side as she blew out a breath. Minutes later an explosion rocked their plane. Her eyes snapped open, and she saw flames off their wing.

Sergeant Roberts said, “We lost Yellow four.”

“Blue four, get over there and watch Yellow’s tail.”

The plane, formerly flying as wingman to Jack’s plane, zipped over behind them.

Three more German planes still zoomed through the skies. Enemy fire strafed past them again.

“Blue four, tailing one of these guys. Got him in my sights. Hammer down.” Cate saw one of the RAF planes on the tail of a German 109. He fired, but failed to hit his target. The German plane seemed to slow before it shot skyward, flipping over in a wide arc, and ending up behind the RAF fighter. Guns blazed from the German fighter.

“This is Blue four, I’m hit! I’m hit! Going down!”

Cate glanced out of her window, spotting the black smoke trailing behind the plane.

“Blue four, ditching. Godspeed, gentlemen.”

The plane dropped from Cate’s sight.

“Blue three, you with me?” Sergeant Roberts inquired.

“Blue three, with you.”

“Cate, you with me?”

“I’m here,” Cate answered.

“I’m going to need you to transfer the guns to me,” Sergeant Roberts began, before panicked chatter interrupted.

“Blue three, watch your tail. You’ve got a Jerry on your six. He’s real close, boy, real close.”

The plane carrying Jack shimmied, rolled, climbed, and dove. “I can’t shake him.”

“I’m coming for you,” Sergeant Roberts said.

“You won’t make it,” the man answered. “Blue leader, can you assist?”

“Blue leader, I’m in the middle of it with two of them.”

“Blue three’s in trouble, can anyone assist?”

Cate spotted the plane on her left. It tailed Jack's plane closely. Gunfire blasted from the German craft. "I'm hit! I'm hit! He got my tail!"

"Blue three is hit. He's still got the Jerry on his tail."

The plane carrying Jack weaved in an arc, trying to avoid additional gunfire.

Cate stared at the thick bullets feeding into the turret gun.

"How do I use this?" she asked Sergeant Roberts.

"Cate..."

"We have no choice. Blue Three isn't going to make it much longer. Now, how do I use it?" she demanded.

"There's a release on your right, grab it, palm up and pull it back toward you." Cate found it and pulled it back. The heavy weapon swung free. "Aim using the crosshairs and fire. You'll want to lead him a bit. Shoot where he's going to be, not where he is. And for God's sake, don't hit Blue three."

Cate lined up the shot, trying to avoid anywhere near the allied plane, and squeezed. Her bullets went wide, peppering the sky behind the German plane.

"That's okay, Cate," Sergeant Roberts said in an even voice. "Line it up again and fire. Remember to lead him a little."

Cate nodded, mentally noting the advice. She felt the plane slow. The other two aircrafts approached them.

"Take your time, don't panic."

Cate fought to control her trembling body and latched onto the trigger. She swung the heavy gun into place again. She aimed carefully, lining her shot up with the German plane's engine as it weaved behind the RAF fighter, then inching it to slightly lead the aircraft.

"Cate, have you got the shot lined up?"

"Yes," Cate said, "but I can't get a window to fire with Blue three's weaving."

"All right, team effort," Sergeant Roberts said. "On the count of three, Blue three break left, Cate fire."

"Roger," Blue three's pilot acknowledged.

"Got it," Cate said. She blew out a steadying breath.

"Three, two, one," Sergeant Roberts counted, "BREAK!"

The fighter broke left in a quick move and Cate squeezed the trigger, swinging the gun to match the movement of the German fighter. A flame burst from the enemy aircraft's engine and black smoke poured in a stream behind the plane. It swung off, diving sharply to the ground.

"She got 'em! By golly, she got 'em! Ho-ho! Great shooting, Cate!" Sergeant Roberts sped ahead and into a barrel roll in celebration. Cate's already shaky stomach somersaulted as they swirled through the sky, but she chuckled nonetheless.

"He's down, Jerry's down," someone reported.

"Whoa! Unbelievable! She gets a hit on her first time out!" another said.

"Boy, he's never going to live down being shot down by a woman."

"You can't count this one, Roberts, she's not your gunner."

"Like fun, I won't count it. Too bad for Wilson his tally will lag mine."

"Wilson may be replaced by Annie Oakley."

Cate bit her lower lip and smiled as Blue three pulled level with them. Jack's pilot saluted her. "Thank you, dearie," the man said. Jack gave her a wave. She returned the gesture to both.

The blue squadron leader shot down a third German plane.

"Last Jerry's bugging out," he reported, as he pulled back into formation.

The dogfight continued between the others until the report came through that the Luftwaffe pilots were either downed or fleeing. The remaining planes returned to the squadron.

"Squadron report."

"Yellow leader, asset intact. We lost Yellow four."

"Blue leader reporting, asset intact, Blue two and blue four down. Blue three sustained damage."

"Green two reporting, Green leader is down, Green three and four remain."

"Red leader, Red squadron intact."

"I'm behind Green three, he's trailing oil pretty bad."

"Green three will you make it to Bletchley?"

"This is Green three. I'm sure as hell going to try."

"Negative, Green three, return to base."

"I can make it."

"Green three, return to base, that's an order."

"Red four, requesting permission to disengage and go with Green three."

"Granted, Red four. Return to base with Green three."

The planes shuffled as two veered off, heading north. "Good luck, gentlemen."

"Let's press on, boys, and get these folks to Bletchley."

The squadron continued their flight uninterrupted. After forty more minutes of flying, the planes began to slow. "Breathe easy, Ace. We're almost there," Sergeant Roberts said to Cate.

"Hardly an ace," Cate answered with a chuckle. "But I'm glad I could help, and also glad we're nearly there."

Within twenty minutes, Cate felt the ground rumble underneath her as the plane's wheels bounced off the ground then rolled to a stop. Sergeant Roberts hopped from his perch in the pilot's seat and offered Cate a hand to climb from the gunner's nest.

"Here we are, my dear," he said, as he grabbed her around the waist and set her on the ground.

"Thank you," she said.

"I think the thanks goes to you, dearie," Jack's pilot said as he stalked toward her, his hand extended. "Let me shake the hand of the woman who shot a Jerry out of the sky to save my neck."

He grasped Cate's hand, nearly shaking her entire arm off. Jack followed behind him, still looking green around the gills. Cate hurried toward him and tossed her arms around his neck. He wrapped his arms around her waist, lifting her off the ground. "Thank you, Cate," he said, as he squeezed her.

"You'll never hear the end of this one from the missus," Sergeant Roberts said with a coy grin.

"You know it," Jack said.

"Jack! Cate!" A familiar voice called to them.

"Lucas!" Cate exclaimed.

The man hurried toward them, limping a bit, a sign of his older age. "You made it. Thank God."

Cate smiled and nodded as he reached them.

"Come along, we've got to get the information to Alan."

Cate nodded. "Just a minute." She stepped back to the pilots as they milled around. "Thank you."

"You can fly with me anytime, Cate," Sergeant Roberts answered.

"Not just for getting us here and in one piece. But for everything you do. Thank you. You're very, very brave."

“You’re welcome. And I hope our paths will cross again once this is all over. I’d like to buy you a drink, assuming your husband doesn’t mind.”

“Sir, I believe we owe you one first,” Jack said.

“Then we’ll buy each other drinks,” the man answered.

Cate nodded and waved as Lucas led them away. She glanced back at the pilots as they discussed their latest experiences. She’d look them up when she got back. She hoped they made it through the war unscathed. She couldn’t imagine living through what they did on a daily basis. One flight proved enough for her.

“What’s this I hear about you taking out a German plane, Cate?” Lucas inquired, as they made their way to Hut 8, where Alan Turing spent much of his time leading a team of cryptographers.

“Hit his engine,” Jack said. “And likely saved my life.”

“My goodness, Cate! Amelia will be so thrilled to hear she sent the right woman for the job.”

“Speaking of, I am absolutely astounded by Amelia’s work!” Cate said to Lucas.

“Ah, yes. She makes quite a good spy, don’t you agree? She has easy access to much of the country, most don’t question her travel. And she’s quite smart and capable. I suppose the war has made fighters out of us all in one way or another.”

Cate nodded at the sentiment as they reached the small green hut. Lucas led them inside. “Alan?” he questioned of another man.

“With the Bombe.”

“Thanks. Come on,” Lucas said, leading them to another hut. They stepped inside. A massive, wheeled box stood against the wall. At just under seven feet wide and six and a half feet tall and two feet deep, the machine was filled with 108 cylinders, called drums, in three sections.

A dark-haired man with deep-set eyes fiddled with the machine.

“Alan,” Lucas said. “I have something for you.”

He straightened and stared at Lucas before eyeing Cate and Jack. Cate removed the papers from under her dress and smoothed them. “Mr. Turing, I have these for you from the intelligence outpost in Dunhaven. Hans Schmidt is convinced...”

Alan snatched the papers from her hand and shuffled through them, biting his thumbnail. “Oh, yes, yes, of course.” He grabbed a pencil and began scratching on the paper.

Lucas nodded and motioned for Cate and Jack to step outside.

“Oh, thank you,” Alan said as they stepped out. “Very helpful.”

They stepped into the late afternoon air. “He’ll be working all night now,” Lucas said. “He doesn’t mean to be...”

“I know,” Cate said. “He’s brilliant. His mind doesn’t operate the way ours does.”

Lucas smiled and nodded. “Yes, others complain he lacks social graces, but I maintain he simply does not have time to process them.”

He began a walk across the property with them. “I’m convinced we’ll soon be able to decipher the Enigma code again thanks to your efforts.”

“We’re happy to help,” Cate said.

Lucas offered her a smile, the corners of his eyes crinkling in wrinkles that didn’t exist in 1925. “And now I’m betting you’d both like to return to Dunhaven posthaste.”

“Oh,” Cate said, realizing she hadn’t even thought of how they would get home in the rush of the events. She flicked her gaze to Jack before returning it to Lucas. “I hadn’t even thought...”. Her eyes wandered toward the landing strip they’d used earlier.

“Oh, don’t worry. We won’t send you up in the planes again,” Lucas said with a chuckle. “Though perhaps we ought to with your shooting skills.” He offered Cate an amused grin. “I have a car. I’ll take you.”

Cate returned Lucas’s smile at the announcement of their ride back, pleased she would not have a second flight in the fighter. Jack wiped at his brow. “I’m certainly glad for that offer.”

Lucas gave him a tight-lipped smile. “Yes, I heard your journey was rather rough. Took a bit damage to the tail.”

“Aye,” Jack said. “And I’m not too proud to admit I was terrified we’d crash or worse.”

“Thank goodness for Cate’s bravery. Though that tends to be the trend among the Americans.”

“I owed him,” Cate said, slipping her hand around Jack’s forearm. “He’s saved me more than once.”

“I’m not sure I’ve ever done anything as dramatic as shooting a plane from the sky,” Jack answered.

“Oh, by the way, Cate, I thought you may like to know the pilot you shot down is alive. He was recovered earlier with minor injuries.”

“Thank you,” Cate answered as they arrived at a vehicle.

“Well, here we are. I’m sure you’re both exhausted, so if you’d like to slip into the back and doze off on the long drive, I won’t object.”

Cate nodded and smiled as she ducked into the back.

“I’ll sit up front, though I make no promises about staying awake,” Jack said.

They settled in as Lucas slipped behind the wheel. Cate found herself too wired to sleep on the first leg of the journey. However as the sun slipped below the horizon and the stars peeked out above them, Cate found herself dozing off.

Her sleep was interrupted by the buzzing of planes. Cate startled awake, exhaustion clouding her mind. She breathed easy as she realized she still rode along in the car driven by Lucas. Jack sat next to him, his head lolling to the side.

“Okay, Cate?” Lucas inquired as she sat up and stretched.

“Yes,” she answered, as she scanned the night skies in search of the planes while stifling a yawn. “Thank you for driving us back tonight. I’m sure you must be tired, too.”

“Of course! Plus, with my missed connection with Amelia, it gave me an excuse to see her.”

“It must be difficult to be separated, particularly at a time like this.”

“Yes, quite. Though we’re both making our contributions. I am so proud of the work Amelia has done to help. We’ve managed to save several convoys. And with your contribution, I’d wager we’ll save several more.”

“I’m honored to have been a part of the effort.”

“I am also quite anxious to determine how Sarah is.”

“She was alive when we left.”

“Yes, I received word she was at a base hospital undergoing emergency surgery. I do hope she pulls through, though her spying days may be limited.”

They spent the rest of the journey making light conversation. Cate found herself unable to sleep anymore. In the lulls, she calculated how long they’d been in 1942. They had arrived around 2:30 p.m. on September 21st. It was now midnight on September 23rd. They’d been here for nearly thirty-six hours. Of course, in their time only two and a half hours had passed. She wondered if they had been missed.

As they approached Dunhaven, Lucas inquired about stopping at the field hospital first. Cate preferred to so she could get information on Sarah, a.k.a. Ruth, firsthand.

They approached the camp and after a few words with the soldiers guarding the entrance, Lucas pulled through and parked the car. With another yawn, Cate climbed from the car and stretched. After a poke to Jack, he too, spilled out of the car and stretched.

“What time is it?” he inquired, as they strode to the medical tent.

“Just about half-past two,” Lucas reported.

“Thirty-six hours,” Cate whispered to him, as they ducked into the tent.

Jack nodded in response to her comment. Lucas scanned the area. Across the space, Cate spotted Amelia sitting at Ruth’s bedside. She spun and caught sight of them. Her worried expression broke into a smile, and she hurried toward them.

“Oh, Lucas!” she said throwing her arms around him in an embrace.

“Amelia, I am so glad to see you,” he answered.

Amelia pulled back from him and eyed Cate and Jack. “Cate, Jack, what a relief to see you both, too. I fretted over my hasty decision to send you. I felt simply terrible about the danger I placed you in.”

“We understand,” Cate answered.

“And we’re more than happy to help,” Jack added.

“The cause was far too important.”

“Yes,” Amelia agreed. “Yes, it was. I would have gone myself but...” She flicked her gaze to the sleeping form of Ruth.

“Fret no more, Amelia,” Lucas said. “They survived it. And even got to ride in a plane.” He offered an amused grin. “And Cate shot down a Jerry!”

Amelia’s eyes widened and her eyebrows raised as she stared at Cate, who shrugged.

“Believe me, that story will be told everywhere by the end of the week,” Lucas said with a chuckle. “Now, how is Sarah?”

“Holding her own. The prognosis is good. She should survive it. She’s quite lucky we found her when we did,” Amelia reported. She glanced to Cate and Jack again. “Good thing you two happened upon her. Though, what were you doing in the folly?”

Cate swallowed hard. “We found a note that suggested meeting there about a critical mission,” she explained. “I thought it rather curious, so I suggested we follow up on it.”

“Ah, I see. Inquisitive as always,” Amelia said.

“What about Rita?” Cate questioned. “Have you caught her? Is she also a German spy?”

CHAPTER 35

“That’s the tricky bit,” Lucas answered. “We had our suspicions about Victor. But Rita was a complete surprise.”

“No hint of her true loyalties before this?” Cate asked.

Lucas shook his head as Amelia explained. “It’s not that. No hint of her whatsoever. She doesn’t seem to exist. She’d never been assigned by anyone to the Dunhaven base. When she showed up, everyone thought she’d been assigned there, but we’ve not been able to track down her existence.”

“Perhaps the Germans sent her to keep an eye on Victor,” Jack suggested.

“Then why kill him and disappear? I don’t understand it,” Amelia said. “Though I suppose we may never know.”

“Well, I hope she won’t cause any more trouble,” Cate replied.

“Not at Dunhaven,” Lucas said. “We’ll be closing that base entirely. With the infiltration, we’d rather shut it down completely and speak no further of it. Nothing undermines the war efforts and morale like a spy debacle going public.”

Cate nodded in understanding. After a few more moments, Lucas said, “Well, I suppose we should be going on to Dunhaven. I’m quite certain Cate and Jack would like to rest.”

They slipped out of the tent a few minutes later, despite Cate assuring him they could wait until he was ready. Within the hour, they arrived at Dunhaven Castle. The morning sky was already brightening when they strode through the door. Rory greeted them, popping into the foyer from the sitting room.

He pulled Lucas into a tight embrace. “Good to see you, brother,” he noted.

Lucas offered a similar sentiment before he turned his attention to Cate and Jack. “And our intrepid heroes. Cate and Jack, you’ve come through once again.”

“Pleasure to be of service,” Jack said.

“How proud I am to call you family. Well, I suppose you’d like to crawl into bed. Unless you’d like me to send up a tray or have a nightcap?”

“No, thank you. We’re exhausted and we’re going to head up. But we’ll talk again tomorrow,” Cate assured him.

“Wonderful. Pleasant dreams, then.”

Cate and Jack left Rory and Lucas to have their drinks and conversation and threaded through the halls, slipping out a side door and hurrying across the darkened landscape to the crypt. As they entered the secret passage, Jack let out a sigh.

“I will be so happy to go home.”

Cate squeezed his hand and he flicked on his flashlight. “I hope you don’t mind my promising to come back tomorrow, but...”

“No, I understand. We can’t just disappear. And we need to pick up the luggage anyway. I was too tired to do it now.”

“Me too. What a day. I’m not sure words can even capture what’s happened in the past forty hours.”

Jack shook his head. “No, and once we’re back in the safety of our time, I will definitely need a post-time travel analysis to decompress.”

“You and me both!” Cate answered as they reached the hidden interior of the castle. Within moments, they were back in the present time.

With the coast clear, they slipped out of the secret passage and hurried upstairs to change. Cate’s mind raced as she slipped out of her clothes, mussed from days of difficult circumstances. She sank onto the tub’s edge. The magnitude of the experience hit her when a piece of straw fluttered from her dress to the floor.

Cate blew out a long, steady breath as images flitted through her mind. She fought through her emotions as she realized how close they had come to their own demise. After a moment, she pushed back her shoulders and stood.

She had other unanswered questions. She needed to consult her notes and she wanted to follow up on tracking several of the people she'd come in contact with in 1942.

Cate pulled on her clothes, fixed her hair, including removing a wayward piece of straw that still clung to the underside. As she put the finishing touches on her look, she considered how strange the shift in her circumstances really was.

With a deep breath, she left her bedroom behind and wandered through the halls to the library. As she pushed through, the dogs bounded to her, leaving a dozing Jack's side.

Tears stung Cate's eyes as she scooped both boys into her arms and ruffled the fur on their heads. Jack stretched as she carried them both over and settled into the armchair.

"I need to get my notes, but I need a minute," Cate said.

"A minute? I need more than a minute," Jack said. "You're a bigger person than me. Then again, you did take down a 109."

Cate chuckled at him. "That really was quite the feather in the cap, wasn't it?"

"I'm still not sure I can process what happened."

"Me either. And then we come back here and live normal lives. That might be the most mind-boggling part."

Jack weighed the statement before responding. "I can't pick a most mind-boggling part. There's so much. This is just as bad as the time we came back from the 1700s and learned there were witches and warlocks."

Cate nodded. "And still so many unanswered questions."

"Who is Rita? I feel so used if she's a German spy."

"I told you she was trouble," Cate said with her eyebrows raised. She set the dogs on the floor and strode across the room to retrieve her folder. "Stemming from your question, if Ruth lived and Rita buried Victor in the garden, why did the detective tell me it had been identified as a woman?"

Cate shuffled through papers to the notes she'd scribble when she spoke with the detective. She sucked in a sharp breath.

"What is it?"

"My notes. Jack, they're different. Look!" She passed the paper over to him. Where it had once said Adult female, 5'4", 70-80 years ago, blunt force trauma to the head it now read Adult male, 6'2", 70-80 years ago, bullet fracture in skull.

“So, the body found is now Victor’s,” Jack said.

“Which means history changed!” Cate exclaimed.

Jack stared down at the paper. “Aye, history changed all right. And I’m not certain that’s a good thing.”

Cate shuffled through to the newspaper articles. “This article still reads roughly the same. Amelia claims Ruth left for another position.”

“When we know she was shot.”

“Maybe that was always the case, but that doesn’t explain who was in the grave.”

“Rita?” Jack postulated. “Perhaps Victor killed them both in the last set of events. That would explain why no one missed her. No one seemed to know who she was or where she came from.”

“It could be.”

“This had to have left a ripple through time.”

Cate swallowed hard as her eyes darted around the room. “Come with me,” she said, as she stood and hurried from the library.

“Where are we going?” Jack inquired.

Cate led him below stairs. The voices of Mrs. Fraser and Molly talked and laughed in the kitchen. Cate’s heart leapt at the sound and continued down the hall.

“Hi, ladies! Mind if we snag a cookie or two?”

“Snag away, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser said, handing her the cookie tin.

“Everything okay here?” Cate inquired.

“Aye. What would be amiss?” Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate shrugged. “Baking gone awry. Riley stealing a steak.”

“No, everything is just fine.”

“Mr. Fraser’s all good?”

“Of course, he is,” Mrs. Fraser answered. “What’s with you today, Lady Cate?”

“I had a bad dream last night. Probably silly, but I just wanted to make sure.”

“Everything is right as rain,” Mrs. Fraser assured her.

“Good.” Cate waved the cookies in the air. “And thanks!”

Jack grabbed one from her as they strolled back down the hall. “Well, it looks like nothing has changed here.”

“Nothing major,” Cate agreed.

When they settled in the library, she grabbed her laptop. A quick search of the internet revealed no major historical changes to the war efforts. The war ended as expected.

“So, history changed, but it left no noticeable difference,” Jack said.

“It seems so,” Cate answered as she pounded on the keyboard.

“What are you looking for now?”

“Information on our pilots,” Cate said. After a moment, she smiled. “Sergeant Roberts lived a full and happy life, it seems. I see him in the census after the war and a death certificate in the early 2000s.”

“What about Sergeant Williams?” Jack asked, inquiring about his pilot.

Cate tapped around, searching the records. “He was shot down in 1943 but survived. He returned to fly with his squadron after a few weeks, survived the war and lived to a ripe old age!”

“Wonder if that was always the case.”

“I’m not certain,” Cate said as she closed her laptop. “I wonder if we’ll ever learn the truth about what happened.”

“I hope we don’t learn our presence changed things radically,” Jack answered.

“It doesn’t seem to have. Let’s hope that trend holds out.”

Jack slouched in his chair and yawned. “Oh, I’m exhausted.”

“Me too,” Cate said. “My nap in the barn and the car were definitely not enough.”

“You’ll sleep well tonight!”

“Oh, please, I hope so. I hope I don’t have you up with my midnight roamings.”

“You and me both!”

They spent another hour together in conversation over the events in 1942, deciding they’d return to 1942 one last time tomorrow afternoon to say their goodbyes to Rory, Lucas, and Amelia.

“Again, I’ll miss them,” Cate said. “Especially after all that.”

“Well, you still have me, Lady Cate,” Jack said, offering her a cheeky grin.

“That more than makes up for it,” Cate assured him as Molly popped in with her dinner tray.

After her dinner, Cate found herself unable to keep her eyes open. She opted for an early night, taking the dogs for one last walk before she crawled into bed, exhausted.

Sun shone through the windows as Cate opened her eyes the following morning. She still laid in the same position she'd fallen asleep in. Had she remained in bed for the entire night? No traces of the necklace existed, though the music box tinkled away on her night table. Sheer exhaustion must have provided a temporary solution to her problem.

She stretched and climbed from the bed, feeling as though she could sleep the entire day away. The motivating factor, though, was their final trip to 1942.

She met Jack in the hall as she emerged from her suite with the two dogs. "Sleep okay?" he inquired.

"You tell me," she answered.

"I didn't get any notifications on my phone, though even if I would have, I was dead to the world last night."

"I think both of us were," Cate admitted, as they strode down the hall together. "I don't think I moved."

"Me either. I guess that's one solution to your problem," Jack said, as they stepped into the crisp morning air with the dogs.

"Spending three days in the span of two hours? I'll pass and hope Damien finds something."

"One more trip today and then we can get back to normal around here. I can't wait."

"I know what you mean, though saying goodbye is always hard."

"Let's plan to visit them when the war's over."

Cate smiled and nodded at the idea.

"Hey, do you want to go back earlier? Maybe this morning?"

"Anxious to get there huh?"

"I just figured we might have better luck catching everyone early in the morning. The place seemed deserted when we went in the afternoons."

"Outside of the spies, you're right. Okay," Cate agreed. "After breakfast?"

"Aye, perfect."

Cate spent her first meal of the day pouring over more internet searches to try to find something amiss or gather more information on the mysterious Rita Haverford. She found none. With any luck, they'd solicit more information on their final trip to 1942.

After changing and meeting in the hall, Cate and Jack slipped back to the past using the universal time portal. A nervous wave passed over Cate as they stepped into the bright sunshine of September 23, 1942.

Mere hours ago, they had returned to Dunhaven after an intelligence mission. As they ambled toward the castle, Cate noticed the intelligence tent already being dismantled. Items were being carried to a waiting truck as the base ceased its operations.

They strode through the front door and made their way to their suite. Cate packed the few things she'd brought, and they carried their suitcases to the foyer. Lucas emerged from the hallway.

"Leaving?" he questioned.

"Yes," Cate answered. "We were just about to find Rory to thank him for the stay."

"Oh, that's too bad we didn't get the chance to visit more, though I'm afraid I'm heading back to London today, myself."

Cate grabbed Lucas's forearm and squeezed. "Be safe, Lucas."

He nodded and gave her a tight-lipped smile. "I will. And the same goes for you both."

"Is Amelia here?"

"Mmm, yes. She'll stay on for several more days, so she has easy access to Sarah. She should be along soon; she plans to go back to the hospital early."

"Has there been any change in her condition?"

"She awoke a few hours ago. Confirmed the details about her confrontation with Victor."

Cate shook her head, reminded of the frightening encounter. "Oh, here's Amelia now."

Amelia wandered down the stairs, still latching her watchband.

"Jack, Cate! Leaving?"

"Afraid so," Jack said.

Amelia pulled Cate into a tight hug. "Do be careful. And we'll have to plan to get together after this mess is over."

Cate smiled and nodded as Amelia pulled Jack into an embrace. She grabbed both of their hands and squeezed. "Thank you for what you did."

"Thank you for what you're doing," Cate said.

Rory approached the foursome, glancing at the suitcases on the floor. "Oh, how I hate to see those."

"I'm having mixed emotions about leaving, too," Cate admitted.

“Well, you’ve been through a terrible ordeal from what I understand,” Rory said. “Are you certain you shouldn’t stay a few more days? Recover a bit more.”

“I’m afraid we can’t,” Jack answered.

Rory nodded. “I understand, though I still wish you weren’t going. Anne will be so sad to have missed you.”

“Well, I’ve invited them back when the war ends,” Amelia noted.

“Yes, yes, that would be lovely. Let’s plan for that.”

“Oh, about the car...” Jack began.

Rory waved him away. “Don’t mention it. I never liked that car, anyway.”

They chatted for a few more moments, before Cate and Jack collected their luggage and headed out the front door. Cate gave the castle a final glance as they approached the crypt.

“You okay?” Jack inquired.

She nodded. “It helps to know the outcome here,” she said, as they ducked into the secret passage.

“I imagine so. We’ll have to make good on that promise to visit them when the war is over.”

“Wow! Jack Reid suggesting time travel!”

“You’ve earned the trip,” he said.

Within moments, they had arrived at the time rip and returned to the present. Jack helped Cate carry the luggage upstairs. She emptied it and returned all the items to storage before lunch. The time spent with her staff helped ease the nerves she still had over their latest time traveling adventure.

She found herself smiling and relaxed as she hurried upstairs to begin penning a chapter on wartime Dunhaven. As she waited for her document to open, Cate checked her phone. A message from Damien had arrived while she ate.

Hey Cate, how’s it going? Text me when you’ve got a minute.

Cate sent a message back, alerting him to her availability.

Within moments, she received a reply. I think we’re on to something here about what’s happening to you... I mean with the wandering around and stuff.

Cate raised her eyebrows at his message. Maybe now they could put this mystery to rest, too. Another message came as she contemplated her response. Tell me if this sounds like what's happening to you.

She waited a moment as the screen indicated Damien's typing. A long message popped up with a list of symptoms. Symptoms include: Time loss, often during a trance-like episode where the sufferer may walk, talk and function almost normally; incoherent thoughts or inability to concentrate; confusion, particularly about the order of events over a period of time; preoccupation with a specific moment or event; dizziness, particularly when a trance is beginning or ending; memory loss; loss of consciousness when transitioning between normal functioning and time loss periods

Cate studied the message then typed back: Yes, that sounds like it! What is it?

Damien responded. Temporalysis

Temporalysis, Cate pondered. What did that mean? Another text appeared on her screen. Time travel sickness.

Time travel sickness, she questioned? What was that? She typed back: I've never heard of that. What is it? How can I stop it?

Damien responded: *Well, that's where things are tricky. This sounds like time travel sickness, but there's one odd thing that doesn't fit. It usually occurs when a human time-traveler hops between several different time points in a short period. Which, to my knowledge, you haven't done.*

Cate texted back: No, in the past two weeks, we've only gone to 1942. Though in the past year we have visited four time periods.

His response came quickly: That's not enough. What I mean is, it has to be hopping through four or more time periods in a day or a week, something quick. Rapid succession travel to lots of different eras.

Cate pondered his statement before she responded: So, this isn't time travel sickness?

Damien answered: Well, we think it is. Weirdly, it can occur BEFORE you do the time hopping.

Cate's brow furrowed. "Before?" she questioned aloud and wrote back: So, I'm going to time hop in the near future?

Damien replied: It's a likely bet if our diagnosis is correct. We're still digging around to determine how to prevent this or stop it.

Cate rubbed the back of her neck, growing uncomfortable suddenly. She fidgeted in her seat as she typed back: Is it harmful? Beyond the obvious time loss and weird conversations.

Dots popped onto the screen and disappeared, indicating Damien's typing and retyping a message. Finally, a message popped onto her screen. It can be fatal.

Cate's breath caught in her throat. "Fatal!" she exclaimed.

Another message chimed in. Don't panic. We're looking for solutions. In the meantime, please don't time hop. You know the cause of it now, so try to avoid it.

Cate's mind spun. If the sickness was already occurring, could she avoid it? She was destined to time hop for whatever reason. She already suffered from time travel sickness. How could she avoid triggering the ailment? Questions with no answers swirled in her mind and she rose to find Jack.

With her mind a blur, she plodded through the halls in search of him. When she stopped moving, she found herself in her bedroom suite. She stared at space. Jack. She had to find Jack. What was she doing here?

She blinked slowly as she stared at herself in the mirror. She knew what she was doing here. She had to find it. She had to find the room. The time was almost here. She had to find it.

Cate pulled her hair into an upswept style. She removed the sapphire silk dress from the wardrobe and changed into it. She pulled the necklace from the bottom drawer and clasped it around her neck.

"I'm coming," she murmured as she stalked through the halls. Images of the room she sought filled her mind. She descended the stairs and made her way to the west wing doors. They stood open, beckoning her to enter.

Cate plodded through them, winding through the halls to the large golden hall. Riley and Bailey waited, staring at the far wall.

Cate approached the pillar near the room's center. She pressed four of the decorative elements at once. A grinding noise filled the room and a screech followed by a whirring. Hidden in the walls, a mechanism sprang to life. Music filled the room. Cate recognized the music from the music box.

She glanced across the room where the dogs sat. The wall opened, splitting down the middle and swinging into the room.

Cate approached the new doorway and smiled. She'd found it. The mirrored walls stared back at her; soft light glowed from inside star-shaped lamps, and the floor spun.

Cate stepped onto the spiraling floor, careful to keep her balance. She smiled as the music filled her ears. She spun in a circle, despite the moving floor, her eyes searching the space.

“I’m here,” she said. “I’m here, where are you?”

The scent of musk filled the air. A shadow moved behind her. She spun in search of it, reaching her hand out. “I’m here!” she called.

The room began to spin faster. The music distorted and Cate’s legs began to wobble. “I’m here,” she breathed out, as her eyelids fluttered, and her eyes rolled back in her head. She slumped to the floor which continued to spin.

* * *

A voice called to Cate in the darkness, sounding thick and garbled. Confused, Cate searched for the source in her mind. “Cate!” the voice said again.

She tried to speak but found herself unable. “Cate!” She recognized Jack’s voice and fought to find it.

After a moment, her eyelids fluttered open. Blurred for a moment, she blinked to clear her vision. She lay in the west wing’s large hall. Music still filled the air. Jack hovered over her as she lay on the floor.

“Jack?” she questioned.

“Hey, Cate,” Jack said, a smile crossing his face.

“What happened?” she questioned, still feeling too dizzy to sit up. “What’s that music?”

“You found your room. At least, I think so.”

Cate’s head lolled to the side, and she spotted the room. She pushed up to sit, steadying herself by grasping hold of Jack’s arm. Music floated from inside as the floor spun.

Cate crawled over and sat on her haunches. “I found you here, passed out, spinning around in there.”

“How?” Cate inquired.

“The dogs. They were carrying on something terrible. I followed the noise here and found you in there.”

Cate pressed her palm against her forehead. “I don’t remember anything.”

“It’s okay, Cate. You’re back now.”

“Wait! I do remember something.”

“What?” Jack asked.

“Damien! He sent a message. He said I had something called temp... temporal something. Temporalysis!”

“Temporalysis?” Jack repeated, his voice questioning.

“Time travel sickness. He said I had time travel sickness, and they were searching for a solution. He sent a list of symptoms.”

“It’s caused by time travel?”

“Yes and no,” Cate said. “It’s caused by a specific form of time travel called time hopping where the sufferer visits multiple eras in a short period of time.”

“What? We haven’t done that, have we?”

“It was very confusing. I can read you exactly what he said. Well,” she said, staring down at her dress, “after I change, of course.”

“Of course,” Jack said with a chuckle.

“I’ll change and meet you in the library. Can you take the dogs with you?” Cate asked, staring down at the two furry faces who watched her intently.

“Sure. See you soon, Cate. And then we’ll get to the bottom of this.”

Jack pulled her from the floor, and she smiled up at him and nodded. They parted ways as Jack headed to the library with the two pups in tow, and Cate hurried up the stairs and through the halls to her suite.

With a deep sigh, she unclasped the necklace and returned it to the drawer. She shimmied out of the dress and pulled on her discarded leggings and tunic. As she zipped up her boots, she stared outside, her brow furrowing.

It had been a beautiful day earlier – now rain fell from the gray skies and thunder rumbled in the distance. She didn’t realize it was supposed to rain.

With a shrug, Cate stood and smoothed her sweater. She crossed her bedroom and entered her sitting room. She stopped before she crossed that room, approaching the window instead of the door. She frowned at the scene outside, the crease between her eyebrows deepening.

Bright sunshine gleamed over the budding trees and bright green grass. She glanced up to the cloudless blue sky. Seconds ago, gray clouds had socked out the sun. How had they disappeared so quickly?

She hurried back into her bedroom and glanced out the window. Not a dark cloud was in sight. “That’s odd,” she mumbled to herself. With a shake of her head, she abandoned her weather watch and headed for the library.

She toggled on her phone and pulled up Damien's message as she stepped through the doors. "Okay, here's what Damien..." She stopped when she found the room empty except for the two dogs.

A whine emanated from Riley as Cate entered. "Jack?" she called, despite it being obvious he wasn't in the room. She spun and searched the hall. "Jack?"

Where had he gone? she wondered, as she stalked back into the library. He must have stepped out for something, she figured as she crossed to her armchair. She'd wait for him here.

As she sank onto the chair, her eyes focused on an object laying on the coffee table. The local newspaper sat tilted toward her.

Her brow furrowed as she stared at it. Realization dawned and her eyes widened. Her heart skipped a beat, and her stomach somersaulted. She shook her head as though it would dismiss what she was seeing.

"No," she cried, as she grasped the paper with trembling hands. Her next mystery smacked her in the face. But it was a mystery she had never wanted to face. "Oh, no."

A tear fell to her cheek. Her lower lip trembled as she stared at the page. A picture of Jack stared back at her, framed above by the words: LOCAL MAN MISSING, PRESUMED DEAD.

* * *

THE END

MISSING FROM DUNHAVEN CASTLE

A TIME TRAVEL COZY MYSTERY

CHAPTER 1

Cate sank into the armchair as tears spilled onto her cheeks. Her lower lip trembled as she re-read the headline of the newspaper she'd found on her coffee table moments ago. Her heart thudded, drowning out any noise in the room.

From the page, a picture of Jack stared at her. The headline read LOCAL MAN MISSING, PRESUMED DEAD.

Cate sat stunned for a moment before she glanced at the phone clutched in her shaking hands. She swiped at it and tapped a name, initiating a call.

Still trembling, she pressed the phone to her ear and waited for a response. She barely heard the voice on the other end.

She blinked slowly as she struggled to form words. "Damien," she choked out, her voice weak and breathy, "I need your help."

"Hey, Cate," Damien answered. "Sure. Is it about the temporalysis? We're still searching for some information, but—"

"No, it's not that."

"Oh. Well, okay. If there's something else I can help with, just say the word."

Cate licked her lips and leaned her elbow against the chair's arm. She sunk her forehead into her palm, fighting back the tears forming in her eyes. She blew out a shaky breath.

"Cate?" Damien prompted.

Cate drew in a deep breath and straightened her posture. "Something terrible has happened." She broke down in tears, unable to get any other words out.

“Oh, no. What is it? Cate, whatever it is, we’ll help in any way we can. Is it the time again?”

“No,” Cate cried. “It’s Jack. He’s gone.”

“What?”

“He’s gone. He’s gone,” she said, her voice catching in her throat.

“Okay, slow down. Just take a breath and tell me what happened. What do you mean, he’s gone?”

“I had another one of those episodes. Jack found me. I was dressed in a ball gown, I had passed out. We were going to meet in the library and discuss it after I changed. I told him to take the dogs with him.

“When I got here, the dogs were here but no Jack. Then I saw the newspaper.”

“Newspaper?”

“Today’s newspaper. It was sitting on the coffee table. There’s a picture of Jack and the headline says...” Cate’s voice trailed off as she choked on the lump in her throat.

“Take your time, Cate.”

Cate sniffled and wiped at her cheeks. She took a steadying breath and said, “It says local man missing, presumed dead.”

Cate heard a rustling on the other end of the line. “Okay, Cate. It’s going to be okay. We’ll figure this out. Give me a second.”

“Okay,” Cate said with another sniffle. She wiped at her cheeks. “The article says he’s been gone for a week. But he was just here. I just saw him not an hour ago. How did this happen?”

“Hold on one second.”

Muffled voices spoke on the other end of the line. Cate could not make out the words, though.

“Cate? You there?”

“Yeah.”

“Okay. Listen, we’re coming. We’ll be there tonight. I know this is hard, but sit tight, okay?”

“Tonight? Damien, you’ll never get a flight.”

“I don’t need a flight, Cate. Just a few hours to grab some stuff.”

“Oh, right.” Cate’s mind spun as she tried to make sense of the situation, including the latest development.

“We’ll see you soon. And, Cate?”

“Yeah?”

“Try not to worry. We’ll solve this. Together.”

“Thanks.”

Cate ended the call and sat for a moment staring at the paper. Panic bubbled inside her and she rubbed at her forehead. Her first attempt to read the article ended quickly. Her jumbled mind failed to comprehend the words on the page.

Riley approached her, staring into her eyes. She scooped him up as she fought back her emotions. Rubbing a hand down his furry back, she forced herself to read the page. It detailed an ongoing search for Jack, stating he’d been missing for over one week. Attempts to contact him or find him had produced no results. His cell phone had been found, but he had not been. Blood found within his home suggested he may no longer be alive.

Cate’s stomach turned over as she read the details. Her mind questioned how this occurred. Had the change in history they’d witnessed when solving their last mystery caused this? Why had the ripple been delayed? When they returned after their wild adventure, Cate’s notes had already been altered, reflecting the change in the victim buried in her garden, but Jack was with her.

Why had he disappeared only now? And where had he gone?

Cate bit her lower lip hard enough to wince. She climbed from her seat, feeling almost numb. She pushed her legs to move forward, leaving Riley behind with his brother, Bailey.

Cate threaded through the halls on autopilot. She descended the stairs and traipsed down the hall to the kitchen. She stepped inside, hoping to find things normal. Hoping the newspaper was some kind of cruel joke.

Molly sat at the kitchen table, a dishtowel clutched in her hand as she sobbed. Mrs. Fraser stood over her, rubbing her back.

“It’s okay, Miss Molly, you have yourself a good cry,” the woman said with a snuffle of her own.

Cate’s lower lip trembled at the scene as she stepped into the kitchen. Molly snapped her head up and stood. She wiped away her tears.

“Lady Cate,” she said with a snuffle. “Didn’t see you there.” She forced a smile on her face, but Cate noticed her lower lip tremble as she tried to hold it.

Cate’s face pinched as emotions overcame her again. Molly walked toward her, arms outstretched, and pulled her into a hug.

“Now, don’t you two girls go giving up hope,” Mrs. Fraser chided as she set a kettle of water on the stove. “Young Jack is a smart man. And we’d be doing him a disservice if we counted him out already!” Mrs. Fraser gave a firm nod at the final statement, as though that would make it true.

Cate squeezed her lips into a thin line. Molly wiped a few tears away. “It was just that article this morning,” Molly said. “It seemed so final.”

“Has it been a week already?” Cate inquired, trying to search for the story.

“Aye, I’m afraid so,” Mrs. Fraser said.

“It can’t be,” Cate murmured.

“I know what you mean,” Molly said, guiding Cate to a seat at the table. “It feels like we’ve lived a month in the last week.”

“Sit down and have a cuppa, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser said, offering her a filled teacup. She set down a plate of cookies as she sat down across from her.

“I couldn’t eat.”

“You have to, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser insisted. “It’ll do you good. Got to keep your strength up.”

Cate’s mind spun as the women talked in the background. She stared into the translucent brown liquid in her cup. Jack had been missing for over a week. Though to her, it had just occurred. History had changed again. Why? How?

“Lady Cate?” Molly’s voice echoed in her ears. She snapped her head up to look at the woman. “Lady Cate?”

“What? I’m sorry, I wasn’t listening.”

“It’s all right, lassie,” Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate’s eyes lowered to the teacup again. “He always called me that.”

“I know he did,” Mrs. Fraser said. “And he will again. I have faith. And I’ve been praying like the dickens.”

Cate offered the woman a weak smile and sipped at her tea. Mrs. Fraser turned the topic to other things, though the somber mood never broke. As Cate finished her cuppa, she said, “I need to go see Mr. Reid.”

Mrs. Fraser nodded. “Oh, just a moment, Lady Cate, would you mind waiting for me to pack up some food? I hope you don’t mind, but I think he could use it. Poor Stan.”

“Of course, I don’t mind,” Cate said.

Mrs. Fraser bustled about the kitchen with Molly, packing several meals in a hamper. "Now, wait a moment, I'll get Mr. Fraser to carry it to the car."

"I can do it," Cate insisted, hefting the heavy basket up.

"Tell him we're thinking of him," Mrs. Fraser said, placing her hand on Cate's forearm.

"I will," Cate promised.

She offered a fleeting smile before she climbed the stairs and headed out the door to the garage. Cate set the hamper in the backseat and slid behind the wheel. She made the short trip to Stanley Reid's cottage.

With the hamper in hand, she knocked on the door. The old man pulled the door open, offering Cate a consoling smile. "Lady Cate," he said, sadness etched in his eyes and on his features. "Come in." He signaled for her to enter.

"Mr. Reid," Cate began, trying to focus on the food in her hand. "Mrs. Fraser and Molly send their best and some food. They were concerned you weren't eating properly."

"That'd be Emily, all right." Stanley gave a weak chuckle.

Cate licked her lips as she grasped the basket handle with white knuckles. "Here, I'll take it, lassie."

"Oh, right." Cate handed the basket off to him and he set it on his coffee table. He turned to face her again. Cate tried to offer a smile, but tears came instead.

Stanley pulled her into a hug. "There, there, lassie. Jackie wouldn't want you to cry."

"I'm sorry."

"Whatever for?" He released her and stared into her eyes.

"I think..." She wiped at her cheeks and sniffled. "I think I had something to do with Jack's disappearance."

Stanley's forehead wrinkled and he screwed up his face. He guided Cate to an armchair and eased her into it. "What are you saying, Lady Cate?"

"I'm saying... I'm saying I think when Jack and I investigated in 1942, we messed something up. And that's what caused this."

Stanley considered the statement, sinking into an armchair next to Cate as she continued.

"We went to investigate the murder of a woman. But when we were there, a man's body was placed in that grave. And when we returned my notes were changed."

Stanley remained silent.

“Don’t you see? We changed history. Something went haywire. And I think Jack’s disappearance is a result of that.”

“How?”

“I’m not sure. But he just disappeared not more than three hours ago.”

Stanley cocked his head. “He went missing a week ago.”

Cate shook her head. “No. He just went missing.”

“You’re not making sense, lassie.”

“I know this is difficult. But I just spoke with Jack less than three hours ago. He was fine. He was normal. He found me passed out in the west wing. We were just about to discuss it when he disappeared and I found a newspaper article saying he’d been missing for a week. But, Mr. Reid, I just saw him today.”

Stanley shook his head and grabbed Cate’s hand. “Lady Cate, I---“

“No!” Cate insisted. “I just saw him! Something’s wrong here. He can’t be gone.”

“But he is, lassie, he is.”

Cate’s gaze fell to her hands. “But not for a normal reason.”

“Maybe so, but what can we do?”

She flicked her gaze back up to the older man’s face. “I’m going to find him. And I’m going to bring him home.”

* * *

Cate slogged through the front door of the castle, blowing out a long breath. Leaning against the thick wooden barrier, she attempted to collect her thoughts. Her jumbled mind failed to pull together coherent ideas.

On auto-pilot, she wandered downstairs again, knocking on the doorjamb leading into the kitchen.

“Oh, Lady Cate, I’m glad you’re back,” Mrs. Fraser said. She forced a smile onto her face.

Cate offered her a tight-lipped smile. “Mr. Reid was very grateful for the care basket. He wanted me to pass along his thanks.”

“Oh, of course. Poor man.” Mrs. Fraser shook her head but pressed on with dinner preparations as a distraction.

“How’s he holding up?” Molly inquired.

Cate sucked in a breath. "He seems okay on the surface. But you can read the sadness in his eyes."

"I'm not surprised. He adored young Jack."

"And Jack took such good care of him," Molly said. "Ugh, I just wish there was something we could do."

"There just might be," Cate said.

Molly glanced at her, cocking her head and furrowing her brow.

"We can find Jack."

"Oh, from your lips to God's ears, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser said. "I pray for it every night."

"I agree wholeheartedly. But the police don't hold out much hope."

"Well, on that note," Cate began, "I have a few friends. The people that were here a few weeks ago, in fact. They're adept in this type of thing."

"Locating missing persons?" Molly inquired as she pulled a pie from the oven.

"Yes," Cate said. "I contacted them about Jack."

"And?" Mrs. Fraser questioned as she sprinkled coarse sugar on the top.

"And they agreed to help. Damien said they'd be here this evening."

"Oh!" Mrs. Fraser said, cutting her gaze to Cate and pressing her hand on her heart. "Well, bless them, Lady Cate. How nice of them to drop everything and come to Dunhaven. I certainly hope they can help!"

Molly offered a hopeful smile. "Me too! Gosh, I hope they can find him. What's their record like on this?"

Cate pondered the question. "They're very, very good. I don't think there's a problem they've ever been unable to solve."

"That's quite a record!"

"I'll get some bedrooms prepared," Cate said. "But I wanted to let you know we may have company for a while."

"They can stay as long as they like, especially if they are pitching in to find young Jack. And dinnae you worry about those bedrooms. Miss Molly and I will handle it right now."

"Oh, no, you've got enough on your plate."

"Nonsense. We've finished our baking, we've just got a little cleaning up to do. And the work will keep our minds off things. You go upstairs and prepare for your guests."

"I really appreciate it, Mrs. Fraser."

Mrs. Fraser gave her a smile and a nod, gesturing that she could run along.

Cate wandered to the library and plopped into the armchair. The newspaper stared back at her. With a grimace, she flipped it over and slouched into the chair, covering her face with her hands.

Her head ached, her eyes stung and her body felt weak all over. She had made a promise to Stanley Reid and she intended to keep it. But she didn't know how. How could she fix something that didn't happen?

Her mind reeled. Visions of her last encounter with Jack earlier that day flitted through her mind. They'd talked. She'd touched him. He was real. Wasn't he? Was she losing her mind? She had begun to question her own sanity when a loud banging echoed through the house.

Cate startled, her muscles stiffening. For a moment, she expected to find Jack at the library door. The banging sounded again. It was the front door, she realized.

"Jack?" she questioned, hope filling her voice.

She hurried from the library to the front door and yanked it open. Three familiar faces stared back at her.

"Hey, Cate," Damien said with a weak smile.

Cate's shoulders sagged in disappointment and relief at the same time. On the other side of the door stood Damien, Celine, and Michael.

"Hi," Cate answered. "Thanks for coming on such short notice. I just can't believe what's happening. I didn't know who else to call."

"It's no problem," Damien said, unwavering from his spot outside.

"Well, please, come in. Mrs. Fraser and Molly are preparing rooms for you. I---"

"Cate," Damien interrupted, "there's something I need to tell you."

Cate stood stunned at the statement. She wasn't certain she could take any more news today. Before she could answer or Damien could continue, movement caught her eye. Someone stood behind the second door, hidden from sight.

A commotion ensued as the figure rounded the door. Michael held out his hands to stop the man, shouting something. Celine shook her head. Damien stumbled back a step. He came into full view, stepping into the foyer, a smile bordering on a smirk on his lips.

Cate's mouth went dry. Her eyes bulged and her jaw dropped open. Her breath caught in her throat and she stumbled back several steps, her hand rising to cover her open mouth. She struggled to make sense of it. She struggled to remain on her feet. She struggled to process coherent thoughts.

The man studied her, raising his eyebrows, a smirk on his lips. “Hello, Catherine,” Duke Marcus Northcott said.

CHAPTER 2

Cate's knees went weak at his voice. She struggled to stop herself from trembling. Her mind failed to form any words.

"Get away," she finally gasped out as he moved toward her again. She backed away from him.

He continued toward her. "I knew there was something unique about you. From the moment I met you, I knew it. A time traveler! Now it all makes sense." He leaned in closer to her. A musky scent filled her nostrils. It matched the scent she'd been smelling in the west wing. "I told you, Catherine, I always find out the truth."

The others filed inside behind him.

"Come on, man," Michael said. "Was that really necessary?"

Damien waved his hand in the air. "Yeah, I was trying to prepare her."

"Back off, Marcus," Celine said, placing a hand on his chest and inserting herself between him and Cate.

Cate remained speechless. Was she dreaming? Marcus Northcott stood in front of her, amidst the Shadow Slayers and they remained perfectly calm. They detested the man. Didn't they? Had history changed that much? Cate pressed her palm against her forehead, her jaw still gaping open.

Damien wrapped his fingers gently around Cate's upper arm. "Can we talk somewhere? Privately?"

Cate nodded and managed to force out one word. "Library."

"We're wasting time," Marcus said.

Damien held up a finger, his voice low. "Just give us a minute."

“We’ll wait here, D,” Celine said.

Damien guided Cate down the hall. She glanced behind her as they walked, staring at the strange scene in her foyer. Marcus’s gaze remained trained on her as she disappeared down the hallway. She gulped again as his dark eyes bore into her and then turned away.

Damien pushed through the doors and into the library, closing them behind him. Riley and Bailey leapt to their feet and Riley let out a howl.

“Riley, it’s okay. It’s Damien, remember?”

Riley sniffed in the air and seemed satisfied with the explanation. He sank to his haunches. Cate spun to face Damien. “What is going on here?”

Damien held his hands in front of him, a penitent expression on his features. “I can explain.”

“I sure hope so because I’m not sure how many more surprises I can handle today.”

“I know. I’m sorry. This is not how I envisioned this happening. I realize seeing him is a shock, but—“

“A shock? I’m surprised I’m still on my feet! When we last saw each other, you hated him. Has history changed that much?”

“No,” Damien said with a shake of his head. “I can explain.”

“I wish you would!” Cate blew out a long breath and squeezed her eyes shut. “Sorry. I’m sorry, I’m just—“

“Stressed. I get it. It’s okay.”

Cate sank into an armchair. Riley wandered over and she stroked his back as he stood with his front paws planted on her thigh. Damien perched on the chair next to her. She was acutely aware of him being in the spot Jack usually sat in when they discussed their problems.

“When you called and told me about Jack, we consulted with the Duke.”

“Do you think he’s responsible?”

“No,” Damien answered with a shake of his head. “But there is a group. It’s called The Agency. It—“

The doors burst open and Marcus strode into the room. Celine and Michael trailed behind him.

“Sorry, I couldn’t stop him,” Celine said, throwing her arms in the air.

“Have we all recovered from our shock? There is work to be done,” Marcus said.

As he strode to the fireplace, Riley and Bailey followed him. Riley left his spot next to Cate and loped to Marcus. Marcus scooped the small dog into his arms. Cate's heart stopped, her eyes bulging from her head. She leapt to her feet.

"Hello, Riley." He scratched the little dog's head. The pup offered him a lick on his hand. He placed the dog back on the floor, giving Bailey a quick tousle on the head.

"Can someone please explain what is going on here?" Cate questioned. With a pained expression, she glanced around the room at the others.

"I was trying when someone," Damien said, side-eying Marcus, "burst into the room."

Marcus rolled his eyes. "Were you planning on explaining it in this century?"

"Give him a minute," Celine barked at him.

"Like I was saying," Damien said to Cate, "there's a group called The Agency. They're... they're not nice people, Cate."

"We think they had something to do with Jack's disappearance," Michael said.

"How?" Cate inquired.

"In addition to being nefarious in general, they have the ability to time travel. And they do it for their own gain. They can manipulate time, jump around in it," Damien said. "Cate, they can change history."

Cate stared at him as realization dawned on her. She swallowed hard. "Change history," she repeated.

Damien nodded. "Yeah, change history. You said that happened once in 1942, and then again when you saw the article, right?"

"Yeah," Cate said, sinking into her armchair. She processed the information for a moment.

"We think what happened in 1942 is related to Jack's disappearance. We think it was him they were after there, too," Michael said.

"Why?" Cate inquired.

"They want Dunhaven Castle," Marcus said. "Among other things."

Cate stared at him for a moment, before flicking her gaze away. Her brows knit as she considered his statement. "Why would they want Dunhaven?"

"Cate, you have access to a universal time portal," Damien explained. "Even with their ability to time travel, this provides easy access to anyone in their group.”

“Why take Jack?”

“Because it weakens you,” Marcus answered. “They will use him as leverage.”

Cate bit her lower lip. He wasn’t wrong. Without Jack, she felt vulnerable.

“What do these people want?” Cate inquired.

“Control,” Celine said. “They want to control history, events, the world.”

“Wait, back up. How do we know it’s these people? Why haven’t they come before?”

“They may have,” Damien answered. “And bided their time, waiting for an opportunity.”

“And we gave them one,” Cate lamented.

“Tell us about what happened in 1942 when the normal timeline changed,” Michael said.

Cate took a deep breath before launching into her story. “We went to 1942 to investigate a murder. The dogs found bones in the garden. The police said they belonged to a female and were buried seventy to eighty years ago. We pieced together some information and found an obscure clue about a woman who disappeared around that time.

“We went back to investigate and found a German spy ring. It was very convoluted but the long and short of it is we believed the woman buried in the garden was a woman named Ruth Harper who sustained blunt force trauma to the head.

“But what we witnessed was something different entirely.” Cate took another breath before continuing.

“A man by the name of Victor, who was a German spy, shot Ruth in the stomach. She survived. Then a woman named Rita, a woman no one could track down, shot Victor and killed him. She had him buried in the garden. When we returned here, my notes had changed. The body now belonged to a man from seventy to eighty years ago.”

Damien blinked a few times as he pieced it all together. “So Rita changed history.”

“That’s what it seems like,” Cate answered.

Michael narrowed his eyes. “And then you said Jack was here earlier today, right?”

Cate nodded. "Yes. I spoke with him. We went to 1942 this morning."

"And he came back fine, right?" Michael inquired.

"Yes," Cate said. "He came back fine."

"And you saw him later," Damien said.

Cate nodded again. "Yes. I had an..." Her voice trailed off as her eyes flitted to Marcus. "Episode. Jack found me in the west wing. We talked. We were going to meet here to talk about the message you sent. About the temporalysis. I went to change my clothes and he brought the dogs here. When I came in, the dogs were here. Jack wasn't. Just this."

Cate grabbed the newspaper and turned it over. For a split second, she hoped to find the headline changed. Her heart dropped when she saw the same picture and news story.

Damien studied the paper.

Cate continued as he skimmed the article. "It says he's been gone for a week. And everyone I've talked to recalls it that way, except me."

"You recall him being here today," Michael said as he paced the floor.

"Yes."

Damien shot a glance at Celine.

"So, what do we do?" Cate inquired.

"We should do nothing," Marcus answered.

Cate frowned at him and Celine rolled her eyes.

"That wasn't the plan," Michael said.

"I said we should do nothing, not we will do nothing."

"We'll attempt to track him, but it'll take some work," Celine said.

"An abundance of work," Marcus corrected.

"So, you think he's alive?"

"We're fairly certain," Damien said.

Cate sucked in a breath. "Thank God."

"We think they took him to distract you," Michael said.

"I still don't see why?"

"Because while we chase them and him," Marcus said, "they will be doing something else. While we are distracted, they will capitalize."

"By doing what?" Cate questioned.

"We don't know," Damien said. "But we'll have to stay alert."

"Right," Cate said with a creased brow. She rubbed the back of her neck as her head began to ache.

“We don’t have many clues to go on,” Damien said. “We’ll need to start in 1942 where you last saw Rita.”

Cate nodded, biting her lower lip as her head swam. She stood, swallowing hard.

“Cate?” Damien inquired. “You okay?”

Cate tried to nod but found it difficult. Her eyes blinked in a slow, deliberate manner.

“Cate?” Damien questioned again, his voice sounding muffled.

“What’s wrong with her?” Michael asked.

Cate’s jumbled mind allowed her to see and hear the events around her but not to communicate. She struggled to maintain her focus.

Marcus twisted to face her, his eyebrows raising. “It’s the temporalysis.” He approached her. Cate’s mind jumbled, fighting to place him.

Her lips curled into a smile. “You’re here!” she said.

“Catherine, focus.”

“Are we going to the ball?”

“No, we are not going to the ball.”

Cate looked down at her clothes. “I have my dress. I’ll get ready.”

“No, Catherine. We are not going to the ball. Focus. We must find Jack.”

“Jack. Yes, but we have to go to the ball to find him.”

“Not now. We’re still in the present. You must focus.”

Cate slow-blinked at him again, her brow furrowing at his words.

“Catherine, focus. We are in the present.”

She shook her head, averting her eyes from him. She spun to face the door and took a step toward it. “I have to go.”

“No,” Marcus said, catching her elbow and spinning her back to him. “You must stay here.”

Cate attempted to wrench her arm from his grasp.

“Cate, maybe you should listen to him,” Damien said, skirting around her and placing himself between her and the door.

Cate shook her head again. “No, I…”

“No, Catherine,” Marcus argued. “You mustn’t leave. You must face the present.”

Celine rushed toward her and touched her cheek. Marcus shook his head. “It will not work. The temporalysis is preventing you from reaching her.”

Cate struggled to free herself from the confines of the group. “Let me go!” she shouted.

“Do not allow her to leave,” Marcus warned them.

Michael placed himself at the doors, barring any exit she had. Cate scanned the room for another escape. Her forehead crinkled as her headache worsened. She spun, searching for an exit. After two dizzying revolutions, her eyes rolled back in her head, and she collapsed.

CHAPTER 3

Cate's eyes fluttered open. Damien hovered over her. "Damien?" she questioned as memories of the last few hours rushed back into her mind. Her stomach turned as she recalled the circumstances that brought Damien back to Dunhaven Castle.

Cate struggled to push herself up to sit from her position lying on the floor. "Easy," Damien said.

"She is fine. Let her get up," a voice said.

The sound caused Cate's flesh to pucker into goosebumps. She sat up, clutching the coffee table as she glanced toward the fireplace over her right shoulder.

It had not been a dream. Marcus Northcott leaned against the mantle with a brandy in his hand. Cate's breath caught in her throat as she spotted him.

She climbed to her feet. "What happened?"

"You had another one of the temporalysis attacks. You passed out."

Cate heaved a sigh, pressing her palm to her forehead. "That's twice in one day."

Marcus reached into his pocket and withdrew a small pouch. He pulled it open and retrieved a small red object shaped into a disk. He held it out to Cate.

She stared at it, shrinking away. "Eat it," he instructed.

"Why?"

"It will aid with the temporalysis."

Cate eyed him warily.

“Well, go on, take it,” Marcus said.

“Take it, Cate,” Celine said with a nod. “He knows what he’s doing.”

Cate shook her head, her features pinching. “Why are we trusting him suddenly?”

“I know it’s weird,” Damien said, “but he’s the best resource we have right now.”

Marcus raised his eyebrows at Cate, a triumphant expression on his chiseled features. She narrowed her eyes at him.

“Marcus has extensive knowledge about The Agency. If we’re going to track them, we’ll need his help,” Celine said.

“And I’m just supposed to trust him?”

“No, Cate,” Damien said. “You just need to trust us.”

Cate scanned their faces. “And by extension, him.” Cate flailed her arm toward Marcus. “He almost killed me!”

Marcus rolled his eyes. “Oh, Catherine, please, that was centuries ago! You cannot honestly still hold that against me. And besides, I made certain you were found!”

“It was centuries for you. It was a few weeks for me!”

Damien approached her, holding his hands out to plead with her. “Cate, I know it’s weird. But alliances shift and allegiances change. It was hard for me to accept at first too but he’s the best resource we have. He’s the one who identified your temporalysis, and he has the best information about The Agency.”

Cate studied his face, her head tilting as she tried to decipher any meaning from his words. “How do you know he’s telling the truth? How do you trust him?”

“He’s saved our lives more than once,” Damien admitted.

“Damien’s right,” Celine said.

“As much as I hate to admit this, they’re telling the truth. He’s come through in the clutch more than once,” Michael added. “I don’t like the guy either, but he’s our best chance right now.”

Marcus wiggled his eyebrows at her and extended his hand again. The red disk stood out starkly against his palm. Cate squeezed her lips together and reached for the red object. She popped it into her mouth. Within seconds, her lips formed a grimace and she shivered. “Ugh, it’s awful. What is this?”

“Dragon’s blood,” Marcus answered. “A temporary solution to your problem.”

“What?” Cate asked, her eyes widening.

“Sap from a Dragon Blood tree,” Celine explained. “It can have some restorative properties for temporalysis. It doesn’t cure it though.”

Cate sank into her armchair. “What does?”

“Nothing that we’ve come across,” Damien said.

“It must run its course,” Marcus said.

“But it can be fatal,” Damien said. “So, you’ll need to leave the heavy lifting to us.”

“What? No!” Cate shouted.

“Cate,” Damien said with a shake of his head. “You can’t follow these people through time. Not only is it incredibly dangerous on its own, but with the added bonus of your temporalysis, it could cost you your life!”

Cate shook her head. “I don’t care. I have to help! For Jack.”

“I’m sure he’ll understand and probably even agree,” Michael countered.

“I’m not going to stand by and do nothing while these people have Jack! It’s not an option for me.”

“Cate, are you sure?” Damien inquired.

After a moment, Cate nodded. “Yes. He’d do the same for me.”

“All right,” Celine said. “Then we’ll get started.”

Damien nodded. “Okay. Now, Cate, I’ll need you to tell me everything you can about Rita. She’s our best lead on tracking these people.”

“Do you think she’s one of them?”

Marcus pulled a cell phone from his pocket and tapped around on it. “Is this the woman you know as Rita?”

Cate stood and studied the image on his phone. Ravishing Rita stared back at her. Her hair and makeup were different, but Cate would recognize her face anywhere. She nodded. “Yes, that’s her.”

“She’s a key member of The Agency. Her name is Gianna Caruso,” Marcus explained. “The woman is a ghost. She is extremely dangerous.”

“Well, that seems like the pot calling the kettle black,” Cate murmured as she sank into her armchair.

“What can you tell us about her?” Celine asked.

Damien added, “Specifically about the last time you saw her.”

Cate licked her lips. Her mind parsed through the details she possessed concerning Rita Haverford of 1942. “Ummm,” Cate murmured.

“Take your time,” Damien said. Michael handed him a laptop from the bag he’d carried in. Damien popped it open and tapped around before focusing his attention on Cate.

She licked her lips again. “When we met Rita, she was working in the intelligence tent.”

“Intelligence tent?” Michael inquired.

Cate nodded. “Yes, there was an intelligence tent on the grounds of Dunhaven Castle in 1942 for a very brief period. Jack and I discovered it when we traveled there. It’s not listed anywhere. Its existence has practically been erased from history.”

“Why?” Damien inquired.

“Because it was infiltrated by German spies. It nearly cost the Allied forces the ability to decipher the Enigma code.”

Damien nodded as he clacked away on his keyboard. Cate continued her tale. “She was posing as an intelligence agent for the British. She was extremely friendly with Jack, very interested in him.” Cate shook her head and sank her forehead into her palm. “Why didn’t I see it coming?”

“You couldn’t have, Cate,” Damien assured her. “Tell me everything you can about what happened with Victor’s death.”

“Jack and I were hiding in the folly after finding a cryptic note. Ruth, the woman we thought had been buried in the garden, came there. She met with Hans, an intelligence agent. He gave her the information to decipher the Enigma code. She swapped it with a fake file and met with Victor. He shot her and took the fake file. But before he could leave, Rita appeared. She said something about there being larger things in motion and he was collateral damage. She shot him. Then two men appeared and she told them to bury him in the garden and leave Ruth there.”

“Do you know what happened to Rita after?”

“No. Jack and I asked about her but my relatives at the time had no information. They said they had no idea where she’d come from and no idea where she’d gone. She simply vanished.”

“Okay, I’m going to concentrate my efforts in 1942 and see what I can dig up. Out of curiosity, why did you start investigating during that time?”

“Mrs. Campbell, our town librarian, gave me a folder of articles about any disappearances in the area. The only one that fit the time frame and gender of the bones, the original set, was Ruth Harper.”

“Do you happen to have those articles?”

Cate nodded and retrieved the folder from the desk. She dug through and scanned the article on Ruth Harper. It remained unchanged. “This is the article that led us to that time period. None of the other articles fit because they were the wrong gender. Well, they were the wrong gender, but not anymore. Ugh, this all makes my head ache.”

“That’s the temporalysis,” Marcus chimed in.

Cate flicked her gaze at him before she handed the articles to Damien. She continued to suck on the dragon blood lozenge, hoping it did the trick for her symptoms.

Damien scanned the articles. “Are any of these others different?”

“Uh,” Cate murmured. She took the folder back and scanned through them. “Not to my knowledge. If there are any details that are changed, they’re imperceptible.”

Damien nodded. “Okay. I’ll concentrate on searching around 1942 for anything dealing with Gianna or The Agency.”

“Make a note of anything you find, and we’ll review it and go from there tomorrow,” Celine said.

Damien offered her a thumbs up. “You got it.”

“Mrs. Fraser and Molly set up the bedrooms you had the last time you stayed. I can take you...”

Damien shook his head as he closed his laptop and stood. “No, it’s okay, Cate. We remember the way. You relax.”

Cate slouched back in her armchair. Damien grasped her shoulder and squeezed. Cate grabbed his hand, offering him a similar gesture as she nodded. He took another step away. Cate twisted and tugged his hand. “Damien.” She waited until he turned back toward her and gave him a weak smile. “Thanks.”

“You’re welcome, Cate. We’ll get him back.”

Cate nodded as he slid his hand from hers.

“You can follow us,” Michael said to Marcus, bobbing his head toward the door.

Marcus swallowed the last of the brandy in his glass and stalked from the room.

“Get some rest, Cate,” Celine said as she patted her shoulder.

The doors closed behind her as everyone left her alone and silence filled the room. Cate grabbed the folder of articles from the coffee table and returned them to the desk. She shambled back to the armchair. The upside-down newspaper remained on the wooden table. Her eyes lingered on it as she bit into her lower lip again. The bitter lozenge in her mouth made her grimace.

She turned the paper over and stared at the picture of Jack. Damien's words echoed in her mind about the nefarious group and their ability to change history. She imagined Jack being held in some unknown location by people hoping to exploit his disappearance for their own gain.

Cate glanced at the empty chair next to her. At a time like this, she and Jack would have met right here and discussed their options. They'd have talked through plans, vetted ideas, and come up with potential solutions. Now she was alone.

Cate's lower lip quivered as she stared at the all-too-empty chair. A tear rolled down her cheek, followed by another, then another. She sniffled as she attempted to stop, but found her emotions too powerful. She sank her head into her hands and sobbed.

Riley and Bailey approached her. She gave them both a rub but their presence did little to comfort her. With her eyes squeezed shut, tears streamed down her cheeks and her body shook with sobs.

A hand squeezed her shoulder. She attempted to compose herself as she reached for it, assuming it belonged to Damien, but his gesture only made her cry more. Instead, she stood and spun, grasping hold of the figure behind her with bleary eyes and pressing herself into his chest. His hand stroked her hair.

After a moment, the tears slowed. Cate sniffled, her eyes still closed as she wiped at her face. She took a step back, blowing out a long, shaky breath. "Sorry," she said, glancing up.

She swallowed hard and retreated back two more steps, sobering quickly and wiping away more tears as she identified the man who consoled her.

CHAPTER 4

Marcus offered her a handkerchief. “Don’t cry, Catherine. I hate to see a beautiful woman cry.” He waved the handkerchief again. “Take it.”

Cate snatched it from him, using it to wipe her eyes. Riley wandered to him, and he ruffled the fur on the dog’s head.

“Why are you here?” Cate demanded.

“You are obviously upset. I came to check on you.”

Cate frowned at the statement. “Why?”

Marcus eyed her before he stalked to the brandy decanter and poured a glass. He waved it at her. She shook her head in response.

He stalked toward her. She stumbled backward. “Take it,” he said, holding out the glass.

“No.”

“We have a long road ahead of us, Catherine. You will need it.”

Cate stared at the amber liquid. She snatched the glass from his hand. “Happy?”

He raised his eyebrows at her, his lips forming a smirk, before he returned to the decanter and poured himself a drink. Cate sipped the fruity sweet beverage as she eyed him sideways.

He snapped his gaze to her over the rim of the glass. “If we are to work together, you must learn to trust me.”

“I’d never trust you.”

Marcus approached her and cocked his head. "You were very interested in me once."

Cate's features twisted into a stunned mask. "You had kidnapped me! I was trying to stay alive! Trying to figure out what was happening and what you were!"

He puckered his lips and narrowed his eyes at her. "And I told you then perhaps once we'd be allies. That day has arrived."

"Why are you here?" Cate inquired.

"You need my help."

"Why would you help me? You almost killed me."

"I explained that two centuries ago."

"You wanted Celine's attention."

"Yes."

"And now? How do I know you won't do that again."

"Simple. The stakes are far too high to fail."

Cate raised her eyebrows at him.

"The Agency is a threat to all of us. Myself included. Helping you helps me."

Cate processed the statement. If Marcus Northcott hoped to gain something over The Agency, could he be trusted? Would he bargain with Jack's life in order to garner favor with them?

Cate flicked her gaze from her brandy to Marcus. "Why are you tormenting me?"

"I don't know what you mean."

"The necklace, the music box. They're enchanted, right?"

"Yes."

"Why? Why did you send them to me?"

"The music comforts you, does it not?" Cate didn't answer and Marcus continued. "As it should. That is its purpose."

"No! It sends me into a trance, and I wander around the castle."

"You are confusing the effects of the temporalysis with the music box. The music box soothes you. Which is why you seek it during a temporalysis attack."

The crease between Cate's eyebrows deepened. "I still don't understand why you sent it."

He sipped his brandy before he answered, focusing his gaze on her. "Because you asked me to."

“What?” Cate said, her voice incredulous. “I never asked you for that!”

He offered her a smile that bordered on a smirk. He finished the last swallow of his brandy and set the glass on the table. With another pat on Riley’s head, he flicked his gaze back to Cate. “Get some rest, Catherine. You’re going to need it.”

He spun on his heel and disappeared from the room. Cate stood motionless for a moment, staring after him. Her brain threatened to implode. Between Jack’s disappearance and the temporalysis, the addition of Marcus Northcott in the mix had the potential to push her over the edge. And his cryptic remarks regarding her involvement in the delivery of the music box and its enchantment were not helping. Was he simply a master manipulator and fantastic liar? But to what end?

The questions made Cate’s head ache. She took another sip of the brandy Marcus had given her before she decided to heed his final words and go to bed.

Calling the dogs after her, she left the library and climbed the stairs, navigating through the halls to her bedroom. She passed the rooms occupied by her mysterious Shadow Slayer friends. She slowed as she passed their doors. Riley ventured to the room Marcus occupied, giving the door a sniff before continuing around the corner with Cate.

As she shut herself away in her suite, she considered locking the door. She pondered if she’d need to. Would she roam the halls tonight? And if she did, where would she go. A shudder passed through her as she imagined herself banging on the Duke’s door and dragging him to the west wing. Though she doubted the man could be dragged anywhere he did not want to go.

With a sigh, she forced herself to walk across the room without locking the door. She doubted the lock would hold her back anyway. In her trances, she usually found a way to get around any barrier.

After changing, she slipped under the covers. The dogs curled near her. She reached over to switch off the light and spotted the piano-shaped music box sitting on her nightstand. Her hand caressed the object. Without further thought, she twisted the winding key. Tinkling music filled the room.

Cate closed her eyes and inhaled deeply. The music did soothe her as much as she hated to admit it. The tension in her muscles eased away and her head stopped aching. And while her heart longed to find Jack and return him to Dunhaven, for the first time since she read the heart-stopping news, she felt she may be able to sleep.

Cate flicked off the light and slouched down under the sheets. She turned onto her side, staring at the outline of the small music box, lit from behind by the pale moonlight streaming through her window. She reached out to caress the tiny keys as she drifted off to a dreamless sleep.

* * *

The music box tinkled its tune as Cate opened her eyes the following morning. Puffy and sore, she squeezed them shut as the harsh reality of her current situation hit her. The newspaper headline shot through her mind.

As she rolled onto her side, she reached for the piano-shaped music box and pulled it closer to her. Her brow furrowed as she recalled the other incredible events of the past twenty-four hours.

In particular, the arrival of Duke Marcus Northcott as an ally rather than an antagonist swirled in her mind. Her conversation with him last evening replayed.

He continued to insist she'd asked him to send the music box. An incredulous idea in her estimation. He must be lying. He had to be.

Cate's stomach somersaulted at the idea of seeing him again today. Intimidated didn't fully capture the sentiment she experienced when she was in his presence.

She bit her lower lip as the music continued to play. Oddly, it did soothe her. But she'd never requested the item from him.

Had something more happened between them in the 1700s? Something when she thought she'd been asleep?

She searched her memory but found nothing. With a sigh, she rose from her bed and shuffled toward the bathroom.

Before she reached the space, her eyes grew heavy. She blinked slowly, a fog building in her mind. Temporalysis. The thought shot across her brain as she struggled to stay conscious.

"No," she moaned as she clutched at the foot of the bed, struggling to stay alert. She dragged herself to the music box, gasping for breath as she pinched her forehead in concentration. Her hands trembled as she grabbed the little box and wound it.

Tinkling music filled the air again and she squeezed her eyes closed, concentrating on the sound. It faded in and out as she clutched the night table in a desperate attempt to tether herself to reality.

A cold nose nudged her. Her chest heaved as she sucked in a breath. She blindly reached for the furry animal next to her. The music box toppled from her lap and skittered across her bedroom floor.

The music slowed, sounding tinny and off.

“No,” Cate cried. She opened her eyes and tried to focus. Her vision blurred in and out of focus.

A bang sounded. Bailey barked, sounding miles away.

“Jack?” Cate called.

She tried to stand but her knees wobbled. She stumbled forward, collapsing to her knees.

Voices warbled but Cate only heard the pounding of her own heart. Hands wrapped around her arms and tugged her upward.

“Jack?” she questioned again. She glanced toward the figure. Only a shadow stood in front of her, blurred beyond recognition.

She reached out to grasp the figure, hoping it kept her conscious. The blue dress flitted through her mind. She swirled in it. A squeeze of her hand pulled her mind back to consciousness, but it threatened to slip away again.

Voices sounded again, garbled and incoherent. Something brushed past her lips. She turned her head away instinctively.

Hands grasped her cheeks and fingers pulled her lips open. Bitterness exploded on her tongue. She grimaced and shivered from the pungent flavor.

A voice mumbled again, still beyond her understanding. Moments later, her fingers touched wood. Music. The tinkling music reached her ears.

The absinthian flavor dripped down her throat. Her heart slowed and her breathing regulated. Her vision began to clear. Colors reappeared in front of her as her surroundings sharpened.

Damien’s concerned face hovered over her.

“Cate?” His voice warbled and echoed.

His fingers squeezed hers. She returned the gesture. “Cate?” he asked again. This time his voice sounded clear.

“Damien?” she murmured.

Another squeeze of her hand. “I’m right here. Let the dragon’s blood work.”

Cate sucked on the lozenge as her vision cleared. She fluttered her eyelids as her vision returned to normal levels. Her lips parted to speak.

“Take it easy. Don’t rush,” Damien said.

She nodded. “I’m okay,” she breathed. Her eyes flicked to the opposite side of the bed where Celine sat. Her full lips formed a smile and she placed a hand on Cate’s forearm.

“I had another attack,” Cate explained.

“We know. I came to check on you this morning and found you collapsed.”

Cate shifted her gaze back to Damien. “At least I wasn’t wandering around talking crazy.”

“Or waltzing,” Damien added with a chuckle.

“Or that,” Cate said with a nod.

“The dragon’s blood from last night allowed you to remain mostly conscious,” Celine said.

Cate shook her head. “This is an aggravating thing to deal with.”

“Cate,” Damien said, concern filling his voice, “are you sure you want to find Jack?” Damien shook his head. “That’s not– I didn’t mean– It’s not what it sounded like. Are you sure you want to do the time traveling to find him? Michael and I can do it, and –“

“I’m sure,” Cate said, pulling herself up to sit. “I want to help. I want to find him.”

Damien shot Celine a glance, one eyebrow arched.

“Is there something you aren’t telling me?”

Damien shook his head. “No. I hate to belabor what I’ve told you already, but this could be fatal, Cate.”

“I can’t leave Jack on his own. And I can’t make you do all the hard work. Besides, this could be fatal even if I don’t time travel, right?”

“We’re happy to do it. This is not unusual for us,” Celine said.

“Yeah,” Damien added, “we’ve done WAY harder stuff.”

Cate shook her head. “No. I want to help. And it isn’t always fatal, right?”

“No,” Damien said.

“You need to keep taking the dragon’s blood,” Celine added.

Damien nodded and handed Cate the black velvet pouch. She accepted the proffered bag and glanced inside. “How often?”

“At least once daily, if not twice,” Damien said.

“Really, you should always have one in your mouth.”

Cate glanced in the bag again. “There aren’t many in here.”

“We know,” Damien said. “Millie’s working on reverse engineering them.”

“And Dembe is retrieving more from the source.”

“Dembe?” Cate questioned, recalling the quiet man from her time with Marcus in the 1790s. “Is he—“

Damien nodded. “Yeah. Also a centuries-old warlock.”

Cate shook her head at how easily they spoke of such things. And how many of these supernatural creatures existed hidden from most people’s knowledge.

Cate flicked her gaze to Celine then Damien. “Can I ask another question?”

“Ask away, Cate,” Damien said.

“Assuming I don’t... you know,” Cate stammered, then gave the kill signal by slashing across her throat with her finger, “how does the temporalysis resolve?”

“Gradual decline of symptoms until there are none,” Celine explained. “Sometimes there is a pinnacle moment, but that can be hard to assess.”

“So, I’ll either continue to get worse until I... never mind. Or I’ll have these attacks but less frequently and less severe?”

“Right,” Damien confirmed.

“Our hope is the dragon’s blood aids in lessening the attacks while you recover,” Celine said.

Damien winced. “But our fear is they’ll mask any warning signs that your condition is worsening.”

Cate grimaced as she sucked on the lozenge in her mouth. With the taste, she’d prefer not to eat them at all. “Should I limit my use of them?”

“No,” Damien said. “But...”

“But what? Damien, please don’t hold anything back. I need to know what to expect.”

He shot Celine another glance. Celine faced Cate. “The truth is, the best person to assess how sick you are and how best to handle your condition is Marcus.”

Cate lowered her eyes and pursed her lips, swallowing the bitter liquid forming on her tongue. After a moment, she gave a slow nod of understanding.

“He really has the best knowledge of this, Cate,” Celine added.

“He’s the one who diagnosed you,” Damien said. “Not that that makes this any better. I get it. He still weirds me out, too.”

“I just can’t understand this,” Cate admitted. “Maybe it’s the temporalysis stunting my critical thinking but... how do you go from detesting him to trusting him?”

“It took centuries,” Celine answered. “But he has proven himself more than once.”

Damien nodded. “I wasn’t kidding when I said he saved my life. Literally, he did. And Celine’s. He’s gotten us through some tight spots. I hate to even admit that, but it’s true.”

“And right now, we have a common enemy. He is extremely powerful and knowledgeable,” Celine said. “We can use that help. And we must if we are to succeed.”

“How are you so sure we can trust him? What if these Agency people offer him something?”

Celine stalked to the window and glanced out. “Marcus would never bow to The Agency.”

“You’re sure?”

Celine twisted her neck to glance over her shoulder at Cate. She gave her a nod. “I would never trust your life to him if I wasn’t certain.”

“Me too, Cate,” Damien said, giving her hand another squeeze. “Really, we wouldn’t sic him on you if we didn’t have to! Although, honestly, he was pretty excited when he figured out your secret.”

“He insisted I had one when we met in the 1790s. And that he would find it. I guess he was correct.”

“Unfortunately, he usually is,” Celine said.

“Yeah, he has an uncanny knack at being correct. It’s annoying, actually,” Damien said. He puckered his lips and stared into space as though an unpleasant memory crossed his mind.

“About that,” Cate said, “he told me he sent me this music box because I asked him to. But that’s not true! Why would he say that?”

Celine lifted her shoulders and opened her mouth to respond when a knock sounded at the door. “Yeah?” Damien called.

Michael stuck his head in through the sitting room doors. “She okay?”

“Yeah,” Damien answered. “Recovered.”

“Good,” Michael said. He offered Cate a lopsided grin.

“Still weirded out by the whole Duke situation, but I told her we all are,” Damien said.

Michael stalked across the room and clapped his buddy on the shoulder. “Damien’s right. I still can’t get on board with pal-ing around with this guy.”

Cate’s eyes widened and she nodded at Michael. “Yes, I feel the same way.”

Michael pressed his lips together into a thin line and shrugged. “But he has saved our lives.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped at the same admission she’d heard from the others in the group. Michael leaned in closer to her. “Don’t worry. I’ve got my eyes all over him.”

Cate offered him a weak smile and a tiny nod.

“Well, if you’re feeling okay, we’ll let you get back to your morning. Meet you in the library?” Damien asked.

Cate nodded. “Thanks.” His last statement almost made her tear up. Jack had said it to her so often. In fact, it was one of the last things he’d said to her.

She firmed her resolve, determined to find him, and pushed herself to get out of bed and dressed after Michael, Damien and Celine left.

As she pushed through the kitchen door after her walk with the dogs, Mrs. Fraser stood waiting for her. “Have your friends settled in?” she questioned.

“Yes,” Cate answered.

“Good. Have they any leads?”

“I’m just about to find out,” Cate said. “Damien was checking on a few things last night. I’m going to get a progress report now.”

“Please let us know of anything they find,” Mrs. Fraser answered. “And I’ll send Molly up with coffee and cookies.”

“Thank you.”

“Want us to watch the pups?” Molly inquired as she arranged a plate of cookies.

“That would be great, thanks.”

Leaving the dogs behind, Cate continued down the hall and climbed to the main floor. She threaded through the halls and arrived at the library. Damien sat at her desk, clacking away on his keyboard. Michael and Celine leaned over his shoulder.

“Hey, Cate,” Damien said as she entered. “Feeling okay?”

“Yes, thanks,” Cate answered.

“I hope you don’t mind I stole your desk.” Damien offered her an awkward smile.

“Not at all. Have you found anything?”

Before Damien could answer, the doors to the library burst open. Marcus strode in. Cate’s posture stiffened and she held a shiver back.

“Where are we on a lead?” he demanded.

“Not very far,” Damien admitted.

“Have you managed to find anything at all?” Marcus inquired.

“A few loose references to someone who could be Gianna Caruso, but hardly anything and certainly nothing after September 1942 in Dunhaven,” Damien said.

Marcus scrunched his eyebrows and offered a frown at the statement. He flicked his gaze to Cate. She stood straighter and stiffer than she had a moment ago.

He approached her, resting the back of his hand against her cheek and then her forehead. “And how you are feeling today, my dear?”

“Fine,” she managed to squeak out.

“She had another attack this morning,” Celine reported. “The dragon’s blood seemed to temper it.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at Cate. “And you are fully recovered?”

Cate nodded at him. “Yes. I didn’t lose consciousness entirely this time.”

“It is too soon to tell if that is a result of the dragon’s blood only or the reversal of symptoms.” He twisted to face Celine. “Where is the good doctor in her quest to synthesize this?”

“Gray said she spent the entire night formulating what she hopes is an equivalent and that she is working on something that may be a cure. Have you heard from Dembe?”

“No, but in the region he must travel to, I am not surprised.”

Molly pushed through the library doors with a large tray containing a silver coffee pot, cups, and a large plate of cookies. The two dogs trotted behind her. “Good morning, everyone,” she said, scanning the group. “Sorry, Lady Cate, the pups insisted on coming up.”

“It’s fine,” Cate said. Riley galloped across the room. Cate smiled down at him, expecting he missed her. Instead, he stopped short, leaping onto his hind legs and placing his front paws on Marcus.

Marcus scooped up the small pup and ruffled the fur on his head. "Good morning, Riley."

"Oh, coffee, awesome," Damien said, leaping from his seat. "Mmm, and cookies, thanks!"

Michael joined him, pouring himself a cup of coffee.

Molly chuckled. "You're welcome. Got to keep you fueled up!" She stood for a moment, biting her lower lip.

"There's no news yet, Molly," Cate informed her. She flicked a gaze from Molly to the awkward scene of Marcus Northcott holding Riley.

Molly's shoulders slumped. "I had hoped to take some news back to Mrs. Fraser. She's really beside herself."

"Poor Mrs. Fraser," Cate lamented. "I'm sorry."

"We'll find something," Damien chimed in. "Tell her not to lose faith in us yet!"

"Yeah, Damien has never met a problem he can't solve," Michael said, clapping the man on the shoulder.

Molly straightened and firmed her jaw, offering them a smile and nod. "Well, if you need anything, just let us know. We'll do whatever we can to help."

She offered another encouraging nod before she left the room, pulling the doors closed behind her.

"They don't know, right?" Damien questioned.

"No," Cate said. "They don't have any idea. And when Jack went missing and I spoke with them about it, their memories had changed. They recalled him being missing for over a week. Same with his grandfather."

"Poor Stanley," Damien said.

"Yeah," Michael chimed in. "He seemed like a nice guy. I bet this is really upsetting for him."

"I spoke with him yesterday. I promised him we'd find Jack and bring him home."

"Did you tell him about the time change?" Damien inquired.

"Yes. I hope it gave him something to cling to."

Damien bit off a piece of shortbread and slurped another sip of coffee before returning to his laptop. "Well, I don't want to let him down. So, I'm going right back to it."

“We should gather information in another way while you continue your search,” Marcus suggested as he set Riley on a leather chair with a pat on his head.

“What way?” Michael questioned.

“A first-hand source.”

“Such as?” Celine asked.

“We know where Gianna was in 1942. We should follow her and determine when she departed from that year and any other clues we can glean.”

“All right,” Celine said. “Michael and I can go—“

“No. That would be foolish. It is best for you to stay here. If Damien stumbled upon a lead, you can open a time portal and allow them to follow up.”

“You shouldn’t go alone, Marcus. If something happens—“

“I won’t.” He swung his gaze to Cate. “Catherine and I shall go.”

CHAPTER 5

Cate's eyes went wide. "What?"

"Cate, you don't have to go if you don't want to," Celine said.

"I-I—" Cate stammered. "Well, I can't go."

"Why?" Marcus questioned.

"She has temporalysis," Michael snapped. "Stop badgering her."

"I was under the impression she preferred to find Zack herself."

"Jack," Cate corrected. "His name is Jack."

"Whatever, my dear, the point is you volunteered for the job. Do you wish to go or not?"

"I want to go," Cate said, crossing her arms over her chest. "But I can't."

"What is it, Cate?" Damien asked.

"I've already been to 1942. In fact, if we return to when we know Rita or Gianna is there, I'll already be there!"

"I don't see the problem," Marcus said.

"It's a direct violation of the rules for time travel!" Cate insisted. "Never travel to a time in which you already exist."

Marcus raised his eyebrows before rolling his eyes with a sigh. "You must be joking."

"No," Cate answered. "It's in Douglas's journal. And one of the first things Jack's grandfather told us after we discovered the anomaly."

"Ridiculous drivel. Nothing prevents you from traveling to a time in which you exist."

“Won’t the universe go haywire?” Cate inquired.

“I’d argue it already has, courtesy of The Agency,” Damien pointed.

“He’s right,” Michael said with a nod toward Damien. “And there is nothing stopping you from being in the same time period as a former version of yourself. We’ve seen it happen.”

“Yeah,” Damien said. “We’ve been to a time period with two of him!” He jabbed his finger toward Marcus who offered a triumphant expression.

“Excellent point, Damien. Live a little, Catherine. Break a rule,” Marcus said with a coy smirk.

Cate frowned at him.

“Look, either way, you can go. I’ll go with you, so you don’t have to go with him.” Michael jerked his thumb toward Marcus.

“That’s a wonderful idea,” Marcus said. “And in the event you need to return or immediately move to another time period, you can wander for days in search of someone able and willing to open a time portal.”

“Wouldn’t we just use the timepiece?” Cate inquired, waving it in the air.

Marcus chuckled. “Oh, you are amusing, Catherine.”

“As much as I hate to say this, he has a point,” Michael said. “If we need to do anything beyond come back here, we’d be stuck.”

Cate furrowed her brow as she stared down at the gold watch. Marcus approached her and pulled the item from her hand, letting it dangle on the chain around her neck. “This is a child’s toy compared to my ability, Catherine. Amusing, but limited in our current predicament.”

“If it’s so limited, why is The Agency after it?”

“Limited, yes. Useless? No. While it proves quite powerful, particularly for laypeople, it pales in comparison with my unique ability to open and enter a time portal. On top of that, we are dealing with The Agency. Not a troop of Girl Scouts. Michael couldn’t provide any effective defense against them.” The crease between Cate’s eyes deepened as she processed his statement. “Now, hurry along and ready yourself, Catherine. We have work to do. I shall meet you here in one hour.”

Marcus turned on a heel and strode from the library. Cate stared after him, her jaw still gaping open for a moment.

“Look, Cate, you don’t have to do this,” Damien said.

“It doesn’t seem like there’s another choice,” Cate answered.

“There’s always another choice,” Celine said. “If you don’t feel comfortable, you do not need to do it. We’ll figure something out.”

“Yeah, I could go with him,” Michael answered. “You stay here. If Damien finds something, Celine can send you two on that lead.”

Cate hesitated a moment, tempted to accept Michael’s offer. With a hard swallow, she shook her head. “No. This is my problem and I want to do the work to solve it.”

“It’s not a problem, Cate,” Michael assured her.

“Yeah, we’re all here to help,” Damien said. “It’s our problem. You’re not alone.”

“And Michael has more experience with Marcus,” Celine added.

Cate glanced around at their faces, all eager to help. She couldn’t ask Michael to take her place. She wouldn’t force someone else to spend time with Marcus Northcott to alleviate her own fears.

Cate shook her head. “As tempting as your offer is, Michael, I can’t accept it. If there’s a chance to save Jack, I want to be there. And I have firsthand knowledge of the events in 1942. I’m the best one to go.”

Michael nodded at her. “I understand that.”

Damien approached her. “Just... be safe, Cate.”

“And as odd as this will sound, listen to Marcus,” Celine chimed in. “He knows what he’s talking about.”

Cate raised her eyebrows and shook her head, blowing out a long breath. “I’m still getting used to that idea. But—“ She flicked her gaze between Celine and Damien. “If you say so, okay.”

Damien offered her a weak smile. “I know this is uncomfortable, but with any luck, we’ll have Jack home safe and sound, then you can time travel with him instead of... him.” He lowered his voice for the last word and jutted his thumb in the direction Marcus had just strode.

Cate forced a smile and nodded. The reminder of Jack’s absence left a lump in her throat. She tried to swallow it down as she blinked away the tears that threatened.

“I’d better get ready,” she squeaked out. She hurried across the room, biting her lower lip.

Damien caught her arm and prevented her from leaving. “Cate, good luck. It’ll be okay.”

Cate gave a curt nod and pulled her arm free, afraid her emotions may overcome her. She darted from the room with the dogs trailing behind her.

She swiped at a tear that escaped onto her cheek as she hurried up the stairs. She sniffled and blew out another long breath. She had to stop riding the emotional rollercoaster and focus. She could save Jack. And she needed to be on the top of her game to do it.

In addition to the at-times debilitating temporalysis, she had Marcus Northcott to manage. Assuming he could be managed.

This time travel trip held no charm for her. So often in the past when she'd time traveled, she'd been giddy. Even when the circumstances were less than ideal. This time, though, she felt nothing but apprehension.

She rounded the corner, lost in her thoughts. She stopped dead. Marcus Northcott stood in the hallway, staring out one of the large windows.

Her heart beat hard against her ribs and she suppressed a shiver.

"Hello, Catherine," he said with the smirk she'd already grown accustomed to.

She clenched her jaw in an attempt to stop her lower lip from quivering.

He approached her and studied her face. She struggled to maintain her composure and lowered her eyes after a moment. Her brow furrowed as she found Riley with his tiny paws planted on Marcus's pant leg.

"Catherine, you must focus."

She licked her lips and offered a barely perceptible nod. He tipped her chin up to face him, hovering close to her. "Focus, Catherine. You are fighting multiple issues. You must focus."

She gave him a more pronounced nod before stepping around him. "Come on, boys," she said to the dogs, steadying her voice.

"Catherine," he called as she scurried away. She twisted to face him. "We'll find him."

The corners of her mouth turned upward in a delicate smile and she continued down the hall. Her forehead creased again as she rounded the corner, taking one last glance back at Marcus. The man's last words to her rang in her ears. He seemed so sure. And she hated to admit it, but she found comfort in his words.

With a determined step, she continued to her room to prepare for her trip.

* * *

Cate ushered the dogs into her suite. She struggled to keep her mindset positive. It already faltered from the moment she'd rallied two halls ago. She swung her hair over her shoulder and forced herself to her bedroom. After winding the music box, she shuffled to the wardrobe.

A dress from the 1940s still hung after her last adventure in the time period. She pulled the doors open and removed the dress, recalling the events she'd experienced when she'd last worn it. A piece of straw still clung to the hemline. She freed it, rolling it between her fingers as memories flooded back into her mind. Throwing her arms around Jack after he'd survived a car wreck and assassination attempt. Falling asleep in the nearby barn while riding out the night.

She shook the memories from her mind and pulled the dress from the hanger. She tossed the straw piece in the trash bin as she entered her bathroom.

A quick glance into the mirror made her wince. Her puffy eyes and splotchy skin hinted at her rough few days. She splashed cold water on her face before she did her best to repair her make-up and pull her hair into a 1940s roll.

She shimmied into her dress and smoothed it out after zipping it. After pulling on her t-strap pumps, she stalked into her bedroom. Her steps stopped as she reached the jewelry armoire. Her eyes slid sideways to glance at it. Her fingertips reached for the drawer pull, lingering on it for a moment.

"I should get ready for the ball," she murmured before she pressed her palm to her forehead. "No. No, I'm not going to the ball."

The music box tinkled its tune across the room. "Yes, the ball," she said. "I have to be—"

She winced in pain and clutched her head again. "No!" she shouted with a shake of her head. "No. I'm not going to the ball."

She yanked her hand away from the drawer and sucked in a deep breath. "You're going to the 1940s to find Jack. Get it together, Cate. Focus."

She squeezed her eyes closed as Marcus's voice echoed in her brain. "Focus, Catherine, focus."

With a deep inhale, she took a step toward the sitting room when her footsteps faltered. She doubled over, gripping her head. Her mind jumbled and thoughts raced through it faster than she could process.

After a moment, the sensation passed. Cate recovered, straightening and gasping for breath. “What in the world was that?” she questioned. With an outstretched hand, she gripped the doorjamb as she recovered.

Any lingering effects passed within another moment. Cate bit her lower lip as she struggled to recall what had passed through her mind moments ago. Nothing came back.

With pursed lips, she squeezed her eyes shut and tried one last time. No memories returned. Her eyes popped open, and she sucked in a deep breath. Riley and Bailey stared up at her.

“I’m okay, boys. Just an elusive memory. But I have more important things to do! I need to go find Jack!”

Riley tilted his head as Cate said Jack’s name. “Yes, Riley. We’re going to get Jack back. Don’t you worry about it. I’ll find him. I promise.”

Riley’s tail waved in the air and Bailey’s pigtail bobbed up and down. Cate gave both dogs a pat on the head before she straightened and smoothed her dress. She pushed her shoulders back and raised her chin as she strode to the door.

Cate navigated through the hallways, firming her resolve with every step. They would find Jack. They would bring him home. Even if she had to do it with Marcus Northcott at her side. The man unnerved her, but she would do whatever it took to find Jack.

She recalled the tinkling music of the music box, still playing in her bedroom. She let the memory of it float through her mind. Even without the noise itself, the thought of the tune could soothe her. Perhaps trusting Marcus Northcott wasn’t such a terrible idea, after all, she ruminated as she descended the main staircase.

She’d take things one step at a time. Her heels clicked across the marble floor of the foyer before growing quiet as she stepped onto the hallway’s rug.

She entered the library, finding Michael leaning over Damien’s shoulder. They poured over something on the screen that appeared to be a handwritten note.

Celine fiddled with her phone across the room and Marcus sipped a brandy.

“Did you find something?” Cate questioned as she stepped inside.

“Ah, there you are,” he said as he set his glass on the side table. “Ready, Catherine?”

“Hey, Cate,” Damien said, twisting to face her. “Nothing much.”

Cate joined them at the desk. She scanned the papers.

“I found this on an obscure site. It’s a set of notes about the Enigma code from the short-lived Dunhaven intelligence outpost. Written by someone named—“

“Hans,” Cate said, the image of the backward blonde man’s face forming in her mind.

“Yes, that’s right,” Damien said with a nod. “Hans Schmidt.”

“This website details a story about how his notes helped crack the Enigma code,” Michael said.

Damien nodded again. “Including a tale about how two people smuggled it from the spy-laden outpost, risking life and limb to deliver it. The story claims they were a couple and the woman shot down a German 109 to ensure the code was delivered successfully.”

The corners of Cate’s mouth turned up as she recalled the event, occurring only days earlier for her. She licked her lips as she remembered downing the plane to stop it from shooting Jack’s fighter jet from the sky.

“Was that you?” Michael inquired.

Cate nodded at him. “Yes.”

“Wow, they really wanted to stop you from getting this to Bletchley,” Damien said with a nod to the computer screen.

“The truth is they nearly shot Jack’s plane down. We were the only plane in the vicinity. I had to do something.”

“So, you’ve saved his life once already,” Damien said with a grin.

“Time to do it again,” Cate said with a determined nod.

“Go get ‘em, Cate.”

She smiled at him.

“Are we finished fawning all over each other?” Marcus inquired, an annoyed expression etched into his features.

“Just a few words of encouragement,” Michael said.

“Save the pats on the back for when we have succeeded and we determine the fallout.” Marcus turned his attention to Cate. “Are you ready?”

Cate licked her lips and nodded. “Yes.”

“Good. Shall we?” He offered his arm. Cate stared at it for a moment before she slid her fingers around it, grasping the fibers of the expensive fabric that made his suit.

“Marcus,” Celine said, glancing up from her phone, “keep her safe.”

Marcus scoffed at the sentiment. “I will do whatever is necessary to keep Catherine safe.” He glanced to Cate who studied his face and offered her a slight smile.

Cate glanced back into the library as Marcus tugged her along. She offered a fleeting smile to Damien as he gave her a quick wave, then flashed his crossed fingers.

Marcus led her to the foyer, pulling open the front door.

“Where are we going?” Cate inquired as they stepped into the spring air.

“To 1942.”

“I meant right now,” Cate said. “1942 isn’t in my side garden.”

“1942 is wherever I wish it to be, Catherine. Though the process is quite elaborate. We do not wish to alert anyone in your household to the opening of a time portal.”

Cate considered his statement. She recalled Damien’s remarks about time portals being volatile and violent. With one of these portals about to stare her in the face, she squeezed her lips together as she pondered the meaning of his statements.

“Will the portal be obvious?”

Marcus slid his eyes sideways to glance at her as he led her around the castle. “Yes. They are quite different from your time rips.”

Cate arched an eyebrow. “What should I expect?”

The corners of Marcus’s mouth turned upward. “Your curiosity is a most attractive quality, Catherine.”

Cate eyed him, mystified by the man with whom she was about to embark on a time travel experience as he explained.

“When I begin to open the portal, the reaction will start small with a slight breeze and a barely perceptible twinkling. As the portal opens further, the scene will be quite chaotic. Winds will whip wildly, and the blackness will grow until it is large enough for you to step through.”

Marcus ceased his walking and spun to face her. Cate swallowed hard as she let her eyes float up to his.

“Once the portal is open, you must step inside. It will be black in the portal. It is vital that you do not stop moving forward until you exit the portal. Do you understand, Catherine?”

Cate nodded. “Yes.”

“Repeat the instructions.”

“Once the portal is open, step inside and continue forward until I exit. How will I know when I exit?”

Marcus looped her arm through his and continued down the path. “It will be obvious. You will be standing in 1942.”

Cate pressed her lips together as she considered his statements. “You said it’s vital that I do not stop moving forward, but what happens if I do?” She tilted her head to glance up at him.

“You question my instructions. You do not trust me?”

“It’s not that,” Cate answered. “The question is mostly academic, but I prefer to be prepared. What if I cannot continue to move forward? Or what if I move too slow? I’d like to know why that piece is so vital and what may go wrong if it is not followed properly.”

He slid his eyes sideways to glance down at her. “You are a most intriguing woman, Catherine. I find your interest in such things quite refreshing.”

His lips twisted into a smile, and he continued after a moment. “I must open the time portal and then enter it. It is a delicate matter that requires some finesse. As such, the time portal is beholden to my timing, more or less. The portal closes behind me as I pass through it. If you should stop moving forward, I may pass you in the portal.

“If that should happen, you would become stuck, lost between times, unable to return here nor go to the intended era. And you may not be able to be found. A terrible tragedy in my opinion.”

Cate’s eyebrows raised. “In mine, too.”

Marcus chuckled as he neared the rear of the back garden.

“Though I must say, your concern baffles me. You nearly—”

Marcus held up his hand to stop her speech. He closed his eyes for a moment, annoyance plain on his chiseled features. “If you’re planning to bemoan the incident between us over two centuries ago, I shall stop you.”

“Incident?” Cate exclaimed.

“I have explained that I meant you no harm.” He narrowed his eyes at her and offered her that smile that bordered on a smirk. “Besides, I have already told you, I quite like you, Catherine.” He allowed the statement to marinate in her mind for a moment before he added, “Now, are you ready?”

Cate nodded and swallowed hard.

Marcus made a quarter-turn away from her, stretching his hands in front of him. Cate eyed the area, detecting nothing amiss.

She side-eyed the man next to her. His jaw tensed as his eyebrows pinched together. She opened her mouth to ask a question when a slight breeze tickled the nape of her neck.

Cate whipped her head in the direction of the breeze, noting the leaves on the tree only meters away did not move. She twisted her head to face forward, and her jaw dropped open. Her eyes widened and her forehead wrinkled. She swallowed hard as she stared ahead of her.

A dull sparkle shimmered in front of them. Cate blinked a few times, wondering if her vision was deceiving her.

After another moment, the shimmering sparkle darkened. A black hole emerged, obscuring the scenery behind it. The winds picked up. Cate's skirt blew wildly. She firmed her legs against the gales that whipped around them.

The ominous black hole grew larger and larger until it eclipsed most of the space visible in front of them. Cate's breath turned ragged and her pulse quickened. She glanced at Marcus then returned her gaze to the growing hole.

"The portal is open! Go, Catherine!" Marcus shouted over the din.

Cate swallowed hard, her eyes wide with fear as she faced the blackness in front of her. She licked her lips and stepped forward. She reached her hand into the dark hole, her heart pounding in her ears as her hand disappeared.

CHAPTER 6

Her lower lip trembled as she stepped into the darkness. She continued ahead, blind to her surroundings. Marcus's words echoed in her mind as she continued to inch forward. She squeezed her lips together, hoping she would not become stuck in this desolate hole between times.

Within seconds, warmth touched her face. Still blind, she blinked her eyes, trying to acclimate to her new surroundings. She blew out a sharp breath as she realized sunlight blinded her rather than darkness.

Cate sucked in another breath, spinning to take in her new surroundings. She stood mere feet from where she'd been moments ago. Slightly behind her on her right, the intelligence tent sat nestled in the shadow of the castle.

Cate bit her lower lip. Her heart continued to race as stood alone in another era. A momentary panic caused her stomach to somersault. What if she was here alone? Would she be stuck?

Cate pulled the timepiece from under her dress. She squeezed it in her palm and closed her eyes as she clutched it. She could use this to return. She opened her eyes and snapped open the face.

Her heart sank and her hands trembled as she stared at the normally ticking timepiece. She hadn't passed through a time rip. Could she still use the watch to return? What if she couldn't?

As her mind spun through possibilities, a rogue gust of wind ruffled her skirt. A second later, Marcus Northcott stood next to her. He straightened his jacket as he glanced around, his gaze settled on Cate.

“Hello, Catherine. I see you made it, safe and sound. How fortuitous. I trust you are all right?”

Cate nodded at him. “Yes.” She glanced down at the timepiece still clutched in her hand. “My watch hasn’t slowed.”

“I am unsurprised. You did not use it to trigger a time portal. It remains in its normal state.”

Cate’s brows knit and she stared down at it for a moment before she slipped it under her dress.

“Are you quite sure you are all right, Catherine? Are you suffering from some symptom of the temporalysis?”

“No,” Cate confirmed. “I had a momentary panic about being stuck here. Alone.”

Marcus’s eyebrows rose toward his hairline. “I will not abandon you, my dear. Now, come along, we have much work to do.”

He took her hand, wrapping her arm around his and leading her toward the castle.

“I don’t seem to suffer from any temporalysis symptoms when I time travel. Is there a reason for that?”

“At the start, time travel should appear to alleviate the situation.”

“But?” Cate prodded.

He offered an amused glance at her. “You are quite clever. The time travel only appears to alleviate it. If you do not improve, you will eventually begin to suffer from symptoms even during time travel excursions.”

“So, I may lose consciousness and wander around in another time period.”

“I shall ensure your safety, Catherine.”

“I don’t see how,” Cate argued. “There is nothing you can do to alleviate the symptoms outside of the dragon’s blood and that merely masks the symptoms, but does nothing to cure me.”

“You are strong. You shall prevail. I have no doubt.”

Cate stared up at him as they walked, his response baffling her again. Before Cate could answer his latest comments, a voice sounded behind them.

“Oi, who are you?”

Cate’s heart leapt into her throat. She recognized the child’s voice. Her shoulders sagged and she bit her lower lip as both she and Marcus spun to face him.

She plastered a warm smile on her face and offered the child a wave. "Hi, Stanley. Remember me? Cate."

"Aye, I remember you, lassie." The five-year-old poked a finger in Marcus's direction. "I meant him."

Marcus hiked his eyebrows high as he stared down his nose at the small child. Cate's heart raced. What would he do to the little boy? She swallowed hard. Perhaps Jack's fate would be permanently altered by his grandfather's poor decision to confront Marcus Northcott in 1942.

She licked her lips as she attempted to circumvent what she was certain would be a tragedy. Breathless, she slid her hand around Marcus's elbow as she attempted to stop him from replying.

"Hasn't anyone ever told you children should not speak that way to adults?" Marcus questioned.

Cate held her breath as the conversation unfolded.

"Aye, my Da does all the time. Never stopped me before."

"I see," Marcus said. "Well, perhaps you should consider listening to your father."

Stanley narrowed his eyes at the tall man standing in front of him. "Still never answered the question, did you?"

"My companion has already answered."

"Nay, she reminded me of who she was. But I remember the wee lassie from the last time we met. She was with her husband then. Big strapping Scot. Certainly not you."

Marcus's eyebrows lifted further at the boy's forwardness. "You are incorrect. Catherine was with a man pretending to be her husband."

"Pretending, is it? What for?"

"Did they not inquire after the intelligence tent?"

"Aye." The child nodded, his face scrunching in thought. "Ohhh, spies. Pretending to be married."

"Correct. Not married, just pretending."

Cate flicked her gaze from Marcus to Stanley, trying to assess the child's reaction to the conversation.

"So, what does that make you? Another fake husband?"

"No," Marcus answered. "That makes me her real husband."

Cate tightened her grip on Marcus's arm as her knees wobbled at his lie.

The child's eyebrows shot up. "Ohhh, lucky you, fellow. She's a pretty lassie."

Color rushed into Cate's cheeks. "Thank you, Stanley. We really should be going."

"Right. I should be off, too. Take care, Mr.—" Young Stanley scratched his head. "Say, I never caught your name."

Marcus straightened. "Duke Marcus Northcott."

"Duke, is it?"

"Correct. And you'd do well to remember it, young man."

"Well, then, Your Grace," Stanley said with a bow, "have a pleasant day."

Marcus's lips turned up in a slight smile. "You didn't think 'the lassie' as you call her would marry a lowly Scot, did you? Good day."

He spun on his heel and led Cate away. She glanced back at the boy still standing on the path before focusing on Marcus.

"Why did you tell him that?" Cate inquired.

"It is the truth."

"It is not! We're not married!"

"You aren't married to Mack either, yet you informed the child you were."

"Jack," Cate corrected. "His name is Jack. And—" Cate squeezed her eyes closed for a moment and shook her head. "Never mind. You've made a fine mess of things. He'll now tell his father that Jack and I are not married. And Lachlan thinks we are!"

"Who?"

"His father, Jack's great-grandfather. That little boy was Jack's grandfather, Stanley Reid."

Marcus let his head fall back as his eyes studied the blue sky. "Ah, that explains so very much."

"What does that mean?"

"His rude and impetuous manner. Like grandfather, like grandson."

"Well, that's the pot calling the kettle black!" Cate exclaimed. "You insulted his own grandson when you told him I'd never marry a lowly Scot."

Marcus shrugged his shoulders. "The child will survive, Catherine. And you deserve far better than a gardener."

“He’s not—” Cate cut off her own words with a flap of her hand. “Never mind. Let’s just do what we have to do and get back.”

“The task will be far easier if you are Mrs. Marcus Northcott.”

“Because it suits your ego?”

“Because no door is closed to Marcus Northcott. And as my wife, no door will be closed to you, either. Simply put, the subterfuge will allow us easier access to investigate.”

“Fine. I just wish you would clue me in on these things before they happen. Now Lachlan will think I’m a bigamist.”

“He will simply think the child was mistaken. You worry far too much, Catherine.”

“Where are we going?” Cate inquired as they approached the castle.

“Inside.”

Cate’s jaw dropped open and she stopped walking. “No! We can’t! What if we get caught?”

“We will not be caught,” Marcus huffed with a roll of his eyes. “And besides, do the MacKenzies not know you? Surely they will not question you wandering the castle.”

“They may question who you are. And I am not telling them you’re my real husband.”

“I am certain you will find the appropriate words to explain my presence if they are needed. Now, come along.”

Cate stared up at the castle rising in front of her. She’d never experienced such trepidation entering Dunhaven Castle as she did at this moment. Even in her first moments at the castle, she’d felt peace. Now, her heart pounded against her ribs and her knees wobbled, threatening to buckle.

She swallowed hard as Marcus led her toward the sprawling structure. They slipped in through the front door.

“Where did you usually see Gianna?”

“We only saw her at dinner or in the intelligence tent.”

“Where else may she be if she involved herself in the events that occurred here?”

“West wing.”

Marcus nodded and motioned for Cate to lead the way. They threaded through the halls and into the unused wing. Cate’s heels clicked off the marble floor. “She often met people in the large hall where I found the—” Cate licked her lips and flicked her gaze to Marcus. “Never mind.”

They wandered through the hallways to the golden doors leading to the massive hall. Cate eased the door open and peered in. She swung the door wide. “Empty.”

Cate strode into the room, her footsteps echoing off the walls. She glanced around on the floor as Marcus closed the doors behind them. Her brow furrowed.

“What is it?” Marcus questioned.

“The note. The one that leads us to the folly to witness the murder. It’s not here. Where is it? It should be here!”

“Does not the murder occur on the twenty-first of September?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod.

“I have returned us to the twentieth of September.”

Cate’s eyes went wide. “The twentieth? Why would you do that? Rita won’t disappear until at least tomorrow!”

“Simple. We must collect as much information as we can.”

Cate huffed and pressed her hand to her forehead. Her face pinched with worry.

Marcus stalked toward her, circling her as he spoke. “Never fear, Catherine, we shall keep to the shadows.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped. “That’s not what I—oh, never mind.”

Cate spun away from him as he faced her. She focused on the wall where she’d stumbled upon the hidden music box room.

“Something of interest, Catherine?”

Cate’s forehead crinkled. She squeezed her lips together. Her body felt as though it was falling through thick air. She blinked hard, trying to keep her focus.

“Catherine?” Marcus’s voice called to her.

Images floated through her mind, flicking past quickly like a montage in a movie. A blue dress. The sapphire necklace. The piano-shaped music box. A rose. A mirrored hall. A large ballroom. A crowd of people. All eyes on her. She curtsied then stared up at her dance partner. Marcus Northcott.

Cate doubled over, clutching her head. “Blue dress. The ball. I have to find my dress. I have to—”

Marcus wrapped his arm around Cate as she folded at the hips.

“Easy, Catherine. You are not going to a ball. We are in 1942.”

“Blue dress,” Cate gasped.

Marcus tugged her upright, cupping her face in his hands. “No, Catherine. There is no ball now. You are in 1942. You must focus. Focus, Catherine.”

Cate blinked and focused on his face. “Are we late for the ball?” she asked him.

“No. Do you have the dragon’s blood with you?”

Cate sucked in deep breaths as she considered the question. Tears formed in her eyes, and she fought to piece together her surroundings. “I—“

Her gaze darted around, and she gulped in breaths. After a moment, her eyelids fluttered, and she grasped at the hand on her cheek. She squeezed her eyes closed and drew in a deep breath. A musky, sweet scent filled her nostrils as the world around her faded.

CHAPTER 7

She opened her eyes and focused on the man in front of her. For a moment, she expected to see Jack's face. She swallowed hard as she recognized Marcus Northcott.

She dropped her grip on his hand as a tear fell to her cheek.

He arched an eyebrow at her. "Catherine? Can you tell me the year?"

"1942," she whispered with a snuffle. She pulled away from his grip. "I'm fine."

Cate pursed her lips and wiped at the wayward tear. A handkerchief floated in front of her face. She side-eyed Marcus, who held it out toward her. A vision of the last time he'd offered her one darted through her mind.

She snatched it from between his fingers and dried her cheek.

"You had another episode," Marcus noted.

Cate remained silent, chewing on her lower lip.

"Do you have the dragon's blood with you?"

Cate blew out a shaky breath and nodded. She pulled the sachet from her pocket.

"Take one now," Marcus directed. "Then you must rest."

"I've never had one while time traveling before."

"You are worsening."

Cate winced as she popped the bitter lozenge into her mouth and pocketed the remaining few drops. A shiver ran through her body as the first bitter globule dripped down her throat.

"You must rest."

“I’m fine,” Cate contended.

“Come along, Catherine.” He extended his hand to her.

Cate ignored it. “I said I’m fine.”

He cocked his head at her. “And I said you must rest. You are worsening.”

Cate’s nose burned as tears welled in her eyes. She flicked her blurry gaze toward Marcus. “Am I dying?”

“I sincerely hope to avoid that situation,” Marcus answered.

“But I’m getting worse. I’m having episodes while time traveling. And I’m using the dragon’s blood.”

“That does not mean you will die.”

“It can be fatal, though, right?”

“It can be.”

Another tear spilled onto her cheek, and she flicked it away. “And does the severity of symptoms indicate outcome?”

Marcus frowned. “Catherine—“

“Do they?” she insisted.

He huffed. “It is often the case that more severe cases are more likely to be fatal, yes.”

Cate pursed her lips as she nodded, turning her gaze from him.

“That does not mean it will be fatal. There have been very severe cases where the sufferer has survived.”

“How?”

“Little is known about why some survive, and others do not.”

Cate sucked in a deep breath and blew it out.

“Catherine,” Marcus said, tilting her chin to face him, “you must fight through this. And to do that, you must rest.”

Cate stared into his deep brown eyes. She tore her gaze away after a few seconds. “No, what I must do is find Jack before it’s too late for both of us.”

“Even if you die trying?”

“Yes. I have to save him. There’s no sense in both of us dying.”

“There is nothing more to do here now. Let’s—“

“No!” Cate shouted. The outburst forced tears onto her cheeks. She pressed a hand to her forehead before flailing it in the air. “We have to stay and look for clues. Anything. Jack’s here with me. We could find him. Warn him. We—“

“Catherine,” Marcus said, grasping her thrashing arm, his voice even and measured.

“No,” she said as she struggled against his grip.

His grasp on her tightened. “Catherine. We will find him. But there is nothing to do here now. Come along.”

Cate sniffled as she stared at him. Her chest heaved with the effort to breathe as she struggled to contain her emotions. Her knees still wobbled from her temporalysis attack. Her muscles relaxed and she ceased to struggle.

She squeezed her sore eyes closed as a final tear rolled down her cheek. Marcus wiped it away with his thumb.

“We will find him.”

Cate glanced up at him and nodded. She allowed him to lead her from the large space into the hallway. They strode down the hall until noise sounded around the corner. Marcus tugged Cate toward another room across the hall. They slipped inside, leaving the door open a crack to view the hallway.

A moment later, a blonde woman strode past and slipped into the hall they’d occupied moments ago. With her hair pulled back into a low bun and wearing a black dress, Cate recognized Ruth Harper, undercover British spy.

“That’s Ruth,” Cate whispered to Marcus. “She’s a spy for the Crown. She’s undercover as a German spy. If I’m not mistaken, she’s meeting Victor Richard or Victor Richter, his real name.”

“With a name like that, no wonder he changed it,” Marcus said as a man strode past and slipped into the grand hall.

Cate almost chuckled at the attempt at humor. “They’re meeting because Ruth is ferreting out the spy and ensuring the appropriate intelligence information gets to Bletchley Park.”

“And this is the man Gianna kills?”

Cate nodded as she peered through the crack. “Yes. She kills him and has him buried in the side garden. However, in the original set of events, Ruth was buried in the garden. But in this timeline, Ruth survives a gunshot rather than dying by blunt force trauma to the head.”

Marcus nodded at the comment.

“If I’m not mistaken—” Cate said, pressing her cheek against the door to peer further into the hall.

The appearance of two other individuals creeping down the hall interrupted her speech. She swallowed hard and her knees wobbled.

Marcus grabbed her elbow. "Are you quite all right?"

Cate straightened, her muscles stiffening. She nodded. "It's just weird."

She forced a smile onto her face and peeked into the hall again. The couple stood at the doors to the grand hall, peering through the small opening in the doors.

Marcus glanced at her, then flicked his gaze across the hall. "I usually find running into another iteration of myself rather exhilarating."

Cate stared at a former version of herself. "That's not exactly the word I'd use."

Her former self's jaw unhinged, and she glanced up at Jack, mouthing some words. Her lip quivered as she eyed the former version of Jack. So close to her, yet somehow so far away.

She straightened again. "I still don't understand why we can't intervene now."

Marcus arched an eyebrow. "A wonderful idea if you prefer a temporary solution."

Cate's brow furrowed as she considered his meaning.

"Even if we approached him now, Gianna could still take him at the exact moment she did. He would return with the other you to your time several days ago."

Cate squashed her lips together before lifting her eyebrows and snapping her fingers. "We'll grab him and take him with us to the day after he disappeared and then he'd be back."

"But no longer available to travel back with you to witness the murder of Victor—"

Cate's head lolled to the side as realization dawned on her. "And we'd never take the message to Bletchley Park, which could seriously alter the course of history. Further than it already has been by the incorrect murder."

"We should disrupt as little as possible."

"But we've already disrupted history. Would it matter if we did it again?"

"In this case, the answer is most likely yes. Not only would your little escapade be erased, along with another key piece of history potentially, but it also muddles timeline. We're bringing the wrong man forward. The Scot that is a match to your time is not that man.” Marcus pointed a finger toward the former Jack.

Cate worked through the difficult concept in her mind. “I understand. It would be like switching me with that me. She’d go forward to my point in time with no knowledge of the past few days.”

“Correct. And therefore, she would essentially be time traveling to the future.”

“Which could be a disaster.”

Marcus nodded. “It also leaves the current version of Jack trapped with The Agency. It does nothing to alter that situation.”

Cate returned her attention to the ongoing in the hallway. “He’s just so close,” she murmured as the former versions of her and Jack hurried back down the hall, slipping into the music room at the end of the hall. Moments later Ruth stormed down the hall followed by Victor.

Marcus flicked his gaze to Cate. She held up a single finger, signaling him to wait, then pointed toward the music room.

A few moments later, the door popped open as Jack and Cate burst into the hall. Cate babbled on about their latest findings as they disappeared down the hall.

The current version of Cate stared after them with a frown.

“We will find him, Catherine,” Marcus said. “The right him.”

She flicked her gaze to him, staring into his deep brown eyes, and nodded. She forced a momentary smile onto her lips and pulled the doors open.

“You know, I really am feeling fine now. We could—“

“We shall do nothing of the sort. You’ve experienced quite an episode with the temporalysis. On top of that, you’ve experienced a shock. Encountering a former or future version of yourself can be startling,” Marcus said as they strode down the hall.

“Didn’t you say exhilarating?”

Marcus offered her a coy smirk. “You seemed rather rattled.”

“You must admit it is very odd.”

“Sometimes you amuse me, Catherine.”

Cate flicked her eyes up to him. “I’m glad I can be of assistance on that front.”

Marcus pushed through a door, and they spilled into a side garden. “Come along. Let us get you to a place where you may rest.”

Marcus led her from the estate to the outskirts of town. Her heart skipped a beat as she stared at the two-story house they approached.

Cate ceased walking, her jaw set. "You're kidding!"

Marcus twisted to face her and offered her a questioning look.

Cate waved her hand at the house ahead of them. "That's the same house you took me to the last time."

"I fail to see the significance."

"You kidnapped me, imprisoned me in that house," Cate said, jabbing her finger at the home, "and then almost killed me."

Marcus stalked several steps back to her and took a firm hold of Cate's arm. "Really, Catherine, you must get over that. It's ancient history."

"It's not!" Cate argued as he dragged her along.

"The incident in question occurred hundreds of years ago. And I do not intend to imprison you this time!"

"Thank goodness for small mercies," Cate said as Marcus pushed open the front door.

Cate stepped into the foyer, her heels echoing off the wood-paneled walls and hardwood floor. Silence coursed through the empty home. Cate's pulse quickened as her eyes scanned the space. She swallowed the lump forming in her throat as her gaze raised up the staircase hidden behind the wooden railing.

Her former prison lay at the top of those stairs. She recalled the sparsely furnished room. The locked door. Crying into her pillow as she wondered if she'd ever see Jack again and if she'd ever return to her own time.

Marcus pushed the door shut, dimming the space as he blocked out the sun. "You should lie down."

Cate took a step toward the sitting room.

"You'd be more comfortable upstairs, wouldn't you?"

"I don't want to be in that room again."

Marcus arched an eyebrow. "Fine."

She continued into the sitting room. The fireplace stood against the adjacent wall, cold and dark. She recalled sitting near the warmth of it in 1792. This was the last room she'd seen before she'd awoken in the stone coffin.

Cate shut her eyes for a moment and shoved the memories from her mind before she crossed to the armchair she'd read in over a century ago.

She collapsed into the seat with a sigh. Her head thudded against the chair's high back.

She pursed her lips as she stared into space. Images of what she'd just witnessed danced through her mind. She let her eyelids slide closed as she pulled the images of Jack into her mind. She recalled the moments when they'd been sorting out the spy situation.

Days ago, they'd been happy, working together to solve a mystery. Now, she stood in almost the same place with a completely different man, solving another mystery. The odd trick of time that allowed her to see Jack and the former version of herself made the situation even worse.

Her heart ached as she considered how close they were, yet how far. Her eyelids slowly opened as the emotion of the moment threatened to overwhelm her. She jumped in her seat, startled to find Marcus Northcott hovering over her. He held a saucer and teacup in his hand. Steaming tan liquid filled it.

Without a word, Cate straightened in her chair and accepted the beverage.

She sipped the creamy tea. The warm liquid slid down her throat, clearing her taste buds of any of the remaining bitter dragon's blood.

"Thank you," she said just above a whisper.

"There are biscuits on the table," Marcus answered as he eased into the chair across from her.

Cate side-eyed the plate of cookies. "I'm not hungry."

"You should eat, Catherine."

The memory of the last encounter with tea and cookies flitted through her mind. She recalled Dembe offering her the small snack. She had refused it. Duke Northcott had insisted she eat it, offering her one of the cookies. She'd knocked it from his hand in a desperate attempt at defiance.

In the end, she'd eaten those cookies and drank that tea. She eyed the plate, pulling one of the wafers from it and nibbling on the corner.

Across the room, Marcus turned his attention to the book in his lap, satisfied with her choice. She finished the cookies and slid the empty teacup and saucer onto the table next to the plate.

"How do you feel?" Marcus questioned as she inched the teacup to the middle of the table.

"Much better," she said with a slight smile.

"Good." He returned to his reading.

“I’m actually feeling quite well,” she said. “Perhaps we should return to the castle and—“

Marcus closed the book around his finger. “Rest, Catherine. You must rest.”

Cate slumped in the chair, letting her head fall against the back. She stared into the blackened interior of the fireplace.

“Are you cold?” Marcus inquired, noting her gaze.

She flicked her gaze to him and shook her head. “No. Just antsy. I’ll never be able to sleep.”

“Try, Catherine.”

Cate sighed and let her eyes slide shut. After a few moments, she popped them open and thrashed her head. “It’s no use. I can’t rest.”

She leaned forward in the chair, clasping her hands over her knees. Her legs jiggled under them. “I’m just going to—“

“No, you are not,” Marcus said before she could finish the statement.

She stared at him. “Am I a prisoner here?”

He held her gaze. “Of course not.”

“Then why can’t I leave?”

“Because it would be extremely foolish for you to do so. If anything should happen to you, which is likely given your condition, we’d have to cease our current investigation to locate you. You do not want us distracted from the search for what’s-his-name, do you?”

Cate’s shoulders slumped and she sighed. “No. I don’t want us distracted from searching for Jack.”

“Then I suggest you stay here and rest.”

“Will resting really solve anything, though?”

“At the very least, it will not hurt. Your mind is jumbled. Allowing it to relax may not cure you, but it can alleviate your symptoms.”

Cate threw herself back in her chair with a sullen expression. “Fine.”

“Do not pout, Catherine.”

“I am not pouting,” she claimed. “I’m merely frustrated with myself. How can we gain any information when I’m losing my mind.”

“You are not losing your mind. We shall make more progress. After you have rested.” Marcus returned to his book, leaving Cate to return her gaze to the empty fireplace.

Her mind buzzed with worry and upset. On the opposite end of the spectrum, her body oozed with exhaustion. Her limbs felt heavy. She ached all over. With a wiggle of her shoulders, she slouched down in the chair. Her eyelids became heavy, and she let them slide closed.

* * *

Cate awoke with a start. She glanced around the darkened space, not recognizing it. She spun, trying to find something familiar in the darkness. She squinted into the blackness around her. Lumps formed at the edges of the space as her eyes adjusted to the dim light.

Cate stumbled toward one. Something moved in front of her. She froze, her eyes desperately trying to make out what it was.

“Hello?” she called. Her voice echoed in the massive space.

Cate spun as she tried to find something familiar. Thick fabric twisted around her legs. She glanced down, running her hand over her abdomen. Her fingers swept across silky fabric. Her expression turned pensive as she wondered what she was wearing.

Pale, white moonlight glowed through a window at the far end of the space. The small amount of light appeared far away.

Cate sucked in a sharp breath, wrapping her arms around her midriff as she took a tentative step forward.

“Hello?” she said again.

She took another step forward toward the light before she glanced back over her shoulder. Her lower lip quivered as a chill raced up her spine. She shivered and rubbed at her bare arms.

With her lips pressed together, she stumbled forward toward the white glow. As she approached, movement caught her eye. Her breath caught in her throat as she snapped her gaze toward it.

Cate blew out a long breath as she identified the source of the movement. Her reflection stared back at her from the mirrored walls. As the alarm passed and her heart rate returned to normal, she studied herself.

Curled tendrils framed her pale face, the rest of her hair swept up into an elaborate style. Her sapphire blue dress skimmed over her body and trailed down to the floor. Her eyes lowered, focusing on the ostentatious sapphire necklace around her neck. She grasped at it, pinching the main stone between her thumb and forefinger.

“Where am I?” she whispered.

Music floated toward her. She snapped her head in its direction.

“Hello?”

Cate wandered toward the sound, passing by the moonlit window. Its white glow painted the marble floor below her. She turned the corner and the sound of the music intensified.

“The ball,” Cate breathed as she lifted her skirt to hurry toward it.

She ran toward a lit hallway, stumbling over something in her flight. She lost her balance and spilled to the hard floor, sprawling across the icy cold surface.

Something rubbed against her leg. Instinctively, she thrashed it as she tried to recover her footing.

Her vision clouded as she planted her hands against the floor and pushed. “Oh, no,” she lamented, squeezing her eyes shut.

Her mind blurred, images distorting. She slumped back to the ground below her and clutched at her forehead. Her temples throbbed.

“Not now.”

A sensation slithered up her leg again. She struggled to crawl forward as blinding visions shot across her mind faster than she could process them.

She moaned aloud as she labored to move forward and work through the pounding pain in her head.

She kicked her leg behind her to move herself. A blinding pain radiated from her ankle to further up her leg. She screamed as a burning sting paralyzed her.

Tears fell onto her cheeks as she gasped in agony, rolling onto her back and writhing on the floor. She lifted her chin, trying to identify the source of her injury.

Her eyes widened and a scream left her throat.

CHAPTER 8

Eate startled awake, gasping for breath as she stiffened in her chair, her eyes shooting open. She sucked in deep breaths as she glanced around, trying to place herself. After a moment, her breathing slowed, and her heart rate stabilized. She released her white-knuckled grip on the thickly padded arms and slumped back in the chair. Her head thudded against the wing as she let it loll.

She had awoken before she'd fully processed what had happened to her. Where had she been in her dream? And what had attacked her? She'd had the sense something had hurt her, but she hadn't identified it.

More nightmares, she reflected as she squeezed her eyes closed. Would these ever end? After the nightmares warning her about Marcus, she'd suffered from nightmares about her experience with him. Then the sleepwalking started. And now she was back to frightening dreams.

She popped her eyes open and glanced around. Her fingers grazed a blanket draped across her lower half. She arched an eyebrow at it. Marcus must have covered her after she fell asleep.

Her eyes scanned the room. Where was he?

She glanced out of the window. Stars twinkled in the dark sky. How long had she slept? She glanced to the clock on the mantle. Its hands pointed to just after one in the morning.

Her stomach rumbled. She had been more exhausted by the temporalysis episode than she'd realized. She'd slept through dinner and well into the night. Her last meal had been only tea and cookies.

Cate glanced to the table next to her, finding it empty of the teacup and saucer that had sat there when she'd dozed off. A note replaced it, her name scrawled across the tented paper.

She snatched the object from the table and flicked it open.

Catherine - I have gone to gather more information on our mutual friend. If you should awaken before my return, there is food in the kitchen.

Marcus

Her stomach grumbled again at the prospect of a meal. As she pushed the blanket back, her nose wrinkled at the idea of Marcus Northcott covering her sleeping form. It sent a shiver down her spine.

She stood and stretched before wandering from the room and down the long hallway leading away from the front door. In the darkness, she ran her hand against the wall to guide her. Her fingers bumped into a door casing and she grabbed hold of it, twisting to face the darkened room. Her fingers groped around on the wall inside, searching for a light switch.

She found one and flicked it on. Light flooded the room from a central chandelier. Under it, a well-polished, but bare dining room table. Cate stared at it, recalling her last encounter in the room while dining with Marcus.

Then her enemy, she'd spent the night on edge, wondering if she'd ever see her home again. Now they were allies. She recalled his words at one of their meals.

"In different circumstances, we may have made fantastic allies," he had said with a smirk.

Cate recalled her response. "I cannot imagine ever aligning with you."

He retorted, "Never limit your options, Catherine. Life can offer us strange circumstances in which we must accept what we thought we wouldn't."

Cate bit her lower lip as the accuracy of the statement punched her in the gut. She flipped off the light switch and left the room before the weight of Jack's disappearance sent her reeling again. She continued down the dark hallway and through an open doorway.

After a bit of fumbling, her fingers hit a light switch and she flicked it on. Bright light bloomed from the ceiling, revealing a kitchen. Bread sat on the counter. Cate tugged open the refrigerator, finding cheese inside.

She removed the plate and shuffled across the room, plopping onto the kitchen chair. After slicing the bread, she tore a slice apart, popping one piece into her mouth. Her rumbling stomach appreciated the meager meal.

As she bit into a chunk of cheese, the front door creaked open. Cate leaned back in her chair to glance down the hall. Darkness met her gaze as the door slammed shut. Footsteps approached but Cate could make out no details. She rose from the chair, her eyes darting around for a weapon in case the visitor was unwelcome.

Before she could find anything suitable, Marcus Northcott popped from the darkness into the well-lit kitchen.

He glanced at the half-empty plate on the table. "Hello, Catherine. I see you are awake and found the food." He flicked his gaze to her. "How are you feeling?"

"Fine," she answered before consuming the final bite of her cheese.

He offered her a fleeting smile as he studied her features for signs of an untruth.

"You should have woken me. I would have liked to have gone with you. I may have been able to help."

The smile spread on his features again. "You were asleep and needed your rest. There was no reason for you to gallivant around in the wee hours of the morning on the off chance that Gianna revealed something that may help."

"Did she?"

Marcus grabbed a piece of cheese from the plate. "Very little, but still a small tidbit that points us in a direction. A rather vague one, but, nonetheless, a direction."

Cate straightened, her eyes widening. "What direction? Did she say where they are keeping Jack? Or when they're going to get him?"

He shook his head. "Nothing that definite. From the conversation I caught a portion of, it seems as though she is going forward in time after she finishes her work here."

"Forward to get Jack?"

He shrugged as he took a bite of the cheese. "She did not say."

Cate's shoulders slumped and she fluttered her eyelashes in frustration. "That's not helpful at all." She sank into the chair and grabbed another slice of bread, ripping it apart and shoving a piece into her mouth.

"I told you it was vague," Marcus said behind her.

"That's less than vague. That's... that's dubious at best. It's not even dubious, it's pointless!" Cate flung her hand in the air before she set her elbow on the table. Her head fell into her palm, writhing back and forth.

A hand clamped on her shoulder and gave it a gentle squeeze. "It gives us some direction. We shall seek more information tomorrow."

Cate felt warmth next to her ear. She slid her eyes sideways, finding Marcus's face next to hers. "We'll find him, Catherine."

She pursed her lips, trying to find comfort in his words. She struggled to believe the man who had haunted her nightmares for months, put her in a stone coffin and left her to die, and sent her an enchanted object for some unknown reason.

The circumstances prevented her from latching on to those words and putting faith in them. She sighed as he lifted his hand and eased into the chair next to her.

He studied her face as she stared at the grain on the wooden table. Her finger absentmindedly traced the dark lines.

"You appear as though you do not believe me."

Cate flicked her gaze to his eyes. Those dark eyes bore into hers. She struggled to form words to respond to his statement.

He raised his eyebrows at her as her lower lip bobbed up and down. "Do not fear, Catherine, I shall earn your trust." He stood from the table. "Now, you should go back to sleep. We have a long day ahead of us."

* * *

The sun blared through the small window, lighting the barren room with its orange light. Cate opened her eyes, squinting against it. She flung her arm over her eyes and sighed.

After a moment, she slowly pulled it away, her eyes scanning the small room. She bolted upright, pushed away the blanket covering her, and swung her legs over the bed.

She recognized the space. A small bedroom with a single window at the foot of the bed. A tiny nightstand sat next to the bed and a small wooden dresser stood across the room, next to a door.

Cate stared at that door. A lump formed in her throat and her heart thudded in her chest. Her lower lip quivered as she slowly rose. She squeezed her lips together as she tried to firm her muscles to stop her knees from wobbling.

The last time she'd been in this room, she'd been a captive. Kidnapped by Marcus Northcott and kept here until he dumped her in a stone coffin.

Hours ago, she'd fallen asleep after her early morning snack of cheese and bread in the armchair in the sitting room. She had refused to go to the bedroom even at Marcus's urging. She insisted she'd sleep in the chair, not wanting to return to this room and the last memories of it.

How had she gotten here? Her brain answered the question with a response she preferred not to accept. Marcus Northcott had carried her here and laid her in bed, covered her with a blanket, and left her to sleep. The idea gave her chills.

She rose and approached the door. Trembling fingers reached for the doorknob. The icy cold brass touched her hand as she grasped it. With a deep inhale, she twisted it. The door swung open easily.

She closed her eyes and breathed a sigh of relief. With straightened posture, she stepped into the hallway and peered down the stairs to the foyer below. Quietness reigned. Her throat went dry. She swallowed and took a step toward the stairs. She hovered at the top before she sneaked down them.

As she reached the bottom, she stared at the door catty-corner from her. Her eyes searched the sitting room to her left. Empty. She could run. The timepiece could return her to her time.

Panic washed over her, and she stumbled down the final step and surged toward the door.

"Good morning, Catherine," a voice said behind her.

Cate froze, her muscles stiffening. She twisted slowly, finding Marcus Northcott striding down the hall behind her.

"Did you sleep well?"

She stared at him for a moment. "Yes. Why did you move me to the bedroom?"

"I thought you'd rest more comfortably there."

She nodded in response.

He closed the gap between them. "And did you?"

"Did I what?"

"Sleep comfortably."

He studied her, his dark eyes boring into hers.

"Yes, I did."

He offered her a slight smile as he smoothed a wayward lock of hair behind her ear. "Good. You needed your rest. You should eat breakfast. We have a long day ahead." He spun on his heel and stalked toward the kitchen.

Cate stared after him. Her fingers reached for the lock of hair he'd touched, lingering on it for a moment.

"Are you coming?" he called over his shoulder.

Cate forced herself to walk forward. She stepped into the kitchen to find a full English breakfast prepared. Her eyebrows lifted as she sank into the chair.

"You cook?"

He set a plate in front of her before settling into the chair next to her. "Of course, Catherine. I don't always have access to Dembe or Stefano to tend to my meals."

"You are a man of many surprises," she admitted as she picked up her fork.

He gave her another smile-smirk as he chewed his eggs. Cate pushed her eggs around on her plate before she bit into them.

"Did you believe me to be backward enough to expect you to cook because you are a woman?"

Cate swallowed the forkful of eggs, surprised at the taste. "You would have been sorely disappointed by that."

"You would have refused?"

Cate stabbed at a mushroom and a piece of egg white as she shook her head. "I'm not a very good cook."

"I cannot imagine you being terrible at many things."

"Thankfully, you did not have to find out the hard way," Cate said with a chuckle. "For both our sakes."

She fidgeted in her seat as she raised her eyes to find him staring at her. "You are a very intriguing woman, Catherine."

She lowered her eyes to her plate as she collected another forkful of food. "I'm not really. I told you that before."

“You are a time-traveling Countess who has spent time in multiple eras. That alone is intriguing.”

“Not to someone like you.”

Marcus cut his sausage into pieces. “Someone like me?”

“You seem to have a very unique set of abilities that extend far beyond the occasional time-travel trip. And you’ve lived for centuries. Through all the eras I’ve traveled to. That must be interesting.”

“The passage of time when one is immortal can be very boring, actually.”

“Lonely, I would imagine.”

He narrowed his eyes at her as he chewed.

“Most people are born, age, and die. It’s painful for those around them, but we all have our time. In your case, though, only your fellow immortals move through life with you. Everyone else dies around you. But you live on. There’s no end. No change. The world lives and dies, but you do not.”

“And you would find this life lonely?”

She flicked her gaze to him, holding his stare. “I imagine it would be difficult to experience the deaths of friends and loved ones for centuries on end.”

“There are other immortals though. Would you not find comfort with them?”

“Have you?”

The corner of his mouth turned up. “I do not seek their comfort, my dear. I do not require it.”

She poked around at her food before changing the subject. “What is the plan today?”

“You said you saw Rita with two men when she murdered Victor, correct?”

Cate polished off the last of her toast and nodded. “Yes, that’s right.”

“I did not manage to locate them last evening. I imagine they will arrive today. We shall go to Dunhaven and hope to find them. Any details we may glean will prove helpful.”

Cate nodded as she wiped her mouth with a napkin before lifting her plate from the table and taking it to the sink.

“And if we can’t learn anything from them?”

“We shall follow them after they dispose of Victor. If my assumption proves correct, and it usually does, Gianna will not remain here for long.”

Cate ran water over the plate before scrubbing it. “Why was she here in the first place?”

Marcus joined her, setting his plate in the sink. “Because you were.”

She flicked her gaze to him, her washing slowing to a crawl as she processed the statement.

“She was laying the groundwork for the abduction.”

Cate’s face pinched and her shoulders slumped. She busied herself rinsing the plate. “We played right into her hands.”

“Do not trouble yourself over it, Catherine. No matter what you had done, she would have set the events in action.”

Cate rubbed the dishrag against Marcus’s plate. “Jack warned me about time-traveling and changing things. We shouldn’t have done it.”

“It had little to do with your decision to time-travel. Had you spent your days frittering away your time at Dunhaven Castle, she would have done the same thing.”

Cate rinsed the plate, her eyebrows pinching together as her mind continued to parse through her guilt.

She swiveled off the water and grabbed a dishtowel, rubbing the plate in circular motions before she set it aside, grabbing the other. Could she have changed things had she not been so impulsive? Would Jack still be at Dunhaven Castle if she’d not insisted on hopping through time to solve mysteries? Was his disappearance her doing?

The plate lifted from her hands. Marcus pulled it away and reached around her to set it down. “It is not your fault, Catherine. No amount of staying in your own time would have prevented The Agency from coming after you.”

Cate blew out a breath and nodded, unsure if she believed it.

“Now, let’s go.” He waved a finger in the air. “Oh, do you have your dragon’s blood? Now would be a terrible moment to have a temporalysis attack.”

Cate patted her pocket. “Yes. I have them. So far, no symptoms.”

Marcus nodded. “I would recommend taking one in either case in the early afternoon.”

“I hate to use them if I don’t need—“

“You do need them.”

Cate pulled the sachet from her pocket, feeling the few lozenges remaining in it.

“Do not worry about running out of them. Dembe is retrieving more.”

“What if—“

“He will not fail. If you have no symptoms, use one this afternoon. We shall hope it stops any attacks at an inopportune moment.”

“Okay,” Cate agreed, shoving them back in her pocket.

He held out his hand. “Come along, Catherine.”

Cate stared at the outstretched fingers, her gaze traveling up the length of his arm to his dark eyes. She forced a tentative smile onto her face and grasped his hand.

CHAPTER 9

Marcus tugged Cate forward, wrapping her arm around his as they strode to the front door. Cate stepped into the bright sunshine outside. Dunhaven Castle stood high on the hill in the distance. It glittered in the late morning sun.

Her mind stretched to the property. In a few short hours, she and Jack would appear there, hidden deep within the castle's interior. They would witness an attempted murder and then a murder. Then their lives would take a shocking turn.

The incidents slipped from her mind as Marcus turned her away from the castle and toward town. She forced her mind to focus on the task at hand.

"Will they come through town first?"

"I am not certain, though I should think so. Stefano has been watching several key areas for them."

"You mentioned him earlier. Who is he?"

"An associate of mine with unique skills."

"Like you?"

Marcus chuckled at the comment. "Not quite, my dear. Though if you are asking if he is an immortal, the answer is yes."

Cate nodded, her forehead wrinkling as she considered the information.

The town of Dunhaven filled in around them before she could ask any further questions. Cate scanned the people, wondering if they'd come across Rita's associates.

Marcus led her to the pub. The familiar surroundings of the wood-paneled walls and thick wooden booths taunted her. They failed to provide her with the usual sense of ease. Every glance brought back a memory she'd experienced with Jack.

Their first meal in the establishment. Their discussion about the strange ongoingings at the castle. Their visit with her great-grandparents in 1925. Her fingers caressed the polished wood of the table they'd shared on their first visit as Marcus tugged her along with him toward a back corner.

A man sat with his feet propped on another chair at the table, his hat pulled low over his face. As they approached, the hat tipped back and he leapt to his feet, catching the hat in his hand and sweeping it onto his nearly black hair in one smooth motion. His dark skin and wide nose suggested his ethnicity to be Roma.

"Duke," he said with a sweeping bow.

"Stefano, have you anything to report?"

"Nothing yet, Duke." His dark eyes scanned Cate, who still clung to Marcus's arm. She offered him a demure smile. "Well, hello, pretty lady." The man whipped the hat from his unruly, black hair and made a sweeping gesture, bowing low toward her.

Marcus arched an eyebrow and huffed at the man. "You may cease your theatrics, Stefano. The lady is hardly interested in them."

Stefano returned his hat to his head and straightened. "Surely she deserves a proper greeting."

"Yes, she does. Proper being the key word. This is Lady Catherine Kensie, Countess of Dunhavenshire."

Stefano clicked his heels together and bent slightly. "Hello, Catherine."

Cate began to answer when Marcus interrupted. "You shall address her as Lady Kensie. Though through the duration of our travels, you should address her as Your Grace. She is posing as my wife. Now, I suggest you cease napping at the bar and start searching for Gianna's associates."

"Yes, Duke," he said with another bow. He flitted past them, disappearing through the door of the bar and whistling a tune.

"He was quite a character," Cate said as he left.

Marcus guided Cate through the pub and out into the streets of Dunhaven. They strolled toward the town's center. "Do not remind me. His behavior is less than appropriate on most occasions, though he has his uses."

“Was he... you know... when you met him?”

“Immortal? Yes. Though floundering.”

“And you took him in.”

“More or less. He possesses several qualities useful to me.”

Marcus ducked down a side street.

“Where are we going?” Cate inquired as they veered around behind the buildings.

“Stefano identified a location where a meeting may take place. If it does, I should like to overhear the discussion.”

They arrived in a darkened alley. The sunshine, obliterated by the buildings surrounding it, barely lit the space.

Marcus slinked through the darkness as though accustomed to it. Cate followed behind him as they approached the dead-end.

Marcus pressed her into a doorway, hiding her from sight. He squeezed next to her. In the tight quarters, Cate’s nostrils detected the thick, musky scent of his cologne. She bit her lower lip as she recalled smelling it before he’d used his unique magic to put her to sleep with the touch of his fingers on her cheek.

Cate squirmed in the small area, fidgeting to press herself as far into the corner as possible.

Marcus stared down at her. “Are you all right?”

She lifted her eyes to his and gave a tiny nod coupled with a slight smile. He narrowed his eyes at her as though assessing the statement for truthfulness.

A shout interrupted any further conversation. Cate’s heart skipped a beat before it began to pound in her chest. Her knees suddenly wobbled, and her throat went dry.

She risked a glance around Marcus’s body. She leaned from the doorway, placing her hand on his chest to steady herself. Marcus twisted to glance over his shoulder.

He narrowed his eyes at the two men who marched down the alley.

He turned back toward her. “Do you recognize them?” he whispered into her ear.

Cate gave them a second glance, biting her lower lip. She returned her gaze to Marcus and nodded. “It’s the men who were with Rita.”

He nodded and pressed a finger to his lips. She pursed her lips and nodded, her hand still resting on his chest. He closed his hand around hers and pressed closer to her.

She sucked in a deep breath as they waited in the dark corner. The men stopped midway down the alley. They conversed in low voices about something Cate couldn't overhear.

They waited several moments with no action. Warmth coursed through Cate's body and sweat beaded on her forehead. She swallowed hard, using her free hand to fan herself. She fought to control her breath, squeezing her eyes shut before blinking them rapidly.

Marcus raised his eyebrows in a silent question. She cocked her head, her face pinching into an upset expression.

He pulled her toward him, his head hovering next to hers. "The dragon's blood."

She wrapped her arms around his shoulders as her knees wobbled again. "I can't open the pouch without making noise."

"How bad are your symptoms?"

Cate considered the question. She'd had far worse symptoms, but this seemed like only the start of the attack. The last thing she needed was to parade down the alley, asking the other occupants about her dress and a ball.

"Medium," she breathed into his ear. "Though my legs are wobbly."

He wrapped his arms around her waist tighter. "Try to focus. If you continue to slip, squeeze my shoulder."

She nodded as her stomach turned over. The worry that she'd give away their position made her head spin along with the temporalysis. She squashed her lips together as her lower lip began to tremble. Tears filled her eyes and she fought to not let them spill onto her cheeks.

She blinked them away as blood rushed through her ears. Her legs threatened to buckle, and she wobbled. Marcus's arms tightened around her waist, steadying her.

She fought to maintain her focus. She concentrated on the smell of summer in the air, mixed with the musky scent of Marcus's cologne. She focused on the feel of the expensive fabric beneath her fingertips.

"Focus, Catherine," Marcus breathed in her ear.

The men milled around yards from them. She fought to stay in the moment. A figure approached them. Her blurry eyes could not identify the individual. She blinked rapidly. The measure served as a temporary relief.

She gasped as she established the identity of the newcomer: Rita. Her high heels clicked on the cobblestone street as she sashayed down the alley.

Cate tapped Marcus's back.

"It's Rita!" she hissed.

"Easy, Catherine, focus."

She held her breath, as she stared at the approaching woman.

"I see you've made it," Rita called to them, tossing her blonde hair over her shoulder.

One of the men answered though Cate did not hear the response. She squeezed her lips together as she focused on their conversation. Rita opened her mouth to respond.

Cate strained to listen, but nothing reached her ears. She frowned as she narrowed her eyes. Rita's lips slowed, moving as though she'd been set to slow speed.

Her features began to melt. Cate's breathing turned ragged. She blinked again and stared up at the sky. The color dripped to the buildings below. A large blue drip smacked Cate in the forehead. She gasped as she wiped it away, glancing upward again.

The sky broke apart. Blackness pushed through, eating away the blue sky. She was slipping. She desperately hoped to glean a clue from Rita's conversation, but she feared giving them away more. What Marcus could do to help her, though, she did not know. But she'd let him know as he'd requested.

She squeezed his shoulder as a tear slid down her cheek. The world faded away, replaced by darkness. Images flitted through her mind. Her fingers reached out into the blackness until they touched cool metal. The room lit suddenly.

Cate stood in a large, mirrored hallway. She stared into the mirror. Her reflection wore a sapphire blue dress. The large sapphire necklace hung around her neck. Cate spun around to search her surroundings. A large moon hung in the sky. Music filled the air.

Cate sucked in a deep breath as the scene suddenly changed. She gasped as she stumbled back a step. Hands steadied her and prevented her from falling over.

She grasped onto them as she caught her breath. A garbled voice called her name. She felt herself being eased into a chair. A warm, tingling feeling shot through her from head to toe.

The chair's cool fabric surrounded her and she doubled over, squeezing her eyes closed until her mind focused. She sat up straighter and blew out a long breath.

Her brow furrowed as she scanned her surroundings. She sat in the sitting room of Marcus's house on the edge of town. Her breathing turned ragged again as she focused on Marcus.

"How did we get here?"

He stalked across the room and poured a brandy. "You squeezed my shoulder."

Cate's features turned incredulous. "Yes. That doesn't explain how we got out of a dead-end alley past Rita and her associates."

Marcus handed the brandy off to her. "Drink this. How are you feeling?"

She accepted the offered drink and sipped it. "Okay."

"You should use the dragon's blood."

"Right," she said, grasping the sachet in her pocket. She tugged it open, the package crinkling as she shook one into her hand and tossed it into her mouth.

"I still don't understand how we got here."

"I used a location hop."

Cate's eyes widened. "A what?"

"A location hop. It allows us to disappear from one location and reappear in another."

The odd tingling returned, and her flesh turned to goosebumps as she considered the statement he made. Even odder, the way he said it was as though it was a completely normal phenomenon to relocate via some unknown magic from one location to another in an instant.

Cate rubbed at the back of her neck as she pondered it.

"Are you feeling any better?"

She nodded. "Yes."

"Drink your brandy. You look a bit peaked. Perhaps you should lie down."

"No," Cate said, slamming the glass down on the table next to her. "I'm not going to rest. I'm fine. The temporalysis attack has waned." She let her gaze fall to her lap and bit the inside of her cheek. "I'm just still stunned by the location change thing."

“It is nothing to concern yourself over, Catherine. I am quite adept at it. You were in no danger.”

She grabbed the glass and sipped the brandy. “It’s just... odd.” She reflected for another moment. “And thanks to the temporalysis, I’ve cost us potential information on Jack.” She sighed as she slumped in her chair.

“Do not fret. We’ve missed nothing.”

Cate leapt from her chair and paced the floor. “We have. We missed what they were discussing! It could have been important. It could have been about Jack!” She bit her thumbnail as she fought the tears forming in her eyes.

He followed her trek back and forth across the room with his eyes, leaning against the mantle with a nonchalant expression.

“Now what?” Cate inquired as she stopped her pacing to stare at him.

“I suggest you rest. We shall find more information later when Gianna intends to enact her plan.”

Cate huffed. “Please stop saying that to me! I can’t rest anymore!” She buried her face in her hands with a deep sigh. After a moment, she pulled them away. “I’m sorry. I’m just frustrated.”

He arched an eyebrow at her.

“Really, I appreciate your help. I don’t mean to be so difficult.”

The comment produced the tiny half-smile, half-smirk she’d seen before. “You forget, Catherine, I was engaged to Celine for years. She is far more difficult than you.”

Cate collapsed into the chair, resting her chin in her palm. “I just want to find Jack.”

“I told you before. This will not be easy. And it will likely not be quick. You must prepare yourself for what may be a lengthy process to retrieve him.”

Cate nodded and blew out a long breath, her eyes remaining fixed on the floor. Marcus approached her and she glanced up at him. He extended his arm toward her. She glanced at it then back to his face, her features pinching with confusion.

“If you’re certain you’re quite well, let us take a walk.”

She slipped her hand into his. “I’m okay,” she told him as she stood.

“We shall find out what transpired during the meeting between Rita and her compatriots.”

“How?” Cate asked as he led her into the bright sunshine outside. “Do you have a magic rewind button?”

He chuckled at the statement. “Your innocence is sometimes very refreshing.”

She scrunched her face at the statement.

“Stefano should have caught the conversation. I had him follow them. While I would have preferred to hear it firsthand, our abrupt change in plans will mean we shall have to rely on Stefano’s observations.”

“Oh. That was smart.”

He offered her a coy smirk as they strolled toward the town. They wound through the streets to the pub. Marcus turned off at an alley flanking it. They reached the midpoint and Marcus positioned Cate against the pub’s outer wall.

“Wait here. Do not move. Do you understand?”

“Yes. But where are you going?”

“Inside to find Stefano.” He spun to leave.

Cate grabbed his arm. “Wait. Why can’t I go?”

“If Gianna’s associates are inside, I do not wish them to see you with me.”

“Oh, right. Okay.” Cate inched back against the wall.

Marcus grasped her arm gently. “If you prefer me not to leave you, I will not.”

“I’ll be okay. Just... don’t forget about me.”

His lips twisted into a tight-lipped grin. “I could never forget you, Catherine.”

He strode down the alley toward the main street. Cate leaned against the wall as he disappeared from her view. She stared up at the bright azure sky. Fluffy white clouds floated past, failing to blot out the bright sun.

The bitter lozenge in her mouth made her cringe. She shuddered as she recalled the debilitating temporalysis attack. Before Jack’s disappearance, she’d been searching for the revolving room.

What was she searching for now? Where was the mirrored hall? And why was her mind fixated on it?

CHAPTER 10

Cate stared at the end of the alley. She suddenly felt alone. She pulled the timepiece from under her dress and stared at it. At least she had a way to return home if Marcus abandoned her. She closed her fingers around it and squeezed it.

After another glance at the main street, she flicked open the timepiece's cover. It ticked away normally, an odd sight for her while in another time. It gave her a moment of panic. What if she couldn't get home with it? Normally when activated, the timepiece ran slow, indicating the passage of time in the present, which moved at a rate of one minute to every fifteen spent in the past.

Now the watch ticked normally. Her stomach turned as she realized it may not interact with the time rips in the castle. And on top of that, she realized they'd been gone longer than twenty-four hours. What had Damien, Celine and Michael told Mrs. Fraser and Molly about her disappearance?

As she fretted over both issues, a shadow crossed over her. She glanced up to find Marcus Northcott with Stefano in tow. He eyed the timepiece in her hands as she snapped it closed and dropped it under the collar of her dress.

"I thought you may wish to hear Stefano's account."

"Yes, I would. Thank you."

Marcus signaled the man to recount the conversation he'd overheard. "Gianna chided them for being late, though she indicated she did not really need their assistance. One of them said The Agency felt she'd wasted too much time here. She took umbrage to that and told them the arrival of one Jack and Cate MacKenzie caused her to alter her original plans as it provided her with an opportunity."

"What opportunity? The opportunity to change history or the opportunity to kidnap Jack?" Cate asked, her voice hurried.

Stefano shrugged. "She didn't say. Only told them to meet her this evening following dinner to wrap up their business here. She said she'd leave immediately after it."

"Anything else?" Marcus inquired.

Stefano shook his head. "The encounter was relatively brief."

"Continue to follow them. Make note of anything that could help us locate Mr. Reid."

Stefano gave a single nod. He twisted toward Cate and offered her a bow. "Your Grace," he said with an amused grin.

Marcus scowled at him as he disappeared down the alley. "His sense of humor is almost as terrible as your Scot's."

Cate giggled. "Jack's sense of humor isn't that bad."

Marcus shook his head at her assessment as he offered her his arm again. "I am not impressed by it."

She slipped her arm around his and they set off. "I'm not surprised. You don't seem impressed by much."

"You impress me, Catherine. I find you a most intriguing woman."

"So you've said. Though I still don't understand why. Given the life you've led, I can't imagine anything being intriguing."

He offered her an amused glance.

"Anyway, where are we going now?"

"To Dunhaven Castle. To wait for the events of this evening. Gianna plans to leave tonight. I would like to determine what clues we can glean from her departure to lead us to—"

"Jack," Cate finished for him. "To lead us to Jack."

"I would doubt it. But, with any luck, it will lead us to another time where we can collect more information."

Cate bit her lower lip and her shoulders slumped ever so slightly. "Oh. I know you keep saying to prepare for a long search, but I just keep hoping to find him around the next corner. I mean, isn't there an Agency stronghold or something where they'd keep him."

Marcus chuckled at her comment. “Unfortunately, no. There are many members of the organization. He could not only be anywhere, but he could be in any time. And, if they had any brains at all, they would move him regularly to prevent us from tracking him down.”

Cate’s eyes fell to her feet as she walked along the road leading to the castle. Her features twitched with upset. “How will we ever find him then?”

“By being more clever than them.”

Cate’s features pinched at the words.

Marcus ceased walking. “I am quite insulted, Catherine.”

She snapped her gaze up to him. “Why?”

“You do not believe me more clever than they.” He pressed his hand against his heart. “I am terribly wounded.”

Cate’s brow pinched and she studied him with widened eyes. “Are you—are you actually making a joke?”

He shrugged. “Not really. I am terribly wounded if you have no faith in my abilities.”

Cate eyed him with uncertainty.

“I told you at the start of this, you must trust me.”

“I suppose that’s what I must do then.”

He grabbed her hand and wrapped it around his arm. “We will find him. Trust me.”

* * *

Cate stood with her hands on her hips, her jaw set. The dark stones of the MacKenzie family crypt rose in front of her. She shook her head and grimaced. “No.”

Marcus offered her an unimpressed glance. “Catherine, you are being impossible.”

Cate crossed her arms over her chest. “I don’t care. I won’t do it.”

Marcus matched her stance. “Fine. Then we shall stand here until you are feeling less obstinate.”

Cate scrunched her face in frustration and flung her arm toward the stone structure in front of them. “I’m not going into the mausoleum with you!”

“It provides us with a perfect vantage point to remain hidden while watching the folly.”

Cate shook her head. “No.”

“Need I remind you, Catherine—“

“Need I remind you that the last time you brought me here, you—“

Marcus held up his hand. “No, you need not. You have mentioned it several times. And I have explained several times that my intention—“

“Was not to harm me. Yes, I know,” Cate said with a roll of her eyes. “That doesn’t make it any better! And it doesn’t mean I want to go inside the mausoleum where I was buried alive.”

“Did you not use this egress when you visited this period with Zack?”

“Jack,” Cate said with a clenched jaw. “Stop calling him other names just to annoy me.”

“I’m doing nothing of the sort.”

“You are so. And yes, I did come through here with Jack. But he didn’t stuff me into a coffin!”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at her. “Pretend I’m the Scot.”

Cate glowered at him, her hands sliding back to her hips. “My imagination isn’t that good.”

He offered her a growling sigh. “I could solve this easily.” He wiggled his fingers at her.

She narrowed her eyes, recalling his magical touch that could cause her to lose consciousness. The idea caused her heart to seize.

With a sour expression, she stormed up the stone steps and pushed through the creaky gate into the crypt.

“Thought you’d see it my way,” he murmured as he followed her inside.

Cate stopped short as she entered the stone walls. Marcus skirted around her. She shivered as her eyes fell to the stone coffin she’d laid in over a century ago.

Marcus flitted his gaze to her before he glanced out the window overlooking the folly. Cate tore her eyes away from the resting place and stalked across the mausoleum. She stared at the ring that opened the passage into the castle.

Her fingers reached out to caress the cool metal. Her lower lip trembled as her mind wandered to the events about to occur in the nearby folly. Again, Jack would be so close, yet so far. She closed her eyes. Images flitted through her mind.

She recalled hiding in the folly, Jack's hand pressed over her mouth as they witnessed a murder, the stars twinkling overhead as she climbed into a tree to watch the Germans run Jack's car off the road, the cold, wet hug she received when Jack climbed from the pond.

"Are you feeling ill?" Marcus inquired.

Cate snapped her eyes open, the memories fading. She flicked her gaze to him, her eyes misty, and shook her head.

He tilted his head and narrowed his eyes at her.

She sniffled. "No. No, I'm fine. Just memories of this night the last time I lived through it cropping up."

Marcus nodded. "If you prefer not to witness the events at the folly—"

"No," she said with a sniffle, blinking away tears. She raised her eyes to his. "No, I'm fine."

"If the temporalysis symptoms crop up—"

"I've got my lozenges at the ready." She patted her pocket. "Though I hope not to need them."

"Do not worry about using them. Dembe will retrieve more."

She joined him at the window. "I know. I mean I hope I don't ruin our chances of finding information about Jack. Also, I'm not exactly thrilled about descending into another bizarre scenario of visions."

The sky darkened outside as the sun set. The last rays of red light shone through the window, lighting their faces with a rosy glow.

Cate glanced out over the painted landscape, worry creasing her features. She spun back to face Marcus. "What will happen to me if this continues? Will I just collapse in on myself? Become stuck in my own mind?"

"That is one outcome, yes."

"And the other is that I die."

"Another is that you pull through it and live."

Cate licked her lips, then squeezed them together as she focused on the folly. Marcus pushed a lock of hair behind her ear.

"You are strong. You can survive this."

She nodded at him. "I hope so. But I'm afraid the symptoms are getting worse."

Marcus gazed out toward the folly. "I'm not convinced they are."

"I'm still having strange visions, although they're new ones now. And I'm continuing to have them despite the dragon's blood."

“But you are remaining conscious for longer durations during them.”

“Maybe that’s just the dragon’s blood. It could be masking the progression of symptoms.”

Marcus slid his eyes sideways to glance at her. “You are strong, Catherine. You can survive this.”

Cate pursed her lips and bobbed her head. “I will survive this.”

“What visions are you having?”

“I saw a mirrored hallway. I was wearing the ball gown I found at the castle with the sapphire necklace. I had a similar dream about that hallway. I fell trying to run. Something was after me. But I don’t know what it was.”

Cate tapped her fingertips against the stone windowsill. Her breathing turned ragged. “What was it?”

“Allow the memory to pass, Catherine. Do not strain yourself.”

“But what is this? First that room and now this other place.” Cate massaged her temples. “Why are these images haunting me?”

Marcus studied her for a moment. “They are not random images.”

“Then what are they?”

“Visions of your future.”

Cate’s eyes widened and she snapped her eyes to him. Her jaw hung open as she processed the statement.

Before she could formulate a response, Marcus waved a finger toward the folly. “There.”

Cate swallowed hard and pushed the conversation from her mind as she gazed outside. She and Jack hurried along the path to the folly, ducking inside.

Cate’s heart seized as she spotted herself with Jack. She promised herself they would find him and she would survive the temporalysis.

As the sun set, she paced the floor. She recalled sitting in the folly with Jack, waiting for something to happen. As the stars sparkled in the sky above, Cate rejoined Marcus at the window. His cool, calm demeanor amazed her. His patience seemed endless, while she was ready to jump out of her skin waiting for something to happen.

At long last, Ruth wandered to the folly and disappeared inside. Hans followed shortly after.

“That’s the British intelligence agent,” Cate said. “He gives her the code for Bletchley. The one that Jack and I will end up carrying there.”

Moments later, Hans stalked from the folly, hands shoved into his pockets as he strode away. Another thirty minutes passed before Victor's lithe form appeared on the path.

"Victor," Cate reported. "The German spy Rita, or Gianna, kills."

"And the one who ended up in your garden."

"Yes, but only in this line of events. In the original, it was Ruth who was buried there."

"Gianna modified history. Not enough to cause things to go haywire, but enough to throw you off."

Cate rubbed at the back of her neck. As she considered it. "Why?"

"The Agency uses this technique to slowly modify conditions to suit and benefit them."

"Because too big of a change could cause unintended consequences for them?"

"Very good, Catherine. You are an excellent pupil."

Cate offered him a tight-lipped smile. A muzzle flash lit up the folly's interior. Cate jumped as she recalled the bullet striking Ruth in the gut.

Cate chewed her lower lip, the memory still too fresh for her taste.

A figure approached the folly in the moonlight. Two men followed. Cate grabbed Marcus's arm and squeezed. "There she is!"

Marcus's face showed indifference or perhaps disdain. "Indeed."

Gianna disappeared into the folly. Another muzzle flash lit up, followed by a second. Moments later, Gianna emerged.

"That's our cue," Marcus said. He grabbed her arm and steered her toward the exit.

"What is our plan?" Cate inquired as they stepped under the starry sky.

"Follow her. She should be moving on soon."

Cate nodded without fully understanding how this may help them. They hurried in the direction Gianna departed in. Cate scanned the horizon in search of the woman.

Marcus wrapped his hand around hers and pulled her from the path. They strode through the grass toward a large tree. A figure moved in the dim light, hunched over and tugging at something.

"Going somewhere, Gianna?" Marcus said.

The figure straightened and stepped from under the branches into the moonlight. Her head lolled to the side and her lips curled at the edges. She shot him a coy glance as she stuck her hand on her hip.

“Marcus Northcott. Fancy meeting you here.”

He narrowed his eyes at her. “I asked you a question. You have failed to answer.”

“Yes. I am.” She glanced around him. “I’d ask what you’re doing here but I think that’s the wisp of a woman, Cate Kensie, behind you. So I can only guess she somehow convinced you to help her find the dimwit of an estate agent.”

“I don’t suppose you’d save me the trouble and hand him over.”

She chuckled and batted her eyelashes at him. “Oh, Marcus, you always were such a comedian.” She paced in front of the tree, the moonlight glinting off her blonde locks. “What I can’t figure out is how mousy little Cate solicited your assistance. She seems beneath you, Marcus.”

He puckered his lips at her. “I am unimpressed with your so-called analysis. I’d prefer to know where you’re going.”

She threw her head back and cackled as she ran her fingers up and down her throat. When she recovered, she faced him, lowering her chin and staring up at him through her eyelashes.

She puckered her lips and narrowed her eyes as she sauntered forward. She laid her hands on his lapels, batting her eyelashes at him as she raised her eyes to his.

“Why don’t you come with me and find out for yourself?” she purred.

Cate frowned at her over-the-top, flirtatious performance. Marcus ran his fingers up her arm, closing his hands around hers. His lips twisted into that half-smirk, half-smile.

Gianna eyed the man she clung to with a flirty stare. Cate’s heart skipped a beat as she worried Marcus may take Gianna up on her offer.

CHAPTER 11

Gianna eyed Marcus as Cate frowned at them, locked hand in hand and gazing into each other's eyes.

"Keep a lady company," Gianna cooed, tossing her leg in the air behind her as she leaned into him.

He lifted his eyebrows, staring down his nose at her. "Then I suppose I should stay where I am. The only lady present is standing behind me."

The flirtatious smile faded from her lips, and she yanked her hands from his. "When are you going to realize the benefits of joining The Agency?"

"My dear Gianna, when you are as powerful as I, there are none."

She stalked away and grabbed what she'd wrestled from the tree earlier. She slung the bag over her shoulder and withdrew a small object from its front pocket.

She scoffed at his last comment. "We'll see who wins, Marcus. Your power is no match for The Agency. I hope both you and your mousy little friend realize this." She glanced over Marcus's shoulder, rising onto her toes to glance at Cate. "Jack's ours, Cate. And there's nothing you can do about it."

She palmed the object she'd retrieved earlier and in an instant, she twisted into a pinpoint, disappearing from view.

Cate's breath caught as the invisible vortex sucked her inside, leaving nothing behind but a gust of wind. Marcus strode forward and studied the spot where she'd stood.

Cate hurried forward to join him, flinging her arms out. “We learned nothing. As usual, she was too busy flirting. Ooohhh, I can’t stand her!” She stamped her foot on the ground.

Marcus’s lips curled again as his hands traced something invisible. “Stop reacting emotionally and pay attention to your surroundings. She has left subtle clues.”

Cate scoffed at the statement. “Clues too subtle for me to see!”

“Not true. You are not paying attention. You are only seeing red over her poor behavior rather than the clues.”

Cate scrunched her face and balled her fists at her sides. She shook her head to dismiss his claim. He crooked his finger at her, motioning for her to join him.

He circled behind her and placed his hands on either side of her head. “Look carefully, Catherine.”

Cate licked her lips and rolled her eyes, about to argue with him when she noticed a slight shimmer against the dark night sky.

She reached her finger toward it. Her skin tingled as she came into contact with it. She cocked her head as she studied the swirling, glittery dust.

“How does this help us?”

“To someone learned in these matters, this tells us the direction of her time travel as well as something about how far she’s traveled.”

Cate glanced over her shoulder at him, her face questioning.

“Notice how it swirls clockwise. This indicates that she’s gone forward in time.”

“How far? To our time? Did she go to get Jack?”

Marcus shook his head. “No, look at how closely the particles cling to each other. She hasn’t gone that far in time.”

“How far did she go?”

“I’d say ten to fifteen years, give or take.”

“So, somewhere in the 1950s,” Cate said as she stared at the dissipating pixie dust swirls.

“I’d say so, yes.”

“Now what?”

“Now we go home. You need your rest, and we need to search for what drew her to the 50s.”

Cate bit her lower lip, disappointed at the answer, but nodded.

“Ready? Do you recall the rules? Straight through the portal, do not stop.”

She nodded again. Her features pinched. “Wait. How did Rita, or Gianna, know Jack was gone? He wasn’t when we met her the first time.”

“Gianna has likely traveled back and forth dozens of times. She’d be well aware of what is about to transpire. In fact, she likely set up some of it while she and you were here.”

“Dozens of times,” Cate repeated as she considered his words. “Why can’t she get temporalysis?”

Marcus chuckled at her statement. “Come, Catherine. Let’s return home and continue our search.”

She offered him a tight-lipped smile and nodded. He stretched out his hands in front of him, pulling open the time portal. As the small twinkling turned into a gaping black hole and her hair whipped wildly around her, Cate stepped into the blackness to return to the present-day.

* * *

Cate stepped into the bright sunshine of the spring day. She shielded her eyes as she glanced around, finding herself near where they’d entered the time portal.

Marcus Northcott appeared beside her moments later.

“It feels good to be home,” she said as they strolled back to the castle.

“How are you feeling? Any ill effects from the return trip?”

Cate shook her head, pushing through the front door. “None so far.”

“You should get some rest in the hopes of staving off another.”

“I’d like to check on any progress the others have made,” Cate said.

Marcus furrowed his brow at her statement but followed her to the library. She burst through the doors, finding them in a similar position to where she’d left them.

“Oh, hey, Cate, welcome back!” Damien mumbled around the shortbread he’d just taken a bite of.

“Have you found anything?”

His eyes shifted from side to side as he munched on the cookie. “No?” he responded. “Is that a trick question?”

“No,” Cate said, her eyelashes fluttering. She glanced at his screen. “That’s the same website you were looking at when we left!”

Damien glanced at it and frowned before he faced her again. “Yeah.”

“You’ve gotten no further?”

Damien bit his lower lip, his eyebrows pinching together. “You’ve only been gone for like five minutes.”

Cate collapsed into the desk in front of her, her eyes wide. “What?”

Damien slowly chewed his cookie as he stared at her. “You’ve been gone five minutes.”

“How? We were in 1942 for over twenty-four hours.”

“There is no time differential when using the time portals we create. We can return to whatever time we choose,” Celine answered from the armchair near the fireplace where she sat with Bailey.

Cate glanced at her, her forehead wrinkling as she spotted Marcus holding Riley again. She shook her head and focused on the information she’d just learned. She’d expected to have been gone at least several hours.

She pressed her palm against her forehead. “Five minutes?”

“Yep. So, sorry to say, we haven’t made much progress in that time, but we’ll keep at it. How was your trip?”

“Any temporalysis issues?” Michael asked.

Cate opened her mouth to respond when Marcus beat her to it. “Yes. She had two attacks, one more debilitating than the other, but after some rest, she seems improved.”

Damien pursed his lips and rubbed Cate’s hand. “How are you feeling now?”

“I’m okay. The worse of the two attacks happened at the worst possible moment.”

Damien patted her hand. “You should get some rest now. I’ll bet you’re exhausted. Between the whole time travel business—“ He lowered his voice. “—and the company. I’m sure you could use a break.”

“But we have to discuss what we found!”

“You found something?” Michael asked.

“Travel trail?” Celine questioned with her gaze on Marcus.

He nodded at her as he stroked the white streak on Riley’s head.

“Any information on where it led?”

“Forward, I’d say ten to fifteen years.”

Damien pounded on his keyboard. "So, we're looking for something in the range of 1952 to 1957."

"Roughly, yes," Marcus answered as he set Riley on the floor. The dog stared up at him as though he held a steak.

"Okay, I'm going to run a search for anything related to Rita Haverford or Gianna Caruso."

"I doubt you'll find anything," Marcus said. "She isn't that foolish."

Cate's shoulders slumped. If they could not track the woman through history, how would they ever find information?

Marcus wandered toward them. "Search for large gatherings in prominent places like Paris, London, Rome."

Damien nodded as his fingers clacked across the keys. "What kind? Anything specific?"

Marcus answered, "Conventions, business, finance, the sort of thing that would bring together prominent businessmen."

Cate rubbed her chin as she considered his response. "Why those?"

"She went forward to this time for a reason. Something is occurring. Something she wants access to or furthers her plan in some way. It may be a discussion with the powers that be at The Agency. It may be to approach a key person to join their initiative."

"What if it's just some random place in time where they've stashed Jack."

"Doubtful," Marcus said. "She wouldn't be going to visit the gardener. She's going to make something happen."

Damien laced his fingers together behind his head and leaned back in the chair. "Okay, searching for any historical events in that time period in major cities." He glanced at Cate. "This could take a while. Why don't you get some rest?"

"I'm okay," she answered.

"At least get changed," Michael said. "We'll let you know if anything comes up in the search."

"Yeah, but like I said," Damien repeated, "it will probably be a while."

"You should rest, Catherine," Marcus said. "If Damien finds a lead, we will need to pursue it."

Cate sucked in a breath and nodded. "Okay. I'll change and come back here. I can rest here."

“Sure, Cate,” Damien answered. “Whatever makes you feel comfortable.”

She smiled and nodded at him before she stalked from the room. She glanced back, her hand lingering on the doorknob, finding Riley sitting at Marcus’s feet. Bailey lounged by the fire.

With a long exhale, she let go of the door and continued to her bedroom alone. The oddities of the situation played in her mind as she wound through the halls. Why was Riley so enamored with Marcus Northcott?

She had only been gone for minutes, so their reaction to her return was understandable. However, Riley’s infatuation with the enigmatic Duke confounded her. Did he put some sort of spell on the animal? But why?

Perhaps to make himself seem trustworthy to Cate. She chewed the inside of her cheek as she considered Celine’s reaction to him. No longer hostile, she seemed to almost trust the man. Even Damien did not seem perturbed by him.

During their encounter in the 1700s, he’d seemed frightened of him and exhibited an extreme dislike. Now they worked together.

Cate pushed through the doors of her suite and into the familiar space as her head began to ache. She hated to admit it, but Marcus was correct. She needed some rest. The adrenaline that fueled her in 1942 no longer coursed through her veins.

She slogged across the sitting room and into her bedroom, collapsing on the soft duvet. With a deep sigh, Cate pushed a lock of hair from her face. She stared blankly ahead as her mind whirled.

Following any other time travel trip, she’d have returned here to change clothes, then meet Jack in the library to discuss their findings. Today, she’d change and go to the library. But Jack would not be there.

Tears filled her eyes and blurred her vision. As her chin quivered and the tears threatened to fall, she rose and stalked to her nightstand. Within moments, music filled the air.

She eased onto the bed, pulling the tiny music box toward her chest. She clutched it close to her and closed her eyes.

Her fingers caressed the smooth wood. The tiny keyboard lifted as she touched it. Cate snapped her eyes open and studied the music box. She recalled finding a note in her handwriting inside. Damien’s text stating the Duke claimed she’d been the source of the music box raced through her mind followed by Marcus’s own words. “You asked me to.”

Cate's forehead pinched as her vision clouded, replaced by a new image.

Cate gasped as she glanced at the candlelight lighting the room. She stared down at her centuries-old clothing, caressing the ribbon tied at her waist. The wooden chair creaked under her as she shifted in it to gawk around a room she'd never seen before.

A large mahogany canopy bed stood in the middle with a thick coverlet. A vanity stood against the far wall. Ornate wood trim decorated sapphire walls.

Cate spun to face a window, catching her reflection in it. Her stunned features stared back at her. Soft, curled tendrils framed her porcelain skin while the remainder of her hair had been swept up.

Cate's eyes fell to the desk at which she sat. She reached out to caress the tiny piano-shaped music box tinkling away. A scrap of paper lay next to it, wet ink scrawling a message across it: You've always loved this.

Cate's eyes widened at the sight, and she leapt from the chair. It scraped back across the hardwood as Cate stumbled backward. She tripped over the leg, spiraling backward. Her arms flailed to try to regain her balance, but she lost the battle.

Her stomach turned as she toppled backward, and the room began to turn black.

CHAPTER 12

Cate gasped as her eyes shot open. She gulped in breaths as she flitted her gaze around the room. She clutched at her duvet, hoping it eased her trembling.

She recognized the space: her bedroom. With another gasp, she sat up, perching on the edge of her bed. She swallowed hard, her chest heaving as she continued to suck in air.

The music box tinkled away, still clutched in her hands. Cate ran her fingers through her hair as she pushed the little piano onto her nightstand.

With weak knees, she stood, teetering for a moment before she gained her balance. She trudged into the bathroom and changed her clothes to her usual leggings and a tunic.

As she stared in the mirror, brushing her hair out of its 40s style, she froze. What had she experienced when she'd sat on the bed? She'd felt as though she'd been somewhere else. The past. But where? How? She'd not activated the timepiece. Even if she had, she'd have ended up in 1925.

By her dress and hair, it appeared she was much earlier than that in time. Then there was the note. The same note she'd found in the keyboard of the music box. Had she written it in the past? But why was she seeing it now? What was happening to her?

After a head shake, she finished her hair and laid the brush on her vanity before she left the bathroom. On her way through the bedroom, she grabbed the music box, taking it with her to the library.

She entered the room to find Michael and Damien conversing over a game of chess. Damien's computer blazed through a search of some kind, information flitting across the screen faster than Cate could process.

Celine curled in the armchair Jack normally used, typing a message on her phone. Marcus sat in the other chair with Riley next to him. He absentmindedly rubbed the dog's head.

"Hey, Cate!" Damien said as she stepped inside the room. "Welcome back."

"Thanks." She motioned to the laptop at the desk. "Any hits yet?"

"Nothing yet. It'll alert us. Hope you don't mind us playing a quick game of chess. It helps me think."

"Not at all," Cate said, crossing the room.

Marcus rose from the armchair and motioned for Cate to take it. He gave Riley another pat on the head and signaled for the dog to stay on the chair.

A weak smile formed on Cate's lips. Cate waved him back down. "Oh, you don't--"

"Of course I do, Catherine," Marcus said. "You need your rest." He motioned toward the chair again.

"Thank you," Cate said as she slid into the soft leather.

Celine side-eyed the exchange before returning to her phone as it chimed.

"Hey, D," she said over her shoulder.

"Yeah?"

"Alexander said to try the years 1954-1956. He recalls a meeting of businessmen occurring sometime in that range."

Damien leapt from his seat and hurried to his laptop. "Can he be any more specific?"

"I'll ask."

"I mean, either way, this narrows the search by half which helps tremendously."

Cate tugged a blanket over her legs as Riley glanced at Marcus, then eased to laying next to Cate. Marcus studied her, his eyes narrowing. Cate fidgeted under his scrutiny.

"Okay, new search running," Damien announced with an emphatic pound against his ENTER key.

“Oh, Alexander says perhaps in the fall. He can’t be more specific than that. But he does recall it being during a time when he was traveling.”

Damien returned to the keyboard. “Fall is a little broad, but I’ll restrict to September through November and see what that gets us.” He clacked around again before the computer began its frantic search task.

Cate nestled under the blanket as the computer worked and Damien crossed back to the chess table. She caressed the music box in her hands.

Marcus stalked to her and eased the piano from her grasp. He twisted the winding mechanism and propped the lid open, setting it on the coffee table.

“You should rest. This will ease your nerves.”

“He’s right,” Celine added. “If you’d like to lay down in your room, we’ll be fine here.”

Cate pressed her lips together, her shoulders rising to her ears. “I’d rather not be alone.”

Celine nodded and smiled. “Of course.”

“No one will mind if you want to close your eyes, Cate,” Damien assured her. “We’ll wake you if we find anything in the search.”

“Thanks.”

Cate slouched in the chair, drawing her knees to her chest. She reached out to stroke Riley’s back as she let her head fall onto the wide cushion behind her. Her eyes scanned the room, taking in all the unfamiliar faces and not Jack’s.

She bit into her lower lip as she felt the emotions rippling inside her. She stared over at the computer as it blazed through its search. Her eyelids slid shut before fluttering open again.

The music tinkled in the background. She focused on the little wooden piano until her eyes slid closed.

Her mind jumbled as she drifted in and out of sleep. She ran through the halls of Dunhaven Castle calling for Jack. She glanced into the library, finding it empty. In a frenzy, she continued to wander the halls.

The doors to the west wing stood open. She slowed and approached them. Voices floated down the hall.

“Jack!” Cate exclaimed and hurried down the grand hall.

“How is she really?” Celine’s voice inquired.

“Her second temporalysis attack was pronounced,” Marcus answered.

“Is she getting worse?” Damien inquired.

“It’s difficult to say, though she is doing an admirable job of fighting through.”

“Yeah, she’s fighting,” Michael’s voice said. “But can she beat it?”

“I certainly hope so,” Marcus answered.

Cate passed the music room. Damien sat at the piano. He poked at various keys. She continued on toward the grand hall. The doors blew open as she approached.

“Cate!” a muffled voice called.

Cate’s eyes widened. “Jack!” she shouted, recognizing his voice. “Where are you?”

“Inside the waltz room! Hurry!”

She hurried across the room and toggled open the revolving music room. Cate rushed toward it. A figure blocked her from entering.

“Hello, Catherine,” Marcus said.

“Marcus! Help me! Jack’s inside the spinning room.”

“He isn’t. It is only a trick.”

“No!” Cate cried. She attempted to skirt around the man, but he blocked the entire entrance. “Marcus, please!”

The room behind him began to crack apart. The music wobbled and slowed. A pillar crashed to the floor. Tears spilled onto Cate’s cheeks. “Please,” she begged again.

“It is for your own good,” he said as he prevented her from entering the crumbling space. The ceiling fell toward the floor, sending a deafening bang through her mind.

Cate startled awake, gasping. The banging continued. Marcus strode from the room.

“It’s okay, Cate. Someone’s at your door,” Damien said.

Cate tossed the blanket off and stood. Before she could leave the room, Marcus returned with a bulky dark-skinned man in tow. He gave her a slight bow.

“Hello, Miss Catherine.”

“Dembe, hello.”

“Dembe has brought you something,” Marcus said.

Dembe pulled a large pouch from his pocket and offered it to Cate with a bow. Cate accepted the proffered object, tugging open the sack.

“Is this—“

“Dragon’s blood,” Marcus answered. “Enough to last you several weeks even if you increase the dose to two to three times per day.”

Cate breathed a sigh of relief.

“That’s plenty, right?” Damien inquired.

“Yes,” Marcus nodded. “You should not need more than half that pouch.”

Cate twisted to face him as she pulled the pouch closed. “Why?”

Marcus flicked his gaze to her and took a sip of brandy from the drink he poured. “Because in two weeks’ time, you should no longer need them.”

Cate’s heart fluttered. “Because I’ll be—“ Dead, her mind added, but she could not bring herself to say the word.

“Cured,” Marcus answered before another sip of brandy.

Cate’s lips curled up on the edges and she nodded, appreciating the vote of confidence.

“Thank you, Dembe,” Cate said to the quiet man.

“It is my pleasure, Miss Catherine,” he answered.

“Will you be staying with us, too?” Cate inquired.

“No,” Marcus answered for him as he strode across the room. “Dembe has more pressing matters to attend to. Dembe, a word before you depart?”

“Of course, Duke,” he answered, his hands clasped behind his back as he followed the man from the room.

Cate set the pouch on the table and eased into the generous seat of her armchair.

“Well, at least that matter is solved,” Damien said. “Now you don’t have to worry about running out.”

“Yes,” Cate answered as the music box wound down. She reached for it, winding the mechanism again before setting it on the coffee table. “I hope no one minds this constant droning, but it does help.”

“Not at all,” Celine assured her. “I understand. My father gave me a music box when I was sixteen just before his death. I still listen to it, and it has a similar effect on me.”

Cate smiled at the words as her mind processed the statement. She tried to imagine a sixteen-year-old Celine in the late 1700s accepting the music box as a gift. How odd.

It reminded her of her odd experience earlier. She must have fallen asleep and imagined she was in another century. It had seemed so real.

Cate leapt from her seat, the blanket draped over her knees falling to the floor. “Will you excuse me for a moment?”

“Sure, Cate,” Damien said.

She hurried from the room, leaving the others behind and hurrying down the hall. Marcus approached from the foyer.

“You should be resting, Catherine.”

“Can I speak with you for a minute? In private?”

“Certainly.”

Cate led him across the foyer and into the sitting room, pushing the doors slightly shut behind them. She spun to face him, still clutching the brass doorknobs.

“What did you mean when you said I was experiencing visions of my future?”

“Exactly that.”

Cate crossed the room, her brow furrowed. “I don’t understand.”

“What are you seeing?”

“A mirrored hallway. I hear music. I’m wearing a sapphire dress. And—“

“And?”

“And when I went upstairs to change, I fell asleep, or I thought I did. I saw myself in another century. I had the music box. And I was penning a note. I thought it was a dream, but it felt so real.”

Marcus nodded. “You are remembering things.”

“Remembering things? I’ve never been to the room I saw myself in. It can’t be a memory.”

“It is. Of your future.”

Cate’s eyes widened and she collapsed onto the couch. “How is that possible? Are these visions of my future?”

“Yes. Though your future occurs in the past.”

Cate chewed her lower lip before covering her face with her hands. “This is so confusing.”

Marcus approached her, reaching toward her as she smoothed her hair behind her ears.

“Hey, Cate?” Damien’s voice called.

“Yes?” Cate answered, leaping from her seat.

Damien popped his head through the opening between the doors. “Oh, hey! I heard voices and just followed them. Sorry if I’m interrupting.”

“Not at all, what is it?”

“We’ve got something,” he said with a grin.

Cate’s eyes lit up and she rounded the couch, hurrying toward Damien. “What?”

Damien led her down the hall to the library. Marcus trailed behind them. She entered the room, finding both Michael and Celine tapping around on their phones.

A giant text box on Damien’s screen announced success. Confetti rained from the top. Damien sat down in front of the machine, dismissing the notification.

“Sorry, ignore that, just a bit of fun,” he murmured.

He clicked around, pulling up an old newspaper article. “The Business Summit,” he said, pointing to the screen. “Held in London in October 1955. A meeting of minds from across the globe to discuss international business.”

“Alexander says that’s the one he remembers,” Celine reported.

“Looks like there were tons of people there who were major players on the world business stage,” Michael added.

Damien nodded. “This is the type of event you mentioned, right?” He directed his gaze toward Marcus.

“Yes,” Marcus answered. “I’d bet that was Gianna’s target.”

“Do you think they have Jack?”

“I doubt it,” Marcus answered causing Cate’s shoulders to slump. “However, they may be deciding what to do with him at that meeting.”

“Then we should go, right?” Cate asked. “Oh, how will we get to London? I’m not sure I can drive a car from the 1950s. Can you?”

Marcus chortled a laugh. “I do find you so amusing at times.”

“Marcus will open a portal that leads to London in October 1955,” Celine explained.

Cate’s jaw dropped and she returned her gaze to Marcus. “Really? They aren’t location-locked?”

“No, Catherine. I am no amateur. The world is easily within our reach, no matter how far-flung.”

Cate nodded. “So, we should go then, right?”

“Yes. Though perhaps you should rest more before we depart.”

“I’m fine. I feel fine.”

“We have no idea what we may encounter. We should wait until you are rested and ready.”

Cate pressed her lips together in frustration. She balled her palms into fists as she sought an argument, her face pinching.

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her behavior. "Your tantrum will get you nowhere, Catherine. We will not go until you have properly rested."

He stalked across the room as though the conversation had ended.

Her eyes shot wide. "I'm not having a tantrum! This is Jack's life on the line."

"And we are not doing him justice by racing there when we risk your life and well-being."

"I'm not risking my life."

"You are. The temporalysis is one issue. Your fragile human state is another."

"Uh-oh," Damien whispered to Celine as Cate narrowed her eyes at the statement.

Celine shot Damien a side-eyed glance, her lips pursed, and wiggled her eyebrows at him. Michael crossed his arms over his chest, his eyes darting back and forth between them as the argument continued.

"I am not fragile! I have been through a lot more than you give me credit for."

"This has nothing to do with giving you credit, Catherine. It has to do with protecting your life."

"I fail to see how delaying a few hours or even a day protects my life."

"This is not up for debate."

"You just don't want to find Jack," Cate accused. "You don't like him. You've said as much."

"Ohhhh, wow, she went straight for it on that one," Michael whispered.

"Yeah, no kidding," Damien said.

"My feelings have nothing to do with the situation," Marcus retorted.

Cate narrowed her eyes and cocked her head. "Oh, I think they have very much to do with it. You haven't liked him since we met in the 1700s!"

Marcus puckered his lips and sighed. "You can accuse me of as much as you'd like, but it changes nothing."

Cate huffed. She flung her arms out and rolled her eyes. "Fine. I'll get some rest." She waved a finger at him. "But I expect to go as soon as I've slept."

Marcus raised his eyebrows at her. "Fine."

Cate spun on a heel and stalked toward the door. She hesitated a moment before she turned back and swiped the pouch of dragon's blood off the table along with the music box before she stalked from the room.

Cate fumed as she stormed up the stairs. With no ability to travel to 1955, she had little choice in the matter. She had to give in to Marcus's demands.

She hoped it wasn't a stall tactic. His dislike for Jack was obvious. Was she correct? Was he scheming to make sure they would not find Jack?

She crashed through the doors to her suite and marched across the room into her bedroom. She slid the music box and dragon's blood pouch onto her nightstand, kicked her shoes off, and climbed between the sheets.

The music box tinkled away as she lay on her side, staring at it. She narrowed her eyes at it as she recalled the argument she'd just had with Marcus.

She reached out and slammed the lid closed on the little item. Much to her dismay, it continued to tinkle away even with the lid closed. She offered a strained scream in her throat as she flopped onto her other side and pulled the pillow over her head.

CHAPTER 13

Cate opened her eyes to a darkened room. She lifted her head and squinted into the darkness. The music box tinkled in the blackness. Had she slept longer than she'd intended?

Cate shot up to sitting, pulling the covers off. More of the room came into view as Cate's eyes adjusted to the darkness. It didn't look like her room. She glanced to the window. The peaked windows rose to the ceiling.

"Where am I?" Cate whispered as her pulse quickened. She swung her legs over the side of the bed, noticing her attire for the first time. She wore a long white nightgown.

Cate grabbed at it, her forehead pinching. She reached for the light on her nightstand, finding none. Instead, her flailing hand knocked over something else.

"Shoot," Cate hissed as she bent toward it. Her fingers wrapped around something waxy. It smelled like beeswax. Was it a candle, she wondered?

She sat up, pulling the object toward her. Light pierced the darkness. Cate snapped her head toward the light, squinting her eyes against it.

A small voice called out. "Your Grace?"

* * *

Cate gasped as her eyes popped open. She scanned the dimly lit room. She clutched at the pillow underneath her as she recognized her surroundings.

Where had she been seconds ago? Had she dreamt up the other place?

She pushed herself up to sit and glanced at her clock. It read quarter after six. Judging by the already darkening sky, it was evening. The music box on her nightstand tinkled away.

Cate pushed back the covers as a light knock sounded at the door across the suite.

“Coming!” she called.

The door popped open, and Molly stuck her head in. “Just me. I’ve got a tray of dinner for you.”

Cate hurried across the room and pulled the doors open further. “Thanks.”

“No problem. I figured I’d give it a try. Celine said you were trying to get a little rest.”

Cate nodded. “Yeah, I managed to fall asleep for a few hours.”

“That’s good,” Molly said as she eased the tray onto Cate’s bed. Molly turned to face her, grasping Cate’s upper arms lightly. “You still look a little tired. Maybe you should turn in for the night after supper.”

“I’m okay, Molly. How are you? Maybe you and the Frasers should do the same. Just leave the cleanup for another day. I’ll even help you with it.”

“Nonsense. The work keeps us distracted. Has there been any news?”

“Damien found something he’s following up on.”

Molly’s eyebrows shot up and a hopeful expression lit up her features.

“It’s not much but we may glean some information from it. We’re going to follow up on it now.”

“Well, after you eat, of course.”

Cate offered her a grin. “Of course.”

Molly nodded at her. “Do you need any help with looking into it?”

“No, I think we’re okay. Everyone has offered to help with that.”

“Okay,” Molly said with a tilt of her head. “We’ll just keep supplying meals and cookies for their efforts.”

“They’ll enjoy that. Especially Damien.”

“Which one is he again?”

“Tall, longish brown hair, blue eyes.”

“They’re all tall, Lady Cate,” Molly said with a giggle. “But I think I know who you mean. The one at the computer all the time.”

“Yep, that’s him.”

“So, the blonde is Michael.”

“Right.”

Molly’s lips curled up on the edges. “He’s a handsome man.”

“Molly!”

“Well, he is! A girl can look. And who’s the other guy?”

Cate swallowed hard and licked her lips as Molly continued.

“Tall, dark, mysterious vibe.”

“Duke Northcott,” Cate answered.

“Duke? Oh boy! Don’t tell Mrs. Campbell. She’ll probably tie him to a chair and beg him to come to all her parties.”

A sarcastic laugh slipped from Cate’s lips. “I’d like to see her try.”

“Oh, a slippery one, is he?”

“You could say that. Anyway, I’m keeping you from your dinner.”

“It’s okay. If you need anything, let me know, okay?”

“I will. Thanks, Molly.”

After a quick hug, Molly flitted from the room, pulling the doors shut behind her. Cate stared down at the tray of food. While appealing, she didn’t know if she could stomach it. She preferred to head downstairs and determine if any progress had been made and plan for their trip to 1955.

She took a step toward the door before she stopped. Visions of Marcus Northcott insisting she eat before they did anything danced through her mind. She returned to her tray, perching on the edge of her bed as she consumed a spoonful of soup.

She finished most of the meal in record time and gathered her tray before leaving the room. She navigated down to the kitchen to return her dishes. After a brief conversation about their tenuous lead and wishes of good luck, Cate climbed to the main floor and wandered to the library.

She pushed into the room. Damien sat near his laptop still savoring a piece of pie. His monitor showed several windows open with articles regarding the 1955 “Meeting of the Minds.”

“Here I am, rested, fed, and watered. Now, can we go?”

“Oh, hey, Cate,” he said with his mouth full, waving his fork in the air. He set the plate down and tapped around on his laptop. “We’ve dug up some more information about the big meeting thing.”

“Hi. Sorry, I didn’t mean to interrupt your dinner.”

“You didn’t,” Damien assured her.

Cate flicked a glance at the half-eaten piece of blueberry pie.

“That’s his third piece,” Michael informed her.

“Oh,” Cate said with a chuckle. “I’m glad you’re enjoying Mrs. Fraser and Molly’s cooking.”

“I am. Remind me to thank Jack when we find him for this opportunity.”

“I’m not sure he’ll think it’s an even trade.”

“Probably not. Okay, we found out a few interesting things about this meeting and we’re pretty sure this is where Gianna was headed.” Damien flicked the articles onto his screen in rapid succession. “All these people are full-fledged members of The Agency. But this guy—” Damien’s screen showed a photograph of a short, round, well-dressed man with glasses and a handlebar mustache. “—is who we think Gianna is meeting with.”

Cate nodded. “Who is he?”

“Thomas Winston. A high-ranking official in The Agency. Gianna often reports to him,” Marcus said from across the room.

“So, we should follow him in the hopes of finding her?”

Marcus rose from his chair and straightened his jacket. “Correct.”

“Do you think he has Jack?”

“No. I think Gianna has been tasked with handling him. And I do not believe he is in 1955, but we must try to determine where she is going next to locate him.”

Cate nodded, her heart broken by the words. She set her lips in a determined line. “Okay. I’m ready. I just need to find clothes and—”

“Not necessary,” Marcus informed her. “Clothes will be prepared for you at our location.”

Cate stared at him for a moment, confused by the words, then nodded. “Okay. Oh, I need the dragon’s blood.”

“We shall leave as soon as you’ve retrieved it.”

Cate nodded and ducked from the room, swiping the large pouch of sour lozenges from her nightstand before she returned to the library.

“Ready?” Marcus inquired.

Cate offered him a weak smile and nodded.

“Good luck, Cate. We’ll be monitoring on this end,” Damien said with a smile.

“Thank you.”

She turned to find Marcus offering his arm. With a small amount of reluctance, she accepted, and he led her from the room and into the cool night air.

“How are you feeling?” he inquired as they strolled along the castle’s front.

“Fine,” she answered.

His eyes slid sideways to glance at her.

“I’m fine!” she insisted. He remained silent. “Okay, okay, I had another one of those vision things. I still don’t understand how these are memories.”

“Your mind is focusing on events that have already occurred in the past, though you have yet to experience them.”

“When I have the visions, they almost feel real. Like I’m there.”

“That is normal for your circumstances.”

Cate’s features pinched as she struggled to piece it together. “And this is related to the temporalysis?”

“Yes.”

“So, I’m getting worse,” Cate murmured.

“I do not believe so.”

“How do you figure that?”

“Most people who reach this stage do not remain as cognizant as you have. I’d wager you are improving and will recover.”

“When?” Cate cried.

“That I cannot say with certainty. The dragon’s blood should keep most of your symptoms at bay, though.”

He stopped walking near the spot where they’d disappeared into 1942 earlier in the day. “You remember the rules?”

Cate nodded and pushed her hand forward. “Straight through, no stopping until I reach the other side.”

Marcus nodded at her statement before he spun away from her, holding his hands out in front of him. The dim sparkling began shortly after, and the winds whipped her hair around wildly.

Marcus gave her the signal and Cate hurried into the large black hole. Within seconds, she emerged into an unfamiliar space.

Cate glanced around the windowless room. A few candles lit the small area. Unadorned walls surrounded her. She didn’t even see an exit from the space. Had she walked into a trap?

Seconds later, Marcus Northcott stepped next to her. He straightened his jacket and glanced down at Cate.

“Where are we?” she asked as she scanned the room again.

“My London home.” He slid a small gold band from within his pocket and grasped Cate’s left hand. With a flick of his gaze to her eyes, he slid it onto her ring finger before motioning for her to step toward the wall.

He triggered a panel and a doorway popped open. He tugged it back toward them and gestured for her to exit.

“After you, my dear.”

She stepped through the opening and into a large library. Marcus followed her, pulling the bookcase closed behind him.

Dembe stood in the room, his hands clasped in front of him. “Good evening, Duke Northcott,” he said with a bow.

“Good evening, Dembe. Is everything prepared?”

“Yes. I have arranged the clothing you requested and a ladies’ maid for Duchess Northcott.”

“Excellent.” He twisted to face Cate. “We shall dine out tonight. You should be ready at six.”

He strode toward the door. “Where are you going?” Cate inquired.

“I have a few matters to attend to. I shall see you at six.”

“Wait! Marcus!” Cate called as he disappeared through the door. With a huff, she flung her arms in the air.

She turned to find a patient, quiet Dembe waiting for her. “When you are ready, Duchess.” He bowed to her.

“I suppose I’m ready,” she said. “And please, call me Cate.”

Dembe’s face twisted into an amused grin as he motioned toward the exit. “This way, Duchess.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped as her request went unheard. Dembe led her into a hallway with a hardwood floor. Thick wood paneling covered the walls. Portraits adorned the space. Cate studied them as they walked.

“Are these Duke Northcott’s family?” she inquired.

“Yes. Come along,” Dembe answered, tugging Cate away from a portrait and ushering her toward a set of stairs.

She climbed to the next level and allowed Dembe to circle around her, leading her to a set of double doors on her right. He pushed them both open in one smooth motion and stood aside.

“Your suite, Duchess.”

“Thank you.” Cate’s pulse quickened for a moment as she wondered if this was the room she’d glimpsed in her visions.

A quick glance revealed that it was not. Decorated in crisp whites and navy, the room had no resemblance to the large space she'd seen in her vision. A woman stood near a vanity positioned between two windows offering a view of London.

"Your Grace," she said with a curtsy.

"Miss Evans has been engaged as your ladies' maid," Dembe said. "Miss Andrea Evans, meet Duchess Northcott. I shall leave you to dress for the evening. If you require anything, Duchess, please call."

"Thank you, Dembe."

Andrea offered Cate a broad smile as she scanned her clothing. "It is my pleasure to work for you, Your Grace. If you'll sit down, I can style your hair, and then we can change to your evening wear from your—" The woman paused as she eyed Cate's leggings and tunic. "Pajamas."

"Oh," Cate said with a giggle, glancing down at her outfit, "this isn't... never mind."

Cate sank into the vanity chair as Andrea circled behind her, brush in hand. Cate drummed her fingers on the vanity top.

"Is something on your mind, Your Grace?"

Cate flicked her gaze to the girl behind her through the mirror. She lifted a shoulder as she pushed her lower lip up in a mouth shrug. "No. Completely blank."

Andrea paused for a moment before continuing to tuck Cate's hair into a fancy updo.

"I mean, not blank. I have thoughts. I—" Cate babbled. "What about you?"

Andrea offered Cate a warm smile. "Where are you dining this evening?"

Cate realized she had no idea. She licked her lips as she considered her answer. "I don't know," Cate admitted.

"A surprise then," the woman said. "How exciting!"

"Yes," Cate said with a smile. "A surprise."

"Is it a special occasion? Perhaps your birthday or anniversary?"

"Oh, no, it's not."

"Perhaps a new moment to mark then. It sounds very special."

Cate smiled at her as she finished taming Cate's hair back into a stylish bun. She retrieved a small, bejeweled crown attached to a hair comb. She settled the heavy hair decoration on Cate's head.

After a moment of looking over her work, she snapped her gaze to Cate in the mirror. "How is it, Your Grace?"

"Very pretty, thank you."

Andrea smiled and gave her a curt nod. She stepped away from the vanity and disappeared into a doorway, returning with a large white box with rose pink ribbon.

"This arrived for you earlier. Dembe said Duke Northcott sent it for you to wear this evening." Andrea eased the box onto the bed, stepping away and clasping her hands in front of her as she grinned at Cate.

"Oh, how fun!" Cate feigned, attempting to play along with the ruse. With a fake smile at Andrea, she undid the bow and pulled the top off the box. Nestled inside was a rose pink and black cocktail dress with gold accents.

Cate pulled the dress from the box and studied it. "Oh!" Andrea exclaimed, clapping her hands together. "Your Grace, it's beautiful."

"Indeed," Cate said. "Well, I suppose I'd better change." She offered what she hoped was a polite, but dismissive smile at the woman.

Instead, Andrea stepped forward to take the dress.

"Oh," Cate said as the woman carefully laid the dress on the bed before retrieving other accessories. "Right."

She had hoped to avoid being dressed by a ladies' maid, having been uncomfortable with the experience in the 1850s when she'd been dressed by her great-great-grandmother's ladies' maid.

She offered a nervous smile as Andrea waved the crinoline underskirt at her and tossed it on the bed. She approached, tugging at Cate's tunic.

"Now," Andrea said with a grin, "let's get these pajamas off."

In short order, Andrea had Cate dressed in the delicately detailed cocktail dress. She fastened the skinny belt around her waist before she adjusted the shawl collar around her shoulders. She tugged on Cate's elbow-length satin gloves.

"Thank you," Cate said with a nod.

"Any finishing touches? I didn't know what jewelry you preferred. Dembe did not believe you sent anything ahead."

"Oh, no, I didn't. No jewelry. Thanks."

Andrea's lower lip bobbed up and down for a moment before she clamped her jaw closed and twisted her mouth into a smile, giving Cate a nod.

A knock sounded at the door. Andrea hurried across the room and pulled the door open. Duke Northcott waited in the hall in his tuxedo, a dark box clutched in his hands.

“Good evening, Your Grace. Duchess Northcott is ready.”

“No, she isn’t,” he answered as he stepped through the door.

Andrea’s face fell as she glanced at Cate with wide eyes, her chest heaving with concern.

Marcus strode into the room, his focus on Cate. “You look lovely, my dear. But you forgot to send your jewelry ahead.”

Cate chuckled nervously as his dark eyes bore into hers. “I did. Silly me.”

“Good thing I remembered.” He flipped the box open. Cate’s eyes widened and she blinked at the massive diamond necklace against the black velvet.

He whipped the necklace from the box and opened the clasp, swinging it around Cate’s neck and fastening it.

“Now, you are ready, dear.”

Cate twisted to offer him a smile over her shoulder as he offered her his arm.

“Have a wonderful evening, Your Grace,” Andrea said with a curtsy.

Marcus led her downstairs and to a waiting car. Cate settled in the back as Marcus slid in next to her.

“Where are we going?”

“To dinner at an exclusive club.”

Cate fidgeted in her seat as the car snaked through the city streets. Cate wanted to ask more but preferred not to discuss it in the presence of the driver.

The car pulled to a stop outside a large stone building. Wide steps led up to a large double door. The driver pulled Marcus’s door open before circling toward Cate’s. Marcus offered his hand as she climbed from the car.

Cate stared up at the building as they climbed the steps and entered the opulent space. Marble floors peeked from underneath thick red carpeting. A massive crystal chandelier lit the space. Thick wood doors led to other rooms on either side of the entryway. Men in formal attire circulated. Women in cocktail dresses flitted around with their husbands or chattered together on their way to the ladies’ room.

Marcus led her to doors in the back. A man glanced up from the podium he stood behind. His eyebrows raised and his muscles stiffened.

“Duke Northcott! What a pleasure to welcome you back. I have your table prepared. Right this way.”

Marcus led Cate behind the man to a table near a thickly draped window. The maître d' removed Cate's fur stole and Marcus eased the chair in behind her. Cate sucked in a breath as she tugged off her gloves. Her eyes scanned the room. She leaned toward Marcus to inquire about the club when a waiter approached.

After Marcus ordered a bottle of champagne and the waiter stepped away, Cate leaned toward him again.

“Why are we here?”

“For dinner.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at him. “No, really. Why are we here?”

Marcus leaned toward her and lowered his voice. “Dinner.”

Cate sat back in her chair, an unimpressed expression on her face as the waiter returned, showcasing a bottle of champagne. After perusing the label, Marcus offered him a nod. The man set to work popping the cork and filling their glasses.

Cate drummed her fingers against her thigh. After filling their glasses, the man inquired about their order. Cate glanced at the menu in front of her in a panic. It soon became obvious her panic was unnecessary when Marcus ordered for her.

The waiter departed and Cate narrowed her eyes at Marcus again. He casually sipped his champagne. Cate fumed silently, her jaw flexed.

“Relax, Catherine. Enjoy your meal.”

Cate leaned over the table. “This is ridiculous! We're here to find Jack! Not go to dinner together.”

“You must eat.”

Cate's features turned stony. “You cannot be serious. I could have eaten anywhere! We're here to track a lead on Jack, not for you to dress me up and take me out for a night on the town!” Cate rose from her chair, poking a finger at him as she spoke.

“Sit down, Catherine.”

“No! I need a minute.” She stormed from the table, her flurry skirt bouncing as she crossed the room. She fumed as her sensible heels pounded across the floor, heading for the ladies' room.

CHAPTER 14

Cate pushed through the ornate wooden door to the ladies' room, entering the warmly lit space. The soft glow reflected off the deep burgundy wallpaper. Thick carpeting covered the floor. Across the space, makeup lighting wrapped around several mirrors paired with vanity stools. Ladies buzzed around inside, fixing makeup, spritzing perfume, or powdering their noses.

Cate stalked across the room and collapsed onto one of the padded stools. She stared at herself in the mirror for a moment. What was she doing here? Why did she trust this man? Jack was missing and she sat in a ritzy club with a small fortune in diamonds hanging around her neck having a lavish dinner.

Cate shoulders slumped and her eyes fell to her lap. She pursed her lips as she held back tears, propping her elbow on the vanity and sinking her forehead into her palm.

"Oh, now, it can't be as bad as all that, can it, dear?" a bubbly British voice said next to her.

Cate raised her eyes to find a platinum blonde seated next to her. She tapped at her nose with a powder puff before flicking a gaze to Cate through the mirror. Her eyes fell to Cate's neck.

"That's a lovely necklace. What'd he do?"

Cate's brow furrowed as her fingers touched the necklace. "What?"

The woman pulled a tube of lipstick from her handbag and flashed a glance at Cate as she uncapped it.

“Are you a missus or a mistress?”

Cate knit her eyebrows. “Missus,” she answered slowly, wiggling her left hand to show her ring, surprised she was playing along with this stranger.

The woman lifted a shoulder and smiled at Cate. “Ohhhh, lucky girl.” Her eyes fell to the necklace again. “That’s a lovely apology necklace. Did you catch him with his secretary?”

Cate’s fingers fell to the ostentatious diamond necklace again. “Oh, no.”

The woman turned to Cate, eyeing her face to face instead of through the mirror. She cocked her head and offered a consoling glance. “Don’t take it so hard, dear. What you do is tell him the necklace simply isn’t enough. Then you take yourself on a shopping spree on his charge account. Really teach him a lesson.” She patted Cate’s leg and spun back to the mirror.

“I’m just having a bad night.”

“Oh, I understand. But that apology necklace should be a good start at making it brighter. And, like I said, don’t let him off the hook there.” The woman winked at Cate.

Cate smiled and nodded, digging in her purse for a distraction. Cate rummaged through the small bag, surprised to find a compact and a tube of lipstick, apparently packed by Andrea.

“What’s your name, sweetheart?”

“Cate,” Cate said. “Uh, Catherine. Catherine Northcott.”

“Northcott. Hmm, I don’t recognize that name.” The woman twisted in her seat to face her again. “Well, Cate Catherine Northcott, welcome to the club. I’m Ginger. Ginger Fallinger.”

Cate shook the woman’s hand. “It’s a pleasure to meet you.” Cate pulled her compact from her purse and fiddled with it.

“I’m a mistress, in case you were wondering.”

Cate flicked her gaze to the woman. She offered Cate a giggly smile. Cate gave her a faltering smile and returned her compact to her purse, pulling out the lipstick tube.

“You don’t need to be embarrassed. I’m not! And I’m fairly sure Mrs. Merton has a good number of apology jewels thanks to my relationship with her old man.

“Like I said, the trick is to hold your head high and make sure you get a new fur coat out of it, too.”

Cate giggled at the statement. How wrong the woman was, but at least she was trying to be supportive. "I'll remember that."

"There's a better look, dearie. Don't let him ruin your life. You snagged him, now make it the best life you can!"

Cate slicked on a bit of the lipstick and offered a nod at Ginger. "I won't let him ruin my life."

"Good girl."

Cate returned her lipstick to her purse and snapped it shut. "I'd better get back." She rose from the stool. "Nice meeting you, Ginger."

"Oh, I'm sure I'll be seeing you around." Ginger winked at her. "Bye, Cate."

Cate clutched at her bag, striding to the door and blowing out a long breath before she exited into the club's lobby. She swallowed hard as she strode back into the dining room. She spotted Marcus at their table and with a sigh, she strode across the room.

Marcus stood as she approached and seated her.

"Finished with your tantrum, my dear?"

Cate whipped the white cloth napkin onto her lap. "It wasn't a tantrum," she spat between clenched teeth.

"No? My apologies. I must have misread your storming from the room after shouting at me."

"I didn't shout," Cate countered. "I— never mind. Let's just get through this ridiculous dinner and focus on finding Jack. Remember him? The reason we're here?"

Conversation halted as the waiter arrived with plates of food. Cate picked up her fork and pushed the food around.

Marcus slowly slid his knife through the filet on the white plate, enjoying a bite of food before he spoke again.

"I have not forgotten the reason we are here. It is, in fact, the reason I 'dressed you up and took you out' to this particular venue."

Cate nibbled at a carrot, raising her eyebrows at the statement as she kept her focus on her plate. "What twisted logic are you using to justify that statement?"

"Look to your left. The table near the center of the room."

Cate sucked in a breath, growing tired of playing games. She flicked her gaze toward the center of the room, doing a double-take as she spotted a balding man with a handlebar mustache and round wire-rimmed glasses.

Her jaw dropped and she leaned toward Marcus. “Is that Thomas Winston?”

Marcus offered her a smug smile and raised his eyebrows.

Cate eyed him. “Why didn’t you tell me that?”

“I was not certain he’d dine here tonight, though he often does. I did not wish to dash your hopes if he did not. And perhaps next time you will realize you must look the part if we are to track leads in plain sight.”

“You really need to tell me these things. My hopes will be just fine.”

“I just told you.”

“I mean before things happen. I don’t like surprises.”

“Such a pity. I do enjoy surprising you.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at the statement before she flicked her gaze back to Thomas Winston. “Do you think he’s here to meet Gianna?”

“That remains to be seen.”

They continued their meal. Cate stole glances at the man at every opportunity. Her heart pounded against her ribs and her stomach fluttered as she wondered what may unfold.

“Your eyes seem glued to Mr. Winston. Really, Catherine, I am becoming jealous.”

“I’m sorry, I thought we were here to track Winston, not to stroke your ego.”

“You are posing as my wife. It seems that should come with the territory.”

Cate shot him an unimpressed glance before she flitted her eyes to the center table. She straightened, her muscles tensing as she spotted an empty chair.

“Oh, no! He’s gone!” she breathed, her head swiveling to search the large dining room.

“Finish your meal, Catherine.”

She ignored him, scanning the well-clad occupants remaining in the room. “There!” she exclaimed. “He’s leaving.” Cate grabbed her purse, shoving her napkin aside.

“Finish your meal,” Marcus repeated.

Cate’s jaw dropped as she glanced at him. “We should follow him. We’re going to lose him!”

“He will not disappear.”

“But—“

“Mr. Winston will spend a fair amount of time enjoying cigars and after-dinner drinks in the bar room. There is no rush.”

Cate bit her lower lip and fidgeted in her seat as she took the final bites of her dinner.

“Okay, I’m finished. Let’s go.”

“You are quite impatient, Catherine. I had hoped to enjoy dessert.”

Cate bounced in her seat. “I can’t enjoy anything wondering where that man went and if he has any information on Jack.”

Marcus offered her an unimpressed glance but relented. “Fine. I cannot stand to see the disappointment on your face.”

The corners of Cate’s mouth turned up as Marcus rose from his seat and offered his arm to Cate. She leapt from her chair, and they strode from the dining room and across the lobby. An open lounge with windows overlooking the building’s front hid behind two large plants.

Marcus led Cate to an empty barrel chair. “Wait here.”

“What?” she questioned, her features twisting with shock. “No!”

“Yes.” He eased her into the chair.

She leapt from it. “I want to go with you!”

“You cannot go. Wait here. I shan’t be long.”

Marcus strode from the lounge, disappearing into another room outside of Cate’s view. Stunned, Cate stood with her jaw agape as she stared after him.

With a scoff, Cate took a step toward the departing duke before she twisted the other way. She glanced around before settling down into the chair to wait. With her tiny evening bag balanced on her knees, her legs bobbed up and down as she blew out a breath, her eyes never leaving the door where Marcus had disappeared.

Her toes tapped the floor as time seemed to stand still. A couple passed her, striding through the lounge and disappearing around the corner. Cate followed them with her eyes as she drummed her fingers on the chair’s arm.

As she turned, she caught sight of another couple at the end of the hall. Cate’s eyes widened and she gasped. Gianna Caruso stood with a rough-looking man with a scruffy beard.

Cate’s palm patted the chair as her posture stiffened. “Oh!” she murmured, shooting a gaze back toward the room where Marcus disappeared.

Her chest heaved as she whipped her head back toward Gianna and her mysterious companion. She craned her neck in search of Marcus one final time before returning her focus to Gianna.

The woman let out a loud cackle and threw her palm against the man's chest. It was unbelievable how flirtatious she was, Cate fumed.

Gianna slid her arm up to the man's shoulder, then down to his forearm before leading him down the hall.

"No," Cate mumbled, her breath turning ragged. With Marcus nowhere in sight, Cate leapt from her seat. She hurried through the lounge and peeked around the corner. Gianna continued down the corridor, ducking down another hall.

With a deep breath, she tiptoed after them and sidled up to the next corner, peering around it. She wrinkled her nose as she found the hall empty.

"Great," she lamented. Cate glanced behind her before she decided to continue her search for Gianna's whereabouts and any potential clues she may find with her.

Her knees wobbled as she crept down the hall, glancing into the open doors. Most rooms contained offices, though many of them were empty.

In one room, a man sat behind a heavy wooden desk, his feet kicked up on the blotter as he spoke into a phone receiver. No sign of Gianna or her companion.

Cate completed her circuit of the hall, finding nothing. One office door stood open at the end of the hall. She glanced inside, finding it empty. With a sigh, she spun to return to the lounge.

Cate froze, her eyes wide and her jaw falling open as she faced Gianna's companion. With a forced smile, she excused herself and attempted to step around the man.

"I don't think so," he spat at her as he grabbed her wrist.

"Let go of me!" she squealed as she struggled against his grip.

The man shoved her backward through the open door and into the large, square office. Cate wrestled her wrist from his grasp, her eyes scanning the space for an exit. Bookshelves lined the side walls. Outside of a large, stained-glass window behind the desk, no other egress existed.

Cate stumbled back a few steps, colliding with the desk. The glass banker's lamp screeched across the wood top as she clutched at the desk's top.

The man stalked into the room, his eyes fixed on her. The door swung shut and from the shadows, Gianna Caruso stepped forward into the moonlight streaming from the window.

“Well, well, well, if it isn’t the little mouse, Cate Kensie.”

She shook her head at Cate, then glanced around the room before waving her hands at her sides. “And no big, bad Duke to defend you. Well, that’s too bad.”

“What have you done with Jack?” Cate shouted.

Gianna offered her a coy smile and a chuckle. “You’ll never know. Especially not now. You’ve just made this exceptionally easy.” Gianna snapped her gaze to the man. “Kill her.”

“My pleasure,” the man said with a grisly laugh.

“Goodbye, my dear Cate. I cannot wait to tell Jack you’re dead.”

CHAPTER 15

Gianna strode from the room, slamming the door behind her. Cate leapt at the sound. Her hands fiddled behind her as she searched for a weapon to defend herself. She knocked over a pencil cup, spilling its contents across the desk. Pencils rattled to the floor, rolling away.

The man pulled a knife from his pocket, flicking it open. The blade glinted in the moonlight. A harsh laugh escaped his lips as he stalked toward Cate.

She spun and searched the desk for anything she could use to facilitate her escape. She found nothing. She whipped around, inching down the desk away from the man who approached her.

When she reached the desk's corner, she made a run for the door. The man lunged toward her, catching her after her second step. He tossed her backward and she stumbled, slamming hard into the desk behind her.

A cry escaped her lips as she found herself trapped. The man closed the gap between them, squashing her into the desk behind her and wrapping his fingers around her throat. He slid the blade of the knife against her cheek. The cold, hard metal pressed into her skin.

Cate let out a gasping sob. "Please let me go."

"Not going to happen." He studied Cate's face as she tugged at his iron grip. "Say goodbye, Cate Kensie. Tonight's your last night on earth."

"I don't think so," Marcus's voice said.

The man twisted to glance over his shoulder at the man standing in the open doorway, limned in the hall's light. Within seconds, Marcus stood behind him. He grasped the hand holding the knife and bent it backward.

The man cried out in pain as Marcus squeezed until he dropped the knife. Cate wobbled away from the desk as Marcus dragged the man to the middle of the room. She trembled all over and gasped for breath.

Marcus's eyes never left the man he held. "Are you all right, Catherine?"

Cate swallowed hard as a tear ran down her cheek. "Y-yes," she gasped out.

Marcus shoved the man to his knees as he glanced over his shoulder at her. Her attacker clutched at his mangled hand, still moaning in pain.

Marcus stepped toward Cate. The man took the opportunity to run for the door.

"I'm not quite done with you." Marcus spread his fingers out, reaching toward the man. Like a magnet, the man slid backward. Marcus flicked his hand, sending the man flying into one of the bookshelves. He crumpled to the floor in a heap.

Marcus took another step toward Cate. "Wait for me in the hallway."

"Wh-what are you going to do?"

He grabbed her upper arm and escorted her from the room. "Wait in the hallway."

The door slammed in her face as she stood in shock, gasping for air. She pressed a palm to her forehead as she caught her breath.

A scream emanated from behind the thick wooden door. Cate jumped at the sound and stared at the barrier. She leapt again as the door whipped open.

Marcus smoothed his jacket as he stepped from the room. Cate's forehead wrinkled as she glanced around him, her lower lip bobbing up and down.

Marcus grasped her arm and tugged her down the hall.

Cate struggled to keep up with him as he dragged her along. "What did you do?"

"What was necessary," he snapped.

She struggled against his grip. "What—"

"We shall discuss the rest at home."

He strong-armed her through the lobby and out into the evening air. After putting her into the car, he slid in beside her. They rode in silence through the streets until they reached Marcus's home.

Cate followed him up the few steps to the townhome. He pushed the door open, entering behind her.

As the door slammed shut, Cate spun to face him. “What did you do to that man?”

“I told you I did what was necessary. You, however, did not.”

“I saw Gianna—“

“You were told to stay in the lounge and wait.”

Cate flung her arms out to her sides. “I wasn’t just going to sit there while she escaped right out from under us.”

“No, instead you were going to nearly get yourself killed. If I hadn’t arrived when I did, the situation may have unfolded very differently.”

“I thought—“

“No, you didn’t. That’s the problem. You didn’t think.”

Tears formed in Cate’s eyes as his words stung her.

“When I tell you to wait, you wait.”

She firmed her jaw and her nostrils flared as anger replaced hurt. “You can’t keep sidelining me!”

He wagged a finger at her. “I can and I will when it keeps you safe.”

“We have to find information! And Gianna—“

“You risked your life to gain information and were very nearly killed. And for what? What information did you gain?”

Cate’s lips formed a shaky pout as she considered the question.

“As I thought. Instead, you have only set us back.”

Cate drew her chin back. “How?”

“I have told you once before that this is a delicate and time-consuming process. We will not solve this with brute force, amateur sleuthing, or in a day. This is not the MacKenzie’s footman or their under-butler. These people are cunning and dangerous.”

Tears brimmed again in Cate’s eyes. “Like you?”

“No,” he answered. “I have no desire to end your life.” He closed his eyes for a moment before he opened them, focusing on Cate. He spoke again, with his voice calmer and measured. “Try to understand, Catherine, every time you do things like this, you make it one thousand times more difficult to find your esteemed estate manager.”

Cate bit her lower lip at his words. They stung her. “I’m sorry,” she choked out, stalking away from him. A tear streamed down her cheek, and she hurried to flick it away, struggling to compose herself.

He approached her. "You must learn to trust me."

She pursed her lips in an attempt to stop her shaking jaw. Unable to form words, she nodded.

He sighed behind her. "Get some rest, Catherine. We have more work to do tomorrow."

Cate nodded in another silent response, sniffing and wiping at her cheeks as she hurried past him from the room. She climbed the stairs and pushed through the door into her bedroom.

Cate pushed the door shut and leaned her back against it, burying her head in her hands.

"Your Grace?" Andrea questioned.

Cate jumped, pulling her hands away and staring at the woman across the room in surprise.

"Oh, Your Grace," Andrea said, her shoulders falling as she hurried toward Cate, "sit down." She guided Cate toward the bed and eased her onto it. "Would you like a glass of water?"

Cate shook her head. "No, thank you." She sniffled and wiped at her cheeks.

"Would you like to talk about it?"

"No," Cate said as Andrea handed her a handkerchief. She dabbed at her eyes. "It was a silly argument, really. I'd just like to change and go to bed."

Andrea rubbed Cate's arm. "Of course."

In short order, she had Cate changed into nightclothes. Andrea pulled the door shut as Cate slid between the sheets and squeezed her puffy eyes closed.

She covered her face with her hands as she sank into the pillows behind her, tears threatening again. A quiet knock at the door startled her. She pulled her hands away and stared at the wooden barrier.

With a deep inhale, she rose from her bed, tugging her robe around her, and shuffled to the door. She eased it open a crack and peered into the hallway, expecting to find Andrea. Instead, she found Marcus Northcott.

"I thought this may help you sleep." He offered her the piano-shaped music box she'd grown fond of in her own time.

Her lips parted as she stared at it. She offered a meek "thank you" as she accepted the offered item.

"Perhaps a nightcap may help," he offered.

“No, thank you,” Cate said, her eyes remaining on the musical object clutched in her hands.

He paused for a moment as if considering her response before he slid the music box from her grasp, setting it on the dresser nearby.

“It will help you sleep,” he said, taking her hand and drawing her into the hallway.

Cate followed him downstairs to the room they’d argued in earlier. She eased onto the couch, clearing her throat as he poured her a brandy.

Cate accepted the drink in the heavy glass, staring into the amber liquid before taking a sip.

“Are you certain you are unharmed?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod, her eyes fixed on the drink in her hand. “I am only shaken.”

Marcus tipped her chin up, studying her face.

“Really, I’m fine,” she added.

“I cannot impress upon you enough how careful you must be, Catherine. I would not wish to see anything happen to you.”

His last statement crinkled her forehead. “I am sorry if I’ve set our search back further. I only wanted to help.”

He stared at her for a moment longer, then sipped his brandy.

“The damage is minimal. However, you really mustn’t do something so foolish again. In order to rescue your friend, we will need to play our cards carefully, like a well-orchestrated game of chess.”

“It would help if I had any idea what was happening. It’s extremely frustrating to be kept in the dark.”

“It would help if you trusted me. Even a little,” Marcus countered.

Cate sipped at her brandy. “I’d trust you more if you shared more with me.”

He arched an eyebrow at her. “I am not keeping things from you. My primary aim is to keep you safe.”

“I’m not as delicate as you imagine.”

“You have no idea what they will do to you, Catherine, and I do not wish you to find out. This evening’s experience should have been enough to more than hint at their intentions.”

Cate recalled the cold steel of the knife’s blade pressed against her cheek. She hated to admit it, but he was correct. Gianna obviously hoped to eliminate her. She shouldn't have been foolish enough to chase her down on her own.

Cate sighed, sinking her chin into her palm. A lump formed in her throat as she spoke. "You're right."

"Of course, I am," Marcus said. She glanced up at him, expecting to find him gloating. Instead, he offered her an amused smile. "Which is why you should trust me."

Cate finished the last sip of her brandy. "Fine. As long as you keep me informed of what it is we're trying to do."

"We are attempting to follow Gianna until we can ascertain where and when she may have put Jack. Once we do so, we shall formulate a plan to retrieve him."

"How will we know when we've found him?"

"We will know. She will make a stand."

Cate considered his statement, her brows knitting.

"I am far more experienced in this than you. It may be difficult to comprehend, but we will know."

Cate nodded slowly after a moment. "All right. I'll trust you." She rose to stand, setting her glass on the table.

"Feeling better?" he asked her.

"Yes," she admitted.

He offered her a fleeting smile. "Good night, Catherine. Sleep well."

"Good night," she said with a slight smile before she left the room, climbing the stairs and pushing into her bedroom.

She eased the door shut and leaned her shoulder against it. The music box caught her eye. She reached for it, winding it and shuffling to the bed. After setting the tinkling item on the nightstand, she climbed into bed again.

As she settled back into the pillows, she wondered if trusting Marcus Northcott was a mistake. The thought plagued her as she attempted to fall asleep. In trusting him, was she dooming both herself and Jack?

CHAPTER 16

Cate descended the stairs the following morning in her lilac day dress and sensible heels. Andrea had swept her hair up in a becoming style, tying a matching ribbon into a large bow at the crown of her head.

Dembe greeted her at the bottom of the stairs with a bow. “Good morning, Duchess.”

“Good morning, Dembe.”

He motioned for Cate to follow him. “Duke Northcott is awaiting you for breakfast.”

“Thank you,” she said as the soft-spoken man led her into a bright dining room. Fall sunshine filtered through the large window across the room. Marcus sat at the head of the table, a newspaper spread in front of him. Dembe pulled the chair out next to Marcus.

Marcus rose from his seat as she entered. “Good morning, dear.” He eased the chair in behind her as she sat. “How did you sleep?”

“Well, thank you.”

Dembe placed a plate with eggs, toast, and bacon in front of each of them. Cate thanked him for the breakfast before she dug into the meal.

“How will we find Gianna today? What if she left already?”

“She hasn’t.”

Cate snapped her head toward him as she lifted a piece of toast for a bite. “How do you know?”

“She is here for a reason.”

“What reason?”

“Likely to discuss her plans with several key members of The Agency.”

Cate broke a piece of her toast in half and dipped it in her runny yolk.
“And they will be at the business summit?”

“Yes.”

“And so will we,” Cate added.

Marcus smiled at her before taking a sip of tea. “Yes, we will.”

“How will we know where she goes after her meeting?”

“That may be a trickier proposition, but I hope to find information from an unlikely source.”

“What’s that mean?” Cate inquired.

Marcus sipped at his tea again without answering.

Cate shot him a glance. “Truth and trust, remember?”

He flicked his dark eyes to her with an amused smile. “I plan to ask a member of The Agency.”

Cate almost choked on her eggs, pressing a hand against her chest.
“That’s your plan?”

“You sound as though you do not have any confidence in it.”

“I don’t!” Cate answered. “Why would any of them tell you her plans?”

“I hope to persuade him.”

“And if you don’t?”

His teacup clattered onto the saucer below it as he shot her a concerned glance. “I’m becoming concerned about your confidence in me.”

“I like to have a backup plan.”

“If I fail, we shall have to find an alternate method of determining Gianna’s next move.”

Cate nodded as she finished her breakfast. Marcus rose from his chair after Dembe cleared their plates.

“Would you care to take a walk before the summit?”

“To find Gianna?”

“No, to enjoy a morning walk. You cannot be all work and no play, Catherine. We wouldn’t want you to become dull.”

“Sorry, the ship may have already sailed on that front.”

Marcus knit his brow as they entered the foyer. Andrea approached with a capelet for Cate, her gloves, and her handbag. They stepped into the crisp fall morning moments later.

Marcus led her down the sidewalk past the stately homes. “You cannot seriously find yourself dull, Catherine.”

“Again, I’ll say I can’t imagine I am that interesting to someone who has lived for centuries.”

“On the contrary. I find you immensely interesting.”

Cate glanced up at him, wondering if he was being sarcastic. He smiled down at her.

“I maintain your life has to have been far more interesting than mine. I spent most of my twenties studying and even after I inherited a castle, I rarely leave Dunhaven, I always order the fish and chips, and I still spend most of my time on research.”

“You mistake a flashy lifestyle with intrigue, though it rarely is so.”

Cate considered it as they strolled past the colorful trees.

“Do you find Celine an interesting woman?” Marcus inquired.

“Yes, who wouldn’t?”

“Would it surprise you to learn that she spends most of her time in a tiny hamlet in Maine and rarely leaves the Buckley estate?”

“But she has lived for centuries.”

“And does that appeal to you, Catherine?”

“Living for centuries?” Cate shrugged. “I’ve never considered it, really. Do you find it appealing?”

“Yes. I find it very appealing.”

Cate puckered her lips and tilted her head at the answer.

“You should consider the proposition, Catherine. In the event that you are ever offered the choice.”

She shot a glance his way, again confused by his statement. It escaped her when she’d ever be offered that choice. Though one year ago she would never have imagined she’d inherit a castle allowing her to time travel nor that she’d be standing in 1955 London with an immortal duke.

They wound through the streets, arriving in front of a stately tan building. Several men in business suits bustled into the building.

“Is this the Business Summit?” Cate inquired.

“Indeed. Shall we go inside?”

Cate nodded as her stomach churned wondering what they’d find inside. Marcus pushed through the door, tugging Cate along with him. In the large lobby, a few men milled around, some in discussions, others reviewing paperwork.

A few smartly dressed women flitted around, handing off papers, jotting notes on a steno pad, or retrieving a cup of coffee.

Marcus scanned the space as he guided Cate to the side of the room. Cate searched the occupants for any familiar faces.

“Do you see anyone from The Agency?”

“Yes,” Marcus answered. He nodded toward a man in a brown suit with perfectly polished shoes. “Elliott Stevens, a financier.”

Cate studied his ruddy features as the man pontificated something or another to the men grouped around him, waving his hand in the air emphatically.

A dark-haired man in a boxy black suit strode through double doors leading to a meeting room. “Harold Payne. A railroad baron.”

He nodded toward another man. “Arnold Chapman, an oil company executive.”

Marcus pointed out several other individuals. It appeared The Agency’s tentacles reached far and wide and into almost every industry.

“I wonder where Gianna is?” Cate questioned, as she continued to scan the room for the woman.

“Duke Northcott,” a voice said. Elliott Stevens strode toward them. “Are my eyes deceiving me?”

“No,” Marcus answered. “They are not.”

“How interesting to see you here. Are you attending a particular meeting?”

“I plan to drop in on several.”

Elliott’s eyebrows raised at his statement. Marcus tugged Cate forward. “I don’t believe you’ve met my wife, Catherine. Catherine, Elliott Stevens, he handles other people’s money.”

The man smiled at Cate. “Well, and my own self-made fortune,” he added.

“Lovely to meet you,” Cate said, clutching at her purse.

“The pleasure is all mine,” the man said to Cate before turning to Marcus. “I hadn’t realized you married. Though I can certainly see why. Quite a lovely woman.”

Cate felt her pale skin flush.

The man rocked on his heels, shooting an amused glance at Cate. “And attending a business summit. What a good sport.”

“Oh, no,” Marcus said with a chuckle. “Catherine is going shopping. She insisted on seeing me off. She is quite devoted.”

Marcus stared into her eyes as his thumb caressed her cheek. Cate offered what she hoped passed as an adoring and devoted smile, suddenly feeling uncomfortable.

“Well, I look forward to seeing you in some of the meetings. Have a lovely time shopping in London, Duchess.”

“Thank you,” Cate said. Marcus offered him a dismissive smile and a nod. The man spun on his heel and stalked away. The smile faded from Marcus’s lips and he grabbed Cate’s forearm, dragging her several steps away and around a corner.

“I’m not going shopping,” Cate warned.

“I certainly prefer you did not. I’d rather you stay close while the wolves circle. Particularly after last night.”

Cate nodded, peeking around the corner again.

“There will be a lounge for secretaries, you can stay there.”

Cate pursed her lips, frustrated but understanding that she would not be welcome into closed-door meetings of business minds in this era. She nodded again.

“Though I prefer to keep closer tabs on you.”

“I should have brought my doggie cam.”

His brow furrowed at her statement and he froze for a moment. “What?”

“Oh, when I started to suffer from the temporalysis attacks, I’d roam around the castle. I didn’t know what was happening so I bought a camera that attaches to a dog collar and I put it on my wrist. Voila! I could follow myself around even when I was in a trance.”

He wiggled his eyebrows. “And you do not find yourself intriguing. In the absence of the camera for dogs, I suggest something a bit more magical. Give me your hand.”

Cate offered her right palm.

He glanced into her eyes. “Do you trust me?”

Cate swallowed hard and gave him a tiny nod.

He pulled a small blade from his pocket, snapping it open and slicing her hand.

Cate gasped, pulling her hand back. “Ow! Maybe I shouldn’t trust you!”

“I shall heal it in a moment, Catherine.”

He sliced at his finger, pressing it against her wound. After a few muttered Latin words, he pulled it away. His finger healed in seconds. Cate stared down at her bloodied hand, then flicked her gaze up to him.

He waved his hand over hers, then wiped any traces of blood away with his handkerchief. She glanced down, doing a double-take at her healed hand.

Her jaw fell open and she stared up at him. An odd sensation passed through her body. It felt as though she could sense a second heartbeat. “What just happened?”

He grasped her hand and held it against his chest. “Do you feel my heart beating?”

Cate nodded, color rising into her cheeks again. “Yes.”

“And now I feel yours whenever you are close to me. We are connected by blood. If you are in danger, I shall know.” The corners of his mouth curled up as he let go of her hand.

She kept it pressed against him, pressing the other against her own chest. He cocked his head at her. “What is it?”

She let her hand drop from his chest. “I feel your heart here.” She glanced up at him with knitted brows.

“I am impressed, Catherine. You are quite perceptive for a human.”

“So, will I be able to sense when you are in danger?”

He shoved his hands into his pockets. “Should the situation ever arise, in theory, yes.”

She let her hand drop to her side as he motioned for them to return to the lobby. “We should tuck you away safely in the ladies’ lounge while I make my rounds.”

“I’m starting to really detest time periods without gender equality,” Cate murmured as they wandered across the lobby, approaching an open set of doors where several ladies flitted in and out.

“Here we are,” Marcus said. “Stay in sight. Do not slink off anywhere alone.”

Cate nodded at him. “Okay.”

“Do you promise?”

“Yes, I promise. I have no desire to have a repeat performance with Gianna or any of her associates. I’ll stay right here.” Cate pointed to the lounge with a nod and a smile.

“Good.” He squeezed her arm before striding away.

Cate sucked in a breath and turned to face the room. Women bustled around. A few chuckled together as they swapped office stories. Some shuffled through papers, sorting them into folders.

Cate swallowed hard and stepped into the room as she tapped her fists against her thighs. She searched for a quiet corner where she could hide.

After a few tentative steps, she chewed her lower lip, offering a demure smile to a clutch of women who eyed her. She licked her lips as she realized her attire made her appear as though she didn't belong. She continued forward until she heard a familiar voice.

CHAPTER 17

“Well, if it isn’t Cate Catherine Northcott.” The woman followed her statement with a giggle.

Cate spun to face her, a smile forming on her lips.

“It’s Ginger. We met at the club last night.”

“Yes, I remember.”

“What are you doing here? Surely you’re not a secretary, too.”

“No,” Cate answered. “My husband is sitting in on some meetings and—”

“Oh, heavens. And he dragged you here? He really owes you, love.”

“He shouldn’t be long—”

Ginger waved her hand in the air, cutting off Cate’s statement. “That’s what they all say. And then when the brandy is flowing and they’re in a cloud of cigar smoke, they lose all sense of the time. He’s not coming anytime soon, dearie.”

Cate struggled to find an answer when Ginger grabbed her by the arm and tugged her forward.

“Come on, let’s head for a drink.”

“Oh, no,” Cate countered, pulling back against the forward motion. “I really should wait here. I—”

“Don’t be silly, Cate! Trust me, he’ll be gone forever. And it serves him right leaving you here like this. Don’t forget,” she said, wagging her finger at Cate, “he’s a two-faced liar. The least he can do is provide you some entertainment while you wait.”

Ginger led her to a bar room. A bartender polished the wooden bar, empty of customers. Ginger sidled up to it, climbing onto a bar stool. She patted the one next to her, encouraging Cate to sit.

The bartender approached. "Two martinis, dirty."

Cate shook her head, her mouth forming an "o." "Oh, no. None for me, thanks."

"Nonsense," Ginger said. "It's five o'clock somewhere. Two martinis." She waved two fingers in the air and winked.

The bartender set to work making the drinks as Cate climbed onto the bar stool. The second heartbeat in her chest still thudded away. She wondered how long it would take to get used to this. She also pondered how alcohol may affect the strange phenomenon.

The bartender delivered their drinks, inquiring about a tab. "Put it on Mr. Merton's tab, both drinks."

"Oh, no," Cate said. "That's where I draw the line." She turned her attention to the bartender. "Put it on my husband's tab. Duke Marcus Northcott."

The man nodded and stepped away as Ginger's eyebrow shot toward her hairline. "Duke, is it?" She patted Cate's arm. "Well, good going for you, Duchess!"

Cate giggled at her statement. "So, how long have you worked for Mr. Merton?"

"I've worked for Lloyd for nearly ten years."

"I see." Cate's mind whirled as she attempted to come up with small talk, an art she struggled with on most occasions.

"Been his mistress for eight," Ginger added. She offered her high-pitched giggle. "Cost him four apology necklaces for the missus." She chortled a few more seconds before sipping at her drink. She pulled the olives from the glass and stirred them around in the liquid. "How long have you been married to your Duke?"

"Oh, um," Cate murmured as her mind raced to come up with a lie. Her mind quickly did the math between 1942 when Marcus first told the lie about their relationship and now. "Thirteen years."

"Oh, I bet he's given you quite a number of apology necklaces."

"I have more than one," Cate admitted, her mind focusing on the sapphire necklace. "And a lovely music box."

“Oh, a creative one, is he?” Ginger pulled one of the olives off the toothpick with her teeth.

“That’s an understatement.”

“So why have I never seen you in London before?”

“Oh, it’s my first time. I’ve never traveled here, usually Marcus comes alone. Though, under the circumstances...”

“He brought you along for a relaxing vacation so you wouldn’t divorce him,” Ginger finished. “Then he dragged you here. The lousy sod.”

Cate allowed her to believe the lie and attempted to change the subject.

“You must see a lot working for someone like Mr. Merton for ten years, I’d bet.”

“Oh, you couldn’t believe it.” Ginger waved her hand in the air with a chuckle. “And not only that, but I handle some of the ledgers for his business partners. So I see it all.”

“Such as?” Cate inquired, sipping at her martini.

“Such as the amount they spend on their own pleasures. Brandy. Cigars.” She flicked her gaze to Cate and lowered her voice. “Mistresses.”

Cate sucked in a breath. “I wonder...” she began, her voice trailing off.

“How much they spend on entertaining their lady friends? They spare no expense, believe me, dearie.”

Cate shook her head. “It’s not that so much as... Well, I wonder if you’d recognize any of their names.”

“Of the ladies they keep?”

Cate nodded, biting into an olive. “Mm-hm, yes.”

Ginger narrowed her eyes at Cate as she sipped at her martini. “Why do you ask?”

Cate pursed her lips and shrugged. “No reason. Just curious.”

“Curiosity killed the cat, Cate. Or made the wife insane with jealousy at least.”

Cate sighed. “I doubt you’ve ever seen her name. I’m just curious to know how well they’re treated, that’s all. You know, to justify that shopping spree he owes me.”

Ginger burst into laughter, slapping the bar with her open hand. “Well, if that’s what you’re after I may be able to help. Let me tell you, they keep them in some rather swanky places.”

“I’ve heard she’s been romping around with a few others and I just wondered if maybe you’ve come across her name in any of your books.”

“Shoot, Cate.”

Cate licked her lips. “Gianna Caruso.”

Ginger gazed into the air, her nose scrunched and her eyes narrowed.

“Mmm, nope, don’t recognize that name.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped. “Long shot.”

“Two more, please,” Ginger called to the bartender.

Cate shook her head a moment too late, missing the chance to decline. She lifted the glass to her lips. Ginger tipped up the bottom. “Bottom’s up, Cate. Got to make space on the bar for the next one!”

Cate swallowed the last of it, coughing as she placed the glass down on the bar. The bartender swiped it away as he set down two fresh drinks.

She grabbed the toothpick of olives and swirled it in the drink.

“Don’t let it get you down, Cate. It’s better you don’t know her. You’ll only drive yourself crazy.”

Cate recalled her reactionary behavior when she’d noticed Rita flirting with Jack and then with Marcus. Maybe Ginger was right.

Her brow furrowed and she straightened on the stool. “Could I ask you one more name? Sometimes she uses it.”

“Sure.”

“Rita Haverford.”

Ginger tilted her head as she set down the martini glass on the bar. She began a slow nod. “Yes, that name I do know.”

Cate’s eyebrows shot up and she sucked in a breath. “Really?”

Ginger nodded. “Mm-hm. Yes. Not in Lloyd’s books, but in Arnie Chapman’s. Flat rental every month for an R. Haverford. And in a swanky part of town, no less. On the fifteenth of every month, like clockwork.”

“Do you happen to recall the address?”

Ginger snapped her gaze to Cate and waved a finger. “Oh, no! No, no. I’m not giving you her address so you can confront her. Believe me, love, there’s nothing you’ll gain from that. You’ll only lose. Most of us mistresses don’t give a fig about the wife’s feelings. We’re just making the best life we can for ourselves.”

Cate shrugged again. “I don’t want to confront her.”

“No? You only want to drive yourself crazy by wondering if she’s prettier than you or better in the sack?”

“Like I said, I just want to make sure I run up his accounts as much as I should.”

Ginger giggled at her. "You're too much, Cate. You've got the right idea. All right, just this once between friends. But I'd better not hear you've been bending her ear about hopping around with your husband. And believe me, I will hear about it." She waved her finger at Cate in warning.

Cate crossed her heart. "I promise."

Ginger pulled a pen from within her purse and jotted an address on her cocktail napkin. She slid it over to Cate.

Cate studied it and smiled, slipping the address into her purse. "Thanks, Ginger. And believe me, I won't confront her. I have no desire to speak with her."

Ginger winked. "No, just make sure you note how swanky her place is so you can justify all those new dresses you'd like."

Cate smiled and nodded. She spun to the bartender. "Two more!"

"Your husband's tab is going to be out of sight!"

With a grin at Ginger, she said, "He owes me, right?"

Ginger gave her a toothy grin and a wink. "That he does!"

The women spent the next hour talking and laughing over Ginger's tales from the office. Cate interjected a few comments but allowed Ginger to monopolize the conversation. Her stories nearly had Cate in tears as she giggled through them.

At the conclusion of one of her stories, as Cate threw her head back with laughter, Ginger sobered a bit. "Uh-oh."

Cate wiped at her eyes with the back of her hand. "What is it?"

Ginger leaned closer and lowered her voice. "Your old man, I think." She burst into giggles, her nose wrinkling.

Cate's eyebrows raised and she spun to find Marcus Northcott perusing the room.

"Oh, yes, that's him," Cate said.

"Ohh, naughty girl, you're going to be in trouble." The two women chuckled together as the alcohol coursed through their veins.

Marcus strode across the room toward Cate. He raised his eyebrows as he approached her. "Catherine, I thought we agreed you would stay in the lounge."

"Ohh!" Ginger burst out, before covering her mouth as she held back a giggle.

Cate forced herself to sound composed. "Yes, though Ginger thought we may be bored. So, she brought me here." Cate waved a wobbly finger toward her companion as her elbow slipped off the bar. "Have you met Ginger?"

Marcus cocked his head and narrowed his eyes as he leaned against the bar. "Have you been drinking?"

Cate brought her index finger and thumb together. "Maybe a little."

Marcus's jaw flexed at the answer.

"Also, there may be a small bill for you to take care of, dear," Cate whispered, poking a finger at the bartender.

Ginger snickered next to her. Marcus huffed and motioned for the bartender to pass along the bill. Cate cleared her throat and pursed her lips as Ginger struggled to compose herself.

After Marcus settled the bill, he grasped Cate's arm. "We should be going."

"Oh, okay," Cate said, sliding down off the stool. She stumbled, leaning into Marcus until she got her legs under her. "Just let me say goodbye to Ginger."

Ginger spun on the stool to face her. Cate offered her an embrace. "Thank you for the company, Ginger."

"You're welcome, dearie. And remember, he owes you!" she whispered. "I hope to see you again."

Cate smiled at her as she pulled back.

"Look me up next time you're in town."

"I will, thank you." Cate clutched her handbag in front of her, pulled on her gloves, and nodded.

She spun, catching herself before she toppled again and squeezing her eyes closed. She centered herself before she took a step forward. Marcus huffed again as he offered her his arm. She accepted and waved to Ginger as he led her toward the bar's entrance.

They passed through the lobby and into the fresh air outside. Cate gulped a few breaths in, feeling a bit steadier. Marcus stopped as they reached the sidewalk, turning to face her.

"Really, Catherine, I'm surprised at you."

Cate blinked a few times. "Sorry, Ginger can be very persuasive."

With an unimpressed sigh, Marcus tightened his jaw again.

"You told me to live a little," Cate added.

"I'm so pleased you took my advice and proceeded to have multiple martinis at eleven in the morning."

Cate swallowed and puckered her lips. "So, did you find out anything?"

Marcus sighed again. "No," he admitted. "My plan did not play out the way I'd hoped. We will need to reassess."

"No sign of Rita—" Cate shook her head, wobbling on her feet as she tried again. "Gianna."

"None. We received an invitation to a cocktail party this evening. We shall try to gather more information there."

"What about Gianna's flat? Do you think there is any information there?"

"Perhaps, though it is a moot point since we do not know where it is."

"Oh!" Cate said, digging in her purse and pulling out a cocktail napkin. "I do!"

Marcus's brows knitted as she waved the white serviette in the air.

"Here. This is it. Quite a swanky part of town, I understand."

Marcus snatched the napkin from her hand and studied it. "How did you come across this information?"

"Well," Cate began, "Ginger is the secretary for Lloyd Merton. And as such, she handles some financials for him and a few business partners. I asked her if she'd ever come across the name Gianna Caruso, but she hadn't." Cate wrinkled her nose. "But then I tried Rita Haverford, the name Gianna used in the 1940s, and she remembered it. She said Arnold Chapman keeps an apartment for her at this address."

Marcus narrowed his eyes at Cate.

"What?" she asked.

"Why would that woman give you her address?"

Cate licked her lips, stumbling a bit as she tried to explain it. She squeezed at the handles of her purse, crushing them between her fingers. "Oh, well... I actually met Ginger last night in the ladies' room when I was rather upset. She assumed it was because my husband had cheated on me. And then today, she... well, I let her believe Rita was the offending party and she offered her address so I could assess how much you may owe me as an apology."

Cate offered a demure smile as she awaited his response. He stared at the scrawled writing on the cocktail napkin for a moment before he shoved it in his pocket. With a wiggle of his eyebrows, he said, "Well done, Catherine."

Cate's smile broadened. "See, I am useful."

He offered her his arm and they strolled down the street. “You realize, it was not about your usefulness, my dear, it is about keeping you safe. That is my primary priority.”

“Do you know how to get to that address?”

“Yes, though we are not going there.”

Cate scrunched her forehead. “Why?”

“Stefano will do a bit of reconnaissance work first. I prefer to be apprised of what to expect, particularly before I allow you to enter, which I am certain you will insist upon.”

“Yes, I will insist. I worked hard for that information. I had to drink all those martinis.”

“I cannot imagine the horror of it.”

Cate smirked at him as he led her back to the street where his home was located. “I’ll bet.”

They climbed the steps and entered the house. Both Dembe and Andrea greeted them as they arrived. Andrea relieved Cate of her gloves and handbag.

“I have a task for Stefano,” Marcus said to Dembe. The man bowed and disappeared down the hall as Cate and Marcus entered the sitting room.

Cate flopped onto the couch and blew out a long breath. A headache formed at her temples and she began to regret the martinis.

Marcus poured himself a brandy. “I’d offer you a drink, but I think you may have had enough.”

“Definitely,” Cate groaned as she massaged her temples.

She slouched down the couch’s cushions and squeezed her eyes shut. “Why did I drink so many martinis?”

“Apparently, it had something to do with your cheating louse of a husband.”

Cate snapped her eyes open and offered him an amused smile before her features wrinkled with pain. “Oh, I never want to see another martini for as long as I live.”

Stefano hurried into the room as Cate returned to massaging her temples. “Dembe said you wanted to see me, Duke?”

Marcus set down his brandy glass. “Yes. Catherine has managed to acquire Gianna’s address. We should scour her flat for clues and use its location to keep tabs on her.”

“Do you wish me to go?”

“We shall go together. Catherine will remain here.”

Cate shoved herself off the couch, climbing to her feet. “No, Catherine will not.”

“Perhaps you should after your morning.”

“I’m not going to sit here while you search Gianna’s apartment. I want to go, too.”

“Are you certain you’re up to it?”

“I’ll be fine.”

Stefano’s gaze bounced between the two of them as they discussed the matter. “Shall I call for the car, Duke?”

“Yes,” Marcus answered, dismissing him. “Catherine, are you sure you shouldn’t—”

“I’m not going to stay here! This is the best lead we’ve had.”

He tilted his head and pinched his features. “I wouldn’t say best—”

“I would. Now, let’s go.”

Cate retrieved her purse and gloves from a waiting Andrea and pulled them on as they awaited the car.

Within the hour, they were pulling alongside a large apartment building. Cate stared up at the building as Marcus motioned for Stefano to exit the car and peruse the flat.

Cate twisted to face him as Stefano gained admittance to the building. “What are we waiting for?”

“For Stefano to ensure no surprises await us inside.”

“Shouldn’t we go with him? You know, safety in numbers.”

“I will not allow you to enter that space until we know it is safe.”

“Allow me? You’re kidding, right?”

“I am not. Much to your independent nature’s chagrin, I will continue to keep you safe whether you like it or not.”

Cate opened her mouth to reply when Marcus waved his hand at her.

“Calm your modern sensibilities, Catherine. I did the same with Michael and Damien when we’ve worked together in the past. Though I will admit your safety is more important to me than theirs on most occasions.”

Cate ducked to glance up at the building again. She twisted to face him. “Shouldn’t you have gone with him?”

Marcus smoothed his tie as he waited. “Stefano is capable and I will not leave you alone.”

Cate returned her attention to the building rising next to her, sinking her chin into her palm as she awaited Stefano's return. After what seemed an eternity, the familiar dark-haired form of Stefano strode from the building's door.

He slipped into the front seat of their vehicle. "Empty," he reported. "Perfectly safe to enter."

"Excellent." He turned to Cate. "Shall we?"

"Most definitely." She shoved her door open and exited onto the sidewalk. She stared up at the building as the crisp breeze ruffled her lilac dress and her expertly coiffed hair.

Marcus rounded the car and joined her, buttoning his jacket. "You certainly are raring to go."

"I hope we find something!" Cate stepped toward the entrance.

"Catherine," Marcus said, grasping her elbow and stopping her, "you must be prepared for the fact that we may find nothing."

Cate nodded and tried to take another step.

"Or that you may not like what we find."

"Noted," Cate said with a nod.

They strode down the sidewalk to the building's door, entered the foyer, and climbed the stairs to Gianna's third-floor flat. As they approached the door, Cate bit her lower lip. How had Stefano determined the flat was empty? Had he knocked and received no response? How would they enter?

They approached the door marked with a brass seven. Marcus reached for the handle, and with a quick twist of his wrist, the door popped open. He pushed it into the flat and motioned for Cate to enter.

"She leaves her door unlocked?" Cate questioned as she stepped into the apartment.

"No," Marcus answered flatly. "That would be rather foolish."

Cate glanced at him as realization hit her. "Ohhh, another one of your talents."

He smirked at her. Cate nodded and turned her attention to scanning the apartment. A living room filled the space in front of her with a small kitchen on her right. An archway led to a hall.

Cate stepped toward the living room, pulling the drawer open on a console table and swiping the items around inside.

"Do not leave this flat without me," Marcus warned her as she milled around the living room, checking books on the bookshelf.

“Okay,” she murmured.

He eyed her for another moment before he strode down the hall, apparently satisfied with her response. Cate pulled several books from the ceiling-high bookshelf, paging through them or hanging them upside down and giving them a shake. No loose papers fell from within.

She opened a small wooden box, finding nothing inside. With a frustrated sigh, she wandered down the hall. Marcus stood inside a small office. She bypassed it in favor of the next door, leading to Gianna’s bedroom.

Cate scanned the space before she tugged open a few drawers. She shoved the clothing around inside, searching for anything that could be a clue to Gianna’s next step. She found nothing outside of Gianna’s trendy wardrobe and love of shoes.

She blew out a breath, easing herself toward the bed before she leapt up, realizing she shouldn’t leave a trace of her visit behind. Instead, she stalked from the room and retraced her steps to the office.

Marcus stood behind the desk, perusing documents.

“Did you find anything?” Cate inquired.

Marcus cut his gaze up to her, sliding something into his pocket. “A few interesting items.”

“Such as?” Cate inquired, circling the desk to peer over his shoulder.

Marcus snapped the folder shut and cleared his throat.

“What are you doing?”

“It was nothing of note,” he claimed, shoving it to the side and sliding a few other documents around on the desk’s top.

Cate reached for the discarded folder. “I’d like to be the judge of that.”

Marcus grabbed her hand, his fingers wrapping around hers. “No need.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at him. “Why don’t you want me to look in that folder? What are you keeping from me?”

“Nothing of importance. I’ve already told you.”

Cate stuck her hand on her hip and cocked her head. “I feel like the conversation about trust and working together didn’t make the appropriate impression on you.”

He raised his eyebrows at her. She reached for the folder again, sliding it toward her and flicking it open. Her eyes widened as she stared at the contents. She shuffled through the pictures in the folder, her breathing turned ragged and her eyebrows furrowing.

“What is this?” she breathed.

Picture after picture of her filled the folder. Walking across the quad at Aberdeen College, playing ball with Riley at Dunhaven Castle, eating at the pub, touring the gardens at Fyvie Castle with Molly. One final picture showed a close-up of Cate. Dunhaven Castle loomed in the background. A large red “X” had been drawn on top of her face.

CHAPTER 18

Cate picked it up to study it, a scoff escaping her.

“I feel the conversation about your safety didn’t make an appropriate impression on you, my dear,” Marcus said as he collected the images and stuffed them back into the folder. He tugged the last one from Cate’s hands and returned it to the bottom of the pile before closing the folder.

Cate frowned at the closed folder as Marcus set it aside.

“You can’t keep information like that from me. It is relevant.”

“It provides no clues beyond what we already know. And it only proves to further upset you.”

Cate’s eyes widened. “I think I should be upset. It’s obvious I’m a target.”

“Not new information.” Marcus shoved a few more papers around. “There is nothing else here. We should go.”

She sighed as she stared down at the desk. “I can’t believe there was nothing here.”

“It was a good lead, Catherine. We shall leave Stefano behind to keep tabs on Gianna. But for now, we should go.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped but she nodded. They made their way through the flat and to the door. They descended to the car. After a few words to Stefano, he slid from inside the car and took up his post on the street to watch for Gianna.

Cate stared up at the building as they pulled away. Another dead-end. How would they ever find Jack?

* * *

The buildings of 1955 London rolled past Cate's window as they traveled to the Business Summit's evening cocktail party. Cate's gloved hands fiddled with the diamond necklace clasped around her neck for a second night. It completed the pale blue floor-length evening gown with its full skirt and draped back. With her hair swept up into a high bun, large diamond drop earrings completed the look.

Her stomach fluttered as she contemplated running into Gianna again. Would they make any progress in determining her next move? What if they didn't?

Before heading to the party, they'd spoken with Stefano, who maintained his post outside Gianna's flat. The woman had returned home and left fifteen minutes before Cate and Marcus arrived. By her appearance, she'd attend the cocktail party.

Cate sucked in a deep breath as the car eased to a stop. Partygoers climbed the stone stairs into the venue. Cate waited inside the car until the driver opened her door, standing aside as Marcus offered his hand to assist Cate with climbing out of the car.

She accepted, staring up at the building as though it was a prison.

"Chin up, Catherine," Marcus said as he wrapped her arm around his.

Cate offered a fleeting smile. "I'm a little nervous."

"Why, dear? Stay close to me. She will not be able to harm you."

"But what if we don't find anything?"

"We will find our lead. Do not fret."

Cate nodded. "Okay. I'll trust you."

"Good," he said with a smile, patting her hand. "We are making progress."

They entered the ballroom and Cate scanned the space. Businessmen and their wives flitted around the room. Waiters filtered throughout the room, champagne flutes teetering on their carefully carried trays. A few couples danced to the strains of the string quartet.

Marcus handed a glass off to Cate before grabbing one for himself. Cate stared at the bubbly liquid, her stomach turning as she recalled her martini lunch.

“Well, Duke Northcott,” a gentleman Cate had not met before said as he approached them, “I’m very pleased to see you here. This must be the lovely Catherine.”

Marcus offered him a fleeting smile. “Yes. This is my wife, Catherine. Catherine, this is Lloyd Merton. I believe you met his secretary earlier.”

“Pleasure to meet you. Oh, Ginger, yes. Please tell her ‘thank you’ again for keeping me company earlier,” Cate said as he wiggled her hand in the air delicately.

He turned his attention back to Marcus. “I wondered if you’d considered my proposal from earlier. I—“

Marcus waved his hand in the air. “I promised Catherine not to bore her with business this evening.”

“Of course,” the man said, the disappointment clear in his voice. “Perhaps tomorrow—“

“I doubt I will attend. The Summit has already offered all it has to interest me.”

“Oh,” Lloyd murmured as the corners of his mouth turned downward in a frown, “I see.”

Cate glanced from Lloyd to Marcus, then back to Lloyd. “Perhaps you shouldn’t be so quick to decide, dear.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her as Lloyd’s expression changed from dejected to hopeful. Cate offered a slight shrug.

Marcus turned his attention back to Lloyd. “Catherine makes a point. Though the Summit holds little interest, perhaps your proposal does not. Forward it to my attorney in the morning and I shall execute contracts after reviewing them.”

“Yes, of course,” Lloyd said. “I shall have them messengered over first thing. And thank you.” He chuckled. “Also, thank you, Catherine. What a wise wife you have.”

“Indeed,” Marcus said as he led Cate away from the man and further into the room. “Really, Catherine, I did not expect you to be so keen on playing businesswoman.”

Cate shrugged again as she sipped at her champagne, nearly shuddering as she recalled her earlier excursion with alcohol. “Ginger did give us

Gianna's address. It felt right to return the favor to her boss." Cate flicked her gaze away from him, studying the room. "Though the information did little for us."

Her eyebrows pinched and she craned her neck to glance behind her then scanned the opposite side of the room. "Why is everyone looking at us all the time?"

"Because I am a Duke and you are a Duchess. We should not be unpopular, you know. Quite the opposite actually."

"Oh, great. That's perfect. My people skills are so phenomenal."

"You seemed to do quite well with Lloyd Merton and his secretary," Marcus said as he led Cate toward the dance floor.

"I haven't seen Gianna, have you?"

"Not as yet. But also noticeably missing are several members of The Agency."

"Oh!" Cate said, her lips forming an "o." "Do you think they're having a secret meeting?" Her eyes scanned the space as though she hoped to catch them in a corner.

"I'm not certain how secret it is, but yes."

"Maybe we should try to find them."

"A useless waste of time. They will be behind closed doors and we will not gain admittance."

Cate sighed as she scanned the room again. "You're probably right. I guess we'll have to wait here then."

Marcus slid the champagne flute from her fingers, setting it on a waiter's tray as the white-gloved man flitted through the room.

"What are you doing?" she asked as she turned her attention to him.

"Dancing."

"What?" Cate said with an amused smile and a chuckle. The expression waned as he led her to the dance floor. "Oh, you're serious."

Marcus pulled her closer to him, taking her hand in his.

"You know, we could just hide in a corner somewhere," Cate suggested.

"Really, Catherine, you must learn to live a little." He swept her around in a circle.

"I tried that this afternoon, remember? All I got was a splitting headache and a bit of nausea."

"You can avoid using your terrible people skills."

“Ah, so you do admit they are terrible,” Cate said with a coy glance at him.

“I do not. I am only quoting you.”

Cate offered him an amused smile and a shake of her head as he continued to move her around the dance floor.

“How have you been feeling? Outside of your experience earlier.”

“Fine,” Cate said. “I’ve been using the dragon’s blood. No time losses.”

“Good,” he said, sweeping her around in a semi-circle.

“Do you think I’m cured or is the dragon’s blood just masking my symptoms?”

“Both. I think you’re close to this passing.”

“How will we know when it has passed?”

“If you recognize the moment your mind is so fixated on and it passes, you will be cured.”

Cate’s eyes went wide. “Really? So, these visions are all related to the moment I become cured?”

“Yes and no. The moment your mind is fixating on is an important moment for you. Once it passes, the temporalysis should pass as well.”

“But—”

“It is not an important moment because it is the moment you are cured. It is an important moment for some other reason.”

Cate’s brow furrowed as she swayed to the music. What moment was she seeing and why was it important to her? Would it be the moment they found Jack?

“What are you thinking?” he inquired, noting her pensive expression.

“Just wondering what the moment is and why it’s so important to me.”

He smiled down at her before something across the room caught his attention. “The meeting must be over.”

Cate followed his gaze. A few of the gentlemen Marcus had pointed out earlier this morning strolled into the room.

“Still no Gianna, though,” Cate noted.

“I shouldn’t think you’d be so eager to see her after last evening.”

“I’m not eager. I just want the information she has so we can find Jack.”

“She will not give that up easily.”

“Too bad,” Cate lamented. Her eyes lit. “There! She just came in.”

Marcus spun them to eye the door. “So she has.”

Cate craned her neck around, spotting the blonde making her way across the room in a form-fitting evening gown with a ridiculously wide butterfly train. She bustled around with her hour-glass figure on full display as she tossed her head back with laughter and grabbed her companion's forearm.

"Ugh," Cate groaned. "Always a flirt."

The man led Gianna to a circle of men. She leaned forward toward one of them, dangling an arm on his shoulder as she wrinkled her nose in a giggle.

Cate shook her head at the woman. "Gosh, I hope she doesn't split a seam in that ridiculous dress."

"My goodness, Catherine, with talk like that I may begin to believe you dislike the woman."

Gianna scanned the room, her eyes focusing on Cate and Marcus. Cate's eyes widened and she winced. "Uh-oh, spotted."

Gianna grabbed the arm of Elliott Stevens and took a step toward them. Cate tried to flee toward a corner. Marcus held her firmly. "Where are you going?"

"Away from her!"

"Did you not wish to find her and determine what we could learn from her?"

Gianna sashayed across the room, her hips rolling with every step in a seductive waddle. She narrowed her eyes at Cate, a set expression on her face. "Not when she's looking at me like that," Cate admitted. She tried to take another retreating step.

Marcus stopped her again. "We will not run away, Catherine. There is no reason to run."

Cate frowned but stood her ground as Gianna and Elliott approached. The scent of Gianna's heavy perfume wafted to Cate's nostrils. The smell was overpowering. She must have bathed in the stuff, Cate ruminated.

"Duke and Duchess Northcott, what a pleasure," Elliott said.

"Indeed," Gianna added. "I hadn't expected to see Catherine, in particular, this evening. I hope you are well."

"She is quite well," Marcus assured the woman. "Unlike your associate. I fear he may be a little worse for the wear."

Gianna's lips turned down into a frown. "You'll pay for that, Marcus."

"I doubt it."

She flicked her gaze to Cate. "Oh, I'll find a way."

"Harm Catherine and I will personally rip you limb from limb."

"My, my! So protective of the little mouse." Gianna cocked a hip, placing her hand on it. "I wonder what Jack would think of—" she waved a finger at them "—this."

"Where is he?" Cate demanded.

"So impatient," Gianna said. "We'll get to that all in good time. There's still so much of the game to go through."

Cate frowned at her, stamping a foot on the floor. "This isn't a game."

"Really, Elliott, have you brought her here simply to agitate my wife?"

"No," the man said. "That's enough, Gianna."

Gianna's mouth turned upside down in a displeased frown as she shot a glance at Elliott before returning her gaze to the couple.

"We are here with a simple proposition. Duchess, would you care for a dance?"

Marcus tightened his grip around Cate's waist, yanking her closer to him. "No, she does not."

"Oh, come, now, Marcus," Gianna taunted, "surely, she doesn't mean that much to you."

"It's fine," Cate said, tugging his hand from her hip. She held her hand out to Elliott.

Gianna offered a sly smile. "Good girl, Cate. I figured you'd see reason."

Marcus yanked the woman toward him as Elliott grasped Cate's hand. "I'll be watching you."

Gianna ran her hands up his lapels, clutching at his neck. "Not if I can help it."

Elliott whisked Cate closer to him and onto the dance floor. "Where's Jack?" Cate asked.

"Patience, Duchess, we haven't even begun to enjoy our dance."

"I'm not enjoying anything with you. I just want Jack back."

"Hmm, how interesting. I find it fascinating how fiercely you speak about him. Your husband does not seem the type to suffer this sort of infatuation with another man."

"It's not an infatuation. Jack and I are friends." Cate searched the dance floor for Marcus, finding him carefully watching her as Gianna draped herself across him.

Elliott twisted to ascertain the focus of Cate's gaze. He deftly spun her in the opposite direction.

"I prefer your focus kept on me."

"And I prefer Jack home at Dunhaven. So what is the proposal?"

"Simple. Relinquish any and all claim to Dunhaven Castle."

CHAPTER 19

Cate's jaw dropped. "What?"

"Trade Dunhaven Castle for Jack. It's quite a simple proposal. Oh, silly me, I left out one detail. We'll need this, too."

His finger hooked around the chain under her diamond necklace and fished the gold timepiece from under her dress.

"We've got big plans." He winked at her.

Cate considered the proposal. He'd asked her to give up her home so The Agency could take control of the time portals that existed there. Dunhaven Castle would exist without her. Where would she go? Would she ever see Jack again once she left? What would become of Molly? The Frasers?

Her mind raced ahead as it worked out the possibilities. It didn't matter. Jack's life mattered. She opened her mouth to accept when fingers closed around her upper arm. She stumbled backward a few steps as Marcus tugged her toward him. She collided into him, grasping onto his lapel for balance.

"This conversation is over," he growled at Elliott.

Gianna circled them, joining her associate.

"I don't believe it is. Why don't we ask Catherine?"

Cate's lower lip bobbed as she formulated an answer.

"You will not speak to Catherine again. Her answer is no. She does not accept the terms of whatever deal you have laid out."

"Again, I believe Catherine may disagree."

"I can assure you, she does not. Come along, Catherine, we have everything we need from this event."

"No, wait," Cate said, tugging against him.

Marcus slid his arm around her waist, lifted her from the floor, and carted her away.

"Consider it carefully, Catherine," Elliott called, "the offer will not stand forever. And neither will Jack."

Marcus stormed from the room with Cate in tow. She thrashed as they entered the lobby. "Put me down!" she insisted.

"No," he argued as he continued into the evening air. He set her down on the sidewalk.

"Why did you do that?" Cate shouted.

"Keep your voice down."

"No!" Cate shouted. Cate flung her arms in the air as she stalked away from him. Their car slid to a stop at the curb.

Cate sighed as the driver opened the door and Marcus motioned for her to enter. With a huff, she slid into the seat, gathering her dress into the car before the door slammed shut. Marcus slipped in next to her and they drove the short distance to Gianna's apartment. Cate crossed her arms tightly over her chest. Her foot tapped against the floor as she tensed her jaw. Silence filled the air for the duration of the ride.

Marcus spoke a few words to Stefano before the car pulled away, this time heading for his home. When they reached it, Cate stormed up the stairs and into the foyer. She thundered into the sitting room, pacing the floor.

"Calm yourself, Catherine," Marcus said as he stepped into the foyer and eased the door shut.

Andrea hurried into the foyer. "Give us a moment," Marcus said.

"Or two," Cate huffed as she spun, her hands on her hips.

Andrea nodded and disappeared from sight. Marcus stepped into the sitting room where Cate paced.

"Why did you do that? You didn't even know what the proposal was!"

"Dunhaven Castle for Jack."

"Okay, so you did. Still, it's not your decision to make!"

"You cannot give them Dunhaven Castle. Under no circumstances."

"They were willing to trade him back. Now they'll never give him back! You heard what Elliott said. He said..."

Cate bit her lower lip as she ground her pacing to a halt. She wrapped her arms around her torso as she failed to find the words to describe the vague threat, realizing all too well what it meant.

Marcus approached her, wrapping his hands around her shoulders. "We will find him and retrieve him."

Cate's eyes turned glassy as she lifted a hand to her mouth, biting her thumbnail.

"But you cannot under any circumstances give in to their demands."

She didn't respond.

"Do you understand? They will use Dunhaven to destroy more than what is currently at stake. And they cannot be trusted."

Cate continued to chew her lower lip, dropping her hand to her elbow.

"Catherine?"

She closed her eyes for a moment and sucked in a deep breath before flicking her gaze to him and nodding. "I understand."

"We'll find him."

"How?" Cate questioned, pulling away from his grasp. "We have no lead."

"I have our next destination. We shall leave in the morning."

"Do you? Where is it?"

"1965."

Cate bit her lower lip as she searched her mind for the reasoning behind the year. "1965," she repeated. "Why then?"

"The Agency will go after your grandparents. They are attempting to remove you from the equation in any way they can."

Her jaw fell open as she stared up at him.

"You see why they cannot be trusted? The man offered to trade Jack for your castle not thirty minutes before giving Gianna the all-clear to threaten your grandparents."

"So, what do we do?"

"We must convince your grandparents to move to The States and change their names. Gianna will not be far behind and we would not want your bloodline wiped from history before you have been born."

"No, that wouldn't be very good, would it?"

"It would be a terrible shame in my opinion."

"Perhaps we should go now," Cate suggested.

"You need rest."

“I’m fine. And isn’t wiping my family off the face of the earth more important than my beauty rest?”

“You do not need beauty rest. But you do need rest. Your temporalysis has not yet subsided and we do not want it to worsen.”

Cate sighed. “I had almost forgotten. I haven’t had an attack the entire time we’ve been here.” She glanced up at him. “But are you sure we have the time? I can go—“

“I am certain. We’ll leave in the morning and go straight to 1965.” He smiled at her as he rubbed his thumb on her cheek.

“Okay,” she said with a deep sigh as she pulled away from him and wandered from the room.

“Good night, Catherine,” he called as she stepped into the foyer.

She flicked her gaze to him as her dress swished across the marble tiles. “Good night, Marcus.”

* * *

Bright sunshine streamed through Cate’s window as she opened her eyes the following morning. She stretched and glanced at the clock ticking away on her night table. She slid to sitting as she grasped it, sucking in a sharp breath.

“No, no, no, no, no,” she murmured as she ran her fingers through her hair. She kicked the covers off and scurried from her bed, sliding into her slippers and tugging her robe around her.

She flung the door open and scanned the hallway. “Andrea!” she called. “Andrea!”

Her slippers scuffed across the smooth tile of the floor as she hurried across the hall and down the stairs. Out of the corner of her eye, she spotted Marcus in the dining room, sipping tea as he read the morning paper.

Cate ignored him, spiraling off the last stair and taking one step down the hall toward what she presumed was the kitchen.

“Good morning, Catherine,” Marcus called to her. She froze and twisted to face him, abandoning her trek to the kitchen in favor of the dining room.

“Good morning. Why didn’t you wake me? I’ll be ready as soon as I find Andrea—“

“Sit down and eat your breakfast.”

“But—“

He pulled his eyes from his newspaper and flicked them to her. “Sit down and eat your breakfast.”

Cate sank into the chair next to him as Dembe appeared with a plate of breakfast. “Thank you, Dembe.”

“Good morning, Duchess. You are very welcome. Please enjoy.”

Cate took a few bites of her eggs, washing them down with orange juice. She dabbed at the corners of her mouth with her napkin. “Okay, I’ll just—“ She started to rise.

“Finish your breakfast.”

Cate plopped back into the chair. “I will finish my breakfast.”

He offered her an amused smile as she dipped her toast into the egg yolk. “I’m a little concerned that my leisurely morning followed by my equally leisurely breakfast is going to cost us precious time.”

“Gianna has not left this year yet and she will not until this evening, so you may enjoy your leisurely morning, my dear.”

“That’s good news. But how do you know?”

“The Agency is welcoming a new member today. She would not miss such an occasion.”

“She seems rather slippery. How certain are you?”

“Very. Stefano is keeping excellent track of her. Should she disappear, he will inform us.” He sipped at his tea.

“I suppose you have everything under control, then.”

He turned the page of his newspaper and shook it straight. “I usually do.”

Cate stared at him for a moment as she sipped her juice. She almost felt at ease. His confidence encouraged her. She would find Jack. They would find Jack.

* * *

Cate finished her breakfast, dabbing the corners of her mouth with her napkin as Dembe swept into the room to remove her plate.

“Would you care for tea, Duchess?”

“No, thank you, Dembe. Could you send Andrea up?”

He smiled and nodded at her request and, with a bow, he left the room.

Cate stood from her seat at the table. "I won't be long."

"Take your time. We shall leave as soon as you are ready."

Cate climbed the stairs and navigated to her bedroom, finding Andrea already waiting.

"Good morning, Your Grace!" she said with a broad grin as she laid a black dress with white piping on the bed. "This dress arrived this morning and Duke Northcott said you should wear it today."

Cate nodded as she eased onto the stool at the vanity. The style, quite different from the full skirt of the 1950s, fit with the next decade's clothes. Andrea eyed her with her hands clasped in front of her.

"Yes, that will do quite nicely."

Andrea flitted around the room, gathering other accessories before she grabbed the hairbrush from the vanity and proceeded to stroke Cate's hair from top to bottom.

"I am unfamiliar with the dress style. Is it quite new?"

Cate's gaze flicked to it. "No. We're going to a costume party."

"Oh, what an interesting party."

Cate offered her a smile through the mirror.

"What hairstyle would suit your costume?"

Cate's mind spun through the icons of the era before describing a full softly curled style with a headband. Satisfied with Andrea's work on her hair, she rose from the vanity. Andrea helped Cate change from her nightclothes to her 1960s dress.

"Do you have another event this evening?" Andrea inquired.

"No," Cate answered as she pulled the sachet of dragon's blood from the drawer of her nightstand and slipped it into her purse. "Duke Northcott and I will be leaving straight from the costume party for a new location."

Cate slid the clasp closed on the purse and eyed her temporary ladies' maid. "I'm afraid this is goodbye."

Andrea plastered on a wide smile. "It has been a pleasure serving you, Your Grace. I hope your regular ladies' maid is feeling up to snuff in no time. Though if you should require my services any further, I should be happy to return at any time. And, of course, I am happy to travel with you."

"Thank you," Cate said. "I would be happy to have you should the need arise again."

"Have a pleasant day, Your Grace."

"Thank you. You do the same."

Cate offered one final smile before she left her 1955 bedroom behind. Odd, she ruminated, as her heels clicked off the stairs leading down, how easily she'd become accustomed to this lifestyle. Specifically, she'd become attached to Andrea in the short time she'd known her. She felt a pang as she left the woman behind. Her fingers lingered on the thick wooden banister as she glanced into the sitting room. Marcus capped a pen and slid it into an interior pocket of his suit jacket.

A wiry gentleman with an odd resemblance to William Smythe collected the papers, sliding them into a folder. She paused in the doorway as they finished their business.

"Ah, Catherine, come in," Marcus said, waving her into the room.

"Sorry to interrupt."

"No interruption at all. I do not believe you've met my legal counsel, Charles Smythe."

A tingly sensation crept up Cate's spine as he spoke the last name. She stuck her hand out as the man accepted it. "Charles, my wife, Catherine."

"A pleasure." He twisted to face Marcus. "I shall messenger the executed contracts over right away. I will see myself out."

Marcus nodded as the man collected his briefcase and strode from the room.

"Was that—"

"William Smythe's father, yes. I thought you may recognize the name."

"And the resemblance."

Marcus escorted her from the room to the library. "He handled the contracts you so skillfully negotiated last evening."

"Oh, sorry, I didn't—"

"It's fine and you were quite right." He smiled at her as he tugged a book, causing the bookcase to pop open. He dragged it back and motioned for Cate to enter.

She stepped into the windowless room, and he followed behind her, closing the bookcase and sealing them off from the elegant library. Candlelight lit the small space, glowing against his chiseled features.

"Ready?"

She nodded as he took his usual stance. Cate glanced around the small space, wondering if the effect of the opening time portal would differ.

The tiny twinkling began in front of Marcus's outstretched arms. A rogue breeze fluttered Cate's carefully coiffed hair. The candles flickered in the gentle wind.

Within moments, the black hole gaped in front of her. A few candles lost their battle against the torrents of wind that blew Cate's hair across her face. Their flames extinguished as Cate stepped into the black hole, walking forward until she landed in a room she recognized.

Marcus joined her seconds later in the bedroom in which she'd once been a captive. He buttoned his suit jacket as he stepped forward, offering her a tight-lipped smile.

"Ready, dear?"

She slid her arm into the crook of his as she nodded. "What's our plan?"

"Your grandparents should be visiting Dunhaven Castle. This is the final day of their trip. We must speak with them and convince them to leave the country."

He led her down the stairs and into the foyer. "We must also erase any trace of your family from the castle."

"And if we fail, I won't exist anymore." Cate puffed out her cheeks as she blew out a long breath. "No pressure, right?"

"I have no doubt you can achieve the goal."

They stepped into the bright afternoon sunshine. Dunhaven Castle rose high on the hill in the distance. Cate swallowed hard as she considered the task ahead of her. What would they say? How much should she reveal? And most importantly, what would happen if they failed?

CHAPTER 20

The gravel crunched under their feet as they walked up the drive toward the castle. The bright sun gleamed overhead and the crisp fall air gusted past them. Cate's stomach somersaulted as she considered the task ahead.

If they couldn't convince the MacKenzies of 1965 to flee to America, more than Jack's future would be at stake. What would happen if Gianna managed to erase her from the timeline? Would she merely pop out of existence? Would she die a slow, agonizing death? Would she slowly fade away until she disappeared?

Her mind searched for answers in a dark well of which she had little knowledge. She bit her lower lip and glanced up at her current partner in crime. Would he know, she wondered?

Cate opened her mouth to ask but snapped it shut quickly. Maybe she didn't want to know what to expect if they failed.

The castle's shadow blocked the sun as they approached. Marcus banged the door knocker against the brass plate, causing Cate's throat to go dry. She'd felt nervous on prior trips but not as nervous as she felt at this moment.

A butler she did not recognize answered the door. Marcus introduced them, requesting to speak with Mary MacKenzie first. The man motioned for them to enter the foyer and follow him to the sitting room.

"I shall announce your arrival at once," he said before stepping out of the room and pulling the doors shut behind him.

Cate sighed and sank onto the couch, her hands clasped in front of her. She glanced around the familiar space as she tapped her fingertips together to release nervous energy.

The door across the room burst open and Cate shot up to stand. Her brow furrowed as two unexpected individuals entered the room.

A young woman, clad in a bright green dress entered. A matching headband pushed her long, blonde hair off her face. Her features carried an unexplained sadness about them. Her hand clutched that of a small boy's.

"Oh, excuse me," she said with a slight Scottish accent. "I didn't realize anyone was in here."

Cate stared at them for a moment before she murmured a response, her lips pulling into a fleeting smile. "Not at all. We were just waiting for Mary"

"She was on a call," the young woman said, "but I'm certain she'll be along any moment." She stepped forward and offered her hand. "I'm her daughter, Gertrude Mackenzie. May I offer you some tea?"

Marcus shook it, then Cate. Cate's eyes lingered on the small boy next to the woman before she flicked her gaze back. "No, thank you."

The woman smiled at her. She patted the little boy's hand. "This is my cousin, Logan MacKenzie. Can you say hello to the nice people, Logan?"

Logan offered a shy wave and a meek "hello."

"Hello, Logan. It's a pleasure to meet you," Cate said.

The doors behind Cate burst open and a lithe woman strode into the room. Dark hair framed her delicate features and her big, green eyes. A polite smile formed on her soft, full lips. "Duke and Duchess Northcott?"

"Yes," Marcus answered.

"Oh, my apologies," Gertrude said with a small curtsy. "I did not realize."

Cate smiled at her and waved the comment away.

"I see you have met my daughter, Gertrude. Gertrude, have you offered the Northcotts tea?"

"I have, Mother, yes, but have not called for it yet."

She nodded at her, giving her a sweet smile. "Thank you. Why don't you take Logan into the garden for a bit."

"Yes, Mother," Gertrude said. She turned to Marcus and Cate and gave another slight curtsy before she led the boy from the room.

Cate followed them with her eyes as she watched Gertrude lead her five-year-old father from the room.

Gertrude pulled the doors closed, and Mary turned her attention to them. “How lovely to receive a visit from a Duke and Duchess. However, I must apologize for my poor memory. I cannot recall how we are acquainted.”

“We are not,” Marcus said. “However, there is an urgent matter which requires your immediate action.”

Mary’s eyebrows raised as she attempted to piece together the puzzle with the few clues she’d been given.

“You are aware of the secret this castle houses, correct?” Cate said.

Mary’s quizzical expression morphed into one of shock. “I’m sorry, I—“

Cate waved her fake denial away as she reached to the gold chain around her neck and tugged the timepiece from under her dress.

Mary’s eyes widened at the sight of the pocket watch. “Then you know the answer to your question. But what brings you to this time?”

“There is a problem,” Cate explained.

“Quite an urgent one,” Marcus added.

“With the time rips? Or the watch?” Mary inquired.

“No,” Cate answered.

“Please, sit down and explain,” Mary said, motioning toward the sofa behind Cate. Cate eased onto the cushion next to Marcus as Mary hurried to the call bell hanging near the door and pulled it. A man entered and she ordered tea before settling on the loveseat across from Cate.

As Mary perched on the soft cushion, Marcus began his explanation. “There is a group who wishes to control the anomalies housed in these walls. They are quite dangerous.”

“Are our lives in danger? Should I have the children removed?”

“We must convince your brother-in-law, Charles, to move his family from this country. It is imperative that he leave immediately,” Marcus said.

Cate eyed the woman. “We understand he is visiting you with his young son, Lucas, and that this is their last day with you. Would it be possible for us to speak with them? Arrangements must be made immediately.”

Mary pursed her lips at the news. “Well, of course, though—“ She paused, her eyebrows pinching together. “—he is unaware of the secret.”

“We understand that,” Cate said. “However, the threat still exists.”

“Is there any danger to my daughter?”

“No,” Marcus answered. “There is not.”

“How can you be sure?”

“We are,” Cate answered. “Removing Gertrude from the equation does little to nothing to change the line of succession.”

Mary lowered her eyes to the polished coffee table below as she considered the news. After a moment, she nodded. “I understand. I shall fetch Charles at once.”

She rose from the loveseat, circling it and heading toward the door. “Please help yourselves to tea when it arrives while you wait.”

Cate settled back into her seat as they waited. Her stomach continued to roll as she considered the remaining half of the battle.

“That was easier than I expected at least,” she murmured.

Marcus side-eyed her, grasping her hand in his. “You’re doing quite well, Catherine. Though I am not surprised.”

She smiled up at him as the doors opened. Cate snapped her gaze to the newcomer, her stomach settling back down once she realized it was merely a maid with the tea tray.

“Tea, dear?” Marcus inquired as the girl flitted from the room. “It may settle your nerves.”

“I would accept, but I’m afraid I’ll rattle the teacup to pieces with my shaky hands.”

The corners of Marcus’s lips turned up as he poured tea into a cup for her. She accepted the proffered beverage and sipped at it before returning the cup to its saucer and sliding it onto the coffee table.

She bit her lower lip and drummed her fingers on her thigh. Marcus sipped at his tea, dumping the saucer and cup onto the side table before closing his hand over hers.

“Calm yourself, Catherine.”

She flicked her gaze sideways to him, glancing up through her eyelashes. “Saying ‘calm down’ to a nervous person almost never works.”

“This is nearly over. And once we solve this issue, we can focus on forcing Gianna’s hand to return your landscaper.”

“Estate manager and he has a name,” Cate reminded him.

Marcus furrowed his brow and he rubbed his chin in a fake display of confusion. “It always seems to escape me.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at the statement, an amused half-smile on her lips. “Sure it does.”

The doors to the sitting room popped open before he could respond. Mary entered with a man at least a foot taller than her. His dark blonde hair, cropped close to his head, matched the small mustache punctuating his long nose in color. Marcus stood as the couple entered.

Cate swallowed hard as her grandfather's eyes fell on her.

"Charles, please meet Duke and Duchess Northcott."

The man's thin lips offered a polite smile, though his forehead betrayed his confusion.

"I'll leave you alone to speak privately," Mary said. She squeezed Charles's arm as she hastened from the room.

"My sister-in-law said you had some disturbing yet urgent news?" Charles questioned.

"Yes," Cate answered. "We're very sorry to tell you this but we believe your life and the lives of your family may be in danger."

The man's mustache wiggled as he puckered his lips at the statement. He narrowed his eyes at Cate. "I'm not certain I understand why nor why you would go to great lengths to inform me."

"The details are difficult to explain, however, you must take immediate action to secure your family's safety," Marcus said.

"And you cannot tell me whom or what threatens them?"

"A group called The Agency. A powerful set of individuals with several connections, both legal and... less than legal. The property of Dunhaven Castle is of interest to them. We must ensure the Mackenzie bloodline continues to maintain the property in future generations."

Cate nodded at Marcus's statement, turning her attention to her grandfather to gauge his response.

"Why would Dunhaven be of interest? And why is my sister-in-law's family not in danger? They are the direct heirs."

"For now. If they should produce no additional heirs or something should happen, the estate goes to your line," Marcus said. "That must be kept intact."

Charles paused for a few moments before he spoke again. "I must admit I find this tale most fantastical."

"I assure you, sir, this is no tale," Marcus informed him. He reached into his interior jacket pocket and removed a folded paper. He slid it across the coffee table toward the man.

Charles stared down at the paper for a moment.

“Open it,” Marcus encouraged.

The man grabbed the paper, unfurling it. His eyes scanned the writing on the page, one eyebrow arching high. He snapped his gaze up to Marcus and Cate. “What is this?”

“That is the handiwork of The Agency,” Marcus answered.

Charles swallowed hard, returning his gaze to the paper as Marcus continued. “An entire family wiped out. Notice the last line. With no other living relatives, the property was willed to one Gianna Caruso. A woman who acts on behalf of The Agency.”

“I still do not understand why,” Charles said as Mary slid into the room again. “Mary, perhaps you can fill me in on the circumstances Duke and Duchess Northcott seem to be concerned over.”

Mary eased onto the couch next to him. “I am afraid I can share precious few details other than to say they are not speaking out of turn.”

“Are you saying you believe their story?”

“I have every reason to believe them. Charles, I cannot comment much further, but Dunhaven Castle is unique. And it must be protected at all costs. Before his death, Oliver imparted to me just how vital this task is. I am not surprised it is being threatened. And I should very much not wish to see any harm come to you because of it.”

“What of you? Gertrude?” Charles questioned. “Surely your lives are also at stake.”

“Someone must stay at Dunhaven Castle,” Marcus said. “There are forces in place to ensure their safety. Yours, however, is best served by leaving the country. Tonight.”

“Leaving the country?” Charles questioned, his eyes going wide.

“Yes,” Marcus answered. He removed another set of papers from his jacket pocket and placed them on the table. “Three tickets to Chicago along with passports with new names. Someone will meet you at the airport once you’ve arrived and take you to the appropriate location.”

“This cannot be. I cannot simply pick my family up and leave!” Charles contended.

“You must,” Marcus implored.

Charles’s lower lip bobbed up and down as he searched for a reason to refute Marcus’s direction.

“Please, Charles,” Cate said. “I realize how difficult this will be, however, for the sake of your family, you must go now.”

He stared at Cate's blue eyes, his face pinching as he studied her.

"Please, Charles, you must listen to us," Cate implored.

A smile tugged at the corner of his lips. "Your eyes remind me so much of my son, Logan's," he remarked.

Cate breathed out a shaky breath as her grandfather compared her own blue eyes to the blue of her father's eyes.

"Well, I shall think about this," he said, waving the paperwork in the air.

"No, Charles, you must act now," Marcus said. "If we have failed to convince you of that, we have failed in our mission."

"Duke Northcott, I cannot simply remove my family from the country without at the very least a discussion with my wife." He glanced to Cate before flicking his gaze back to Marcus. "Surely, you understand."

"I do not. If Catherine's life was in peril, I would act immediately. Without question."

Charles huffed out a breath. "There are things to be dealt with. We cannot simply—"

"You can and you must," Marcus said.

"I do not disagree about the move. And we shall after a discussion and at least a visit to our home to retrieve our things."

"Take what you have now and go," Marcus countered.

"It is not that simple. It's—"

His statement was cut off by Marcus leaping from his seat next to Cate. "Charles, will you oblige me with a private discussion for a moment."

Cate raised her eyebrow at him. "Surely anything you say can be said in the company of your wife and Lady MacKenzie."

"You may prefer your reaction to be kept private."

The man's eyebrows pinched at the statement, but he rose with a nod.

"You may use the study," Mary offered.

"Shall we?" Marcus said, motioning to the door leading to the foyer.

He and Charles strode from the room, leaving Cate alone with Mary. She flicked her gaze to the woman and offered a smile.

"I hope your husband can convince him," Mary said. "I cannot tell him of our connection."

Cate nodded. "I know." She chewed her lower lip for a moment before she added, "If Marcus can convince him, we will need to remove any traces of their connection to the family. Only you and then Gertrude can know about Charles's branch of the family and their whereabouts."

“I understand. There are records in the office. I shall gather them and burn them immediately.”

“Thank you,” Cate said.

Mary slipped through the doors at the back of the room, leaving Cate alone in the sitting room. She leapt from the sofa and paced the floor.

Cate huffed out a breath as she spun and stalked across the room in the opposite direction. She gnawed on her lower lip, her fingers curling and uncurling into and out of fists. What would Marcus say that would convince her grandfather?

Cate spiraled in the opposite direction. Her shoulders slumped and she squeezed her eyes closed. She hoped it wasn't anything too nefarious. Marcus's special set of skills meant anything could happen. Visions of Marcus wrapping his fingers around her grandfather's neck as he threatened him popped into her mind. She shook her head, dismissing it. He wasn't that bad.

The second heartbeat inside her chest thudded alongside hers. She pressed her hand against it. Steady. Strong. She hoped that meant he was playing by the rules.

She focused on her task. She needed to ensure any records linking her father and grandparents to the MacKenzies were destroyed. Her mind flashed through any locations where records may exist.

Marcus promised he would wipe the other records. He'd already provided documents to allow the family to travel to the States under their new names, becoming the Kensies rather than the MacKenzies. That left only records within the castle.

Cate swiveled on her heel and made another trek across the sitting room. Her jaw dropped open as she recalled one place a written record existed and it wasn't in the office.

Cate gulped in a breath and hastened to the door leading to the foyer, starting down the hall across from her.

Her pace quickened as the library doors came into view. She pushed through them, finding the room empty. Her eyes focused on the object she sought across the room. On a pedestal, the family bible stood open.

Cate raced toward it, flipping it closed before she flicked open the cover. Transcribed on the blue-green fabric interior, the family tree sprawled across the inside.

Cate traced it from Douglas to her great-grandfather Lucas. A chill ran up her spine as she recalled reading this for the first time when she arrived at the castle.

A large inkblot had concealed any names below Lucas and Amelia's. Cate moved her finger down, finding the next two branches unobscured. She smiled down at the names of her grandparents and father.

They hadn't been erased from the family over an argument. They'd been blotted out for their own safety. Cate swallowed hard. And she had been the one to do it.

Cate squeezed her lips together as she hurried across the room to the desk. She tugged the middle drawer open and searched inside. A fountain pen clattered across the wooden bottom.

Cate's fingers fumbled to grasp hold of it. The cold metal pressed against her skin as her trembling fingers grasped it. She unscrewed it, pulling out the ink cartridge as she crossed to the Bible.

With a deep inhale, she turned the cartridge over and squeezed. Ink spilled through the pierced end and splattered across the page.

Cate stared down at the erased piece of history, her emotions mixed. The source of her consternation when she'd inherited the castle had been of her own doing.

As she contemplated the ramifications of the odd situation, the door creaked open behind her. Cate spun to face the entrance, expecting to find the children.

Her heart thudded in her chest as she recognized the figure sauntering into the room. Cate's breath caught in her throat as Gianna eased the door shut behind her and took one step closer to her.

Gianna's lips curled into a wicked smile as she cocked a hip in her colorful paisley dress and crossed her arms.

"Well, well, well, if it isn't the little mouse."

Cate set her features in a stony stare. "You won't win this time. My grandparents are already safe."

Gianna chuckled and offered a fake round of applause. "Bravo, little mouse." She stalked toward the desk and shuffled papers around, picking one up and studying it. "Though this really was just an exercise in futility."

Cate's features scrunched as she squeezed her fists, her nails digging into her palm. "What?"

Gianna flicked her gaze to Cate, narrowing her steely eyes. She shrugged and puckered her lips. “Your grandparents weren’t that important to me.” She offered a fleeting smile.

Cate swallowed hard as her pulse raced. She inched to the side, hoping to sprint across the room and through the door. The two leather armchairs she cherished so much in her time and a coffee table littered the path to freedom.

Her eyes lingered too long on the door, giving her intentions away. Gianna whipped a metal letter opener from the pencil cup on the desk. The steel glinted in the afternoon sunlight streaming through the windows.

“I don’t think so, mouse.”

Blood rushed through Cate’s ears as her heart thumped hard. Her throat went dry and she fought to steady herself. She couldn’t outrun her. She’d have to stay and fight.

CHAPTER 21

Cate's breathing turned ragged as her fight or flight instincts kicked in. Gianna wiggled the makeshift weapon at her.

"Too bad your guardian isn't here. It looks like the great Cate Kensie won't be a problem much longer."

Cate side-eyed the fireplace. Could she make it to the tools hanging on the opposite side? If she could, the poker would make a nice weapon.

As she lunged for them, Gianna charged toward her. She caught her by the forearm, wrenching Cate back and away from the tools she desperately sought to protect herself. The letter opener sliced Cate's arm as they struggled.

"Uh-uh-uh," she chided, clamping down on Cate's flailing arms.

The doors to the library burst open as Cate continued to fight against Gianna's strong grip. Marcus thundered into the room, his features set in an angry stare.

Gianna retreated behind Cate, wrapping her arm around Cate's throat and dragging her backward. She held the razor-sharp letter opener to Cate's throat.

"I wouldn't do anything hasty, Marcus. I will kill her."

"And then I will kill you. I wouldn't risk it, Gianna."

Cate struggled against Gianna's grip, unable to free herself.

"I understand you completed your little mission here. Bravo, though I'm looking forward to the next stop. Aren't you?"

Cate grasped Gianna's forearm as she tried to pull it away. Her face pinched at the statement. "Which is where?" she questioned.

Gianna's muscles tensed for a moment at Cate's statement. Her head cocked, pressing against Cate's. She offered a sharp chuckle. "Oh, ho, well, what's this? The little mouse doesn't know?"

Cate gritted her teeth as Gianna tugged at her, forcing her spine to bend backward to stay upright.

"My, my, what a naughty boy we've been keeping things from our spouse, Marcus."

Cate's brow furrowed as she tried to follow the conversation. Was Gianna implying Marcus somehow knew her next move? But how? And why had he not shared it?

She cackled again. "Well, this is simply too delicious. Cate has no idea where I'm going next. But you do, don't you, old boy? You've known ever since you swiped that note from the desk in my flat."

Cate's muscles stiffened and she stared, wide-eyed, at Marcus.

"It couldn't be more perfect. And since you'll likely kill me before I can escape if I harm her now, I'll let you two sort this out. I'm sufficiently satisfied with the disappointment you'll witness on Cate's delicate little features when she realizes you've been lying to her." She giggled. "Maybe she'll even cry!"

Gianna unfurled her arm from around Cate's neck and shoved her forward toward Marcus. Cate stumbled ahead, crashing into him. He grasped her, holding her steady.

Gianna removed something from her pocket and tossed the letter opener aside. It clattered across the floor as she offered them a smirk. "Have fun explaining this little indiscretion to wifey-poo. See you at the next stop. Oh, and I expect to see both of you there." Her smirk intensified. "And then I'll tell you where we're keeping good old Jack. Toodles!"

She winked and waved as she rolled an object in her left hand. Cate gasped as she, once again, disappeared from sight.

She heaved a sigh of relief as Gianna disappeared. Her shoulders sagged and she squeezed her eyes closed for a moment.

Fingers wrapped around her forearm, turning it. "You're hurt."

"It's just a scratch," she answered, trying to stop herself from trembling.

Marcus removed a handkerchief from his pocket and pressed it against her wound.

“I’m fine, really.” She clamped a hand over the white fabric and tugged her arm away. She stared up at him for a moment. “Gianna was lying about you knowing where she was going next, right?”

Marcus flicked his gaze out the window, avoiding her stare. “Catherine—“

“Right?” Cate repeated, her voice rising an octave.

Marcus lowered his gaze for a moment before he answered. “No.”

Cate swallowed hard, her eyebrows shooting skyward. She sucked in a hard breath and fluttered her eyelashes as she tried to formulate a response.

“There is a reason,” Marcus began.

“Well, I’d love to hear it!” Cate shouted at him.

“You should not go on to the next time stop.”

Cate’s eyes went wide again. “That’s not your decision to make. And it’s not up to you to decide what I get to know and what you get to hide from me!”

“Catherine—“ Marcus tried again, shooting a frustrated glance at her.

She waved a finger at him. “No! No, you don’t get to do that. You lied to me! I asked you if you found anything in her office and you said no! Why?”

“Because you should not go on. I will take you home and I will go myself.”

Cate licked her lips, annoyance forming on her features as she shook her head, her gaze darting around the room as she formulated a response. “Gianna wants both of us there. She said that. We have no choice. And even if she didn’t, you don’t get to make all the decisions.”

“I will handle Gianna. We will get the information we seek, but you must—“

“What? Trust you?” Cate let out a sharp laugh. “You’ve got to be joking. You still haven’t explained why you lied to me about finding that note. How do you expect me to trust you when you keep hiding things from me?”

Marcus sighed and reached into his pocket. He withdrew a scrap of paper and held it toward her. As she reached for it, he tugged it back. “Are you certain you wish to know?”

Cate lowered her chin and gave him an unimpressed glance. “Of course, I want to know.”

She snatched the paper from his fingers and unfolded it. The date and location on it caused a shiver to snake up her spine. Black ink stood in stark contrast to the white paper. In script handwriting the note read:

September 20, 2013, 10:03 P.M.

Pine Hill Road and Route 53

Her muscles stiffened and her heart thudded in her chest. A warm, tingly sensation caused her knees to go weak and her skin to turn to gooseflesh.

“Now you can see why I kept it from you. There is no need for you to go to that particular date.”

Cate licked her lips as she struggled to hold back the tears brimming in her eyes. She sucked in a sharp breath.

“I have to go for Jack,” she said, her voice barely above a whisper.

“No, you do not. I will handle her.”

Cate shook her head. “I won’t risk it.” She sniffled, blinking away her tears before she glanced up at him, firming her jaw. “I’ll be fine.”

He stared down at her for a moment before he averted his gaze, staring out the window as he flexed his jaw. “Fine, though I do not consider this wise.”

“Noted,” Cate said as she stared down at the date again, preparing herself, “though I will again point out that you do not get to decide. You need to stop keeping things from me.” She waved the note in the air. “Even things like this.”

“I will always protect you, Catherine,” Marcus said as he approached her.

He wrapped his fingers around her wounded arm and tugged her other hand away. Fresh blood sprang to the surface as she removed the pressure. Marcus traced his finger up the wound.

Cate’s eyes widened as it disappeared, fully healed without leaving a trace on her porcelain skin.

Marcus glanced at her, catching her gaze. “Whether you like it or not.”

Cate stared up at him as he caressed her forearm. Her brow furrowed as a fleeting memory crossed her mind. Her pulse sped as she worried she may experience another temporalysis attack.

“What is it?” Marcus asked her.

The sensation passed and she relaxed. "I don't know. A memory or a vision. It was fleeting and it's gone now."

"Have you kept up with your dragon's blood?"

"Yes," she said with a nod, tugging her arm away from his grasp. "Anyway, it's gone. I suppose we should be going."

He nodded and she slipped her hand through his arm. He led her from the castle and back toward the house from which they'd come.

"How did you convince my grandfather, by the way?"

"I showed him what would happen if he did not comply with our request."

Cate considered the statement. "Which was?"

Marcus shrugged. "I do not know. Whatever he saw prompted him to make his decision."

Cate's face scrunched. "Are you saying you just showed him something? And you have no idea what it was and that did it?"

"Yes."

Cate blew out a long breath. "Whatever works, I guess."

They reached the house as the sun lowered in the sky. Cate's throat went dry as they entered the silence of the house. They climbed the stairs to the bedroom they'd arrived in.

Marcus eyed her. "Are you certain, Catherine? I can—"

"I'm sure," she interrupted with a slight nod. Her heart thudded and she felt anything but certain, but she pressed forward. For Jack, her mind added.

She pushed her shoulders back and squeezed her hands into fists.

Marcus gave her a slight nod before he took his usual stance to open the time portal. Within minutes, the air in the room ripped in a torrent around them and a black hole yawned in front of them.

Cate stepped forward into the blackness, heading toward a destiny she preferred not to face. She arrived on a grassy knoll. Stars twinkled in the dark skies above and a full moon painted the landscape in an ethereal glow.

A warm breeze fluttered the already-changing leaves, knocking some of them from their perch. They fell in a lazy dance to the ground below.

Cate scanned the horizon, spotting a crossroads in the distance below. Her heart ached as she stared at it.

Marcus arrived seconds later. His eyes flitted around their new surroundings before landing on Cate. She offered him a weak, faltering smile.

Tears filled her eyes even before she witnessed what she expected to happen on the date written on the paper.

Marcus reached for her and pulled her closer to him. “You should not have to endure this.” Her face pinched as the gesture brought the tears closer to sliding onto her cheeks.

In the distance, car lights meandered along the winding road toward the crossroads. Cate’s face twisted as she spotted them. A moment of panic surged through her and she wondered if she could change history.

Her eyes scanned the horizon, spotting another car careening along Pine Hill Road. Cate groaned, watching helplessly as the two cars approached each other, hidden from each other’s view by the large hill between them.

She pressed a trembling hand to her mouth as her emotions threatened to spill over. Tingling warmth surged through her before she stumbled back a few steps. As the cars approached each other, strong arms wrapped around her and pulled her close.

A tear slid down her cheek as she buried her face against Marcus’s chest, squeezing her eyes shut. Her fingers clutched at the expensive material of his suit. She squeezed her eyes tighter as a sob escaped her. His hand clamped over her ear, pressing her closer to him and muffling some of the night noises.

Time slowed as Cate counted the seconds until tragedy struck. Her muscles tightened and she squeezed his suit jacket tighter, twisting it in her hand. She struggled to keep her sobs under control. She considered opening her eyes but decided against it.

His arms held her tighter and she understood why. The hand over her ear failed to drown out all the night’s sounds. Her muscles went rigid as the sickening scrape of metal on metal tore through the air.

A wail escaped her lips. Marcus murmured something to her, but her mind failed to comprehend the words. A horn blared in the distance, breaking the otherwise silent night.

CHAPTER 22

Sirens screamed moments later. Cate peeled her eyes open but clung to Marcus. Tears stained her cheeks, and her breaths came in gasps.

She breathed in the thick, musky scent of his cologne as she swallowed hard. Marcus stroked her hair. The horn finally ceased its blaring. Red and blue lights flashed in the distance, painting the hills in eerie shades of toggling colors.

After a moment, she pulled away, sniffing. “I’m sorry,” she said.

“There is no need to be sorry, Catherine,” he said, keeping a firm hold of her.

“I’m okay,” she choked out, her shoulders heaving as she attempted to cease her sobbing.

“Catherine—” he began, when she collapsed toward him again, wrapping her arms around him. He stroked her hair again as she allowed her emotions to settle.

A car approached their location, its brakes squealing as it slowed to a stop and pulled to the side. Cate lifted her head, wiping at her tears.

“You made it!” Gianna said as she climbed from the vehicle and sauntered toward them. “I wasn’t certain you’d come.”

“Where’s Jack?” Cate asked in a low voice.

“Wouldn’t you like to know?” Gianna said with a smirk.

“You said—”

Gianna waved her hand in the air, her features turning stony. “I know what I said.” She relaxed, cocking a hip and crossing her arms. “Though I suppose you deserve the answer I promised. After all, I am impressed you came to witness your own parents' fatal car accident courtesy of my esteemed colleagues, little mouse."

Marcus tugged Cate closer. Cate's lower lip trembled, and she worked to keep her jaw tight to stop her teeth from chattering.

"The location, Gianna, without your running commentary," Marcus said.

She pouted her lower lip. "Aww, so sweet. First, you lie to her, and then you play the hero." She shook her head at him. "Oh, how the mighty have fallen."

"I assure you I am still as mighty as ever," Marcus spat back.

A wicked smile formed on her lips as she toyed with a lock of her hair. "We'll see. August 11, 1810, follow if you dare." With a wink and a grin, Gianna disappeared from their sight.

Cate's eyes fell to the ground as Gianna disappeared and she gulped in deep breaths.

"We should return home and inform the others. They'll make their stand in 1810. That's where we'll find Jack."

Cate bit her lower lip and nodded.

"Are you ready?"

Cate blew out a long breath and nodded again.

"Let's get you home." Marcus stretched his arms out in front of him and opened the time portal.

Cate stepped through it, landing near the back garden of Dunhaven Castle. Without waiting, she hurried toward the castle. Her emotions threatened to overwhelm her again as the events replayed over and over on a loop in her mind.

The cool evening air caressed her skin as she reached the side of the castle and trudged up the path toward the front. Marcus arrived behind her and called out to her. She did not stop or answer. Instead, she concentrated on holding herself together. The task took all of her energy.

"Catherine!" Marcus called again as she rounded the corner. She squeezed her lips together, holding back a sob as she hurried toward the front door and pushed into the foyer.

Celine and Damien emerged from the hall leading to the library as she burst through the door. They slowed to a stop, staring at her as she crossed. Michael joined them seconds later.

“Hey, Cate,” Damien said, his voice slowing as he studied her pinched features.

Marcus hurried through the door behind her. “Catherine!”

Cate ran up the stairs, her chest tight.

“Marcus, what happened?” Celine questioned.

“Yeah, man, what d’you do to her?” Michael asked.

“I just need a minute,” Cate choked out as she hurried up the last few stairs and disappeared down the hall. She sprinted through the halls with a palm clamped over her mouth. Tears clouded her vision as she raced for her suite. She burst through the doors, closing them behind her as she leaned on them and let more sobs escape.

She slid to the floor and pulled her knees to her chest, burying her head.

A light knock sounded on the door behind her. “Hey, Cate?” Damien’s voice questioned. “Everything okay?”

“Yeah,” Cate called through the door in a shaky voice.

“Can I come in?”

“Just a second,” Cate said, wiping at her tears and scrambling to her feet. She sucked in a trembling breath as she pulled the door open.

Damien lifted his eyes to her, suppressing a wince. “Hey. You seem really upset. I just want to be sure you’re okay.”

“I’m fine,” Cate squeaked out. She pressed her lips together as she tried to control her emotions.

Damien offered her a consoling smile. “You don’t look fine, Cate. And that’s okay.”

Cate’s forehead crinkled as she nodded, tears forming again. She shambled a few steps away and sank onto her chaise. Damien followed her.

“You’ve got a lot going on. With Jack missing, that’s enough to bring you to tears. And having to time hop with Marcus, well—“

Cate leaned forward with her elbows on her thighs and scrubbed at her face. “It wasn’t his fault.”

Damien lifted his eyebrows and nodded. He rubbed the back of his neck. “Okay, well, that’s good. Umm, I don’t know what else could have happened. Is it the temporalysis?”

Cate shook her head. “No. The dragon’s blood has kept the symptoms in check, thankfully. But...” Her voice trailed off as she parsed through the words.

Damien eased onto the chaise next to her and placed a hand on her shoulder gently. "You don't have to tell me if you don't want to."

"It's okay." She wiped at a tear that had rolled down her cheek. "Gianna, she... she kept going to different places in time and we were following her." Cate rolled her finger in a circle as she mimed the time-hopping.

"What times did you visit?"

"Umm, we started in 1955 where you found the Business Summit. And then she went to 1965 and we followed her. And then she—" Cate sniffled and wiped at her face as she choked back a sob.

Damien rubbed her shoulders as she continued. "She said she'd tell us where they had Jack if we went to the next location."

"And did she?"

Cate offered a jittery nod. "She did." Cate clutched the edge of the chaise, digging her nails into the velvety fabric.

"Okay, that's good, right? We can go there and get him."

Cate's face fell as she tried to nod. She covered her eyes with her hand. "I'm sorry," she said after a moment.

"Cate, what's wrong? Is it Jack? Did she say something happened to him?"

"No," Cate answered with a sob in her throat. "It was the last location she made us go to."

"Okay," Damien prodded.

"It was the moment of my parents' car crash."

Damien's shoulders sagged and he shook his head. He rubbed Cate's shoulders harder. "Cate, I am so sorry."

"It's okay," she hiccupped. "I just...I just need a minute. It hit me harder than I thought even though it's been years, and—"

"There's no need to explain," Damien assured her. "I can't imagine having to witness my parents' crash. And they died over two decades ago."

Cate snapped her head to him, her eyes red and puffy. She sniffled and pressed a tissue to her red nose. "Your parents—"

Damien nodded. "Died in a car accident when I was five, yeah."

Cate reached out and grabbed his hand.

"And I can't imagine being forced to watch it happen and being anywhere near as composed as you are right now."

“Ha,” Cate barked. “I’d hardly call this composed.” She motioned to her tear-stained cheeks and her red, splotchy face.

“Way more composed than I’d be, I promise.” He grinned at her.

She returned his smile and dabbed at her eyes with the tissue. She blew out a long breath. “We got a clue to Jack’s location, though. We need to focus on that.”

“You can take a minute, Cate. Why don’t you lay down for a little while? We’ll brainstorm the next move and have it all ready when you come down.”

Cate squeezed his hand and sniffled. “It’s okay. I want to be part of it. I need to be part of it. I just needed a minute.”

“Okay, cool. Whenever you’re ready.”

“Just let me splash some cool water on my face.”

“Sure thing.”

Cate disappeared into her bedroom. She spotted the music box on her nightstand and crossed to it. She wound it and set it down as she shuffled to the bathroom. She glanced in the mirror and winced at what stared back.

She ran the cold water and splashed it onto her skin. Her eyes stung as the water hit them. She squeezed them closed as she pressed her towel against her skin. Her head ached and her stomach rumbled.

Exhaustion coursed through her as she hung the towel on her towel bar and shambled into her bedroom. The tinkling music floated across the room. She closed her eyes and let it wash over her. After a moment of listening, her muscles relaxed and she felt more at ease.

She opened her eyes and continued into the sitting room.

Damien tapped his palms on his knees and rose from the chaise. “Ready?”

Cate offered him a slight smile and nodded. “Yeah,” she said just above a whisper.

Damien wrapped an arm around her shoulders as she approached and they wound through the halls and down the stairs, heading to the library.

He swung the doors open in front of them. Celine, Michael, and Marcus stiffened as the doors opened and Damien strode in with Cate.

“She’s okay,” Damien reported, keeping his arm around her as he guided her to the leather armchair.

Cate sniffled as she sank into the supple leather. Marcus poured a brandy and crossed the room, holding it out for her. She accepted it with a meek “thanks.”

He circled around the chair, letting his hand rest on her shoulder. She reached up to grab it, her fingers lacing through his. Celine perched on the other leather chair. She eyed their hands for a moment, her eyes narrowing slightly at them.

She licked her lips before she spoke. “Marcus said you were able to learn a little about Jack’s location.”

Cate nodded. “Yes,” she answered with another sniffle before she sipped at her brandy.

Damien perched on the arm of Celine’s chair. “That’s great. Where? When?”

“1810,” Marcus answered.

Michael scoffed at the date as he paced the floor. “That’s it? That’s pretty vague.”

“August 11, she said,” Cate added.

“Did she give you a place?” Celine questioned.

Cate shook her head as Marcus slid his fingers from hers. “Yes.”

Cate snapped her gaze to him, her brow furrowed.

“More or less,” Marcus added. “Several key members of The Agency will be in Germany at that time.”

Cate glanced behind her at Marcus. “So, we start in Germany?”

Marcus nodded. “Yes. I’d stake my life that he is there.”

“Germany’s a big place,” Michael said as he paced the floor. “Can you be any more specific?”

“I do not know which Agency members specifically will be there. That would help us identify the places to check.”

“How can we find that?” Damien questioned.

“Maybe there are some records—” Cate began.

“No,” Marcus interrupted her. “We will need to travel to 1810 and search from there.”

“But that could take months!” Cate exclaimed, leaping from the chair. “Or longer!”

“She’s right,” Michael said as he continued his pacing.

Marcus shook his head. “No.”

“No?” Michael questioned. “Care to elaborate.”

Marcus leaned against the mantle, a smirk on his lips. “We shall make them come to us.”

Cate arched an eyebrow, sinking back into her chair. Michael ceased his pacing, his eyes narrowing at the man. Damien's eyebrows squished together. A slight smile formed on Celine's lips and she shook her head.

Marcus raised his eyebrows. "We're going to throw a ball."

CHAPTER 23

Cate crinkled her nose at the plan. “So, your plan is to go to 1810 and throw a party?”

“Exactly, dear,” Marcus said.

“And how does this help?” Cate asked.

“Marcus’s family is quite well known in Germany,” Celine explained.

“A ball at Rosenberg Palace is an event not to be missed.”

Marcus bowed his head at her.

Celine sucked in a deep breath. “It isn’t a half-bad plan, Marcus.”

“Once we learn who is there, we will find Jack. And once we find him, we can retrieve him.”

Cate licked her lips and bit into her lower one, the corners of her mouth turning upward. They were so close. Hope filled her. Damien grasped her forearm and squeezed.

“It must be a concerted effort,” Marcus added.

“We’ll all need to go,” Celine said with a nod.

“You should start in Dresden and travel to Rosenberg,” Marcus said to Celine. “A contingency of Agency members arrive there on August 11.”

“All right.”

“Observe and nothing more. We do not know the full extent of those who will meet later that month and we do not want to frighten them into closing ranks.”

“Understood,” Celine said with a nod.

“Catherine and I will travel straight to Rosenberg.”

Cate took another sip of her brandy before she set the glass on the coffee table and rose again. "Should we go now?"

"No, you should get some rest. We shall travel tomorrow."

"We'll handle getting everything together," Celine said, grasping her arm and squeezing it. "Get some rest."

"I'd like to help," Cate said.

"We know, Cate," Damien said as he climbed to his feet. "But you should rest. You've done all the hard work so far. You deserve a break."

Cate offered a weak smile and grabbed Celine's hand and then Damien's. "Thank you."

She lifted her chin and glanced at Michael. "And thank you."

"You're welcome," he said with a smile. "Get some rest."

She nodded and twisted toward Marcus. "Good night, Catherine."

"Good night. And thank you." She placed her hand on his forearm, her fingers lingering there for a moment as she smiled up at him.

She collected Riley and Bailey and retreated to her suite. She rubbed at her stinging eyes as she slipped her shoes off. With a tired sigh, she peeled her dress off and pulled on her pajamas. Cate sank onto the edge of the bed and stared blankly ahead.

Riley nudged her with his nose. She turned to stroke his head, pulling Bailey toward her, too. They brought a smile to her face.

"I really should try to sleep, boys, though I'm not sure if I can." She stroked their soft fur. "We're one step closer to finding Jack."

Riley cocked his head at the name. "Yeah!" Cate exclaimed. "Jack! We're going to get him tomorrow." She blew out a long breath. "At least I hope so."

A quiet knock sounded at the door to her suite. "That's probably Damien checking on me. I was a wreck before."

She climbed to her feet and shuffled across the sitting room after pulling on her robe. She swung the door open, finding Marcus on the opposite side.

"Hi," she said, surprised by his presence. "Is everything okay?"

"I've come to ask you that question."

Cate studied him for a moment as Riley bounded from the bed and hurried toward Marcus. He leapt onto his hind legs, staring up at him.

Marcus glanced down at the small dog before scooping him up. "Hello, Riley," he said, tracing his finger down the dog's head before he returned his gaze to Cate, raising his eyebrows to prompt her to answer.

“I’m fine,” she said.

“Will you be able to sleep?”

Cate lifted a shoulder. “I hope so.”

Marcus studied her for a moment. “Use the music box.”

She nodded. “Okay.”

He stared at her for another moment, his hand absentmindedly stroking Riley’s fur. “Good night, Catherine. I hope you sleep.” He handed Riley to her with a smile.

She offered him a nod and a closed-mouth smile as she shut the door. She shuffled back to her bedroom, setting Riley on the bed and perching on the edge next to her nightstand.

The small piano-shaped music box sat silent. Cate caressed it before she twisted the winding key.

Sweet music filled the air. She sat for another minute listening to it before she slid between the sheets. After flicking the light off, she stretched out in bed. Her mind whirled as she squeezed her puffy eyes closed.

She focused on her breathing, allowing the music to fill her mind. She concentrated on every note until she finally drifted off to sleep.

* * *

Cate thrashed in the sheets as images flitted across her mind. The sapphire blue of a dress flowing in the breeze. The glint of the diamond and sapphire necklace. A mirrored hallway. Music.

Cate experienced the sensation of spinning. The spiraling soon became dizzying. The music distorted, turning disturbing. Waves of nausea passed over her and her head ached at the temples.

With blind eyes, she searched for somewhere to lie down. Her fingertips brushed the soft fabric of bedcovers. Cate clung to it, pulling herself onto the bed. She closed her eyes and sucked in a deep breath.

Her eyes squeezed tighter as pain shot up her leg. The pain intensified until she opened her mouth in an unrestrained scream.

Cate shot up to sit, gasping for breath. She grabbed at her leg where, moments ago in her dream, she’d experienced the most agonizing pain she’d ever experienced in her life.

She flicked the light on and pulled her pant leg up, searching for a wound. Her skin remained unblemished.

It must have been part of her nightmare. She sank back into her pillows, switching the light off. It had seemed so real. Riley lazily climbed to his feet and wandered up the bed to snuggle next to her. Cate let her fingers caress his fur as her mind whirled.

She hoped the nightmare would end soon, though she worried it was just beginning.

* * *

Sunlight streamed through the tall windows. Cate squinted against it as her eyes fluttered open. She laid still for a few moments, her mind acclimating to her surroundings.

The music box tinkled away on her nightstand. Her gaze flicked around and she blew out a sigh as she recognized her bedroom. The events of yesterday flooded back to her, including the time-hopping to multiple eras.

Her forehead pinched as she recalled their final stop. The realization that The Agency had murdered her parents dredged up more emotions than she had been prepared to handle. Tears threatened again and Cate pushed herself up to sit, refusing to give in to the sweeping sadness that could eat her up.

Instead, she swung her legs over the side of the bed and slid her feet into her slippers. She'd focus on moving forward. On finding Jack. They were so close. They just needed to execute their plan. She hoped to be reunited with him soon.

She went about her morning routine, focusing on bringing Jack home. As she zipped up her boots, the odd nightmare from the previous night crept into her mind. She touched her leg where the pain had been before she dismissed it from her mind and tugged on her boot.

After a walk with the dogs, she pushed into the kitchen. The cinnamon scent of baking snickerdoodles rose from the oven.

Mrs. Fraser and Molly both studied her as she entered. "How are you, Lady Cate?" Mrs. Fraser inquired.

"Okay, thanks. Those cookies smell delicious."

Mrs. Fraser offered her a tight-lipped smile. “Fresh batch for the work today.”

Molly wrung a tea towel in her hands. “Have they found anything?”

Cate swallowed hard, trying to formulate a response. She wanted to give them hope, but not if it would be dashed. Cate licked her lips before she began to nod.

“Y-yes,” she stammered out.

“Lady Cate!” Molly exclaimed, tossing the towel in the air. “That’s great news!”

Cate nodded, a tight-lipped smile on her face.

“Is something wrong, Lady Cate?” Mrs. Fraser asked.

“No,” Cate assured her. “Just trying not to get my hopes up too much. We may still have some work ahead of us.”

Mrs. Fraser squeezed her lips together in a stern expression. “Was that what was bothering you last night?”

Cate furrowed her brow.

Molly tilted her head, a concerned expression crossing her features. “Your friends told us you went to bed early because you were exhausted.”

“The Englishman said you should not be disturbed,” Mrs. Fraser said, throwing her shoulders back and wagging her head. “As though we’d disturb you!”

“I’m sorry, Mrs. Fraser. I’m sure he—“

Mrs. Fraser shook her head and waved Cate’s comment away before she finished. “I suppose it’s fine. He seems very protective of you. Just like we are.”

“Anyway, yes, I was exhausted. It feels like I lived through days instead of hours. I just needed some rest. Especially with the plans to follow up on the lead today.”

Mrs. Fraser grasped Cate’s shoulders and stared at her. “If you need any help, Lady Cate, you know where to find us. And I mean that for more than just biscuits.”

Molly approached and rubbed Cate’s arm. “Yeah. You can’t take this all on yourself. If you need anything, Lady Cate, just ask.”

Cate smiled at them both. “Thanks. We’re all going to track this lead from two different angles, so we should have it handled. But thank you.”

Mrs. Fraser offered a tight-lipped smile and a nod. “But not before your breakfast! We’ll have it up in just a moment.”

“Thanks, Mrs. Fraser,” Cate said. “And do you mind if I leave the dogs with you while we travel?”

“Not at all. Molly and I will take good care of them. You go and don’t worry about a thing. Bring Jack home. And we’ll be here waiting, giving the pups lots of treats.” At the last word, Riley cocked his head and Bailey sat at attention.

“They’ll be in good hands, then,” Cate said with a chuckle. She strode from the room.

As she reached the door, Molly’s voice stopped her. “Where’s the lead?”

Cate twisted back to face her, her hand clutching the door jamb. “What?”

“Where’s the lead you’re tracking?”

Cate flicked her gaze between the two women, both of them waiting for her answer. She swallowed hard and forced a fleeting smile onto her face. “Germany.”

Molly’s jaw dropped and her brow furrowed in confusion. She shot a glance to Mrs. Fraser, who matched her expression. Cate took the opportunity their stunned silence gave her to hasten from the room and up to the dining room.

Damien and Celine already waited inside. Damien’s face lit up as she slipped into the room. “Hey, Cate! Good morning.” He leapt from his chair at the table and pulled a chair out for Cate. “Did you get any sleep?”

Cate nodded as she sank onto the cushion while he eased the chair behind her. “I did. And I’ve informed Molly and Mrs. Fraser we’re following up on a lead today.” Cate ran her fingers along the chain of her pocket watch pendant. “Gosh, I hope I didn’t give them false hope.”

“We’ll find him, Cate,” Celine promised.

Cate smiled and nodded at her, clinging to the certainty hinted at in her statement. Marcus strode into the room moments later. Michael followed him, still strapping on his watch.

“Good morning, Catherine,” Marcus said. “Did you sleep?”

“I did, thank you,” Cate said. “I’m ready for today.”

The conversation dropped off as Molly and Mrs. Fraser delivered their breakfast. “And good luck today,” Mrs. Fraser said before she excused herself from the room.

Cate waited for the door to swing shut behind them before she spoke. “Once we see who is in Germany, how will we track Jack?”

“We shall begin with the most obvious places based on those who attend. They have certain strongholds, places he’d be more likely to be kept,” Marcus explained.

Cate nodded as she stirred her oatmeal before eating a spoonful. “And then what?”

“That depends,” Marcus answered.

“On?”

“On where he is and how easily we can get him back.”

Cate nodded as she stared at the swirls in her oatmeal. Her leg bounced up and down as she considered the task ahead. So close, yet they still seemed so far. Celine’s words echoed in her mind and she clung to them again. They would find him.

As they continued their breakfast, a knock sounded at the door. Marcus rose from the table, waving Cate back to her seat. “That would be Dembe.”

He disappeared from the room as Cate hurried through the last bites of her meal. She wiped at the corners of her mouth before she rose from her chair, discarding the napkin on the table.

The others followed her lead. She made her way to the foyer, finding the front door already closed.

“Library, probably,” Celine said.

Cate nodded and led the group down the hall, finding Marcus and Dembe in the library as Celine suggested.

“There you are. Clothing for our journey. We shall meet here and proceed to 1810 in one hour.”

Dembe distributed the clothing and they went their separate ways to change.

Cate closed herself in her suite with the dress box in her hand. Her stomach somersaulted and she wondered if her oatmeal may make a reappearance in an unwelcome form.

She forced herself to cross through her sitting room and bedroom and into the bathroom. She pulled her hair into an upswept style before she wandered back into the bedroom.

As she jiggled the top off the box, the music box began to play across the room. Cate stared at it for a moment before she tugged the top off the large dress box. A cream-colored dress lay inside. Green, gold, and orange embroidered details trimmed the sleeves, bust, and bottom.

She pulled the garment on and fastened it, settling the empire waist into position. With a glance in the full-length mirror, she blew out a long breath. "I'm coming for you, Jack," she whispered before she tugged up the long train and hurried from her room.

Cate snaked through the halls, her heart in her throat, and descended the back stairs, making her way to the library.

Marcus awaited her. He smiled at her as she entered the room, studying her up and down. "You look quite lovely, dear."

"Thank you," Cate said, feeling color rising in her pale cheeks.

Michael strode in a few moments later, tugging at his collar. "Man, I hate the past."

"Get over it, buddy, you'll live," Damien said as he strode in. Celine followed in a dress similar, though much plainer than Cate's.

"Are we ready?" Marcus inquired.

"Yes, I think so," Cate answered, eyeing the others for confirmation.

With nods from everyone, Marcus offered his arm to Cate. They strode from the castle to the back garden. He eyed Celine, Michael, and Damien. "I will open one portal for you to Dresden. Once that closes, I shall open the portal for Catherine and myself."

Cate nodded and stood back as he opened the time portal for her time-traveling companions. As the wind whipped around them and the black hole yawned open, Celine, Michael, and Damien entered, disappearing into the blackness.

Marcus lowered his hands and the portal snapped shut. He twisted to face Cate. "Ready, my dear?"

Cate nodded and Marcus repeated the procedure, opening another time portal to 1810. Cate stepped into the black hole, stepping forward until she met bright sunshine.

CHAPTER 24

Cate's features pinched as she spun in a circle, scanning her surroundings. She expected to appear in a hidden room inside a castle or somewhere on its grounds. Instead, she stood in an alley in some unknown city.

Marcus appeared moments later. She slipped her hand around his arm and he led her forward.

"Where are we?" she inquired.

"Zurich," he answered as they approached a black carriage, drawn by four jet-black horses.

Dembe stood near the coachman, who held the door open.

"Has the missive been sent as directed?" Marcus inquired as Cate climbed into the conveyance and settled into the seat.

"Yes, Duke. It has been sent as instructed."

"And arrangements have begun?"

Dembe gave him a silent nod. Marcus's lips formed a fleeting smile and he climbed into the carriage. The coachman closed the door behind them. The carriage wobbled as he and Dembe climbed up to the coachman's seat. A whipped crack and the carriage lurched forward.

Marcus smiled at Cate as she stared out the window, watching the buildings of 1810 Zurich pass by her window.

She'd never traveled to the city in any time period before. In fact, she had rarely traveled outside of the States before her move to Dunhaven. She found the foreign city's streets and buildings fascinating regardless of the era.

The coach slowed to a stop, still surrounded by the cityscape. Cate ducked her head to glance out at their surroundings as Marcus alighted from the carriage. She switched her view to the opposite window, studying the man with whom Marcus spoke. The carriage swayed as Dembe disembarked to join the discussion.

She did not recognize the man. Graying temples accented his jet-black hair. His sharp features offered him a sinister appearance. He spoke a few words to Marcus, bobbing his head up and down and waving his hands in front of him in what appeared to be an assurance of some kind.

Marcus gave him a nod as the door to the home behind him opened. A blonde woman hurried out, sidling to the dark-haired man and slipping her hand through his arm. She offered a demure smile, batting her eyelashes at Marcus.

Her big blue eyes, high cheekbones, and full lips reminded Cate of someone. Marcus nodded to her and she spoke a few words to him before he shook his head.

Disappointment filled her full features and her shoulders sagged. She flicked a gaze away from him, her icy blue eyes landing on Cate in the carriage. She crinkled her brow and tilted her head, snapping her gaze back to Marcus. Her face pinched as she spat out a few words at him, waving her hand toward the carriage.

Marcus spoke a few words to her before returning his attention to the man. He offered a few more words before he spun on his heel and strode back to the carriage.

"I shall ensure it is done!" the man called behind him.

"See that it is, Theodore. I do not tolerate failure as you well know," Marcus said over his shoulder before he climbed aboard.

Dembe returned to his seat and the carriage lurched forward again. The blonde remained outside as they pulled away, her icy gaze and pinched features glaring at them.

Cate swayed with the movement of the carriage for a moment before she spoke. "Problem?"

"No," Marcus said. "Mr. VanWoodsen will be keeping track of several things for us to make finding your gardener easier."

Cate bit her lower lip, allowing the reference to Jack to slide, as she parsed through the words. “The woman seemed agitated.”

Marcus offered her a half-smile. “You are very observant, Catherine.”

Cate stared at him, awaiting more of a response, but fearing she would not receive one.

“That was Celine’s sister, Celeste. She was less than impressed that I am traveling with another woman.”

Cate’s lips parted as realization struck her. “Oh, that would explain why she looked so familiar.”

“Yes, the Devereaux women share a certain beauty.”

Cate nodded. “Yes, she looks very much like Celine. They’re both extraordinarily pretty.”

The buildings thinned, giving way to the countryside. Cate settled back in her seat as the city faded away. “How long will it take to reach Rosenberg?”

“The better part of the day. We shall arrive in the late afternoon.”

Cate smiled and nodded as she settled into her seat, content to watch the countryside pass her by as they continued along their journey. The German landscape soon filled her window. She stared out at the green hills, thick with lush trees. The bright sunshine painted the countryside in a cheery, idyllic light, reminding her of a landscape painting.

After a midday picnic, they climbed back into the carriage and continued along their way. As Cate climbed into the conveyance, she spotted trunks loaded onto the back. Her brow furrowed at them. They had not traveled with luggage before. Why were they traveling at all, though, her mind questioned? Marcus said he could open a portal to any location. Why did he not open one inside his own castle?

Cate concluded the meeting with Celine’s sister and the man she presumed was her husband must be the reason. She hoped Celeste’s disdain over Marcus’s traveling companion did not ruin any plans of finding Jack.

As the carriage sprang to life and the countryside rolled past, she concluded it would not. Marcus indicated that her visions of the future centered around some important moment. It had to be when they found Jack or when she reunited with him.

The dress in her visions, the one she’d found in the tower room, fit with this time period. She must reunite with Jack, perhaps at the ball, while wearing the dress. She clung to the hope.

As the sun lowered in the sky, they continued past rolling green hills and small towns. Cate glanced out the window, her eyes sweeping over the picturesque scenery. A large hill rose in the distance. Something appeared to sit atop it. Cate ducked for a better view as they approached.

Her lips parted as the carriage closed the distance and she spotted a massive sprawling castle atop. Its many towers and turrets rose high into the sky. Flags and banners waved from the top. A few fluffy white clouds floated below the castle. It towered on the tall hilltop over the surrounding lands.

Cate arched an eyebrow at the impressive, fortified castle, flicking a gaze to Marcus. "Is that Rosenberg?"

"Yes," Marcus answered. "We should arrive within the hour."

"That's quite an impressive castle," Cate said as she settled back in her seat.

Marcus smiled at her. "Oh, I nearly forgot." He dug in his pocket and produced a gold band. "You'll need this again."

Before Cate could reach for the shiny object, Marcus took her left hand and slid the ring onto her third finger. She pulled her hand away, staring at the object for a moment before she directed her gaze out the window as the carriage tilted backward.

They had begun the winding climb to the towering palace on the hill. The climb took over forty-five minutes in total. As they approached the final stretch, Cate eyed the castle. A contingency of people waited at the entrance.

She assumed the staff had been summoned to welcome Marcus to his family's estate. A woman stood separate from the others. Her bright red dress stood in stark contrast with the tan stones of the castle. The thick fabric and gold embroidery along the edges of the dress suggested she was not a servant.

The carriage eased to a stop and swayed as the coachman leapt from his perch and tugged open the door. Marcus stepped out of the conveyance. The woman approached him, opening her arms in an embrace.

Marcus kissed her cheek in greeting. "Hello, Mother."

Cate's eyes went wide. "Mother?" she breathed.

"You are looking well," Marcus said as his mother held him out at arm's length to inspect him. Her flawless ivory skin still held a youthfulness despite the few streaks of gray in her blonde hair.

Cate stared down at the gold band glinting off her ring finger. Her heart pounded and her stomach turned over.

“As are you,” his mother answered. “Marriage agrees with you. I am looking most forward to meeting your bride.”

Cate cringed at the words. “Oh no,” she whispered. “This can’t be happening.”

Marcus’s hand slid inside the carriage. Cate swallowed hard, her limbs going weak and warmth flushing over her as she slid her hand inside his. He tugged her forward and she climbed down from the carriage, swallowing hard as the woman, a pleasant smile on her face, eyed her.

Cate plastered a smile on her face as her mind scurried to recall appropriate protocol. The woman was a duchess, she should curtsy. No, her mind corrected, if she was married to her son, the duke, she was the duchess. The woman would be a dowager which meant she was not the current duchess, so she did not need to curtsy. At least she hoped.

“Mother, this is Catherine, my wife. Catherine, my mother, Anna.”

Cate’s insides jiggled as she stepped forward, the smile still plastered on her features. She offered a demure, “Hello.”

Anna pulled her into a warm embrace. “Welcome to Rosenberg Palace, dear.”

“Thank you.” Cate stepped back, trying not to fidget as nervous energy coursed through her. She had not expected this. On top of finding Jack, she had not anticipated meeting her mother-in-law. Fake or otherwise. She was a terrible conversationalist. The woman, once a duchess, would likely wonder what her son ever saw in her to warrant marriage. How would they manage to search for another man while keeping up the ruse of a newly married couple?

Cate’s mind spun out of control as the conversation continued around her.

“She is very lovely, Marcus. I look forward to getting to know you better while you stay.”

Cate offered a nervous chuckle, glad that Marcus picked up the conversation.

“Have preparations begun for the ball?”

“Yes,” Anna said as she led them toward the entrance. “Though, really, Marcus, we mustn’t discuss it now. Surely, Catherine is quite tired after the journey.”

Cate offered her another smile, wondering if she may have lost her voice. She cleared her throat and squeaked out a “yes.”

Anna squeezed her arm and offered a knowing smile. “Of course, you are, dear. I’m certain you’d like to settle in and rest. I trust you can lead her to the sapphire room without badgering at her about the details of the upcoming celebration of your nuptials, Marcus?”

“Of course, Mother.”

Anna offered another pleasant smile at Cate before she stalked away. Cate relaxed her stiff muscles as Marcus led her up a curving staircase. They disappeared into a wide hallway devoid of any doors.

Cate caught her breath from the encounter as they passed by the tall, round columns holding the tall ceiling high above them. “Do you remember how we discussed not springing things on each other?”

“Yes,” Marcus answered.

“That was one of those moments that should have been discussed,” Cate scolded.

“I fail to see how I’ve sprung anything on you.”

Cate halted near a life-sized bust of a woman in a tiara sitting atop a pedestal, her eyebrows high. “Some warning that I was about to meet your mother would have been appropriate. And also, you said a ball, not a wedding celebration.”

“Semantics,” Marcus said as he pulled Cate’s arm around his elbow and continued down the hall.

“How are we going to manage this and find Jack?”

He tugged one corner of his mouth upward in a half-smile and wiggled his eyebrows at her. “Do not worry, Catherine, I am very talented.”

Cate offered him a wry glance.

“The simple fact is, while a ball at Rosenberg may be an event not to be missed, under the circumstances, we may not gather everyone we hoped.”

“How does our fake marriage fix that?”

“No one would miss a wedding celebration, particularly mine.”

“Well, ours,” Cate pointed out. “You’ve dragged me into this, too.”

“Dragged? You seemed to come willingly.”

“That was before I knew there was a mother-in-law and wedding ball involved.”

“Mother seemed most intrigued by you.”

“I’m sure,” Cate said, rolling her eyes at the statement and her own behavior. “The three words I managed to get out probably captivated her.”

Marcus chuckled as they arrived at an ornate door. Ivory decorations trimmed the ivory double doors. Marcus pulled them open and pushed open the interior doors before leading Cate into the massive suite.

Sapphire blue walls adorned in ivory and gold rose to high decorative ceilings. A blue chaise trimmed in ornate woodwork stretched in front of a massive fireplace. A sitting area with a love seat and two chairs were expertly arranged near a tall window overlooking the picturesque landscape below.

Through another set of double doors, a four-poster bed rose on a pedestal. Thick sapphire blue velvet curtains framed the large bed. A writing desk was tucked in the corner across from the bed. A full-length mirror stood opposite it.

Cate’s breath caught in her throat. Beyond the room’s stunning decor, she recognized it. This was the room from her visions. This was the room that would lead to her monumental event.

Cate stepped forward, biting her lower lip as she took in the space.

“Are you pleased with it?” Marcus inquired.

“It’s beautiful.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at her. “But?”

Cate twisted to face him, tearing her eyes away from the intricately detailed ceiling. “But nothing.”

Marcus approached her and pushed back a wayward curl in her upswept style. “Something is churning in your mind.”

“This is the room I’ve been seeing in my visions.”

Marcus nodded. “Then the temporalysis is nearing its end.”

Cate agreed with a nod and a tiny smile. She waved her crossed fingers in the air. “Let’s hope!”

He stared down at her for a moment, a smile playing across his features. “I suppose I should leave you to rest before Mother scolds me.”

The statement elicited a chuckle from Cate. The man who seemed to have no boundaries still preferred not to anger his mother. “Okay.”

“I shall have your trunks sent up along with your ladies’ maid.”

Cate nodded at the statement as he turned on his heel and strode from the room. She ran her hand across the luxurious fabric of the chaise, her footsteps echoing off the marble floor. Her neck twisted as she scanned the large room. It made her beloved suite at Dunhaven look shabby.

The entire castle outdid hers, she reflected as she shambled into the bedroom. The opulence in its design and decor outshined anything she'd seen before.

Her fingertips caressed the polished wood of the writing desk. Her heart skipped a beat as she recalled the vision of her writing the note she'd found in the music box.

Cate scanned the room in search of the small item, but she did not spot it. Had she received the music box in this time? She bit her lower lip as a chill passed over her and she shuddered.

She pulled her hand away from the desk and crossed to the mirror. She stared into it, almost expecting to see herself clad in a sapphire dress. Instead, the reflection of her cream-colored dress stared back.

The normalcy eased her tense nerves. The room did not transform in front of her eyes. No visions plagued her. Hopefully, she'd recognize the important life moment and push past her temporalysis soon.

CHAPTER 25

A light knock sounded on her door, pulling her thoughts away from their meandering path through her mind.

“Yes?” she called, hoping it was not Marcus’s mother.

“Your Grace?” a voice answered. “May I come in?”

The voice sounded familiar and Cate stepped away from the mirror and through the large opening into the sitting room. “Yes,” she called out again. This must be the ladies’ maid Marcus mentioned.

A familiar blonde pushed into the room, her clothing and hair changed to fit the era. A smile spread across Cate’s face. “Andrea!”

Andrea curtsied to her with a smile. “It is a pleasure to serve you again, Your Grace,” Andrea said.

“How did you get here?” Cate asked.

“After you expressed your approval of me, His Grace explained to me the abilities he possesses and the lives you lead. I’ll admit I was intrigued yet did not believe it entirely. He offered me the role of your ladies’ maid and I happily accepted. I hope you are pleased.”

“I am, very,” Cate said, still smiling.

“His Grace felt it may settle your nerves to have a familiar attendant. And do not fret, I have spent my days waiting for the call, studying the prominent styles of each time period as instructed by His Grace. I hope to be indispensable to you.”

“His Grace was correct. I am so pleased you are here.”

Andrea clasped her hands in front of her and nodded with a slight smile. “Your trunks should arrive in just a few moments and I shall unpack them. Is there anything you require first?”

Cate began to shake her head when another knock sounded. “That must be the trunks,” Andrea said, scurrying to the door. She tugged it open and stepped aside. A maid scooted into the room, a large tea tray spread between her outstretched arms.

The young woman kept her eyes lowered as she slid the tray onto the table. “Tea, Your Grace,” she said with a curtsy.

“Thank you,” Cate answered.

The girl gave her another curtsy before disappearing from the room. Andrea already poured the steaming liquid for Cate, handing her a cup balanced on a saucer.

Cate accepted, added sugar, and sipped at the sweet, warm liquid. The trunks arrived as Cate sank into the chair. She studied the delicate rose pattern on the china as men hefted several trunks into the room.

Andrea heaved the first open and pulled a dress from it, studying it before carefully refolding it as she glided across the room and into the bedroom, heading for the wardrobe. Cate rose from her chair and pulled the next dress from within the chest.

“Oh, Your Grace! Please allow me,” Andrea said.

“I could help,” Cate offered.

Andrea guided her back to her chair and eased her into it. “Drink your tea. You must be exhausted after your travel.”

Cate raised her eyebrows at the statement, marveling at the level of luxury to which the Northcotts must be accustomed.

As Andrea pulled another dress from the trunk, Cate began to wonder how many days Marcus planned to be here. She had hoped the search for Jack would be swift, but by the number of clothing items emerging from the trunks, she worried she’d be in 1810 far longer than she anticipated.

She sucked in a deep breath before finishing her tea and nibbling on a biscuit. Andrea finished the task as Cate finished her biscuit. She found herself missing Mrs. Fraser’s shortbreads, though she could not complain about the taste of her current selection.

Andrea returned to the sitting room and clasped her hands in front of her. “Would you care to take a walk around the property before you retire for the evening?”

“Oh, umm,” Cate hesitated.

“The Dowager Duchess’s ladies’ maid said the gardens are quite lovely in the summer months and she pointed out several paths you may enjoy exploring.”

Cate’s mind whirled. Her introverted nature drove her to seek solitary time. She glanced through the towering, peaked window. The allure of exploring the idyllic scenery won over her tendency to shut herself away.

“I would love to view the gardens briefly,” she said, rising from her chair.

Andrea smiled and led Cate from the room and through the wide halls and downstairs. They exited through a side door into a large walled garden. The gravel crunched under their feet as they wound through the perfectly manicured bushes, hedges, miniature trees, and flowering plants.

Cate lamented the era before cell phones, wishing she could snap a picture of the lovely gardens to share with Mr. Fraser. Though she wasn’t certain how she would explain her presence in a German castle’s gardens on her search for Jack.

“It is quite lovely, isn’t it, Your Grace?” Andrea said.

“Yes,” Cate agreed. “And most unexpected in this location.”

Cate studied a row of several bushes as they meandered along the paths. She approached the large flowering growth, her fingers caressing the dark purple flower. She pressed her nose to the deep purple bud and sniffed the sweet scent.

“I’ve never seen purple roses before, have you?” Cate inquired of her companion. Andrea did not respond. “Andrea?” Cate twisted in search of her ladies’ maid.

Andrea stood several yards away, eyeing a nearby bush. Between them, Marcus stood, a slight smile on his face.

Cate straightened as she eyed him. “Marcus.”

He strode toward her, his hands clasped behind his back. “Good afternoon. Enjoying the gardens?”

“Yes,” Cate answered. “I’ve never seen purple roses before. They are very pretty.”

Marcus eyed them, reaching out to touch one of the flowers. “They grew wild here before the castle was built. My mother’s family insisted they become part of the gardens.”

“Is that the reason for the name Rosenberg?”

“Yes. Quite literally, it means—“

“Rose Mountain,” Cate said.

He smiled at her as he tugged a rose from the plant. “Correct.” He offered her the flower.

“Thank you,” she said, accepting the violet bloom.

He offered his arm, and they strode through the gardens. A cool breeze tickled Cate’s bare skin as she leaned against the low wall to stare out over the vast landscape below. The sun lowered toward the horizon in a brilliant fiery ball, casting dusky blue, purple, and pink hues across the sky.

A chill swept past her again and she drew her arms closer to her.

“Are you chilled, dear?” Marcus inquired.

“A little. I should go. I wouldn’t want your mother to scold me for not resting.” She offered him an amused grin.

Marcus removed his jacket, slipping it around Cate’s shoulders before he began to lead her back to the castle. “Mother will not scold you, but rather me for dragging you about the castle’s gardens.”

Cate arched an eyebrow and chuckled as she sniffed at the rose she held. “I hope to make it back to my suite before she catches us.”

“For my sake, yes,” he answered with a laugh.

They rounded the corner, the doorway coming into view. Andrea waited patiently, her hands clasped in front of her dark uniform.

“I shall leave you in Miss Evans’s capable hands,” Marcus said as he clasped her hand in his. “Good night, Catherine.”

“Good night.” Her lips curled into a slight smile before he let her hand go.

Andrea ushered her into the castle. “Did you enjoy your walk, Your Grace?”

“I did, yes. Oh, I’m sorry to have left you. I didn’t expect Duke Northcott to be there.”

“Quite all right, Your Grace. I am so pleased you were able to enjoy the gardens with His Grace,” Andrea said as she guided Cate through the halls and back to her suite.

Cate slipped Marcus’s jacket from around her shoulders as she entered.

“I shall see that this is returned to His Grace as soon as I have you settled. He is such a gentleman, Your Grace. You are a lucky woman.”

Cate smiled at her as she studied the purple rose in her hand. “Yes, he is quite well-mannered.”

“I shall fetch water for the rose.” Andrea grabbed an empty vase from the long table against the wall and flitted from the room. Cate wandered to the large window, twirling the violet bloom between her fingers. She stared out over the darkening landscape. Another day had come to a close with no sign of Jack. Perhaps tomorrow would bring more information.

Andrea returned with the vase and Cate dropped the rose into it. “I shall place it on your night table, Your Grace, so you can view it as you fall asleep and when you awaken in the morning.”

With a smile, Andrea carried the crystal vase with its single rose into the bedroom and placed it near the bed. She readied Cate’s nightclothes before she signaled to remove Cate’s dress.

As she tugged it over her head, she said, “Are you very tired from the travel?”

“A little,” Cate answered. “The carriage was quite rough at times, though I found the scenery breathtaking.”

“Indeed. The palace sits on a picturesque spot. It reminds me of a painting.”

“Yes, I thought the same.”

Andrea’s gaze flitted to the purple rose after she tugged the nightgown down to the floor and held out her robe.

“The purple roses are very beautiful.”

“I have never seen roses that color before,” Cate admitted.

“Neither have I. And how romantic for His Grace to pick one for you.”

Cate adjusted the robe as she sat at the vanity. Andrea loosened her hair and brushed it. “Has he always been so romantic?”

Cate paused for a moment before answering. Apparently, when Marcus had explained their time-traveling lifestyle, he had not informed her their marriage was a sham. She scrambled for an answer, settling on, “Yes. As long as I have known him, I’ve found him quite drawn to extravagant gestures.”

Andrea smiled at her through the mirror. “The diamond necklace was stunning.”

Cate nodded in agreement as Andrea set down the brush. “Finished. Is there anything else, Your Grace?”

“No, that’s all, thank you.”

“Would you like me to fetch you something to read?”

Cate stood and stretched. “No, thank you. I think I will go to sleep. I’m more tired than I realized.”

Andrea dipped into a curtsy with a smile as Cate climbed into bed and settled into the pillows. “Good night, Your Grace.”

“Good night, Andrea.”

The woman flitted from the room, leaving Cate to stare at the darkening sky through the window and ponder where Jack may be in the vastness of the German landscape expanding beyond her window.

* * *

Cate’s eyes flitted open the following morning and she stretched and climbed from her bed, pausing at the window to admire the sun rising over the valley below. She pulled the cord on the wall as she tugged her robe around her. Moments later Andrea scurried into the room, carrying a tray.

“Good morning, Your Grace. I have your breakfast. Would you care to eat it before dressing or after?”

“Umm, before, please,” Cate said as her stomach rumbled.

Andrea slid the tray onto the table as Cate eased into the chair. “I shall prepare your dress for the day whilst you eat.”

Cate sipped at the hot tea before biting into her toast.

“Did you have a dress you preferred?” Andrea called from the other room.

“The cream and brown, please,” Cate answered. “Have you seen Duke Northcott this morning?”

“I have not, Your Grace. Would you like me to fetch him?”

“Perhaps wait until after I’ve dressed. I do not know his plans, but I should like to speak with him.”

Cate hurried through the meal and within the hour, Andrea had her dressed and ready for the day with her hair swept up and her dress expertly fitted around her. Andrea finished tying the bow in the back before she fussed with the frilly sleeves.

“I shall send for His Grace,” Andrea said with a slight curtsy.

“No need. I’ll go looking for him.”

“One of the stable hands was readying a carriage this morning if that helps.”

“Thank you,” Cate said as they exited into the hall. They parted ways and Cate wandered down the wide hallway, hoping she recalled the way to the foyer.

She found the two sweeping staircases leading down and hurried down the many steps as the sound of horses neighing floated through the halls.

Marcus emerged from a hallway below as she stepped onto the marble floor.

“Catherine, good morning. Did you sleep well?”

“Yes, I did, thank you. Are you leaving?”

“Yes, I have business to attend to.”

“Regarding Jack?” Cate asked as they stepped into the warm morning air.

“Yes,” Marcus answered as the coachman whisked the carriage door open.

“I’ll go with you,” Cate said.

Marcus opened his mouth to speak when the front door burst open again. Anna strode from inside.

“Good morning,” she greeted them with a pleasant smile. “Off already?”

“Good morning, Mother. Yes, I have several things I must attend to.”

“Please do not tell me you are dragging poor Catherine with you?”

Cate’s eyes widened at the statement. “Oh, I volunteered. I do not mind,” Cate assured her.

Anna slipped her arm around Cate’s elbow. “Nonsense. There is nothing so boring as to sit in the carriage drumming one’s fingers against the seat whilst your husband conducts business.”

“Oh, but—” Cate protested when Anna waved her hand in the air.

She flicked her fingers at Marcus to shoo him into the carriage. “I will not hear of it. Marcus, be on your way. Catherine and I shall take tea together. I would very much like to get to know you better, dear.”

Cate’s eyes widened further and she shot a panicked glance at Marcus. He offered her an amused smile. “Enjoy your tea, dear.” After kissing a stunned Cate on the cheek, he climbed into the carriage.

Anna tugged Cate toward the door. The carriage pulled away, dashing Cate’s hopes to escape the situation.

Anna led her into a large sitting room, decorated in burgundy hues and released her arm at the loveseat, circling the coffee table and sinking onto the couch across from her. She motioned for Cate to sit.

With a hard swallow, Cate sank to the cushion, remembering to keep her posture straight. The task was not difficult, given her tense muscles. A maid arrived with a tray of tea moments later and disappeared shortly after she gave them both a curtsy.

Cate returned Anna's smile as the woman poured tea into a delicate china cup adorned with purple roses. She poured her own cup, dropping a sugar cube into it and pouring in cream. After stirring the mixture noiselessly, she picked up her cup and saucer and focused her attention on Cate.

Cate swallowed hard again under the woman's scrutiny.

"And how was your first night in the palace?" Anna inquired before lifting the delicate china cup to her lips.

"Very well, thank you," Cate answered. "The room is beautiful."

"Did you have any trouble sleeping?"

Cate sipped at her tea before settling the cup into the saucer with a clatter. She chided herself for being so careless, though her hands were on the verge of trembling. "No," Cate said with a shake of her head.

"Oh good. I often find myself restless after a long day in the carriage."

"I took in the gardens last evening before I retired. They are very beautiful."

"Yes, I saw you and Marcus from my balcony," the woman said with a Cheshire Cat grin.

Cate's mind reeled at the statement. The woman seemed protective of her son. Not good, she assessed.

"I had never seen purple roses before. They are very unique and beautiful."

Anna offered a polite smile. "Yes, they have been here since before Rosenberg was built. My ancestors found them quite lovely and built the garden around them."

"Has your family been at Rosenberg for very long?"

"Seven generations. From the time the land was gifted to my great-great-great-grandfather, the first Duke of Rosenberg, by the Kaiser."

"What a rich history," Cate answered. So, Anna had married laterally, and her family ranked similarly to the Northcotts. Even worse, Cate's mind ruminated. After seven generations of Dukes and Duchesses gracing these halls, her son had married a common American. The woman must be disappointed in his choice, particularly if she had known of his engagement to Celine, a marquis's daughter. And if she ever found out they were faking this for the purposes of finding another man... Cate's thoughts broke off as she felt Anna's eyes upon her.

Anna sipped at her tea, her eyes peering at Cate over the rim. Cate cleared her throat and sipped at her tea again.

"Biscuit?" Anna offered, holding out a tray of flat square cookies.

"Thank you," Cate answered, accepting them.

"And how did you meet Marcus?"

Cate's mind searched for a lie as she used chewing the cookie as a stall tactic. She settled on a misleading truth. "Oh, we were introduced through mutual friends at a dinner party."

"Were you in Europe at the time?"

"Scotland," Cate said, figuring it was true.

The door behind Cate opened and a maid flitted in, carrying a white box in both hands. She offered it to Anna before curtsying and scurrying from the room.

Cate sipped at her tea, avoiding eye contact. As she glanced up, she found Anna's eyes on her again. A smile spread across the woman's face. "This is for you, dear. A gift. I ordered it the moment I read Marcus's letter announcing his marriage. Then I fretted over it. Though I suppose it is appropriate. I hope you fancy it."

Anna slid the box across the table toward Cate. Cate set her teacup on the table and retrieved the proffered box. "Oh, you didn't have to," she said. "But thank you."

"Of course, I had to," the woman argued as Cate set the small box on her lap. "I have a new daughter-in-law!"

Cate untied the mauve ribbon around the box and slipped the top off. Inside, nestled in paper, was the piano-shaped music box. Her heart skipped a beat as she spotted the small object. The music box she had grown to love had been a wedding gift from her fake mother-in-law.

"Oh, it's lovely!" Cate said as she pulled it from the box.

"Do you find it so? I did. Then I fretted you may not enjoy music. It's musical, you see. There is a knob on the side."

Cate twisted it and opened the piano's lid. The familiar tinkling tune filled the air.

“Though,” Anna continued, “I suppose if you did not like music, you may just keep it closed.”

“I do enjoy music and I am very smitten with this little box.”

“Oh, how lovely. I am so pleased. I must admit, I was not at all sure what to expect when Marcus wrote to me.”

Cate’s stomach twisted into a knot. Here it came. The disappointment over his choice. Rather, his fake choice. Though Anna did not know their marriage was a sham. She believed her son had stooped low enough to marry a common American. Cate bit her lower lip as she settled the music box into its package and slid on the lid, setting it aside.

Cate recalled Mrs. Fraser’s initial reaction to her inheriting Dunhaven Castle. While the woman had warmed to her since, her first sentiments of disappointment, disapproval, and being called a “crass American” whirled through her mind.

Cate swallowed hard and raised her eyes to the woman. “Duchess,” she began.

“Oh, please, dear, call me Mother.”

Awkward, Cate thought, though she forced a smile onto her lips and pushed the word out. “Mother,” she said as she retrieved her teacup, “I realize I am not what you expected in a daughter-in-law.”

Anna slid her eyes closed and flicked her hand in the air. Her eyelashes fluttered open as she spoke. “Allow me to stop you there, Catherine.”

Cate swallowed hard, fighting to stop her lower lip from trembling.

CHAPTER 26

Cate settled into silence, awaiting the inevitable lecture and expression of disappointment. She hoped it may be followed by a promise to try to get along for Marcus's sake.

"When I say you are not what I expected, please know I do not mean it in a negative way. Quite the opposite, in fact. I am pleasantly surprised."

Cate flicked her gaze from the china pattern to the woman across from her. She wore a broad smile.

"You are quite lovely. I have not seen a genuine smile on my son's face in quite some time, though you have managed to elicit one. That pleases me. And you are a vast improvement over the last woman he brought to Rosenberg."

The statements stunned Cate into silence. She had not expected this level of acceptance, nor their farcical marriage to make such an impression. And then the last statement. What sort of women did Marcus bring to the palace? Perhaps he had paraded many here. His social standing would make it easy for him. Was he similar to her great-great-uncle Lorne who brought questionable women home all the time?

Anna winced before continuing. "I do not wish to be indelicate, however, you should be aware in case it comes up from some ill-mannered busybody. You do realize Marcus was engaged to Marquis Devereaux's daughter for several years, don't you?"

"Oh, yes," Cate said with a nod, "yes, I am aware."

Anna offered a wistful side-glance as she smashed her lips together in a half-frown. "A most disappointing choice."

Cate's mind reeled as she took the last few sips of her tea. The very beautiful Celine, daughter of a French Marquis, was a disappointing choice?

"The dreadful woman brought out the worst in Marcus." Anna flicked her gaze to Cate and smiled as she lifted her teacup. "It is clear you bring out the best."

Cate's mind parsed through the statements. Anna must have picked up on Celine and Marcus's tumultuous relationship. Specifically, Celine's lack of interest in her son regardless of his peerage or their engagement status.

Cate offered a nervous, but warm smile as worry filled her that they would not be able to continue their charade, particularly after Celine arrived.

Before she could speak again, the doors burst open a third time. A maid carried in a small black-and-white dog, cupped carefully in her arms.

"Oh, there you are, my darling," Anna said, reaching for the small pup. She lifted the dog from the girl's arms, a broad smile on her face as she pulled it close. With a kiss on the pup's nose, she wrapped the small animal in her arms and held it close to her chest.

"Oh, I hope you do not mind Athena."

Cate set her teacup down, a genuine smile forming on her features. "Not at all. I like animals, especially dogs."

"How refreshing you are. Athena is almost as important to me as Marcus. Perhaps more so," she said with a chuckle. Cate joined her in laughter, connecting with the sentiment. She felt the same way about Riley and Bailey.

"Athena had pups several weeks ago. Perhaps you'd like to see them."

"I would love to," Cate answered.

Marcus's arrival interrupted their conversation. He strode into the room and poured himself a cup of tea.

"Back so soon? I trust your business went well," Anna said to him as she cuddled Athena.

"Yes, it did. And I hurried home to see how your tea was going."

"Quite well, darling. You needn't have rushed. We are getting along swimmingly."

"I see," Marcus said with a wink and a smile at Cate.

“Catherine expressed an interest in seeing Athena’s pups. Could you take her, dear, or are you off again?”

“I would be happy to. I am home for the day. I could not bear to be away from Catherine for a moment longer.”

Anna stood, still stroking the small dog in her arms. Cate followed her lead, rising from her seat as Marcus set down his teacup.

“Oh, leave the box, Catherine, I shall have your ladies’ maid fetch it and deliver it to your room.”

“Thank you,” Cate said as she slipped her hand around Marcus’s arm.

Marcus led her from the room and down a long hallway. “That seemed to go well,” he said as they strolled.

“You’re laying it on a little thick, aren’t you?” Cate inquired.

“Mother loves you.”

“That only makes me feel worse for being so disingenuous.”

“Who is being disingenuous?”

Cate crinkled her eyebrows at his statement. Rather than follow up, she changed the subject. “Did you find anything out about Jack?”

“No, but I have several things in place so we can find him quickly after the ball.”

“Which is when, by the way?”

“Tuesday.”

“Tuesday!” Cate exclaimed, grinding to a halt. “It’s only Sunday!” Cate groaned. “That’s two days away! Two more days of fooling your mother, who, by the way, doesn’t seem to be easily fooled.”

Marcus raised his eyebrows as they turned a corner. “It should not be a problem for you, Catherine. As I said, Mother loves you.”

“Until she figures out we’re not really married. And,” Cate continued, “she does not seem to like Celine at all. When is she arriving?”

“Tomorrow,” Marcus answered as he pushed through a doorway into another room.

“That ought to be interesting.”

“I am not looking forward to it. Mother detests Celine.”

“No kidding. She said as much. How are we going to explain this?”

“Leave it to me,” he said as they approached a makeshift pen in the middle of a large room. “Mother simply would not have Athena’s pups in the stables.”

Cate glanced down into the cordoned-off area, spotting several small puppies scurrying around. They ranged from brown and white, to gray and cream, to black and white like Athena.

Cate squatted down to pet one as it ran past. The brown and white speckled puppy frolicked across the space. Cate smiled after him when a small tongue licked her fingers. She flicked her gaze to the new puppy vying for her attention.

A smile spread across her face and she scooped the small black-and-white dog into her arms, rising to stand. "He's so cute," she said as she stroked his tiny head.

She cuddled him close as Marcus tickled his chin.

"He reminds me so much of Riley! He's got a feather-like tail just like him. Similar markings. And look, he's even got the white streak down his head. It's almost identical!" She glanced at the pup's face closely. Her smile faded, replaced by a confused expression.

She snapped her gaze to Marcus. She flicked her gaze back to the small pup in her arms. He stared up at her with dark, almond-shaped eyes, offering her a lick on the cheek.

She shook her head slowly. "No. It can't be." She returned her gaze to Marcus. "Can it?"

"Can it be what, dear?"

"Never mind, it's ridiculous." Cate set the tiny dog down in the pen. He scurried around and stood on his hind legs, staring at her.

"He likes you," Marcus said, scooping him up and stroking his fur. He handed the dog back to Cate.

Cate rubbed his tiny head. "Sorry, buddy, I won't be getting a dog for another two centuries."

"He'd be happy to wait."

She flicked her gaze back to him and cocked her head. "Are you saying... Marcus, is this Riley? My Riley?"

Marcus offered her an amused smile.

"Are you kidding?"

"Mother was very pleased that you took one."

"But...He...I..." Cate stammered.

Marcus lifted the dog from her arms and gave him a pat before returning him to the pen. "The side effects of time travel can be very confusing."

“How did you know where to take him?” Cate asked as they strolled from the room.

“The Agency is a constant threat to you, Catherine. It was imperative that someone kept an eye on you.”

Cate stopped walking, her jaw agape and her eyes wide. “For how long?”

“As long as you needed it,” Marcus said.

Cate stood in stunned silence again.

“Come along, Catherine, we should take in the gardens before we dress for dinner.”

After a walk through the gardens, Cate joined Marcus and Anna for dinner. The conversation flowed easily with Anna in the lead, though Cate found it difficult to continue lying to the woman. Her pleasant demeanor and obvious goal to make Cate feel welcome caused guilt to course through Cate’s veins.

The sensation continued as she returned to her suite for the night. As Andrea slipped her robe around her, her eyes fell onto the piano music box sitting on her night table.

Andrea noted her gaze. “What a lovely gift, Your Grace. Was it from His Grace?”

“No, from the Dowager Duchess.”

“Oh, how lovely.”

“Yes, very much so.”

“Would you like me to wind it for you before I go?”

“No, I can do that. Thank you, Andrea. And good night.”

Andrea curtsied and hurried from the room. Cate sank onto the edge of her bed and caressed the small music box before winding it and setting it on the nightstand. She slipped under the covers, blowing out the candle and plunging the room into darkness.

The music box tinkled away as the pale moonlight filtered into the room. Cate rolled over to stare at the music box, limned in moonlight. Their search for Jack was leaving a larger footprint than she expected. And causing more ripples in the pond than she’d bargained for. What else would they alter as a result of their search?

* * *

Morning light streamed through Cate's window as Andrea put the finishing touches on her hair.

"The seamstress is coming today for the final fitting for your gown. The Dowager Duchess's ladies' maid reminded me earlier," Andrea said.

"Oh, I hadn't even thought of it."

"Are you very excited about the ball?"

Cate considered the question. From what she had gathered from her temporalysis visions, the major event her mind attempted to recall in fragmented bits and pieces occurred at the ball. She'd have confirmation if the dress the seamstress brought today matched with the one she'd found in her tower room.

What would the event be? Would it be Jack's return? Or at least learning his location? Either way, she anticipated the event with great interest.

"Yes," Cate admitted. "I am."

Andrea tugged open a drawer and pulled out a string of pearls. "I found these in the trunk and thought we could use them in your hair."

Cate recalled the fleeting vision of herself in the full-length mirror. Her elaborate hairstyle had been decorated with pearls. "That would be lovely, Andrea, yes."

Andrea nodded and grinned at her. "I shall show the dressmaker in as soon as she arrives."

"Thank you." Cate rose from the vanity and crossed to her nightstand. She wound the music box and strolled with it toward the window.

A knock sounded at the door before it opened a crack. "Catherine, may I come in?" Marcus inquired.

"Yes," Cate called.

"Good morning," he said as he strode toward her. "How are you this morning?"

"Good, thank you."

Marcus lowered his eyes to the music box still clutched in her hands. "Mother will be pleased you are enjoying her gift."

Cate gazed down at it. "I do. Very much. I understand why I left myself the note." She flicked her gaze to the writing desk. "Oh, which I still need to write. This back and forth is so confusing."

"I have no doubt you will grow used to it in time."

Cate's features scrunched at the statement. Marcus changed the subject before she could question it.

“Celine, Michael, and Damien will arrive later this afternoon.”

“Oh, good,” Cate said. “Do you think they’ll have any news?”

“Some, though I would not expect them to have stumbled upon Jack’s location.”

Cate nodded and bit her lower lip, attempting to temper her hope.

“We will find him. You have my word.”

Cate smiled up at him. “Thank you.”

Another knock sounded at the door, interrupting any further conversation. “Your Grace, the dressmaker has arrived.”

“I shall leave you to your dresses, dear,” Marcus said as his mother strode into the room with another woman in tow. Marcus kissed Cate’s cheek before he stopped to offer his mother a kiss, then disappeared from the room.

Cate closed the music box lid and slid it onto the nightstand.

“I am so pleased to see you with the music box, Catherine,” Anna said. She introduced the seamstress, Frau Wagner, who had already prepared a gown.

“With a few minor adjustments, it will be perfect for your ball,” Frau Wagner said. “Shall we try it?”

Andrea stepped forward to accept the dress the woman produced from a garment bag. In a stunning sapphire blue silk with embroidered accents, Cate’s heart fluttered as she recognized the dress she’d found.

She stared at it in the full-length mirror as Andrea finished fastening it. A smile crept across her face as she studied it. This was the dress. The ball must be the moment she envisioned. What event would be that meaningful to her?

“It is quite lovely, Your Grace,” Andrea said.

“Yes, it is,” Cate murmured.

“Come out, dear, so I may make adjustments,” Frau Wagner said.

Cate strode into the sitting room in the dress. Anna clapped her hands together and bit her lower lip. “Oh, Catherine, it is lovely. You are a vision.”

Color rose in Cate’s cheeks and she dipped her chin downward, gazing at the beautifully colored fabric. “Thank you.”

“And the fit is quite good,” Frau Wagner said, pinching the fabric in a few places and tugging at it in others. “Just a few minor adjustments and it shall be perfect!”

She waved to an assistant, speaking in German and requesting what Cate assumed to be pins as the woman rushed forward with them. Frau Wagner pinched and pinned a few places then shooed Cate away to remove the dress, informing Andrea to be mindful of the pins.

Cate returned in her day dress as Anna poured tea. The ladies chatted about ball details, Anna's dress, and a few of the guests before the morning waned. Frau Wagner departed in the early afternoon with the promise of the perfected dress to be delivered by mid-morning tomorrow.

As her carriage pulled away, another trundled up the winding path. Marcus strode from inside.

"Good, you're both here."

Anna raised an eyebrow at him.

"We have guests arriving," Marcus said, motioning to the carriage approaching.

It rounded the last bend and the horses trotted toward them, silencing Anna's question. The carriage pulled to a stop and the coachman dismounted, pulling the door open.

Michael stepped out first, adjusting his jacket as he climbed down. He smiled and stuck his hand out to Marcus before he took Cate's hand.

"Welcome to Rosenberg, Mr. Carlyle," Marcus said. "Of course, you remember Catherine, my wife. Mother, this is Michael Carlyle, a business associate. Mr. Carlyle, my mother, the Dowager Duchess Northcott."

"Duchess Northcott," Michael said with a bow.

Damien followed from the carriage behind him. "And his brother, Damien Carlyle."

Damien greeted everyone before he returned to the carriage and offered his hand to the final passenger.

Celine disembarked from the carriage and took a step forward. Next to Cate, Anna's posture stiffened. She raised her chin and narrowed her eyes at the blonde.

"Mother, you remember Celine Devereaux, now Buckley."

"Duchess," Celine said with a brief curtsy.

Anna's features turned stony. "How could I forget?" She spun on a heel to face the palace. "Marcus, a word."

"As soon as I show our guests to their rooms."

"I trust one of the maids can handle the task."

Cate swallowed hard at the icy greeting and the curt words Anna spoke. She recalled Marcus's statements yesterday. Obviously, he had been correct.

Cate bit her lower lip as Marcus said, "Of course, Mother." He directed his next statement to the group. "Will you excuse me?"

"Of course," Michael said.

"What's that about?" Damien inquired as they disappeared into the house.

"Marcus's mother and I do not get along very well," Celine said. "She's quite a difficult woman."

Cate crinkled her brow at the statement. Before she could follow up on the conversation or invite them inside, fingers wrapped around her hand and tugged her forward.

She turned to find Anna pulling her toward the door. "Come along, Catherine. There is no need for you to remain outside with them."

Cate allowed herself to be led into the house, offering a wave to the others. "I apologize for my son's poor judgment," Anna said as she dragged Cate through the halls. "I assure you it will not stand under this roof while I draw breath."

Cate shot a wide-eyed glance at the woman next to her. A purple-red flush colored the Dowager's fair skin and her jaw tensed.

Cate swallowed hard as they paraded through the halls. "I apologize, but I believe there must be some mistake."

"Oh, there has been a mistake. Marcus has made a grave error."

She tugged Cate along and into a private sitting room where Marcus awaited her. Cate jumped as she slammed the door shut behind them.

"Just what do you think you're doing, Marcus?" Anna demanded. "How dare you invite that woman to stay under this roof. The same roof as your new bride."

"Mother—" Marcus tried.

She flung her arms outward. "I will not have it! I simply will not stand for it! If Celine Devereaux has come crawling to you unhappy with her choices, you should have sent her straight back to the man she chose. Do not forget, Marcus, how unhappy she made you for years. Do not endanger your newfound happiness for that woman."

"I—" Marcus tried again.

Anna waved a finger at him. "Do not speak back to me until I've told you you may."

Marcus sucked in a breath, his frustration obvious.

Cate flicked her gaze between the two of them, interjecting a comment before Anna could continue berating her son. "I'm sorry but I feel I must be the one to apologize," Cate said.

Anna grasped her hand and patted it. "There is nothing for you to apologize for, dear."

Cate shot a glance to Marcus, then back to Anna, flipping her hand over to grasp the woman's hand. "There is, I'm afraid. You see, Damien Carlyle is quite a close friend. He handled several things for me after my parents' deaths. I invited him. It turns out, by pure chance, his cousin is Celine Devereaux. I did not realize she was traveling with him. I had already extended the invitation before we spoke yesterday. Had I realized the extent of the difficult relationship, I never would have done so."

Anna studied Cate's face. Cate bit her lower lip. "I am very sorry," she added.

Anna flicked her gaze to Marcus who raised his chin as he awaited her response. Anna returned her attention to Cate. She wiggled her shoulders back and cupped Cate's cheek in her hand.

"There is no need to apologize. You couldn't have known the difficult situation." She shot a glare at Marcus. "I shall do my best to welcome them for your sake."

"Thank you. I appreciate that very much and again, I—"

Anna pressed a finger to Cate's lips to stop her third apology. She squeezed Cate's hands in hers and shot an icy glance at Marcus. "You are lucky your wife is so gracious."

"Indeed, Mother," Marcus agreed.

She wagged a finger at him. "Keep yourself in line, Marcus. And steer clear of Celine Devereaux."

Marcus nodded as she spun to storm from the room. Cate blew out a sigh of relief as she pulled the door closed behind her.

Marcus strode toward her. "You handled that well."

She fixed her gaze on him. "I hope so. I really don't want your mother angry at me."

"Frightening, isn't she?"

Cate giggled. "You'd better stay in line, then."

"I would not dream of stepping out of it and risk angering both Mother and my new bride."

Cate chuckled at him again as she slipped her arm around his elbow.

“Shall we visit our controversial guests and determine what they’ve learned?”

“Yes,” Cate agreed.

Marcus led her on a rambling journey through the palace. He had apparently housed them in rooms as far as from his mother as possible, Cate figured, as they arrived at a plain door. Marcus knocked at it. Michael pulled the door open seconds later, waving them inside.

They entered the tastefully decorated room, small yet comfortable.

“Hey, Cate,” Damien said with a warm smile. “That was some greeting! I hope everything’s okay.”

Cate nodded as Celine flopped onto the small armchair and sank her chin into her palm. “Your mother is as pleasant as ever, Marcus.”

Marcus shot her a glance. “She seems perfectly pleasant with Catherine.”

“Lucky Cate,” Celine shot back.

Cate blew out a soft breath and focused her attention on Damien. “Have you learned anything about Jack?”

“We haven’t found anything about his location,” Damien answered. “But we did track a few individuals who may be of interest.”

“What are the names?” Marcus inquired.

“Lord Mountbatten was in Dresden,” Celine answered.

“And a fellow by the name of Archduke Hansen,” Damien said.

“Among others,” Michael said, rattling off several more names.

Marcus clasped his hands behind his back and strode to the small window to gaze out. Cate followed his trek across the room.

“Anything promising?” Cate inquired.

“We can rule out Hansen, I doubt he’d dirty his hands with this.”

“Anyone else?”

“We should keep an eye on Mountbatten, Williams, Hanscomb, and Ivanov. Any of them or all of them could be involved.”

Michael nodded. “Will they attend the ball?”

“Of course. Even Archduke Hansen will attend, but do not waste your time with him. Focus on the other four.”

“Okay, sounds like a plan,” Michael said. “We’re all over it.”

“Should we each concentrate on one of those four? Between all of us—” Cate began.

“No,” Marcus interrupted. “You will have enough on your plate as the new bride. The others will need to monitor all of them.”

Cate lowered her gaze to the floor as she considered the statement’s implications and her lack of skills to handle it.

“We’ll handle it, Cate,” Damien assured her. “We’re so close!”

Cate glanced up to smile at him. Marcus passed between them and grasped Cate’s arm gently, spinning her toward the door. “We should leave them to settle in,” he said, swinging the door open.

“I think we’ll skip dinner,” Celine grumbled. “For everyone’s sake.”

“See you tomorrow, Cate,” Damien said with a wave.

Cate waved at him as Marcus tugged her into the hall.

“Oh, Cate,” Celine said as she stepped to the door to pull it closed, “I wouldn’t mention Jack around here too much before Anna isn’t quite so pleasant to you either.”

She pulled the door shut, closing out Cate’s view of the room. Cate drew her chin back at the acrid statement from the normally pleasant Celine.

Marcus drew her further down the hall. “Do not let Celine’s enmity with my mother perturb you.”

“Well, I don’t want to upset her. Your mother, I mean. Celine seems to be upset already. I won’t mention him to her.”

“I have every confidence that even if you did, it would be with the utmost tact, and Mother would not bat an eyelash.”

Cate sighed as they strode down the hall. She had caused so much strife. So much tension existed because of her insistence on time traveling to help her ancestors. She had caused Jack’s disappearance. She had exposed him to Gianna and her shadowy organization. And she continued to cause ripples through time even now.

“Is something wrong, Catherine?”

“I’m sorry,” Cate choked out, her eyebrows pinching as her eyes clouded with tears.

“Whatever for?”

“All this disruption. This is all my fault.”

“None of this is your fault.”

Cate did not answer. Marcus stopped walking and grabbed her shoulders. “None of this is your fault.”

Cate nodded without making eye contact with him.

“Ignore Celine’s tantrum. She and Mother are like oil and water.”

Cate’s mind spun as she considered the difficulty she’d thrust upon everyone. No, she thought, Gianna had thrust it on them. They would get through it. She would find Jack.

She reached up and clasped his hand in hers and flicked her gaze up to him, offering another nod.

“Shall we take a stroll in the garden to distract your troubled mind?”

A slight smile spread across Cate’s face. “Yes.”

Despite her acceptance, tension continued to build in her as the ball hurled toward them.

CHAPTER 27

Cate paced the floor of her bedroom in her dressing gown. Despite the music box's pleasant tune, she found herself anxious. She wrung her hands as she stalked across the floor. She settled in front of the large window for a few moments.

The blue sky faded into purples and pinks as the sun set. Not much longer, she ruminated. The thought sent her scurrying across the room again. She twisted her right hand with her left as she considered the impending event.

Would they learn anything relevant? Would they find Jack? What would be the life moment emblazoned in her mind? And would her temporalysis be cured? Or would she succumb to it?

A lump formed in her throat. She leapt, flailing her arms in the air as a knock sounded. Andrea entered a moment later.

"It is time, Your Grace."

Cate nodded and took a seat at the vanity. Andrea brushed her hair before she began to fashion it into an elaborate upswept style with pearl beads woven through it.

"You are quiet, Your Grace," Andrea said. "Is everything all right?"

Cate flicked her gaze to the woman through the mirror. "Yes. Just nervous."

"About the ball?"

Cate nodded with a tight-lipped smile. "So many people will attend. I hope I can keep them all straight as I meet them"

“I am certain you will.” Andrea teased a final curl into place. “There. Do you fancy it?”

“Oh, Andrea,” Cate said as she twisted her neck to view the style from each side, “it’s beautiful.”

Andrea smiled as she clasped her hands in front of her. “And now the dress.”

Cate slipped off her robe as Andrea readied the dress. After a few moments, the silk sapphire fabric hung loosely around Cate’s frame and Andrea worked to fasten it.

Cate’s heart thudded in her chest as the moment from her visions approached. Within moments, Andrea finished her task. She smoothed the dress and fluttered the trumpet bottom.

“Beautiful, Your Grace.”

“Thank you,” Cate said as she stared at the mirror.

Andrea pulled on her gloves to finish her look. “Jewelry?”

The sapphire necklace flashed through her mind. She’d had it in her visions.

“No,” Cate answered, not recalling the item in the luggage.

A knock sounded at the door. Andrea flitted toward it, tugging it open after peering out. Marcus strode inside with a velvet box in his hands.

“Oh, Catherine,” he said, stopping for a moment.

“What?” Cate asked, glancing down at her dress as she wondered if something was amiss.

“You are stunning.”

Cate let out a breath. “Thank you,” Cate said, feeling color rising in her cheeks.

“I have a gift.” Marcus snapped open the case. Cate’s breath caught in her throat as she eyed the sapphire necklace. All the items had come together. The music box tinkled in the background. She wore the sapphire blue dress. And the sapphire necklace was about to be fastened around her neck.

“May I?” Marcus asked.

Cate nodded and spun as he swept the necklace around her neck. She recalled the first time he’d done it. His fingers had been icy cold. Though at this moment, they were warm. She gazed in the mirror at the large stones as her thumb and forefinger pinched the center stone.

“You know, Catherine, when I first gave you this necklace, I had no intention of harming you.”

Cate raised her eyes from the stone to his dark eyes.

“The necklace ensured you remained alive.”

Her brow furrowed as she stared at him in the mirror’s reflection. “So, I couldn’t have died in that coffin?”

He cupped her shoulders and eyed her through the mirror. “No, dear, you could not have. I would never have harmed you. Even then.”

Perhaps this explained her draw to the necklace. It kept her alive. She spent another moment staring at it in the mirror before Marcus’s voice pulled her back to the present.

“Ready, my dear?” he asked, holding out his hand toward her.

A smile turned up the corners of her mouth as she twisted toward him. She slipped her hand into his and stepped forward toward the moment her temporalysis visions showed her. Toward her moment.

Marcus wrapped her hand around his arm and led her from the room. They snaked their way through the halls as they approached the ballroom.

As they turned the corner, Cate’s breath caught in her throat. The mirrored hallway matched her visions exactly. Conversation and music filtered from a well-lit room at the end of the hallway.

“Oh, there you are!” Anna said as she hurried toward them. “Oh, Catherine, you look lovely.” She offered her a kiss on her cheek.

“Thank you,” Cate said as Anna kissed Marcus’s cheek.

Anna studied them both for a moment, fiddling with Marcus’s lapel. “You two are perfect. Ready?”

“Yes, Mother, we are ready.”

Anna squeezed Cate’s hand and flitted back into the ballroom.

“She’s making me nervous,” Cate whispered. She blew a small breath out.

An amused grin formed on Marcus’s lips as he led her closer to the room. “Relax, Catherine. And smile. You will be the envy of every woman here tonight.”

Cate’s heart pounded as they approached the large room. They stepped inside. Cate’s eyes went wide as the music stopped and a trumpet sounded in her ear. The trumpeters on either side of them lowered the instruments with military precision.

Cate forced a smile on her face as all eyes turned to them. A formally clad man next to Cate announced their entrance. Marcus led her down the trio of steps into the ballroom and toward the middle of the floor.

He turned to face her, pulling her into closed position. "Oh, no," Cate breathed.

"Relax, dear."

Music began from a full orchestra and Marcus whisked Cate across the floor effortlessly. The smile on her face grew as she found the waltz easy. Others joined in as they continued.

"Why were you nervous? You are an excellent partner," Marcus said to her as the floor became crowded with other dancers.

"I'm not certain that's true. I think you're making me look good."

"Impossible," he said with a smile at her.

The music ended and the dancers applauded the musicians. Another song began as Marcus led Cate from the floor.

"There are several people we should greet," Marcus said.

Anna rejoined them. "Archduke Hansen has arrived, you should begin there, then Duke Cranston, followed by Lord Dixon then Lord Palmer."

Marcus nodded as Cate attempted to keep track of the names thrown at her. Anna patted Cate's arm. "You are a lovely dancer, Catherine, among so many other wonderful qualities. Marcus has chosen very well."

Anna approached a couple holding champagne flutes. Marcus extended his hand to the man as Anna kissed the woman's cheek.

"Duke Northcott, congratulations," the man said.

Marcus nodded at the man before introducing Cate. "My wife, Catherine. Catherine, Archduke Hansen and his wife, Sophia."

Cate offered her hand to the man before she leaned in to offer a kiss to Sophia. They chatted for a few moments before they moved on to another couple. Anna passed Cate a champagne flute along the way. She sipped at it as a dizzying array of names, faces, and peerage passed in front of her.

After another dance and three more introductions, they met Lord Mountbatten. The round-faced man with a thick, red, bulbous nose stared for several moments at Cate as they made polite conversation.

His portly wife eyed Cate up and down before passing along a snide "best wishes." They did not stay long with the couple before they moved on.

“That was one of the people you suspected may be connected to Jack’s disappearance, right?” Cate asked as they meandered around the room.

“Yes,” Marcus answered her.

Cate glanced back at him as they strode away. “I didn’t like him.”

“No one does,” Marcus assured her.

“Are the others here?”

“Yes, we have not met them yet, though we will.”

“I cannot believe how many people came!” Cate said as she glanced at the sea of faces, half of whom she had not met yet.

Marcus chuckled at the sentiment. “We are an important family in every social circle.”

They had two more conversations before they came upon Michael, Damien, and Celine.

“Hey, Cate!” Damien said. “You look beautiful.”

“Yes, you do, very,” Michael said.

“Blue is your color,” Celine said.

“Thank you. I feel quite out of place.”

“You don’t look it!” Damien said. “You’re a pro on the dance floor. Wow! Last time I danced at one of these things, I think I broke Celine’s toes.”

Cate chuckled before she wrapped her arm around Marcus’s and tapped his forearm with her other hand. “I think the accolades go to Marcus whose magic abilities apparently extend to making people look good on the dance floor.”

Celine’s lips curled into a smile and she shot Marcus a glance, raising her eyebrows.

“Have you met any of the people we’re supposed to be watching?” Cate inquired as she scanned the crowd.

“We’ve been keeping an eye on each of them. No tells so far,” Celine said.

“Oh, there goes Williams out of the room,” Damien said.

“I’m on it,” Michael answered, slipping past them and following the man.

“Come along, Catherine. We have more well-wishers to greet.”

Cate offered Celine and Damien a wave as Marcus led her away. “I’m glad they’re here to help. I can barely focus.”

“You’re doing fine. Everyone loves you. And the others have things well under control, wouldn’t you agree?”

“Yes, I would. I’m glad we checked in with them.”

“Has it settled your nerves?”

“Yes, it has. Thank you.”

They continued around the room, meeting more people than Cate could keep track of, including Lord Hanscomb and his wife. The gregarious man rambled on to Marcus about some business or other while his wife, Mary, inquired about the newly married couple’s travel plans.

They continued on around the room, sharing a brief conversation with Marquess Ivanov who traveled alone, explaining his wife would soon deliver their third child and remained at their country estate.

As they broke away, Cate inquired, “Do you think he nabbed Jack when he’s about to travel to the country for the birth of his child?”

“Doubtful, though I wouldn’t rule him out entirely.”

Cate glanced behind them, finding Michael had returned to the room. Michael’s presence indicated the man must have returned to the party. They had not yet met Sir William.

After four other conversations, they made it to the tall, dark-haired Sir William and his wife.

“Well, Duke Northcott,” Sir William said after introductions were made, “I suppose congratulations are in order.”

“You can do more than suppose, Williams, I am certain everyone in the room would agree I have outdone myself with Catherine.”

Sir William turned his beady, dark eyes toward Cate, narrowing them as he stared down his nose at her. “There is no denying she is lovely. Where did you say you were from, Catherine? Scotland?”

“Philadelphia,” Cate corrected.

“Oh, how foolish of me, yes. You’re American.”

Cate offered a polite smile.

“I don’t know why I thought you had some tie to Scotland. Do you?”

Cate swallowed hard, the implication unnerving, as she considered her response.

“She has a very important one, yes,” Marcus said. Cate glanced up at him, surprised he would admit her connection. “It is where we met.”

A smile spread across Cate’s face and she returned her gaze to Sir William.

“Quite an important tie then,” Lady Williams said with a giggle.

“Very,” Cate said with a smile.

They chatted a few more moments before Marcus excused them. He led Cate away toward the dance floor.

“I have shared you with the others enough,” he said as he pulled her closer.

“Do you think Sir William acted suspiciously?” Cate asked.

“Perhaps,” he answered.

“He kept asking about Scotland. Like he knew.”

“Perhaps the tale of how we met has already circulated.”

“Or perhaps he knows I’m the Countess of Dunhavenshire and he has Jack.”

Cate craned her neck to try to catch a glimpse of the man across the room. Marcus turned her the opposite way.

“What are you doing?” Cate inquired as she attempted to peer over his shoulder.

“Enjoying a dance with my new wife.”

“Very funny,” Cate said with a huff. “We have work to do.”

“The others can manage it. We’ve done our jobs.”

“How do you figure that?”

“We brought them all here,” Marcus said as he stared down at her.

“Still, we could—“

“Shh, Catherine. Let’s enjoy our moment, shall we?”

“Are you enjoying our fake moment?” Cate asked.

“Very much so,” he said as the dance ended and the dancers applauded.

Anna rejoined them, parading them around to a select few for second conversations. Within a few hours, the event began to wind down. As the first few guests filtered from the party, Cate chewed the inside of her lower lip. They’d learned little and soon the party would end. They’d be stuck again.

With each guest they said their goodnights to, Cate saw her chance of gaining information about Jack’s location slipping away.

A few guests still milled around the ballroom as the party wound down. Out of the corner of Cate’s eye, she caught movement toward the door. Michael and Damien hurried out of the room. Celine followed, making eye contact with Cate and signaling her to follow.

Cate grabbed Marcus’s arm and whispered the request in his ear.

“Duke Northcott,” a gentleman said as they left the dance floor, “I hoped to speak with you for a moment this evening. Might I borrow you with advanced apologies to your new bride?”

“Go on, dear,” Cate encouraged him.

She stepped away before he could protest, disappearing out the door where Celine had disappeared moments ago.

“What’s up?” she asked as she found the trio several steps away down the hall.

“We thought we saw Gianna,” Damien reported.

Cate’s head swiveled as she scanned the space. “Where?” she gasped.

“It was a fleeting glance,” Celine said, but we’re fairly sure we saw her slip into the ballroom, speak with Lord Mountbatten, and then leave.”

Cate continued to scan the area. “We should split up and look for her.”

“That’s almost always a terrible idea,” Damien said.

“He’s right,” Celine said with a nod. “We should at least go in pairs.”

“Celine and I will go that way,” Michael said, pointing down the hall. “You and Cate take that way.”

Cate nodded and she and Damien set off down the hall. They hurried down the hall, glancing into rooms and down other halls.

“How sure are you it was Gianna?” she asked, her breathing heavy as she dashed from door to door.

“It looked like her. Blonde, smart-alecky, confident.”

“That’s her, all right,” Cate said as she ground to a halt, spinning to consider which direction to go next. “Wait!”

“What is it, Cate?”

“That mirrored hall by the ballroom. A bunch of my visions were of that hall. I bet you it’s connected to Gianna.”

She grabbed Damien’s hand and tugged him back toward the ballroom, veering off to the large, elaborate hall. They wandered down it. Cate spun, searching for any sign of Gianna. She threw her arms out.

Cate pressed her palm to her forehead. “Nothing. Ugh! Where is she?”

“Let’s keep searching. This is a big place.”

Cate agreed with a nod and they set off down the hall, peering into rooms and winding into other hallways. They climbed the stairs to the next level.

Damien opened and closed doors as they trekked through the upstairs hallways. He pushed open the door to a sitting room. Candlelight glowed from within. “Candles!” he whispered. “Maybe she’s in here. Stay here while I check it out.”

Damien slipped into the room, leaving the door slightly ajar. Cate peered in through the crack, trying to follow his movements. She lost sight of him as he moved further away. With a sigh, she leaned away from the door.

Movement further down the hall caught her eye. She twisted to face it, catching the back of a buxom blonde hurrying down the hall away from her.

“Damien!” Cate called. “She’s here!”

Gianna disappeared around the corner. “Damien!” Cate called again.

She bounced on her toes as she waited. With a huff and a wince, she glanced at the doors once more, then left them behind, hurrying after Gianna.

She dashed down the hall and rounded the corner. Empty. Cate’s chest heaved as she rushed down the hall in search of the woman. She pushed a few doors open, finding darkened spaces.

Her heart beat hard against her ribs as she worried she’d lost her only link to Jack. Cate rounded the corner. Her suite lay at the end of the hall. She hurried toward it, pushing through the door and into her sitting room.

Cate scanned the candlelit space. She hurried across the room and into her bedroom. Gianna strolled across the room, swinging her evening bag from the drawstrings.

“Hello, little mouse,” she said with a grin and an arched eyebrow.

CHAPTER 28

Cate narrowed her eyes at the buxom blonde. “Where’s Jack?”

Gianna sauntered past her vanity table, running her hand along the brush and mirror set. She grasped the atomizer and sprayed it in the air.

“My, aren’t we becoming spoiled by our new friend?”

Cate set her jaw. “Tell me where Jack is.”

Gianna set the perfume bottle down and stalked past Cate, bumping into her as she passed. “Oops!”

Cate grabbed her wrist as the woman smacked into her and spun her around. “Where is Jack?” she shouted. “We’ve played your game. Enough is enough! Tell me where he is.”

Gianna wrenched her arm away from Cate. “You little spoiled brat,” she spat. She pulled her arm back, closing her fingers into a fist. She swung, hitting Cate square in the jaw.

The force sent her stumbling backward and she toppled over, spilling onto the floor.

“Wow, Cate, you really should learn how to take a punch!” Gianna said with a harsh chuckle.

The doors to the room burst open and Gianna snapped her gaze in their direction. She hid behind the door as Damien rushed inside.

“Cate!” he shouted, racing toward her.

“No!” Cate said as Gianna slipped around the door and raced across the room. “She’s getting away.”

Damien hesitated for a moment before he turned to race after her. He returned in a moment, Celine and Michael in tow.

Damien knelt next to Cate. "What happened?"

"Gianna's out there!" Cate said, her voice shrill.

"She's gone," Michael reported. "We saw her slip from the room and disappear."

Cate's shoulders slumped.

"Cate, what happened?" Damien asked. "Is this a bruise?" He touched a red spot on her jaw.

Cate winced. "Yes, she punched me."

"What?" Damien said.

"What is going on here?" Marcus inquired as he stormed into the room.

"We saw Gianna. We went in search of her," Celine explained.

"And she clocked Cate then disappeared," Damien finished.

"She did what?" Marcus barked as he hurried to Cate. He pulled her to stand, cupping her face in his hands and studying her reddening jaw.

He offered an angered huff as his thumb rubbed her cheek. "Are you hurt?"

Cate grasped his hands and shook her head. "I'm okay. She just stunned me, that's all."

"When we spotted her, she was speaking with Lord Mountbatten," Celine said.

Marcus's focus remained on Cate. "Are you certain you are unharmed?"

"I am," Cate assured him. "We need to focus on Gianna. She disappeared and we have no new information."

"Untrue. We should follow up with Mountbatten if Gianna spoke with him," Marcus said.

Before anyone else spoke, Anna entered the room. She eyed the scene suspiciously. "What is going on here?"

"Merely wishing Catherine a good night," Marcus answered. "It has been a long evening and she is quite tired."

"Yes," Anna answered, "we should allow her to rest."

No one moved and Anna's posture stiffened. "Have I spoken unclearly?"

"Oh, right," Damien said. "Sorry. Good night, Cate. You looked really beautiful."

"Thank you, Damien," Cate said.

Celine and Michael echoed Damien's sentiments before they shuffled from the room.

Anna embraced Cate and kissed her cheek. "You were so lovely, and everyone adored you. Sleep well, dear."

Marcus turned to face Cate as his mother left. He lightly grasped her chin between his thumb and forefinger and tilted her face to study her jaw again. "You should not take such chances."

"I almost lost track of her. I thought we could get some information from her." Cate's eyes clouded with tears. "She didn't tell me anything, though."

"And she won't. She is goading you. You must stop falling for her antics."

Cate sighed. "I'm sorry." She brushed a tear away that slipped to her cheek.

"Your trust in my abilities is concerning," Marcus said.

She glanced up at him, a faltering smile crossing her lips. "Sorry," she whispered. "I'm just tired."

"Then I shall let you rest. And we shall scrutinize Lord Mountbatten tomorrow. I'm certain we'll find something of interest to lead us to Jack."

His use of Jack's real name did not escape her. She wrapped her fingers around his hand. "Okay. Good night."

"Are you certain you are all right?"

She nodded again. "Yes, I'm fine. Thank you."

Marcus kissed her cheek before he strode from the room. Cate collapsed onto the stool in front of the vanity with a deep sigh. She sank her chin into her palm before she raised her eyes to the mirror. She twisted her neck, staring at her jaw. Marcus had removed any trace of the blow. At least she wouldn't have a bruise.

Andrea entered moments later. Within an hour, Andrea had her prepared for bed. Weary from the evening, Cate shuffled across the bedroom as the door eased shut behind Andrea.

She scrubbed her face as she perched on the edge of the bed. With an exhausted sigh, she slid under the covers and eased into the pillows.

The night of her visions had come and gone. They seemed no closer to finding Jack. There had been no a-ha moment, no epiphany. Why had her mind focused on this event? What had been the important moment?

Her mind replayed the evening. A moment during her first dance stuck in her mind. Her forehead crinkled as a thought danced across her mind.

Before her mind could fully parse through it, something moved near Cate's leg. Cate propped herself up on her elbows and glanced down toward her feet.

Something tickled her leg near her ankle. Instinctively, she kicked her leg as she peeled the covers back.

Before she could uncover her calves, a sharp pain shot through her ankle. She gasped, throwing her head back as the intense pain narrowed her vision for a moment. Her ankle throbbed. A stinging burn shot up her leg.

Cate gulped in breaths until the pain intensified to a point she could not stand. She opened her mouth wide, a scream echoing throughout the room.

Tears streamed down her face as she gritted her teeth through the pain. She tried to kick off her covers, but the pain in her leg made the task difficult. Her right leg flicked at the duvet as her left leg lay like a dead weight.

Cate whimpered as the source of her pain revealed itself. A stout-bodied, pear-headed snake slithered its way up the sheets, its tongue flicking at her. Cate's eyes grew wide and her lower lip quivered as the snake's forked tongue snapped in and out of its mouth again.

The pain worsened, traveling into her thigh. She moaned in agony. The doors to her suite burst open and Marcus raced inside. "Catherine?"

He rushed to her bed, his eyes wide. With a grimace, he grasped the snake at the base of its neck. Moments later, its body went limp and he tossed it aside. The body smacked into the wall, sliding to the floor with a thud.

He cupped Cate's face in his hands. "Catherine? Did it bite you?"

Cate tried to nod, but her vision was blurring. Her eyes fluttered as she attempted to focus on him and keep them open.

"What happened?" Anna's voice called. "I heard a horrific scream."

"Catherine has been bitten by a venomous snake," Marcus said. His hands traveled down her calf to the puncture wounds on her ankle.

Anna rushed inside, her gaze falling on the discarded body. "Oh, no," she groaned. "We must remove as much of the poison as quickly as possible."

Cate shrieked in pain, tears streaming freely. Anna hurried to her side, stroking her hair. Marcus pressed his lips to the wound, drawing as much poison from the wound as possible. It did little to ease the pain.

Cate's entire body burned with it. Every muscle, every fiber stung. Her vision clouded and narrowed. She gasped for breath. She clutched at Anna's hand, attempting to use it to anchor her to this world. Marcus spoke, but his voice was garbled.

The burning pain proved to be too much. She closed her eyes and slipped into the all-consuming blackness.

* * *

Garbled voices awoke Cate. Tinkling music filled the air. She gasped as she snapped her eyes open, glancing around her surroundings. Blackness surrounded her. She swam in a sea of nothing. Her limbs felt heavy and limp. Her body burned with pain.

The voices became clearer for a moment.

"...to her?" Damien's echoed.

"A snake bite," Anna explained. A cool, damp cloth was pressed against her forehead from nowhere.

"Will she be all right?" Damien squeaked.

Anna's garbled voice answered, becoming clearer toward the end. "... know. She is feverish."

"Damien?" Cate called to him. "Anna?"

Cate tried to stand but found herself unable to move. She struggled to crawl forward but made no progress.

The garbled voices continued before they faded away.

"No!" Cate called. "Don't go! Wait! Please don't leave me here."

* * *

Cate startled awake again, this time finding herself in a darkened version of the mirrored hallway. She scanned the space, catching sight of herself in the mirror. Cate crawled toward it and pressed a hand against it. She was trapped.

"Hello?" she called out, her voice reverberating in the space. Tinkling music played overhead. Pain in her ankle made her gasp. She sat back and grabbed at her swollen ankle. A large black bruise sullied her skin. Two puncture wounds stung as she ran her fingers over them.

A cooling sensation crept across her ankle. Fingers caressed her hair. Voices sounded overhead, echoing in the large hall.

“...eat something,” Anna said.

“No,” Marcus answered.

“Marcus, you must—“

“Mother, please!”

“We are doing everything we can for her,” Anna said. “Yet her fever lingers.”

Air tickled her ear as Marcus’s voice whispered to her. “Come back, Catherine. You must come back to us.”

“Marcus!” she called. “I’m here!”

She stared upward, searching for any way out, but finding none.

* * *

Cate shot up to sit with a startled gasp. She shivered as coldness caused her skin to prickle with goosebumps.

Shouting had interrupted her sleep. She concentrated on the voices. Tinkling music still played in the background.

“Get her out of here!” Anna shouted.

“I would never harm her. I only wanted to help,” Celine answered.

Anna’s muddled voice yelled something.

“...ridiculous!” Damien shouted back.

“Yes, it’s crazy,” Michael added.

“This is not Celine’s fault,” Marcus answered.

“Are you certain?” Anna asked.

“Yes. We know who is responsible,” Marcus said. “It is rather a complicated tale.”

“We seem to have the time,” Anna said.

Fingers stroked her hair again and a cool sensation pressed against her burning hot forehead.

Marcus’s voice echoed in the dark space. “We should focus our energy on Catherine. She cannot die.”

CHAPTER 29

The familiar tune from the music box floated on the air. Cate's eyes fluttered open. With blurry vision, she slid her eyes around to try to identify her surroundings. Her body ached and tiredness coursed through her. Sweat beaded on her forehead and her nightgown, soaked with sweat, clung to her. She shivered as a chill passed over her.

After a few more blinks, her eyes focused. In the dim light, she recognized her bedroom suite at Rosenberg. She slid her gaze sideways. Marcus stood limned in the pale morning light as he stared out the window.

"Marcus," she squeaked, her voice weak and quiet.

Marcus spun to face her, hurrying to her side. "Catherine!" He rubbed her forehead with his thumb as he smiled at her, clutching her hand. "You are awake!"

"Hi," she breathed out with a weak smile.

"I worried I would never see those beautiful blue eyes again."

Anna stirred from her dozing in the chair next to the bed. She leapt forward, perching on the edge of her seat. "Catherine, thank heavens. How do you feel?"

"Tired," Cate answered.

Anna stroked her damp hair. "Her fever has broken." She eased the covers back, glancing underneath. "The swelling is down."

Anna settled the covers over her. "We should tend to the wound again and make you more comfortable. Marcus, will you see about some food for Catherine whilst I help situate her?"

“Of course, Mother,” Marcus said, his eyes never leaving Cate’s. He squeezed her hand and kissed her forehead before he left her bedside to attend to her meal.

After a change of nightgown and brushing of her hair, Anna settled Cate in bed.

“Feeling any better?”

“Yes,” Cate answered as she smoothed the covers over her legs. “Was I feverish?”

“Oh, yes, dear. Terribly. The cloths I used only lasted minutes before they were too hot to do any good.”

“From the bite?”

Anna nodded as she clutched Cate’s hand, her thumb rubbing it. “Yes. Marcus removed most of the poison, but what remained in your body made you deathly ill. We worried you may not recover.”

“I was that sick?”

“Yes, you were quite ill. Marcus has not left your side since the incident. He has not eaten nor slept he’s been so worried.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as she considered a response to the statement. Marcus’s arrival in the room interrupted her. He carried a tray of food, settling it on Cate’s lap.

“Thank you,” she said as she picked up her fork.

Anna patted her shoulder. “If you do not mind, I am going to step out for a moment and give you two some time together.”

Anna hurried from the room as Cate took a few bites of food. Marcus stroked her hair. “Are you feeling better?”

“I am, yes,” Cate said. “I cannot believe how sick I was.”

Any further conversation was interrupted by the door to the hall bursting open again.

“Cate!” Damien exclaimed as he pushed through. “Oh, man, it’s good to see you awake.”

She smiled at him as he eased into the chair next to her bed. “It’s good to be awake.”

“We were so worried about you.”

Michael and Celine trailed behind him. “I was just saying that I can’t believe how sick I was. What a terrible night. And now, nothing. Besides being a little worn out, I’m fine.”

Damien's brow crinkled and he shot a glance at Michael and Celine. "Night?" he said, flicking his gaze back to Cate.

"Yes," Cate answered after a bite of toast. She glanced around at each of them. "The snake bit me less than twelve hours ago. And now I'm fine."

"Uhhh—" Damien mumbled, his gaze darting around at the others again.

"What?" Cate inquired as the others in the room reacted oddly to her statement. "Isn't that what happened?"

"Not exactly," Damien said with a wince.

Cate scrunched her features. "How long was I sick?"

"Three days," Marcus answered.

"Three days!" Cate shouted, nearly knocking the breakfast tray from her lap. "Are you serious?"

Damien nodded and patted her arm. "You were really sick, Cate."

"There were a few times we didn't think you'd pull through," Celine said.

Cate's jaw hung agape and she lowered her eyes to her nearly empty breakfast plate. She licked her lips as she tried to formulate a response.

Damien patted her arm again. "But you're okay now. And we have some good news."

"Good news?" Cate asked, lifting her gaze to him.

"We found Jack," Michael answered.

Cate snapped her gaze to him, her jaw falling open again. She shoved the tray aside as she leaned forward. "You did? Where is he? Is he here?"

"No," Celine answered. "We know where he is, but we're still working out a plan to get him back."

"I assume my brush with death distracted you from that," Cate said with a sigh.

"Yes and no," Celine said. "While you were certainly a focus, the location they are using to hold Jack makes this more difficult."

"He is most certainly under guard," Marcus said.

"And getting him out will not be easy," Celine added.

"Because he's that heavily guarded?" Cate inquired.

"No, there's something else," Celine said, pulling her lower lip into a wince.

Damien lowered his eyes, scrunching his lips. Michael glanced away, crossing his arms over his chest. Celine shot a glance at Marcus.

"What is it? What aren't you telling me?"

Marcus pushed a lock of hair behind her ear. "You should rest, Catherine."

"What? No! What aren't you telling me?" She stared at Marcus, an insistent expression on her features. "We talked about this. Sharing information, remember?"

Silence fell over the group again. "She has the right to know," Damien said.

Marcus sighed at the statement. His lips parted, though he hesitated. Cate eyed him, awaiting the details.

He squeezed his lips shut and swallowed hard. "We believe based on the information we've received that Jack has temporalysis."

Cate sucked in a breath at the news.

"Quite a severe case," Marcus added.

Cate's shoulders slumped forward as she lowered her eyes, pondering the news.

"His condition will make it difficult to retrieve him."

Cate licked her lips as questions raced through her mind. "Because of the confusion he's experiencing?"

"No," Celine answered with a sigh. She flicked her gaze to Cate, a consoling expression on her features. "We don't think he's even conscious at this point."

A sob escaped Cate's lips and she clapped a hand over her mouth as tears clouded her vision. Marcus slipped a hand around her shoulders, rubbing them.

"Temporalysis can be fatal, right?" Cate questioned.

"Not always," Damien said.

"But Jack's case sounds pretty severe," Cate said. "What if we can't get to him in time? And even if we do, what if he can't be saved?"

"We'll get to him, Cate," Michael said.

Celine nodded. "And then we'll do our best to manage his symptoms. Millie was working on a few things when we left. We'll get her started on assessing his condition the second we return."

Damien grabbed Cate's hand and squeezed it. "It'll be okay, Cate."

Cate heaved in a few breaths, worry on her delicate features. "We need to get him as soon as possible."

"And we will," Michael said. "Why don't you get some rest and we'll go come up with a plan."

“I can help,” Cate insisted.

Marcus tightened a hand around her shoulder, holding her in place. “No, Catherine, you will rest. We very nearly lost you and I will not chance you taking a turn for the worse.”

“But—“

“Catherine, I will not argue over it. This is not up for discussion.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped and Damien patted her hand. “It’s okay, Cate. You rest and let us come up with something. We’ll tell you as soon as we have a plan. Deal?”

Cate sighed and slumped back toward the pillows. “Deal.”

Damien rose from his chair and stepped toward the foot of the bed. “Let’s get at it!”

“Get some rest, Cate,” Michael said as they stepped away.

Marcus lingered behind as they departed from the room. He flicked his gaze to her. “Are you all right?”

Cate nodded, not making eye contact with him.

He tipped her chin up with his finger. “Catherine.”

She raised her eyes to him. “I’m okay. I’m not happy about Jack being so sick, but there’s not much we can do about that but hope for the best.”

“Do you have the dragon’s blood? We can begin treating him the moment we get to him.”

Cate nodded and tugged open the drawer of the nightstand, pulling out the bag Dembe had given her.

As Marcus pulled the bag open, Cate shook her head and waved her hand. “You can take the whole thing. I don’t need it anymore.”

Marcus raised his eyebrows in question.

“I reached the point of my visions. I should be cured, right?”

“Yes, you are. What was the culmination?”

“The ball,” Cate said. “I thought it may have been connected to some clue about Jack but it wasn’t.”

Marcus’s forehead pinched as he considered her statement. Any further conversation was interrupted by Celine’s head popping through the door. “Marcus, are you coming?”

“Yes,” he called to her. He flicked his gaze to Cate. “Rest, Catherine.”

She nodded at him. Before he left the room, he wound the music box, setting it on her nightstand. Cate settled back into the pillows as Marcus strode away.

As the door eased shut, she buried her face in her hands. Her temporalysis had passed, but now it afflicted Jack. And in a far worse way. She slid down in the bed, resting her head against the pillows behind her.

She reached for the music box as it tinkled away and pulled it close to her, closing her eyes and listening to the tune. It did little to soothe her nerves. She set it on her night table and threw back the covers.

She swung her legs over the edge, sliding into her slippers and testing weight on her ankle. A slight ache shot up her leg but she could bear the weight. She stood and wandered over to the window, gazing out over the landscape.

With a sigh, she toddled around the room, her arms crossed over her chest. She ambled into the sitting room and sank onto the chaise, cupping her chin in her palm. She shook her head in frustration. She could not sit here even if she'd just survived a snake bite.

She pushed up to stand and stalked across the room, intent on finding her friends and joining the strategy session. She roamed through the halls in search of the others.

She pushed through a doorway, glancing around the space in search of them. Instead, she found a large library. Cate stared at the many books on the shelves, deciding to investigate before moving on. If she was relegated to staying in bed, at least she could read.

Cate breathed in the scent of the leather-bound volumes. Her fingertips ran along their spines as she studied the room. She approached one shelf and studied the titles. Her eyebrows pinched together as she read the titles. Benson's Guide to Creatures. Basic Enchantments. Enchanted Objects and Their Uses.

"Is this for real?" Cate whispered to herself.

She tugged a few volumes from the shelf and tottered to the large mahogany desk in front of the stained-glass window. The thick books thudded onto its polished top as she plopped onto the wooden chair.

A plume of dust billowed into the air as she tugged open the first volume, its leather binding creaking. She thumbed through the book, the pages fluttering past. She stopped at a random page and studied it.

The entry detailed information about vampires, their characteristics, strengths and weaknesses, and other information about the species. Cate scanned the information before flipping to another random page. She stared with wide eyes at the illustration of a crouched hairless creature with beady eyes and triangular teeth. The heading, citing the name Gobgoyle, described the creature as amiable for the most part, though could become aggressive if provoked. It indicated the creatures were popular pets among the Dracopires.

“Dracopires,” Cate repeated as she thumbed through to the index. She traced her finger down the finely printed list and found the entry. After flipping to the appropriate page, Cate studied the entry, her eyes growing wider.

The illustration showed a hulking, beastly, bipedal creature with a long pointed tail, large wings, and horns poking from its human-like head. Cate swallowed hard as she scanned the description of the dragon-like vampire. Her forehead crinkled as she scanned the paragraph about their home. While a small colony lived in the mountains of Romania, most Dracopires lived in a realm called Sangmond.

“Sangmond?” Cate questioned.

She rose from her chair and wandered to the shelves, finding a book titled Realms beyond Earth. She slid the thick tome from the shelf and wandered back to her seat. After consulting the index, she thumbed to the appropriate page.

Her mind spun as she read about the other realm, dictated by a blood-red moon that rose and set like the sun. She blazed through the article before flipping to another. Page after page described strange and fantastic worlds beyond earth.

Cate pulled another book toward her and opened it, reading random entries before trying another book. She lost herself in the sea of new information. Book upon book, article upon article stunned her.

Before long, books littered the top of the large desk, each open to random pages. She studied a new one, tracing information back and forth between two books.

The creaking door across the room drew her attention away from her stack of research. Marcus stepped into the room, his brow furrowing at the scene. “Catherine? What are you doing in here?”

Slumped over the books, Cate glanced up at him, her jaw agape. “Is—is all this real?”

Marcus strode to the desk and studied the collection sprawled across the polished mahogany wood.

“My, my, Catherine, you’ve amassed quite a collection here.”

Cate glanced up at him for an answer to her question. He flicked his gaze toward her and nodded. "Yes, it is all fact."

Cate's eyes scanned the open tomes spread in front of her. She slow-blinked at them. "Wow," she said as she slouched back in the chair. "How do people not know?"

"It is well-guarded."

"Obviously," Cate answered. "This is astounding."

"Have you been here for long?"

"Since shortly after you left me. I found this room and I started with this book here." She dug the creature reference from under the pile. "And then I went to this one because they mentioned some sort of other world with Dragon-something-or-others that are also vampires."

"Dracopires," he said.

"Yes," Cate said, pointing to him. "That's it. And they lived in some other world. So, then I read about that. Then another world, and another."

"And then this book about enchantments. And this one about contacting something called an adjudicator."

"You read portions of all of these since this morning?"

"Well...yes," Cate answered. "And I've barely made a dent."

"And did you find it interesting?"

"I found it fascinating and astounding. My mind can barely keep up with all of this and I've barely scratched the surface."

"Your curiosity is admirable and quite refreshing." Marcus smiled down at her before he offered his hand. "Come with me."

Cate glanced at the books. "I promise it will be worth leaving your books behind for a moment."

She flicked her gaze to him and slipped her hand into his. He led her across the room to a bookshelf. His hand slid behind the decorative trim, pressing some unknown trigger. The bookshelf popped open and he tugged it backward, revealing a dark stairway.

After retrieving a lit candle, he grasped her hand and pulled her forward. They traveled down the stone steps, spilling into a large chamber.

Marcus left Cate at the base of the stairs and lit several wall sconces. As the room lit up, Cate's gaze flitted from one object to another, some on pedestals, others on shelves.

"What are these?" Cate asked.

“Enchanted objects, magical items, precious commodities. My father amassed a large collection of such items. I have added to it.”

Cate’s eyes cut to Marcus, before returning to the objects, some appearing mundane, others appearing magical. “What do they do?”

“It depends on the item,” Marcus answered. He led her to the mantle clock, ticking away the time on a shelf. “This can stop time for small amounts of time.”

He led her to a staff. “This can alter weather, specifically, it can draw lightning.”

He pulled a sheet off of a full-length mirror. “This allows the user to enter Mirror World.”

Cate twisted to glance at him before returning her gaze to her reflection. “What?”

“Mirror World. The world that exists beyond the mirror.”

“I’m not sure I understand.”

Marcus’s lips curled on the edges. “Hmm, you’ll have to do more reading. Haven’t you ever wondered what your reflection does when you are not there?”

“No, I thought my reflection was gone once I left.”

He smirked through the mirror at her. He uttered a few Latin words, then said, “Pull her from the mirror.”

“What do you mean?” Cate inquired.

He positioned Cate in front of the mirror. She stared at her reflection.

“Reach for her,” he said.

She cocked her head, twisting to glance at him with a furrowed brow. He nodded to her.

Cate stretched her arm toward the mirror. Instead of hitting cold glass, her hand melted into the mirror. She gasped and snapped it back.

“It’s all right, Catherine, it will not harm you. Grab her hand and pull her toward you.”

“What?” Cate asked with a chuckle.

“Go on,” he encouraged.

Cate swallowed hard and squared her shoulders. With a raise of her eyebrows, she pushed her hand into the mirror. Flesh touched hers and she closed her fingers around what she felt and tugged it toward her.

Her eyes widened as her hand emerged from the mirror. Another hand clasped hers. An arm emerged. Cate glanced behind her at Marcus.

“Keep going.”

Cate stepped backward and a mirror image of herself stepped out of the mirror. She stared at the doppelgänger, dropping its hand.

Marcus circled around her. “Are you impressed?”

“I’m... speechless,” Cate said.

“Say hello to her,” Marcus said.

Cate returned her gaze to her duplicate. “Hello,” she said with a wave.

“Hi, Cate,” the other Cate answered.

“Who are you?” Cate asked her.

“I am you. Well, I am your mirror image. I can walk and talk and do everything you do.”

Cate stared at the other version of herself. “Let’s put her back,” Marcus suggested.

He whispered in the other Cate’s ear. The doppelgänger spun on her heel and stepped back into the mirror, returning to the other world.

As he covered the mirror, Cate said, “It’s something like this that allows Gianna to time travel, right?”

“Yes. There are seven time travel conduits in the world. The Agency has two. I have one. The locations of the others are unknown.”

Cate approached a tiara on a pedestal. Its diamonds sparkled in the candlelight. “What does this one do?”

“Allows the wearer to view a window into Alterra.”

“What’s Alterra?”

“Another dimension where a different set of decisions have led to a different world.”

Cate crinkled her brow as she ran a finger along the jewels.

“Ask Damien about it. He has been to one.”

“Really?” Cate inquired.

“Yes, though I believe he found the experience rather frightening. Would you like to try it on?”

Cate shook her head. “No, not if what Damien saw terrified him.”

“You may see something you like.”

“Or hate. I’ll stick with this dimension, thanks.”

Marcus approached and stared down at her. “Are you happy with what you see in this dimension?”

CHAPTER 30

Cate swallowed hard as his dark eyes bore into hers. She avoided the question. “I will be happier when we’ve retrieved Jack. Was there any progress on that front?”

He offered her a half-smile. “We plan to propose a trade with them.”

“A trade?”

Marcus waved his hand around the well-stocked room. “One of these items for Jack.”

“Do you think they’ll go for it?” Cate inquired.

Marcus nodded. “Yes. Without these objects, their powers are limited. They will be interested. At least enough to take a meeting.”

Cate nodded and blew out a long breath. “I can’t wait until this is over.”

“Shall we return you to your bed to rest? Perhaps you’d like to take your books with you.”

Cate nodded as she glanced down at her ankle. “Yes, I think I may have overdone it.”

Marcus’s forehead crinkled with concern. “Are you in pain?”

“A little.” She winced as she tugged her nightgown and robe up, revealing her swollen ankle.

“Catherine,” he chided. “We must get you back into bed. I shall carry you.”

He reached for her.

“No,” she countered, waving a finger at him. “I can walk. I don’t need to be carried like a damsel in a gothic nov—“

Her words cut off as Marcus swept her off her feet, cradling her in his arms.

“This is unnecessary,” Cate argued as he climbed the spiraling stairs.

“I’ll be the judge of that.”

“Your judgment is impaired. I can walk.”

“Yet, you will not,” he insisted as they stepped into the library. “Push the bookcase closed, please.”

Cate swung the bookcase shut before he crossed to the desk. “And pick up the books you’d like to study.”

Cate grabbed the few she had been reading before he carried her through the halls and settled her in her bed. “Can I trust that you will stay here?”

“Can I trust that you will tell me when you hear anything about Jack?”

“Of course, I will. As long as I know I can find you here.”

“I will not move,” Cate promised as she flipped open her book on other realms. “I have a lot of learning to do.”

Anna arrived shortly after Cate settled into her reading. “How are you feeling, dear?” she inquired as she sank into the armchair.

“Much better,” Cate admitted.

“I see you’ve found some books to entertain you.” She glanced at a few of the titles Cate had spread across the bed. She cut her gaze to Cate, a surprised expression on her features. “I am surprised you are not asleep with this dry selection.” She shook her head at the books. “Did you allow Marcus to pick the books?”

Cate chuckled at the statement. “I did not. I selected them myself. I found them immensely interesting.”

“Hmm, what a unique individual you are, Catherine. It is obvious why Marcus married you.”

They chatted for a few more moments before a knock sounded at the door and Damien pushed his head in. “May I come in?”

“Yes,” Cate said, waving him inside.

“Just checking on the patient.”

“I’m doing well, thanks.”

“I’ll allow you two to visit,” Anna said, rising from the chair and patting Cate’s arm. “If you need anything just call.”

She strode from the room as Damien eased into the chair, perusing the selection of books. “Interesting stuff, huh?”

"I thought so. I'm not sure I fully comprehend the magnitude of what is in these books."

"It's crazy, that's for sure. Oh, Benson's Guide to Creatures. Alexander has this."

"Have you read it?"

"I've checked out a few entries, yeah."

Cate flicked her volume closed. "I heard you checked out more than entries in some of these. Marcus said you visited a place called Alterra?"

"I did. One of them. There are millions or something."

"He said it terrified you."

"Oh," Damien said with a chuckle. "Yeah, sort of. In this time band, Celine married Marcus and she turned into a real b— well, never mind. She was kind of scary."

Cate's eyebrows raised. "Really?"

Damien nodded. "Oh, yeah. She drew a guy to her with some kind of magnetic force and then turned him mute!"

"Wow." Cate ruminated on how the single different choice had resulted in an entirely different version of Celine.

"In the end, when she met Gray, she fell in love with him. I guess they're just meant to be together no matter what happens in the time band."

"Aww, that's kind of romantic. Though, I doubt Marcus appreciated that."

"Nope. Not at all."

Cate stared into space as she considered the reaction he may have had to such news. Any further conversation was interrupted by the arrival of Michael.

"Hey, we got something back from Mountbatten."

"You did?" Cate inquired, shifting the book off her lap.

Damien leapt from his seat. "What was it?"

"They're willing to play ball. Tonight. Eldinbury Castle."

Damien blew out a breath. "On their turf."

"Yeah, I don't like it," Michael said.

Marcus and Celine entered as Michael and Damien discussed the details. Cate studied Marcus's face, trying to read his reaction.

"I assume you already announced the news," he said to Michael.

"Yeah," Michael answered. "We were just discussing it."

"Going to them. Not great," Damien said.

“We have little choice,” Marcus answered.

Celine crossed her arms and shrugged. “He’s right, D. We need to play by their rules.”

“I don’t have to like it.”

Cate stared up at Marcus. “What do you think?”

“I think Celine is correct. Given Jack’s condition, we need to make the best play we can this evening as they govern.”

Cate bit her lower lip. “Damien’s right, too. It puts us in a bad position.”

“Jack’s condition, which is relatively unknown, but does not seem to be good, dictates our choices. It is not the best position to be in, but nonetheless, it is the one we are in. We must make the best move we can.”

Cate nodded, still chewing her lower lip. “I want to go.”

Marcus clasped his hands behind his back. “It may be best—”

Cate shot him a pleading glance. He scrunched his eyebrows. “Fine.”

“I think we should all go. We’re coming in at a disadvantage. Showing up en masse strengthens us, somewhat,” Michael argued.

“Yes, I think it would be best,” Marcus said.

Damien nodded. “Then we travel this evening to Eldinbury.”

Cate blew out a long breath as the plans were finalized. Soon she would be reunited with Jack and this nightmare would end. At least she hoped.

* * *

The carriage trundled along the lane toward Eldinbury Castle. Cate sat next to Marcus, trying not to fidget too much. She chewed her lower lip as her nerves reached fever pitch. She glanced across from her. Sandwiched between Michael and Damien, Celine drummed her fingers against her leg.

Damien offered Cate a supportive smile. “It’s almost over, Cate,” he said.

Marcus glanced at her before he slid his hand over hers. She turned hers upward and laced her fingers between his, drawing on him for support. She worried about what they’d find when they arrived. Would they accept the bargain for one of Marcus’s enchanted items? And would it matter? What condition would Jack be in? Could he be saved?

Questions raced through her mind faster than she could process them. She gave up trying to reason answers for each as the castle came into sight.

Her heart sped up, pounding against her ribs. Marcus squeezed her hand, sensing her apprehension through their shared connection.

The carriage slowed to a stop outside the entrance to the fortress castle. Cate's knees wobbled as Marcus helped her from the carriage. The five of them were shown into the foyer before they were paraded down a long hallway into a generously-sized office.

The portly Lord Mountbatten puffed a cigar behind his desk. Next to him, the shapely Gianna, perched on the mahogany wood, her legs dangling as she sipped a sherry.

As they filed into the room, Lord Mountbatten took another puff of his cigar before setting it in an ornate ashtray. He slowly rose from his chair as Gianna slipped to the floor, turning to face them with a cat-who-caught-the-canary smile. A necklace sporting a large gold key dangled from her neck.

"Well, Northcott, I never thought I'd see the day where you were willing to bargain for anything."

Marcus's set expression conveyed his displeasure with the entire situation. Cate swallowed hard, worried the plan may not come to fruition if the ruddy man continued to needle at Marcus.

"I am willing to do nothing until we have confirmed Mr. Reid's condition."

"He's alive," Gianna said.

"Can we see him?" Cate asked.

Amusement crossed Gianna's features and she leaned onto the polished desk. "The mouse speaks. I would allow a moment, but there really is no use."

"What's that mean?" Michael inquired.

"He is unconscious. And quite honestly, I am not certain how much of his mind remains intact." She flicked her haughty gaze to Cate. Cate swallowed the lump forming in her throat.

"Then I suppose we should get down to business before you destroy him entirely in your little game," Marcus answered.

"Make me an offer," Mountbatten said.

"The Crown of Alacon," Marcus said simply.

Gianna slid her eyes sideways, an amused grin playing on her features. The round man picked up his cigar and puffed it, blowing a circle out from his fat lips.

He flicked his gaze to Marcus. "No."

Gianna raised her eyebrows, her grin widening. Cate's heart dropped a little. Though perhaps he had made a low offer on the first round.

"The Mirror Bridge."

The man flicked his gaze to the desk, puckering his lips as he stroked a hand down his round belly. "No."

"Both," Marcus countered.

Cate swallowed hard as she awaited the response.

"Declined," he spat. "Have you come here to toy with me? I will let the man die, it makes no matter to me."

Cate's heart seized at the words.

"Though I do think it matters to the little mouse," Gianna said, making an exaggerated display of pouting.

Unflustered, Marcus continued. "I have an offer you cannot refuse."

Cate studied him, wondering what it was. What object in his secret artifact room did The Agency desire enough to trade for Jack?

"I doubt it. If it is another of your trinkets, I have plenty of my own. And I acquire new toys daily."

"It is not. And I guarantee you will accept it."

Gianna raised her eyebrows at the statement as did Lord Mountbatten. The man tapped ashes from his cigar, scattering them into the standing metal ash tray. "I'm thoroughly intrigued. Name your offer."

Marcus eyed the man for a moment before he uttered a single word. "Me."

CHAPTER 31

Cate's eyes went wide at Marcus's offer of himself for Jack. "What?" she gasped.

The others with her seemed as shocked as she was at the statement, none of them aware of his backup plan.

The delighted grin on Gianna's face could not be hidden. She shot a gleeful glance at Lord Mountbatten, who also failed to hide a satisfied grin.

"Accepted," he answered. "I never imagined I'd win both the objects of my desire."

"No!" Cate said.

"Return to your carriage, we shall deliver Reid to you," Mountbatten said.

Cate shook her head, her breath catching in her throat. "No," she repeated. She grabbed Marcus's arm, tugging on it.

"Oh, my, the little mouse is displeased!" Gianna giggled before turning serious. "Too bad. The deal is made. He is ours now."

"Catherine—" Marcus began when Gianna interrupted him.

"Get out. You're finished here."

Marcus eyed Lord Mountbatten. "A moment," he requested.

The man waved his hand, signaling for Marcus to proceed. Cate's breathing turned ragged as Marcus pushed her back several steps.

"Catherine, calm yourself. Once you return to Rosenberg, seek out Mother. She will know the best way to help Jack."

"Marcus, no, you can't do this," Cate begged, tears forming in her eyes.

“It is done. Take Jack home.”

Cate shook her head frantically as she clutched at his forearms. “No, this solves nothing. We’ve traded one problem for another.”

“It solves everything.”

“We’ll find another way,” Cate pleaded.

“Jack does not have that kind of time.”

“No,” Cate choked out. She glanced around Marcus. “I’ll give you Dunhaven. I will—“

Marcus wrapped his arm around her and eased her back a few steps. “No, you will not. The deal is made. This is over.”

Her lower lip trembled as she searched her mind for another solution. She pressed a palm to her forehead as she gasped out a breath. Gianna approached him with thick handcuffs.

“No,” Cate sobbed.

“Don’t worry, mouse, we’ll take Dunhaven, too, when we’re ready.”

Marcus pushed her toward Damien as a gleeful Gianna clasped the iron shackle around one of his wrists. “Take her.”

Damien wrapped his arms around Cate as tears spilled onto her cheeks. “No,” she sobbed.

“Come on, Cate. I’ve got you.”

Cate dug her heels in as Damien tried to guide her from the room. After a moment, he tugged her up and carried her into the hall as her feet kicked to find purchase.

“We can’t leave him here,” she cried as they stepped into the hall.

“I don’t think we have a choice,” Michael said as he wrapped an arm around her, too.

Cate’s lip trembled and her limbs felt weak as they led her to the waiting carriage. She climbed inside. Damien clamored in next to her, wrapping his arm around her and pulling her close as she sniffled.

“We can’t leave him,” she tried again.

Celine shook her head. “I’m not sure what we can do. To be honest, I’m still in shock.”

“You didn’t know either?” Cate asked.

“I didn’t. And I’m stunned that Marcus just sacrificed himself.”

Damien rubbed Cate’s arm as Celine admitted her surprise. Cate’s lips formed a grimace as she fought back tears.

“We’ll get back to Rosenberg, assess the situation with Jack, and come up with a plan,” Michael promised.

The doors to the castle opened, shining light from within. All eyes turned to the figures limned in light. Two men dragged another man between them. His feet trailed behind him as he hovered at their elbow level, his head lolling to his chest.

They tossed the man’s body forward. Jack hit the ground hard, sliding forward on the gravel in a heap.

“Jack!” Cate exclaimed as Damien and Michael leapt from the carriage. They dragged an unconscious Jack into the carriage.

His head lolled to the side as Cate and Celine helped tug him inside.

“Dragon’s blood,” Celine said as they hauled him onto a seat, propping him against the side.

Cate dug it from her pocket, pulling his lower lip down and placing a lozenge on his tongue. The bitter dragon’s blood drop produced no effect.

“Oh, Jack,” Cate moaned as she settled into the seat next to him. She grasped his hand and squeezed. “We’re here. And we’re going to get you help.”

The carriage bobbed its way away from the castle. Cate glanced back at the lights glowing within the windows. She resisted the urge to stop the carriage and go back. The second heartbeat in her chest beat steadily. As the castle shrank away from view, Cate returned her gaze to Jack. She hoped Anna could help. But she fretted over explaining where the woman’s son was when they returned.

* * *

The carriage slowed to a stop after the steep climb to Rosenberg Palace. Cate flew from the carriage in search of Anna while Michael and Damien unloaded Jack, shouldering him between them as they dragged him into the castle.

Cate hurried through the halls, bursting into a private sitting room where Anna read by candlelight.

“Come quickly, we need your help,” she gasped.

Anna snapped her book shut and followed Cate from the room. Cate led her to the foyer where Michael and Damien held a limp Jack.

Anna studied him before flicking her gaze to Cate. "What has happened to him? Do you know?"

"Severe temporalysis," Cate said. "We do not know much more than that."

"Follow me."

Anna led them up the stairs and down a hall, pushing into a bedroom and signaling them to place Jack on the bed. He flopped onto the bed, unmoving.

"He is not from this time," Celine explained as Anna hovered over him. "We must take him back to his original time period as soon as possible."

Anna ignored her for the moment. She tugged open Jack's eyelids, pressed a hand against his chest before she pressed her ear to it. She laid the back of her hand across his cheek.

"We've given him a dragon's blood lozenge," Cate said as she wrung her hands, watching the process.

Anna straightened and faced them. "He is dangerously close to being lost forever. And there is no way he can time travel tonight."

"Is there anything we can do?" Cate asked.

Anna nodded as she pushed past the group. "I can try a remedy. It will not cure him, but it may help stabilize him for travel to his time. We will not know until morning at the earliest."

Cate nodded as Anna reached the door. She twisted before she left the room. "By the way, where is Marcus?"

Cate's face fell and she bit her lower lip hard.

"There was an incident. Marcus stayed behind," Celine answered.

Anna arched an eyebrow at the statement.

"We needed to get Jack here as soon as possible," Michael said. "He told us to come straight here."

Anna's eyes fell onto Cate, who studied the floor as she held back her emotions. "I will prepare the remedy."

"Cate," Damien said as Anna left the room, "maybe you shouldn't be here."

"He's right. We can't afford for Anna to lose focus and you're still visibly upset over Marcus," Celine said.

"She has the right to know," Cate answered.

"No one's disagreeing with that," Michael said, "but maybe now's not the best time."

“Right, maybe once Jack’s stabilized,” Damien said.

“I can’t believe you’re suggesting we keep this from her.”

“To save Jack’s life,” Celine said. “Explaining what happened may be tricky. And we need her.”

Cate sucked in a breath. “All right. I won’t tell her yet. But we need to discuss what we’re going to do about this.”

Anna’s return interrupted further conversation. She bustled across the room, holding a smoking concoction. “Open his mouth,” she instructed.

Cate nodded and pulled down Jack’s lower lip.

“Prop his head up a bit and hold his nose.”

Anna poured a small amount of the green liquid into his mouth. After a gargled cough, it disappeared. She continued to trickle liquid in until the concoction was gone.

“Now we wait,” Anna said.

Cate perched on the edge of the bed, grasping Jack’s hand in hers.

“Do you have more dragon’s blood?” Anna asked.

“I do, yes,” Cate said. She pulled the sachet from her pocket.

“Give him another. We’ll keep a continuous dose for now.”

Cate nodded and slipped another lozenge onto Jack’s tongue. His chest rose and fell steadily, the only sign of life existent.

“And how are you, dear? How is your ankle?” Anna asked, stroking Cate’s hair.

Cate swallowed hard, pushing the idea of confessing everything to the woman from her mind. “Oh, I hadn’t even—”

Anna tugged up the hemline of her skirt. The swelling in Cate’s ankle had spread to her foot. In the chaos of the night, she had failed to notice the steady throbbing and deep ache.

“You’ve overdone it,” Anna said. “You should retire and rest. Get off your feet.”

“I—” Cate began, her voice cutting off as she tried to explain why she should stay with Jack. “I’d like to help you monitor him. I can put my foot up here.”

“You should be in bed, Catherine. You need proper rest. You’ve just recovered from a severe wound. You do not want to risk a relapse.”

Cate searched her mind for a rebuttal.

“Marcus will never forgive me if he returns and finds you ill again.”

Cate offered the woman a forced smile, trying to keep her lower lip from trembling. "You're right."

"I'll walk you down, Cate," Damien said.

Cate rose from the bed. "If anything changes with him—"

"I'll let you know, dear, I promise." Anna pulled Cate into an embrace, kissing her cheek. "Rest well, dear."

Cate nodded as she slipped her hand through the crook in Damien's arm. He led her from the room. "I know you hate to leave him, but it may be for the best. Not just with your ankle, but with the whole situation."

"I feel terrible not telling her."

"I know, but things will look different in the morning. Celine, Michael, and I will talk and see what we can come up with."

"What can you come up with?" Cate asked, emotion lacing her voice. "That place is a fortress. We couldn't get Jack out."

"Jack's illness put a damper on that," Damien said. "We'll figure something out."

They arrived at Cate's suite and said their good nights. Damien reiterated his promise to find a way. Cate nodded, though her mind questioned the oath.

She slogged into her suite, crossing the room and entering the bedroom. She sniffled and focused on the music box. Behind it, the purple rose stuck from inside the vase. Tears clouded her vision as she spotted it.

After crossing the room, she perched on the edge of her bed and wound the music box, holding it close to her chest. Her fingers caressed the purple bloom as she sniffled again.

"Your Grace?" Andrea's voice squeaked.

Cate wiped away her tears. "Oh, Andrea. I didn't hear you come in."

Andrea offered her a consoling glance. "Is everything all right?"

Cate nodded, squeezing her lips together as she fought back another wave of tears.

"Oh, poor dear," Andrea said, hurrying to her and stroking her hair. "What is it?"

Cate shook her head and wiped away the tears again. "I'm just tired."

Andrea smiled down at her. "Well, let's get you changed and into bed to rest."

Cate squeezed her hand and nodded. They set about the nightly tasks with Andrea tucking Cate into bed before she left. Cate wound the music box again and set it on her night table. It tinkled away as she stared out at the moonlit sky.

Cate pressed her hand to her chest. The second heartbeat thudded next to her own. She squeezed her eyes closed, focusing on that heartbeat's rhythm. It lulled her to sleep despite her anguished thoughts.

CHAPTER 32

Cate shot up with a gasp. With labored breathing, she attempted to determine what had awoken her.

Another stabbing pain shot through her chest. She clutched at her nightgown as she hunched over. As she gulped in breaths, she realized what had startled her.

The second heartbeat, steady and strong when she had fallen asleep, now thudded rapidly, sometimes skipping beats.

Cate squeezed her eyes shut as pain shot through her again. Tears spilled onto her cheeks as the sharp pain stabbed at her.

She threw back the covers and swung her legs over the side of the bed. Her bare feet touched the cold floor. She padded across the room, tugging her nightgown over her head. She pulled on a dress and fastened it to the best of her ability, then slipped into her shoes and pulled a full-length, hooded cape around her.

Cate raced from the room and hurried through the halls. Pain shot through her chest again and she clutched at it as she descended the spiral staircase. She flung the front door open and fled into the warm summer night.

The gravel crunched under her feet as she sprinted to the stables. After slipping inside, she climbed to the rooms housed above, pounding at one of the doors.

A wide-eyed stable boy inched his door open. His aghast expression worsened as he spotted Cate. “Duchess Northcott?”

“Ready the horses. I need a carriage immediately.”

His head bobbed up and down in a panicked nod as he retreated into his room. He emerged moments later, still tugging on his jacket.

Cate followed him downstairs. “What can I do to help?”

“Oh, Your Grace, please—“

“This is an emergency. Time is of the essence. Now, what can I do to help?”

With the man’s instructions, they readied the two fastest horses and a small carriage. Cate climbed aboard as the man inquired about their destination.

“Eldinbury Castle,” Cate told him.

The man’s brow furrowed but he climbed to his perch. The carriage lurched as the horses tugged them forward.

Cate stared out at the moon as they trundled down from the mountain. She pressed her hand to her chest. The other heartbeat still thudded hard against her ribs. “I’m coming, Marcus,” she whispered.

Cate tapped her foot against the floor as the carriage crawled along. She willed it to move faster, particularly when the second heartbeat slowed as if weakened. She wondered as they rolled along if she should have woken the others. Though she couldn’t have endured a “wait until morning” lecture. They could not wait. Something was wrong. She could feel it. She could sense it. And she had to do something about it.

The castle lights appeared across the field. Cate knocked against the window and the carriage slowed to a stop. She flung the door open and leapt from the carriage.

“Your Grace?” the coachman said as he scrambled from his perch.

“We can’t approach the castle too closely. This is far enough. Wait here.”

“But Your Grace—“

“I’ll be fine. If I do not return by daybreak, go back to Rosenberg and fetch the Carlyles. Otherwise, wait for me here.”

The man nodded, looking unconvinced as Cate trudged across the field. She hid under the leaves of a large oak tree, lifting her eyes to view the castle looming over her. Few people moved around it at this time of night. Most of the windows were dark, though a few still glowed.

As she pondered how she’d gain entrance, a small door near the corner opened and two men popped out, strolling around the corner. Cate raced for the door as it swung closed. She slipped inside, finding herself in a back servants' hallway.

Cate glanced up and down its length, finding it empty. She pressed against the wall, creeping down the hall. Her fingers scraped across the rough stone as she searched for a way down. A fortress castle like this one had to be designed with a dungeon. She only needed to find it.

An opening in the wall led to a stone stairway, spiraling downward. Light glowed at the bottom. Cate hesitated for a moment at the top, debating on whether or not to try it or continue on. Voices down the hall forced her decision. Two figures rounded the corner behind her. She hurried down the circular stairway to escape being spotted.

The stairway spilled into a hall leading to a large kitchen, cold and quiet at this time of night. Cate shook her head and retreated up the stone steps, hoping the individuals in the hall above her were gone.

Instead, voices echoed down the circular stairway. The two people who had turned into her hallway were descending the stairs and about to run into her. She spun and fled down the steps again and sprinted the length of the hall to the kitchen. She skidded to a halt, spinning in search of a hiding place.

As the voices floated down the hall toward her, she squeezed under the large prep table in the center of the room. She pulled her cloak tight around her, sucking in a deep breath that she held as two sets of legs appeared at the entrance.

They spoke in German, a language Cate did not understand. She pressed her lips together as they conversed about something she could not understand. The men approached the table, one on one side, one on the other. Cate shrank as far under as she could.

The sound of someone biting into an apple reached her. The conversation continued between bites of the apple. Loud laughter followed one statement before the men retreated, returning down the hallway from which they'd come.

Cate blew out the breath she'd been holding. She waited several more minutes before she crawled from under the table and rose to stand. She strained her ears for sounds of the men but heard none.

Cate inched down the hall and climbed up the stairs again. At the top, she glanced up and down the hall, finding no one.

She chose to return in the direction she'd come, bypassing the door and peeking around the corner. Another empty hallway. She slid around the corner and slinked down the hall.

Halfway down, she found another passage leading down. Dim light flickered at the bottom of the stairs.

With a deep inhale, Cate descended the stairs. She spilled into a small square room with an opening across from her. A man dozed in a corner next to it on the stone floor. Cate swallowed hard as she tiptoed past him and into the dark chamber beyond.

Iron barred cells made up both sides of the large room.

"Marcus?" Cate hissed. She hurried down the center path, glancing into each cell on either side. All empty.

Her heart sank as she reached the end. A dark opening in the middle led to another room. Cate crept into the darkened room. She paused as her eyes adjusted to the room, lit only by the moonlight shining through the small, barred windows near the ceiling.

Cate scanned the room. Across from her, she found a single iron door with a peek door near the top. She lifted her dress and cape and sprinted across the room. Her fingers closed around the metal pull and she swung the small door open on creaky hinges.

"Marcus," she whispered.

A figure rose from a stone bench, limned in the moonlight shining through the small window. "Catherine?"

He raced to the door, grasping the bars lining the peek hole with both hands. "Catherine, what are you doing here?"

"I couldn't leave you," Cate said. "I'm here to rescue you."

"This is far too dangerous. You must leave."

"What? No! I'm not leaving without you."

"Catherine—"

"No!" Cate insisted. She pressed a hand to her heart. "I could feel what they did to you. You can't stay here."

He sighed as he reached for her hand and squeezed it. "I'm sorry you experienced that. But, Catherine, this is impossible."

"Can't you use your magic unlock trick?"

"No," he answered. "This cell is a Wizard Holder. Locked with an enchantment. You would need the key."

Cate squeezed his hand and nodded. "I'll find it."

She tugged her hand away, but he kept a firm hold on it. "It is too risky."

"I saw keys when I entered. I'll try those."

She yanked her hand free, spun on her heel and sprinted back to the entrance where the man slept before Marcus could protest. Holding her breath, she stepped toward his sleeping form. Her fingers closed around the thick iron keyring. The keys jangled as she lifted them from the hook. She winced, glancing down at the man. He snorted in his sleep, his head rolling back and forth on the stone wall behind him.

Cate froze until he settled back into sleep, rhythmic breathing with light snoring indicating his status. She eased the keys from the wall hook and crept into the cell room, darting across and returning to Marcus's cell.

"Any of these?" she said, waving them.

Marcus scanned them. "No. The key is unique. Gold."

Her shoulders slumped. "Where would it be?"

"Catherine, you cannot traipse around searching for it. You must go."

Cate's brow furrowed and she scratched at her forehead as she tried to think through her problem.

"If Gianna finds you—"

Realization dawned and Cate pointed at Marcus. "That's it. Gianna. She has the key. She had it earlier. I'll find her and get it."

"Catherine, no!"

"I am not leaving here without you," Cate insisted. She dropped the other keys on the floor and hurried from the room, sneaking past the sleeping guard again and hurrying up the stairs. Her mind spun as she considered searching the rooms for Gianna. At this time of night, she was likely asleep. At least, Cate hoped she was.

She hurried through the empty, darkened halls, finding a back stair leading to the second floor. She wound around the halls, wondering which doors to try. One hallway contained sconces, still lit. Cate paused and wandered down that hall. It must be lived-in.

But which door was Gianna's? Or did this hall belong to Lord Mountbatten? A large set of double doors stood at the end of the wide hallway. Cate approached them, her fingers lingering on the wood. She pressed her ear to the door. No sounds came from within.

She leaned away, second-guessing trying the door. As she turned to leave, she caught a whiff of perfume. She flicked her gaze back to the door.

Gianna's perfume. Gianna's room.

Cate eased the door open and slipped into the room, covering her head with her hood. She scanned the space as she entered, finding a simply furnished sitting room. A doorway stood open across the space. Moonlight shone on a bed. A figure lay under the covers.

Cate tiptoed across the stone floor and hovered over the bed. Gianna's blonde hair sprawled on the pillow behind her. A gold chain lay around her neck. From it, a thick gold key rested on her chest.

Cate swallowed hard, biting her lower lip. She reached for her, her hand trembling. She wiggled her fingers, trying to steady it.

With a quiet exhale, she tried again. Her fingers caressed the cold metal. She gently grasped it, tugging it upward. She lifted the gold key higher, her breath catching in her throat as she considered how to ease it away from Gianna's neck. As the weight lifted from the woman's chest, Gianna's hand shot out, grasping Cate's wrist. The blonde's eyes snapped open and she stared up at a stunned Cate.

Her lips curled into a twisted smile. "Hello, little mouse."

CHAPTER 33

Cate tugged on the key again, but Gianna's grip was unyielding. She opened her fingers, dropped the key, and yanked against her iron grip again.

"Oh, I think not," Gianna said through gritted teeth.

She rose to sit as Cate struggled against her. "You can have a cell next to your dear husband."

Gianna stood and Cate finally wrestled free of her grip. She stumbled back several steps.

"What luck," Gianna said with a chortle as she stared at her. "We can torture you to force Marcus to do what we want." She sucked in a deep breath, a smile crossing her lips. "Oh, this will work so much better than torturing him directly. He'd break eventually, but this will be much faster. He's got quite a will, that one."

Cate scanned the room for something to help her. Gianna stalked toward her. Cate stumbled back. Her legs wobbled and her throat went dry.

"You can't escape, little mouse. And you're going to help us achieve so many things." Her lips curled again into a wicked grin. "And then I'm going to have the pleasure of finally killing you."

Cate swallowed hard as Gianna sauntered toward her. She continued backing away until her back hit a cold, stone wall.

"Nowhere to run, Cate," Gianna gloated. "First Jack, then Marcus, and now you. You've fallen like a house of cards and soon Dunhaven Castle will be ours."

“I don’t think so,” Cate answered through barred teeth. She swung at Gianna with a right hook.

Gianna threw her left arm up, blocking her punch with her forearm. With a quick twist, she grasped Cate’s wrist and wrenched it to the side at an awkward angle. Cate winced, holding in a groan.

Gianna cocked her head. “You’re going to have to try harder than that.”

Cate bent to the side as Gianna continued to contort her arm. Pain shot up to her shoulder. She tugged on her wrist as she shoved her shoulder into Gianna’s chest. She managed to wriggle free when Gianna stumbled back two steps.

Cate lifted her skirts and raced toward the door. Gianna grabbed her flying cape and yanked her backward. Cate pulled at the tie around her neck, unable to free herself from the garment. She fell backward into her attacker. Gianna wrapped her arm around Cate’s neck and another around her waist.

Cate tugged against the arm choking her. She gave up after a moment, instead, elbowing Gianna in the gut. The blonde blew out a sharp breath, relaxing her grip on Cate, allowing her to escape her grasp and dart away, spinning to face her adversary.

Cate’s chest heaved as she considered her next move. Her eyes focused on the key. The second heartbeat thudded in her chest. She had to retrieve it. She could not fail.

Cate set her jaw, widening her stance and curling her hands into fists. “I want that key.”

“Come and get it,” Gianna taunted.

With a shriek, Cate lunged at her, planting her shoulder against the woman’s ribs and driving her backward toward the wall. The two women collided into a hanging tapestry next to the bed. Dust billowed from the fabric. Gianna grunted as Cate slammed her into the hard wall before cocking her fist.

Cate pulled her arm back and swung forward. This time, she hit her target, striking Gianna on the cheek.

The woman’s head swiveled to the side as Cate landed the blow. Her shock lasted only seconds. She whipped her head back toward Cate, glowering at her. With one quick motion, she flung her arm toward Cate. The back of her hand cracked Cate across the face.

Cate stumbled sideways several steps. Her face stung from the impact. She rubbed at the stinging skin before she leapt at Gianna. Her hands wrapped around the woman's throat and squeezed.

Gianna barred her teeth, tugging at Cate's hands. She cocked her fist and struck Cate in the jaw. Cate yelped as she toppled to the floor, landing hard on her hip and palms.

Gianna snorted a laugh as she straightened. "I told you once before you need to learn how to take a punch, Cate."

Gianna stalked toward her as Cate crawled away on the floor, attempting to escape. Her attacker grabbed her ankle and tugged her backward. Cate's fingernails clawed into the floor, trying to stop her backward motion.

"Give up, little mouse. You've lost."

Cate fought against Gianna's grasp and clambered a foot forward, her fingers reaching in front of her.

"It's actually adorable watching you try to fight, but, honestly, dear, just give in."

Cate stretched forward, straining her muscles to eke out an extra inch. Gianna's foot pressed against Cate's backside, shoving her into the floor. Cate gritted her teeth as she lengthened her muscles to the point of pain, ignoring her aggressor's taunts.

Gianna leaned toward her, her voice a heated whisper. "Give up, Cate. You can commiserate with Marcus in a few short moments."

"I don't think so," Cate growled as her fingers touched cold metal. She closed them around the rim of the bowl. As she rolled onto her back, she swung the chamberpot she'd grasped seconds earlier. It struck Gianna square in the temple. The force drove the woman backward. As she teetered, attempting to regain balance, Cate scrambled to her feet, still holding the chamberpot.

Before Gianna recovered, Cate swung the heavy metal pot again. It banged into Gianna's head with a loud thud. The blow sent her careening toward the far wall. She slammed into a heavy wooden wardrobe, cracking her head on the opposite side. With a cry of pain, her eyes rolled back in her head and she slumped to the floor.

Cate's chest still heaved from the effort. She dropped the chamberpot at her side. It clanged against the stone blocks, rumbling to a stop a foot away from her.

Cate approached Gianna's limp form and pushed the woman onto her back with her foot. The gold key gleamed in the moonlight streaming into the windows. Cate leaned forward and snatched it, breaking the chain around her neck.

She puffed out a long breath as she eyed the heavy key. She closed her fingers around it before she lifted her skirts and hurried from the room. Gianna would not be down for long and she'd alert the entire castle to Cate's presence. She wouldn't have much time before a full-blown manhunt would be taking place.

Cate retraced her steps down to the main level, meeting no resistance. She snuck through the halls again in search of the stone stairway leading down to the dungeon cells. She located it with no trouble and hurried down the stairs, slowing toward the bottom.

The rhythmic sound of breathing met her as she crept down the last few stairs. The guard at the bottom still slept in the corner.

Cate pushed her shoulders back and sucked in a breath through her nose. She bit her lower lip as she inched across the room. The man snorted and wiped at his face as she hit the middle of the room.

She held her breath, freezing where she was and squeezing her eyes closed. She opened them a slit and flicked her gaze to the sleeping form. His head lolled to the opposite side and he sniffed, his chest rising high before he exhaled.

With her fingers spread and her arms stretched to each side, she waited another moment for him to settle back into sleep. After another moment, no rhythmic breathing filled the chamber. Instead, the guard gulped in a deep breath and squirmed.

Cate winced, wondering if she should make a run for Marcus's cell or retreat. Seconds later, the decision was made for her. The man fidgeted more, raising his arms overhead in a stretch.

Cate fled for the steps behind her, hurrying up several of them and out of sight. She pressed against the wall, hoping to remain unseen. The man's shadow spread across the floor as he rose from his seated position.

The shadow contorted, the arms flailing out in a large stretch. A loud yawn reverberated within the chamber, echoing up the stairs. Feet shuffled across the rough, gray stones making up the floor. After another few yawns and groans, the man's shadow disappeared.

Cate ducked to stare through the opening, catching the guard disappearing into the cell room. She slinked down the stairs and into the guard's chamber, pressing herself against the wall as she inched across the room.

A glance inside the moonlit room of cells showed the man meandering toward the back room and Marcus's cell. Cate darted through the doorway and scampered into a dark cell. The cell door issued a high-pitched squeal as she tugged it open. She winced, easing the door closed and retreating into a darkened corner. She pulled the hood of her cape as far over her head as possible.

A voice floated from the other room, the words indistinguishable at first.

"Been playing with the peek hole, have you?"

The man paused for a response, but Cate could not make it out.

"Doesn't matter. You won't be getting out of here anytime soon."

Cate held her breath, praying the man would retreat. After a few moments, keys jangled and then the man reappeared in the cell chamber. He shambled across the room, swinging the iron keys in his right hand. Whistling echoed throughout the room. He disappeared into the small square chamber outside.

Cate waited a few moments before she slipped from the cell, grimacing again at the creak of the hinges. She scurried across the room and into the back chamber. Her cape's hood fell backward as she raced across the small room.

Her fingers wrapped around the bars in the small window as she skidded to a stop, waving the gold key.

"I got it," she whispered breathlessly.

Marcus appeared at the door. "Quickly, use it."

Cate shoved the key into the lock and tried to turn it. It wiggled but would not turn.

"It's not working," she cried. She jiggled it again before struggling to turn the large key again, moaning as it stuck, unmoving.

"Is there an inscription on the key?" Marcus inquired.

"Ah," Cate stammered as she tugged the key from the lock and pulled it closer to her eyes, "I can't see in this light."

Marcus slid his hand between the bars. "Give it to me."

Cate nodded as she passed the key through to him and waited as he crossed toward the moonlight streaming through the window at the back of the cell. She pressed her hand against her forehead, her chest heaving as she gasped in breaths.

Marcus returned and stuck the key through the small window. "Aperiatur via," he said.

"Oh, that makes sense," Cate said. "Let the way be opened."

"You speak Latin?"

"Of course not," Cate said with a scoff, "but I can understand it."

She slipped the key into the lock and spoke the words. The key twisted and the lock clanked as it released. She tugged on the handle and the door swung open on squeaky hinges.

Marcus hurried out of the cell, pulling Cate into an embrace. She flung her arms around his neck with a sigh of relief.

"Thank you, Catherine," he whispered to her.

She pulled back, still wrapped in his arms. "We need to go quickly. I had a run-in with Gianna when I retrieved the key. I managed to knock her unconscious, but she'll alert everyone soon enough."

His lips curled into a slight smile at her statement.

"I don't think we'll make it past that guard, though."

Marcus tugged her closer to him. "I'd prefer to take a shortcut."

Cate opened her mouth to question his meaning when the world around her began to fade to black.

CHAPTER 34

For the seconds the blackness enveloped her, she wondered if she'd passed out or suffered another temporalysis attack.

A cool breeze caressed her cheek, and the rustling of leaves tickled her ears. Moonlight lit their surroundings, casting shadows across Marcus's chiseled features.

Cate glanced around, a surprised expression on her face. "How?"

"I used a location hop," Marcus explained. "The same thing I used when you suffered your temporalysis attack in Dunhaven."

Cate recalled being in the street one moment and in Marcus's home the next. However, she'd had a vision so she had not experienced the jump from one location to another in seconds.

"That was... odd," she replied, glancing up at him.

He stared down at her, his thumb caressing her cheek. "Catherine—"

A shout interrupted his statement, followed by sharp barks of several dogs.

"We must go," he said.

"I left the carriage on the road there," Cate answered, pointing past the large tree she'd hidden behind earlier.

Marcus followed her finger and nodded as he scooped her up into his arms.

"What are you doing? I can walk!"

"Your ankle is undoubtedly swollen after all your traipsing around the castle," he answered as he sprinted across the field toward the road.

“Besides, it is owed to me.”

“Owed to you?” she asked as they neared the road.

“My ego has been bruised by needing to be rescued. The least you can do is allow me to feel useful.”

The corners of Cate’s lips turned up in amusement. “All right, fair enough. Thank goodness you were here to carry me to the carriage.”

He smirked at her as they arrived at the road. The coachman scrambled to open the door as he set Cate down. She climbed inside and collapsed into the seat, her heart still pounding from the experience. Marcus followed on her heels, taking the seat next to her.

As the carriage lurched forward his hand found hers and squeezed. She smiled at him in the moonlight, returning the gesture. As they trundled away from the castle, she craned her neck to glance back at the imposing form of the fortress castle. It shrank from her view, the lights now blazing from most windows fading away behind them.

With a sigh, she collapsed back into her seat, letting her head rest against the back. Her eyes slid closed as the carriage rumbled along, rocking her to sleep.

* * *

Cate’s eyelids fluttered open. Bright morning sun shone in the blue sky, blinding her. She shielded her eyes against it, picking her head up from where it had fallen on Marcus’s shoulder.

“Sorry,” she breathed as she straightened and stretched.

The carriage slowed to a stop outside of the massive palace. The coachman leapt from his perch and swung the door open.

Marcus climbed from the carriage, offering Cate his hand as she followed him. She stared up at the castle, outlined by the cloudless azure sky. Her mind wondered what had happened inside in the hours she’d been gone. Had Jack improved? Could they finally return home?

The questions filled her mind as Marcus wrapped his hand around hers and led her toward the door. They stepped into the massive entryway.

Damien hurried down the stairs, slowing to a stop as he spotted Cate and Marcus. His jaw dropped open as he gripped the marble banister.

“Cate!” he exclaimed, before he scrambled down the remaining stairs, spilling onto the marble floor below. “You’re here!” His eyes flicked to Marcus. “And you are here, too.”

“Lovely to see you again, Damien,” Marcus said.

His gaze cut back to Cate. “Where have you been? Anna went to check on you earlier and found your bed empty. She checked a few places and couldn’t find you. She woke the entire house and had them searching for you.”

“Oh, sorry,” Cate said, her eyes darting between Damien and Marcus. She tapped her free hand against Marcus’s arm. “I went to get Marcus.”

“Alone?” Damien said, his voice raising an octave. “Cate! Are you serious?”

“I am,” she answered with a wince. “It couldn’t wait.”

He ran his fingers through his brown hair as he blew out a long breath and shook his head.

Michael appeared at the top of the other curving stairway. “Cate!”

“She went to get Marcus,” Damien reported, still sounding astounded.

“Alone?” Michael questioned. “You should have woken us.”

“I didn’t want to regroup and plan. There was no time.”

“There is no reason to continue to rehash this. It is finished. Thanks to Catherine, I am free. And we may now move forward with determining Jack’s status.”

“Right, Jack,” Damien said. “Uh, we should check on him. He was holding his own when we discovered you were missing. Celine is with him.”

Damien and Michael mounted the stairs. Cate followed until Marcus tugged her back. “We will be along in a moment,” he said to the other two.

“What?” Cate questioned as the others disappeared down the second-floor hall.

“You should not have come alone, Catherine. You do realize that.”

“What happened to the whole ‘no reason to rehash this’ sentiment?”

“There is not. Outside of the need to reiterate that you should not take such chances with your life. And the need to admonish the stablehand who assisted you in doing so.”

“Unnecessary,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

“I shall decide what is necessary.”

Cate wagged her finger at him. "Marcus, do not berate that poor man for doing what I demanded he do."

"You would do well to listen to your wife," Anna said as she descended the stairs.

They turned their attention to her as she approached them. She cradled his face in her hands. "Welcome home, Marcus."

"Thank you, Mother. Though all this fuss is unnecessary."

"Do not tell your mother what is necessary and what is not. I am not blind nor stupid. The incident so casually mentioned last night was far more troublesome than anyone was willing to admit. And I am pleased to have you back."

She turned to Cate and pulled her into an embrace. "And thank you, dear, for doing whatever you needed to do to return him."

Cate returned the gesture, whispering a "you're welcome" into the woman's ear.

"How is the man you are tending?" Marcus inquired as they pulled away from each other.

"Improved," Anna answered. Cate's heart leapt at the statement.

"We must return him to his own time as quickly as possible."

Anna nodded at the statement. "He is not quite ready for that yet, but I expect he will be soon. I shall see to him now."

"Good."

The sound of hoofbeats and a carriage sounded outside the door as Anna ascended the stairs. Cate's brow furrowed as worry consumed her. Had Gianna and Lord Mountbatten tracked them here? Were they coming for a showdown?

The door popped open and a man strode inside. Cate's knees wobbled and her jaw dropped open as she recognized Marcus Northcott. She glanced at the Marcus standing next to her in shock.

The other man approached, clasping his hands behind his back as he stopped.

The first Marcus smiled down at her. "Catherine, meet my 1810 counterpart."

"Hello, Catherine."

Cate's gaze flicked between the two identical men. "This is weird."

"You should go and check on Jack," Marcus said before turning to his newly arrived twin. "Come along, Marcus, we have much to discuss."

Cate stared after them as the two men disappeared into the nearby sitting room, her jaw still gaping open and her eyebrow arched. She stood in shock for a full minute after the doors closed behind them before she stumbled to the stairs and climbed up. She navigated to the room they'd placed Jack in hours ago and pushed open the door, peeking in.

Anna administered some form of medicine as she had earlier. Cate joined her on the opposite side of the bed. Jack's color had improved, no longer a shade of whitish-gray, he now appeared more like himself. She wrapped her fingers around his cold hand and squeezed in a silent display of solidarity.

"You said he's improved?" Cate questioned.

"Yes," Anna answered as she poured the last bits of the thick amber viscous liquid into Jack's mouth, "I think this last bit of serum should ready him to travel to his time."

Cate breathed out a sigh of relief as she nodded. "Good."

"He's been through quite an ordeal," Anna said, flicking her gaze to Cate. She dabbed at any serum clinging to Jack's still pale lips.

"Yes," Cate said. "Not just the temporalysis."

"Those people are terrible," Anna said, returning her eyes to her work.

Cate focused on Jack's face, his eyes still closed. A bruise on his cheek betrayed a small part of what he'd endured at their hands.

"I know," she murmured.

Anna's fingers wrapped around Cate's hand, pulling it away from Jack's. Cate glanced over at the woman.

"Thank you for going back for Marcus."

Cate forced a smile onto her lips, guilt washing over her for lying to the woman. "Of course. I wouldn't have left him there. I didn't want to leave him the first time."

"I know you didn't." Anna lowered her eyes for a moment before she flicked them to the door. "Some others do not care about him the way you do."

Cate began to shake her head. "That's not—"

"It is," Anna said, her eyes cutting back to Cate's. "Marcus is correct about you, Catherine. You are too kind. A quality we both find charming."

Cate lowered her eyes as color rushed into her cheeks. She wasn't certain how much longer she could keep the charade going. In particular, she worried her concern for Jack may cause an issue with Anna.

Thankfully, the doors opened, and Damien stuck his head inside. "How's he doing?"

Anna dropped Cate's hand, grabbing the bowl she'd set on the nightstand earlier. "Better. If the latest dose works as I expect, he should be ready to return to his time period within a few hours."

"Oh, good," Damien said, slipping into the room and approaching the bed.

"I warn you, he will not be cured of the temporalysis. Only stabilized enough to make a time travel trip."

Cate licked her lips as she pondered a response. Damien beat her to it. "We understand. We have a doctor ready to treat the temporalysis in his time period. We're hopeful the treatment will work."

"Thank you," Cate added, "for stabilizing him."

Anna offered them each a curt smile before excusing herself from the room, stating that she would check back in an hour.

The door clicked closed behind her and Cate sank onto the edge of the bed, taking Jack's hand in hers again.

"He's going to be okay, Cate," Damien assured her. "Millie thinks she's got something workable to tackle the temporalysis."

She stared at Jack, her head bobbing up and down at his statement. "I can't believe everything that's happened."

A hand fell on her shoulder and squeezed. "I know. But he's going to be okay. Millie's a fantastic doctor for all things supernatural. Trust me."

Cate patted his hand and flicked her gaze to him. She offered a weak smile before her eyes fell to Jack again. "Even outside of that. The time-hopping and The Agency. How cruel they are. How vicious and driven."

"They are not nice people. But things are looking up. We've got Jack back. Anna nearly has him ready to go home. This'll all be over soon."

Cate sucked in a deep breath as she considered his statement. She twisted her neck to glance at him again. "Also, there are two Marcuses downstairs." Her eyes searched his face for a glimmer of the shock still resonating through her.

Damien rubbed the back of his neck as he nodded. "Oh, right, yeah. His 1810 version is here. The one you've been traveling with is the one from our time."

Cate blinked at him as his lack of surprise registered with her. "Your lives are beyond interesting. Meeting a second Marcus was just bizarre."

Damien wiggled his eyebrows at her and grinned. "Tell me about it. It's even weirder when one of them hates you and one of them is supposed to be helping you."

Cate's forehead crinkled as she processed the statement. The confusion surrounding the supernatural world showed no signs of resolving itself anytime soon.

The doors burst open and Marcus strode in, interrupting any further musings on Cate's part. For a split second, she wondered which version of him stood in front of her.

"Has Mother administered another round of the serum?"

"Yes," Cate said, returning her attention to Jack. "She said he may be ready in a few hours."

"Excellent," he said. He lifted one of Jack's eyelids and studied his eye. "We should leave as soon as possible." He spun to face Damien. "Is the good doctor prepared to treat our patient?"

"Yeah, Millie's all ready. She should arrive right around when we do. She thinks the serum she fabricated will work."

"Then we should prepare to leave."

A new voice entered the conversation. "Surely Catherine does not need to undergo such a trip," Anna said.

Marcus clasped his hands behind his back, offering his mother a curt smile. "I would prefer to keep Catherine close after the incident last evening with The Agency."

"She will be safe at Rosenberg. After all she's been through, she needs rest, Marcus."

"Mother—" he began when Anna interrupted him.

"Marcus!" she said, her eyes widening. He squeezed his lips into a thin line, a sigh emerging from him.

Cate's eyes shot back and forth as the two argued. She rounded the bed and sidled next to Marcus, slipping her hand around his arm.

"Thank you for your concern, though I prefer to stay with Marcus." She arched an eyebrow before adding. "You never know when he may need me again."

Marcus's eyes slid sideways to gaze at her and he gave his head a slight shake. "I suppose I will never live that down, will I, dear?"

An amused grin crossed Cate's features and she shrugged. Anna smiled at the two of them and squeezed Cate's arm. "As long as it is what you prefer, dear.”

“With that settled, when will Mr. Reid be ready to travel?”

Anna pushed past him toward the bed. “That is what I’m here to assess.” She leaned over Jack, pulling back his eyelids and laying her palm against his forehead and cheeks. She pressed an ear against his chest.

Marcus raised his eyebrows at her as she straightened.

Anna pursed her lips. “He is responding more slowly than I hoped.”

“Can he travel?”

Anna shrugged. “Possibly in several hours.”

“Can it be expedited?”

“No, Marcus, it cannot be,” Anna said, annoyance creeping into her voice. “Patience has never been your virtue, has it?”

“Returning him to his time is of the utmost importance.”

“And you shall. When he is stable enough to return.”

Cate watched the exchange between the two again before she interjected a question. “What is the consequence of returning too early with him?”

“He would not survive the trip,” Anna replied. “Time travel, while seemingly innocuous, can take an incredible toll. Temporalysis is merely one of those. Many go unnoticed, however, they exist nonetheless.”

“I understand the risks of time travel fully, Mother. Yet the importance of returning him to a time where he can be more aggressively treated—”

“It could kill him,” Anna retorted, interrupting his statement. “Aggressive treatment is useless if the man is dead.”

“And the risk will be lower in a few hours?” Cate inquired.

“Yes, it should be,” Anna assured her.

“Then we wait,” Cate said.

Marcus pressed his lips together with another slight shake of his head.

Anna patted his chest. “You are outnumbered, Marcus. Resign yourself.” She turned to Cate. “And you should get some rest. If you plan to follow Marcus to another time, you will need all your energy.”

Anna strode from the room, the situation resolved to her liking.

Damien headed for the door, too. “I’ll tell Michael and Celine we’ll be ready to leave in a few hours.”

Marcus stared down at Cate as silence fell over the room. He raised his eyebrows at her.

“What?” she questioned.

“I cannot believe you sided with my mother against me.”

Cate shrugged, puckering her lips. "She seems like a very knowledgeable woman. And her advice seemed prudent."

"Well, perhaps you should follow her prudent advice to rest."

"Perhaps I should. I do feel tired. The adrenaline is wearing off."

Marcus's eyes strayed down to her feet. "How is your ankle?"

"Strong enough to allow me to walk to my room, thank you."

"Are you certain? I'm sure Mother would scold me if I allowed you to gallivant through the halls on your injured ankle."

"Maybe we should keep it between us."

He motioned to the door. "Or perhaps I should call her and inquire after her knowledgeable opinion."

Cate shook her head but grinned in spite of herself. "You just want to win an argument against me by siding with your mother."

"It feels appropriate. Perhaps even cathartic."

Cate let her head loll to the side as she gave it another shake. She patted him on the chest. "See you later, Marcus."

He grasped her hand and squeezed. "I hope you get some rest. You deserve it."

He smiled at her as his thumb rubbed the back of her hand. She returned his expression before she slid her hand from his and left the room after one last glance at Jack's sleeping form.

Cate wandered through the halls to her bedroom suite. Her ankle offered a slight protest as she pushed the door shut behind her and leaned against it. Soon the nightmare would be over. Damien seemed certain their resident supernatural doctor would succeed in restoring Jack. He had yet to awaken from his temporalysis-induced coma. Would he ever?

CHAPTER 35

Cate shuffled through the room and collapsed onto the bed. She balled the pillow under her and buried her head in it. Despite her exhaustion, questions plagued her, and she found herself unable to sleep.

She rolled onto her back and stared out the window at the cloudless blue sky. What if Jack didn't respond to the treatment Anna had administered? Would they be stuck here? Could another treatment be attempted?

Questions continued to bombard her as she let her eyes slip down to her slightly swollen ankle. It had improved, however, it remained a painful reminder of only a part of the ordeal they had all endured in 1810.

She flicked her gaze back to the window, catching sight of the music box on the night table. She reached out and caressed the smooth wood. After winding it, she set it back on the table. The tinkling music filled the room. She rolled onto her side and stared at the tiny piano. Behind it, the purple rose glowed in the sunlight streaming through the window.

Cate smiled at the two objects. Perhaps the ordeal here had some positives, she mused as she drifted off to sleep.

* * *

Darkness surrounded her as she opened her eyes. The music box still played its tune, resounding through the darkness. Moonlight cast long shadows across the floor.

Cate pushed herself up to sit and stretched. She had slept longer than she'd expected. She hadn't expected to sleep at all, let alone until after sunset. The music must have soothed her.

She wondered about Jack's status. Would he be ready to travel yet? Could they finally return to their time?

The music continued to play. Cate recalled the number of times she'd used it to relax. An idea flitted across her mind. She had to act on it before they left 1810.

A quiet knock sounded across the room.

"Yes?" Cate called out.

A flickering flame appeared at the door and Andrea poked her head into the sitting room. "I didn't wake you, did I, Your Grace?"

"No, I was awake. Come in," Cate said as she swung her legs over the side of the bed.

"Duke Northcott told me of your daring rescue. How brave you are! You must have been exhausted. How are you feeling?" she asked as she entered the bedroom and began lighting candles.

Cate grabbed the music box from her nightstand and hurried to the desk near the window. "Fine. I managed some sleep."

"Good. Can I bring you anything? Tea, perhaps?"

"No, thank you. Is there any news on Jack?"

"Mr. Reid?" she asked, receiving a nod from Cate as she set the music box on the desk and sank into the chair. "I believe he has improved. The Dowager Duchess seemed pleased with the progress he'd made after the treatment."

Cate pulled a paper from within the center drawer and tore off a small scrap. "Oh, that's good."

"Are you certain there is nothing I can do for you, Your Grace?"

Cate dipped the quill into the ink, pausing before she withdrew it. "Actually, there is something. I must speak with Duke Northcott right away. Will you find him and send him here, please?"

Andrea nodded with a smile. "Of course, Your Grace. Right away. I know just where he is."

"Thank you," Cate said as Andrea hurried from the room. She withdrew the quill and scratched it across the paper she'd torn moments earlier.

Her eyes scanned the message as she blew on it to dry the ink. You've always loved this.

Cate lifted the small keyboard and slipped the note inside. She glanced out the window, catching the reflection of herself. It matched one of the visions she'd had during her illness. She had been confused when she'd seen it. Now she realized exactly what she needed to do.

The doors swung open moments later and she leapt to her feet.

Marcus strode across the room. "You summoned me, dear?"

"Yes," Cate said. "How is Jack?"

"Ready to travel."

"Good. Sorry, I didn't mean to sleep this long."

Marcus waved the apology away. "It allowed us time to give him an additional treatment and further stabilize him."

"So, he should survive the trip then?"

"Easily, yes. Are you ready for it?"

Cate shook her head. Marcus furrowed his brow, cocking his head at her reaction.

"There is something you need to do before we leave this time."

"Oh?" Marcus inquired.

Cate scooped the music box off the desk and stared at it for a moment. She flicked her gaze to Marcus's dark eyes and thrust the music box toward him. "You need to enchant this."

He raised his eyebrows as he stared down at the object. Cate jiggled it at him, encouraging him to take it.

His gaze met hers. "Do you understand now?"

Cate nodded as his earlier statements rang in her mind. "Yes. What I experienced with the music box was my doing. I asked you to enchant it because, without it, I wouldn't have trusted you. And without trusting you, we couldn't save Jack."

He slipped the music box from between her fingers. "I shall do as you ask."

"Thank you," Cate said.

"When I have completed it, I will collect you and we can return to our time."

He stepped toward the door, lingering before he entered the sitting room. He twisted to face her as he tapped the music box's underside with his fingers.

"You never told me the culmination of your temporalysis. What was it?"

Cate licked her lips as she considered the question. She remained uncertain, however, she had a sneaking suspicion of the pinnacle moment when she'd been cured. She opened her mouth to answer when a knock sounded and the door popped open.

"Your Grace?" Andrea called.

"Yes," Cate answered.

The woman entered the room. "Oh, I'm sorry, I wasn't aware you were still occupied. My apologies."

"Marcus was just leaving," Cate said, giving him a nod.

Marcus waved the piano in the air. "I shall return when the task is complete." He strode from the room, pulling the door shut behind him.

Andrea winced. "My apologies, Your Grace. I did not mean to interrupt."

"You didn't. We were finished."

"I understand you will be leaving later."

"Yes," Cate said. "Yes, we are."

Andrea clasped her hands together in front of her, squeezing them until they turned white. "Would you need me to travel with you?"

"Uh," Cate stammered as the realization hit her that Andrea may not have a place to go if she did not follow Cate. "I—"

Andrea waved her hand at Cate. "If you do not, please do not worry. Duke Northcott said he would make arrangements to return me to my time if you did not need me further." She let out a nervous chuckle. "Which I am most grateful for. I cannot imagine trying to find my way in 1810."

"Oh, I understand. And I would be most happy for you to travel with us. I'm certain with Jack's illness, we could use your assistance. Although I must warn you, we are from several decades in the future from when I met you."

Andrea arched an eyebrow, her mouth gaping open.

"If you prefer to return to your own time, I understand. The decision is yours."

"I would be most happy to travel with you, Your Grace. Though I am certain I have much to learn!"

A smile crept across Cate's face and she nodded. "Yes, I'd say you do."

Andrea pulled her lips back in a giddy grin, grasping Cate's hand and squeezing. "I must prepare for the journey! I am thrilled to continue to serve you!"

“I’m glad you’re excited and that you’re coming with us.”

“Is there anything I must prepare for you?”

“No, I think I have everything prepared. I’m just waiting for Duke Northcott to return.”

“Oh, there are some personal effects I would like to retrieve. May I or would you prefer I wait here?”

“No, not at all. Please get them.”

“Thank you, Your Grace. One of them is from my mother and I would be sorry to part with it.” She bobbed her head with another grin before she spun and hurried from the room, leaving Cate alone.

She wandered to the large window and gazed out over the landscape. She would miss the quiet solitude Rosenberg offered. Had it not been for Jack’s trouble, she may have enjoyed her stay.

She stared at the moonlit landscape for a few moments longer before she pulled away from it, wandering across the room and collapsing on the edge of the bed. Her fingers reached out to caress the petals of the purple rose.

Her mind wandered to their upcoming return. Would the doctor she’d yet to meet be able to cure Jack? What would happen if she couldn’t? One soft petal fell to the nightstand. She picked it up, her thumb caressing the petal.

How long did Jack have if he didn’t respond to the treatment? Would he ever awaken from the coma?

The opening of the door across the room interrupted any further questions. Marcus strode into the room, the music box in his hands.

Cate rose to her feet. “Is it done?”

“It is,” he said, sliding it back onto her nightstand. “And it shall be here in your room until you return or until I send it to you.”

Cate stared down at it with a smile, running a finger along the keyboard. Something about that fact comforted her.

“Ready?”

“No,” Cate answered. “I’m waiting for Andrea. She asked about going with us.”

“I left the decision to you when she inquired about it earlier.”

“She told me. I didn’t want to leave her behind. There’s something comforting about her presence.”

“I’m glad you like her,” he said. “And I’m certain she’s thrilled to follow you.”

The door burst open again and Andrea hurried across the room, breathless and clutching a brooch in her hand. “I’m ready.”

“We should proceed, then,” Marcus said. “Come along, Catherine.” He wrapped her hand around his arm and led her away. Andrea followed behind them as they wound through the halls to Jack’s room.

As they entered, they found Celine, Michael, and Damien waiting with a still unconscious Jack. Anna stood near his bed, checking his vital signs again.

“Is he still stable?” Marcus inquired.

“Yes. Improved a bit, actually. He should withstand the trip easily, though the temporalysis is another matter. The case is severe. I do not hold out much hope.”

Cate swallowed hard at the news.

“The doctor we have engaged in his time may have a treatment to reverse it.”

Anna raised her eyebrows. “Please let me know if it works. I would be most interested in this new treatment.”

“Of course, Mother,” Marcus promised. He turned to the others. “Are we ready?”

Nods answered his question. Anna stepped to Cate and wrapped her hands around Cate’s arms. “And I hope I shall see you again soon. Perhaps when Marcus reports on the treatment you could return with him. I shall miss you even though we only spent a small amount of time together.”

She tugged Cate closer into an embrace.

“I shall return her as soon as possible, Mother,” Marcus promised.

Cate pulled back and squeezed Anna’s hands. “I left the music box in my room for my next visit, which I hope is not far off.”

Anna smiled at the statement before returning her gaze to Marcus. She stood on her tiptoes to kiss his cheek. “Take care, dear. And take good care of Catherine.”

“I promise I will.”

After another kiss on the cheek and a final embrace of them both, Anna stepped out of the room. Marcus nodded to Damien and Michael.

“Celine, you will go first. Michael and Damien will follow with Jack. Then Catherine and Miss Evans and I will follow. We shall return in the middle of the night several days from when we departed so we can re-enter Dunhaven Castle without any prying eyes.”

“That makes sense,” Cate said. “We’ll take him to the bedroom near my suite.”

Damien nodded as Celine pulled the bedding back. “Millie should arrive shortly after we do to assess him,” he said.

Damien and Michael lifted Jack from the bed, each of them shouldering his weight. His head sagged to his chest as they settled his weight between them.

Once they had him ready, Marcus began the process of opening the time portal. Andrea grasped Cate’s hand as the wind swirled around the room, blowing the curtains wildly. Cate patted it and tugged her closer.

When the portal opened, Celine disappeared into it. Michael and Damien dragged Jack between them, stepping into the blackness next. Cate glanced at Andrea before she pulled her toward the hole and stepped inside.

CHAPTER 36

They walked for a moment in the blackness before air tickled Cate's cheek. She blinked a few times before she glanced up at the waning crescent moon. Andrea stood at her side. The castle sprawled in front of them.

Cate spotted Celine ahead with Michael and Damien, who lumbered toward the front entrance, carrying Jack between them.

"Is this Dunhaven Castle, Your Grace?" Andrea inquired.

"Yes, it is. And my home." She patted Andrea's hand again. "I hope you'll love it here as much as I do. I have the perfect bedroom in mind for you."

Marcus stepped through the portal. It snapped shut behind him as he straightened his jacket. He smiled at Cate and offered her his arm. They strolled up the hill with Andrea trailing behind them, catching up to the others as they entered the foyer.

The darkened castle interior signaled they would not run into the others as they snaked through the halls.

"I'll show you the bedroom for Jack," Cate said in a low voice. She turned to Andrea and patted her hand. "And then I'll get you settled."

"No rush, Your Grace," the woman assured her.

Cate led the group upstairs, winding through the wide hallways to the one containing her bedroom. She pushed open the door to the room Jack usually occupied when staying at the castle and hurried to the four-poster bed. She pulled back the thick, navy duvet and stepped aside to allow Michael and Damien to ease Jack into the bed.

He sank into the soft cotton sheets and pillows before Cate pulled the covers over him. “Thanks. I’d like to change and then I’ll stay with him.”

Celine dragged a chair across the room toward the bed. “I’ll sit with him until you get back.”

“Millie should be arriving any moment, too,” Damien said. “I’ll change and go downstairs to wait for her.”

“Make certain he has more dragon’s blood until the good doctor can examine him,” Marcus said.

Celine nodded, pulling open the pouch and sliding another lozenge into Jack’s mouth. Cate focused on his features for any sign of a reaction but found none. She sucked in a deep breath, trying not to become too distressed over the lack of reaction to the bitter substance.

Instead, she turned her attention to Andrea. “Come with me. I’ll show you your new room. And I’ll get you some clothes.”

“Thank you, Your Grace,” the woman said as she followed Cate. “And I can stay with Mr. Reid if needed at any time. Just say the word.”

They stepped into the hall and Cate continued toward the double doors marking her suite at the end. “Thank you, that’s very helpful.”

Before she reached them, she stepped to a set of doors on their left and pushed them both open. “I thought this would be appropriate. It’s very near to my room and has enough space to be comfortable.”

Andrea’s eyes widened as she stepped into the royal purple room. She swept her hand over the loveseat positioned in front of the wide fireplace before eyeing the matching chaise in front of the window. Through an open archway, a large bed with a satin duvet sat in the middle of the wall.

“Oh, Your Grace, are you certain? It is too much.”

“It isn’t,” Cate said with a chuckle. “I hope you’ll be comfortable here.”

Andrea spun to face her as she slid her fingers over the thick duvet. Her gaze floated around the room again before she answered with a broad smile. “How could I not be?”

Cate returned her expression as she flicked her gaze back to Cate’s eyes. “Should we get you changed, Your Grace?”

“O-Oh—” Cate stammered, ready to tell the woman it was unnecessary. She quickly changed her mind, realizing Andrea’s work should not be minimized. “Yes. Let’s do that and then I’ll get you some pajamas and clothes for tomorrow.”

Cate led her to her bedroom suite. “Normally, there are two dogs running around in here, but with my absence, Molly, my housekeeper-in-training, or Mrs. Fraser, my housekeeper, must have them. You can meet them both tomorrow along with Mr. Fraser, my groundskeeper. I think you’ll get along well with everyone.”

“I look most forward to meeting them.”

“Oh,” Cate said, wincing a bit, “the relationship between Duke Northcott and I is a bit complicated. We... we’re not actually married. So, please don’t say anything to the others or refer to me as Your Grace.”

Andrea’s brow furrowed and she forced a smile onto her face. “I shall be sure to remain discreet. However, His Grace was very insistent that I use your proper title at all times.”

“Right, I’m sure that has to do with keeping up the appearance of us as a couple.”

Andrea forced another smile. “I will say nothing to your current staff.”

“I’m sorry this is so complicated. But thank you.”

Andrea smiled and nodded at her. Cate pulled her pajamas from a drawer. They chatted about the castle and its other occupants as Cate changed and gathered a selection of nightclothes and clothing for Andrea to use.

“We can order you some clothes tomorrow,” Cate said as she offloaded several items to the blonde. “Whatever you’d like. There’s a wonderful thing called the internet that allows you to buy almost anything you want and have it delivered straight to you!”

“Sounds fascinating, Your Grace. I look forward to learning about it and the fashions of this era. Are they very different from the fifties?”

“Yes, very! I hope you sleep well.”

“Thank you. I’m certain I will. What time shall I report to the servants’ area in the morning?”

Cate glanced at the clock on her night table. “It’s already two. I’d like you to get at least a few hours of sleep. And I would imagine I’ll spend the next few hours sitting with Jack, so there’s no rush.”

“Would seven suffice?”

“Yes, that would be fine, as long as you get enough rest.”

They wandered through the sitting room and Andrea swung the door open to the hall. "We can adjust the hours after things settle with Mr. Reid."

"Sounds great. I hope you sleep well."

Andrea made the short trip down to the hall to her room, disappearing behind the wooden doors. Cate continued past them to Jack's door. She peeked inside, finding Damien with a woman she'd never seen before. She assumed it must be the doctor he'd spoken of earlier.

Cate slipped inside and eased the door shut behind her.

Damien twisted to face her from his position at the end of the bed. "Hey, Cate. Millie made it."

The woman glanced at her over reading glasses, giving her a tight-lipped but warm smile with her bright red lips. She returned her attention to the clipboard in front of her and jotted another note before she stowed the pen under the clip and stepped toward Cate, sliding her glasses onto the top of her head.

She slicked a stray lock of dark brown hair that had escaped her low bun behind her ear before sticking her hand out toward Cate.

"Hi, I'm Dr. Amelia Gresham," she said in an efficient voice. "I don't believe we've met before, but I've heard about you."

Cate grasped the woman's hand. "I hope all good things. I'm Cate Kensie. Thank you for coming, Dr. Gresham."

"No trouble at all. Quite a fascinating case. And please, call me Millie."

Cate nodded at the statement before inquiring about Jack's status. "So, how is he? Do you think you can help him?"

"I believe so, yes. I've had several conversations with Duke Northcott regarding temporalysis and done extensive research. His condition is severe, however, he is quite stable which is a good thing. I can begin treatment immediately. I have already arranged for materials to be delivered within a few hours."

"So, you think he'll recover?"

"I have high hopes," she said with a grin.

Cate sucked in a nervous breath and smiled at her, still unconvinced but hopeful.

Damien squeezed her shoulders. "Millie's the best. If she's hopeful, you should be, too."

"I am. And very thankful for your help."

“I’d like to continue my assessment. You’re welcome to stay if you’d like,” Millie said, drawing the pen from her clipboard again.

“If you don’t mind me looking over your shoulder, I’d like to.”

“Not at all!” Millie tugged a stethoscope from around her neck and shoved the earpieces into her ears. She pressed the diaphragm on Jack’s chest after slipping it under his button-down shirt. With a nod, she let the stethoscope fall against her chest as she stood and jotted down a note.

“Strong heartbeat,” she said. “Excellent.”

She dug into a black doctor’s bag and pulled several instruments from within. Temperature, blood pressure, and pupil reactivity were checked and noted. Millie shined a light into Jack’s mouth before she felt for his pulse.

After tugging the covers back, she felt for a pulse in his feet. After a few more notes, Millie set down the clipboard and pulled off her glasses.

“All right, well, we are in good shape to begin. As soon as the equipment arrives, I will begin to monitor his brain activity along with continuously monitoring his heart rate and blood pressure. And then I will administer the new treatment. We’ll monitor him carefully and make adjustments as we see the results.”

She turned her attention to Cate. “Is there a space where I may set up some lab equipment?”

“Of course. Would you prefer a space upstairs near Jack?”

“That’s entirely up to you. Wherever is convenient.”

“Well, I can set you up in one of our larger bedroom suites. You should have plenty of room for your equipment.”

“That sounds excellent. I’m not certain how much sleep I’ll manage. At least not until the patient has improved. But it would be nice to have a bed for those quick naps.”

Cate admired the woman’s determination. “Let me show you there now.”

“Thank you. I can stow my luggage and then I’ll wait for my equipment downstairs. Damien, would you and Michael help me carry the equipment?”

“Definitely. No problem at all.”

Cate settled Millie into a large suite in the same wing, keeping her close to her patient but providing her space to spread out. She checked her timepiece as Michael, Millie, and Damien departed to await the equipment’s arrival.

At half-past six, Molly and the Frasers should be awake and in the kitchen. She'd swing by and give them the news before collecting Andrea to introduce her to the others. After sitting with Jack until the sun rose over the moors, she descended to the lower level and hurried to the kitchen. Her mind rambled through how she would broach the subject of Jack's return and his condition.

Any practiced conversation would likely never occur the way she imagined it, but ways to say the words continued to ricochet through her mind as she walked. Voices floated down the hall as Cate approached the kitchen.

She glanced inside from the doorway, finding Molly and Mrs. Fraser busy preparing a small breakfast for the three of them. Riley and Bailey milled around, searching the floor under the table for scraps. As Cate appeared in the doorway, the two pups scrambled to her.

"Lady Cate!" Mrs. Fraser greeted her. "You're back!"

Cate smiled and nodded as she crouched to pet the dogs. "Hello, boys. I missed you!" She ruffled their fur as Riley stood on his hind legs, licking her cheek. She stroked the white streak on his head, the image of holding a tiny puppy version of Riley in 1810 flashing in her mind. The oddity of the situation struck her again.

Molly's voice interrupted her ruminating. "Did you find anything?"

Cate's smile grew as she rose to stand, though she also held back tears. She nodded again. "We did." She paused for a moment and swallowed hard. "He's home."

Molly's jaw dropped and Mrs. Fraser collapsed into a chair at the table. "Are you serious?" Molly said, her voice an octave higher with excitement. "Oh my gosh, those friends of yours must be magic!"

A tear rolled onto Cate's cheek, and she laughed at Molly's enthusiasm and the truth in her statement. She flicked it away and gasped out, "Yes, I am. He's home."

"Lady Cate, that's wonderful news!" Molly said.

"Aye, I can't believe it, though I'm so pleased."

Cate licked her lips and sucked in a deep breath. "There is some bad news."

Mrs. Fraser glanced up sharply at her. "Is he hurt? Sick?"

Cate nodded again, wiping at another tear. "He's very sick. But we've brought a doctor well-versed in his condition to help him. She's confident she can help him recover fully.”

“Well, that’s some good news. Where he is? Edinburgh? Glasgow? Inverness?” Mrs. Fraser inquired.

“He’s right here in the castle. The doctor is here. She’s having all her equipment sent here so she can treat him privately right at home.”

“Can we see him?” Molly asked.

“Yes, he’s upstairs in his usual bedroom.”

“We’ll go up as soon as we’ve made breakfast for the group.” Mrs. Fraser turned toward Molly and snapped her towel onto the dark wooden table. “Well, Miss Molly, let’s get to it. Our rescue party is likely hungry!”

“Oh, no, Mrs. Fraser,” Cate said, waving her hand, “I’m going to head into town and give Mr. Reid the news. I’ll bring him to the castle, and I’ll pick up some breakfast pastries at the bakery on my way back.”

“As much as I want to see young Jack, we have a house full of people to feed!” Mrs. Fraser said, climbing to her feet.

“No one expects breakfast with all this going on. And there are several new people in the house—” Cate began when a new voice interrupted her.

“Good morning. I hope you don’t mind that I’ve taken the liberty to find my way to the kitchen.”

Cate spun to find Andrea next to her, her hands clasped behind her back.

Cate squeezed her arm. “Oh, good morning, Andrea. Not at all.” She turned to Molly and Mrs. Fraser. “Molly, Mrs. Fraser, I’d like you to meet Andrea Evans. She was of great assistance to me as we searched for Jack. She’ll be joining the staff here, assisting me.”

“And I can help with some light housekeeping as needed. And, if you’d like, I could put together some oatmeal for everyone while you ladies visit with your friend.”

Mrs. Fraser’s brow knit, an expression Cate recognized as consternation. Molly licked her lips and straightened her shoulders. Cate held back a wince as she worried about the woman feeling displaced by Andrea’s arrival.

Andrea waved a hand in front of her. “I don’t mean to intrude on your kitchen, but under the circumstances, I can handle a bit of breakfast to allow you time to welcome Mr. Reid home.”

“Well—” Mrs. Fraser began.

“Really, no one needs to handle breakfast this morning. Let me bring it back with Jack’s grandfather. That will allow you both to see Jack.”

Andrea returned her hands behind her back and offered a slight smile, her chin lowering.

“Well, Lady Cate, if it’s all the same to you, with Miss Andrea’s help, we could probably whip up a batch of oatmeal and visit young Jack before you’re back with Stan,” Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate glanced between Mrs. Fraser, Molly, and Andrea. “That would be great if you three are fine with that.”

“We certainly are,” Molly said, settling into a more relaxed stance. “That’ll allow you to bring Mr. Reid back as quickly as possible. I’m sure he’d love to see Jack.”

Mrs. Fraser slung the tea towel over her shoulder. “And how many people are we now?”

Cate counted them in her mind before she answered. “Ten with our newest arrivals of Dr. Gresham and Andrea.”

“Did you count Stan?” Mrs. Fraser asked as she dug in the pantry.

“No,” Cate answered. “Eleven with him.”

“Oatmeal for eleven,” Mrs. Fraser announced, carrying a carton of oats and a few other items with her.

“Miss Andrea, I’ll put you in charge of creating a few bowls of toppings. You’ll find everything you need here in the pantry. I assume you are familiar with what to put out?”

“Are raisins, walnuts, brown sugar, and cinnamon appropriate?” Andrea inquired as she ducked into the pantry.

“That’s an excellent start.”

“I’ll put out some fresh fruit,” Molly said as she retrieved a large pot for Mrs. Fraser. “Andrea, you can find bowls in this cupboard and work at the table.”

“Thank you, Molly and Mrs. Fraser,” Andrea said as she carried an armful of items to the kitchen table.

“It seems like you ladies have this well in hand. I’ll head out.”

“Be careful, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser said. “No speeding.”

“I promise,” Cate called over her shoulder as she departed.

Molly’s voice floated down the hall, bringing a smile to Cate’s face. “So, Andrea, where are you from originally?”

Cate climbed the stairs, finding a number of boxes littering the foyer floor. Michael and Damien shuttled the contents of each upstairs. Cate left them to their work, stepping through the front door into the cool, misty morning air. She pulled her cardigan tighter around her as she hurried toward the garage, the gravel crunching under her feet as she went.

Within fifteen minutes, she eased the car to a stop in front of the elder Mr. Reid's cottage on the outskirts of town. Cate flung the car door open and rushed to his front door. She pounded against it.

A moment later, the older man pulled the door open, his eyebrows raising at the sight of her. "Lady Cate. What a lovely surprise. Come in."

Cate shook her head, refusing his invitation. "I came to get you and take you to the castle. We found Jack."

The man's jaw dropped, and his eyes widened. For the first time, Cate witnessed him at a loss for words. He finally managed to say, "You did? Is he..."

His words trailed off, leaving the implication in the air.

"He's sick but alive. We have a doctor treating him. A specialist."

The man hurried across the room as Cate spoke, grabbing a sweater and tugging it on before he pocketed a set of keys from a bowl on the entryway table. "What's he have?"

They hurried the short distance to the car. "Temporalysis. Time travel sickness," Cate explained. "I had it, too, but mine is gone. Jack's is worse. He was unconscious when we found him. Millie believes she can cure him. She's just started to treat him."

Stanley clicked his seatbelt into place and rubbed at his forehead. "I've never heard of such a thing."

"Neither had I until I had it. Thankfully, our friends from across the pond know about it."

Cate gunned the car toward the castle, making the short trip back.

"Has he woken up yet?" Stanley asked as she eased to a stop in front of the castle.

"No, not yet," Cate admitted as she led him through the door and up the main staircase. "Hopefully soon."

CHAPTER 37

Cate led Stanley through the halls to Jack's room. She found a flurry of activity inside as all forms of medical equipment now graced the room. Millie jotted notes on her clipboard and made adjustments to some of the machines.

Mr. Fraser stood behind Mrs. Fraser, who sat in an armchair, clutching one of Jack's hands. Molly perched on the edge of the bed, holding the other. Stanley circled around Cate, heading for the bed.

"Oh, Stan, here, take my seat," Mrs. Fraser offered, jumping from the chair.

"Oh, Jackie," the older man said as he sank into the chair and grasped his hand. "You look like hell."

"His vitals are strong," Millie responded after introducing herself to the newcomer.

"Aye," Mrs. Fraser said, patting Stanley on the shoulder. "And that's a good sign. He comes from strong Scottish stock. He'll pull through."

"There is every reason to be optimistic," Millie answered as she continued her note-taking.

Marcus swept into the room as Millie set the chart near Jack's feet. He strode to the bed and snapped up the clipboard, studying it. "Where are we, doctor?"

"I have just begun treatment. It will take several hours before we can assess any effect."

"And his vitals?"

“Strong.”

“Brain activity?”

“Minimal, but constant and consistent.”

Marcus scanned the paper, flipping through the several sheets before he set the clipboard down. “I shall check back in the coming hours.”

He spun on his heel and crossed the room to Cate. After a quick glance at the others in the room, he said, “I have several things I must attend to. I shall return as soon as possible. If you need me, call.” He pressed a paper into Cate’s hand before stepping around her.

Cate murmured thanks as he strode from the room.

“Wow, he’s intense,” Molly said from behind her.

Cate spun to face her and nodded with a chuckle.

“He’s very authoritative. Is he a doctor, too?”

“No,” Cate answered, “just a very knowledgeable man.”

“Apparently so,” Molly said as she studied the doctor across the room making adjustments to the equipment. “The way he barked orders at the doctor, I thought he was her supervisor.”

Cate offered another giggle. “Nope. He just likes to think he is.”

“But you trust him, right? And her?” Molly wiggled a finger at the brunette across the room.

“Yes,” Cate answered without hesitation. “She’s the best I know to deal with Jack’s illness.”

“She said she had extensive experience with his condition.”

“I can’t imagine many other people do,” Cate said.

“Yes, it sounded very rare. I’d never even heard of it. How did you find her?”

“Damien recommended her as a specialist in these types of rare conditions.”

“Thank goodness for him. Poor Jack. First, he goes missing, and now this. I hope the treatment works soon. I can’t wait to see those blue eyes again and hear one of his bad jokes.”

“Bad puns, you mean?”

Molly offered a quiet giggle and pointed a finger at Cate. “Yep, that’s exactly what I mean.”

They stood for another moment, staring at Jack’s comatose form. “Well,” Molly said after a moment, “I should get back to the kitchen. Poor Andrea has been down there alone for a while.”

“Oh, I can run down and check on her,” Cate offered.

“No, no, nonsense. Sit with Jack for a while. I’m sure you’d like to get off your feet.”

“I’m fine, Molly. How about if I walk down with you?”

“Sounds like a great compromise,” Molly said with a smile.

“Miss Molly!” Mrs. Fraser called to her. “Are you heading back?”

“We’re both heading down,” Molly answered. “You can stay here. I’ve got the cleanup under control.”

“We’ll just stay a bit longer.” Mrs. Fraser wrinkled her nose and discreetly tapped a finger toward Stanley. She mouthed “don’t want to leave him alone.”

Molly offered her a nod and a wink, sporting a thumbs up. She followed Cate into the hall and they strolled toward the main staircase.

“So,” Cate said as they rounded a corner, “what do you think of Andrea?”

“She seems great. A little backward, maybe. Very proper.” Molly giggled. “I hope she doesn’t flee from here thanks to us. Well, me. I can be a little overwhelming, I think. Particularly to a Brit.”

“I’m sure you didn’t frighten her off. She’s got a stomach for more than you realize.”

“Oh?” Molly questioned, her eyebrows raised as they descended the main staircase.

“We had quite an adventure finding Jack and she was a trooper all the way through.”

“You’ll have to tell us the story one day.” Molly patted Cate’s forearm as they hit the foyer floor. “Long, long after we’ve all recovered from this. I’m sure the experience isn’t something you want to relive.”

Cate forced a smile onto her face as they descended to the servants’ area. She swallowed hard, recalling the traumatic events, though there had been positive moments, too. “One day, I’ll tell you all about it. And I hope Andrea wasn’t too much of a surprise. I couldn’t leave her with nowhere to go.”

“Not at all. That’s just like you, Cate. We’ll make her feel really welcome.”

They stepped into the kitchen, finding Andrea sipping tea at the table.

“Sorry for the long wait,” Molly said as she scanned the kitchen.

“Not at all. I helped myself to a cuppa. I hope that’s all right.”

“Perfectly fine,” Molly said. She swiped a hand across the clean counter. “Did you clean the entire kitchen yourself?”

Andrea sipped at her tea before settling the cup into the saucer with a shake of her head. “I didn’t know where the tureen went, so I left it out.” She waved her finger at the object on the counter.

Molly wiggled her eyebrows at the woman, placing a hand on her hip. “Well, I certainly am impressed.”

Andrea offered a demure smile. “Thank you. I’m happy to assist as much as needed while Mr. Reid is ill in any capacity. How trying it must be for all of you.”

“Thanks for your help. We really appreciate it.”

“Andrea,” Cate said as their conversation wound down, “could I steal you away for a moment for another task?”

“Of course, Your—” Andrea cleared her throat as her words cut off and she pursed her lips. “You’re not stealing me at all. Just let me wash my teacup.”

“Oh, I’ll take care of that,” Molly offered, signaling her to hand the cup over.

“Thank you, Molly,” Andrea said.

“Thanks, Molly. I’ll check back in a bit and fill you in on Jack’s condition.”

“Thanks, Lady Cate!” Molly called as they left the room.

Cate led Andrea upstairs and to the library. She found Damien and Michael inside. Damien clacked away on his keyboard, while Michael scrolled through a legal document on his.

“Hey, Cate, how’s Jack?” Damien inquired.

“Millie started his treatment. Now we wait. May I ask a favor of you?”

Damien spun in his chair to face her fully. “Of course. What is it?”

“Could you introduce Andrea to some of our technology and maybe get her started with picking out some clothing?”

“Ahhh, I can definitely show her how to use a laptop. I’ll leave the shopping to Celine. She’s an expert.”

Cate chuckled at the statement. “Okay, thanks. Andrea, I’ll leave you here in very capable hands. Select anything you’d like and we’ll get the purchases squared away later.”

After settling Andrea with Damien, Cate returned to Jack’s room. Satisfied Cate would be staying for a while, the Frasers excused themselves.

Cate settled into a chair across the bed from Stanley.

The monitor in the room beeped in rhythm with Jack's heart rate, providing the only sound for several moments. Finally, Stanley spoke. "Thank you for bringing him home, lassie."

Cate's brow crinkled as she returned her gaze to Jack. "You're welcome. I hope this treatment works soon."

"You risked a lot to bring him back and no matter what happens, I appreciate that."

"Of course. Jack and I are a team. He took great care of me when I started to suffer from temporalysis. The least I could do was search for him when... those people took him."

Cate's lips formed a frown as she balled her hand into a fist.

"He's safe now, lassie. Thanks to you."

Cate bit her lower lip as she continued to stare at Jack. "But the monsters who did this to him are still out there."

"But they may think twice before they bother you again."

"Let's hope," Cate said.

They fell into silence, comforted by the constant beeping of the equipment and the rise and fall of Jack's chest. Millie flitted in and out of the room several times, reading monitors and jotting notes.

Cate stretched her legs before lunch, checking on Andrea and the others before returning to Jack's room. Molly delivered lunch to them and they continued to watch for any sign of improvement.

After setting her lunch tray aside, Cate slipped her hand around Jack's. "Come on, Jack," she whispered. "Time to wake up."

A hand slipped around her shoulder and squeezed. She twisted to find Marcus behind her. He smiled down at her as the door opened and Millie paraded into the room. She swept her reading glasses from the top of her head and slid them onto her nose. She grabbed her clipboard and approached the monitors, reading several displays and jotting things on the chart.

The crease between her eyebrows deepened as she read another screen. Her eyes narrowed at it before she puckered her lips and scribbled onto her paper.

"Well, doctor?" Marcus inquired, his hand never leaving Cate's shoulder.

Millie tore the glasses from their perch on her nose and spun to face them. She closed the arms and clutched them in one hand, the clipboard in the other. She squeezed the glasses as she pulsed them in the air.

“The news is not what I hoped.”

Cate swallowed hard, biting into her lower lip. She reached across the bed to grab Stanley’s hand. He wrapped both hands around hers and squeezed.

“Explain,” Marcus said.

“His brain activity has not increased at the rate I’d hoped.”

“Has it increased at all?” Cate asked.

“Minimally. Not enough to indicate a positive response to the treatment.”

Cate sucked in a deep breath, trying to steady her voice. “So, what does this mean? The treatment isn’t working? He won’t wake up?”

Millie raised her eyebrows. “No, but it means we may need to take another course of action.”

“Could the treatment just need more time to work? It’s only been a few hours,” Stanley said.

Millie shrugged her shoulders and cocked her head. “It could be.”

“But?” Cate prodded.

Before she continued, Millie sucked in a deep breath. “So far, his vitals have not regressed. His heart rate and blood pressure are still strong, for example.”

“That’s good news,” Stanley said.

Millie swung her head to the other side. “However, unless we can reverse the temporalysis, it is only a matter of time until they do.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as she processed the statement. “So, what you’re saying is if this treatment doesn’t begin working soon, he’ll not survive the temporalysis.”

“That is one outcome, yes.”

Stanley cleared his throat, his eyes turning glassy. The chair squeaked as he leaned forward, resting his elbow on the bed. “Are there others?”

“Yes, we have other options,” Millie said. “I would like your feedback on how to proceed as they all carry risks.”

“What are they?” Stanley asked.

“As I just mentioned, we can proceed with the current treatment. We have a certain window to increase his brain activity and begin to reverse the temporalysis. If the treatment doesn't work in that time, we would not be able to cure him.

"The second option would be to try a completely new formulation. Again, if we miss the mark and the treatment does not work..." Millie's voice trailed off. She lifted her shoulders and pulled her lips back in a wince.

"Same outcome as the other," Stanley said, rubbing the scruff on his chin.

"Exactly. And the final option is to keep the same formula but increase its potency. This comes with the same risk of not working, though I believe this is our best chance of success."

"Then we should take that one," Cate said. "Right?"

Millie pursed her lips before she answered. "Well, this comes with a different risk."

"Which is?" Cate asked.

Millie inhaled deeply, licking her lips before she continued. "The increase in potency may cause other issues with his system. In short, it would take a physical toll. One that may leave a lasting effect if it does not kill him."

Cate's eyelashes fluttered as she considered their three options. She shot a glance to Stanley who still rubbed at his chin.

"Since each comes with a significant risk, I do not wish to make the decision for you," Millie added.

"How sure are you the last option will cause an issue?" Stanley inquired.

Millie squeezed her lips into a thin line before answering. "Almost one hundred percent certain. The increase in potency will take a toll. It also has the best chance of curing him, in my opinion, however, in doing so, it may cost him his life, or leave him permanently paralyzed."

Cate gasped, covering her mouth with a shaking hand. The grip on her shoulder tightened before a hand strafed across her back a few times.

Stanley shook his head. A tear spilled onto his cheek, and he flicked it away with a snuffle. "So, you say the best chance is the third option?"

"Yes," Millie answered. "We chose this formulation for a reason. However, to err on the side of caution, I purposely did not make it as potent as possible. We began with a lower dose to test if it could work. I would not recommend continuing. We have seen no improvement which suggests the dosage is too low. And I would be loathed to change the formulation as, after careful research, this formulation optimizes the odds.”

“She is correct. The best option is to increase the dosage and monitor him carefully,” Marcus said.

Cate shot a glance at him before swallowing hard and flicking her gaze to Stanley. His eyes met hers. “What do you think, lassie?”

“I think we have to trust them to give Jack the best shot at recovering.”

“Aye, I believe you’re right.” His eyes rose to Millie’s. “Give him the increased dose.”

Millie gave an exaggerated nod and hurried from the room to prepare the new treatment.

Cate inhaled deeply and blew a long breath through her mouth. “I should tell the others.” She glanced at Stanley again. “I don’t want to leave you alone.”

Stanley wiped at his teary eyes. “Ah, I’m all right, lassie. Go on and tell them. They’ll be wondering.”

“I shall go with you,” Marcus said as she stood.

Cate nodded as she circled around him and hurried to the hall. She avoided eye contact with him as she stepped into the hall, her mind focusing on forcing her feet to move.

“Catherine—“ Marcus began as he followed her.

She continued as though she’d never heard him.

“Catherine,” he repeated, catching her arm.

“I just need to let them know,” she murmured, her voice shaky and her eyes focusing on the burgundy runner in the hall’s center.

“You need to take a moment to collect yourself.”

“I’m fine,” she insisted.

He tipped her chin up with his finger. She raised her eyes to his, her lower lip quivering into a frown as she stared into his dark eyes.

“Millie is an excellent doctor. You are doing her a disservice by doubting her.”

“I don’t doubt her—“ Cate began with a sob.

“Then Jack? Do you doubt his ability to fight through this?”

Cate sniffled. “No. But the odds—“

“Are not that bad,” he said. “The increased dosage will likely work.”

“But will it kill him in the process?”

“I trust the good doctor’s judgment. He may have a difficult reaction, but I believe he can survive it.”

Cate licked her lips as she processed his statement, focusing on a spot on the velvet-trimmed burgundy wallpaper. Her head bobbed in a slow nod after a moment and she sniffled, sucking in a shaky breath. “Okay. Okay.” She smoothed a lock of hair behind her ear. “I’ll trust Millie.”

Marcus pushed the other side of her hair behind her ear. “You should. I detest being wrong, so Jack must survive.”

A slight smile crossed her face and she squeezed his hand. “Thank you. Can you maybe stay in there with Stanley? I don’t want him to be alone.”

“Of course.”

They parted ways with Cate navigating as quickly as possible to the lowest level of the castle. She clung to the words Marcus said to her, repeating them over and over in her mind.

“He’s going to be fine. He’s going to survive,” she mumbled as she hopped down the stairs. Her eyebrows raised at the bottom. “Because Marcus hates being wrong.”

With a shrug and a roll of her eyes, she proceeded down the hall and knocked at the door jamb. Molly and Mrs. Fraser’s eyes snapped to her. Molly’s hand slowed as she rubbed a pot dry. Mrs. Fraser wiped her wet hands on her apron and rounded the counter.

“Lady Cate? Any news?”

Cate nodded. “Jack isn’t responding to the treatment like Dr. Gresham hoped.”

“Oh no,” Molly said, her shoulders slumping. “What does that mean?”

“It means the chance of his recovery is slimmer, but Dr. Gresham believes it still can happen. In order to give him the best chance, we need to change his dosage. It’s riskier, but the other options all mean he’d have less chance to recover.”

Mrs. Fraser slumped into a chair at the table with a sigh. “Oh, young Jack, you poor, poor man. How is Stan taking it?”

“He’s upset. But he’s keeping a stiff upper lip.”

Mrs. Fraser rose from her chair and hurried across the room, grabbing the kettle. “I’ll make him a nice, hot cuppa. That’ll strengthen his fortitude.”

Cate pulled the cookie tin down from a shelf. “I’m sure he’ll appreciate that. And a few shortbreads.”

Mrs. Fraser set the full kettle on the stove. “Got to keep up his strength!”

“Do you mind if we visit with Jack?” Molly asked.

“Please do. I think both he and Mr. Reid will appreciate that.”

Mrs. Fraser shooed them from the kitchen. “Go ahead up, you two. I’ll be right behind with the tea.”

Cate and Molly snaked through the halls to Jack’s room, joining Stanley and Marcus. Mr. and Mrs. Fraser arrived moments later.

Stanley sipped at his tea as Millie hurried into the room. She carried a liquid-filled pouch which she hung from an intravenous pole after removing the other nearly empty bag. She connected it to the IV line in Jack’s arm, adjusting it and the drip.

The serum slowly dripped into the line, slowly making its way into Jack’s system. She sighed as all eyes turned to Jack.

“Now, we wait.”

CHAPTER 38

The clock above the room's fireplace ticked the time away. Cate bit her thumbnail as she paced the floor at the foot of Jack's bed. Mr. and Mrs. Fraser sat in a pair of armchairs next to the bed. Stanley leaned his fists on the mattress, stretching after being in his armchair for hours. Molly perched on the bed next to him, rubbing his arm.

They'd finished dinner and the subsequent cleanup and gathered together to spend time with Jack as the accelerated treatment continued to seep into his system.

The tension grew with each passing moment as they waited to determine if the new treatment would work. As Cate spun to amble back across the room, a loud beeping sounded, followed by a series of high-pitched bleeps mixed with a lower tone. Cate froze, her head swinging toward the monitors. Numbers blinked, and red text blared across the screen.

Cate gasped, her heart skipping a beat. The door across the room flung open and Millie raced inside. She tapped a few buttons, silencing the machines before she snatched the clipboard from the nearby nightstand and flipped through pages as she flicked her gaze up to the monitors.

She jotted several notes before she made more adjustments to the machines. Marcus strode into the room as she stowed the pen in the clipboard. Damien followed behind him.

"Is it bad news?" Molly questioned.

Millie pursed her lips as she spun to face them, studying their faces before she answered. “Not really. We did anticipate that the higher dosage would take a toll on his body.”

“Is the treatment working?” Stanley asked.

“Yes, it appears so. Brain activity is increasing at a pace that I’m happy with.”

Cate bit her lower lip before she asked, “But will he survive the treatment?”

“That remains to be seen. We are beginning to see his brain activity increase, but we are also seeing signs of him beginning to struggle with the treatment.”

Damien tapped his chin with his finger. “Can we reduce the dosage since the higher dosage kicked-started the brain activity to make this easier on him?”

Millie shook her head. “I’m afraid lowering the dosage will result in him being stuck at this level.”

“So, we need to continue with the higher dosage despite the toll it may take,” Cate said with a sigh.

“Unfortunately, yes. If he can survive this treatment, he will recover fully. We’re at a critical stage right now. In the next twelve hours, he will either awaken or he will die.”

Faces fell at that. Cate wrapped her arms around her midriff as she bit into her lower lip again. The next twelve hours would be difficult for them all. Damien slipped his arm around her and she leaned into him.

“It’ll be okay,” he whispered to her.

Mrs. Fraser rose to stand, straightening her sweater. Tears shone in her eyes, but she firmed her jaw as she spoke. “I suppose we’ll all need a strong cuppa so we can keep vigil. He knows we’re here. We need to support him.”

“I’ll help you,” Molly said, unable to keep her tears in check. They flowed freely down her rosy skin.

They disappeared from the room. Cate patted Damien’s hand before she stalked to the chair Mrs. Fraser had occupied moments ago and sank into it. She grasped Jack’s hand and squeezed as she flicked her gaze to the monitors. Jack’s heart beat faster than it should and his blood pressure had risen significantly.

She eyed the liquid in the IV bag which remained half-full. Would Jack's system tolerate the rest of the treatment? Could he get through the second half of the liquid flowing into his veins?

"Doctor, a word," Marcus said, signaling Millie to step out of the room.

Cate's brow furrowed as they stepped into the hall. She rose, laying Jack's hand on the bedding, and crossed to the door.

"Cate," Damien said before she could pull the door open, "if you need anything, just ask. It's going to be a long night and we're all here for you. If you need a break, or someone to talk to, anything, just let us know."

"Thanks, Damien," Cate said. "I think what we all need the most right now is for Jack to wake up."

He pulled his lips into a thin line as he nodded at her. She excused herself, pulling the door open and slipping out. Marcus stood outside, his hands clasped behind his back as Millie hurried down the hallway toward her room.

"What was that about?" Cate asked as she sidled up to him.

"Just a discussion with the good doctor about the current situation."

"What does that mean? Is there something she isn't telling us?"

He twisted to face her. "No, she has been completely candid."

"Then why the secret conversation?"

"It was hardly secret, Catherine."

"Then tell me what you discussed."

"Merely a few strategies and suggestions to maximize his chances for survival."

Cate stared up at him, her brows knitting and her lip bobbing up and down as she attempted to formulate a question.

"I am not hiding anything from you, Catherine. We are merely preparing for the event that Jack may need some assistance in surviving the treatment."

Cate sighed and nodded. "I hate that we need to prepare for that."

Marcus offered her a slight smile. "But it is best that we do even if we do not need it."

"You're right," she said. Silence fell between them for a moment before Marcus squeezed her upper arms.

"Catherine, you must prepare for a difficult twelve hours."

"I know," Cate said, lowering her eyes to stare at a button on his jacket.

“A very difficult twelve hours. He will likely worsen before he improves.”

Cate blew out a long breath as she allowed the statement to sink in, girding herself for what may come before the sun rose. She hoped they could all withstand it. Especially Jack.

* * *

Cate gnawed on her lower lip. Already sore from her constant nervous biting and licking of her lips, she winced as she resumed pacing.

The clock on the mantle chimed the hour. Three in the morning. Three hours from the twelve-hour mark Millie gave them earlier. Jack remained comatose. His heart still beat far faster than it should and his blood pressure had risen again.

So far, though, he held his own. And the treatment had almost finished. Just a few more hours to pull through. No one had left the room except to retrieve another cup of tea.

As the echo of the clock’s chime finally died away, a new noise filled the air. One monitor emitted a horrid warning signal. Loud beeps followed.

Millie leapt to her feet and raced to the monitors.

“What is it?” Stanley asked, snapping his head toward the monitors.

“His heart is beating too fast. And his blood pressure is skyrocketing.”

Molly leapt from her perch on the edge of the bed and hurried back toward Cate. She flung her arms around Cate and pulled her close.

“Could everyone step back, please?” Millie asked as she leaned over Jack to check other vitals.

The Frasers and Stanley scurried backward, joining Cate and Molly. Mrs. Fraser wrapped her arm around Stanley’s shoulders as Mr. Fraser placed a hand on his back. They all stood in silence as the alarms continued to scream.

Marcus, Damien, Celine, and Michael hurried in moments later. Marcus strode toward the bed, seemingly unflustered.

“Doctor?” he prompted her as she fiddled with a syringe before sticking it into the IV tube and depressing the plunger.

“He’s experiencing an extremely difficult time with the treatment. His heart is racing and his blood pressure is rising far too high. I’ve administered medication to try to counteract it.”

The machines continued to belt out their emergency signals. Millie filled another syringe with a shake of her head. “He’s not responding to the medication. I’ll try another round.”

She jabbed the needle into the connection and pushed the plunger. Cate held her breath, waiting for the monitors to stop their cacophony of noise. It did not happen.

“It is not working,” Millie said, breathlessly. “He’s crashing.”

She scurried to drag a crash cart toward the bed, revving up the machine in case it was needed. Jack’s body began to violently shake. His head lifted and slammed back into the pillow multiple times.

“Hold him down, he’s seizing,” Millie shouted over the din. Marcus steadied Jack’s shoulders, pressing them against the bed. His body continued to convulse.

“Oh no,” Molly cried, tears flowing freely as she clung to Cate. Cate wiped a tear from her cheek as she attempted to hold her emotions in check. Her wobbly knees made it difficult to stand.

Across the room, mayhem continued. Damien held Jack’s legs steady as Millie filled another syringe with a new medication, pushing it into Jack’s intravenous line. Within a few moments, Jack’s shuddering ceased, though his heart continued to race.

“The seizure has stopped, but his blood pressure is still far too high,” Millie reported.

The monitors continued to blare until only a single continuous beep emerged from it. Cate stared in horror at the flat line streaming across the screen.

CHAPTER 39

“*H*e’s flatlined,” Millie reported. “Charging.” She fiddled with the crash cart before grabbing the paddles and pressing them against Jack’s skin after tearing open his flannel shirt.

“Clear!” she shouted before she sent the electrical impulse through his body.

The single sound continued and no heartbeat spiked on the screen. Millie shook her head, turning a dial and giving the clear signal again. Jack’s chest leapt in the air as she shocked him a second time.

“Come on, Jackie, fight,” Stanley whispered, his fingers curling into fists as he willed his grandson to live.

No changes occurred despite the attempt. Millie swiped at a bead of sweat forming on her brow and tried a third time. Cate swallowed hard as she felt Molly’s shoulders shake with sobs when the monitors continued to indicate no heartbeat.

The doctor set the paddles to the side. Cate’s stomach dropped as she assumed the worst. The doctor had given up. Jack would not survive.

Millie shoved the crash cart aside and lunged toward the nightstand. She snatched a fat syringe from the wooden top and removed the tip protector. She pressed the plunger until liquid shot from the top of the thick needle.

Wrapping her fingers around the broad syringe in a fist-like hold, she aimed it at Jack’s chest. She lifted her arm, then swung it down, plunging the needle into his chest and depressing the plunger.

Within a moment, a rhythmic beeping filled the room. Regular spikes appeared on the screen again.

Millie breathed a sigh of relief as she wiped away another bead of sweat. "His heart rate is slowing and his blood pressure is lowering." She sucked in a deep breath and blew it out. "He will survive."

"Excellent work, doctor," Marcus said as exclamations of relief resounded in the room.

"Now we only need him to wake up," Mrs. Fraser said.

"I anticipate that will not be for several hours at least," Millie said. "Not only is his body recovering from the medication, but the latest trauma. I will continue to monitor him closely, but I believe we may be past the worst of it."

"Will he definitely wake up?" Molly asked.

"I cannot say with one hundred percent certainty, but his brain activity is promising."

"At least he'll live," Stanley said as he wandered back to his chair and collapsed into it. "And as long as he's alive, there's hope."

The group gathered around Jack's bed again, Molly still clung to Cate as she sniffled. No one left the room for the next several hours. Jack's monitors continued a steady rhythm until the sun crested the moors. Its red glow bathed the room in a bright orange light.

Cate's swollen and sore eyes threatened to close as she perched on the edge of the bed, clasping Jack's hand in hers. Molly retreated to the window seat, staring out over the morning landscape as she wrung her hands. Mrs. Fraser sat near Stanley, her hand squeezing his shoulder.

As the birds began to chirp outside the window, the pace of the beeps marking Jack's heartbeat quickened. Cate's stomach dropped and she stiffened, afraid he'd suffer another episode of his heart stopping or another seizure.

Millie hurried from across the room to check his monitors.

"What is it?" Cate inquired. "Another seizure?"

Millie shook her head and turned to face them. "No. He's waking up."

Cate's heart leapt and she turned her wide eyes toward Jack's face. Molly leapt to her feet, approaching the bed. After several more accelerated beeps, Jack's fingers twitched.

"Jackie," Stanley encouraged, "come on, Jackie. Open your eyes, laddie."

Jack's chest heaved in a few deep breaths before his eyelids fluttered open. He stared at the ceiling for a moment before he lowered his eyes to the group surrounding him. Cate offered him a teary-eyed smile as Stanley patted his hand.

"That a boy, Jackie."

Jack spent another moment silent, his eyes wandering from face to face. He swallowed hard and forced a weak smile on his face. "Am I..." His weak voice barely carried to the others. He cleared his throat and coughed.

"Easy," Millie said. "I know you want to communicate, but make sure you're ready."

He flicked his gaze to the doctor and nodded. "Water," he said in a hoarse voice.

Molly scrambled around the bed and filled a cup of water. Mrs. Fraser lifted it from her hands and carried it to the head of the bed. "I've got experience with this." She pressed the glass to his lips as he struggled to lift his head.

After a quick sip, he let his head collapse back into the pillow and sighed. "Am I at Dunhaven?"

"Aye, you are, laddie," Stanley said. "Lady Cate brought you home."

Jack's eyes cut to Cate and he pulled his lips back in another weak smile. She patted his hand and smiled at him.

"And not a moment too soon!" Millie said. "We haven't met yet, but I'm Dr. Amelia Gresham. Please call me Millie. I've been treating your condition. You've had a tough go of it, but I think you're on the upswing now."

Jack smiled and nodded at her. He glanced around the room again, spotting the familiar faces of Michael, Damien, and Celine across the room. He lifted a shaky hand to wave at them. Cate glanced back, noting Marcus's absence.

Damien waved back. "Good to see you awake, buddy," he called over.

"It's good to be awake," he croaked. "Seems like I have a lot of people to thank for this."

"There's no need to thank anyone," Cate said.

"Still," Jack said as he struggled to sit up, "I'm sure it was no easy feat."

"There's a lot to discuss, but only when you're feeling better," Cate said.

“And that will not be until after you’ve recovered a bit more,” Millie said as she jotted a few notes on his chart. “I’d like to do a full exam to assess your health. But it can wait for a few moments while you bask in the attention from your friends.”

“And bask I shall,” Jack said with a lopsided grin. The dark circles under his eyes betrayed his fatigue from the incident. And his pale skin suggested his recovery would not be immediate.

“Ah, Jackie, it’s good to hear your sense of humor wasn’t damaged in the trauma.”

Everyone chuckled. They chatted for a few moments before Andrea discreetly approached Cate. She whispered in her ear, “Your Grace, His Grace requested a word.”

Cate glanced at her and nodded before addressing everyone else. “Excuse me a moment.”

She stood and followed Andrea to the door, stepping into the hall as she glanced backward at the others. Molly slid into the seat she’d occupied, grasping Jack’s hand with a broad grin on her face as she told him how worried they’d been.

Cate stepped onto the thick runner and faced Marcus, who remained out of sight from the occupants in the room.

“Thank you,” Cate said before he began. “He’s awake. And it may be best he didn’t see you.”

Marcus nodded before he waved a manila envelope in the air. “I am sorry to interrupt your reunion, however, we have another problem.”

Cate raised her eyebrows. “Oh?”

Marcus handed the envelope to her, clasping his hands behind his back as she lifted the flap. She slid the papers out and scanned them, her brows knitting.

“You’ll want to pay particular attention to the marked passage.”

Cate flipped through the papers to a flagged section. She skimmed the text in the highlighted area, swallowing hard and pursing her lips. She flicked her eyes up to his face, her features a mask of confusion and shock.

“But this…” she stammered, glancing at the paper again. “This would mean…”

“You would lose Dunhaven Castle, yes.”

Cate’s features pinched. She glanced at her friends, gathered around Jack’s bed.

“And your friends will, too,” Marcus added. “Gianna will have no mercy when she rips the estate from you.”

“Then, this was all for naught.”

Marcus wiggled his eyebrows at her. “Not necessarily.”

Cate returned her gaze to him, the crease between her brows deepening as she tightened her grip on the papers in her hand.

“The situation is fixable. If you take bold and immediate action.”

Cate’s mind searched for the appropriate action to fix the issue facing her.

Marcus held his hand out toward her. “Trust me.”

Cate stared at the fingers reaching toward her, understanding in an instant his solution. Her stomach flip-flopped and her knees wobbled. Her gaze turned back to the scene in the room.

Molly clutched Jack’s hand, Stanley held his other. Mrs. Fraser listed the foods she’d be providing Jack to ensure his recovery went swimmingly. Mr. Fraser stood in silent support of his wife and friend.

Stanley remarked about his wish to join Jack for the lovely list of food he’d be receiving. Jack asked for shortbreads with every meal. Molly giggled at his terrible joke, though assured him after his brush with death, he could have all the cookies he wanted.

Her heart broke for them if the current paperwork stood. She pressed her lips into a fine line, gripping the papers tightly.

She wouldn’t let this happen. She would fight back. She would save Dunhaven Castle.

Cate flicked her gaze back to Marcus. With a hard swallow, she reached out and slipped her fingers into his hand. He offered her a sideways smirk as she took a step forward. A step toward fixing the problem. And toward an uncertain future.

* * *

THE END

TAKEN FROM DUNHAVEN CASTLE

A CATE KENSIE MYSTERY

CHAPTER 1

Everything was different now.

Cate traced a finger over the black print on the paper as though it would make the words more real. She squeezed her eyes shut, realizing those few sentences had altered her life.

Everything had changed when she read those words. Everything was different now.

Everything.

The moment she'd first seen the document flitted across her mind. The decisions she'd made after had been life-altering.

She blew out a long breath, stuffing the papers into a folder and flicking it closed. She tossed it onto the coffee table in front of her.

What's done is done.

She pursed her lips, studying the cold hearth in front of her as she pulled her legs up and nestled into the supple leather of the library's armchair.

She flicked her gaze to the other empty chair in the room, staring at it for a moment before she let her eyes slide closed.

Jack was alive. But the events they had set in motion when they'd traveled to 1942 couldn't be undone. And those events changed history. And her life.

Cate let her head fall back into the cushion behind her. A cold, wet nose nudged at her limp hand that dangled from the chair's arm.

She twisted her neck and glanced down at Riley. His feather-like tail wagged at her. The corners of her lips tugged upward as she ran her fingers through his black-and-white fur. “Hey, buddy. I’m okay.”

Bailey wandered over as she spoke, staring up at her tentatively.

“I’m okay, guys, really. It’s all going to be okay.” She let the words sink in around her, desperately trying to believe them.

Cate pushed herself up to stand and snatched up the folder. She stalked to the fireplace and grabbed a stick lighter. With a click, a flame flared from the tip. She touched them to the corner of the manila container. Fire burst from it.

She tossed the burning papers into the fireplace. They curled as the edges blackened. With her arms wrapped around her, she sucked in another deep breath. She swallowed hard as she considered what she faced later this afternoon. Her palms turned sweaty, and her pulse sped as she contemplated how the events may play out.

Her phone chimed, interrupting her rambling mind. Cate checked the display, staring at the one-word text message on her lock screen.

Ready?

She rested her chin on the top of the device as thoughts flitted through her mind. Was she ready?

She bit her lower lip and typed a response. Her thumb hovered over the send button. She slid her eyes closed, sucking in a breath before she popped them open and pressed the arrow. The lone word floated up. She stared at the simple, three-letter answer.

Yes.

Was it true? Was she really prepared?

The door to the library swung open, cutting off any further contemplating on her part. Molly hurried inside. She tossed a strawberry blonde lock over her shoulder, offering Cate a broad smile.

“Hey, Lady Cate.”

“Hi,” Cate answered, twisting to eye her. She recognized the pleasant expression on Molly’s features. It hid the trepidation behind her pretty face.

Molly clasped her hands in front of her. “Just checking to see if anything else was needed before Mr. Smythe and Gayle arrive later today.”

Cate sucked in a deep breath and shook her head. “I don’t think so. We should be all set.”

Molly forced another grin as she nodded. “Okay. Are you certain they’re not staying? Mrs. Fraser is asking. She’s surprised they’re not. To be honest, so am I.”

Cate pressed her lips together, trying to offer a reassuring smile, but sure she wasn't pulling it off. "They aren't."

She let out a shaky breath, biting her lower lip to stop it from trembling. She blinked back the tears forming again.

Molly nodded, her grin fading. She studied the area rug, tilting her head as she drummed her fingers on the back of the armchair. "And neither has said anything about why they're coming?"

Cate shook her head in answer, unable to form words. Mr. Smythe had not told her the reason, but she knew it. She was afraid any verbal response may betray her lie.

"Well, I don't know how you feel about it, Lady Cate, but downstairs we are all in a tizzy. Everyone's nervous. I don't know how you're so calm." Molly flicked her gaze outside the window and shivered. "It sounds so ominous. Especially with him requesting us to be present."

"I'm sure it'll all be settled soon," Cate answered.

"Yeah, but how?" Molly fluttered her eyelids. "I'm sorry. It's not my place."

"No, Molly, it's okay. You should never feel like it's not your place. Dunhaven Castle is your home, too."

"I just can't imagine what this is, but I'm nervous."

Cate approached her friend and housekeeper-in-training, pulling her into an embrace. "It'll be okay, Molly. No matter what he says, no matter what comes next. It'll all be okay. We'll always have each other."

Molly squeezed her tightly before she pulled back. Tears shined in her eyes and stained her cheeks. "I'm sorry," she said, her voice breathy as she waved her hands at her face.

Cate rubbed her arms. "It's okay."

"No, no, it's not." Molly heaved a sigh. "It's just...it's been one thing after another. First Jack's disappearance, then his near-death, and now this."

"When it rains, it pours."

"Yeah," Molly said, wiping at her tears. "But it's poured for you, too. We should be supporting you and instead, I'm crying on your shoulder."

"It's okay, Molly," Cate assured her. "We support each other."

Molly licked her lips and nodded, sniffing before blowing out a steadying breath. "Right."

"Speaking of, I hear Jack's been pestering Mr. Fraser about going back to work."

“Oh, yes,” Molly said with a roll of her eyes and a chuckle. “Talking about trimming those hedges out back. He almost died less than two days ago. And he’s ready to trim trees.”

“Sounds like Jack,” Cate said with a laugh.

“We may need to tie him to the bed.”

The two women shared another giggle over the suggestion. “Well,” Molly said after a deep inhale, “I’ll leave you alone. Two hours to go.”

“Two hours,” Cate said. “I think I’ll take the dogs for a walk, and tire them out before the others arrive.”

“Enjoy, Lady Cate.” Molly offered her a final smile before she disappeared from the room.

Cate stared after her, hoping her words were true. “Everything’s going to be okay,” she murmured to herself.

With a glance over her shoulder, she called the dogs with her. They strolled around the property, basking in the warm late-spring air. She eyed the castle on the horizon as she sauntered back from the loch.

Dunhaven Castle. Her home. She had to protect it. She had no choice.

She quickened her step, nervous energy pushing her to hustle up the path. The dogs raced ahead of her, galloping into the kitchen as she pushed the door open.

“Well, hello, boys,” Mrs. Fraser greeted them.

Molly set out a plate of cookies in preparation for the arrival of their guests.

“And hello, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser finished.

“Hello, Mrs. Fraser.”

The woman waved a finger in the air. “We’re almost ready. If I know Mr. Smythe, he will be on time. Not a moment late.”

“We can be sure of that,” Cate said with a nod.

Mrs. Fraser shifted a few teacups around on the tray before she clasped her hands in front of her.

“It’ll all be over soon, Mrs. Fraser.”

“The dreaded visit, you mean?” Jack asked as he and Mr. Fraser pushed into the kitchen.

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod. “And what are you doing out there? Aren’t you supposed to be taking it easy?”

“Dr. Gresham said I should be getting exercise, not laying around.”

“Trimming bushes is a little beyond exercise,” Cate said, wagging a finger at him.

“I trimmed nothing. I merely frowned at them as we strode past,” Jack assured her.

“Good. No trimming bushes until you’re cleared,” Cate warned. “I’m going to head up. They should be here in about ten minutes.”

Cate’s pulse quickened as she said the words.

“Mind if I walk you up, Lady Cate?” Jack asked.

“Not at all. Come on, boys, let’s head up to the library.”

They strode down the long hall, climbing the stairs to the main level as the dogs scampered up the stairs in front of them.

“You’re doing pretty well on these stairs,” Cate noted.

“I’m feeling much better,” Jack answered as they pushed into the hall.

“Good.”

“Cate—“

Cate stopped and shook her head. “Jack, you don’t need to say anything. You don’t need to thank me again.”

“I do. I wouldn’t be here if it wasn’t for you. There’s been so much going on, we’ve barely had the chance to discuss it. I miss my chair in the library.”

Cate smiled at him. “I’ve missed you being there. We’ll have plenty of time to talk after this meeting with Mr. Smythe.”

Jack puckered his lips, flicking his gaze down the hall. “I don’t like this. Something feels wrong.”

“I don’t like it either,” Cate answered, “but I don’t think we have much choice in the matter. Mr. Smythe insisted on the meeting, and he insisted it happen today.”

Jack stuck his hands on his hips. “Too much has taken place since 1942. This just reeks of something blindsiding us.”

“I know.” Cate pressed her lips into a thin line. “We’ll know soon enough, though. Try not to worry about it.”

Jack scoffed and crossed his arms. “Yeah, okay, right.”

“I’m serious. Jack, you nearly didn’t survive. Your heart stopped. I don’t want anything else to happen to you. You’ve got to take it easy.”

Jack flicked his gaze to the floor, sliding his eyes closed. He opened them and sucked in a deep breath, centering his focus on her. “I know. Thank heavens the doctor knew what to do.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes, avoiding his stare for a moment before she nodded. "Yeah. Damien said she was the best."

"The best supernatural doctor. Doesn't seem like there would be much competition in that field."

Cate chuckled. "She may have a corner on the market. But her skills were impressive nonetheless."

"Aye, I suppose I do owe her my life."

Cate nodded at the statement as she squeezed his arm. "We all do."

Jack sucked in a sharp breath and stuck his hands on his hips. "Well, I suppose I'll let you go wait on pins and needles in the library."

"I'll call you as soon as they arrive."

"Thanks, Cate. See you soon."

They parted ways, and Cate returned to the library. She chewed her lower lip as she sank into the soft leather of the armchair. Nervous energy stopped her from settling. She studied the bookcases as her leg bobbed up and down.

She rolled her neck around and pulled her legs onto the chair to stop their constant movement. Instead, she drummed her fingers against the arm. Riley approached her again, staring up at her with his almond-shaped eyes.

"I know, Riley. I'm nervous, and you can tell. But it'll all be over soon." She patted his head, and he leapt onto his hind legs, pawing at her.

Cate scooped him up, nestling him in her arms like a baby as she rubbed his chest. He offered a wide yawn. "Looks like you are in desperate need of a nap, buddy. I wish I could nap through what's about to happen."

Riley relaxed in her arms, his eyes closing to slits. The crunch of gravel interrupted any rest on his part.

Cate glanced out the window. A cloud of dust billowed across the garden, indicative of someone driving up the driveway. Her heart thudded in her chest as she set Riley on the rug near the fireplace and strode from the room.

The squeal of a car's brakes pierced the air as Cate reached the front doors. She flung them open to find Mr. Smythe's sleek black rental rolling to a stop.

Cate forced a smile on her face as the passenger door popped open and Gayle emerged. "Hi, Gayle."

"Hello," Gayle said, her forehead crinkling as she tried to smile but worry clouded her face.

Cate peered over the top of the car and offered Mr. Smythe a greeting. His usually set features had an extra-dour tone to them. "Hi, Mr. Smythe."

The attorney forced the briefest of smiles onto his face as he buttoned his suit jacket before pulling his briefcase from the backseat.

"Come in. We'll meet in the library. Let me call everyone else."

Cate waved them toward the large room as she strode toward the servants' stairs. All four of her staff popped from the stairway. "They're here."

"We know," Molly said, worry pinched her forehead. "We've been standing at the top of the stairs for the last five minutes."

Cate squeezed her hand. "Well, let's go find out the reason behind this meeting."

Mrs. Fraser wrung her hands, blowing out a sharp breath. "Oh, Lady Cate..."

"It's okay, Mrs. Fraser. Let's see what Mr. Smythe has to say. There may be no reason to worry."

"All right," she said. Mr. Fraser wrapped his arm around his wife and led her down the hall.

Jack nodded at Cate and Molly to precede him down the hall.

They entered the library, finding seats as Cate took a post across the room, too nervous to sit.

Mr. Smythe tugged several folders from his well-polished briefcase before snapping it shut and sliding it next to the armchair.

He glanced up, his eyes scanning all of them before lowering to the paperwork perched on his knees. "Let me begin by apologizing for being presumptuous enough to invite the staff, though as this will ultimately affect them as well, I felt it important that they be present."

"Of course, Mr. Smythe," Cate answered, trying to firm her shaky voice. "Can you tell us what this is about?"

"Is there something wrong?" Mrs. Fraser questioned from the sofa across the room, her hands nearly white from gripping each other. Mr. Fraser patted her knee in a silent gesture of support.

Gayle offered the woman a contrite glance from the armchair Jack usually frequented.

Mr. Smythe swallowed hard, running a hand over the folder in his lap as he stared at it. "I am afraid there has been an egregious error made." He paused, his lip bobbing up and down but no sound emerged. "My firm..."

He paused again and shook his head. “I have made a mistake. There was an oversight. I do not know how it happened, but rest assured I am determined to investigate. To be frank, I cannot see how I missed this, but...”

Molly leaned forward, her lips parted as she waited for the news. “What is it?”

Jack leapt from his seat. “If it’s about the estate accounts, I’ve double-checked them—“

“It has nothing to do with the finances,” Mr. Smythe interrupted.

“Then what is it?” Molly asked.

Mr. Smythe studied their faces again, his features paler than usual and gaunt. He flicked his eyes downward again as he licked his lips and focused his attention on Cate.

“It seems you, Dr. Kensie, are not the rightful owner of Dunhaven Castle.”

CHAPTER 2

Cate's heart hammered as the words hung heavy in the air. Gasps rang out around her as she pressed a hand to her chest and swallowed hard.

"What?" Molly shrieked, leaping from her seat on the sofa's arm.

Jack plopped into his chair, his brow furrowing and his jaw gaping.

"But...y-you did a DNA test. You confirmed it," Molly gushed.

Mr. Smythe nodded. "There is no question that Dr. Kensie is a MacKenzie. We did confirm that through a DNA test. She is definitely the closest living relative. In fact, she is the only living relative left of the MacKenzie family."

"Then how could she not be the heir?"

Molly collapsed back onto the sofa's arm, pressing a hand to her forehead.

Jack shook his head. "This is insane. You searched for months, Mr. Smythe. You said she was the right one. We didn't know if anyone was left, and you found her. You assured us Dunhaven would carry on."

"Yes," Cate chimed in, clearing her throat, "when we spoke, you were sure the DNA test would confirm what you were already certain of and that there would be no challenges of any merit."

"Yes, I know, I..." Mr. Smythe slid his eyes closed, pressing his thin mouth into an even tighter line. "There was a codicil. Lady Gertrude added it to the will, and we..."

His voice trailed off, and he swallowed hard. Had the news not been so dire, Cate would have felt sorry for the man.

Mr. Smythe twisted his neck and cleared his throat. "That is, I was not aware of it."

"A codicil? What does that mean?" Molly questioned.

"It's an addendum to the original will," Gayle explained. "It modifies it in some way."

"And this addendum changes it so Cate isn't the heir?" Jack asked.

"More or less, yes," Mr. Smythe said.

"Well, what the hell does it say?" Jack asked, lunging forward in his seat. "Because the last we heard Lady Gertrude wanted this to go to family only. It was never to leave the MacKenzie family. So, if Cate's the only MacKenzie, and she's not the heir who the hell is it going to?"

The doors to the library swung open. A curvy blonde in a form-fitting, shin-length dress stood inside. The corners of her full lips curled up into a devilish grin. "That would be me."

Cate's heart skipped a beat as the familiar form of Gianna Caruso sashayed into the room, sticking a hand on her hip as she stopped next to Mr. Smythe's armchair.

"I have the matter well in hand, Ms. Caruso," he assured her with a sour expression on his face.

Gianna lifted a shoulder. "These people deserve answers, and we shall provide them."

"But...she's not a MacKenzie!" Mr. Fraser's quiet voice said.

"No, I am not. But I am, in fact, the rightful heir to this estate and everything in it. And I would like to be upfront about how this affects you."

"I'd like that," Mrs. Fraser said, lifting her chin. "I think we'd all like to know where we stand."

"Of course," Gianna said, her red lips twisting into a tighter grin. She paused, the smile broadening as she scanned all of their faces. "I want you all out by week's end."

"What?" Mrs. Fraser gasped.

"Dr. Kensie is no longer the owner of Dunhaven Castle. She is also no longer your employer. I am. And you are all fired."

Molly's jaw dropped open, and tears filled her eyes again. Jack wrapped an arm around her shoulders.

Cate shook her head at the scene. Her heart pounded as she fought to steady her breathing. Every impulse in her body pushed her to lunge through the air and throttle the woman responsible for so much damage.

From the deaths in 1942 to Jack's kidnapping and now this. Gianna Caruso had slashed and burned almost everything dear to her.

Across the room, Gianna continued twisting the knife. "And while we are at it, there is another matter to clear up. Mr. Smythe, would you care to explain it?"

William Smythe's pale skin turned gray as the color drained from his face. He arched an eyebrow as he began. "Any decisions Dr. Kensie has made over the course of her time at Dunhaven Castle—"

"Her illegal time at Dunhaven Castle," Gianna added, pulling one corner of her mouth back in a smirk as she settled her arms over her chest and stared at Cate.

Mr. Smythe fluttered his eyelids before pressing on. "Any decisions Dr. Kensie has made are null. That includes the gifting of the cottage to Charlie and Emily Fraser and..." His voice trailed off again, and he whipped a handkerchief from his pocket and used it to dab his forehead. "Any salaries paid to employees."

Molly's eyebrows knit, and she stared at him with an incredulous expression. "What?"

"You owe me your salaries back," Gianna said, flicking her gaze to the Frasers. "And you owe me your home."

"But surely..." Mrs. Fraser began, a hand pressed to her heart.

"Surely nothing. The cottage is my property. Now, I realize this is a shock—"

"A shock?" Molly squealed. "This is robbery."

Gianna's facial muscles twitched with annoyance. "I'll let that slide since you are upset. However—"

"No! I don't have the money. What do you expect me to do? I got paid. I bought stuff. It's gone! What I do have left is my life savings. I'd be bankrupt."

Gianna arched an eyebrow at the redhead. "I'm a reasonable woman. We can set up a payment plan if you cannot pay the lump sum."

Molly gasped as a tear rolled down her cheek. She started to shake her head, but it turned into a quiver. She pressed a shaking hand to her forehead.

Mrs. Fraser's wrinkles deepened as she wrung her hands and glanced at Mr. Fraser.

Cate slid her eyes closed as the chaos ensued. Her heart broke for her friends. The sudden appearance of Gianna was an unexpected twist. An unwanted nuisance that made her skin crawl. And threatened to ruin everything.

"I can't believe there isn't something we can do," Jack's voice said, bringing Cate back to the reality of the situation brewing around her.

"There is," Gianna said, poking a finger in the air, "you can get out. By week's end, or I will have to use force. Mr. Smythe can handle drawing up arrangements to repay the debts you incurred during the time I should have been in charge of the funds."

"Wait just a minute," Jack growled. "Lady Gertrude never wanted this to leave the family."

"And it is just that fear that forced her to write the codicil," Gianna said, crossing her arms.

Jack's nostrils flared, and he held a shaking hand toward the attorney. "Mr. Smythe, can you please explain how this happened? How did Lady Gertrude's desire for Dunhaven to remain in the family force her to add a codicil ensuring it did not?"

"Simple," Gianna began.

"I'm asking him, not you!" Jack shouted.

Cate stepped forward, placing a hand on his shoulder. "Easy, Jack. Let him explain."

Gianna offered him a smarmy smile. "Yes, easy, Jack. You wouldn't want to raise your blood pressure after your illness."

Jack's chest heaved as he gasped in breaths, his face an angry shade of red.

Mr. Smythe held up his hand. "Please, Ms. Caruso, allow me to explain. They deserve that much."

"A matter of opinion," Gianna said, "but proceed."

Mr. Smythe sucked in a deep breath. "Lady Gertrude became concerned that the next owner of Dunhaven Castle may face a situation similar to hers."

"Meaning what?" Jack asked.

"Meaning no clear heir. It was the concern that Dunhaven Castle could pass to someone outside of the family, someone unknown if the new heir had no family. And so, she added a codicil that if the next of kin was not married at the time of inheritance, the property should pass to the Caruso Preservation Foundation, of which Ms. Caruso is the president.”

“So, Cate had to be married, or she could not inherit?” Jack questioned.

“Yes,” Mr. Smythe said with a nod.

“No, that can’t be legal,” Jack said, slicing through the air with his hand. “Cate’ll challenge it.”

“Yes,” Molly said, leaping to her feet and threading her arm through Cate’s. “Surely, this can’t stand up in court. It’s discrimination or something. Because she’s a single woman, she can’t inherit? That’s crazy! She’s the next-of-kin.”

“I assure you it is legal. It will stand up in a court of law. It can be enforced. As archaic as it may seem, this is a standard practice historically in wills.”

“I mean, this is the twenty-first century! How can a single woman be denied an inheritance based on her marital status?” Molly asked, shaking her head.

“Because Lady Gertrude wanted this place preserved. And Cate lacks the ability to do that,” Gianna said.

“This is crazy!” Jack said, flinging his hands in the air.

“It is,” Molly said. “Marriages can fall apart. It doesn’t guarantee a future.”

“But it does, in most instances, lead to children. And there is a stipulation about the duration of the marriage.” Mr. Smythe shook his head. “It’s a moot point since Dr. Kensie is and was single at the time of inheriting.”

Gianna raised her chin, a smirk on her face. “Which means Dunhaven Castle is mine.”

Mr. Smythe pressed his lips together. “Unfortunately, she is correct. And she does have the legal right to enforce you all to leave in a timely manner.”

“One week,” Gianna chimed in.

“That’s hardly reasonable,” Molly shot back.

“You don’t have that many things. I think you can manage it,” Gianna said.

“This is cruel,” Molly shouted as she jabbed a finger at the woman. “And heartless.”

“Perhaps some leniency could be arranged,” Mr. Smythe began, sliding his eyes sideways to Gianna.

Cate’s heart pounded in her chest again. She wiped her sweaty palms against her leggings and licked her lips. She cleared her throat and lifted her eyes to the group. “Will you excuse me for a moment?”

Molly wrapped her arm around Cate’s shoulder. “Cate—“

Cate squeezed Molly’s hand and offered her a slight smile. “No, I’m okay. I just...need one minute.”

“Of course, Cate,” Gayle said with a consoling smile.

Cate took a step toward the doors when Gianna stepped into her path. “Leave the timepiece. It comes to me, too. I wouldn’t want you absconding with any valuable heirlooms.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at the woman, her nose wrinkling and her lips settling into a frown.

“That’s ridiculous,” Jack said.

Cate lifted the pendant timepiece from around her neck. She held it out toward Mr. Smythe, dangling it from her fingers. “I trust this will be safe in your care until we can sort through this mess.”

Mr. Smythe accepted the proffered item with a remorseful and fleeting smile before placing it on the coffee table.

“Excuse me,” Cate said, skirting past Gianna and darting out the door. She pulled those closed behind her, collapsing against them as she blew out a long breath. She fluttered her eyelashes, glancing upward and blinking away her tears.

The sudden, unexpected appearance of Gianna made this all the more difficult for her. She fought to steady her breathing. She had to proceed. She had to fight for what was hers. And her staff’s. She shook her head at the greed displayed by the woman to require her staff to repay their salaries over the last year.

With a deep inhale, she forced herself down the hall and around the corner to the office. She strode to the file cabinet and tugged it open, digging through it for the documents she sought. She bypassed the green folder containing the copy of the will she’d signed for in Aberdeen. The copy had contained no such codicil. Could she fight it based on that?

She shook her head, pulling the next folder out of the drawer and slamming it shut. She spun on her heel and raised her chin. With the item pressed against her chest, she strode back to the library.

The scene inside remained tense. Jack sat next to Mrs. Fraser on the sofa, his leg bobbing up and down. His hand wrapped around Molly's who perched on the edge of the sofa's arm. She sniffled, biting her thumbnail. Mrs. Fraser and Mr. Fraser held hands, their faces stoic.

Cate swallowed hard and closed the doors behind her.

"Finished with your moment? I'd like to get moving on signing the paperwork," Gianna said as she circled around her to face Mr. Smythe.

"There's no need for that," Cate said.

"Cate," Jack began with a shake of his head.

"Don't give up, Lady Cate," Molly said.

"Not without a fight," Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate twisted to face them and nodded. "It's okay. We'll be okay." She returned her gaze to Mr. Smythe and thrust the folder toward him. "I think you'll find everything you need in here to verify that I am, indeed, the rightful heir to Dunhaven Castle."

Mr. Smythe's eyebrows squashed together as he slowly pulled the folder from Cate's hand. He shook his head, glancing down at it before returning his gaze to her. "Dr. Kensie, I'm not certain you understand. Unless this is a marriage certificate dated February 1, 2019, you are not the heir. You had to be married at the time of inheritance which is effectively Lady Gertrude's date of death."

Cate lifted her chin, swallowing again as her throat went dry. "As you'll see when you open that folder, I was, in fact, married on February 1, 2019. Actually, nearly five years before that in August 2014."

Mr. Smythe flicked the folder open, studying the contents.

"What?" Molly asked behind her. "You're married?"

Mr. Smythe lifted the certificate, his jaw agape and his eyebrow arching. "Apparently, yes. At least, you were. Are you still?"

"Yes," Cate said.

"No divorce? No separations?"

Cate shook her head before she stalked across the room, taking up her original post.

Mr. Smythe blinked as he stared at the paper, his shock apparent.

"I want that verified," Gianna spat.

Mr. Smythe continued to gawk at the sheet with pinched features. "Y-yes, of course. May I keep this?"

Cate nodded. "It's a copy."

“No!” Gianna shouted. “No, this is a lie. You are not and were not married in 2014.”

Cate stared at the woman with a blank expression.

Jack studied her, his features betraying his confusion. “You were married when you came here?”

“Yes,” Cate said, sliding her eyes to him.

“To who?” he burst.

“To me,” a new voice said from the doorway.

All eyes turned to the newcomer. Cate’s lips curled at the edges as she stared at her spouse of nearly six years. Silence fell over the room’s occupants as he strode into the room and spun to face them. “I do not believe I’ve met all of you formally, but I am Catherine’s husband, Duke Marcus Northcott.”

CHAPTER 3

Stunned faces stared at the newest arrival to the room before a few flicked to Cate. Mr. Smythe slow-blinked at the man, then glanced down at the certificate again.

Riley bounded across the room to Marcus who scooped him up and rubbed his head. “Hello, Riley.”

“Oh, please. You cannot be serious,” Gianna said.

Marcus strode across the room toward the brandy decanter. “I believe you will find all the paperwork in order to clear up this matter, Smythe.”

“You are married,” Mr. Smythe repeated, as though trying to cement the idea in his head.

“Cate, you’re married?” Molly questioned.

Marcus poured himself a brandy and spun to face them. “Yes. Since 2014. Turns out your Lady Cate is actually Duchess Cate.” He smiled at Cate, tipping her chin up. “Though you’ve never been much for titles, have you, dear?”

Cate smiled up at him and shook her head. “No.”

“I want this checked into,” Gianna said, crossing her arms. “Thoroughly.”

“Yes, we will, though this all looks to be in order,” Mr. Smythe answered, stowing the marriage certificate in the folder and sliding it into his briefcase along with the other.

“So, just to be clear, we’re not all out of jobs, homes, and being asked to repay our salaries,” Molly questioned.

“No, that is not the case,” Gianna said, her nostrils flaring.

“Assuming we can verify the marriage certificate and find no evidence of divorce or separation, yes,” Mr. Smythe said as he stood.

Marcus crossed the room and slid the pocket watch from the coffee table. “Thank you, Smythe. You’ll find nothing but a happy marriage.” He returned to Cate’s side and set his brandy on the drink cart before he draped the pendant around her neck. “I believe this is yours.”

Cate clutched the pocket watch in her hand and offered him a brief smile. “Thank you.”

Gianna’s lips curled into an expression of disdain. “You think you’ve won, but you haven’t. You should have given us Dunhaven when you had the chance.” She spun on her heel and stormed from the room.

Mr. Smythe rose from his seat. “I will be in touch. We will expedite this as much as possible.”

“Until the matter is resolved, that woman should be barred from this estate,” Marcus said. “She has upset the staff and Catherine.”

“Yes, of course,” Mr. Smythe said. “We will advise her—“

“Not good enough, Smythe. Tell her in no uncertain terms that Dunhaven Castle and its grounds are off-limits.”

Mr. Smythe pressed his lips together in a thin line as he nodded. “Yes, of course. If you will excuse me now, we will return to London posthaste to begin.”

“Mr. Smythe, are you certain you won’t stay?” Cate asked. “We’d be happy to have you for the night.”

“Oh—“ he said, smoothing his jacket.

“Really,” Cate said, “it’s no trouble and certainly more comfortable than a hotel. There are no trains back today.”

He snapped his gaze to Gayle before he nodded. “If it isn’t any trouble, that would be most appreciated.”

“It’s no trouble at all,” Cate said.

“Thank you, Lady...” Gayle pressed her lips together and offered Cate an apologetic smile. That is, thank you, Your Grace. That will take some getting used to.” She gave a small chuckle.

“Really, just Cate is always fine,” Cate insisted. “And we are happy to have you stay.”

“If you don’t mind, I’ll step out to make some calls to begin the validation process required by the codicil.” Mr. Smythe licked his lips and fixed his gaze on Cate. “For what it’s worth, I am very sorry for this mess.”

“It’s okay, Mr. Smythe. And with any luck, it should be cleared up very soon.”

He bobbed his head at her before he strode from the room.

“Well,” Mrs. Fraser said, rising along with Mr. Fraser, “I can take you up to your room, Ms. Pearson.”

“If it’s my usual spot, I can find it with no trouble.”

“Yes, it is,” Mrs. Fraser answered with a nod.

“Then please don’t trouble yourself. I’ll find my way up.”

“I’ll send up a tray with your meal. Given the circumstances, Lady—” Mrs. Fraser stopped, fluttering her eyelashes. “Her Grace thought an informal dinner may be best.”

“Of course. Thank you.” Gayle offered them all a warm smile before she disappeared from the room.

Mrs. Fraser smoothed her dress and clasped her hands in front of her. Cate recognized the gesture. It betrayed how nervous Mrs. Fraser remained over the recent events. “Well, I suppose we should be returning to the kitchen to finish our preparations.”

Cate stepped forward and reached for Mrs. Fraser’s hands. She gave them a squeeze and offered her a smile. “It’s going to be okay, Mrs. Fraser. Mr. Smythe just needs to finish the verification on his end and everything will go back to normal.”

Mrs. Fraser glanced over her shoulder at Marcus before her gaze settled on Cate. “And normal or not, meals must still be prepared or we’ll all starve!”

Cate broadened her grin at her. “We wouldn’t want that.”

“I’ll send trays up for you both,” Mrs. Fraser said, offering a tentative glance at Marcus again.

“Oh,” Cate said, glancing at Marcus for a moment, “I would still like to eat dinner with you.”

“Oh, surely you—”

“I have several things to see to this evening. I will dine out,” Marcus said.

“Well, then we would be most happy to have you, Lady—” Mrs. Fraser closed her eyes, pursing her lips.

“Good,” Cate said. “And there’s no need to change how you address me. Lady Cate is perfectly fine.”

“But not proper,” Mrs. Fraser said, tugging her hand free and wagging a finger at her.

Cate gave the woman’s hand another squeeze and smiled.

Molly approached and pulled her into a hug. “We’ll talk later?”

“Yes,” Cate said. “Definitely.”

Mr. Fraser offered Cate a simple pat on her shoulder and a tight-lipped smile.

“Ah, do you mind if we discuss a few estate matters that may be changing given the news?” Jack inquired.

Cate nodded at him. “Yes, I think there are a few things that need to be addressed in the short term while we wait for this mess to clear up.”

Molly pinched Jack’s chin. “Don’t work too hard.”

“I’ll take it easy.”

The majority of her staff shuffled from the room, leaving Cate with Marcus and Jack. Jack pushed the doors shut behind the others before he spun to face them. He focused his gaze on Cate, his chest heaving out a deep sigh.

“Cate—“

She held up a hand, stopping his words. “Jack, please.”

“Please what? Please help?”

Marcus sipped at his brandy, offering Jack a stony glance over the rim of the glass. “Catherine hardly needs your help.”

Jack’s jaw tightened as he fixed his gaze on the man, nostrils flaring.

Cate sighed and held up a hand. “Marcus, please.”

Marcus clamped his mouth closed with a huff, busying himself with refilling his brandy and pouring another.

Cate flicked her gaze to Jack. “I can explain.”

“I sure as hell wish you would because I cannot understand this.” He flung his hand at Marcus.

The man handed the second brandy to Cate. She accepted the proffered glass, tapping her fingers against it as she stared into the amber liquid.

Jack pressed his hands against his forehead. “I mean, what the hell happened, Cate?”

“So much,” Cate breathed, her features pinching.

“Such as?” Jack inquired.

“Such as she focused her energy on rescuing you instead of saving Dunhaven Castle,” Marcus spat. “And this is the fallout of that decision.”

Jack's eyebrows shot up as he snapped his gaze at the man.

Cate pressed a palm to her forehead, sliding her eyes closed. "Marcus, can you give us a minute?"

Marcus studied her for a moment before setting his glass down. "Of course. We will speak later about the next steps."

Cate nodded as he strode from the room. He offered her a glance before he pulled the doors closed.

Jack ran his fingers through his hair as the latch clicked, blowing out a forceful sigh. "Now can you please tell me what the hell happened to result in this?" He gestured toward the closed doors.

"You were gone, Jack." Cate licked her lips, tears glistening in her eyes as she sank into Jack's usual armchair, her voice lowering to a whisper. "You were gone."

Jack perched on the edge of the chair she usually used. "I know. And I'm sorry."

Cate's features pinched, and she pressed her lips together. "You don't need to apologize. I'm not blaming you. I'm sure it was horrible for you. I can't begin to imagine what happened to you or what those people did to you. But on this end, you were gone."

"And you called him?"

Cate stared into the amber liquid, recalling the panicked moments when she realized Jack had been taken. "I called Damien."

She flicked her gaze up to Jack's face. "They brought Marcus."

Jack's brow furrowed, and he cocked his head. "Damien brought Marcus? Damien? The guy who hated this man the last time we saw him?"

Cate's forehead wrinkled, and she took a sip of her brandy. "Apparently, things in the supernatural world change a lot." Her lower lip bobbed up and down for a moment before she took another sip of the amber liquid.

"Apparently," Jack said, his eyebrows shooting up.

Cate blew out a breath as she considered her next words. She flicked her gaze to him. "He stepped up, Jack."

"He didn't kidnap you this time?"

"He saved my life. Multiple times. And yours."

Jack fluttered his eyelashes, his face betraying his lack of understanding.

"He traded himself for you."

Jack stared at her, unblinking.

Cate nodded at him. "Yes. He traded himself for you. You had temporalysis. You were dying. He traded himself for you. You are alive because of him."

Jack pressed his lips together, lowering his eyes to the area rug. "Sorry, I'm just having a difficult time picturing that man as selfless."

"I was shocked, too. But he did. And he endured a substantial amount of torture because of that."

Jack scoffed. "So he says."

"No," Cate said, slamming her glass down on the table. "Not says him. Says me."

Jack's shoulders slumped. "Cate, I'm not calling you a liar. But I think he's manipulative and—"

Cate shook her head, pressing her hand against her chest. "No. You don't understand, I..."

Jack flicked his eyebrows up as her voice trailed off. "Then help me understand. Because I don't."

"He did something to me—"

Jack leapt from his chair, pacing the floor. "I knew it."

"No, nothing bad."

"I'll believe that when you explain."

"I'm trying but...it's difficult. It's...odd."

Jack rolled his eyes. "Not surprising with him."

"When we were searching for you, Gianna tried to kill me. And she nearly succeeded. Marcus worried something would happen to me. He used some sort of magic to link us."

Jack froze, snapping his gaze to her. "Link you?"

"Yes," Cate said, pressing a hand to her heart again. "He cut my hand and his and mixed our blood. He could feel my heart beating inside his chest."

Jack sank into the armchair again, his features pinching as he tried to understand.

"And, despite me being human, I can feel his heartbeat in my chest, too."

Jack's surprised look turned incredulous. "What?"

"I have two heartbeats in my chest. My own and his. I can feel things that happen to him. Major things. Terrible things."

Jack flicked his gaze to the dark fireplace. "My God, Cate."

“That’s how I know they did horrible things to him. I felt them, Jack. He traded himself for you knowing he’d live through that. But he did it. He did it so you could live.”

Jack balanced his elbows on his thighs and shook his head. “I’m still having a hard time picturing this guy as selfless.”

“Hard time or not, he offered himself. Ask Damien, Michael, or Celine. They were all there when he did it. I was there. Damien had to carry me out of the room. And then when his heartbeat woke me up in the middle of the night...”

Cate’s features pinched as her voice trailed off.

Jack leapt from his seat and paced around the floor. “Why the hell would he do that do you? Why would he make you go through that? Are you sure it wasn’t a setup?”

Cate lifted a shoulder. “He didn’t know I would feel his heart. He was surprised. He thought only he would feel mine. But I did.” She pressed her hand against her chest again. “I do.”

“This is unbelievable,” he breathed, perching on the edge of the armchair again. “I was sick?”

“Dying,” Cate said. “You were unconscious by the time we found you, and you wouldn’t have survived for much longer.”

Jack’s features pinched. “I remember...I remember odd things happening. One minute it felt like I was here at Dunhaven. And the next...”

“You were back in some cell somewhere, right?”

Jack flicked his gaze to her and nodded. “Yes.”

“You had temporalysis. Like me, only more severe. We are assuming Gianna time-hopped you back to 1810, and that’s what caused it. Your case would have been fatal.

“Thanks to Dr. Gresham, it wasn’t.”

“Thanks to Anna Northcott, it wasn’t, and Dr. Gresham. And as much as you don’t want to hear this...Marcus.”

Jack slid his eyes shut as he heaved a sigh. He snapped them open again, focusing them on her. “I’m assuming they cured you, too?”

Cate shook her head. “No. Amelia was still working on the cure. But mine wasn’t as severe as yours.”

“Did you go comatose?”

“No. Marcus had a treatment that mitigated the symptoms. I still passed out a few times and had weird visions, but I always came to within a few minutes.”

“So, do you still have it?”

Cate took another sip of her brandy before shaking her head. “Cured.”

“By Dr. Gresham?”

“No, mine ran its course.”

Jack jumped from the chair again. “Ran its course? How do you know? How can you tell? Cate, are you certain you’re not sick?”

“Yes. Marcus said I’m cured.”

Jack flung a hand in the air. “Oh, Marcus said. Well, then it must be true.”

Cate pursed her lips, her fingers tapping the side of her glass again.

“I’m sorry,” Jack said, spinning on his heel and wandering back across the room. “Did he at least give any proof?”

“He said the visions I kept having were of a moment in my future. Some pinnacle point of my life. And once that passed, if I hadn’t fallen into a coma or died yet, I’d survive.”

“And you experienced the moment? You lived through it?” Jack asked, sinking into the armchair again.

Cate nodded, lowering her eyes to what remained of her drink.

Jack shook his head, letting his chin rest in his palm. “What was it?”

“What?” Cate asked, flicking her gaze back to him.

“What was your moment?”

“Uhh, a ball at Rosenberg Palace.”

Jack’s features pinched.

“Marcus’s mother was...is...I think, a German Duchess. Rosenberg Palace is his maternal side’s home.”

“What happened at the ball that was so important to you?”

Cate flicked her eyes from his, her forehead crinkling. She sucked in a breath, her lips parted to answer when she shook her head and shrugged. “I-I-I think maybe the narrowing down of suspects as to who had you and where you may be held? I’m honestly not sure.” She forced a nervous smile on her face. “It’s all a blur that night.”

Jack narrowed his eyes at her. “Cate, did something happen?”

Cate swallowed hard, lowering her gaze to the coffee table.

“Cate?” Jack prodded.

She lifted a shoulder again. “After the ball, I got sick.”

“From the temporalysis?”

Cate shook her head, her features pinching as she recalled the painful experience. “Gianna put a poisonous snake in my bed. I...”

Jack lunged forward, his fingers clutching the arms of the chair. “What? Did it bite you?”

“Yes,” Cate answered, staring ahead, “and I was sick for three days.”

Tears filled her eyes. “I’m the reason you were so sick when we got to you, I think.”

“No, Cate, I’m certain that’s not true.”

“Damien said it wasn’t. He said they used the time to find you and assess how we’d plan to get you back, but...had I been awake maybe we would have gotten to you faster.”

“You can’t think like that, Cate.”

“But I do.”

“I’m sure for those three days you were pestering everyone for information while you recovered.”

Cate slid her eyes closed for a moment. “I wasn’t conscious.”

“Oh, Cate,” Jack said with a sigh. “That woman really did a number on us, didn’t she?”

“And she continues to be a thorn in our side,” Cate said, setting her glass on the table.

“I assume she’s behind this latest...situation.”

“The codicil? Yes. Marcus’s people caught it when we returned with you. He warned me they’d try something like this. You were just being used as a distraction.”

Jack chewed his lower lip as he shook his head.

“And to be clear, I did not do what I did just to keep the castle. I would have traded it for you.”

“No one thinks that, Cate. I don’t think that. They can’t take Dunhaven.”

“I know.”

Jack rubbed his lips before he shot a glance at Cate. “Just to be clear, you weren’t married when you first came here, right?”

The statement elicited a chuckle from Cate. “No.”

“Just checking. Your marriage certificate is dated 2014.”

Cate gave him a broad smile as she nodded. “Yeah. Two days ago, we went to 2014, got married, and came back.”

Jack let his head fall back onto the cushion behind him. He stared at the ceiling, sighing, before he picked up his head and stared at Cate. "I guess the only thing left to ask is what the hell do we do now?"

CHAPTER 4

Cate slumped in the chair as the question hung in the air. The enigma had plagued her since she'd read the codicil. Marcus had offered her a temporary solution, but it remained just that: temporary. They needed to fix this. To reset the clock. But she had no idea how to do that.

Cate flicked her gaze to Jack. "I'm not sure. I hate to say this, but I think we're going to have to rely on Marcus to take the lead."

Jack dropped his head into his hands. "Words I never wanted to hear."

"I'm sorry."

He raised his eyes to her. "It's not your fault. But I'm damned uncomfortable with this. I don't trust that man."

"Noted, but until we have this fixed and The Agency dealt with, we don't have a choice."

Jack clasped his hands, resting his chin against them.

"Sorry, Jack. But look on the bright side. This is only temporary."

"You sure about that?"

"Yes. We both saw him with Celine in 1792. I'm shocked he even offered to marry me, to begin with. It must be a huge inconvenience for him."

Jack studied her for a moment. "We both saw him with Celine, yes. But we both also saw Celine with him. She detests him."

"Not anymore," Cate answered. "They're practically civil. Even friendly."

Jack wiggled his eyebrows. "Talk about playing the long game, huh?"

Cate chuckled at the statement and slouched back in the chair. “Yep. So, like I said, I’m certain this is temporary, and he’ll want this ended as soon as possible. Maybe this is even designed to impress her in some way.”

“Thank goodness for small miracles.” Jack offered a laugh. “Impress your future wife by marrying another woman. What kind of world do we live in?”

“It gets stranger by the minute.” Cate furrowed her brows, squinting at him. “Did you know there are other universes where we make different choices that result in a different world?”

Jack stared ahead blankly for a moment. “Don’t say anything else. I can’t handle it.”

Cate grinned at him. He shot her a shocked glance. “Wait...are we in one of them?”

Cate chuckled again. “Not to my knowledge. I did not even want to glimpse into one when given the chance.”

“We really need to have a long conversation about what happened while I was gone once this mess is over.”

“Oh, definitely. I’m glad these chairs are comfortable because we’re going to be in them for a long, long time to go over everything that happened while you were gone.”

“In the meantime, I better let you have a few minutes to yourself. I’m certain the questions at dinner tonight are going to be brutal.”

Cate snickered at the statement as Jack rose from the chair. “I’ve definitely got some explaining to do.”

“I don’t envy you that,” Jack said. “See you soon.” He strolled to the doors and disappeared through them with a wave.

Cate slouched in the armchair, letting her head fall against the cushion behind her. With a long breath, she forced herself to her feet, calling the dogs after her. She trudged upstairs, threaded through the halls to her room, and closed herself inside.

She leaned back against the doors, letting the silence envelop her before she shuffled across to her chaise and sank onto it. She rested her head in her hands as the emotions building from the stressful day threatened to overwhelm her.

She pressed her lips together, tears welling in her eyes. A lump formed in her throat, and a sob escaped her. She buried her face in her hands.

A soft knocking sounded at the door as Riley nudged at her elbow. Cate sniffled, wiping at her cheeks. "Come in!"

"Your Grace?" Andrea said, poking her head in through the door. "Just checking to see how everything went."

"As expected, more or less."

Andrea slid through the small opening and eased the door shut behind her. She approached Cate, clasping her hands in front of her. "Would you like to talk about it?"

Cate glanced down at the area rug, sniffing again. "No, I'm fine, thank you."

Andrea offered her a consoling smile. "Why don't I brush your hair before dinner?"

"Oh, you don't—" Cate began before she sucked in a breath and nodded. "Yes, that would be great."

Andrea led her to the dressing table, and Cate sank onto the chair in front of it. Andrea slid the soft bristles through her long hair.

"Gianna showed up for the discussion," Cate said after a few swipes.

Andrea flicked her gaze to Cate's face through the mirror, arching an eyebrow. "Well, that wasn't expected, was it? You thought only Mr. Smythe and Gayle would come."

"Yes. And she made things quite uncomfortable."

"I can imagine. How trying for you."

Cate let her forearm slap onto the table, rattling the perfume bottle, music box, and comb. "Do you know she had the nerve to ask my staff to repay their salaries for the year I was here?"

Andrea froze mid-stroke. "No!"

Cate nodded at her. "Oh, yes, she did. She wants everything repaid to her. She was kind enough to offer them a payment plan if they couldn't return the funds in one lump sum. And she wanted the Frasers' cottage."

"That woman is a menace. Thank goodness you were prepared."

"Yes," Cate said, lowering her eyes to the piano-shaped music box. She propped it open, allowing the sound to soothe her. "I hope it works."

"I have no doubt it will," Andrea said with a reassuring smile.

Cate heaved a sigh, tearing her eyes from the music box to stare at Andrea through the mirror. "I don't put anything past Gianna and The Agency."

“His Grace will undoubtedly have prepared for everything,” the woman said, resuming her steady brushing.

Cate stared at the woman a moment longer, pondering if the statement would prove true. She certainly hoped so.

“There we are,” Andrea said as she gathered Cate’s hair behind her shoulders. “Would you like to change for dinner?”

“No, that’s not necessary. I’m dining in the kitchen tonight with you.”

“Oh, how lovely, Your Grace.” She hesitated a moment, biting into her lower lip before she added, “Will His Grace be joining us?”

Cate chuckled as she rose from the table. “No. I cannot imagine Marcus eating in my kitchen with the staff.”

Andrea giggled as Cate spun to face her. “If I may be so bold, Your Grace, neither can I.”

Cate pushed the music box closed and drummed her hands against her thighs. “Well, I guess we should head down.”

“Are you all right? I could have a tray sent up.”

“No, I think I’d better face the music. I’m sure everyone has questions. I just feel...it feels odd lying to them.”

“Does Mr. Reid know the truth?”

Cate nodded. “Yes, he does. I owed him that.”

“But the others do not.”

“No. And they cannot.”

“Of course.” Andrea wrapped her arm around Cate’s shoulders and led her to the door. “Don’t worry, Your Grace, if the questions become too uncomfortable, I will merely spill my soup and cause a scene.”

Cate smiled at her, flicking her gaze sideways as they strode through the door. “Thank you, Andrea. I can always count on you.”

They made their way to the kitchen below stairs with the dogs in tow. The sweet smell of cinnamon filled the room.

Cate wandered to her seat at the table as Mrs. Fraser pulled a steaming apple pie from the oven and set it on the stove.

“Looks like you’ve been busy,” Cate said, inhaling a deep breath of the delicious scent.

“Indeed, we have,” Molly said with a grin as she set a bowl of leafy green salad in the center of the table. “Figured we’d bake a celebratory pie now that we’re not all homeless and broke.”

Cate squashed her lips together and shook her head. "I am sorry about this."

Molly crinkled her forehead. "Sorry about what? It's not your fault."

"Nay, it isn't, Lady...oh," Mrs. Fraser said, tapping her cheek, "old habits, Your Grace. If it's anyone's fault it would be Mr. Smythe, but I cannae even blame him. He's usually ever so cautious."

"I can't believe something like this would slip past him," Mr. Fraser chimed in.

"I can't believe you're married!" Molly exclaimed, plopping into a seat across from Cate with a grin. "I'm glad. Not only because it's saving our collective rear ends but also for you."

Cate smiled at her. "Thank you."

"Now wait just a minute before we go congratulating her," Mrs. Fraser said as she set a loaded plate of stew in front of Cate. She studied Cate's face with narrowed eyes. "Are you happy?"

Cate smiled up at the woman. "Yes," she said with a nod.

Mrs. Fraser plopped into a seat. "All right, then, I suppose congratulations are in order. Though belated for nearly five years. What in the world has he been doing all this time?"

"Things," Cate said, concentrating on her plate. "We don't have the most traditional relationship."

Molly poked her fork toward Cate after popping a grape tomato into her mouth. "You know, I think I've seen him around campus a few times. He's just one of those men who make an impression. I had no idea you two were married."

"How did you meet?" Mrs. Fraser asked.

"Through friends," Cate answered, shaking the salt shaker with too much vigor.

"Well, even if he hasn't been here the entire time, he seems pretty devoted. I mean, the moment Jack went..." Molly slid her eyes sideways to Jack, the smile slipping from her features. She flicked her eyes back to Cate. "He came as soon as you needed him."

"He did, yes."

"And we are ever so grateful for that," Mrs. Fraser said with a curt nod.

Molly stabbed a carrot with her fork. "Plus, Riley seems to adore him."

The statement brought a smile to Cate's face as she pushed her stew around on her plate. "He does. There is a good reason for that."

Jack snapped his gaze up.

“Marcus gave me Riley. Riley is actually a pup from Marcus’s mother’s dog, Athena.”

“Really? Aww, that’s so sweet,” Molly said with a grin.

Jack narrowed his eyes at her, and she offered him a subtle nod to verify the truth of the statement.

“Yes. I really needed Riley after my parents died.”

“I’ll bet,” Molly said, reaching across the table to grab Cate’s hand.

“Well, we certainly are grateful to him for appearing today,” Mrs. Fraser said. “I hope Mr. Smythe can clear this matter up quickly so that horrid woman can go back to whatever foundation she has and worry about stealing someone else’s inheritance!”

Cate smiled at her as she scooped up a beef-soaked celery stalk. “My fingers are crossed.”

“As are mine. And my toes,” Mrs. Fraser said with a chuckle. “The nerve of that woman to act like Dunhaven doesn’t belong to you.”

“And ask us to pay back our salaries!” Molly exclaimed. “I mean, is she serious?”

Jack scoffed at the statement.

“I am so sorry she’s doing this,” Cate said again.

“It’s not your fault,” Mrs. Fraser insisted.

“Let’s hope it’s over soon enough.”

“Mr. Smythe is nothing but efficient, so with any luck, he’ll have this wrapped up, and we can get back to planning your first-year anniversary.”

Molly’s eyes went wide. “Oh my goodness!”

“What?” Mrs. Fraser questioned. “You dinnae forget, did you?”

“No, but...” Molly fluttered her eyelashes. “What do you think Mrs. Campbell will say when she finds out you’re married to a duke?”

Cate opened her mouth to answer, but no words came. She crinkled her forehead, trying to imagine Mrs. Campbell’s reaction to the news which would surely spread like wildfire through the town. Her eyebrows raised as her nose wrinkled. She slid her eyes closed. They really needed to fix this situation before she ended up at another 1810-like ball complete with blaring trumpets announcing their arrival. Her fork clattered to her plate.

“Oh, she’ll likely have the entire event planned around playing up that aspect,” Mrs. Fraser said, wagging her finger in the air. “The ninny will become more of a thorn in your side than she already is. That's what'll happen."

"I'm certain His Grace would be most happy to celebrate Her Grace's one-year anniversary at Dunhaven," Andrea said with a smile.

Molly waggled her fork as she eyed Andrea. "So, do you actually work for him?"

"Yes," Andrea said as she raised her water glass to her lips.

"Oh, for how long?" Molly questioned.

"Long enough," Andrea said with a chuckle.

Cate drew in a long breath and licked her lips. "Let's hope this whole mess is cleared up before the anniversary party and plans can continue as they were. Happy or not, I'm sure Marcus has other things on his plate."

"Well, we'll take it one day at a time. But for now, let's have pie," Mrs. Fraser said, rising from her seat and gathering several plates.

"That sounds like an excellent plan," Molly said as she joined her.

The group shared the buttery, rich dessert before they broke up for the evening. With the dogs in tow, Cate dragged herself up the stairs, ready to stretch out in bed and try to forget the day.

She pushed into the downstairs hall, shuffling toward the main staircase. As she entered the foyer, her eyes snapped to the stairs where a figure leaned against the banister. Riley and Bailey growled. Cate stiffened, her heart thudding against her ribs.

"Hello, little mouse," Gianna said, her lips curling into a derisive smile.

CHAPTER 5

“*W*hat are you doing here?” Cate demanded, her muscles stiff and her pulse racing.

The woman crossed her arms and slowly sashayed toward Cate. “You’re full of surprises today. Married? To the Duke himself?” She paused, arching an eyebrow. “Well played, Cate. Though it won’t help.”

“Get out, Gianna.”

She positioned herself inches from Cate’s face, lowering her voice to a whisper. “You’re just staving off the inevitable. We’re going to win. And when we do, it’s going to leave you in ruins.”

The woman smacked into Cate as she stalked past her, knocking her back a step. She grabbed the doorknob and swung the front door open.

Cate glared after her. “Gianna,” she called as the woman stepped into the night air.

Gianna twisted to face her, her blonde hair swinging.

“I’ll never let you win.”

The corner of Gianna’s lips turned up on one side. “We’ll see.”

She spun on her heel and slammed the door. Cate jumped, squeezing her eyes closed as she allowed her heartbeat to slow.

“Catherine, is something wrong?”

The voice startled Cate into opening her eyes. She spun to find Marcus hurrying down the stairs.

Cate sighed, pressing a hand to her forehead. “Gianna was here.”

His eyes went wide, and he set his hands on her shoulders. “Are you all right?”

“Yes, I’m fine. She didn’t do anything to me outside of her usual threats.”

Marcus sighed, flicking his gaze to the floor. “We should go up and speak more privately.”

Cate nodded, and they climbed the stairs with the dogs trailing after them. “Our plan is going to work, right?”

“Yes, but it is only a short-term solution. The win will be short-lived as they will be quickly working a new angle,” he said as they reached the top of the stairs and continued through the hall.

Cate let her head fall back between her shoulder blades. Short-term solution, just as she suspected. How long before he tired of it? “We need to fix this.”

“I’m working on that.”

“How?” Cate asked.

Marcus studied her for a moment before stalking away from her. “It may be best—”

“Don’t do that,” Cate said.

He twisted to face her. “You do not even know what I’m about to say.”

“You’re about to say it may be best if I stay out of it. And I’m not going to do that. I will not be shut out of this fight.”

Marcus’s nostrils flared as he clasped his hands behind his back. “You are extremely stubborn.”

“Yes, I am,” Cate said, lifting her chin. “It’s one of those endearing things you can mention about why you married me.”

A smile played on his lips. “And how did the conversation go with your gardener regarding our recent yet not-so-recent nuptials?”

Cate’s shoulder slumped, and she heaved a sigh. “I don’t know what’s more maddening. Gianna showing up unannounced twice or you referring to Jack as my gardener.”

“If the shoe fits.”

“Except it doesn’t. He is not only my estate manager, but he is a very good friend. And he also is a very large part of protecting this estate.”

“And I assume not only will you not be shut out of the fight, but you will not allow him to be either.”

Cate cocked her head, smiling at him. “You are very bright.”

Marcus puckered his lips as he sucked in a breath. “Fine, though if he prevents us from doing what we need to do—“

“He won’t.”

“I’ll leave his management to you, entirely, dear.”

Cate crossed her arms, drumming her fingers on her forearm. “So, what are our next steps?”

“That remains to be seen, though I have my suspicions that we will be seeking another missing person.”

Cate slowed her steps, snapping her gaze at him. “Do you think she’ll come after someone else in the house like Molly? Or Jack again?”

“No, I believe The Agency may prefer your predecessor.”

“Gertrude?” Cate asked as they arrived outside of her bedroom.

“Yes. It’s obvious they’ve had contact with her. Hence, the codicil.”

Cate crinkled her forehead. “And you think they’re still in contact with her?”

“I think they will attempt to strong-arm her into changing her will to ensure you cannot inherit, though given her mindset, it will be an uphill battle.”

“Given her mindset?” Cate questioned.

“I can only assume they pressured her into changing the will though she found the idea of letting the estate go outside of the family to be less-than-favorable, hence the codicil. The Agency likely allowed it to slip believing it achieved their goal.”

Cate pressed her lips together, studying the thick red carpet under her feet. “And now that it doesn’t...” Her voice trailed off, and she chewed her lower lip.

“They’ll try several angles, I would imagine. One of which will be to pressure Gertrude MacKenzie further. By any means necessary.”

Cate flicked her eyes up to his and sighed. “And we both know what that means.”

The corners of Marcus’s lips turned up, and he rubbed her shoulders. “We’ll fix this.”

“Should we have done something else?” Cate asked. “Like stop them from taking her.”

“We would likely be unable to do that. I’m certain they had unfettered access to Gertrude already. All that remains is to locate her and stop them.”

“Won’t they just do it again?” Cate pressed a hand against her forehead as her muscles tensed. “This is a losing battle.”

“It is not.”

Cate pressed her lips together, steadying her breath as her emotions threatened to bubble over.

Marcus put his hands on her shoulders again. “Catherine, we will find a way.”

Cate nodded without making eye contact with him.

“Catherine,” he prodded, tilting her chin up with his finger, and raising his eyebrows as her eyes met his.

“Okay.”

“Your trust in me is most concerning.”

Cate crossed her arms, shrugging. “Sorry, I’ve just never faced anything like this before.”

“Which is why I wish you’d let me handle it, but you stubbornly refuse to allow me to do that.”

Cate’s lips tugged up at the corners, and she eyed Marcus. “I’m not going to do that. This is my problem—“

“Our problem, dear, we are married.”

Cate broadened her smile, a chuckle escaping her lips. “You really got the worse end of for better or worse, didn’t you?”

“I would not change a thing, Catherine. Now, get some rest. You’ll need it.”

Cate nodded. “Thank you.”

He stepped past her, and she pushed her door open, hurrying inside.

“Oh, Catherine,” he said, spinning to face her again.

“Yes?” she asked, leaning against the closed second door.

“They will not bang their heads against a brick wall.”

Cate crinkled her brow, pulling her chin back.

“The answer to your question of won’t they just do this again. They will not bang their heads against a brick wall. They’ll move on to another target. We just need to stay ahead of them as much as possible.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as she attempted to understand the statement. Another target? When would this end?

She flicked her gaze to Marcus’s dark eyes.

“Just like we did this time,” he added, brandishing his wedding band.

Cate forced a smile on her face and nodded. “Goodnight, Marcus.”

“Goodnight, Catherine.”

She stepped back and eased her door closed. With a sigh, she leaned against it. Fears raced across her mind faster than she could process them. Her face pinched as she worried about the future. She stared down at her ring finger as images of their rushed wedding danced across her mind.

“Trust me,” he’d said after she’d read the changed version of the will. He’d offered her his hand, and she’d accepted it.

They’d traveled to 2014. He’d somehow had everything prepared. A dress, a church, even flowers. Their wedding would appear legitimate to anyone outside looking in. There wouldn’t even be the question of a hurried ceremony.

Cate crossed the room and opened the lid of the piano music box. The lilting tune filled the air. She sucked in a deep breath as she pressed the box to her chest and shuffled to the bedroom. She set the music box on the nightstand and kicked her shoes off, sinking onto the edge of the bed with a sigh.

How long would the farce continue? How long before Marcus tired of the games and left her to fight The Agency on her own?

She pursed her lips and closed her eyes, letting the music push out all the worry. They would solve this and The Agency would move on to a new target. And Marcus would move on.

Everything would return to normal, she assured herself. The situation was only temporary.

“And exhausting,” she said as Riley tapped her knee with his paw.

“I’m tired, too, buddy,” Cate said, lifting him onto the bed as Bailey scrambled onto the bed himself. “Wow, you’re getting good at that, Bailey.”

The little dog wagged his pigtail before circling and plopping down. Riley cuddled next to him with a sigh, laying his head across his canine companion’s side.

“I really should change but I’m worn out. All that stress from Gianna did me in, boys.” She leaned against the pillow, pulling her feet up onto the bed. “I’ll go in just a few minutes.”

* * *

Random images flitted across Cate's mind. Her heart pounded as she raced through the halls of the castle. A scream split the silence, and she froze, gasping before she plowed forward again.

As she rounded a corner, the world melted around her.

Cate gasped in a breath, her eyes fluttering open. Tinkling music still filled the air in the lit room. Her forehead wrinkled, and she pushed herself up to sit.

Two sleeping dogs curled at the bottom of the bed. Cate shifted her gaze from them to her own legs. She still wore her clothes.

A glance at the clock told her she'd been asleep for hours. With a sigh, she forced herself off the bed and changed into her pajamas before she slipped under the sheets. The music box continued to play in the darkness.

She closed her eyes, and let the music wash over her. Her mind returned to the reason she'd awoken. A nightmare had pulled her from her slumber.

Her pulse quickened. Nightmare? Nightmares had been what had kicked off the entire chain of events that landed them where they were now.

Why was she still having them? Cate rolled onto her side, tugging the covers higher. Her heart skipped a beat. Had her temporalysis resurfaced?

She swallowed hard as she snuggled deeper into the pillow. Maybe it was just a normal nightmare. Probably prompted by Gianna's appearance today.

Yes, Cate thought to herself as she drifted back to sleep, just a normal nightmare.

When her eyes opened again, streaks of red painted the sky outside her window. She glanced at her clock and groaned, rolling onto her back.

Riley waddled up the bed, giving her a kiss on the cheek.

"Good morning, buddy," she said, stroking his head as he collapsed into her.

He yawned widely before snuggling his head into her arm.

"I feel the same way, Riley."

Bailey picked his head up and wagged his tail before letting it fall back down.

She lay in bed stroking Riley's soft fur for a few moments longer as random thoughts flitted through her mind. She wrinkled her nose as she recalled the nightmare she'd had. The thought drove her to rise.

"Okay, buddy, time to get up. We have to face the day, like it or not."

She wound the music box that had stopped playing at some point overnight and left it tinkling on her nightstand as she tugged on her robe and stretched.

She crossed the room and pulled open her door, finding Andrea waiting on the opposite side with her hands clasped in front of her.

“Good morning, Your Grace,” she said with a broad smile.

Cate stood to the side and motioned for Andrea to enter. “Good morning, Andrea. I’m sorry, I overslept.”

Andrea bustled past her, crossed into the bedroom, and tugged open a drawer to begin assembling Cate’s clothes. “Quite all right, Your Grace. I did not hear anyone stirring so I waited.”

“Sorry to have you standing out there.”

“It’s no problem at all,” Andrea said with a smile. “I’m so pleased to hear that you slept.”

“Yes, I did,” Cate said as she sank into the seat at her vanity. “I fell asleep in my clothes.”

“Oh, no. This is why you shouldn’t have dismissed me after dinner. I would have made sure you changed.”

Cate met her gaze through the mirror. “I know. But I survived, and look, I ended up in my pajamas anyway.”

Andrea brushed through Cate’s hair, an amused grin on her features. “Soon, you won’t even need me, Your Grace.”

“I used to change my own clothes once upon a time,” Cate said with a chuckle.

“But now you have me.”

Cate gave her a tight-lipped smile and a nod, staring down at the vanity top. She traced a scratch on it with her finger absentmindedly.

“Are you quite sure you slept well, Your Grace?”

Cate flicked her gaze up and nodded. “Yes. It’s just this tension. It’s killing me.”

“I’m certain it’s very nerve-wracking. I hope it’s over soon.”

“You and me both.”

Andrea finished with her hair and assisted Cate with her dressing, folding her pajamas and stowing them away before hanging up her robe.

They parted ways at the foyer doors, with Cate taking the dogs out and Andrea continuing downstairs. After their stroll around the castle, Cate pushed through the door into the kitchen.

“Good morning, Your Grace,” Mrs. Fraser said with a smile and waved a finger in the air. “I remembered this morning. See what a good night’s sleep will do for you?”

“Good morning, Mrs. Fraser,” Cate said, “though, again, the formality really isn’t needed.”

“Do you like Duchess Cate better?” Molly asked as she filled a bowl with brown sugar.

“I like just Cate. I hadn’t even gotten used to Lady Cate yet.”

“And the whole time you were holding out on us.” Molly winked at her.

“And this is why,” Cate said with a chuckle.

Molly wrinkled her nose in a silent giggle.

“Oh, Mr. Smythe requested a working breakfast in the library. He said it applies to Ms. Pearson, as well.”

“Oh? He really feels quite terrible about all this, I think. I do feel bad that he’s working over breakfast, though I’m surprised he’s not skipping the meal entirely and leaving to make the train.”

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hand against her apron as she set bowls on a tray. “There’s been a change of plans on that front, too. He’s asked to stay an extra day, possibly two.”

“Oh!” Cate exclaimed. “That’s perfectly fine. I hope he can enjoy a few days off.”

Molly froze, her jaw hanging open. “Ahhh, I didn’t get the impression he’d be taking any time off.”

Cate raised her eyebrows, sticking a hand on her hip as Jack entered with Mr. Fraser. Greetings were given before Cate drove the conversation back to Mr. Smythe’s change of plans.

“What gave you the impression Mr. Smythe is staying for work?”

Molly pressed her lips together and shot a glance at Mrs. Fraser.

The older woman finished transferring oatmeal into a server and set it on the tray. “He asked us all to be upstairs before breakfast for another announcement.”

Cate’s jaw flapped open. “Another announcement?”

“Mmm, that’s what he said,” Mrs. Fraser said with a nod.

“I’m not certain I can take another announcement,” Jack said, running his fingers through his hair.

“You and me both,” Cate said. “I suppose we should head up.”

Mrs. Fraser nodded, lifting a tray filled with bowls and utensils. "I suppose. I personally miss the days when announcements were not made."

Cate glanced around the kitchen in search of the tea and teacups. "Is there something I can carry?" Cate asked.

"Nay, you know better than that. If it's tea you're in search of, it's already upstairs. Your husband is an early riser, and he's been with Mr. Smythe for over an hour."

Cate sucked in a deep breath as she shuffled behind the women carrying their breakfast. She shot a nervous glance at Jack.

"You ready for this?" he whispered.

"I don't know. But stay after. We need to talk."

Jack nodded as they paraded up the stairs and to the library. Mr. Smythe sat with paperwork spread around him. Gayle tapped around on her laptop in the chair next to him. Marcus stared out the window in front of the desk, sipping his tea.

"Breakfast, everyone," Mrs. Fraser announced as she bustled through the doors.

"Thank you," Mr. Smythe said without glancing up from his papers.

Marcus flicked his gaze to them as they entered, his lips curling into a smile as Cate entered. "Good morning." He set his teacup in the saucer and slid it onto the desk. "Good morning, Catherine, did you sleep well?"

"Yes, thank you."

He clasped her shoulder and rubbed it. "Good. There is news. Sit down."

Cate took a seat on the sofa as Marcus strode across the room, pouring a cup of tea and adding sugar before passing it to her. She accepted the drink, sipping at it as she studied the attorney.

He tugged off his reading glasses and set the paperwork aside. "I am sorry to have called you all together again, but there is news. And, as this affects everyone, I felt it easiest to tell you all at once."

"Yes, of course, Mr. Smythe," Cate said. "What is it?"

"Has there been any progress on verifying the marriage?" Molly asked as she sank onto the arm of the sofa.

"Nothing is open yet in the States, but I will call the moment it is," Gayle said with a smile and a flutter of her eyelashes.

The woman's second gesture made Cate's heart skip a beat. Bad news loomed. She flicked her gaze to Marcus, who, as always, appeared unflustered.

“What is the news, Mr. Smythe?” she asked.

Mr. Smythe pressed his lips into a thin line. “Assuming the marriage is verified, a new issue has cropped up.”

“Which is?” Cate inquired with raised eyebrows.

Mr. Smythe licked his lips, scanning the group. “Ms. Caruso is challenging the claim.”

“What?” Molly questioned.

“How?” Jack asked.

“Can she legally do that? We’ve met the terms of the codicil,” Cate said.

“She isn’t challenging the will,” Mr. Smythe said, “she’s challenging your marriage. She’s suing you for fraud.”

CHAPTER 6

Cate choked on her tea, sputtering a cough out as she lowered the teacup to the saucer. “Fraud?”

Marcus slid a hand onto Cate’s shoulder and squeezed.

“Whoa,” Molly shouted. “What? How?”

Mr. Smythe huffed out a sigh and shook his head. “She has managed to find an attorney willing to claim that your marriage is a sham. Preposterous, I know, however, they may convince a judge to take the case. Though even if they do, I would be surprised if it made it to trial.” He lowered his gaze, flicking his eyebrows up and cocking his head. “Though stranger things have happened.”

“How can she do this? On what basis?” Molly babbled.

Jack studied Mr. Smythe. “How likely is it that it doesn’t make it to trial?”

“That’s hard to say. I’m surprised any attorney would file this, though, some have no scruples.”

“This is insane,” Molly exclaimed, pacing the floor.

Cate grabbed her hand and squeezed it. She eased onto the sofa next to Cate, wrapping her arm around her.

“Mr. Smythe, can you explain what exactly she’s accusing us of?” Cate asked, patting Molly’s hand.

“Simply put, she claims your marriage is fraudulent. Designed only to collect the inheritance.”

Molly let her hand slap against her thigh. “How can that be? She was married five years before she inherited this place! How could she know?”

Mr. Smythe nodded at the statement. “The case could be made that she was aware of the familial connection, knew about the provision, and married to ensure her inheritance.”

“But I didn’t know,” Cate said while Molly exclaimed, “That’s ridiculous.”

Jack sighed, scrubbing his face with his hands.

“I’m merely suggesting how the other side may frame this. It’s my job to anticipate their next move and counter it.”

“So, what do we do?” Cate asked.

“Yeah, how can you prove they didn’t marry for money and that they really love each other?” Molly asked.

Cate shot Marcus an uncomfortable glance, heat rising in her cheeks. The corners of his lips turned up, and he squeezed her shoulder again.

Mr. Smythe slid several documents toward him and tapped his index finger against them. “We can make a strong case to ask for a dismissal.”

Molly crinkled her nose. “How?” She flicked her gaze to Cate. “Oh, sorry.”

“It’s fine. Molly makes a good point. How?”

“On top of the fact that you married nearly five years before your inheritance, we have several other things that play in our favor. We can make the case that your separate addresses were due strictly to your employment. And, of course, His Grace’s will can be used. We have not yet discussed your will and it would appear disingenuous to create it now, though we should deal with it after this matter has concluded.”

Cate scrunched her eyebrows. “I’m sorry, Marcus’s will?”

“Yes,” Mr. Smythe said, retrieving the papers he’d patted earlier and waving them. “In most instances of fraudulent marriages, assets are kept separately, however, since yours are not, we have a solid case that the union is legitimate.”

“What do you mean ours are not?” Cate inquired.

“Oh, my apologies, I assumed you were aware. Since one month following your nuptials, all estate assets are bequeathed to you and/or any children from your union, including...” He flipped through the document. “All monetary assets, which are substantial, the Stratfordshire estate, the Wintervale country estate, the London townhouse, the Maine estate, the house in Martinique, and Rosenberg Palace.”

Cate’s eyelashes fluttered as he read the list. Jack slow-blinked before flicking a stunned gaze in Cate’s direction.

“Whoa,” Molly murmured, “that’s a lot of houses.”

“Right, of course,” Cate breathed out.

“Again, in situations where fraud is being committed, typically there is a separation of assets so that one party cannot benefit from the phony marriage. Or there is a pre-nuptial agreement in place to prevent the distribution of assets.”

“And no such agreement exists,” Marcus said. “Catherine and I wed for genuine reasons.”

Mr. Smythe nodded. “Which is why I believe we’ll have a solid rationale to request this claim be dismissed.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod.

“What will happen if they don’t dismiss the case?” Jack inquired.

“There will be a trial and the judge will make a determination,” Mr. Smythe said.

“What are our chances in a trial?” Cate asked.

“Good, though I think we stand a good chance of avoiding that as well.”

“Does it matter that no one really knew about our marriage?” Cate questioned.

Mr. Smythe knit his brow. “No. Obviously, some people knew. We can ask them for statements to present if we need them. The other side may try to argue that the secrecy indicates deceit on your part, but a statement from the dowager Duchess should put that to rest.”

“Anna?” Cate asked, her eyebrows shooting up.

“Of course, dear. Mother would be happy to attest to our nuptials. You know how she feels about you.”

“The dowager Duchess is fond of her?” Mr. Smythe asked, clicking his pen and pressing it to the paper.

“Mother adores Catherine. And of course, she would be happy to provide the necessary documents to prove that our little Riley,” Marcus said, scooping up the small dog and stroking his fur, “was mothered by her beloved Athena and given to Catherine as a wedding present.”

“Excellent, yes, that is excellent. It’s those sorts of details that will make the authenticity of your union obvious.” Mr. Smythe scribbled a few notes onto his legal pad before he clicked the pen again and stuffed it into his suit jacket pocket.

He gathered his notes and slid them into the briefcase. "If you don't mind, I will set up a temporary workspace in your office."

"Not at all."

Mrs. Fraser rose, adjusting her skirt and motioning to the oatmeal tureen. "And please take some breakfast. You'll need food to help with your work."

Gayle rose and smiled at the woman. "Thank you, Mrs. Fraser. I'll prepare food for both of us. Mr. Smythe, I will meet you in just a few moments."

He nodded at the petite blonde before scurrying from the room, already pressing his cell phone to his ear.

"I'll help you carry the meal, Gayle," Mrs. Fraser said, pouring more tea into their teacups and loading them onto a tray.

"Oh, thank you, that would be lovely."

Molly patted Cate's shoulder. "I should head downstairs and finish the breakfast clean up."

Cate rose as Molly did and offered her a hug. "Thanks, Molly."

"Stay strong, honey."

"Thank you," Cate said with a smile.

"You wanted me to stay?" Jack asked.

"Yes," Cate said with a nod. "If you have the time."

"I've got nothing but time. No one will let me do anything."

"Good," Cate said, raising her eyebrows. "You shouldn't be working yet."

"She's right. Better listen to the boss," Molly said with a grin.

"Guess I'll be down to sit around and steal cookies when we're finished. Better get some of those scotchies in the oven. They're my favorite. Don't tell Mrs. Fraser."

"I wouldn't dream of it. As far as she's concerned, you're a shortbread-or-die guy." Molly winked at him before she strode from the room with Mr. Fraser.

Jack smiled at her as she pulled the doors closed behind her.

Cate collapsed into the chair behind her, heaving a sigh as Marcus poured himself another cup of tea. He arched an eyebrow at her. "Drink your tea, Catherine."

Cate raised her gaze to him. "Don't tell me to drink my tea. We're being sued for committing fraud."

"Wrongfully."

Cate flicked her eyebrows up.

Marcus stirred milk into his tea. "We are being wrongfully sued."

Cate leapt from her seat. "Except we're not. We committed fraud. We didn't get married six years ago, we got married two days ago for the exclusive purpose of maintaining control of Dunhaven Castle."

"Yes, but only you, me, and the gardener know that."

Jack screwed up his face, snapping his gaze at Marcus. "Hey."

"He's not my gardener," Cate said through clenched teeth with her hands on her hips.

"My point, Catherine, is that to the rest of the world, we have not committed fraud. To the rest of the world, we have been happily married for nearly six years."

Cate rubbed at her temples, sucking in a deep breath. "What if we can't prove that?"

"We can. The burden lies on them. There is no way we could have known when Gertrude MacKenzie could die. If our marriage was fraudulent you'd likely not be named in my will as the sole beneficiary. There's the story about Riley. All the appropriate things are in place to assure a positive result."

Cate sank onto the sofa, blowing out a long breath. Her brow crinkled, and she glanced up at him. "Yeah, how is that working with Riley? How did he get to that pet store?"

Marcus rolled his eyes at her. "Honestly, Catherine. I took Riley to that store and paid the woman to sell him to you."

Cate arched an eyebrow. Jack shot her a glance, his features pinched.

"And when did you add me to your will?"

"One month after we wed. Have you not been paying attention, dear?"

Cate offered him an annoyed glance.

"What's the out?" Jack asked.

"Excuse me?" Marcus shot back.

"There has to be an out. Something that prevents her from actually claiming your estate in the event that something happens. I'm just trying to figure out what The Agency will throw out there next."

Marcus sipped his tea, stalking to the window and staring out at the rain that now steadily fell from the gray skies. "There is no such 'out' as you put it."

"So," Jack said, narrowing his eyes at the man as he tapped his chin, "if you were to drop over dead, Cate would inherit your entire estate?"

Marcus twisted to stare at him, arching an eyebrow. "You're cleverer than you look."

Cate shot Jack an unimpressed stare.

"I'm sorry, I'm a bit shocked is all," Jack said, flinging a hand in the air.

"I don't see why. It is, after all, my duty to ensure that in the event of my demise, my lovely wife is well taken care of."

"I suppose that makes it look legitimate," Cate said with a sigh, rising from the couch and stalking across the room. She rubbed a hand across her forehead. "Let's hope it works."

"It will work," Marcus assured her.

She nodded without speaking.

"Catherine," he said, approaching her, "it will work. You must stop fretting over the things we already have in hand."

She flicked her gaze to him. "Do we? We didn't expect to be sued for fraud."

"Yes, we did. I told you they would try multiple angles. This is a distraction. To stop you from tracking the source of the problem." He raised his eyebrows. "And it appears to be working."

"It isn't. But we have to deal with this unanticipated problem."

"It has been dealt with. And now we must focus on others."

Cate furrowed her brow as she slid her gaze to the window again.

"Focus, Catherine."

"Ease off. Give her a minute," Jack shouted from across the room. He stormed toward Cate, wrapping an arm around her. "Why don't you sit down, Cate?"

Marcus huffed out a breath as Jack spun her away from the window.

"This is why I suggested you not be involved. The Agency will not attack you on one level. They will throw a dozen things at you at once. They have the resources to do so. And if you cannot prioritize you will lose."

"That's enough!" Jack barked.

Cate wrapped her arms around her midriff and shook her head, pressing her lips into a thin line. "He's right."

"Cate—"

Cate cut her gaze to Jack. "No, he's right." Cate sucked in a deep breath and shifted her focus to Marcus. "Okay, what do we need to do?"

"You need to stop fretting over our marriage and allow the measures already in place to do their work. Then we need to attempt to track down Gertrude and remove her from The Agency's reach."

Cate licked her lips and nodded. "Right."

"And how exactly do you propose we do that?"

"By following the clues," Marcus said after another sip of his tea.

"Which means what, exactly? And how does this solve our problem?"

Marcus narrowed his eyes and stared at Jack before he cut his gaze to Cate. "Must we include him?"

"Now, just a minute—" Jack began, wagging a finger at Marcus.

Cate pressed a hand against his chest, stopping him.

"Yes, we must," Cate answered.

Marcus arched an eyebrow, his lips forming a frown.

"Humor me," she said.

With another sigh, he nodded. "Fine. Let me explain it as though you were a child. We must determine where The Agency is holding Gertrude. She could be anywhere."

"Or in any time," Cate added.

"Correct, Catherine. We must begin with the limited information we have and use it along with my considerable skills and resources to continue to track the woman until we find her. Once we do, we must convince her to restore the original will."

Jack wrinkled his nose, frowning at Marcus.

"So, the intention is to return things back to normal. Back to Cate not being married to you."

"The intention is to restore history to the original version as closely as possible," Marcus answered.

The two men glared at each other.

Cate held her hands in the air. "Okay, what clues do we have?"

Marcus tore his eyes away from Jack, fixing them on Cate. He slid his phone from his pocket and toggled on the display. "We have this man leaving the offices of Smythe, Smith, and Smithon in 2009."

Cate stared at the pixelated image on the screen. "So, we go to 2009."

Marcus shook his head. "This man is in the employ of this man." He flicked to another picture.

Cate stared at the smiling face of a middle-aged man. She narrowed her eyes at the picture, cocking her head.

"So, we find this guy? How?" Jack asked.

Cate pointed a finger at the display. "Didn't we see him at The Business Summit?"

Marcus's lips curled into a smile. "Very good, Catherine."

"Arnold Chapman, oil exec," Cate said.

Marcus raised his eyebrows. "Very impressive, dear. Yes. Arnold Chapman."

"So, he's our first lead," Cate said. "How can we get access to him?"

"Now, you're focused," he said with a wink.

"If we know when the fake will was planted, why not just intercept it?" Jack asked.

"Because that does little to solve the overall issue, doesn't it?" Marcus answered. "We need to determine if they have Gertrude and where. We'll start with Arnold Chapman."

"And where will we find him?" Cate pressed.

"I happen to know he's hosting a party on May 15, 1956, at his London home."

"When do we leave?" Cate asked.

Jack rubbed his chin. "We need time to plan. And time to drive to London."

Marcus squinted at him before sliding his eyes to Cate. "Must we take him?"

Cate cocked her head, tugging back one corner of her lips.

Marcus rolled his eyes with a disgusted sigh. "Fine."

"There's no way you're taking Cate to London without me," Jack said, crossing his arms.

"I assume you have an invitation to this party," Cate asked.

"Of course. For myself and my wife."

"Whoa, just a minute," Jack said.

Cate fluttered her eyelashes at Marcus. "Surely you can manage an invitation for your good friend, Jack."

Marcus pressed his lips into a thin line. "I am a warlock, Catherine, not a miracle worker."

Cate crossed her arms, eyeing him with an unimpressed stare.

He sighed, glancing at the rain falling from the skies. "I'm certain I will manage an invite for the gardener."

"He's not—"

Marcus held his hand up. "I know, I know."

Jack rubbed his chin. "That still doesn't solve the problem of driving. We'll need to go back, leaving time to drive, go to the party, investigate, and drive back. Now, we've done days in the past before, but we'll need to let everyone know we're unreachable for a few hours at least—"

"That's not necessary," Cate said with a shake of her head.

Jack furrowed his brow. "What do you mean? The party is in London."

"Marcus has the ability to open time portals that end up wherever we'd like whenever we'd like."

The confused expression on Jack's face morphed into astonishment. "So..." His lower lip bobbed up and down but no more words came out.

"We should talk about that because they're quite different than traveling through our time rips," Cate said.

"Obviously," Jack huffed out. "So, we'll only need the time for the party. We may be only gone for a few minutes then, right?"

Marcus groaned and rolled his eyes as he stalked away. "I'll leave you to explain this. We should leave as soon as possible."

"We'll be ready in a few minutes," Cate answered as he strode from the room. He offered her a nod and pulled the doors closed behind him.

Jack wandered across the room and collapsed into an armchair. He scrubbed his face with his hands. "This is insane."

Cate eased into the chair across from him. "And it's about to get crazier."

CHAPTER 7

Jack snapped his gaze to Cate. “What? Why?”
He let his head fall back onto the thick cushion behind him and covered his face. “Oh, maybe don’t tell me. I don’t want to know.”

Cate sucked in a breath, allowing him a moment to settle.

He uncovered his face, sliding his eyes to hers. “The fact that you took me up on that is more disturbing.”

Cate offered him an amused smile. “It’s not that bad. It’s just different.”

Jack blew out a long breath before he pursed his lips. “Okay, so...no more time differential?”

Cate shook her head with a tight-lipped smile. “No.”

“So, that’s worse, right? Now we will be missing for however long this party is, at least. That could be hours.”

With another head shake, Cate dismissed his concern. He crinkled his brow.

“Marcus can just return us to a few minutes after we left.”

Jack lowered his chin to his chest. “Seriously?”

“Yep,” Cate said, sucking in a deep breath. “The first time we traveled back to the 40s, we came back and I burst in here demanding to know how much progress Damien, Michael, and Celine had made. They looked at me like I was crazy. It had only been about five minutes since we’d left.”

“Wow,” Jack said, laying his head back on the cushion. “So, no more fifteen minutes to one, instead, just instantaneous return.”

Cate bobbed her head up and down. “Yep. We can now live multiple days in the span of just minutes.”

“Wonderful,” Jack groaned.

“There’s something else,” Cate said.

Jack rolled his head toward her. “I’m afraid to ask.”

“The time portals are quite different from ours, too. In addition to not being distorted—“

“And opening in any time or place,” Jack said, wagging a finger at her, “which is still weirding me out, by the way.”

“Right. In addition to those things...” Cate paused to suck in a deep breath and lick her lips. “When Marcus opens the portal, it’s a bit... turbulent.”

Jack’s eyebrows shot up. “Turbulent? Care to elaborate?”

Cate chewed her lower lip, eyeing him for a moment. “It starts small. But...when the portal begins to open, there’s a lot of wind and noise. A black hole expands until it’s large enough to step through.”

Jack slow-blinked. “A giant black hole with winds whipping. Sounds... wonderful.”

“It’s not so bad, but it can be nerve-wracking the first time it happens. Now, once the portal is open, and this is really important, when you go into the portal, do not stop walking until you come out on the other side.”

“Don’t stop walking. Why?”

“Because Marcus also enters the portal behind us. Once he steps out of the portal on the other side, it closes automatically. If it closes with you inside of it, you may get lost between times.”

“For how long?”

Cate crinkled her nose. “Possibly forever.”

Jack’s eyes slid closed. Cate reached out and grabbed his hand, squeezing it. His eyes popped open, and he returned the gesture. “What in the world have we gotten ourselves mixed up in?”

Cate patted his hand and smiled. “I know it’ll seem weird, but we’ll get through it. It’s not as bad as it seems, I promise.”

“Says you. I can’t believe you’ve done this before and were okay with it. You are definitely the braver one of us, Cate Kensie.”

“I was far from okay,” Cate said with a chuckle, “but I couldn’t let them have you. You didn’t deserve that.”

“It’s so bizarre.”

“You’ll get used to the portal.”

“Not that,” Jack said, leaning forward, still clutching Cate’s hand. “The whole thing about me being missing. I was here one minute and just gone the next. But people think I was gone for a week.”

“I know. When I found the newspaper, I couldn’t believe it. And no one else remembered you being here. Not even Stanley.”

“Thank goodness you did.”

Cate offered him a tight-lipped smile and a nod. “And as much as you don’t want to hear this, thank goodness for Marcus and his experience.”

“You’re right,” Jack said, slumping in the chair, “I don’t want to hear it.”

“I know it’s strange.”

“No. It’s more than strange. The last time I saw that guy he nabbed you from the castle and then put you in a...never mind. Never mind. Let’s focus on moving forward. I’m going to need all my sanity to get through this time portal stuff.”

“You get used to it. I’ve done it a dozen times at this point and look,” she said, waving her hands in the air, “I’m fine!”

“A dozen times?” Jack questioned.

Cate nodded. “1942, 1955, 1965, 2013, 1810, and of course, 2014.”

Jack batted his eyelashes at the list. “What?”

“We started in 1942 following Gianna. We went to 1955 where several Agency members were at a summit, then 1965 to warn my grandparents to leave. And by the way, I met my father when he was five.” She grinned and chuckled as she recalled the memory. “Then 2013, and then 1810 where we found you.”

“Why 2013? What’s the connection?”

The smile waned on Cate’s lips and she flicked her gaze to the floor. “Uh...”

“Cate?” Jack questioned, leaning forward and balancing his elbows on his knees.

“We followed Gianna around to multiple time periods in search of you. She...” Cate slicked a lock of hair behind her ear. “She said she’d tell us where you were if we went to 2013. She wanted...” Cate pressed her lips together, flexing her jaw as she kept her eyes trained on the area rug. “She wanted me to witness my parents’ fatal accident.”

Jack closed his eyes, shaking his head as he reached for her hand.

She grabbed it and squeezed it. "I'm okay."

"I'm sorry you had to go through that. And alone, nonetheless." He offered her a tight-lipped smile.

She snapped her gaze up to his face. "I wasn't alone."

"Cate, you may as well have been."

Cate shook her head, letting her gaze fall again. "No. Marcus was... kind and sympathetic."

"Two words I'd never have expected to hear associated with that guy."

"I know it seems weird, but...in that horrible moment, I was glad to have him there."

Jack heaved a sigh. "Well, I suppose we don't have much time to prepare."

"There's not much to prepare," Cate said.

"Well, I need to use the little time we have left to fret. I've lost a precious amount of time and I've got a lot to agonize over. The new time portals, working with the Duke..."

Cate chuckled as his voice trailed off. Before she could respond, the door burst open.

Marcus strode inside with Andrea in tow. "Has he been adequately prepared?"

Cate nodded as she rose to her feet. "Yes, he's aware of the new portal, what to expect, and how it works."

Marcus arched his eyebrows. "He knows the very important rule?"

Cate bobbed her head up and down, sliding her hand forward. "Straight through, don't stop until you reach the other side."

"Very good." Marcus glanced outside. "The weather is not suitable to leave from our usual spot."

"You mean you can't control that?" Cate asked.

He flicked his gaze to her, an amused smile playing on her lips. "I wouldn't want to show off. Perhaps another suitable spot?"

"The mausoleum?" Cate suggested with a shrug. "It's private and we can get there through the secret passage."

"Excellent suggestion. We should go now," Marcus said as he strode toward the door.

"Seriously? You're okay with going to the mausoleum with...him?" Jack thrust a finger toward him.

Cate glanced over her shoulder and nodded. "Yeah. It's okay. We've already been there together once before."

"After a minor tantrum, Catherine and I worked out our issues regarding that incident."

"It wasn't a tantrum," Cate said with a roll of her eyes as they stepped into the hall and crossed to the wall sconce that triggered the secret passage leading to the mausoleum.

"You raised your voice at me, and I believe you even stamped your foot," he said as she opened the passage.

They stepped inside with Andrea following them.

"Wait, is she going with us?" Jack asked, thumbing toward her.

"Yes, of course," Marcus answered, pushing the panel closed. "Catherine will need her ladies' maid."

"We should have brought a—" Jack began when Marcus conjured a fireball into existence. The ethereal blue light lit the passage, blinding Jack. "Flashlight."

"I come equipped with one," Marcus said as he pushed past Jack. "Come along."

Cate fluttered her eyelashes and shrugged as they fell in line behind Marcus.

Within minutes, they climbed the grade up to the secret entrance to the mausoleum. Damp air met them as they stepped into the crypt. Wind gusted outside already, blowing the rain around.

Thunder boomed overhead as Marcus spun to face them. "Are we ready?"

Jack glanced up, wincing. Cate wrapped an arm around his waist. "You'll be fine."

Marcus narrowed his eyes at them. "Catherine, you will go first—"

"No, Jack will go first, then Andrea, then me, then you."

Marcus puckered his lips and stared at her for a moment. "Fine. Mr. Reid, when I give you the word, straight through, understood?"

"Yes," Jack answered. Cate squeezed his shoulder as Marcus spun away from them, raising his hands in front of him. A trace of a breeze tickled their skin, and a tiny black dot appeared in front of him. It grew larger and the wind swelled.

Cate's hair blew wildly as the twinkling black hole gaped open.

"It's open!" Marcus shouted over the din.

“Go!” Cate said, pushing Jack forward. “Remember, no stopping!”

He nodded, squinting against the wind gusts. “See you on the other side.”

Cate smiled and waved him forward. He gave her one final glance before his chest expanded with a deep breath. He lifted his foot. It hovered in the air for a moment before he stepped forward, disappearing into the blackness. Andrea followed him.

Cate waited for a second after she disappeared before stepping into the darkness. She continued forward for a few steps before the blackness fell away.

Candlelight flickered in the small, windowless room as she stepped from the portal. Jack gaped around the space, his brow furrowed.

“Cate, thank God,” he said, racing toward her and pulling her into a hug. “That was...odd.”

“We made it. I told you it wouldn’t be that bad.”

“Bad enough,” Jack said, letting go of her. “Where are we?”

“London house,” Cate said as Marcus joined them.

“I see we’ve all made it,” he said, adjusting his suit jacket. “Good. We should dress immediately. We leave in an hour.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod. She stepped to the wall and opened the panel accessing the hall.

Dembe awaited them, offering a bow as they stepped into the foyer. “Duke,” he said with another bow before he repeated the gesture to Cate. “Duchess.”

Cate smiled at him. “Hi, Dembe.”

“Good evening, Dembe. Is everything prepared?”

“Yes, Duke,” Dembe said with a nod.

“Excellent. Will you assist Mr. Reid with dressing for the evening?”

Jack waved his hand in the air. “Oh, I don’t need—“

Marcus twisted to face him, his eyebrow arched high.

“Thanks,” Jack said with a nod and a hard swallow. “I’d be glad for the help.”

“This way, Mr. Reid,” Dembe said, waving his hand toward the stairs.

“After you,” Jack said.

“Catherine, a moment,” Marcus said.

“I shall wait in your room, Your Grace,” Andrea said as she headed for the stairs.

Jack cleared his throat as he glanced between them before he grabbed the railing. With a huff, he followed Dembe.

Cate closed the gap between her and Marcus. "What's up?"

Marcus reached into his interior pocket and removed a velvet box. "Please wear this tonight."

Cate accepted the box, her eyes trained on it. "Is this the sapphire necklace?"

"Yes. We do not know what we will encounter. I'd like you to have the added protection."

"Okay, thanks," Cate said, smiling up at him. She pressed her lips together, not moving.

"Is there something you'd like to say?" he asked her.

She stared up at him through her eyelashes. "What about Jack?"

"I hardly think the necklace would suit him."

Cate pressed her lips together and shook her head. "You know what I mean."

"I will make every effort to ensure no harm comes to him."

Cate nodded, flicking her gaze down to the marble floor.

Marcus tipped her chin up. "I promise."

Cate offered him a tight-lipped smile. "Thank you."

She glanced over her shoulder at him as she strode toward the railing and climbed to the second floor, navigating to her bedroom and pushing inside. Andrea smoothed a sapphire evening gown across the bed.

"Ready, Your Grace?" she asked, straightening and clasping her hands in front of her.

"Yes," Cate said, handing off the jewelry case to her before she sat at the vanity.

"Your jewelry?"

"Yes," Cate said as Andrea approached.

"Is it a new piece?"

"No. My sapphire necklace."

Andrea offered her a coy smile through the mirror. "Oh, that's a lovely one."

"Yes, it is," Cate said as Andrea began to style her hair.

Within twenty minutes, Andrea had swept her hair into a style popular for the era, settling a tiara around the high bun. Cate rose from her chair to change.

“It’s a lovely dress, Your Grace,” Andrea said as she fastened the dress in the back. “You look beautiful in it. Blue is your color.”

“Thank you, Andrea.”

“It reminds me of the gown you wore to your wedding celebration in 1810.”

Cate studied her reflection in the mirror as memories of the ball flitted across her mind, bringing a smile to her face. “Yes, the color is similar.”

Andrea snapped open the jewelry case as Cate slipped into her shoes.

“Just a moment, I’ll fasten them.”

“I’ve got it,” Cate said, sinking onto the bed and lifting her foot. The folds of fabric made it impossible to reach her ankle easily. “Okay, I need your help.”

Andrea chuckled as she laid the sapphire necklace on the bed next to Cate and squatted to fasten the ankle straps of Cate’s heels. “You should know better, Your Grace. This is what ladies’ maids are for.”

“Yes, I really should by now.” Cate reached for the necklace next to her, her fingers caressing the blue gems. A shiver snaked down her spine, and she shuddered.

“Your Grace?” Andrea asked.

Her voice sounded miles away. Cate swallowed hard as she struggled to keep her eyes open. Her eyelids fluttered as images flitted across her mind faster than she could process them. She gasped in a breath and pressed her hands to her temples as pain shot across her forehead.

The pressure increased in her head before her eyes rolled back, and she collapsed backward onto the bed.

CHAPTER 8

“Your Grace?” Andrea’s voice called into the blackness. Warm hands tapped against Cate’s cheeks as she flicked her eyes open.

With a moan, she pinched her features and fluttered her eyelids, trying to focus. The room filled in around her. She lay on her back in her bedroom at the London house with Andrea’s concerned features hovering over her.

“Oh, Your Grace, thank heavens.” Andrea pressed a hand against her chest and heaved a sigh of relief. “Let me fetch His Grace.”

“No!” Cate exclaimed, reaching for Andrea’s hand and squeezing it. “No, please don’t tell him anything.”

“But Your Grace—”

“Please,” Cate said, pulling herself up to sit. “I’m fine. I just...I haven’t eaten at all today. I got lightheaded.”

Andrea stared at her for a moment, the concern still etched in her features. “I should fetch you something to eat, then.”

“No, really. I’m okay. I’m sure I’ll eat at the party.”

Andrea flicked her gaze to the floor, chewing her lower lip.

“Really, Andrea, I’m fine.” She glanced into the mirror and winced. “Oh, I’ve mussed the lovely job you did on my hair though. I’m sorry.”

“Not to worry, Your Grace, I can fix that easily.”

“Thank you,” Cate said as she pushed herself to stand.

Andrea grabbed her hand, steadying her. “Are you quite certain you feel all right?”

“Yes, I’m perfectly fine,” Cate answered, forcing a smile onto her face as she plopped onto the chair at the dressing table. Still clutched in her hands, the necklace clattered around the wooden top.

Cate uncurled her fingers, staring at the object. When she had temporalysis, it triggered her visions. Was it doing that again?

“Just set that down and I’ll fasten it the moment I finish with your hair.”

Cate dumped it on the table, pulling her fingers back with a frown before she quickly replaced it with a pleasant smile. “Thank you.”

Within minutes, Andrea had her hair perfected and had fastened the necklace around her neck. Cate stared at it for a moment, afraid to touch it. Although the contact of the gems against her skin did not trigger anything wooziness at the moment.

Cate bit her lower lip and stared into the blue gems for a moment.

Andrea’s voice pulled her back to reality. “Your Grace? Anything else?”

“Oh, no,” she said, plastering a smile on her lips.

Andrea offered her a nod. “I will meet you downstairs with your gloves and bag.”

“Thank you,” Cate called as Andrea ducked out the door. She spun to stare at the necklace again. First a nightmare, then another episode that seemed to be triggered by touching the sapphires. Her heart thudded against her ribs, and her stomach turned over. Something was amiss.

Her palms turned sweaty, and she wondered if another case of temporalysis may have infected her. Perhaps the last one never subsided. Her forehead pinched as she considered it. She shook her head, dismissing it from her mind. She had to get through this evening. She wouldn’t mention it to anyone before then.

She pushed herself up to stand, her legs weak when she stepped away from the vanity. She closed her eyes, sucking in a steadying breath before she pushed herself forward to the door and slipped into the hall.

The sound of another door closing drew her attention across the hall.

Jack emerged in a tuxedo. “Wow, that’s some dress.”

“Thank you,” she said with a smile.

His eyes landed on the ostentatious necklace, and he frowned. “Is that what I think it is?”

Cate glanced down before nodding. “Yeah.”

“You’ve got to be kidding me. Turn around, I’ll take it off.”

“No,” she said, waving the comment away, “it’s okay.”

“No, it’s not. If this is some kind of weird power trip for him—“

“It isn’t. The necklace has some sort of protective power.”

Jack screwed up his face.

“Apparently, Marcus gave it to me so that nothing would happen to me in the crypt.”

Jack wrinkled his lips into a disdain-filled frown. “I hate this.”

Cate eyed him for a moment before she grabbed his hand and squeezed.

“It’ll get better. I promise.”

Jack shook his head, avoiding her gaze.

“We’d better head down.”

“Right,” Jack said with a nod as they walked toward the stairs. “Let’s see if we can get the world back to normal so we can end this charade.”

Cate forced a smile onto her face before she picked up her skirts and descended to the first floor. Voices floated from the sitting room when she rounded the banister and stepped inside with Jack trailing behind her.

“Catherine, there you are. You look stunning,” Marcus said as she entered. He crossed to her and kissed her cheek.

“Thank you. Hello, Mr. Smythe,” she said to the other man in the room. “I don’t believe you’ve met our friend, Jack Reid. Jack, this is Charles Smythe.”

“Good evening, Your Grace,” he said with a nod of his head before he swallowed the last of his brandy and set the glass on the bar. He thrust his hand out toward Jack. “Reid? Scottish?”

“You know it,” Jack said with a grin as he pumped the man’s hand up and down.

“I know a few Reids from Dunhaven. Any relation?”

“No,” Marcus answered flatly.

Charles turned his head toward him with a nod. “I see. Well, I will messenger the paperwork to you tomorrow.”

“Good.”

Mr. Smythe offered them all a good night and strode from the room. Jack’s brow crinkled. “Was that...”

“William Smythe’s father, yes,” Cate said with a nod.

“The resemblance is uncanny,” Jack said with a flick of his eyebrows.

“I thought so, too.”

“Are we ready?” Marcus asked, setting down his brandy glass. “The car is waiting.”

“Yep,” Cate answered as they shuffled into the foyer where Dembe and Andrea awaited them with coats. “Do we know who else we may see at this event?”

“Undoubtedly several members of The Agency will be present. If we find no evidence within Mr. Chapman’s home, perhaps we’ll stumble upon another lead,” Marcus said as Dembe slid his overcoat on.

“Stumble upon? That doesn’t sound like you,” Cate answered, pulling her gloves on after Andrea secured her capelet.

Marcus offered her a smirk. “There are several key people I would like to engage in a discussion.”

Cate arched an eyebrow at him as she accepted her evening bag from Andrea. “That sounds like you. Do you think Gianna will be there?”

“If she’s gotten word you will be, I imagine she’ll put in an appearance.”

“What does that mean?”

“It means she loves to goad you. And she will not miss out on the opportunity to do so.”

“Wonderful,” Cate groaned with a roll of her eyes.

“Do not let her provoke you. She’s pushing you to make a mistake that she can capitalize on. Do not give her the opportunity.”

“Right,” she answered with a sigh, eyeing the swirls on the marble floor.

“Catherine,” Marcus said, tipping her chin up, “keep your wits about you.”

Cate nodded. “I will.”

“Shall we?” he asked as he offered his arm.

She smiled at him as she slid her arm through his, flicking her gaze to Jack. He stared at them, an expression of disbelief on his features.

“Jack? Are you okay?”

“Uhh, yeah,” he said, rubbing the back of his neck. “Yeah, ready. Let’s go find some clues.”

Cate smiled and nodded at him, reaching out to grab his hand and squeeze it before they strode into the spring night.

Cate slid into the backseat, gathering her skirts before the driver eased the door closed. Marcus entered next to her, leaving Jack in the front seat. The car eased away from the curb and snaked through the streets of London to the home of Arnold Chapman.

Cate stared up at the starry night sky as her fingers drummed the seat next to her. Her stomach jittered as the buildings rolled past her window.

Warm fingers wrapped around hers and squeezed. She cut her gaze to Marcus, and he offered her a smile. "Calm yourself, Catherine."

"I'm calm," she answered.

He arched an eyebrow at her. She pressed her lips together as she realized her pounding heart gave her away. Jack shot them a glance over his shoulder, his brow furrowing.

Cate sucked in a deep breath, trying to bring her heart rate back down. "There, see?" she asked as her heart returned to a normal rhythm.

The car slowed to a stop outside of a stately home. Marcus squeezed her hand again before he climbed from the car and circled it. He reached a hand inside to help her from the car as Jack stepped out, tugging at his collar.

Marcus scrunched his nose at Jack. "Stop fiddling with your collar like an ape."

"These are not the most comfortable things."

"You'll survive," Marcus shot back with a roll of his eyes.

Jack narrowed his eyes at the man. Cate stepped onto the pavement, and Jack offered his arm to her.

Marcus raised his eyebrows. "I think not, Mack."

"It's Jack, Pal."

Marcus frowned at him. "I am not your pal."

Jack inched closer. "Cate can make her choice."

"I'm not certain you will like the outcome of that," Marcus shot back.

Jack scoffed at the statement. "You don't know Cate Kensie."

Marcus stood taller, stepping closer to him. "You don't know Catherine Northcott."

Cate shook her head, stepping between them. "Enough. Let's go. We have work to do."

Marcus offered his arm as did Jack.

"This is ridiculous, Reid. It would look more than questionable for another man to escort her when her husband is available."

Jack puckered his lips. "It's your call, Cate. Whatever you're comfortable with."

Cate swallowed hard, flicking her gaze between them as heat rose into her cheeks. "Marcus is right. It would look odd and most of these people think we're married."

“We are married, dear.”

Jack hesitated for a moment before he nodded. “As long as you’re comfortable.”

Cate forced a smile as she slid her arm into the crook of Marcus’s. “I’m fine.”

They strode to the door, pushing into the din of the party inside. Guests circulated in the nearby sitting room, talking and laughing.

Marcus surveyed the scene before leading Cate toward Arnold Chapman who already approached them. Cate glanced over her shoulder at Jack. “Stay close.”

“Well, do my eyes deceive me, or is that Marcus Northcott I see,” Arnold said with a broad grin, thrusting his hand out. “And here I thought there was a misprint on my final guest list. To what do we owe the pleasure?”

“Normally I wouldn’t bother, but Catherine traveled with me, and I felt she deserved the night out.”

“Ah, yes, the lovely Catherine,” Arnold said, shifting his gaze to Cate. “A pleasure to see you again. I suppose we all owe you a debt of gratitude. After your marriage, the elusive Duke has become less elusive.”

“I’m happy to be of service on that front,” Cate said with a grin.

Arnold eyed Jack, his shoulders sliding down his back as an uncomfortable grin covered his face. “Have we met?”

“Jack Reid,” Marcus said, “a...friend.”

“Ah, you seem familiar,” Arnold said as they shook hands.

Jack swallowed hard and licked his lips.

Cate noticed the discomfort building on his features. “I’m sure you’ve met at some point before. Well, I’m certain you have other guests to speak to, and we should say hello to a few other friends.”

“Oh, before you go, my advanced apologies, Catherine, but I was hoping you, Marcus, might join us for a brief business discussion in about twenty minutes.”

Marcus scanned the crowd before his focus centered on Arnold. “I would hate to neglect Catherine. We had planned for an uninterrupted evening together.”

“I do understand. I would find it difficult to leave such a lovely woman, however, I do promise to keep it brief.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at the man as he mulled it over.

Cate patted his arm. "Go, dear. I'll be fine. Jack will keep me company."

Marcus huffed out a breath. "Well, I suppose I cannot say no."

"Certainly not or you may find yourself in the guest room," Arnold said with a hearty chuckle.

"I shall see you shortly," Marcus said with a curt nod before they moved away. They said hello to a few others before Marcus handed Cate a champagne flute and guided her toward a corner. Jack trailed behind, his hands shoved in his pockets as he surveyed the crowd.

"Are you okay?" Cate asked as they settled near the window.

"Yeah," Jack said after a hard swallow.

"Are you sure? Do you recognize some of these people?"

"Yeah," Jack said, rubbing the back of his neck.

"It's okay. You're safe now."

Jack nodded.

"But you may not be," Marcus said. "Catherine, I am not at all certain I should leave you for this meeting."

Cate sipped her champagne, scanning the crowd. "We'll be okay. This is the best way for you to get information."

"I had planned to do that with you at my side."

"They'll be far more candid without me. You know that."

He huffed, puckering his lips. Cate glanced over his shoulder at the front door. Her posture stiffened, and she took a long sip of her champagne. "Great."

Marcus glanced over his shoulder at the buxom blonde sauntering into the room. He twisted back to face Cate. "Now I know I will not attend."

"What?" Cate asked, her eyes wide. "No, you have to go."

"Not with Gianna here."

"I'll be fine," Cate answered, flicking her gaze back to the woman who leaned far too close to the married Arnold Chapman, laying a hand on his chest as she snorted a giggle. "Ugh, she does not know the meaning of holding back?"

Marcus arched an eyebrow at Cate. "What?" she said, lifting a shoulder, "You know how I feel about her overly flirtatious nature."

"Yes, I do. And I know it drives you to make foolish decisions in an attempt to best her."

"I do not," Cate argued.

“Yes, you do. And after the physical fight with her in Germany, I would prefer not to leave you alone with her lurking around.”

“You fought with her?” Jack questioned.

“He’s making more of it than it was. Besides, she started it.”

Marcus shot a glance at Jack before returning his attention to Cate. “I am not. In a misguided attempt to retrieve me from a locked cell in Eldinbury Castle, Gianna assaulted her violently. And she has physically attacked her on more than one occasion.”

“Cate!” Jack hissed.

“It’s fine,” Cate said, her champagne swishing in the glass as she sliced her hand through the air. “I’m fine. Let’s stick to the plan. You go get your information. Jack and I will wait here.”

“Will you? Do you promise?” Marcus asked.

“I will be fine.”

Marcus cocked his head, sighing as he arched an eyebrow.

“Yes, I promise. I won’t go near her.”

Marcus glanced at Jack. “Make certain she does not.”

Jack nodded. “Of course.”

With a sour expression, Marcus heaved another sigh before he squeezed Cate’s arm and glanced at Jack. “Keep her safe.”

Cate scoffed before taking another sip of her champagne. “She is unreal.”

Jack followed the direction of her gaze as Marcus disappeared behind closed doors with a bevy of businessmen. Gianna threw her head back, laughing as a group of men surrounded her.

Cate jabbed a finger in her direction, the champagne quivering in her glass. “Do you know she tried to convince Marcus to leave me stranded in 1942 and go with her?”

She downed another long sip.

“Maybe we should move somewhere away from her. I don’t much like her either.”

Cate puckered her lips as she stared at the woman.

“Cate?”

“Better to keep her in our sights. She’s too dangerous to let slip away.”

“Right,” Jack said, tugging at his collar again. He stared at the woman again for a moment before he shifted his gaze to Cate. “This whole thing is too strange.”

Cate let her shoulders slump. "I'm sorry. It must be so hard for you to see her and these people again."

"And this whole Duke thing." Jack shifted his weight from foot to foot before he spun to face her. "Cate—"

"Well, well, well," Elliott Stevens said, a grin on his oval face as he closed the distance between them, "if it isn't the Duchess herself."

"Mr. Stevens," Cate said, raising her chin as she stepped between him and Jack.

"Out on the town without your illustrious Duke." His eyes shifted to Jack. "And with the infamous Mr. Reid." He clicked his tongue at her. "Whatever will your husband say?"

Cate narrowed her eyes at him. "Oh, he's here. He's in a meeting."

"Oh, yes," Elliott said, rocking on his heels, "I believe Gianna just stepped inside with them. I'm certain she can distract him from any... shenanigans on your part. Though it still surprises me that he allows this to go on. He doesn't seem the type to suffer playing second fiddle."

Cate heaved a sigh.

"Oh, I don't mean to drone on about personal matters when there is business to discuss."

"I already told you, Marcus is—"

Elliott flicked a hand in the air. "Oh, no, not with the Duke. With you, dear Duchess."

Cate flicked her eyebrows up.

"We're prepared to give you one more chance."

Cate crossed her arms, staring up at the man. "One more chance for what?"

"To hand over Dunhaven Castle before we destroy everything you love."

Cate shook her head at him. "This conversation is over." She stepped sideways, but he blocked her way.

"I wouldn't be so hasty," Elliott said.

Cate bounced back a step, firming her jaw. "I will not give you my home."

"Then you'll give us everything else including your life."

CHAPTER 9

Heat seared through Cate as the man left the threat hanging in the air.

“Watch it,” Jack hissed, pushing in front of Cate.

“Oh, I plan to,” Elliott said, shoving his hands into his pockets. “I plan to watch as we dismantle everything you love.”

Cate elbowed her way in front of Jack, her lips tugging into a grimace. “I will never let you take Dunhaven Castle.”

She grabbed Jack’s hand and tugged him away from the man as she stormed from the room. They ducked into a quiet hall. Cate collapsed back against the wall, blowing out a long breath.

“The nerve of that guy,” Jack said, fidgeting with his collar again.

“He was the same way when we met him in 1955 while searching for you.”

“What the hell have we gotten mixed up with?”

“Powerful and dangerous people,” Cate said, pressing a hand to her stomach. She snapped her gaze up to Jack. “We need to look for more information.”

Jack ran his hands through his hair. “I’m not sure that’s a good idea.”

“We need to get ahead of them any way we can, and we may never have an opportunity to search this house again.”

“I’m pretty sure this is exactly what the Duke told me not to let you do.”

“Since when do you follow Marcus’s advice?”

Jack puckered his lips, sticking his hands on his hips as he considered it.

“Come on, Jack,” Cate said.

“I don’t know, Cate. I’m not sure we should risk angering these people on their turf. Or angering your esteemed husband.”

“I will handle Marcus.”

Jack shook his head, throwing his hands in the air. “Fine.”

Cate nodded and grabbed his hand, leading him further down the hall and away from the party.

“I’m not sure which is more frightening. The fact that we may get caught by The Agency or the Duke. Or that you think you can handle it.”

“I can. He’s not an ogre.”

“He’s damned close,” Jack said as they peered around a corner.

“It’s clear, let’s go,” Cate said, picking up her dress and tiptoeing down the hall. “Try that door.”

Jack swung it open, peering inside. “Billiards room.”

Cate shook her head, continuing down the hall. She crossed to the opposite side and cracked a door open. She shook her head. “Nothing.”

They continued down the hall to the next door. Cate flung it open. Moonlit lit the large desk across the room.

A smile spread across Cate’s face. “Bingo.”

She switched on the light, hurrying to the mahogany desk and circling it. “Check the file cabinet.”

Cate pulled the drawers open on the left side of the desk, pawing through the items inside.

“What are we looking for?”

“Anything. Anything that may lead us to Gertrude or help us determine the other angles they’ll be working,” Cate said as she slid the middle drawer open. Pens rattled around as she swiped her hand inside, searching for any clues.

“I don’t see anything,” Jack said. “But I’m not sure I know what to look for.”

Cate slammed the center drawer shut and tugged open the top drawer on the right. “When we were at Gianna’s place in 1955, she had notes... photos...dates.”

“Photos?” Jack asked, freezing with his hand still stuffed in the top drawer.

Cate’s hand slowed as she pushed items around. Memories of the folder of Gianna’s research filled her mind. “Me.”

“What?” Jack questioned.

“The photos were of me. Me at Aberdeen. Me at Dunhaven. She’s been watching me for years.” Cate collapsed into the chair behind her, tears brimming in her eyes. “They killed my parents.”

Jack slammed the drawer closed and hurried across the room, sliding his hand around her. “Cate...”

A tear slid onto her cheek, and she wiped it away. She sucked in a breath and blinked back the rest of her tears with a sniffle. “I’m not letting them take anything else from us.”

She tugged open the bottom drawer and rifled through it. Her features pinched as she found nothing. “No!”

“Come on, Cate, let’s get out of here.”

Cate stared at the blotter on the desk. “Maybe if we—“

“No, there’s nothing here. We should go.”

Cate gripped the decorative edge, her knuckles turning white. She pressed her lips together in a thin line.

“Come on, Cate. There’s nothing here.”

Cate sucked in a breath and nodded. “You’re right. Let’s go.”

She rose from the chair, and they hurried from the office and down the hall. The din of the party reached their ears as they turned the corner and continued toward the foyer.

Cate glanced into the library. “Arnold Chapman is in there. Their meeting is over.”

She crossed to the sitting room and scanned the interior, finding Marcus where they’d been standing. She wound through the crowd toward him.

“Catherine, where have you been?” he asked as she approached.

“Sorry, we had to step out for a minute.”

He grabbed her hands in his. “Are you all right? Have you been crying?”

Cate nodded at him. “Yes, we’re fine.”

“I told you not to move.” He flicked his gaze to Jack. “Could you really not do what I asked for fifteen minutes?”

“Don’t blame this on him. Blame it on Elliott Stevens.”

Marcus refocused his attention on Cate. “What happened?” He shook his head. “Never mind. We’ll discuss it in the car. We are leaving.”

“Great idea,” Cate said. “I’ve had as much as I can take of this party.”

Marcus wrapped his hand around hers and led her toward the door. She grabbed hold of Jack's arm and tugged him along with them.

"Leaving so soon?" Gianna asked, stepping into their pathway. "The party's only just getting started."

"Stand aside, Gianna," Marcus said with a huff.

"Why? It appears you could use a fourth. You're a bit...unbalanced."

"We are leaving," Marcus said.

"The night is young. Jack, are you looking for a date?" Her lips curled into a smirky smile.

"Pass," Jack said, tugging at his sleeves with a grimace etched into his features.

Gianna pouted. "Boo. Well, looks like that leaves me with you." She slid her arms up Marcus's lapels.

Cate glared at the woman as Marcus wrapped one hand around one of hers and shoved it away. "For once, I agree with the Scot."

He tugged Cate closer and wrapped an arm around her waist. "It would be a terrible shame to downgrade when I'm already married to perfection."

Heat rose in Cate's cheeks as Gianna's features turned stony.

"Her supposed perfection may cost you everything, Marcus."

Marcus lifted a shoulder in a half-shrug. "I doubt it."

"We'll see," she snapped as Marcus led Cate past her.

Cate shook her head as she pulled on her capelet and stepped into the evening air, tugging at it. "She is something else."

Their car slid to a stop in front of the house. The driver popped out and raced around to open the door for Cate. She slid into the backseat with a huff.

"I certainly hope you got the information you hoped to find," Cate said as Marcus slipped into the car next to her.

"We can discuss it at home," he answered, "when you have cooled off. There is nothing further to do tonight."

"Cooled off?" Cate asked. "Are you kidding?"

Marcus slid his glance sideways to her as the driver pulled away. "I am not."

Cate crossed her arms, her foot tapping against the floor.

"You have every right to be outraged with her."

"I'm not outraged. I'm just..."

"Furious," he answered.

Cate pressed her lips together. "Okay, fine. Her behavior is outrageous."
"As are her threats."

Cate flung her hand out. "Yes, exactly. That's exactly what I mean."

Marcus's lips curled on the edges.

Cate wagged a finger at him. "Don't give me that look. Of course, I meant her threats. What else would I mean?"

Cate heaved a sigh, shaking her head. "First Elliott Stevens and now her."

The slight smile faded on his lips, and he twisted to face her more fully. "What? What happened with Elliott Stevens?"

"Nothing," Cate said, waving the question away before she pressed her hand to her forehead.

"Catherine—"

"He threatened her," Jack said, twisting to face them from the front seat.

Marcus's eyes went wide, and he flicked his gaze from Jack to Cate. "He what? What did he say to you?"

The car eased to a stop in front of Marcus's home. The driver hurried to open Cate's door. She climbed from the vehicle on her own and stomped to the house. She pushed through the front door, tossing her bag down and tugging off her gloves.

"What did he say, Catherine?" Marcus demanded as he stormed in behind her.

She tossed the gloves on the entry table before grabbing the edge, her biceps flexing as she slid her eyes shut.

Cate twisted to face him and Jack as he strode into the foyer. "He asked for Dunhaven Castle again."

"And he threatened to kill her."

Marcus snapped his gaze to Jack before he shifted his focus to Cate. "Is this true?"

Cate shook her head before she switched to a nod. "Not in so many words, but yes." She flicked her gaze up to his dark eyes. "Tell me you found something."

Marcus heaved a sigh. "This is becoming too dangerous."

"What?"

"You should not be involved. You are putting yourself directly in the line of fire. You shouldn't be exposed to these people."

Cate's jaw flapped open. "You don't get to make that decision."

“I feel I must. I have far more experience with them than you do.”

Cate stuck a hand on her hip. “Sidelining me at Dunhaven Castle doesn’t help to protect me at all.”

“Cate, for once, I think he may be right,” Jack chimed in.

“I can’t believe you two.”

Jack splayed his hands to the sides. “That man threatened you. He said you’d pay with your life. Maybe it’s best if we don’t push them while we sort this situation out.”

Cate clamped her jaw closed as she glared at them both. “I am not stepping out of this fight. It involves my family and my home.”

“Yes, but Catherine—“

Cate poked him in the chest. “Don’t you ‘but Catherine’ me. You wouldn’t be standing here right now if it weren’t for me. Remember that next time you decide it’s best for me to sit on my hands and do nothing.”

Marcus puckered his lips, his annoyance obvious.

Cate picked up her evening bag from the table and waved it toward them. “I’m going to bed. We can discuss in the morning.”

She spun on her heel and stormed up the steps to her bedroom. With a slam, she shoved the door closed and leaned against it.

“I assume the party did not go as planned, Your Grace?” Andrea inquired from her post near the vanity.

Cate heaved a sigh as she pulled herself away from the door and shuffled across the room. “You could say that.”

“Perhaps some sleep will help.”

Cate nodded as she plopped onto the bed. Andrea bent to unbuckle her shoes. Cate drummed her fingers on the bedspread.

“I’m sorry,” Andrea said as she tugged one shoe off. “I’m nearly finished with the shoes.”

“Oh, I’m not frustrated with you.”

Andrea glanced up with an arched eyebrow. “I understand. Would you like to talk about it?”

Cate sighed as she slid onto her feet, and Andrea unfastened her dress. “No.”

As Cate slid her pajama top on and buttoned it, she flung an arm out. “I just can’t believe after everything, he thinks it’s best for me to not be involved.”

Andrea offered her an apologetic smile as she hung the dress.

“You know, I went to Eldinbury Castle for him. But he thinks I shouldn’t be able to go to a party because someone may say something mean to me.” Cate plopped on the vanity chair after tugging on her pajama pants.

Andrea pulled the tiara from her hair and set it aside. “I’m certain His Grace only wishes to protect you.”

Cate flicked her gaze to Andrea through the mirror as she dismantled her hair. “Yeah, sure.”

Andrea met her gaze. “He is quite protective of you.”

“He likes to win.”

“He likes to be certain you are safe,” she answered as Cate’s hair tumbled past her shoulders.

Cate blew out a sigh. “Gianna put an appearance tonight. And she threw herself at both Jack and Marcus.”

Andrea offered a knowing glance as she slid the brush through Cate’s hair. “That explains both of your consternation.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped, and she shook her head. “I don’t understand why she has such an easy time provoking such a reaction from me.”

“Because she is threatening everything dear to you. She has the upper hand because you care whereas she does not.”

Cate studied the woman through the mirror. “You’re right.”

Andrea smiled at her as she set the brush down. “Of course, I am. Which is why you so enjoy my service.”

Cate rose and pulled the woman into a hug. “Yes, it is.”

“Do you think you will be able to sleep?”

“I think so. Despite the time change and all the excitement, my adrenaline is gone and I’m exhausted.”

Andrea pulled back with a nod. “Oh, your necklace. Let me remove it.”

“Oh, could you leave it?” Cate ran her hands over the jewels. “I’ll get it, but I’d like to keep it with me.”

“Of course, Your Grace. Sleep well.”

“Thank you,” Cate said with a slight smile as she pulled her robe tighter around her and fastened it.

Andrea squeezed Cate’s hand before she slipped from the room, easing the door shut behind her. Cate wandered to the full-length mirror, sliding the robe collar open and eyeing the sapphires around her neck.

A knock sounded, drawing her attention away from the gems. Cate tugged the collar closed and inched the door open, staring through the crack.

“Hey, Cate,” Jack whispered. “You okay?”

Cate swung the door open wider and motioned for him to enter. “Yeah, I’m okay. How are you?”

Jack stuck his hands on his hips, still in his tuxedo. His bowtie hung undone around his neck. “Nervous.”

Cate sighed, pressing her lips together. “I’m sorry. I’m sorry to put you through facing them tonight—“

“It’s not that.”

Cate studied him for a moment. “Then what?”

“Do you think you may have painted a bigger target on our backs by marrying him?”

Cate arched an eyebrow. “I think if I hadn’t married him, we would have already lost. So target or not, Marcus Northcott is the only thing standing between The Agency and Dunhaven Castle.”

Jack crossed his arms, bobbing his head up and down. “I don’t believe that. I think you’re just as big a part of this fight as he is.”

“I’m glad you realize that.”

Jack closed the distance between them, reaching out to squeeze her shoulders. “I’ve always realized that, Cate. Like it or not, I’m not sure we can escape this and leave it up to someone else entirely.”

“No, we can’t. But after what happened to you, if you don’t want to be involved, I get it.”

He offered her a half smile. “No chance, Cate. We’re in this together.”

Cate patted his hand and smiled.

“Besides, I trust you a hell of a lot more than I trust him.”

“We’ll get through this,” she promised. “Try to get some sleep.”

Jack let his gaze roam around the room. “I hope I can. I’m not certain I’m comfortable sleeping in his house.”

Cate raised her chin, offering him an amused grin. “Technically, it’s also my house. So, if it bothers you too much, you can remind yourself of that.”

“Oh, right,” Jack said, smacking a palm to his forehead. “You get all seven hundred houses including this one if something happens to him.”

“Yep,” she said with a giggle.

Jack smiled down at her. “Good night, Cate.”

“Good night. Hope you sleep,” she called as he slipped into the hall and pulled the door shut.

She sucked in a deep breath, shuffling around the bed and collapsing on the edge. She opened the lid of the music box, letting her eyes slide shut as tinkling music filled the air.

A knock interrupted her ruminating. She closed the music box as she rose before heading for the door. She pulled it open, expecting to find Jack unable to sleep.

“Did you even try to sle—“ she began until she recognized Marcus. “Oh, sorry, thought you were Jack.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her as she motioned for him to enter. “Mr. Reid visiting my wife in her bedroom at this hour. Should I be concerned?”

“Very funny,” Cate said.

“Did I hear your music box?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod. “I find it very relaxing. I really need to thank your mother for it again.”

“She will be thrilled that you enjoy it.”

They stood for a moment in silence before Cate spoke again. “If you’ve come to try to talk me into staying out of this again—“

“No, I haven’t,” Marcus said, clasping his hands behind his back.

“Good.”

“I only wish to give you the option in the event that you’d prefer to exercise it.” He studied her in the soft light. “I worry about you, Catherine.”

“You don’t have to.”

“Of course I do. It is the duty of a husband.”

She flicked her eyes up to him with a wry expression.

“I’m serious, Catherine,” he said, sliding a lock of hair behind her ear. “These people are not kind. I do not wish to subject you to the depths they will sink to.”

“I think I’ve subjected myself,” she said, shambling across the room and opening the music box.

“That may be, but I will do everything in my power to shield you from any hostility if you prefer it.”

Cate twisted to face him, knitting her brows. She studied him for a moment, her gaze settling on his dark eyes. “As easy as it would be to say yes, I can’t. This is my fight.”

Marcus reached for her hand, threading his fingers through hers. "Our fight."

Cate stared down at their clasped hands. "Right."

She raised her eyes to his, offering him a coy smile. "You need me to save you when you get captured."

"I will never live that down, will I?"

"No," she said with a chuckle. "But seriously...we're in this together."

"Together," he repeated, squeezing her hand. He studied her for a moment. "Will you be able to sleep?"

"I think so," Cate said, pulling her hand from his and shuffling to the bed. She collapsed onto it with a sigh. "Interacting with Gianna is exhausting. And that's not an invitation for you to shield me from harm."

"As long as you are committed, I will not question your involvement again. But I will not apologize for protecting you."

"I am. Together. We have each other's backs."

"Always," he answered with a slight smile. "Try not to let her upset you. She isn't worth it."

Cate offered him a curt nod.

"Good night, Catherine."

"Good night."

Marcus offered her one last smile before he strode from the room.

Cate let her shoulders slump, blowing out a long breath before she peeled off her robe and tossed it at the foot of the bed. She kicked her slippers off and crawled between the sheets.

With another long exhale, she stretched out on the comfortable mattress. She let her eyes slide shut as the music played.

Her mind went over the events of the evening, recalling first the conversation with Elliott Stevens, then the one with Gianna. As details raced by a new image replaced the one from the party.

Cate ran through the halls of Dunhaven Castle as a scream split the air. The image startled her, causing her to gasp and vault upright. She sucked in another breath as her eyebrows pinched together. Did she have another case of temporalysis?

CHAPTER 10

Cate stared up at the ceiling as the music played. Light streamed through the window, announcing the new day. Worry coursed through her as the events of the past few days wandered through her mind.

The Agency proved to be as dangerous as Marcus said, but another issue weighed more heavily on her mind. Her nightmares and visions had resumed. The last time she'd had a similar experience, temporalysis had been the cause. An illness that could have killed her. Did she have it again?

Cate squeezed her eyes closed, her features pinching as she fought back tears. She should tell someone. She should tell Marcus.

Her gaze slid sideways to the piano-shaped music box. She narrowed her eyes at the drawer pull of the nightstand. She tugged it open, and searched the inside, hoping to find a Dragon's blood lozenge.

She found nothing useful. With a sigh, she collapsed back into her pillow. Her fingers found the necklace still around her neck. She unclasped it, laying it on the nightstand.

A knock sounded at the door and Andrea peeked inside. "Your Grace?"

"I'm up, come in."

"Good morning. Did you sleep well?"

"Well enough," Cate answered as she slid her feet into her slippers. She dressed for the day. As Andrea put the finishing touches on her hairstyle, she chewed her lower lip.

"All finished, Your Grace. Is there anything else?"

“Actually, yes. Could I ask you to ask Dembe for something? But I need you to be discreet.”

“You mean, no one should know. Not even His Grace?”

Cate spun to face her. “Yes. I’m sorry. It won’t be for long, and I hate to put you in this position...”

“Say no more, Your Grace. I am happy to help with anything you need. What is it?”

Cate licked her lips, her eyebrows pinching. “Can you find out if Dembe has any Dragon’s blood lozenges?”

Andrea arched an eyebrow before returning her face to a neutral expression. “Yes, of course, Your Grace. Leave it with me.”

Cate grabbed her hand and squeezed. “Thank you, Andrea. I’m so sorry to do this. And, please, don’t worry. I’m being cautious is all.”

“Of course.” Andrea nodded as she clasped her hands in front of her before she spun on her heel and disappeared into the hall.

Cate drummed her fingers against the thick wooden top of the vanity. If she could get the Dragon’s blood she could buy herself some time.

Cate pressed her lips together and sucked in a breath. “Please get them, Andrea,” she whispered as she stood and crossed the room. She stepped into the hall, glancing at Jack’s door and wondering if he slept.

She hastened down the stairs and into the dining room. Jack and Marcus leapt from their seats as she entered.

“Good morning, Catherine,” Marcus said as she crossed to the table. He picked up a purple rose from her place setting and offered it to her.

She accepted it, smiling up at him. “Are these—”

“From Rosenberg, yes. I recall you enjoyed the last one I gave you. So, I had these flown in for you.”

Cate studied the bouquet in the center of the table as she sniffed the single rose. “Thank you.”

She eased into her chair as Marcus pushed it in behind her. “So,” she said, setting the rose aside, “what information did you get last night? Jack and I found nothing.”

Marcus froze as he returned to his seat. “What do you mean found nothing?”

She picked up her fork and draped her napkin across her lap as Dembe set a plate in front of her. “Thank you, Dembe. We searched the office and found nothing.”

“You did what?” Marcus asked with his teacup halfway to his lips.

“We searched the office. I thought maybe we could find a clue like we did at Gianna’s.” Cate poked her fork toward Marcus. “We should try her place again.”

“Because that turned out so well the last time,” Marcus answered. “You should not have searched the office. I thought we agreed you would not slink about.” He shot a disapproving glance at Jack.

“Don’t blame Jack,” Cate said as she slathered jam onto her toast. “It was my idea.”

Marcus fidgeted in his chair. “Of course, it was.”

“Anyway, we didn’t find anything. So, I hope you came up with something in your meeting.” She glanced over at Jack’s full plate. “You’re not eating?”

Jack frowned down at the food as though he didn’t trust it.

Marcus took a sip of his tea. “I tried to tell him Dembe is an excellent cook. It did very little to convince him. The meeting produced a few leads we may follow up on. However, it will take a bit of work.”

“What leads?” Jack inquired finally picking up his fork.

“The Agency has inducted several new members. Their properties would make an excellent location to hide a newly acquired asset.”

“Asset?” Jack questioned after a sip of his juice.

“Gertrude,” Cate concluded.

“Right.”

“Where are the properties?” Cate asked.

“That is where the work comes in. I could not solicit the information without an investment in their group. I have called Charles Smythe to discuss it, and I have Stefano doing some legwork.”

Cate sipped her tea, puckering her lips as she set the cup in the saucer. “You shouldn’t invest with them.”

“I would prefer not to financially tie myself to The Agency, but I do not see a way around it. It is the quickest way to find the locations.”

Cate stared at the purple roses in the vase, her brow furrowing. “I know how we can get the locations.”

“What?” Marcus asked as she slid the teacup and saucer onto the lace tablecloth. She held up a finger as she stood and tossed her napkin onto the chair. She hurried around the corner into the foyer and approached the phone. With the receiver cradled between her neck and shoulder, she waited to be connected after making her request.

Jack and Marcus followed her into the space as someone picked up the line on the opposite end.

“Hi! This is Catherine Northcott. I’m in town and was wondering if you may be available for lunch...Yes, I’m free today...That sounds perfect. I’ll see you then.”

Cate replaced the receiver in the cradle and spun to face them. “Done.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at her. “Well done, Catherine.”

“Someone want to fill me in on what just happened?” Jack asked.

“Last year, Catherine befriended one of the secretaries of a man involved with some members of The Agency. The woman is privy to much of the sensitive information handled by them including their properties.” Marcus turned back to Cate. “At least I assume you called Ginger Fallinger.”

“I did,” Cate said with a smile and a nod.

“And this Ginger woman will tell you why?” Jack asked.

Cate lifted a shoulder as she searched for the words.

“Catherine and Ginger like to drink several martinis in one sitting which I’m sure helps loosen Ginger’s lips.”

“You’d think if she’s working for The Agency, they’d want her to be more trustworthy.”

“I may have allowed her to believe me to be a wronged woman which helped with her loose lips.”

Jack pressed his lips together as he tried to hide a laugh.

“A clever ruse, though disingenuous,” Marcus said. “Well, where are you lunching? We should make plans to accompany you.”

The smile faded from Cate’s face, and she shook her head. “No. You can’t go. Ginger will never talk with you two around.”

“You cannot go alone,” Marcus argued.

“And I can’t go with you.”

“We’ll have to follow you. Hide behind the fake plant at the restaurant or something,” Jack said.

Marcus blinked several times as he shifted his gaze to Jack. “I don’t hide behind fake plants.”

Jack shrugged. “You will now if you want to keep an eye on her without blowing her cover.”

“He’s right,” Cate said, “although...”

“What is it, Cate?”

“Are you sure you two can handle this without killing each other?”

Marcus scoffed. “I am in no danger of being killed. He couldn’t even maim me.”

Cate stared at him for a moment. “Let me rephrase. Are you sure you can handle this without killing Jack?”

Marcus sucked in a deep breath. “Of course.”

Cate raised her eyebrows. “Jack, are you sure you can handle this without driving Marcus to kill you?”

“I’ll do my best.”

“Great,” Cate said. “We have a few hours before lunch. Maybe we should go to Gianna’s apartment.”

“I am not certain that is wise.”

“We found information there last time.”

Marcus wagged a finger at her. “We found the information she wanted us to find. I am not certain it is helpful.”

“Humor me. It can’t hurt.”

Marcus sucked in a breath and nodded. “Fine.”

“All right. Let me just get my bag.”

She hurried up the stairs, clinging to the thick wooden railing as she paused for a second. A clammy sweat made her dress stick to her back. She blew out a breath and resumed her journey up the stairs.

She pushed into her room, crossed to the bed, and collapsed on the edge. The door opened a moment later and Andrea slipped inside. She offered Cate an eager smile, dangling a small sachet from her fingers.

Cate leapt up, her eyes wide. “You got them.”

“I did.”

“Did Dembe agree to stay quiet about it?” Cate asked as she opened the pouch and fished out one of the drops.

“I asked him to remain mum about it. He did not disagree, though he advised this matter be brought to His Grace’s attention.”

Cate nodded as she winced from the bitter taste of the Dragon’s blood on her tongue. She stuffed the pouch in her purse. “Yes, I don’t plan on keeping it from him for long. Just long enough to make some progress on this situation.”

Cate spun, nearly running into Andrea.

“Your Grace, are you certain you are all right? Perhaps it’s wise to confide in His Grace sooner rather than later.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped as the words sank into her mind. Her lower lip bobbed up and down and her forehead pinched. “Yes, I know, I just...I’m not even sure it’s what I think it is, and we really need to get this information.”

Andrea pressed her lips together and nodded. “Perhaps, though, he can assess it better and put your mind at ease.”

Cate flicked her gaze to the floor as her mind went in the opposite direction. Perhaps he can put the final nail in my coffin. “I’ll tell him soon, I promise.”

“Of course, Your Grace. And I shall say nothing further about it.”

“It’s okay, Andrea. I know you’re trying to help. And you’re right. I shouldn’t hide it. I just...need some time.”

Andrea nodded and squeezed Cate’s arm. “Be safe, Your Grace.”

“Thank you.”

Cate hurried from the room and down the stairs. “Ready.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at her, cocking his head. “Are you certain?”

“Yep,” Cate said, doing her best to hide the lozenge and her reaction to its bitter taste.

He stared at her for another moment before he nodded and motioned for her to precede him to the door. Cate sucked in a breath as she stepped into the bright sunshine of the spring morning.

Within minutes the car eased to a stop outside Gianna’s posh apartment building. Cate stared up at it, recalling their last experience there. Pictures of her with red Xs across her face danced through her mind. What would they find this time?

Cate climbed from the car, slipping her arm into Marcus’s as they approached a figure leaning against the side of the building.

He straightened, bowing as they closed the gap between them. “Have you done as I asked?”

Stefano nodded. “Yes. The apartment is clear, and she has not returned. Hello, Duchess.” He eyed Jack. “Did you find a new stray?”

“This is Jack Reid,” Cate said.

Stefano’s bushy eyebrows shot up. “Oh! The Scot that you didn’t want to find.”

Jack pulled his chin back to his chest, his eyebrows raising.

Marcus scowled at him. "That's not exactly what I said. Come along, we should not dally."

He tugged Cate along with him, leaving Stefano at this post. They entered the building, navigating to Gianna's apartment. With a flick of his wrist, Marcus unlocked the door and motioned for Cate to enter.

She sucked in a deep breath as she entered the lion's den. She grabbed Jack's hand as he crossed the threshold. "You okay?"

"Yeah, I'm good. You?"

She forced a smile onto her face and nodded. "Yep."

She pointed down the hall. "The last time we found evidence it was in the office."

Jack nodded as he stared around the posh space. "I'll check out the living room."

Cate took a step toward the office when Marcus tugged on her elbow. "Catherine, perhaps I should go first. The last evidence we found was quite disturbing."

She glanced over her shoulder as they wandered to the office. "Thank you, but I'm okay."

They stepped into the space. Her muscles tensed as memories of her previous experience here flitted across her mind again. She paused while another fleeting thought crossed her brain. With a sharp breath, she sucked harder on the dragon's blood lozenge and pushed herself to the desk.

She rifled through the folders on the top, wondering if she'd find more pictures of herself. Marcus slipped his hand onto her shoulder as he flicked open a folder and studied the contents.

"Anything interesting?" she asked while she shuffled to another folder.

"Not really, you?"

Cate lifted the folder closer as she flipped through the contents. "I don't know."

Marcus pressed closer to her, peering over her shoulder. He snatched one of the images from the folder.

"Who is this?" Cate asked, staring at the blonde in the photo.

"I don't know."

Cate flipped over the picture, searching for any other information. "Another victim?"

"Perhaps," Marcus said, folding the photo he held and shoving it into his pocket.

Cate eyed him. "You're taking that?"

"It may prove useful."

Cate searched through the other folders, finding nothing useful.

"Doesn't look like we're finding a clue this time."

"Which may be a good thing."

"It's not," Cate said, dropping the last folder she searched. "We need a break."

"The last time we found a clue here it led to an extremely painful moment for you."

Cate pressed her lips together as she heaved a sigh.

"Though she underestimated you," he said, sliding a lock of hair behind her ear. "She underestimated your strength."

Cate smiled up at him. The sound of a throat clearing interrupted their conversation. Cate stepped back, shooting a glance at the door. "Nothing in here."

"Nothing out there either."

Cate grimaced and shook her head. "So much for that. Let's hope Ginger can help."

Marcus nodded, motioning for Cate to precede him around the desk. She took a step past him when the world around her melted for a moment. Random images of Dunhaven Castle's darkened halls fluttered through her mind.

She sucked in a gasp, grasping onto Marcus to steady herself.

"Catherine?" he asked, holding her from falling.

"Sorry," she said, licking her lips and sucking a breath in. "Lost my footing."

He arched an eyebrow.

She shrugged. "I tripped."

"Have you twisted your ankle?"

Cate pressed her lips together, waving a finger in the air. "No. I do not need to be carried."

"I shall be the decider of that," Marcus called after her as she stalked from the room.

Jack furrowed his brow when she passed him. "He has a real penchant for carrying me around like a damsel in a gothic novel."

She stepped into the hall, passing the open bedroom door. A whiff of Gianna's overpowering perfume floated past her nostrils. A blinding set of images spun through her brain.

The world swirled along with the memory-like pictures. The walls melted, and her vision blurred before she pitched forward.

CHAPTER 11

Images sped through her mind faster than she could process. They settled into what seemed like a memory. She ran through the halls of Dunhaven Castle again. A scream sounded as she rounded a corner in a hall not currently used. Her stomach turned, and her heart pounded as she hurried toward her unknown destination.

She wrapped her hands around the doorknob. Before she could open it, the image faded away, replaced by blackness.

Cate's eyelids fluttered open, and she sucked in a sharp gasp. Two concerned faces hovered over her.

"Catherine," Marcus said, stroking her hair, "how do you feel?"

She crinkled her brow as she glanced around the room. "Fine."

Jack squeezed her hand. "Are you certain, Cate? You just passed out."

"I'm sure." Her lips tugged downward in a grimace. "Am I in Gianna's bed?"

"Yeah," Jack answered, nodding his head toward Marcus. "He carried you in."

Cate winced as she tried to push up to sitting. "I'm not surprised."

Marcus prevented her from rising. "You were unconscious. This was an obvious case for carrying you."

"I'm fine. Let me sit up."

"We have yet to assess that," Marcus answered.

"I hate to be a pain here, but I'm not comfortable laying in Gianna's bed. I'm perfectly fine."

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her. "Then explain your sudden fainting spell."

Cate tugged her lips into a grimace as she shrugged. "I—"

"Don't say you didn't eat enough because you had a healthy breakfast courtesy of Dembe," Marcus said, feeling her forehead.

"Maybe I ate too much," Cate suggested.

Marcus offered her an unimpressed stare. "Very funny, Catherine. Your pulse is slowing, though your heart was racing only moments ago."

"I'm fine. It was racing because I fainted, that's it."

"But what caused you to faint?" Marcus questioned.

Jack squeezed her hand. "For once, he has a point, Cate."

Cate flopped back into the pillows with a sigh. "I'm not liking the agreement between you two."

Marcus raised his eyebrows at her. "Well, that is simply too bad. We have—"

"Is that the time?" Cate gasped, swiping the clock off Gianna's nightstand.

"I have heard nothing from Stefano, so there is no need to panic."

"Yes, there is a need to panic," Cate said, pushing herself up to sit and trying to swing her legs over the bed's edge. "I'm going to be late for my lunch with Ginger."

"You are not going to your lunch with Ginger," Marcus answered.

"Yes, I am," Cate said as she pushed herself against the mattress in an attempt to stand.

"No, you are not," Marcus answered, pressing her back onto the bed.

Cate smacked a hand against the bedspread. "I'm not sick!"

"We have not determined that yet. We should go home and assess your condition."

Cate wrinkled her nose. "I'm not going home and being put to bed with a hot toddy like a Victorian housewife. I have important business with Ginger, and I'm determined to do my part."

"I said nothing about a toddy, though that could be arranged."

"It's not necessary. Now, let's go."

"Cate, maybe we should go back to the house," Jack said, clapping a hand on her shoulder.

Cate pressed her hands to her temples. "This is ridiculous. I'm fine. There is no reason to go back to the house and every reason to go to the restaurant. We'll discuss this all when we get home. And if I collapse at the restaurant, I'm certain you'll race in and carry me from the building."

"This is not a joke, Catherine. You collapsed."

"And scared the hell of out of us, Cate," Jack added.

Cate sucked in a deep breath, flicking her gaze to the floor. "I know. And I think I know what's causing it. And it's definitely something we can discuss as soon as I get this information from Ginger."

Marcus stared at her with a gaping jaw. "You know what's causing it?"

She flicked her gaze up to him before lowering it to the floor again. "I think so."

"And?" he prompted when she didn't continue.

"And we can discuss it when we're home. Getting this information is vital. It could make the difference between success and failure." Cate flicked her gaze to his dark eyes again. "Please. This can keep, I promise."

"Tell me what you think it is," Marcus prodded.

Cate pressed her lips together, shaking her head. She sucked in a deep breath and flicked her gaze up to him. "I think it's temporalysis again."

"What?" Jack gasped, skirting the bed and kneeling in front of Cate. "Cate! This can't keep. It can be fatal."

Marcus narrowed his eyes at her. "Do you have—"

"Dragon's blood," Cate answered. "Yes, I got it from Dembe this morning. And I've used it."

Marcus heaved a sigh. "I shall need to speak to him about that."

"Don't punish Dembe for my choices," Cate said, pushing herself to stand. "I asked both Andrea and him to keep it a secret for a short time."

"Because of the lunch with Ginger."

Cate nodded at him.

"All right, Catherine. We shall discuss this further when we arrive home. But you are free to go to your lunch."

"Thanks for your permission," Cate said, patting his chest.

"If you feel ill—"

"I'll signal you. Though I hope to get through this. I'll use the dragon's blood." She pulled her purse open, retrieved another lozenge, and popped it in her mouth. "Let's go, we're going to be late."

"Cate," Jack said as they strode from the room, "are you sure this is a good idea? Temporalysis almost killed me."

"I know. But it didn't kill me the last time, and this is exactly like it was the last time."

"That doesn't mean it won't kill you this time," he answered.

"You don't know that," Cate said. "Maybe temporalysis is always non-fatal for me. We have no idea."

Jack glanced over his shoulder at Marcus. "Can it kill her?"

"If it is temporalysis, yes," Marcus answered. "Temporalysis can always be fatal. Surviving it once does not make you immune to fatalities."

"So, you can contract it more than once?" Jack asked as they slipped into the hall.

"Yes," Marcus answered.

Jack grabbed her arm and squeezed. "Cate, please, let's go back to the house and talk about this. We shouldn't dally. I nearly died from this."

Cate headed for the stairs. "I'm not going to die in the next two hours."

"You don't know that," Jack said as he hurried down the stairs after her. He pressed a hand to his forehead and shook his head. "Cate, please, reconsider this. It's not going to matter if we find Gertrude, and you're dead."

Cate pushed into the spring air, sucking in a deep breath. "I don't think two hours is going to make a difference, and maybe we can make some progress on this."

Jack stared at Marcus as he strode onto the sidewalk from the building. "Do you want to maybe weigh in here? I can't believe you're going to let her do this."

Marcus flicked his eyebrows up as he glanced between them. "I can't force her to do anything. She has her own mind."

The corner of Cate's lips turned up, and she cut her gaze to Jack.

Jack screwed up his face. "You're kidding. You carry her around like a doll, and you tell me not to let her get in trouble."

Marcus waved his finger in the air as they strode to the car. "I take excellent care of Catherine. I protect her from harm as much as possible. But that does not mean I control her."

"Unbelievable," Jack said, flinging his arms out as he shuffled to the car and tugged the passenger door open. "The one time I need you to go all medieval on her plans and you refuse to do it." He slammed the door shut with a sigh before he twisted to face them. "Are you hoping she dies?"

Marcus shot him a surprised glance. "Certainly not. Catherine's well-being is of the utmost importance to me."

"So, you're going to let her go to lunch with someone from The Agency while she's dying so we can get a lead that may give us nothing while we delay her treatment for a potentially deadly disease? Smart."

"Ginger is hardly dangerous. I have my dragon's blood. And we're only delaying any other treatment for a few hours," Cate argued as the car wound through the streets of London toward the restaurant.

"I concur with Catherine. Believe me, if I felt she was in any danger, I would have argued the case myself."

"How about simply not allowing her to be this reckless?"

"Allowing me?" Cate cried.

"She is not a child, Mack. I cannot allow or disallow her to do things."

"Jack," he growled through clenched teeth.

"Rest assured, Mr. Reid, if I thought she would do herself any harm, I would have done whatever it took to convince her not to pursue the gambit with Ginger."

Cate snapped her gaze to him. "You wouldn't have carried me off like in a Victorian novel, though, right?"

"If circumstances warranted it," Marcus said as the car rolled to a stop outside the restaurant. "Have a nice lunch, dear."

Cate slid from the vehicle after the driver opened her door. She poked her head back inside, flicking her gaze between the two of them. "Behave. Both of you. And don't come charging in and dragging me off unless my death is imminent."

She slammed the door shut and hastened to the entrance of the restaurant. The doorman pulled the door open for her, and she slipped inside. The maitre d' greeted her with a pleasant smile.

"Hi," Cate said with a smile. "Catherine Northcott. I'm meeting with—"

"Cate! Yoo-hoo!" Ginger waved from inside the restaurant. "I'm here."

Cate pointed at the bubbly blonde. "Found her."

"Ah, yes, Miss Fallinger," the man said with a wrinkled nose. He led her to the table, spinning to face her as they arrived. "May I take your coat?"

"Yes," Cate said, peeling the light jacket off and passing it over.

"Well, don't look at her like that, guv," Ginger said with a coy smile at the man. "She's a duchess you know?"

The man blinked his eyes at Cate as she settled in the chair. "Yes, Duke Northcott is my husband."

The man arched an eyebrow. "My apologies, Your Grace. Had I known--"

"You can make it up to her by bringing us two martinis to start," Ginger said.

"Right away," he answered, hurrying away with her coat in hand.

Ginger frowned at him as he scurried away. "Lousy sod. He's never nice to the mistresses."

"I'll bet he thought I was one."

"But you're not. And you're a whole duchess, too. That gave him a shock." Ginger stared after him for a moment more before she flicked her gaze to Cate, sliding an arm across the table to clasp her hand. "It's good to see you, Cate Catherine Northcott."

Cate squeezed her hand and smiled. "It's good to see you, too."

"And what have you been up to? Did you get your shopping spree?"

"I did," Cate answered, flicking her gaze to a plant that rustled nearby before she cleared her throat.

"Uh-oh. Tell me he did it again."

"No," Cate answered. "Nothing but good behavior."

Ginger arched an eyebrow over her expertly made-up eye. "Really? Are you sure?"

Cate clammed up as their martinis were delivered, studying the menu for a moment. Ginger picked her glass up and raised it to Cate. "To good times with the duchess."

Cate retrieved her glass, clinking it against Ginger's before taking a sip.

"Now, back to it. Are you certain? Because, let me tell you, Cate, once a cheater, always a cheater. I know. I'm a mistress. They tell their wives all the time that it's over and it never is. The first bad day at the office, or investment gone wrong, and there they are right back at your door looking for comfort."

The leaves of the plant rustled again. Cate did her best to ignore it, licking her lips as she set the menu aside. "I have no reason to suspect--"

Ginger wagged a finger at her. "Oh, that's the time he's doing it. When you don't suspect. Let me guess. Everything's going along swimmingly at home. He's being overly nice. Helpful even."

Cate cocked her head. "It's like you can see into our marriage."

The leaves shook hard as she spoke.

Ginger took another sip of her martini. "You've got troubles, Cate. He's bouncing around with a mistress again. Mark my words."

Cate sipped at her drink. "You may be right." She furrowed her brow, but the appearance of their waiter prevented any further conversation. After placing their order, Cate sipped her martini again.

"Now, let's talk about more pleasant things like how big the necklace will be this time when he finally admits his nefarious ways."

Cate chuckled at her as Ginger waved for another two martinis. "That diamond necklace you were wearing the day we met was a dandy, Cate Catherine. I can't imagine what he'll give you this time."

"Well," Cate said as she finished her martini and handed the empty glass to the waiter as he replaced it with a fresh one, "that's something I was hoping you could help with."

Ginger flicked her eyebrows up as she studied Cate over the rim of her glass. "I vote rubies this time. No, no, sapphires. They'd look so beautiful with your eyes."

Cate waved the comment away. "I have sapphires."

"Oh, I bet they're dazzling."

"If you think the diamonds were incredible, you should see the sapphires."

"I may have to," Ginger said with a wink. "Okay, sapphires are out. So, rubies it is."

Cate leaned closer, tilting her head. "Actually, I was thinking something a bit different."

The corners of Ginger's lips turned up, and she leaned closer, arching an eyebrow. "Do tell."

Cate licked her lips as the waiter placed hot dishes in front of them. Cate poked at her chicken with her fork as she formed her request in her mind.

"You were saying?" Ginger asked as she stabbed a piece of pasta.

"I have a bit of money set aside. My own. Not his."

Ginger, chewed the pasta slowly, jabbing a fork at Cate. "No, sweetheart, you don't want to spend that on rubies. You spend his money on the rubies, and you keep that money for a rainy day."

"Well, that's the thing. I do want to keep it for a rainy day, but..."

Ginger sipped her martini, raising an eyebrow. "But?"

“I’d like to have more of it for a rainy day if you know what I mean.”

“Oh,” Ginger said, her chin raising higher, “you want to invest.”

“Yes,” Cate said, “I knew you’d understand. And I want to do it myself. Not with his investment people, I don’t trust them.”

“Oh, I understand. I’ve seen some of mine put their wives’ money in low-growth deliberately. Why?” Ginger leaned closer, lowering her voice. “She can’t leave him that way.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod and another sip of her martini. “I want to make my own way.”

“Oh, I’m not certain he’s going to let you do that. The royalty is notorious for not wanting any scandal.”

“Then maybe my investment will be a good reason for there not to be any more strife.”

“So, you think having enough to leave him will keep him in line?”

Cate lifted a shoulder. “It can’t hurt.”

Ginger puckered her lips as she cradled the martini against her chest.

Cate slid her arm across the white linen tablecloth and grabbed Ginger’s other hand. “Please, Ginger? I really want to stand on my own two feet and be proud of something.”

Ginger eyed her for a moment before she twisted her arm and grabbed hold of Cate’s hand. She squeezed it as a smile spread across her face. “I’d be happy to help you.”

Cate broke into a smile. “Thank you.”

“What did you need? Typical investments made by some of the bigwigs in Arnie’s office?”

“Actually,” Cate said, “Marcus was in a meeting with some of Mr. Chapman’s people last night. He mentioned something about newly acquired properties. He was considering investing, but he’s still deciding. I’d like to beat him to the punch.”

“Steal the investment right out from under him, huh?”

Cate raised her chin and nodded. “Yes. Though...”

“You’re afraid?”

Cate winced, setting her fork on the plate. “I don’t want to do anything foolish. I’m afraid Marcus may say I’ve jumped in without thinking if he finds out. I’d like to do a little research first.”

“You want to see the locations and make sure they’re worth it?” Ginger asked.

“Yes. But Marcus won’t tell me anything about them.”

Ginger’s lips curled up. “Don’t worry your pretty little head about that, love. I’ve got you covered.”

Cate returned the gesture, picking up her martini and raising it toward Ginger.

With a giggle, Ginger lifted her glass and clinked it against Cate’s. They finished their meal making light conversation about their lives. As Cate paid the bill at her own insistence, Ginger scrawled the addresses of the Chapman group’s newly acquired properties on a cocktail napkin.

She slid it across the table toward Cate. “These are the ones that just came in during the last two months. Check them out and if you have any questions, you call me.”

Cate smiled down at the napkin before she slid it into her purse. “Thank you, Ginger. It was good to see you. I’ll be in touch.”

They said their goodbyes, exchanging a hug before Ginger offered her a wave and tottered off. Jack and Marcus circled around the large plant as Ginger disappeared through the door.

Cate pulled the address list from her purse and handed it to Marcus.

He perused it before pocketing it. “Well done, Catherine.”

“Now, can we please discuss this temporalysis thing?” Jack asked.

“Yes, I think we should,” Cate said with a deep sigh. “Because I think I’m getting worse.”

CHAPTER 12

Cate licked her lips, drumming her fingers against the seat of the car as they made their way home. The chicken she'd had for lunch threatened to reappear as worry over her condition consumed her. This time seemed worse. She worried it would be fatal.

Warm fingers slid around her hand, stopping their nervous movement. She glanced at Marcus who smiled at her.

She forced a smile onto her face as tears threatened. If she died, what would happen to Dunhaven Castle? Would it go to him? Would that spell disaster for her friends?

He squeezed her hand, sensing her apprehension. The car slowed to a stop outside the house. Cate climbed from inside, and they entered the house. They settled in the living room.

Jack collapsed onto the couch next to Cate, puffing out a sigh as he let his head drop into his hands. "Okay, can we finally address the temporalysis situation here before something terrible happens?"

"Yes, I think we should," Cate said with a shake of her head, her voice rising as panic laced it. "The dragon's blood doesn't seem to be working at all. The last time it helped with the symptoms, but this time it's not and I'm afraid—"

"Stop there," Marcus said, offering her a brandy. "Go back to the beginning and tell me what has been happening."

Cate grabbed the proffered beverage as Jack rubbed her shoulders. She took a sip, trying to steady her shaking hands.

“Take a breath, Catherine. There is no reason to panic,” Marcus said, squeezing her shoulder.

Cate pursed her lips, sliding her eyes closed and sucking in a slow breath.

She opened her eyes, flicking her gaze up to Marcus.

“Ready?”

Cate nodded and took another sip of the brandy.

“From the beginning.”

Cate sucked in a breath, crinkling her brow. “Wait, the beginning beginning, like the start of the original temporalysis, or the start of this one?”

“This one for now.”

“Okay. Uh, it started the night Mr. Smythe made his announcement. I had a nightmare, very similar to what happened during the last bout of temporalysis.”

“About?” Marcus asked as he poured himself a brandy.

“I was running through the halls of Dunhaven Castle. Someone screamed. I woke up.”

Jack leapt from his seat, pacing the floor. “Bah, it’s the same damned thing as it was last time.”

“Let her finish,” Marcus said. “I assume this was not an isolated incident?”

“No, it wasn’t.”

“But it’s the same as last time. This started with nightmares.” Jack jabbed a finger toward Marcus. “Nightmares of you chasing her all over the castle.”

Marcus poured another brandy and held it out. “Try a sip for your nerves.”

“I don’t need a drink. I need everything back to normal. I need Cate not sick. Again. I need—“

“Take the drink, Mr. Reid. And let us finish our discussion.”

Jack flicked his gaze to Cate. She gave him a nod. He grabbed the drink from Marcus’s outstretched hand and took a sip, collapsing onto the couch next to her again.

“Continue, dear.”

“Umm, I chalked the nightmare up to the stress of seeing Gianna, but...” Cate heaved a sigh. “I’m having the visions again.”

“Of?” Marcus asked.

Cate lifted her shoulders. “I’m not sure,” she said, her features pinching as she spoke, “they go so fast, I can’t make them out. Sometimes it’s the hall, sometimes it’s other things. Last night before the party, I passed out as Andrea was buckling my shoes.”

Her breathing turned ragged, and tears formed in her eyes. “It’s the same as last time. It feels like memories, but it’s not.”

Cate pressed her lips together into a thin line as she held back the emotions welling inside her. Jack rubbed his hand across her shoulders again as he let out a sharp breath.

“And this happened earlier today while at Gianna’s? This is the reason you fainted?”

Cate nodded as she sipped her brandy. “More visions. And a few almost came through at the restaurant. Now, I’ve had the dragon’s blood. Two lozenges since I got them this morning but it’s doing nothing to stop any of this.”

Marcus nodded as he sauntered to the front window and stared through it.

“Oh, Cate, why didn’t you say something last night?” Jack asked.

“I didn’t think it was anything. I just wanted to get the information at the party and today I thought the dragon’s blood would help. I was going to tell you. I just wanted to get more information first.”

Marcus sipped his drink before he spun to face them. “Tell me about the last time.”

“Umm,” Cate began.

Jack leapt from his seat poking a finger at the man. “The last time started with nightmares of her being chased through the castle by you.”

Marcus flicked his gaze to Jack then returned it to Cate. “And then?”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “It started with the hole in the library.”

Marcus’s eyebrows raised, prompting her to continue.

“I kept dreaming about a gaping hole in the library. I saw myself in clothing from the late 1700s. And I kept hearing a warning.”

“And you found a passage there, correct?” Marcus asked.

“Yes,” Cate answered with a nod. “In the spot it always appeared at in my nightmare.”

“And did you have waking visions during that time?”

“No,” Cate said. “I only had those later. After we met. Before that, I had dreams about you. Then we met. And then I had more dreams about you. Everything shifted to the dreams about the ball. That’s when I started getting the visions.”

“And that is when you started losing time. Wandering the castle, seeming to be in a different era.”

“Yes,” Cate answered.

“You did not have that before this?”

“The wandering? No, just recently.”

“And are you suffering from the same now or just the visions and dreams?”

Cate crinkled her brow. “Just the visions and dreams so far. They are fairly frequent, but so far, at least to my knowledge, no roaming around.”

Marcus sipped his drink again, narrowing his eyes. Jack eased onto the couch, sliding an arm around Cate’s shoulders.

Cate set her empty glass on the coffee table. “So, do I have temporalysis again? Am I going to get this every time I time travel now?”

Marcus heaved a sigh. “No, I don’t believe you have temporalysis.”

Cate flopped back against the thick cushions. “Great. What weird thing do I have this time and how deadly is it?”

Marcus finished his brandy and set the glass on the bar. “I am fairly certain I know, but I would like Mother to consult on your condition.”

“Whoa, wait a minute,” Jack said, leaping from his seat again, “we’re not going anywhere until we get some answers. Cate could be dying.”

“I doubt it, though providing answers is exactly why we should visit my mother. Besides, she would love to see you, Catherine.”

“You doubt it? What if you’re wrong?”

Marcus lifted his shoulders. “It’s a sensation I’m not familiar with since I am never wrong.”

“You’re a real piece of work, you know that? I’m not willing to risk Cate’s life—“

“Neither am I,” Marcus growled with a curled lip.

“Stop it. Both of you. There is something far more important going on here,” Cate said. “We need to follow up on those addresses.”

Jack shot her a shocked glance. “Cate, we need to follow up on your illness which, by the way, no matter what the genius over here says sounds a hell of a lot like temporalysis.”

Cate bit her lower lip, flicking her gaze to Marcus as she rose to stand. "We need to find Gertrude before this gets any worse."

"Stefano can follow up—"

"No!" Cate said, balling her hands into fists. "I want to follow up."

"Fine. We'll do that first."

Jack scoffed, tossing his arms overhead. "You're joking! You're going to put this off to search these properties first?" He pressed his palms together, shaking them at Cate. "Cate, please, don't be so reckless. I nearly died from this. I know what it's like. You shouldn't ignore it."

"I'm not." She slid her gaze to Marcus. "I'm not dying, right?"

Marcus set his dark eyes on her. "No, I'm quite certain you are not. I would never risk your life, dear."

"That's good enough for me," she said with a nod. "Let's go."

Jack stuck his hands on his hips and shook his head. "I wish you'd reconsider."

"As much as I would love to see Anna again, we need a clue to Gertrude's location before she slips away from us entirely. We can't risk it, Jack."

"We can't risk your life either, Cate. I understand the current situation leaves something to be desired, but we've won for the moment. Maybe we should let it go."

"For the moment are the key words in that sentence," Marcus said as they made their way to the foyer. "The Agency is always seeking to find a new path forward. Any time we waste gives them an advantage. And while Catherine's condition is important, it can be dealt with after we find a path forward."

Cate pushed through the front door. Dark clouds sailed past, blocking out the sun. She hurried to the car, ducking inside as large raindrops pelted the sidewalk.

"So, can I stop taking these?" she asked, waving the pouch of dragon's blood lozenges in the air as Marcus slid in next to her.

"Yes, they will do nothing."

"Good," Cate said while stuffing them back in her purse. "I hate the taste of them."

Marcus passed along the first address and within half an hour they'd arrived outside of the apartment building.

“The address said Penthouse C,” Cate said as she stared up at the posh building.

“Seems like it may be a logical place to keep her,” Jack answered, studying the facade with his hands shoved into his pockets.

“Let’s hope we get lucky on the first try.”

They strode to the door where a doorman stood, his hands clasped in front of him. He stared down his nose at them, arching an eyebrow. “Visiting someone?”

“I’m considering buying Penthouse C,” Marcus answered.

“Then you should get in touch with the Chapman group. They are handling the property.”

“I’d prefer to see it prior to making an inquiry with them.”

The doorman rocked on his toes. “Sorry, mate, viewings are only by appointment with the Chapman group.”

Marcus offered him an unimpressed stare. He lifted his hand when Cate batted it down. “Hi, I’m sorry. Ginger Fallinger told us to stop by. She said it wouldn’t be a problem.”

The doorman raised his eyebrows, adjusting his cap. “You know Ginger?”

“Yes,” Cate answered. “She’s a friend. She passed along the address and told me to stop by if I’d like to see it.”

“Oh, well, I’m so sorry to disappoint, but I don’t have the keys, you see.”

“Oh,” Cate said, pressing her fingers against her forehead. “I do.” She patted her purse. “Silly of me. I forgot to say earlier.”

“Ginger gave you a set?”

“Well, she let me borrow a set to look around. I’ll return them when I see her later for dinner at the club.”

“Right, well, if Ginger said it’s okay, I guess it’s okay. Go on up.” He tugged the door open and motioned for them to enter.

“Thank you,” Cate said as they filed past him through the door and pressed the button for the elevator in the lobby.

“Good going, Cate,” Jack whispered as they waited.

Marcus flicked his eyebrows up. “I could have handled it.”

“We didn’t need anyone passing out from your weird sleep-touch thing,” Cate retorted.

The doors whooshed open, and they stepped inside. “There’s only one problem,” Jack said as he pressed the button for the top floor. “We don’t actually have the keys.”

Marcus closed his eyes and shook his head. “You really are not all that bright, are you?”

“Look, mate—“

“I am not your mate,” Marcus answered.

“Marcus can unlock the door the same way he did at Gianna’s,” Cate said, standing between them as the car continued its upward journey.

Jack furrowed his brow, scratching his head. “I thought the door was just unlocked.”

“Why would Gianna leave her door unlocked?”

Jack shrugged. “I don’t know. Felt invincible because of her ties to The Agency?”

Marcus clicked his tongue as Cate patted his arm.

“He’s new to magic.”

“Obviously.”

The doors opened, and Marcus led them from the elevator, finding apartment C. With a flick of his wrist, he pushed the door open. An empty flat lay beyond it. Cate stepped inside, her heels echoing off the hardwood flooring.

“Do you think they moved her?” she asked, her voice echoing in the empty space.

“It’s possible. Though it’s also entirely possible that she has never been here.”

Cate scanned the space again, bobbing her head up and down. “Okay, well, I guess we should have a look around.”

“I’ll go with you, Cate,” Jack said, sliding his arm around her shoulders.

“Okay. We’ll check the bedrooms.”

Marcus nodded as he studied the empty bookcase.

Cate led Jack down a hall and entered the last door. She strode across the room and tugged open the closet door, searching the inside for any clues.

“Nothing,” she said as Jack emerged from another door across the space leading to an en-suite bathroom.

“Me either.”

“Let’s try the room across the hall.”

Jack nodded, and they hurried to the second bedroom. "I don't know how you can be so calm, Cate," he said as he swept a hand across the empty shelf in the closet, sending a spray of dust into the air.

"What do you mean?" she asked, spinning to face him after checking the corners.

"I mean all of this. Magic. Him." Jack pressed his lips together as his features pinched. "Your illness."

Cate shrugged as they crossed the hall to another bedroom. "As hard as this is for you to hear, I trust him."

She tugged open the closet door, and, upon finding it empty, pushed it shut, finding Jack on the other side.

"You can't be serious."

"I am."

"Do you really trust him or are you just going along with him because he's saying what you want to hear?"

Cate studied him for a moment. "He's not saying what I want to hear."

"How do you know? You wanted to look for clues. He says you're fine. How can you put your life in his hands, Cate?"

Cate shuffled around the room in search of anything that may be a link to Gertrude. She came to a stop before answering, sucking in a deep breath. "Because my life has been in his hands multiple times already, and he's come through every time."

She did a final scan of the space. "There's nothing here. Should we try the last door?"

Jack didn't answer for a moment, staring at her. "Did he put a spell on you?"

Cate burst into laughter. "What?"

"I'm serious, Cate. Did he put some sort of magical spell on you?"

"No," she said with another chuckle before her smile faded. "At least, I don't think so."

"So, you don't know," Jack answered, wagging a finger at her as she strode from the room.

"I do know. Mostly."

"Mostly?"

Cate switched on the light in the windowless room across the hall, finding a small bathroom. "He didn't, okay?"

"How can you be so sure?"

Cate glanced up at him, one shoulder rising toward her ear as she wrinkled her nose and prepared to answer. "Jack, I—"

"Catherine?" Marcus's voice called from the living room.

"Coming!" she answered. "We should go. We have three more locations to check."

She smiled at him and squeezed his hand before tugging him toward the door.

"Did you find anything?" she asked as she stepped into the square living room again.

"Nothing. There is no sign anyone has been here in the past several months since The Agency acquired it."

Cate frowned as she took a final look around the space. "Oh well. On to the next."

Marcus nodded as he placed his hand against her back and guided her toward the door. Voices sounded in the hall. Cate froze as a woman cackled before murmuring something to the man who had just spoken.

Her eyes went wide, and she snapped her gaze to Marcus. "That's Gianna! And it sounds like she's coming here!"

Cate bit into her lower lip as she realized they were trapped.

CHAPTER 13

Marcus pulled her closer to him. “We’ll location hop to the car.”
“No,” Cate answered with a shake of her head, “we may overhear something crucial.”

“We need to hide,” Jack hissed. “Before they catch us.”

Keys jangled outside the door as Gianna’s voice became louder.

“Bedroom closet,” Cate said, tiptoeing into the hall and hurrying to the master bedroom. She raced across the room and flung the door open. She stepped inside with Marcus and spun to find Jack grimacing on the outside.

“I’ll go to the other one.”

“No, Jack! There’s no time. You’ll get caught. Come on, there’s room.” She waved him inside and pulled the door shut behind them.

“This is not at all how I hoped the day would turn out,” Jack whispered as the sounds of the door opening reached their ears.

Marcus slid his arm around Cate, pulling her closer to him. Jack frowned as she slipped her arm around his waist and leaned into him, knitting her brows as she concentrated on the conversation floating their way.

“Love the bookcases,” Gianna said.

“I thought you would,” Arnold Chapman’s voice answered her.

Footsteps approached their location, stopping every so often. Cate’s heart pounded against her ribs as Gianna’s high heels clicked closer and closer.

Marcus tightened his grip on her when Arnold's voice echoed off the walls of the master bedroom. "What do you think?"

"Mmmm, it's roomy."

"You could do it up any way you'd like."

Silence met the statement for a moment before Arnold spoke again. "And look at that view."

"But I like my old flat."

"Then keep that, too. Whatever you want, Gigi."

Cate rolled her eyes. High-heeled footsteps shuffled across the room, sounding on the tiled bathroom floor before clicking back onto the hardwood.

"I don't know, Arnie. Perhaps the closet space can convince me."

Footsteps closed in on their location. Cate tightened her grip on Marcus as her heart pounded harder.

"Now, there's no need for that. I assure you it's adequate."

A giggle resounded as a thud jiggled the closet door. "Arnie," Gianna said with a chuckle.

"What?"

Another thud against the door. "You are insatiable."

"You're kidding me," Cate hissed.

Arnold's voice turned breathy. "I think you should take this flat. Think of all the new memories we can create here."

Cate wrinkled her nose at the statement as the sounds of lips smacking filled the air.

"All right, you've convinced me."

"Good. Let's properly christen the place, then, shall we?"

Cate grimaced, shaking her head. "Oh, gross."

"Perhaps we should leave," Marcus whispered in her ear.

Cate glanced up to answer when the conversation outside the closet changed.

"Just a moment. Let's save celebrating for the appropriate time."

"Appropriate time?" Arnold asked.

"My plan hasn't quite come off yet," Gianna said. Footsteps clicked away from the door.

Cate held a finger in the air, pressing her lips together as she listened.

"You're on track though, aren't you?"

“I’ve got some new tricks up my sleeve,” Gianna answered. “I’m still working everything out, but this could be our ticket.”

“And what of your nemesis?”

A sigh sounded and more high-heeled footsteps plodded across the room. “Cate Kensie is not my nemesis. Merely a thorn in my side.”

“Quite the thorn, apparently.”

“How that unalluring dimwit managed to convince a man like Marcus Northcott to marry her is beyond me.”

Cate’s jaw dropped open, and she stuck a hand on her hip.

“Yet she has. So, what is your play?”

Cate dipped her head forward, straining for the answer.

“I’m still working it all out. But as long as she continues to chase her tail looking for her benefactor and drag Northcott along with her, I have the advantage. I just need a bit more time to work out all the details.”

“Can you string her along for that long?”

“I think so. She’s rather stuck, isn’t she? She has to find Gertrude. Which gives me time to move forward with my next plan.”

“I won’t press you for details...yet. Though, what if the esteemed duchess gives up the chase? I assume you have her benefactor hidden quite well.”

“She won’t. I’ll slip her a clue to keep her on the trail.”

“And what if she finds the old biddy?”

Cate clamped her jaw closed, shaking her head.

“Let her. I’ve found a much more delicious angle to work that is guaranteed to bring us Dunhaven Castle.”

“I like the sound of that,” Arnold said before more lip-smacking replaced their conversation. A giddy moan escaped Gianna. “I like the sound of that even more.”

The couple giggled for a bit more before the sounds of kissing replaced their laughter.

“Time to go,” Cate said as Jack grimaced.

“I think we’re pretty stuck,” Jack whispered as the sound of a body smacking against the wall echoed.

“You really are ignorant,” Marcus huffed as he pulled Cate close to him.

“Don’t leave Jack,” she warned.

Marcus pressed his lips together as he reached for Jack’s hand. Jack pulled his back, screwing up his face.

“Give him your hand,” Cate said as another moan cut through the air. “Quickly.”

Jack eyed him suspiciously as he held out his hand. Marcus grabbed it and the dark room faded away, replaced by an overcast day.

Cate glanced around, finding their car on the side street they’d parked on earlier. “Thank goodness you got us out of there. I couldn’t take much more of that.”

Jack stood unmoving as his gaze slid around. He swallowed hard, wiping at his pale face. “What the hell just happened.”

“Location hop,” Cate and Marcus said simultaneously as they headed for the vehicle.

“What?” Jack questioned, hurrying after them.

“A location hop. Marcus can move from one location to another instantly. And lucky for us and our ears, he can take us with him.”

“That was rather disturbing,” Jack said with another gulp.

“I know,” Cate answered as they slipped into the car. “Gianna and her shenanigans with any man who will look her way was something I never hoped to have first-hand knowledge of.”

Jack slid into the front seat and twisted to face her. “I meant the location hop.”

“Oh,” Cate answered, crinkling her brow.

“One minute we were in a closet. The next we were on the street. I’m not certain I’ve fully recovered.”

“I am no amateur, Mr. Reid. But if you prefer, I will gladly leave you behind the next time Catherine and I make a hasty exit.”

Jack glared at him.

“I’m sure Jack appreciates your unique talent. Just give him a chance to take it all in.”

The car merged into traffic and headed for the next location on the list.

“I hope we find something at one of these places. I did not like that conversation at all. What other things is she pursuing?” Cate asked.

“I’m afraid to find out.”

“She’s already kidnapped you, so it must be something else. But what? What guarantees her Dunhaven Castle? Especially if she doesn’t care if we find Gertrude?”

Cate stared at her lap as she tried to parse through the meaning in her mind. “And what clue is she going to feed us? How long is she going to have us following these leads around?”

“Until her next plan comes to fruition,” Marcus answered.

“Which is what?” Cate asked again with a sigh.

“I don’t know,” Jack said, scrubbing his face, “but I hate this.”

“Buck up, Reid. The Agency is not an easily surmountable enemy. This battle will rage for quite some time.”

Jack shook his head before letting it fall into his hands. “I hope we can withstand it.”

“Look to Catherine for a shining example. She has already spent time fighting them on your behalf. She has nearly died on your behalf. And now she leads the charge to save Gertrude MacKenzie from their clutches even as they move on to a new target.”

Jack twisted to face them, his features pinching.

“So, dig deep and find your backbone. You’ll need it. And Catherine will need your support.”

“As long as we protect Dunhaven Castle and everyone in it, it doesn’t matter how long it goes on,” Cate said as she squeezed Marcus’s hand.

Marcus kept his eyes trained on Jack as he tugged Cate’s hand closer to him, patting it.

“We need to find a clue before Gianna leaks it to us. We need to give her less time for her plan than she wants.”

“Excellent, Catherine. We should strive to keep them as off-balance as they try to make you.”

“Easier said than done, I think,” Jack answered. “How can we make that happen?”

“By looking for some sort of evidence and not worrying about things we don’t need to worry about right now. We have to prioritize,” Cate said.

“And we must trust each other,” Marcus said, threading his fingers through Cate’s.

“Right,” Cate said with a nod. Both backseat passengers turned their gazes to Jack.

He paused for a moment before poking a finger toward his chest. “Oh, me? I trust you, Cate.”

Marcus flicked his eyebrows up.

Jack switched his gaze between them. “Is that good enough?”

“It would be really good if you trusted both of us,” Cate said. “We need to be a united front.”

Jack frowned, his eyes sliding toward Marcus. "Okay."

"Okay, what?" Marcus asked.

Jack narrowed his eyes at the man. "I...trust...Cate and so by extension I...we are a united front."

"I think that's the best he can do right now," Cate said, patting Marcus's hand. "We'll take it. As long as we're all on the same side, we're good."

Marcus offered Jack a smirk as he clasped Cate's hand in both of his. Jack spun in his seat, blowing out a breath as he faced forward.

Cate cocked her head at his behavior. "Are you okay, Jack?"

"Oh, I'm just swell."

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as she stared at the back of his head. "I know the location hop is odd at first—"

"To say the least. I just location hopped with a guy who...never mind," Jack said, throwing his hands in the air. "We're all on the same side."

"That's right. And it's a good thing because we need everyone to figure this out."

"Let's hope there is a clue at this property," Jack said as the car rolled to a stop.

Cate stared up at the house. "Looks promising."

They stepped out of the car as thunder rumbled overhead. Cate hurried up the walk behind Marcus, pelted by large drops of rain falling from the overcast skies.

Marcus opened the door, allowing her to enter first before he stepped inside behind her. Jack brought up the rear, closing the door behind them.

They glanced around the empty space. Cate toggled the light switch on, but nothing bloomed to life. "No power."

Light sparked to life as Marcus conjured a fireball, leaving it floating above his hand. "Come along, Catherine. I shall accompany you this time."

Cate shook her head. "We should stick together. With no light, we could miss something." She flicked her gaze to Marcus. "Besides, we shouldn't leave him alone. The Agency has come after him once. We can't afford a second time."

"You are correct, dear. Come along, Reid. Keep your eyes open for any signs of the former mistress of Dunhaven."

Jack shuffled behind them into the room on their right. Cate stepped to the window, staring out of it for a moment as she tried to picture Gertrude here. An ache settled between her shoulders, and she wiggled them to relieve the pain.

By the time they worked their way through the downstairs, her temples throbbed. She lagged a step behind Marcus as they climbed up the stairs to the next floor.

Rain pelted the window at the top of the stairs.

“Catherine?” Marcus questioned as they reached the top. She stared out at the drops running down the glass.

“Cate?” Jack asked, his voice dull and echoing.

Thunder boomed overhead as images flashed through her mind. Her eyelashes fluttered. She turned, stalking ahead toward a bedroom at the back of the house. She hovered in the doorway as lightning lit the space.

Cate wandered into the middle of the room and stood for a breath before she spun in a slow circle. Her gaze fell to the floor. She took a few steps forward and dropped to her knees.

“Cate!” Jack shouted, racing toward her. “Are you hurt?”

Cate’s fingers dug into the thick mauve carpet. She pulled up her hand. A gold chain dangled from her index finger.

She tilted her head, studying the medallion on the chain. “G.M.,” she read.

“Gertrude MacKenzie,” Jack breathed.

“She was here,” Cate said, breaking into a grin. “She was here.”

Marcus lifted the charm and studied it. “Excellent work, Catherine.”

“Too bad she isn’t still here,” Jack said.

“No, they moved her when we arrived, I’d bet. But to where?” Cate questioned. She wrapped her fingers around the bracelet as she sat on her haunches. Images shot through her mind again.

She blinked her eyes as they flitted past. Thunder rumbled again.

“Catherine?”

“It’s happening again,” she said, her voice strained.

Marcus extinguished the fireball, dropping to a knee at her side and rubbing her back. “Breathe, Catherine.”

Cate’s features pinched as the pressure in her temples increased. She squeezed her eyes closed, grasping at the sides of her head. A tear rolled down her cheek. Her fists unfurled into shaky hands, and the bracelet fell to the carpet below.

Cate gasped in a sharp breath as her mind cleared in an instant. She braced herself against the rug with a hand as she tried to steady her breathing.

“Easy, Catherine. Tell me what just happened.”

“Images. Lots of them. They just come in a rush, and it’s painful. My head feels like it’s going to explode.”

Marcus rubbed her back as she blew out a long breath and sat back on her haunches. Jack sighed and shook his head.

“All right,” Marcus said with another rub of her back, “I think it’s time we pay a visit to Mother. I don’t think this can wait any longer.”

She licked her lips, clutching his forearm as she cut her gaze to him. Her features pinched again as she fought back the emotion bubbling inside her. “Am I going to be okay?”

“Yes, dear, you are. I promise,” he said, stroking her hair.

Cate nodded, climbing to her feet. Her knees wobbled, and she kept a firm hold of both men. Her stomach turned over. A lump formed in her throat. She tried to cling to Marcus’s words, but she worried he’d underestimated her illness.

Not temporalysis, her mind repeated. But if not that, then what? And would she survive it?

CHAPTER 14

Cate's fingernails dug into the palms of her hands until they hurt. Rain pelted the car roof as she stared out the water-streaked window. She'd fought to keep her heart rate steady, and her hands from shaking, but the latest attack had rattled her.

More severe than the others, the intensity of the experience left her drained. She struggled to keep her eyes open as weariness wore her down.

She couldn't imagine an outcome where things turned out okay. Temporalysis could be fatal. And based on the severity of what she experienced now versus her previous illness, she couldn't fathom surviving this one.

Perhaps Marcus's mother had some sort of cure. She'd helped Jack, stabilized him when he almost died from temporalysis. Perhaps she could do something similar for her.

She wrung her hands in her lap as worry built. Warm fingers wrapped around her hand and tugged it away from the other. She offered Marcus a fleeting smile before she returned her gaze to the rain falling.

They arrived at the house, and Cate slid from the car, struggling to make it up the walk as tiredness coursed through her.

"I think you should rest before we go," Marcus said as they pushed into the foyer.

"Rest? Are you serious?" Jack questioned. "We should go right away. She's getting worse."

"A nap will not harm her. She is exhausted. This is wearing on her."

Cate heaved a sigh as she listened to the argument. An ache lodged itself between her shoulders again.

"It's fine," she said. "I'm going to lie down. We'll go as soon as I wake up."

"Of course, dear."

Cate waved to acknowledge the comment as she tugged herself up the stairs, clinging to the banister to avoid stumbling. She shambled to her room and collapsed on the bed. Her eyes closed as voices floated from downstairs. They grew more distant as she dozed off.

She startled awake, her eyes fluttering open to find only darkness. She rolled onto her side, scanning the room. A sigh of relief escaped her as she recognized her bedroom in the London townhouse.

She glanced at the clock, her eyes going wide. It read after eleven. She glanced out the window at the starry sky. Her features pinched as she hurried off the bed and scrambled down to the first floor.

Marcus read in the wingbacked chair near the fireplace. He glanced up from his book as she raced into the room, breathless from her dash. "I slept longer than I hoped. I'm sorry."

He closed his book and rose from his chair, approaching the drink cart. "How do you feel?"

"Fine. No nightmares. I'm sorry—"

"Catherine..." He squeezed her shoulder, passing off a brandy. "It's all right."

She sipped at it. "I really didn't mean to sleep this long. Where is Jack?"

"Asleep. I told him to rest, and for once he listened. Only after I assured him that we would wake him before we departed."

"I'm surprised he believed you," Cate said before taking another sip of the drink and settling back into the cushions behind her.

"As am I. Perhaps we should leave—"

"No," Cate said with a shake of her head, "absolutely not."

Marcus pressed his lips together. "Fine."

Cate let her head fall back against the pillow. "I'm worried."

"I know," Marcus said. "After we consult with Mother, I think things will become clearer."

"Can't you give me a hint?"

"I would prefer not to misspeak. And Mother is the best to assess your condition."

Cate chewed her lower lip before taking another sip of the brandy.

"You will be fine, Catherine. Mother can help."

Cate nodded without glancing at him. She stared at her shimmering reflection in the amber liquid.

He hovered over her, and his finger traced her jawline, tipping her chin up. "Trust me."

She offered him a fleeting smile. "I do. Mostly."

"Mostly?" he asked with a coy grin. "I will have to do something about that. That is the biggest obstacle we face at the moment."

She chuckled, and the corners of her lips turned up despite herself.

Marcus poured himself another brandy. "Stefano checked the other two locations and found nothing. I thought you may want to know."

Cate sighed, shaking her head. "So, we're stuck again. So much for getting a step ahead of Ravishing Rita."

"Who?"

"Oh, Gianna. I nicknamed her Ravishing Rita when we met her in 1942. She couldn't keep her hands off Jack. Although, I never thought she'd actually nab him."

"Gianna will do anything she can to unnerve you," Marcus said, settling on the couch next to her.

"She seems to enjoy it."

"I'm certain she does. She loves to push your buttons. Don't let her."

Cate stared up at him through her eyelashes, clutching the brandy glass to her chest. "Easier said than done."

"Why does she bother you so?"

Cate let her head roll to the side. "Oh, let me count the ways."

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her.

"Seriously? You want me to name them?"

"I want you to stop allowing her to goad you. And to do that, you must understand why she does."

"She's a...she's awful," Cate said with a glance at him. "She's overly flirtatious. She uses her looks to get ahead. She takes pleasure in hurting other people. Especially me. The way she twisted the knife with everyone at Dunhaven was truly disgusting."

"She is jealous."

"Right. I'm sure she is."

Marcus sipped at his brandy. "I assure you she is."

“Oh, right,” Cate said, wagging a finger in the air, “you’re right. She would so love to woo you to her side and be a duchess.”

“That will never happen. Though your excellent match is hardly the only source of her jealousy.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as she considered the statement. “Right again. My husband and my castle.”

Marcus slid a lock of hair behind her ear. “And many other things.”

Cate twisted to face him.

“She can’t hold a candle to you, Catherine, and she knows that.”

Cate’s forehead pinched as she stared into his dark eyes, contemplating the statement.

“Cate!” Jack’s voice called from the entrance. “You’re up.”

Cate sucked in a breath, turning away from him to find Jack stumbling into the room, his hair mussed and his clothes wrinkled.

“Perfect timing, Mr. Reid,” Marcus grumbled with a sigh as he rose to stand.

“I woke up a little bit ago. I hadn’t planned to sleep that long. I guess the experience at the abandoned house wore on me more than I thought.”

Jack collapsed onto the cushion where Marcus had sat a moment ago. “I’ll bet. Do we have to wait until the morning to get answers?”

“No. We should go now. I’m certain Catherine would like to have this settled.”

“You are correct,” Cate answered, climbing from the couch. She finished her brandy and set the glass on the bar.

Jack rose, too. “Is she coming here or are we going to her?”

“We will go to Rosenberg. I think the atmosphere there will be conducive to setting Catherine’s nerves at ease.”

Cate set her hands on her hips. “Answers will be conducive to setting Catherine’s nerves. Please say Germany isn’t too far for a location hop because I don’t think I can stand several hours on a plane in the 1950s.”

“Of course not, dear. I am no amateur.” He held out his hand, and Cate grabbed it.

“Mr. Reid,” Marcus said, holding out his other hand.

Jack blew out a sharp breath. “Another jumpy thing. Just one minute we’re here, and the next we’re in Germany?”

Marcus stared at him, unblinking. “That is the plan.”

Jack's lips form an O as he exhaled again. "Okay, right. Sure. Yes. Just..." He let out another breath, nodding his head. "Just one minute. I just..."

Jack bent over, steadying himself against his legs.

Marcus heaved a sigh, slipping his arm around Cate's waist as they waited.

"Sorry," he said, waving a hand in the air while still bent over.

"It's okay, Jack. Take your time."

"Is he always this much of a coward?" Marcus asked her.

"Hey, listen—" Jack said straightening.

"He doesn't like time travel either. Even the tame kind without the scary portal."

Jack held a hand in the air. "No, I don't. I don't, in general, like things that go against the natural grain of things like going to another time where you could kill your father or talk to yourself or instantaneously traveling from one location to another one thousands of miles away by some unknown means."

"The means are very known. Location hops are quite standard...for those capable, anyway."

"Well, they're not standard for me," Jack said as he straightened.

"Unsurprising. Have you collected yourself yet? I'm certain Catherine would like to get her answers sooner rather than later."

Jack stretched his neck, then shook his head. "No, but I'm ready."

Cate grabbed his hand and smiled. "It'll be okay. Marcus is an expert."

Jack grimaced as he grabbed the man's hand. "Right."

Marcus tightened his grasp around Cate and the room faded from her view, replaced by the foyer of Rosenberg Castle.

"There, made it, see?" Cate said, clapping Jack on the shoulder.

Jack scanned the space. "Yeah. I guess we did."

"There is no guessing about it, Mr. Reid. Welcome to Rosenberg Palace. Why don't you go into the sitting room, dear, and I'll wake Mother? Unless you'd prefer your room."

Cate squeezed his arm. "Sitting room is fine. Thanks. Please apologize ahead of time for waking her in the middle of the night."

She threaded her arm through Jack's and pulled him toward the large sitting room off the foyer. She pushed inside and led him to the sofa.

“I’m not sure I should sit. But I’m also not sure I can stand. These location hops are...unnerving.”

“I know,” Cate said, patting his arm. “Take a seat in the armchair. I’m sure this entire situation is wearing on you given your recent temporalysis.”

“No more wearing than your current situation. Whatever that may be.” He sank into the chair and shook his head, clasping his hands until his knuckles turned white. “Oh, Cate, I hope he knows what he’s talking about.”

Cate bit her lower lip, considering her answer when the door popped open across the room. Marcus strode in with Anna hurrying behind him in a dressing gown.

“Catherine,” she said, rushing over with her red robe flying behind her. She pulled Cate into an embrace, “how lovely to see you.”

Anna leaned away from her, brushing a lock of hair from Cate’s face. “Marcus says you’re having some difficulties.”

“A little,” Cate answered with a nod. “We’re hoping you can help.”

“Of course, dear. Let me ring for tea.” She glanced at Jack who stood near the armchair, her muscles stiffening. “Oh, Mr. Reid, how lovely to see you. You are looking quite a bit better than when I saw you last.”

“I’m feeling quite a bit better. And I understand some of that has to do with your excellent care of me. Thank you for that.”

“You’re welcome.” Anna offered him a curt nod as she led Cate to the sofa and eased her to sit. “Marcus, ring for tea.”

“Oh, really, it’s fine,” Cate said. “No need to wake the household.”

“There is every need, dear,” Anna said, patting her hand. “Now, tell me what is happening with you.”

“Well, as you know when I was here last, I had temporalysis.”

“I remember, yes. It passed if I recall.”

“I thought it did, however...”

Anna squeezed her hands as the housekeeper rushed in still in her dressing gown. “Oh, Mrs. Higgins. Tea right away, please.”

The woman nodded and scurried from the room. Anna returned her gaze to Cate. “Continue, dear.”

“The nightmares and visions have started again.”

Anna narrowed her eyes at Cate.

“Tell her from the start,” Marcus said as he settled into the chair next to Jack.

“The first start or the second start?” Cate asked.

“The first. Leave nothing out.”

“Okay,” Cate said, blowing out a long breath before starting. “I started having nightmares and visions about a passage in my library. I had them for a while before we found the secret passage there. Then...” She licked her lips, flicking her gaze to her hands. “Dreams about Marcus. After I met him, I began having visions of the ball.”

“Your wedding ball,” Anna clarified.

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod, “and that’s when I started wandering the castle, losing time, confusing where I was.”

“That ended after the ball, correct?”

Cate swallowed hard. “Right, no more wandering around, but...I’m having dreams and visions again.”

“Of?”

Cate’s features pinched. “I’m not sure. It’s random images. Sometimes I can’t make anything out. They’re painful. Crippling, at times.”

“I see,” Anna answered, flicking her gaze to Marcus. “And you assessed this?”

“Yes. But I wanted your opinion as you have first-hand experience with this.”

“Quite right,” Anna said. She placed a hand against Cate’s cheek before moving it to her forehead. She cupped Cate’s face in her hands and stared into her eyes.

Anna held a finger up, rising and kissing Cate’s forehead. “Wait here.”

The housekeeper bustled in with the tea, sliding the tray onto the coffee table.

“Thank you,” Marcus said, dismissing her.

He poured a cup and passed it to Cate. Cate stirred in her sugar and sipped at the beverage, fidgeting in her seat.

“Almost, dear,” Marcus said, rubbing a finger against her cheek.

She gave him a tight-lipped smile, taking another sip of tea as her leg bobbed up and down.

Jack poured himself a cup of tea and sank into the chair. He took one sip before he slid the saucer onto the table and leaned forward, balancing his elbows on his bobbling legs.

The doors to the room opened again and Anna hurried in with a glass case containing a floating purple rose. Cate’s eyes went wide as she stared at it. Anna slid it onto the coffee table before she tugged Cate's teacup and saucer from her hands, setting them aside.

"I'm certain you recognize this," she said.

"One of the roses from your garden," Cate said.

"Not just any rose," Anna said as she lifted the glass. "The rose Marcus gave you before your ball on your first visit here. I had it preserved for you."

Heat rushed into Cate's cheeks as she shot a nervous glance at Jack, fluttering her eyelashes.

"Now, what I want you to do is touch the petals with your fingertips. You may need to use both hands. Give it a few seconds, and tell me what happens."

"Oh, uh, okay." Cate swallowed hard, staring at the floating rose. She slid her eyes sideways toward Anna, wondering what reaction the woman expected. She shot a glance at Marcus who poured a cup of tea, adding milk and sugar before passing it to his mother. He offered Cate an encouraging nod and smile.

Cate sucked in a breath and stretched her shaking hands forward.

Anna rubbed Cate's back. "Relax, dear."

Cate swallowed hard and let the fingers of both hands caress the rose petals. As her skin touched the silky softness, images flooded her mind, appearing and disappearing faster than she could process. She gasped, pulling her fingers away and cutting her gaze to Anna.

"Tell me what happened?" Anna prompted.

"Images again. Lots of them. I let go before it became painful."

The woman's lips curled on the edges, and she replaced the glass cover on the rose. "As I suspected."

Cate's crinkled her forehead. "What is it? What's wrong with me? Do you know?"

Anna sipped her tea, raising her eyebrows at Marcus. "Would you prefer to tell her?"

Cate's stomach turned over as she wondered what ailment afflicted her this time. Would it prove deadly?

CHAPTER 15

“I defer to you, Mother,” Marcus said. “I am certain you will deliver the news in the best way for Catherine.”

Anna slid her saucer onto the table and twisted to face Cate. She grasped her hands and smiled at her.

Tears shone in Cate’s eyes, and her forehead pinched. “What is it? Just tell me straight out. Tell me what it is and how long I have.”

“How long you have? Oh, darling.” Anna caressed her cheek. “You’re not dying.”

Cate blinked back her tears. “I’m not?”

“No, of course not.”

“You mean it’s not temporalysis or something similar?”

Anna shook her head, smiling at Cate. “No, you’re not ill.”

Cate scrunched her eyebrows tighter. “Then what is wrong with me?”

“Nothing is wrong with you, Catherine. But you are having these experiences for a reason.”

“Which is?” Jack prompted.

Anna’s smile broadened. “You are clairvoyant.”

Cate stared at her for a moment, unsure she’d heard correctly. “I’m what?”

“Clairvoyant,” Anna said. She let go of Cate’s hands and retrieved her teacup, sipping the warm liquid.

“Clairvoyant? Like a...fortune teller?”

Anna chuckled, shooting a glance at Marcus who smirked at the question. "Oh, I do love her, Marcus. No, dear, not like a charlatan with a crystal ball or a deck of cards. You are a true clairvoyant. You can see the future."

"See the future?" Cate shook her head. "No, I—I can't see the future."

"I assure you that you can, my darling."

"But...the visions and the nightmares...they were part of my temporalysis."

Anna shook her head, sliding the saucer onto the coffee table again. "No. Only the time losses and wandering were symptoms of the temporalysis. The dreams and visions are part of your gift."

"But..." Cate's scrunched up her face, blinking rapidly as she tried to make sense of it.

"I assure you that's what it is. You are not ill. Nothing is wrong with you. You are a clairvoyant. I know because I'm also somewhat of a clairvoyant myself."

"How did this happen to me? I've never had this before."

"You've never had it or you've never noticed it?" Anna asked.

Cate retrieved her teacup, staring into the amber liquid. "No, I've never had this."

"Think hard, Catherine. You may not have noticed it. Or you may have written it off."

"I have never had anything like this. It's crippling. These images flash across my mind faster than I can process. That's never happened to me."

"Maybe not. Your gift is stronger now. But you likely have had premonitions and dreams before."

Cate swallowed hard, heat washing through her body. "I dreamt about my parents dying before it happened."

"Yes, that's it. See? Clairvoyant." Anna wagged a finger at her before clasping her hands and circling them around her knees.

Cate pressed a hand against her forehead as she balanced the saucer in the other. "I don't understand any of this."

"And that is why I brought you to Mother," Marcus said. "She can help you."

"Yes, of course, dear. You need to learn how to process this."

"Obviously," Cate said. "I can't even begin to fathom how to wrap my head around this."

“Oh, no, no,” Anna said with a chuckle, patting Cate’s hand, “you misunderstand. You need to learn how to handle the images. How to make sense of them. And most importantly, how to ensure they are not crippling.”

Cate sat motionless at the news.

“But I think this information is enough for today,” Anna said. “You need to rest.”

“Oh, no, I just woke up shortly before we came here. I’m fine.”

“You need to let this sink in. And you need to sleep. You should do that more easily now that you know you are not sick.” Anna smiled at her, rubbing her cheek. Her eyebrows shot up. “Oh, of course, you’re worried about another nightmare. I have a solution for that. I’ll make you a sleeping draught that will ensure you sleep soundly without any disturbances.”

Cate nodded, her lips still parted as she tried to form words but found none. “Y-yes,” she finally stammered, “that would be appreciated.”

“It’s all right, Catherine,” Anna said as she rose. “Try to relax.”

Cate scooted back on the sofa, drumming her fingers on the cushion. Marcus joined her, pushing a lock of hair behind her ear. “You see? I told you that you were not ill.”

She shifted her gaze to him. “I’m not sure this is an improvement. It’s worse than the temporalysis.”

“It is not. And it is quite useful. Do not worry, dear, Mother will help you control it.” Marcus took her hand in his and squeezed.

She nodded and offered him a tight-lipped smile. “Right. Okay. Yes. You’re right. This is better than temporalysis. I’m not dying. I only feel like I am at times.”

“And Mother will help you temper that.”

“Right. Okay. Yes.” She slid her eyes closed and drew in a deep breath. “I’m fine. It’s fine. I’ll be fine.”

“I’m not sure I will be fine. I don’t think I can recover from any of this.” Jack’s leg bobbed up and down frantically. “The portals and the location thingy and now this? Cate Kensie can see the future?” His jaw gaped, and he blinked hard.

“Maybe Anna should give you a sleeping draught, too,” Cate said.

Marcus rolled his eyes as he rubbed Cate’s shoulders. “You are far too needy, Reid. I’m certain you’ll be fine.”

Anna bustled back inside with a small vial of liquid. She dumped it into Cate’s teacup and poured more steaming tea before dropping sugar cubes into it and stirring. "Drink this. It will help you sleep soundly, and we'll talk more tomorrow."

She passed the teacup to Cate. With a smile, Cate accepted it and sipped at the sweet liquid.

"I have assured Catherine that you will assist her in controlling her visions."

"Yes, of course. Do not worry, dear, we will make sure they are not as crippling. I promise."

"Thank you," Cate said as she finished the tea. "

"Now, you should go to bed. The draught will not take long to work. Marcus, you did not arrange for her ladies' maid to be here."

"My apologies, Mother, we came rather hastily."

Anna clicked her tongue. "That is no excuse. You should have planned ahead. No matter, I will help you, Catherine."

"It's not necessary, thank you. I can manage." Cate stood, her legs wobbly from the experience and the quick-acting sleeping potion. She glanced at Marcus. "You'll see to Jack?"

"Of course."

Cate smiled at him and took a step toward the door, one weak knee giving way as she stepped. Marcus leapt from his seat to steady her.

"Oh, that is fast-acting," she murmured, rubbing at her forehead.

He scooped her into his arms. "I shall return for you, Reid."

He carried her into the foyer and up the wide staircase as Cate shook her head.

"You will find any excuse to carry me around, won't you?"

Marcus smiled at her and winked as he climbed the stairs. "I asked Mother to make it extra strong just so I could carry you."

"I wouldn't put it past you," she said with a yawn. "Though this time I am rather grateful. Whatever is in this stuff is incredibly strong."

"I have no doubt Mother made certain it was strong enough to suppress any visions that may creep into your sleep."

"I hope you're right. I hope it's enough to let my mind wrap around this. I never imagined this was what I'd hear."

"And what did you think you would hear?" he asked as he strode past the statues lining the hall.

"Some weird illness that would slowly kill me. Or at least make life very uncomfortable until I survived it."

Marcus smiled at her as he strode toward the double doors of her room.

“Wait, I’ll get the handle.”

“Unnecessary, Catherine,” Marcus answered. As the doors blew open in front of them, he wiggled his eyebrows at her.

“Showoff,” she said with a coy smile.

He set her down inside, careful not to remove his hand until she was steady. “Are you certain you are all right?”

Cate yawned and nodded. “Yes, thank you.”

“Good night, dear. Sleep well.”

He stepped from the room, and she closed the doors behind him, leaning against them before she pulled her weary body away from them. She shuffled across the room, wondering if she could find her centuries-old nightgown.

As she approached the bed, she spotted a nightgown and robe laid out. The corners of her lips turned up. The housekeeper must have laid it out for her.

After changing, she slipped between the sheets, collapsing back against the pillows. Her tired eyes slid closed, and she relaxed into sleep.

When her eyelids fluttered open, bright sunshine streamed through the large window. She stretched and smiled at the sunny morning. She’d slept soundly with no nightmares.

A knock sounded at her door. “Come in!” she called.

“Your Grace, you’re awake,” Andrea said as she strode across the sitting room toward her.

“Andrea,” Cate said with a broad smile, spinning to face her. “How did you get here?”

“His Grace fetched me last night. I’ll ring for breakfast and set your clothes out for the day. We can dress whenever you’re ready.”

“I’m ready,” Cate said, taking a seat at the vanity.

“I didn’t want to interrupt your viewing of the garden.”

Andrea fixed her hair and helped her change before another knock sounded.

“That must be your breakfast,” Andrea said, rushing across the room to the door. She pulled it open, offering a quick courtesy. “Oh, good morning.”

Anna bustled into the room with the tray. “Good morning, Andrea. Good morning, Catherine. I took it upon myself to wrangle the tray from the maid and bring it.”

“Oh, thank you,” Cate said as she settled at the table in the sitting room. “You didn’t have to do that.”

“In truth, I wished to check on you. Did you sleep well?”

“Yes,” Cate answered. “No disturbances. Would you like to join me for tea?”

“Excellent. Ah, no dear, I just wanted to be certain you slept. I’m going to take in the gardens, but we will begin your training this afternoon.”

“All right,” Cate said with a nod. “Is Marcus up?”

“Out already,” Anna said with a flick of her hand. “Though he assures me he will not be long. He is following up on something to do with a recent discovery you made. He said you’d know what that means.”

“Oh, yes, I understand. Thank you.”

“Of course, dear. Try to relax and we’ll begin later.”

Cate slathered jam onto her toast. “Actually, I hoped to do some reading on my condition.”

“A wonderful idea. You are quite clever. It is no wonder Marcus adores you.”

Cate swallowed hard as heat rose in her cheeks. Anna patted Cate’s shoulder, leaning down to kiss her forehead. Andrea curtsied as Anna strode from the room before she approached Cate.

“Is there anything else you need, Your Grace?”

“Yes, do you happen to know where Jack is?”

“I believe Mr. Reid is several halls over in the bachelor’s wing.”

“Of course. Would you mind waiting and showing me the way?”

“Not at all,” Andrea said. Cate hurried to finish her breakfast, popping the last piece of toast into her mouth and standing as she wiped her mouth. “Ready.”

Andrea led her through the halls of the enormous castle, leading her to a single door tucked at the end of an obscure hall. Cate thanked her and sent her on her way before she knocked on the door.

Jack yanked it open a second later. “Oh, Cate, thank goodness. I had no idea where to find you. I’ve been worried.”

“I’m fine. I slept well. Did you get any sleep?”

“A little. Not much. I tried knocking on all of the doors in this hall, but nothing. I tried again this morning, too. Where is your room?”

“Oh, it’s across the castle,” Cate said, pointing in the general direction.

Jack stared in the direction of her finger. “Why would they put us so far apart?”

“Ahhh,” Cate said with a wince.

“What?”

“I assume Anna put you quite far away from me because I’m—“

Jack let his head fall back between his shoulders. “Married to her son. Right. Wow, she’s trusting.”

Cate lifted a shoulder. “She’s very protective of Marcus. I was on my way to the library. Would you like to come with me?”

“Beats staying here in my hole. Unless we’ll upset Mama Northcott.”

“I’m sure she’ll be fine. She’s in the garden.”

Cate looped her arm through Jack’s after he pulled his door closed and led him down the hall. He gaped around as they traversed the halls. “I thought Dunhaven was sprawling, but this...”

“Is massive,” Cate finished for him with a chuckle. “Yes. I know. My bedroom alone makes mine at Dunhaven look shabby.”

Jack sucked in a breath as they rounded a corner. “I guess we should talk about what I’m desperately trying to avoid talking about.”

“My odd new gift?”

“Not sure I consider it a gift when it knocks you to your knees from the pain.”

Cate arched an eyebrow as she approached a set of ornate double doors. “I’m really interested to see what Anna has to say about it this afternoon.”

She twisted the knobs on the doors and pushed them into the room. “Until then, I was going to do a little research.”

Jack strode into the library and scanned the space. “You really think you’ll find a passage in the encyclopedia.”

“I’m hopeful,” Cate said, scanning the titles.

“I wasn’t serious, Cate.”

Cate snapped her gaze to him as she ran her finger along the books. “I was.”

Jack scrunched his nose at her.

She stared at him for a moment before she waved him toward another shelf. “Look at these titles.” She tugged them off the shelf one by one, stacking them in his arms. “Enchanted Objects and Their Uses, Basic Enchantments, Benson’s Guides to Creatures.”

Cate grabbed his book-laden arm and led him to the desk under the stained glass window. She tugged the top book from his stack and plopped it onto the desk. Dust swirled in the air as she thumbed through the book, finding the appropriate entry.

“Here. Look.” She pointed toward a specific entry with an illustration next to it.

“Gobgoyle,” Jack read, shooting her a brief glance before he read from the page, “A hairless, quadruped known for his characteristic triangular-shaped teeth and marble-like eyes. They are a popular pet among Dracopires.”

Cate waved a finger in the air. “Which begs the natural question, what is a Dracopire?”

“There’s nothing natural about that question, Cate.”

Cate ignored him, flipping through to another passage. “Dracopires. Dragon-like vampires, some of which live in Romania. Surprise!” She offered him an amused stare. “But most of which live in Sangmond. So, then you wonder, what is Sangmond?”

“Not really,” Jack murmured as Cate hurried across the room, pulling another book from the shelf and delivering it to Jack.

“Realms Beyond Earth describes it as another realm dictated by a blood-red moon that rises and sets like the sun.” She handed it off to Jack, fanning the pages. “And there are hundreds of these. Look!”

Jack collapsed into the armchair opposite the desk. “I’m not sure how much more my brain can handle.”

“And this entire library is filled with volumes like this. And don’t even get me started on what’s downstairs.”

Jack snapped his gaze to her. “What’s downstairs?” he whispered.

“Tons of magical stuff,” Cate said with a grin as she returned to perusing the shelves. “A mirror that lets you pull your mirror image out of it.”

“No,” Jack said with a shake of his head. “No, no more. I officially can’t handle anymore.”

“Wild, right?”

“Wild is not the word, Cate. This is...insanity.”

“We should have known, right?” Cate said, tugging a tome from the shelf and continuing to scan the titles.

Jack paged through the volume on his lap. “I don’t know how we could have known any of this.”

Cate shot him a glance over her shoulder. “Come on. Time travel existed and only at Dunhaven? We really had a narrow view of the world.”

Jack studied her as she pulled another book from the shelf and carried them to the desk. “I think you’re actually enjoying this.”

“Enjoying what?” Cate asked as she paged through the book.

“All this. The new worlds, the odd creatures.”

Cate scanned the entry she found. “It’s fascinating.”

“I will never understand how your mind works, Cate Kensie.”

Cate offered him a smile before she returned to her book. She scanned the entry about the wide range of clairvoyants. Some only experienced feelings while others had vivid images of the future. Other psychics ranged in between, often their response depending on the severity of the situation.

While clairvoyants could experience any range of visions about the future, many of them centered around negative events such as deaths or other severe traumas.

Cate read the words again, her finger tracing the word negative. She stared into space as a shiver snaked down her spine. On what negative event did her mind dwell?

CHAPTER 16

Cate's features pinched as she squeezed her eyes closed. She stretched her mind to recall something from the visions she had. Something that would offer her a clue to what her mind wanted to show her.

"That face looks very worried, dear," Marcus said.

Cate snapped her eyes open to find him in the doorway.

"Are we learning?" he asked as he strode toward her.

"Yes," she answered. "I thought I might find some information on my condition here."

He leaned over the book, perusing the entry. "And what did you find that gave you such a distressed expression?"

Cate licked her lips and flipped the book closed. "Nothing."

"That's quite a bit of nothing to give you such a perturbed look, dear."

She tugged one corner of her lip back. "Did you find anything this morning? Your mother said you were out chasing down a lead."

"Nothing of promise," Marcus answered.

Cate's shoulders slumped, and she banged a fist against the desk's top. "We're not doing very well."

"We will persevere and triumph, Catherine."

She flicked her gaze up to him, pinching her eyebrows together. "I hope so."

"Perhaps a walk in the garden before you begin with Mother."

She sucked in a deep breath and nodded. "Yes. I think I need some air. Jack, wait until you see the roses."

Marcus sighed as he followed Cate from the room. "Come along, Mr. Reid. It seems you are invited, too."

They spent the time before lunch in the garden. Their meal was a quiet affair with stilted conversation as Cate's apprehension grew over her upcoming training session with Anna. What would she see? And how would she withstand it?

The meal ended with the servants carrying away all of the dishes. Cate traced the outline of her napkin, trying to control her heart rate.

Anna rose from her chair. "Come along, Catherine. Let's begin. If you gentlemen will excuse us, we have much work to do."

"I'll come with you," Marcus said as he stood.

"No, you will not."

"But Mother—"

"No, you will not." Anna wagged her finger at him. "Catherine needs space."

"She should not be alone."

"And she will not be," Anna answered, raising her chin. "I will be with her."

"But—" Marcus tried again.

Anna's eyes widened. "I said no. No means no. Perhaps a game of billiards or chess for you two whilst Catherine and I do our work."

Marcus puckered his lips, his displeasure obvious.

"Do not give me that face, Marcus. I will not stand for it. Kiss your wife goodbye and wish her luck."

"Yes, Mother," Marcus said with a sigh. He bent toward Cate, rubbing her shoulder while he kissed her cheek. "Good luck, dear."

"Thank you," she answered, sounding meeker than she'd hoped.

"Come along, Mr. Reid. We have a date with a billiard table."

"That sounds...worse than I expected," Jack murmured as he rose. "Good luck, Cate."

Cate smiled at him, offering a nod in silent thanks as her heart skipped a beat and her stomach turned over.

"Go," Anna said, shooing them away.

Cate swallowed hard as they left the room. Anna turned her focus to Cate, offering her a tight-lipped smile. "Come along, Catherine."

Cate forced a fleeting smile onto her lips as she rose, trying to hide her shaky hands.

Anna grasped them and squeezed. "There is no need to be nervous, dear. I understand how stressful this can be, particularly with your physical symptoms, but that is what we aim to temper."

Cate tried to smile, but her features pinched, and her lips quivered. She bit the lower one to stop the trembling.

Anna cupped her face in her hands. "Oh, darling, what is it?"

"It's less the physical symptoms and more..." She flicked her teary gaze away from Anna as she blinked them away.

"What, dear?"

"What is it that I'm seeing? The book said it's usually negative."

"The book?" Anna asked.

"I went to the library this morning, and I read about my condition."

Anna clicked her tongue. "I knew I shouldn't have left you alone. You're too clever for your own good, Catherine."

"I'm sorry. But I can't stop wondering what terrible event my mind is trying to show me."

"They're not all terrible."

"But most of them are," Cate said, her voice catching in her throat.

"Let's try to focus on teaching you how to make these less painful and debilitating first, shall we? And then we'll worry about what you see, and how we can use it to stop any tragedies."

Cate furrowed her brow, her lips forming a pout. "Stop them?"

"Yes, dear. We're shown things for a reason."

"So, we can avoid them?"

"Sometimes," Anna answered. "Or at the very least, we can prepare and minimize the damage."

Cate slid her shoulders down her back and raised her chin, pressing her lips together. "Okay. Let's do this."

Anna patted her cheek, smiling at her before she led her from the dining room. "We'll go to your bedroom. A space where you are comfortable. It will help."

They navigated through the castle's halls, pushing into the sapphire bedroom. Anna locked the doors behind them for privacy.

Cate wrung her hands, swallowing hard as she hovered in the space.

"Sit down," Anna said, motioning to the chaise. "And lay back. Try to relax."

Cate let her head rest against the thick cushion as Anna tugged a chair over toward her. "Now, your visions, the ones you have when you're awake...is there a trigger?"

"Umm," Cate murmured, "it seems to be random."

"Think harder, Catherine, because this can help you prepare for them. Talk through them with me."

Cate licked her lips, trying to recall the instances when she'd had the debilitating visions. "The first waking one I had was when I was dressing for a party. I picked up the sapphire necklace and experienced one. Another was in Gianna's apartment. And the third was in an abandoned house where we found Gertrude's bracelet. Oh, Gertrude is a relative."

Anna patted her hand. "I know. All right, were the visions always the same?"

"I don't know. They go by so fast, and my head hurts so much that I can't be certain."

"What does your gut say?"

Cate pressed her lips together. "That they were different. The one in the abandoned house felt different. Emotionally. I had a different response."

"So, they are of two different things most likely. Let's try to work on the one in the abandoned house. Given the other triggers, I'm afraid those may be more disturbing for you."

"Maybe we should start with those."

"No, you are still learning. You need to be able to access these and process them."

Cate's forehead pinched as she patted her stomach.

"Trust me, Catherine."

She offered a nod without making eye contact.

"Do you know why the visions are painful?" Anna asked.

Cate flicked her gaze to the woman and shook her head.

"Because you are correct. They are often of negative things. And because of that, your body fights them. Viciously, at times. Your mind wants you to see these things but a part of you is resisting them."

"Like an instinctual reaction to protect yourself from harm."

"Yes, exactly."

"So, how do I avoid that?"

"You must be open to them."

Cate barked out a harsh laugh. "I'm not sure I want to be."

Anna wagged a finger at her. "And that is why they hurt."

"Will I ever see anything good?"

"Yes, you may. I think you did last night with the rose."

Cate puckered her lips as she studied her feet. "Can we start with that one instead?"

Anna smiled down at her. "I'd rather start with something a bit more painful because conjuring happy future events will not teach you very much."

"Darn," Cate said with a wrinkle of her nose.

"I would very much like to help you with this. And I'm not doing it to be cruel. I want to be sure you don't suffer more than you have to."

Cate grabbed her hand and squeezed. "I know. Thank you."

"If it becomes too much, we'll try with a happy zerinnerung."

Cate snapped her gaze to the woman's face. "What?"

"Zerinnerung. It means future memory."

"Future memory," Cate repeated. "How odd, yet how right the description sounds."

"Let's get started." Anna shoved her hand into her pocket and pulled out an object. She dangled the gold bracelet from her fingers. "This seems to be a trigger for you."

"And you want me to touch it and see if I get a future memory."

Anna pulled it away, tilting her head. "Not just yet. I want you to prepare for it. Acknowledge that it may be painful. We cannot spare ourselves all the pain, but we can avoid much of it. If we're prepared, it is not as jarring."

"Right, okay." Cate stared up at the ceiling, trying to keep her breathing calm. "Okay, I'm ready, let me try."

"No, you are not," Anna argued.

Cate screwed up her face.

Anna's eyes traveled down to Cate's feet. They stuck off the chaise, pointing straight up in the air as she clenched her leg muscles.

"You're tense."

"I'm preparing," Cate argued.

"You're bracing. Which is a fear reaction. A fight or flight response and your body is preparing to do both."

"Fight and flight?" Cate asked.

Anna nodded. "Fight by causing you intense pain to prevent you from adequately understanding or responding to the images you're shown. And, if necessary, flight. You will pass out. We don't want either."

"Okay. Relax."

"Deep breaths. Think of happy things."

Cate closed her eyes, sucking in deep breaths as she tried to force herself to relax. She pictured Dunhaven Castle's library. Two furry pups lounged near the roaring fireplace. She lounged in her favorite armchair.

Cate licked her lips and flicked her eyes open. "Okay. Happy thoughts." She waved for the bracelet.

Anna arched an eyebrow, holding the bracelet out to her. Cate licked her lips as she reached for it. Her breathing turned ragged, and her hands began to shake as she reached for the bracelet.

"Sorry," she said, pulling her hand back.

"It's perfectly fine, Catherine. Take your time."

"The moment I reach for it all my happy thoughts disappear."

Anna smiled at her, setting the bracelet on the side table. "That's normal. You're anticipating the terrible side effects. And that in itself is what exacerbates them somewhat."

"Only somewhat?" Cate asked with a chuckle.

"The visions will never be easy. But you can make them less taxing."

"By envisioning my happy place," Cate said.

Anna lifted her shoulders and fluttered her eyelashes. "Not exactly. But this is a first step. Catherine, you must understand, this will take quite a bit of work to learn to manage. You can do it. But it will not happen immediately."

Cate bit into her lower lip. "Patience is not my virtue."

Anna chuckled at her statement. "I understand, particularly when it comes to something like this. No one would want to experience this pain. And if I could take it away and teach you to manage this in one afternoon, I would."

Cate sucked in a deep breath, patting her abdomen as she tried to relax. "Can I ask how this step helps?"

"What do you mean?" Anna crinkled her brow.

"Well, I can't always anticipate when I'm going to have one of these. So, I wouldn't be able to think of my happy place or somewhere I feel safe before one occurs. They just sneak up on me. So, how would I use this to help?"

Anna pressed her lips together and nodded. "I understand. This will not help you with the ones we can't anticipate. What it will help you with is learning how to process the images by lessening the pain for those we can anticipate."

Cate furrowed her brow, her eyes falling on the gold bracelet. "So, in other words, instead of having them race across my mind faster than I can process them, I'll be learning to actually see them."

"Right, yes. Everything is jumbled right now because your mind is fighting against it. And because of the physical symptoms, it's really battling these visions. If you can control your physical reaction, we can make headway in processing these. And if you learn to process them, you can master receiving them without much suffering on your part."

"Not much suffering sounds excellent," Cate said, shooting her a smile. "Okay, I'm going to try again."

"Whenever you're ready."

Cate sucked in a deep breath and licked her lips. She squeezed her eyes closed, bringing her cozy vision of Dunhaven Castle to the forefront of her mind.

She slid her eyes open to slits and reached for the bracelet. Her fingers touched the cold metal of the monogrammed charm. A jolt shot through her body as images sped across her mind. Her temples ached and her muscles tensed as she struggled to make sense of the visions.

She fought to keep her hands on the metal for as long as she could. The comfy image of the library became lost in the fray. She struggled to keep her eyes open.

The pain became blinding, and the world closed in around her.

CHAPTER 17

Cate's eyelids fluttered open. Anna smiled down at her as she pressed a cool cloth against her forehead.

Cate fidgeted on the chaise. "That didn't go as well as I hoped."

"I did not expect you to accomplish it on your first attempt." Anna dunked the rag again and wrung it out before placing it on Cate's forehead again. "How is your headache?"

"Dulled," Cate answered. "I can try again."

"Don't rush it. Take time to recover from this one."

Cate shimmied up. "I can do it. I—"

"Catherine," Anna said, pushing Cate's shoulders back into the chaise, "do not rush. If you try again too soon, you'll only set yourself up for failure."

Cate settled back into the chaise with a sigh.

She let her eyes slide closed as she waited for the tension in her temples to release. After a few minutes, she opened her eyes. "Okay, I'm feeling a bit better now."

"A bit or better?"

Cate sucked in a breath. "Better. No headache. My stomach has settled."

"All right. Try again whenever you feel ready. Relax. Happy thoughts."

Cate closed her eyes again, conjuring her image of the dogs in the library. She snapped her eyes open, trying to hold on to the memory as she reached for the bracelet. The touch of the metal shoved the snug thought aside, replacing it with pain and nonsensical images.

She dropped the bracelet before she passed out, blowing out a long breath.

“All right, better,” Anna answered. “Lay back.”

“Better because I dropped the bracelet,” Cate answered.

“Still progress.”

“Debatable,” Cate said as Anna pressed the cloth against her forehead.

After a few moments of resting, Cate stopped Anna from pressing the cloth against her forehead again. “I’m ready to try again.”

“All right. Find your safe place,” Anna said, dropping the cloth in the basin and settling back in the chair.

She brought her safe place into her mind again and reached for the bracelet. Her fingers brushed across the metal and the attack began. A cry escaped her, both from pain and frustration. She dropped the bracelet and flung herself back onto the chaise, blowing out a breath.

“All right, darling, it’s all right,” Anna said, pressing the cloth against her.

“It’s not,” Cate cried.

“Yes, it is.

“I’m not getting any better at this.”

Anna pulled the cloth away and submerged it in the water. “You have tried three times. Mastery can take years. Don’t be so hard on yourself.”

Cate pushed herself straighter, blocking Anna’s arm before she could place the cloth on her head again. “I’m going to try again.”

“No,” Anna argued.

“Yes,” Cate said, her jaw clenched.

“Catherine, you must wait before you try again. You’re tired and weak from the last attempt. Rest.”

Cate collapsed back onto the cushion, squeezing her hands into fists.

Anna patted her tight fists. “This is not resting.”

Cate puffed out a sigh.

“Allow yourself to be cared for, Catherine. You do not need to take this all on yourself. You are not alone. I am here. Marcus is here.”

Cate unfurled her hands, flicking her gaze to Anna. “Thank you.”

Anna smiled down at her. “Of course. Now, I think that is enough for today.”

“No, I’d like to try again. Maybe more than once. I can do it. I want to make some progress.”

Anna grabbed her hand and patted it. "I know you do, dear, but I think—"

"No," Cate interrupted, "I want to try."

Anna sucked in a breath, arching an eyebrow before she nodded. "All right. Whenever you're ready."

Cate nodded and sucked in a breath as she prepared herself. She reached for the bracelet. Memories rushed into her mind, and she dropped the jewelry piece.

"All ri—"

"No, again," Cate said, grabbing the gold chain. Pain shot from temple to temple. She held on to the charm this time, forcing herself to focus. The images shot around her brain. She fought to control them as the pain forced itself further into her mind. If she could even make sense of one vision, she'd have made progress.

She bit into her lower lip until she tasted blood, refusing to drop the charm. Her limbs trembled with torment as her nerves burned. Tears welled in her eyes as the agony intensified.

"Let go, Catherine," Anna encouraged her.

She clung to the bracelet until tears rolled down her cheeks. Anna pried her fingers back. The visions ceased as she removed the charm from Cate's touch, setting it aside.

Cate's shoulders shook as she continued to cry. Anna shifted in her seat, perching on the edge of the chaise and pulling Cate into her arms.

"Shh, Catherine. It's all right."

The door unlatched across the room. "What's happened?" Marcus asked.

Anna waved him over. "She was a bit overzealous with her attempts. And you should not be unlocking doors with your magic tricks." She lowered her voice as he sank onto the edge of the chaise. "But I'm pleased you did."

Cate leaned away as she sniffled and wiped at her tears. "I'm fine."

Marcus pulled her into his arms. "You are not."

Cate relaxed against him, laying her head on his shoulder.

"She pushed herself a bit too hard. She is stubborn."

"Yes, I know," Marcus answered.

Cate's muscles relaxed, and the tension released in her temples. She pushed back, wiping at her cheeks again. "I am not. I wanted to make some progress.”

“You did make progress, darling,” Anna said with a rub of her back. “Tomorrow, we’ll try again. You will learn how to manage this, I promise.”

Cate sniffled again and nodded. “Thank you.”

Anna stroked her hair. Suddenly, she froze. “Oh, Mr. Reid, I didn’t see you there.”

“Just wanted to see how Cate was.”

Cate twisted to find him hovering inside the door. “Oh, Jack, I’m fine. Come in.”

“Actually,” Anna said, hurrying away, “she needs a bit of rest. We’ll leave you alone. Mr. Reid, have you seen our gardens? I think you’ll find them quite lovely. I understand you do a bit of gardening yourself.”

“Oh,” Cate said, her brow furrowing as Anna spirited him from the room, “but—“

“Leave it, Catherine. You will not convince Mother to bring him back.”

“He’s probably upset,” Cate answered, still staring at the now-closed door.

“So are you. Stop worrying about him and start worrying about yourself.”

Cate faced him, fluttering her eyelashes. “I’m fine.”

“You are definitely not.”

“I am,” Cate insisted. “My heart is beating normally. You should know that.”

“It is now. It wasn’t moments ago. It felt as though it was ready to burst.”

Cate sighed, clasping her hands in her lap. “This isn’t exactly easy. It’s a lot harder than I expected, actually.”

“What did you expect?”

Cate shrugged, staring up into his dark eyes. “Magic.”

The corners of his lips curled up, and she giggled. “Sorry, I couldn’t help myself.”

“Magic is not as simple as you may expect.”

“You certainly make it look easy,” she said, flopping back on the chaise.

He pressed her hand against his chest. “I am glad you think so. How are you feeling?”

Cate sucked in a deep breath. “Tired. I think the adrenaline is wearing off, and I’m realizing your mother was right.”

“She usually is,” Marcus said with a smirk. “You should rest.”

“No, I’ll never sleep tonight,” Cate said, pushing herself up to sit.

“I think Mother will handle that for you. I’m certain she will not want you to experience any dreams during the night. It robs you of your strength.”

“And I’m going to need that.” She glanced back toward the door. “Maybe a walk in the garden.”

“Are you going to the garden for you or for him?”

Cate snapped her gaze back to him. “Both.”

Marcus flexed his jaw with a huff. “At least you are honest.”

“He’s in another time, in a foreign country, and he’s worried about me.”

Marcus rose to stand, offering her his hand. “As am I.”

“I’m fine.” Cate lifted a shoulder. “And I find the garden relaxing.”

“Come along. At the risk of Mother scolding me, I will take you to the garden.”

Cate smiled up at him as she slid her hand into his and stood. “Thank you.”

“Of course. I cannot say no to you,” he said as he wrapped her arm around his and patted her hand.

“Don’t worry. I’ll tell her it was my fault if you get scolded.”

“It will not matter,” Marcus answered, leading her from her bedroom into the hall, “she will blame me.”

They strolled into the bright sunshine of the garden. Down the path, Anna pointed out a flowering plant with tiny pink buds.

She caught sight of them, her head tilting and her eyebrows shooting high. “What’s this?”

“It’s my fault,” Cate answered. “I twisted his arm into bringing me. I needed some fresh air, and I love the garden.”

Anna shot Marcus a glance before she returned her gaze to Cate. She felt her cheek, then her forehead, and finally her pulse. “Are you tired?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod, “but I’m well enough to take a brief stroll.”

“Make certain it is brief. You need your rest. You have been through a trying experience.”

“I plan to rest after dinner,” Cate answered before she turned to Jack. “How are you enjoying the gardens?”

“Oh, they’re lovely. Are you sure you’re okay?”

“I’m fine. Let me show you the roses.” She grabbed his hand and tugged him toward the bush near the overlook. She pointed out the tiny purple buds.

“Cate, are you sure you’re okay? I was worried sick.”

“I’m fine,” Cate assured him. “Really.”

Jack crinkled his brow, staring into the distance.

“Jack, I’m fine. This is just...very new. And I’m not making much progress with it.”

“What happened?”

Cate shifted her weight, pressing her lips together. “Anna gave me the bracelet. Every time I touch it, I get these visions. But I can’t make any sense of them.”

“And she hasn’t been able to help you control them?”

“She says the first thing I need to do is learn to experience the ones I expect without pain. And then we can work on slowing them down and deciphering them.”

“But you can’t.”

“Not so far. I’ve been trying to channel my happy memories but the minute I touch that bracelet, they all go right out of the window.” She fluttered her hand in the air.

Jack sucked in a deep breath, shaking his head. “I don’t know how you do it. I wouldn’t want any parts of this.”

“I have to. I have to figure this out before it destroys me. I hope to make some progress tomorrow.”

“Cate—”

“I think that’s enough for you, my dear,” Anna said as she tugged Marcus toward them. “Marcus, take her back to her room to rest. And I think you should eat there tonight.”

“Oh, I can—” Cate began.

“You will not,” Anna said. “You must rest.”

Cate pressed her lips together. “All right, but I’d like to grab the references from the library. I can’t sleep all evening.”

“Fine. As long as you don’t stress yourself,” Anna said.

“I promise.”

“I’ll walk you up, Cate,” Jack said with a nod.

“Oh, but we haven’t finished our tour,” Anna said with a gracious smile at him, cutting between him and Cate and slipping her hand through his arm. "Come along, Mr. Reid."

Jack glanced over his shoulder as Anna led him away. Cate offered him a shrug and a wave.

"Ready?" Marcus asked as she turned back to face him.

"I'd better be before I get scolded," Cate said. "Did you get a tongue-lashing for bringing me down?"

"Nothing I couldn't handle. Though I will take you straight to your room and retrieve the book for you to avoid another."

"I can make it to the library," Cate said as they pushed back into the castle.

"You could and then I could carry you to your room or you could walk to your room and I can bring you the book."

Cate shook her head at him. "Fine, you can bring me the book."

"Are you certain? You know how I love to carry you about."

Cate rolled her eyes as a chuckle escaped her. They navigated through the halls to the sapphire bedroom. Cate pushed inside with a promise to rest as Marcus left to retrieve her book.

She stalked further into the room, blowing out a long breath. The trip to the garden had been more taxing than she was willing to admit. She craved stretching out in bed.

She drummed her hands against her thighs as she waited for Marcus to return. Her eyes fell onto the fine gold chain laying on the table.

Odd how such a tiny object could cause so much pain. She stalked toward it, staring down at it. Her hand trembled as she reached toward it again.

She snapped her hand back as the door clicked open behind her. "Your book, dear."

Cate spun to face him, accepting the thick tome. "Thank you."

"Do you need anything else?"

"Tea would be nice," she said. "And can you send Andrea?"

"Of course, dear," Marcus said. "I'll visit you later."

Cate smiled and nodded as he strode from the room. She flicked a gaze back to the bracelet before she left it behind in favor of staring out the window at the garden below. Anna continued to roam around with Jack.

Cate chuckled at the scene. Andrea arrived a moment later. Cate happily changed into her pajamas and settled in her bed with a warm cup of tea. Her mind wandered to her friends at Dunhaven. Their lives were almost frozen in time. Worried about their jobs and their home, they had no clue Cate and crew had left to try to solve the issue.

She traced the outline of the book next to her. She had to solve it. They deserved better than to be used as pawns in Gianna's game. She tugged open the tome, searching for the entry on clairvoyance.

She struggled to focus on the words written on the page. Her mind wandered to her experience earlier this afternoon. Would she ever master these visions, or would they always defeat her? Would they always remain just beyond her grasp, warning her of something she'd never know?

Cate tossed the book to the side and threw back the covers. She slid her feet into her slippers and shuffled into the sitting room. She stared down at the bracelet on the side table.

Memories of her previous painful experience flashed across her mind. But it did not stop her from reaching toward it. Her fingers wrapped around the thin chain, and she rubbed the charm. Her fingernails traced the grooves of the monogram.

Her eyelashes fluttered as images began to flood into her mind. Pain throbbed at her temples as she fought to control the images and focus on something.

Her knees began to weaken, and she wobbled on her feet, stumbling forward. Her breathing turned raspy. She struggled to stay upright. A groan escaped her lips as the pain reached a fever pitch.

Cate unraveled her fingers, trying to drop the bracelet, but it tangled around her thumb. She shook her hand in a desperate attempt to free herself of the images, but she couldn't. She flailed her arm, but her vision began to close to a pinpoint.

She pitched forward, smacking her head off the edge of the side table before she collapsed to the floor.

CHAPTER 18

“Catherine?” Marcus’s voice echoed in her head. “Catherine, open your eyes.”

“What’s happened?” Anna asked.

“I found her collapsed with the bracelet in her hand. She appears to have hit her head.”

Footsteps scrambled into the room. “What can I do?” Andrea asked, breathless and panicked.

“Fetch a basin of water and a cloth. She’s still bleeding,” Anna answered.

Cate tried to force her eyes open, to tell them she was okay, but she couldn’t. Her eyelids stuck closed as though glued. Her limbs would not respond. And she couldn’t find her voice.

Warm fingers pressed against her wrist. “Her pulse is strong.”

“Her heartbeat is normal,” Marcus informed her.

“Good. With that prolonged exposure, she is likely exhausted. She will wake, darling. We must be patient.”

Footsteps sounded again. “Ah, thank you, Andrea.”

“May I stay?” Andrea asked.

Anna answered, “Yes, I’m certain she’d want you here.”

Cool, damp fabric pressed against her forehead, gently wiping at the skin. It stung, but her muscles were too weak to wince.

Warm fingers threaded through hers. “Please wake up, Your Grace,” Andrea squeaked.

Cate tried to squeeze her hand but found it impossible.

A finger traced the wound on her head, making it tingle.

"Cate?" Jack's voice exclaimed. "What the hell happened to her?"

"Calm down, Mr. Reid," Anna said. "She's fine. Merely exhausted."

"She doesn't look fine. She looks half-dead."

"Please stop your shouting," Anna answered.

"Will someone please tell me what happened to her?" Jack asked.

Anna heaved a sigh as the cloth pressed against her skin again. "She picked up the bracelet again. She must have held onto it for too long. She collapsed and hit her head."

"Oh, no," Jack groaned. "She needs a doctor."

"She will be fine," Anna argued.

"You don't know that," Jack shouted back. "And I'll be damned if I'm going to stand here, and let you two take care of her."

"Now, Mr. Reid, that is quite enough," Anna said, her voice turning heated. "I will not tolerate you speaking to me or my son that way. He is Catherine's husband, and I am her mother-in-law. There is no one more appropriate to care for her than those who love her."

Jack scoffed at the statement. "Oh, please."

"That is quite enough, Reid," Marcus said. "You can remain here only because Catherine would want you, but if you do not stop hurling accusations I shall remove you myself."

Silence pervaded the room for several seconds.

"Stay back and out of the way," Anna said. "I am less forgiving than my son."

What a nightmare, Cate thought. If I could only open my eyes.

Noises faded away as Cate drifted in and out of consciousness.

"...been hours. She needs a doctor," Jack said.

"What did I tell you, Mr. Reid? If you could not control yourself, I would ask you to leave."

"She hit her head. She could have a concussion."

Anna said, "She does not. She is perfectly healthy, merely exhausted."

"You don't know that," Jack responded.

"I do," Anna said. "I am quite experienced at this. She is perfectly fine. I would never risk Catherine's health."

"I've had enough of this," Jack answered.

A scuffle sounded, and her bed jiggled.

“Stop this right now,” Anna shouted. “Mr. Reid, if you cannot control yourself, I shall ask you to leave.”

“Oh, I’m not leaving her alone with you. No way.”

“Then keep your mouth shut,” Anna answered. A warm hand wrapped around hers. “You take your time coming back to us, Catherine. You get all the rest you need.”

“This is ridiculous,” Jack murmured.

Cate tried to force her eyes open but found the task impossible. I’m okay, Jack. Her lips would not form the words.

“Marcus,” Anna’s voice said a moment later, “open her music box.”

The tinkling music filled the air a moment later. Her muscles reacted to it, relaxing more until she drifted away.

When her senses returned, the music still played. The music. Perhaps that was the key. Maybe the music could help her focus on the images her mind tried to send her. It helped her through temporalysis.

First, though, she had to wake up. She had to open her eyes. She tried to force them open again.

“How long do you plan on waiting until you realize she’s not waking up?” Jack asked.

“Mr. Reid, how many times must I ask you not to interfere?”

“Enough,” Marcus snapped, “we are all here for Catherine. We—“

Cate flexed her fingers.

“What is it, Marcus?” Anna asked.

“She is waking. She squeezed my hand.” Fingers caressed her hair. “Catherine, can you open your eyes?”

Cate fought to force them open. Her blurry vision cleared a few seconds later.

“There she is,” Anna said, patting her hand. She shot a glance at Jack who stood near the end of the bed with Andrea.

“I’m here,” Cate whispered. “I’ve been here.”

She tried to push herself up, but Anna and Marcus stopped her.

“Easy, Catherine,” Anna said, “you are still weak.”

Cate swallowed hard as she settled back into the pillows. “I couldn’t let go of the bracelet. It got stuck.”

“Why did you try it again?”

“I don’t know,” Cate admitted. “I just—thought I could make progress but it got tangled around my thumb.”

“The prolonged exposure has exhausted you,” Anna said. “You must rest. Do you feel strong enough to eat a little?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod.

“I shall arrange it. Marcus, stay with her.”

“I will do it,” Andrea offered. “It’s so wonderful to see you awake, Your Grace.”

“Thank you, Andrea.”

The blonde bobbed her head up and down before she spun on a heel and disappeared from the room.

“How do you feel, Cate?” Jack asked.

Anna flexed her jaw, her annoyance with him clear. Cate shifted her gaze from her mother-in-law to Jack. “I’m just a bit tired.”

“Are you sure? You hit your head.”

Cate raised a leaden arm, her muscles aching, and rubbed her forehead.

Marcus stroked the spot she’d smacked. “There is no scar.”

“Thanks,” she said.

“Cate, you should get checked out by a doctor.”

“I’m fine,” she said. “Just tired from the experience. I’m sure after some sleep, I’ll be able to try—”

“No,” Anna said with a shake of her head. “No more for at least a day.”

“No,” Cate said, shoving at the bed to try to sit straighter. “I can do it.”

Anna raised her eyebrows. “I am the expert here. And I say you cannot.”

“For once, I agree with her,” Jack said.

“Well, I do not,” Cate said with a shake of her head. She flicked her gaze to Marcus. “Do you want to help out here?”

“Mother knows best.”

Cate huffed. “This isn’t fair. You’re ganging up on me.”

“We will make progress, dear,” Anna said. “I promise. But no more with the bracelet for now.”

Cate heaved another sigh as Andrea returned with a tray of food.

“All right,” Anna said as Cate polished off the meal, “now it is time for you to sleep.”

She rose from the chair, shooing Andrea and Jack back. “Time for us to leave. Marcus, if anything should change with her condition, you will let me know immediately.”

Jack shook his head. “I’m staying, too.”

“That is highly inappropriate, Mr. Reid. Catherine needs her rest. She does not need you hovering over her.”

Jack shook his head, wagging a finger in the air. “I’m not—“

“Okay, okay, that’s enough,” Cate said. All eyes turned to her. “I’m perfectly fine. You’re all very kind to worry so much, but I’m okay. Have any of you eaten dinner?”

“There is no need for you to worry about that,” Anna answered.

“I’ll take that as a no. Why don’t you eat, and Jack can stay with me and then switch.”

Marcus stroked her hair. “There is no need for that, dear, I can stay.”

Cate grabbed his hand and squeezed. “Go have dinner with your mother. Jack can wait with me, and then you can watch me sleep all night.”

Marcus heaved a sigh and narrowed his eyes at Jack. “Fine. Come along, Mother, we shall eat quickly.”

Anna arched an eyebrow and snapped her gaze to Jack. “Notify me if anything happens. And do not under any circumstances let her touch that bracelet.”

Jack held his hands up in silent acquiescence. “Come along, Marcus.”

“I shall stay, Your Grace.”

“No, Andrea, please go eat,” Cate said, waving her away.

“Are you certain?”

Cate nodded and smiled at her, sending her along her way.

Jack settled into one of the chairs near the bed with a sigh as the others slipped out of the room. He puffed out his cheeks and scrubbed his face with his hands before he focused on Cate.

“I thought we lost you.”

“Nope, still here. Although, I’m starting to think this room is cursed,” Cate said as she shifted around in the bed.

“Are you okay? Anything hurt?”

“No, nothing. I can’t believe I cracked my head. That hurt. But it’s fine now.”

“Cate, I think we need to get out of here. I don’t like this.”

Cate crinkled her brow and shook her head. “I’m kidding. It’s not cursed.”

“Well, I’m not. The moment something happened to you those two closed ranks. They would barely let me anywhere near you.”

Cate sucked in a breath, flicking her gaze to her lap. “I heard.”

Jack arched an eyebrow.

"I was conscious for much of the time. I could hear you. I just couldn't open my eyes or speak. Or move. I fell asleep for a little bit, but I heard most of it."

"Then you know what I'm talking about."

Cate tilted her head, grabbing his hand. "They're just trying to help."

"Help? Cate!" Jack exclaimed, leaning forward toward her. "You hit your head, and they swept it under the rug. They didn't want to do a damn thing. You could have been hurt."

"That's not true. They're not inexperienced. And remember Marcus can feel my heartbeat."

Jack pulled his hand away, flicking his gaze out the window and flexing his jaw. "Cate..."

"Jack," she said, grabbing his hand again. She softened her voice. "Jack..."

He fluttered his eyelashes, snapping his gaze to her.

"Anna is very protective. When I was in a coma from the snake bite, she accused Celine of poisoning me. Which is ridiculous," Cate said with a shrug. "But still...she is extremely protective."

Jack heaved a sigh. "I don't like it."

"I don't imagine you do. This is a tricky situation, though."

"Tricky isn't the word," Jack grouched. "I hate this."

"I'm sorry," Cate said with a squeeze of his hand.

"It's not your fault. You did what you had to do to save Dunhaven Castle. And you know, I'd rather these two than The Agency."

Cate smiled at him. "Me too." She eased back into the pillows and shook her head. "Anna is going to be so disappointed when Marcus and I divorce at the end of all of this."

"She doesn't know?"

Cate shook her head. "No. She thinks we've been married since 1810."

"Ho," Jack hooted with a half-grin. "Two centuries of marriage, and then it all falls apart."

Cate giggled as she shimmied lower in the bed, letting her head rest on the pillow. "And then he goes back to Celine. Oh, the horror."

"What? She didn't like Celine?"

Cate rolled her eyes, sucking in a breath as she shook her head. "Uh, in a word, no."

“Really? The very alluring Marquis’s daughter was not up to Anna’s standards?”

“Not in the slightest. She told me during our first conversation that Celine was, and I’m quoting here, a most disappointing choice.”

“Wow,” Jack said, dropping his chin to his chest. “No wonder she hates me. I’m just a gardener.”

“You’re hardly just a gardener,” Cate said.

“Yeah, well I’m not sure old Marc told her that.”

Cate chuckled, slapping a palm against her face. “Call him that to his face and see what happens.”

“Pass. I have no desire to live my life as a toad.”

“A toad?” she said, laughing harder. “You think he’d be that kind?”

“Maybe I’d be a slug.”

Cate burst into laughter as did Jack. They chuckled together for a few minutes until the door burst open and Marcus entered. His eyebrows raised high as he witnessed the scene. “How are you feeling, dear?”

“Much better,” Cate said with a final laugh.

“It seems Mr. Reid is doing an excellent job at entertaining you.”

Cate smiled at him and nodded. “As always. Thank you, Jack.”

“Is the show finished?”

Jack flicked his gaze between them before he stood. “If you’re feeling okay, Cate, I’ll go eat.”

“I’m feeling fine. Really, I don’t need a babysitter. Neither of you needs to stay.”

“I will be the judge of that,” Marcus said as he settled into the seat Jack vacated.

“Are you sure you’re all right?” Jack asked, squeezing her foot through the blanket.

“I’m sure. Have a good dinner.”

“Mind if I check back before I go to bed?”

“Not at all,” Cate answered as Marcus answered, “No.”

Cate snapped her gaze to him. “Marcus, he can stop by.”

“You may be asleep,” he answered.

“Then you can tell him that.”

“All right, dear. Please stop by on your way to retire,” Marcus grumbled.

Jack smiled at Cate and mouthed the word “slug” before he turned to leave.

Cate hid a smile as he strode from the room. Marcus arched an eyebrow as he stared after him. He spun back to face Cate as Jack slipped from the room.

“And what funny jokes did Mr. Reid have that lightened your spirits so?”

“Nothing,” Cate said as she adjusted her covers.

“A secret. Should I be worried?”

Cate offered him a coy glance. “No, though your mother sure was.”

“Mother is extremely protective of you.”

“And you.”

Marcus cocked his head. “What did he tell you?”

“He didn’t tell me anything. I could hear most of what went on.”

“Then you know Mother said nothing out of bounds.”

“I know,” Cate said, tracing the edge of her blanket. “But Jack is extremely off balance. This is not normal for him. He’s scared. He doesn’t understand.”

Marcus puckered his lips, crossing his arms. Cate reached for his hand, lacing her fingers through his. “I know you don’t like him. I’m pretty sure the feeling is mutual at the moment. But you have the upper hand in this situation and that’s what terrifies him.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at her.

“You understand so much more of this world than he does. He’s running to catch up. Even I understand more than he does after our experience finding him. He’s still learning to trust you, but every other second he learns something new and terrifying and he’s struggling to keep up.”

“I suppose I can understand how it may be difficult for his feeble mind to comprehend.”

Cate tugged one corner of her lips back, glancing at him through her eyelashes. “Be nice.”

Marcus heaved a sigh, squeezing her hand. “You know I would never harm him, Catherine.”

“I know that. But he doesn’t yet.”

Marcus smiled at her. “I’m glad you know it. And that is all that matters to me.”

Cate slouched further down the bed. “Does that include not turning him into a slug?”

Marcus flicked his eyebrows up, puckering his lips as he considered it. “Tempting as it may be, no, I would not.”

“Good,” Cate answered with a sigh of relief. She snapped her gaze to him. “Wait, can you actually do that?”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at her with a coy grin. “I must keep some mystery about me, Catherine. I wouldn’t want you to become bored with me.”

Cate shook her head at him.

“And now I think it’s time for you to sleep.”

“I am tired. But I’m fine. You don’t need to stay. I am perfectly capable of sleeping on my own.”

“That is my call to make, and I am perfectly happy to watch you sleep so that I may be here should you need anything.” Marcus switched off the light, plunging the room into darkness. Moonlight shone through the window, illuminating some of the room as Cate settled back into the pillows.

Within moments she drifted off to sleep. When Cate snapped her eyes open, the room remained dark. “Marcus?” she called into the darkness, wondering what happened to the moonlight.

She turned on the light, finding the chair he’d sat in earlier empty. He must have gone to bed, convinced she was okay.

She shivered, rubbing her arms after she switched off the light again. A breeze tickled her skin as she settled back into the pillows.

With a start, she flicked the light on again, glancing around the room. Everything seemed normal. Cate crinkled her brow, clicking the light off. Just as she settled back into her pillows again, a shiver snaked down her spine.

She turned the light on again, searching her bed for a serpent. She found nothing. As she settled the covers over her again, movement caught her eye.

A cloaked figure stepped out from behind the wardrobe and stalked toward her. Cate’s heart pounded as she stared at the person.

The figure tossed her hood back. Gianna smirked at her as she sauntered closer. “Hello, Cate.”

“What are you doing here?” Cate demanded.

She swung her legs over the bed and attempted to stand. Gianna raced around the corner and shoved her down to the mattress.

“Marcus!” Cate called.

“He can’t hear you.”

Cate pressed her hand against her chest. “He’ll know.”

One corner of Gianna’s lips tugged back. “I hope he does. We’re going to take everything from you, Cate.” She leaned closer, whispering in Cate’s ear. “Everything.”

“I won’t let you,” Cate said through clenched teeth.

Gianna grabbed a pillow, squeezing it between her hands. “You won’t be able to stop me.”

She pressed the pillow over Cate’s face and smashed her against the bed.

CHAPTER 19

Cate startled awake, flailing her arms as she cried out.
“Catherine?” Marcus asked, leaping to his feet.

Cate gasped, her heart pounding. She squinted against the light as he flicked it on. She searched the room, her eyes darting around wildly.

“Catherine, what is it?” he asked, slicking a wayward lock of her hair behind her ear.

“I...Gianna...she...” Cate heaved a deep breath. “It was a dream.”

“Just a dream or a vision?”

Cate crinkled her brow. “No, a nightmare, I think. She was here. She was...”

“She is not here. You are safe.”

Cate grabbed his hand as she steadied her breathing. She slid her eyes closed, slowly sucking in a breath. Marcus wrapped his arms around her as he sank onto the bed next to her. She clung to him as her fear dissipated.

She pushed away from him a few moments later. “I’m okay.”

“Are you certain?”

“Yes. I really wish I hadn’t met her.”

“But then we never would have reconnected, and I’m certain you’d agree that was a high point.”

Cate chuckled as she settled back in her pillows. “Certainly the high point of the situation.”

“Has Jack checked in?”

“Yes, dear, hours ago. It’s nearly morning.”

“Was I asleep?”

“Soundly. I sent him on his way to bed. I did not turn him into a slug.”

Cate laughed at his statement before she sobered. “Oh, Jack!” She snapped her gaze to Marcus. “We need to check on him. What if it wasn’t a dream? What if I misinterpreted it, and it was a warning? She said she’d take everything from me. What if she took Jack again?”

“Calm yourself, Catherine. I’m certain he is fine. Rosenberg is a veritable fortress.”

Cate tossed her covers back. “And one where I was bitten by a poisonous snake.”

“While it was open for a party. I’m certain no one could have entered.”

“I want to be more certain,” Cate said, pulling her robe around her.

“All right,” Marcus said with a sigh as he rose.

Cate slid her slippers on and stood. “Please don’t make me stay here alone.”

“Certainly not. I am not letting you out of my sight.”

Cate nodded, grabbing his hand and dragging him forward. They navigated the distance to Jack’s room.

Cate pressed an ear against the door, knocking lightly. “I don’t hear anything.”

She banged against it again, shifting her weight from foot to foot. With a shake of her head, she grabbed the knob and twisted it. It didn’t budge. “It’s locked. Why would it be locked?”

Cate flung her hand toward it. “Open it.”

“Catherine, I—“

“Open it.”

Marcus sucked in a breath and flicked his eyebrows up. “Fine.”

With a flick of his wrist, he unlocked the door and pushed it into the room. Cate crept into the dark room. “Where are the lights?”

“On the left wall. Wait!” He pointed a finger forward. Cate followed the line of his finger. A lump poked up the covers in the bed, limned in moonlight.

Cate crept forward, craning her neck to stare down at him. Jack lay on his side, sleeping soundly. She waited, counting his breaths. She blew out a sigh of relief.

“Satisfied, dear?” Marcus whispered as he wrapped an arm around her shoulders.

“Yes,” she said, leaning a head against his shoulder as she patted his hand. Her brow crinkled. “Why was his door locked?”

“I’m certain he had his reasons.”

“What reasons? Why lock the door?”

“I do not know, but I do not believe we should debate it here.”

Cate stared down at him. “Was he afraid of something?”

“Catherine, it does not matter. He is fine. Let’s get you back to bed.”

“I’m just curious. I—“

“Whoa!” Jack shouted, drawing her attention from Marcus.

“Jack,” Cate said.

Jack tugged the covers up to his chin. “What the hell is happening?”

“I had a bad dream. I wanted to check on you.”

Jack’s eyes slid to Marcus. “And him?”

“I was worried about you. We came to check on you together. And good thing, you locked your door. Why did you lock your door?”

Jack pressed his lips together, his eyes lingering on Marcus. “This is pretty close to the exact scenario I imagined when I decided to lock it.”

Cate collapsed on the edge of the bed. “Very funny. Are you sure you’re okay?”

Jack swallowed hard, lowering the covers with a nod. “Yes. I’m sure. I’m fine, Cate. I’m okay. How are you feeling? Have you gotten any sleep?”

Cate bobbed her head up and down. “Yes. Until I had that stupid nightmare. Don’t worry, it wasn’t a vision. Just a regular old nightmare.”

“Are you sure?”

“I am. If you’re sure you’re okay, I’ll head back and try to get more rest. I just wanted to check on you.” Cate grabbed his hand and squeezed.

“Maybe I should come back with you. I can stay—“

“That will not be necessary,” Marcus informed him, patting Cate’s shoulder. “I will be with her.”

“That’s not comforting.”

“I am not concerned about your comfort,” Marcus retorted.

Jack pushed back his covers. “Which is why I should go with you.”

“No,” Marcus said flatly.

Cate patted Jack’s hand. “No, you need your rest, too. It’s fine.” She stood and pulled his covers up over him.

“Cate—“

Cate pressed her hand against his again. "It's fine, Jack. I'm perfectly safe with Marcus."

Jack narrowed his eyes as he glanced up at the man. "If you're sure you feel comfortable."

"Absolutely," Cate said with a reassuring smile.

"Would you mind giving us a minute?" Jack asked Marcus.

"I would," he answered.

"Marcus," Cate said with a tilt of her head, "give us a minute."

Marcus puckered his lips, studying her. He traced the line of her jaw. "Do not be long. You need your rest."

She nodded in response as he strode from the room, twisting to give them one last look over his shoulder before he stepped into the hall.

"Cate..." Jack started, taking her hand.

She collapsed onto the edge of the bed. "I'm fine, Jack."

"Are you really? Are you sure it wasn't a vision?"

"Yes, because those make me tired, but I don't feel that tired. I just wanted to be sure."

Jack licked his lips, blowing out a sigh as he slumped back into his pillows. "And what about the rest?"

Cate crinkled her brow. "The rest of what?"

Jack nudged his head toward the door. "Him?"

"Marcus?"

Jack nodded at her question.

"He's fine. I feel safe with him."

Jack stared at her for a moment, studying her face. "Okay, as long as you're comfortable."

"He won't let anything happen to me," Cate said as she rose to stand. "Oh, and he promised not to turn you into a slug."

Jack's eyes went wide. "You told him?"

"No, I didn't tell him exactly. He promised he'd never hurt you. I felt it was prudent to ask if that included turning you into a slug."

"And he said he couldn't. That's a relief."

"Well, he didn't say he couldn't, just that he wouldn't."

Jack stared at her with a blank expression. "I don't know if I like this new world we live in."

Cate giggled at him. "You'll get used to it. Just like you did with time travel. Good night, Jack."

She shuffled across the room as he called after her, "I'm still not used to time travel!"

She spun, chuckling again. "Good night, Jack."

"Good night, Cate."

Cate waved as she slipped through his door into the hall.

Marcus pulled himself from leaning against the wall. "Have you settled his nerves?"

Cate slipped her arm into his and pulled him down the hall. "Yes."

"Wonderful."

"You could give him a break, you know? He's—"

"Struggling to keep up, I know. Though it is my duty to worry about you first. You, too, are struggling."

They turned the corner on the long walk back to her suite. "I'm not. We spent a lot of time together rescuing him. I'm way more used to this than he is."

Marcus stopped, turning her to face him. "You are still acclimating to this world and your new condition. And you are Gianna's main target."

Cate opened her mouth to respond, but he pressed a finger to her lips, silencing her.

"I understand your urge to protect him, but you must allow me to worry about you."

Her lips tugged up at the corners as she stared up at him. "I guess I can let you do that."

"Good," he said, flicking his eyebrows up. "Now, perhaps you'll allow me to carry you back to your room."

"No," Cate said, wagging her finger at him. "I can walk."

"But you're allowing me to worry about you."

"Worry, not carry. Those two letters at the start make a big difference."

Marcus chuckled at her as they pushed into her room.

"See, I made it," she said with a grin as she doffed her robe and climbed into bed. "I walked all that way on my own. Amazing."

"Yes, it is," Marcus said as she slouched down and pulled the covers over her. "You are an incredible woman, Catherine."

"Mmm-hmm," she said as he settled into the chair next to her bed. "Absolutely astounding. The real astonishing bit was the way I put one foot in front of the other over and over until we got here."

“That is not what I meant, and you know it. But it’s time for you to rest.”

Cate smiled at him as he turned off the light. She settled back in her pillows, letting the smile play on her lips until she drifted off to sleep.

When her eyes opened again, light streamed into the room from the large window. She squinted against it as she searched the chair for Marcus. Instead, she found Anna in his place.

“Good morning, Catherine,” she said with a smile, patting her hand. “You probably expected Marcus and I am a poor substitute, but I sent him away early this morning.”

“Oh,” Cate said as she pushed up to sit, “certainly not a poor substitute. And I am glad you sent him, hopefully, to rest. He stayed all night.”

“I know. He does worry over you so. Though I can see why.”

Cate smiled at her, feeling heat rise into her cheeks. The thought of Anna’s upset at their inevitable divorce raced across her mind. She licked her lips, searching her mind for conversation.

“The truth is I wanted to try something. I know Marcus would object, but I’m hoping you’re game.”

Cate flicked her gaze to the woman. “What is it?”

She offered her an amused smile and held a finger up before she hurried from the room. She returned with the purple rose.

“This should elicit a similar reaction as the bracelet, however, the future memory should be quite pleasant, I think. I thought we could try that and see how it goes. It should be a bit less taxing. What do you think?”

Cate stared at the purple rose floating in the case before she flicked her gaze to Anna. “I think I’m glad you sent Marcus away.”

Anna chuckled as she slid the glass case onto the night table and eased into the chair. “There is no rush to try. Whenever you are ready, though perhaps after your breakfast.”

Cate nodded in agreement, flinging off her covers.

“Oh, no, no, you remain abed. I shall ring for it.”

“That’s nonsense, I’m—“

“Recovering and hoping to try again today. Do not waste your energy traversing the halls for a meal that can be delivered to you.”

Cate tugged the covers over her as Anna pulled the cord on the wall. “Marcus tells me your search for your ancestor took you to London.”

“Yes, it did,” Cate said, tracing the edge of her blanket.

“And how did you find the London home?”

“It’s lovely and very convenient.”

“I always thought it rather a bore. Possibly because Marcus’s father typically left me there to do business. I do hope that isn’t the case with you. I have warned him not to neglect you.”

“He doesn’t,” Cate assured her as Andrea arrived with a breakfast tray.

“Shall I wait for you to dress, Your Grace?”

“No, no, Andrea, we’ll manage,” Anna said, shooing her away.

“And Marcus tells me you haven’t yet been to Stratfordshire or Wintervale.”

Cate scooped up a spoonful of porridge. “No.”

Anna propped her head on her chin, staring into space. “How odd.”

“I’m certain it’s because we’ve been so busy—“

Anna waved a hand in the air, cutting off her answer. “There is no excuse. You really should view the properties at the very least so that you may begin making the changes you’d like to make it your home.”

Cate shook her head. “Oh—“

“Do not be shy, Catherine, my son has a fortune and it should be devoted to making you happy. Make all the changes you’d like so you are happy there. It is your home now.”

“Homes,” Cate said with a shrug as she scooped up more of the porridge.

“Yes, dear, homes. Of which we have acquired many over the years. And they are all yours now. This palace included. I really should ask if there are any changes—“

Cate grabbed her hand. “No. That is where I draw the line. This is your home. I wouldn’t change a thing.”

Anna’s shoulders slumped as she wrapped Cate’s hand in both of hers. Tears shone in her eyes. “Oh, Catherine, Marcus could not have selected better in a wife.”

Cate flicked her gaze to her bowl, pushing around the porridge.

“I don’t mean to embarrass you, dear, but...” She heaved a sigh. “Well, I feel we have dodged a bullet. His near marriage to that...woman would have ruined him.”

Cate forced a smile onto her face. “I’m sure—“

“Oh, please, you do not need to be gracious.” She patted Cate’s arm. “Admit it, Catherine, you are far better.”

The smile on Cate's face broadened. "I'm not sure about that, but I am glad you think so."

"I know so. Now," she said, lifting the tray from Cate's lap, "let's get you dressed."

Cate climbed from her bed, trying to shake off the guilt building inside her over the previous conversation. She pushed it aside as they moved on to other topics.

When they finished, Cate's eyes fell on the rose across the room. "Would it be okay if we tried now?"

"If you're feeling up to it, dear, yes. Why don't you lay back in your bed and try to relax? Remember these will still be taxing, but I hope not as taxing."

Cate nodded, reaching for her music box. "I had an idea in the middle of the night, too." She lifted the box in the air, opening the top before she set it down on the night table. "I thought this may relax me. It helped so much during my temporalysis."

"Oh, I'm so glad you enjoy that little box."

"I cherish it," Cate answered as she settled into her pillows.

"Let me know when you're ready, dear, and I'll give you the rose."

Cate shimmied, trying to find a comfortable spot as she focused on the music. "How do you know these memories will be positive?"

"I do not know for certain, but since this object represents a positive moment for you in the past and you reacted to it once before, I believe this will show you positive future moments."

Cate nodded, recalling the moment when she'd received the rose from Marcus in the garden below. The memory brought a smile to her face. She sucked in a breath and flicked her gaze to Anna. "I'm ready."

Anna slid the glass off and set it aside. She retrieved the rose from where it floated and passed it to Cate. "Remember, still taxing so don't push too far."

"Right," Cate said with a curt bob of her head. Her heart beat faster as she reached toward the rose. She blew out a controlled breath, focusing on the music and the memory of the rose. Her fingers caressed the petals. Visions whipped across her mind in a blinding blur.

Her breathing turned ragged as she struggled to focus. Tension built at her temples. She fought against it, desperate to make some progress. The music tinkled in the background as her mind wrestled with the future memories.

“Catherine?” Anna questioned.

“Wait,” she breathed. Her eyelids fluttered before sliding closed, and her forehead crinkled. She forced her heart rate slower and her breathing steadier. Her mind converged on one crystal clear image.

She sucked in a breath as she pulled her fingers away from the rose and flicked her gaze to Anna. “It worked.”

CHAPTER 20

“It worked,” Cate repeated as she pinched her eyebrows together. The future memory danced across her mind.

Anna clapped her hands together with a grin. “Catherine! That’s wonderful! And you could see the memory clearly?”

Cate matched her expression. “I did. Yes, crystal clear. Like I was standing right there.”

“That is wonderful. Excellent progress.”

Cate bit her lower lip as she reflected on the future memory she’d seen. Her forehead crinkled. “Are they real?”

Anna tilted her head. “What do you mean?”

“Are the future memories definitely going to happen?”

“Oh, yes.”

“No way to avoid them?”

Anna narrowed her eyes at Cate. “I’m growing concerned this happy future memory was not quite so happy.”

Cate chuckled. “Oh, no, it seemed very happy, but...I’m just curious to know how sure they are. Could my brain create something that won’t happen? Has that ever happened to you? I want to know more for the bad ones.”

“Oh, yes. Can your brain mislead you? Yes, certainly, but that’s usually due to misreading the information you’re given. You’re fed things not to avoid them but to prepare to handle them in the best way possible. However, perhaps you witness your friend crying and interpret it as your friend being harmed when really she is crying happy tears because she is with child.”

Cate sucked in a breath as she considered it. “I see. Okay. I’m ready to try the bracelet.”

“Catherine! You can’t.”

“I can. I succeeded.”

“Once. You succeeded once. You need more practice and more patience.”

“But—“

The door to her suite burst open, and Marcus strode inside. “Good morning, Catherine. What does Mother have you doing that has your heart rate up?” He kissed her cheek before leaning on the bed to await her response.

“We are practicing,” Anna said, waving the rose at him before she returned it to its glass case.

“And?” Marcus asked, directing the question to Cate.

“And it worked!” she exclaimed with a grin. She flicked her gaze up to him and raised her shoulders.

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her, smiling. “Excellent work, dear.”

Anna patted her hand. “She did so well. And so quickly. You are an excellent pupil, Catherine.”

“I want to try the bracelet again, but—“

“No,” Marcus and Anna said simultaneously.

Cate’s shoulders slumped as she flicked her gaze between them. “This is ridiculous. I made progress.”

“And you are still learning. You managed to make sense of a happy future memory. The bracelet will be very different,” Anna said.

“I will never learn how to tame the bad ones if I don’t try.”

Anna grabbed Cate’s hand and rubbed it as she shifted her gaze to Marcus. “Oh, Marcus, I do like her.”

“As do I.”

Cate tapped her foot in the air as she puckered her lips. “I appreciate how much you both like me, but I still think I should try the bracelet.”

“Tell you what, dear. You try the rose again in a bit. If you can easily focus on another future memory, I’ll let you try the bracelet this evening.” She held up a finger. “Just once.”

Cate tugged back one corner of her lips and crinkled her nose.

“Mother is right.”

“As I always am,” Anna said, raising her eyebrows and smiling as a knock sounded at the door. “Come in.” She snapped her gaze to Cate. “Oh, I’m sorry, dear.”

“It’s fine,” Cate said as Andrea popped her head in.

“Your Grace? Just checking in to make sure you managed everything this morning.”

“Yes, I’m fine, Andrea, thank you.”

Andrea smiled and nodded, sliding her eyes sideways. “Also, Mr. Reid is here inquiring after you.”

“We’re busy,” Marcus answered as Cate said, “Send him in.”

Marcus huffed out a breath and nodded at Andrea.

Andrea smiled at them before she stepped back. Jack strode in a moment later. “Good morning, everyone,” he said, his eyes darting around at the three of them. “Cate, how are you feeling?”

“Very well, thank you. We’re making progress with my visions.”

Jack flicked his eyebrows up. “Really? Did you see anything about Gertrude?”

Cate shook her head. “No, we’re working on another angle that’s less painful.”

Anna tightened her fingers around Cate’s hand. “We must be careful to not overtax her.”

“Yeah, definitely,” Jack said, sliding his hands into his pockets. “That sounds like a good plan.”

He sucked in a breath and nodded, his head bobbing up and down over and over.

“Would you mind taking a walk with me to the garden? I could use some fresh air,” Cate said.

A grin spread across Jack’s face. “Of course.”

Cate nodded and swung her legs off the bed. She patted Anna’s hand. “We’ll try again when I get back?”

“Of course, dear.”

“I’ll go with you,” Marcus said as Cate rose from the mattress.

“Actually, darling, if you wouldn’t mind staying, I’d like a word with you,” Anna said.

Marcus pressed his lips together into a thin line as Cate slid her hand around Jack’s arm. “Fine.”

“We won’t be long,” Cate assured him. They left her suite behind and navigated the halls to the door leading to the garden. Cate squinted as she stepped into the bright sunshine, shielding her eyes as they wandered through the spring blooms.

“Glad I stopped by when I did,” Jack said.

“Sorry to have kept you in the dark. When I woke up Anna was already there, and she wanted to try my visions with a different object, and—“

“You don’t need to apologize, Cate. I know you’re just doing what you have to. But I’m glad I came when I did to rescue you.”

Cate sniffed at the purple rose buds. “Oh, I didn’t need to be rescued. They’re taking excellent care of me.”

Jack furrowed his brow. “Oh, I thought...you seemed like you wanted to get out of there.”

Cate sucked in a breath. “It has been a little uncomfortable.”

“I knew it,” Jack said, shifting his gaze out over the landscape. “As beautiful as this place is, we need to get out of here.”

Cate fingered the delicate petals of the blooming buds. “No, we’re so close to making progress.”

“Cate, progress doesn’t matter if you’re—“

“I’m not. It’s not what you think.”

He gazed sideways at her. “Care to explain?”

Cate slid her eyes closed, her features pinching. She licked her lips before she fluttered her eyes open. She wandered to the stone wall circling the mountaintop garden and stared out over the rolling hills. “This is not going to end well.”

Jack rubbed her shoulders. “I’m sure we can figure this out. We’ll get the will fixed.”

“No, not the will.” Cate rolled her head to the side. “Anna wants to know when I’m going to start redecorating the houses. She’s shocked that I haven’t been to Havershire or whatever shire it is Marcus owns and the other one and the other one. And if I want changes at the palace to tell her.”

She covered her face with her hands as she sighed. “I’m certain that’s what they’re talking about now. She’s going to be so disappointed when she finds out the truth.”

“Why does it matter?”

“I actually like Anna. I don’t want her hurt in this charade.”

Jack wiggled his eyebrows, shifting his gaze to the landscape again. “Hopefully, it’ll all be over soon and you won’t have to worry about it anymore.”

Cate sucked in a deep breath and nodded. “With any luck. I made some progress with the visions. But no one will let me try the bracelet again. It must have something to do with Gertrude.”

“But you saw something, right?”

Cate nodded, avoiding his gaze.

“What?”

“What?” she asked.

“What did you see?”

“Oh, um, nothing to do with Gertrude. Nothing to do with anything. It was fleeting, but I could center on it. But I used the rose which brought a happy future memory.”

“Future memory?”

Cate bobbed her head up and down. “That’s what they are called. The visions. And they do feel like memories. It’s weird. Anyway, I saw something obscure that doesn’t help us at all. And no one will let me touch the bracelet.”

Jack rubbed her shoulders again. “What do you think everyone’s doing at home?”

Cate stared out at the bright blue sky as the fluffy white clouds floated across it. “It’s kind of weird because the answer is nothing, right?”

“What?” Jack asked, his hand freezing on her shoulder.

“Well, think about it. We’re here, living through days, but...Marcus will return us to almost exactly the moment we left. Only moments will have passed. So...at home, our friends are frozen in time.”

Jack scrubbed at his face. “This is...weird. So, okay, how does this work? What if we fix all this? What if we fix the will? What happens when we get back?”

“Everything will be different.”

Jack remained silent, rubbing his chin as he considered the statement. “Is that what happened when I went missing?”

“Yeah,” Cate said with a nod. “I went to the library and you were gone but for everyone else, you’d be gone for a week. So, if we fix things, we’ll go back and Mr. Smythe will be really confused about what’s happened. No one will know why the will is different.”

“But we’ll remember.”

“We’ll remember,” Cate said. “Nothing will have changed for us. But everything will have changed for everyone else in the house.”

Jack sighed, resting his chin in his palm as he balanced his elbow against his other arm. “I hope I can survive all this. It’s just getting weirder and weirder.”

Cate chuckled at him. “I mean, at least we can fix things, right? And then we’ll just need to explain why things changed. Oh, maybe we can update the will after the last one with the codicil removed. That would fix it. I think.”

“Right,” Jack said, bobbing his head up and down. “Wait, couldn’t you have brought me back early and stopped everyone from remembering I was missing?”

“We returned with you after we went searching. I guess we could have returned with you around when you disappeared, but...” Cate crinkled her brow. “Then there may have been two of you.”

Jack’s eyes went wide. “Two of me? That’s...” He took a few breaths, his mouth hanging open. “So, I could, in theory, talk to myself.”

“You could tell yourself how dashing you are. Or make bad puns to yourself,” Cate said.

“Or make excellent puns,” Jack pointed out.

“Either. Both.”

Jack rubbed his chin again. “Can I ask you something?”

“Sure.”

“Have you...talked to yourself?”

Cate shook her head. “No. I’ve never talked to myself, but I saw myself with you in 1942.”

Jack’s head slid forward as he stared at her. “You saw...yourself.”

“Yeah. I saw myself with you. I wanted to grab you back then but it was the wrong you. The right you was with Gianna. It’s really confusing, but yes, I saw myself.”

“Did you see you?”

“No, the other me didn’t see me.”

“Whew,” Jack said, rubbing his forehead. “Good thing. Or else the universe may have blown up.”

Cate screwed up her face and chuckled. “What?”

“The universe will explode. It’s like a basic tenant of time travel.”

“I’m not sure that’s true.”

“I think it is. In Back to the Future, the lady couldn’t handle seeing her older self. She passed out.”

“I was only two days older.”

“Still...” Jack said with a shrug.

“It’s not a problem. Believe me.”

Jack wagged his finger at her. “You don’t know that, Cate. And as a Reid, I’m going to pull the safety card on this one and say just don’t do it.”

“But it’s fine. Really, I promise.”

“You can’t know.”

“But I do. In 1810, Marcus had an 1810 counterpart.”

Jack’s eyes went wide, and his jaw fell open again. “No. His eyes floated to the castle. Two Dukes?”

“Yep. And they talk to each other. They tell each other things. Like the future and what they should do.”

Jack stared down at the ground, kicking the gravel around on the path. “I can’t believe I’m going to say this, but...I’m kind of glad I was unconscious for that.”

Cate pressed her lips together and shook her head as she playfully patted his arm. “Well, I am not. You were really sick. I would have preferred you to have been fully conscious.”

“I wouldn’t have stayed that way after I saw that,” Jack answered.

Cate sucked in a breath. “Anyway, I guess we’ll find out how things happen this time. If anyone ever lets me touch that bracelet.”

“You’re way braver than I am, Cate,” Jack said. “I don’t think I could do what you’re doing. Scratch that. I know I couldn’t do it.”

“Yes, you could. You could do it for Dunhaven. For Molly, for the Frasers, for me.”

“I think you’re way braver than me.”

Cate shifted her gaze to the palace’s wall. “I guess we should head back.”

“Yes, I’m sure Mama Northcott is pacing the halls because you’ve spent far too long away from her darling baby boy.”

Cate giggled as they strolled back toward the door.

“You know, I never know what to call her. But I have a feeling if I called her Anna she’d faint dead away.”

“Technically, you should call her Your Grace. She’s the mother of a Duke.”

“Technically, I should call you Your Grace. You’re the wife of a Duke. Though it sounds so strange when that girl says it. Andrea, is it?”

Cate nodded as they pushed into the castle’s hall. “Yes. Andrea. And Cate is just fine.”

“You’ve never been one for titles,” Jack said in his best Marcus voice.

Cate pressed her lips together as she suppressed another giggle.

“And are you certain you don’t prefer Catherine?”

Cate shot him a sideways glance. “Yes, I’m sure. You’re going to get yourself in trouble with your joking.”

They wound through the halls to her bedroom suite. Cate pushed inside, finding the room empty. “No one’s here.”

Jack scanned the space before he slipped inside. “At the risk of being beheaded, I’ll come in.”

“They’re not going to behead you.”

“You don’t know that,” Jack said with a wag of his finger. “They must still be discussing all those renovations you’re going to do at the house in Stratfordshire. Or perhaps the Mayberry estate. Or maybe the London home. And when you’ll have tea with the Queen.” Jack waved a finger in the air as he did his best Queen voice.

Cate shook her head as she giggled. “I’m glad the temporalysis has not dampened your sense of humor.”

“Mrs. Campbell is going to be thrilled if you stay married through your one-year anniversary.”

Cate sighed and sank onto her chaise. “I’m not certain what I dread more. Mrs. Campbell’s one-year extravaganza—“

“Don’t forget The Presidents’ Ball right on its heels.”

“Right, and that, or touching that bracelet again.” Cate slid her eyes sideways to the gold chain on the side table.

“The bracelet would win for me.”

“I think it wins for me too.” Cate stared at it before she glanced around the room. “And no one is here to stop me so...” She reached for the chain when Jack smacked her hand back.

“I’m here to stop you.”

Cate snapped her gaze to him, her jaw hanging open. “Jack!”

“No, Cate. I’m not going to be turned into a frog because I let you pick that thing up.”

“No one is turning anyone into a frog. And if you don’t let me try, we’ll never find out if I can do this. No one will let me try it.”

“Well, you’re not doing it on my watch. No way. I’m not going to let you do and get the wrath of the Northcotts while you lay unconscious. I had enough of that last night, and I didn’t even do anything.”

“Okay, fine. I’ll wait until you leave.”

Jack plopped into the armchair and flung his hands out. “Looks like you’ll have a long wait. Because I’m not leaving.”

Cate threw herself back onto the chaise, letting her body go limp. “Ugh. We’ll never solve this.”

Jack drummed his fingers on the arm of the chair. “I’ll win favor with those Northcotts yet.”

She poked a finger at him. “You should be worried about winning favor with me. I’m the MacKenzie.”

“And I’m the Reid. I’m supposed to protect you. Always.”

“Well, you are, by letting me pick this up, searching for information about Gertrude or whatever is happening with The Agency and defeating them!”

Jack wrinkled his nose. “Stop trying to convince me. I am not going to be the reason you’re unconscious in the bed.”

“You wouldn’t be. I’m the one doing this. I know what I’m doing. And I was able to make progress this morning. My music box helps. I’m going to try that when I touch the bracelet and see if it works.”

“And what if it doesn’t? What am I supposed to do, just let you lay there unconscious until one of those two wander back in and say, ‘Oh, hi, Cate’s unconscious, don’t know when she’ll wake up.’”

“No, of course not. Hopefully, I won’t be unconscious. I only passed out last night because the stupid chain got caught on my thumb.”

Jack pursed his lips and clasped his hands in front of him, avoiding her gaze.

“Jack, you can monitor it. Pull it off me if I struggle too much. But let me try.”

He slid his eyes closed and puckered his lips. “Damn it, Cate. If you get me turned into a dog, I’m going to bite you.”

“Deal. You can bite me if Marcus turns you into a dog. Until then, grab that bracelet, and let’s go.”

Jack slid the jewelry piece off the table with a shake of his head as Cate hurried into the bedroom. She opened the lid of the music box before she stretched out on the bed.

“Okay, I need to prepare to touch that. I’ll let you know when I’m ready. Lay it in my hand. It’ll be taxing on me, but don’t pull it away too quickly.”

Jack huffed out a sigh, sliding his eyes closed. “Oh, Cate. I’m nervous.”

“Don’t be. It’ll be all right.”

“I really hope so.”

Cate squeezed his hand and settled back into the pillows. She closed her eyes, letting the music wash over her. She steadied her breathing. She opened her eyes, staring at the bracelet. Her heart skipped a beat as she stared at it.

She shifted her gaze to the purple rose in its case next to the piano music box. The memory of receiving them along with her earlier future memory settled in her mind.

“Okay,” she whispered. “Give me the bracelet.”

With her eyes trained on the two gifts and the music playing, the metal, warm from Jack’s skin, slid across her skin. She struggled to keep her eyes focused as memories raced through her mind. Tension twisted at her temples. Pain began to build. She winced.

“Cate?” Jack asked, leaping from his seat and hovering over her.

“Wait,” she squeaked.

She gritted her teeth as she struggled to process the blur.

“Cate!”

“Wait,” she said again. Her breathing turned ragged.

“That’s it, I’m taking it,” Jack said. He whipped the bracelet from her hand as she collapsed backward.

Exhausted, she struggled to suck in breaths. The doors to her suite burst open and Marcus raced in, followed by Anna.

“What’s happened? What have you done?” he shouted at Jack.

“She wanted to try the bracelet. I—“

“She what? And you let her?”

“I’m fine,” Cate whispered.

Marcus grabbed her hand, stroking her hair. Anna pushed past Jack, squeezing Cate’s other hand in hers.

“I’m fine,” she repeated. “And I think I know where Gertrude is.”

CHAPTER 21

“Cate, are you serious?” Jack asked from the foot of her bed. “You know where she is.”

Cate struggled to push herself up. She made it as far as her elbows before Anna and Marcus stopped her.

“Easy, Catherine,” Anna said.

“I’m fine, really. And I managed to get some clarity in my future memory that may help us.”

“What did you see?” Jack asked, earning a glare from both mother and son.

“I saw a...house or something. It looked abandoned. I saw Gertrude there. She was...” Cate’s features pinched. “Tied to a chair. It was dark. Ummm—”

“All right, easy, Catherine,” Marcus said. “Take your time. There’s no need to rush.”

Cate struggled to sit up further. “There is. She’s trapped there. We can solve this. We can—”

“Do you know the exact location?” Marcus asked.

Cate collapsed back into the pillows. “No.”

“Then we have more work to do.”

Cate covered her face with her hands.

Anna pulled them away, squeezing them in hers. “It’s all right, Catherine. This is incredible progress. I’m amazed.”

Cate sighed. “It’s not enough progress.”

“It’s plenty,” Marcus said.

“And each time you try, you’ll get better. And you’ll get more information,” Anna said.

Cate nodded and waved at Jack for the bracelet. “Okay, I’ll try again now.”

“No,” Anna and Marcus said simultaneously.

Anna shook her head. “You can’t try again this quickly.”

“Yes, I can.”

“You’re going to overtax yourself. You’re still unsure, and you’re going to hurt yourself,” Anna answered. “You don’t want to end up like you did last night.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped again.

“Maybe they’re right, Cate,” Jack said, squeezing her toes.

“Now, you’re all ganging up on me,” Cate said with an amused eye roll. “Fine, fine. Since everyone agrees, I’ll wait.”

Anna pulled a blanket over Cate’s legs and tucked it around her.

Cate thrashed her head back and forth. “I feel like an invalid. I’m not sick. I’m perfectly fine.”

Anna fussed more with the cover. “If you want to try again soon, you should not tax yourself now. In the meantime, perhaps you can recall more details from what you saw.”

“You’re right.” Cate slid her eyes closed, trying to pull up as many details as she could from what she’d seen. After a moment, she clicked her tongue, pounding her fists on the bed. “It’s all fuzzy now. It was so clear in my mind when I saw it.”

“That’s perfectly normal, Catherine. Until you can still speak whilst you have the visions, they will be vivid, then quickly fade. It is your body’s way of protecting itself.”

“I don’t need to be protected from this. It’s so frustrating.” Cate patted the bed on either side of her. “You all don’t need to stay. I’m perfectly fine.”

“There is nowhere I’d rather be, dear,” Marcus said as he stroked her hair again.

“Me too,” Jack said with a nod. Marcus shot him an annoyed glance as he dragged another chair from the sitting room and plopped into it.

“Thank you all. I’m sorry this is going so slowly.”

“There is no need to apologize,” Anna said with a pat on her arm.

Cate puckered her lips as she bided her time to try again. "Did you say I'd be able to talk during these visions eventually?"

"Oh, yes. You should see them with just a tiny amount of pain and discomfort. You'll be able to speak while they occur. That should make them easier to decipher, although, as I mentioned, it can be incredibly tricky to attempt to pinpoint meaning."

"I have a feeling this one is fairly easy to pinpoint. It seems I'm seeing the place where Gertrude is being held captive by The Agency."

"And now we'll work to get more details on where that is. Are you ready to try again?"

"Mother," Marcus began, "are you certain it isn't too soon?"

Anna shot him a glance with her eyebrows raised. "Are you questioning me?"

"Of course not. Merely suggesting we err on the side of caution."

"I believe Catherine would like to try, and she won't rest until she does. So, she's not getting adequate rest anyway."

Cate pulled herself up to sit straighter, bobbing her head up and down. "I would very much like to try again."

"Mr. Reid, do you have the bracelet?" Anna waved her hand toward Jack.

Jack shifted around in his seat. "Uh, I'm kind of on his side on this one." He poked a finger toward Marcus.

"His timing is nothing short of amazing," Marcus murmured.

"Well, I think he makes a good point. I think it's too soon."

"And I say it's not," Anna answered.

Cate offered him a stunned glance. "I'm with Anna. And I'm the person experiencing it so my opinion outweighs everyone. Hand over the bracelet, Jack."

Jack eyed Marcus who glanced at him over his shoulder. "Don't look at me, Mr. Reid. We are outnumbered."

Jack pressed his lips together and shook his head as he dug the bracelet out of his pocket. "Can't believe this."

"Please keep your commentary to a minimum, Mr. Reid. While I appreciate your worry for your friend, I have things perfectly under control," Anna said as she accepted the bracelet dangling from Jack's fingers. "Catherine, whenever you are ready."

Cate nodded. "Okay, just give me a minute."

“Take your time,” Anna said with a nod.

Marcus wrapped his hand around Cate’s as she settled back into the pillows, allowing the music to relax her. She closed her eyes, letting her mind recall her happy moments at Rosenberg Palace as she’d done before and the seemingly happy future moment she’d witnessed when she touched the rose.

She pressed her lips together, preparing for the onslaught of painful images. Her heart skipped a beat, and she forced it to settle into a normal rhythm. With her palm open, she opened her eyes and slid them to Anna. “Ready.”

“Good luck,” Anna whispered as she dropped the bracelet into Cate’s hand.

The metal hit her skin, cool to the touch this time, and the images began to rush through her mind. She fought to slow them, the pain building already.

She tried to speak as they floated past, but she found herself unable to make a sound. The tension built at her temples. Tears formed in her eyes as the visions showed no signs of slowing down.

“No,” she cried as she dropped the bracelet on the bed. She blew out a shaky breath as a tear slid down her cheek.

“It’s all right, Catherine,” Marcus said, rubbing her arm.

“I didn’t get anything this time. I got more last time. I’m going backward.”

Anna scooped up the bracelet and set it aside. “You’re not. These setbacks are normal. You’re pushing yourself instead of letting them come to you. You are forcing things, and that is making this all the harder.”

Cate heaved a sigh. “I just want to get more information.”

“There are other angles we can try that don’t involve your clairvoyance,” Marcus said.

“Like what? An exhaustive search of all The Agency’s properties in every time period?” Cate slapped a hand against her face.

“That was rather a dramatic way to put it, but yes,” Marcus answered.

“I’m game. I can help. Just tell me what to do,” Jack said, rubbing his hands together.

Anna sat back in the chair, furrowing her brow.

Marcus rose from his seat. “Their properties are extensive. It will take us days to comb through them and select potential locations to scout.”

“Wait, wait, wait,” Anna said, waving a hand in the air. She cocked her head, licking her lips and narrowing her eyes.

“What is it, Mother?”

“Surely, you can’t want Cate to try again, can you?”

“I can do it,” Cate answered.

“No. Not with the bracelet. But perhaps we can glean some additional details from the one clear memory she’s had.”

Cate bit into her lower lip, her features pinching. “Oh, but I can’t remember anything else. I’m sorry.”

“Yes, I know you said it’s hazy now, but...what if we hypnotized you?” Anna asked.

Marcus cocked his head, flicking his eyebrows up. “Excellent idea, Mother. Perhaps that can help us narrow the search.”

“I’m not sure I can be hypnotized,” Cate answered.

“What makes you say that?” Anna asked.

“Well,” Cate answered, tracing the blanket’s edge, “I tried it once and it didn’t work.”

“When?” Marcus asked.

“When I had temporalysis, I—“

“Who performed it?” he interrupted.

“Ahhhh...” Cate stammered, avoiding eye contact with everyone.

Jack cleared his throat and waved a hand in the air. “Me. I tried it.”

Marcus heaved a sigh. “Well, that explains it. User error. Mother is quite adept at it. I assure you she will have no issues achieving the hypnotic state with you.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes and blew out a long breath. “All right. Well, I’m willing to try. Will the memories hurt like they do when I touch the bracelet?”

“They may be frightening to you, but I am hoping they are not painful. Though hypnosis is not a standard technique for these situations, so we’ll be feeling our way through.”

“Wait,” Jack said, “are you saying you have no idea what this will do to her?”

Marcus shot him an irked glance. “That’s not exactly what she said, Reid.”

“This is a controlled experiment. We can end it at any time,” Anna added.

“I’d rather try this than the bracelet again. I mean, I’ll try either, but this seems less taxing.”

“Then that is what we will do,” Anna said with a smile and a pat on Cate’s arm. She waved at the window before she removed a pendant necklace from around her neck. “Marcus, close the drapes. Now, Catherine, lay back and try to relax. Focus on my pendant. Notice how it sparkles despite the dim light.

“Try to take deep breaths and feel your body relaxing. It’s melting into the bed. You’re beginning to feel very relaxed. Your eyes feel heavy as do your limbs. Your eyelids are starting to close.

“I’m going to count backward from three to one. When I reach one, you will be completely relaxed and asleep.”

Cate’s eyelids struggled to stay open as she stared at the pendant. Anna rolled it between her thumb and forefinger. It sparkled and glowed in the low light. Her limbs sank into the soft bedding, and her eyes slid closed.

She floated in darkness until Anna’s voice spoke again. “Catherine, are you relaxed?”

“Yes,” she answered.

“Where are you?”

“Nowhere,” Cate answered as she spun in the black room.

“I’d like you to find a place where you feel safe. Where you feel happy.”

Cate pinched her eyebrows together as she searched the darkness. Light pierced through it, and she moved toward the bright beam. She made out the outline of a partially open door. Cate grabbed the handle and tugged it open.

Her lips turned up at the corners as she recognized the future memory she’d seen earlier. She walked into it, embracing it fully as she closed out the blackness.

“Have you found one, Catherine?” Anna asked.

“Yes.”

“Good. If you feel any pain or become frightened, I want you to return here. Do you understand?”

“Yes,” Cate said as her smile broadened.

“All right, Catherine. Now, I want you to search your mind to find the vision you saw earlier. The vision of Gertrude.”

Cate’s forehead creased. “No.”

“I know you want to stay where you are, but I need you to find Gertrude. I need you to describe what you see when you find that vision.”

Cate nodded, allowing the room to slip away from her. Images raced past her in the darkness.

“Have you found it?” Anna’s voice echoed.

“No,” she cried.

“Calm down, Catherine. You’re fine.”

Cate squeezed her eyes closed as images whizzed past her. “I can’t make sense of anything. It’s all moving too fast.”

“Find the image you saw before. You recalled it after touching the bracelet. Find that image.”

“I’m trying, but I can’t.” Cate pressed her fingers against her temples as she searched the buzzing visions for anything familiar. Voices floated around, the spoken words unintelligible. Her head swam as her senses overloaded.

“Catherine, go back...” Anna’s voice trailed off, too soft for her to distinguish.

Cate wrapped her arms around her as she struggled to find a way forward. Nonsensical images surrounded her, voices overlapped, and a musty scent filled her nostrils.

In an instant, everything stopped. She found herself alone in the dark again. “Anna?” she called.

No one answered her. “Marcus?” Her voice echoed in the nothingness but no one responded.

“Jack?” she squeaked. “Anyone?”

Cate tightened her arms around her abdomen as she sank to sit. She stared into the blackness surrounding her. She was lost. And alone. And she had no idea how to find her way out.

CHAPTER 22

Cate shivered, rubbing her arms and letting her head fall back between her shoulder blades. She struggled to keep her heartbeat steady as she sat alone in the darkness.

“You can’t sit here, Cate. You have to move,” she said to herself. “You have to find a way out.”

She rose to stand and spun in a slow circle. She slid her eyes closed and forced her mind to recall the safe memory she’d created earlier. When she opened her eyes, she spotted the light ahead of her.

Her lips turned up at the corners. Perhaps if she went back there, she could hear Anna again, and she could get out. She took a step toward it but stopped. If she went there, she may never be able to return for the information she sought.

She shook her head and turned away from the glowing light. She forced herself to move further into the darkness.

After a few steps, the light flickered behind her. Cate twisted to glance over her shoulder. It flashed again before it burned out, plunging her further into blackness.

She pressed her lips together and stretched her hands out in front of her. She moved forward until she bumped into something. It screeched, and she stumbled back a step before she lunged toward it. Her fingertips explored the object.

A smooth surface with ornate edges. Cate used it to guide her steps forward. Muffled noises boomed overhead. She closed her eyes, trying to make sense of them.

“Voices,” she whispered. She crept further forward. A man and a woman conversed, though she couldn’t make out any of their words.

She continued forward. Her fingers scraped along a wall. She traced the edge of the picture frame molding.

“I’m inside a house.”

She pushed herself forward, using the wall as her guide. She reached a corner and rounded it. Light glowed at the end. Her heart skipped a beat as she spotted it. She hurried forward toward it. The voices grew louder though she still couldn’t make sense of them.

Cate tiptoed toward the doors, peering inside through the crack. Her pulse quickened. “Gertrude!”

Cate flung the door open and hurried into the space. Voices continued to babble from nowhere. She hurried toward the figure slumped in the chair. The woman’s chin rested against her chest with her eyes closed.

Cate reached for her wrist, bound to the chair’s arm. Her hand went through the woman. Cate rose and stumbled back with a gasp.

“It’s not real. She’s not here.”

Cate straightened and spun, taking in the room. “This is the room I saw. Abandoned. Large. Yellow walls. Parquet floors. Tray ceiling. Large windows.”

The couple spoke again. Cate struggled to make out the words, but she could not. She memorized as many details of the room as she could.

“Anna?” she called.

“Catherine? I’m here. We’re here. Catherine, you need to go to your safe place.”

“Okay,” Cate answered.

She took a step toward the door when the voices started again. They babbled on with nonsense. “No,” Cate said, shaking her head.

“Catherine, what’s wrong? Talk to me.”

“Someone’s talking. But I can’t understand it.”

“That’s okay, Catherine. Do not worry about that. Just come back to us,” Marcus said.

Cate nodded and took another step to the door. “Okay.”

The hairs on the back of her neck stood up, and her skin turned to gooseflesh. A shiver snaked down her spine. A low moan sounded behind her. She spun to glance at Gertrude.

“Gertrude?”

The woman moaned again. Cate took a step back toward her. “Gertrude?”

She took one more tentative step when Gertrude’s head snapped up. Her muscles strained against the shackles around her legs and the handcuffs around her wrists. Cate stared into her wide crystal blue eyes, so similar to her own.

The woman’s gaunt face showed extreme shock. “Gertrude, it’s okay. I’m Cate. I—“ “Cinderella,” the woman said, her voice strained and hoarse.

Cate froze, her forehead pinching at the word. “What?”

“Cinderella,” she repeated before she slumped in her chair.

Cate rushed forward toward her, kneeling in front of her. “Gertrude?”

With her eyes closed and her chin against her chest, Cate could solicit no further responses from her.

She rose, her features still pinched as she considered the strange event.

“Catherine?” Marcus called to her.

“I’m here. I’m coming back.”

After one final glance over her shoulder, she hurried from the room and crept through the blackness until she found the other glowing doorway. She pushed inside, feeling the warmth of the future memory surrounding her. “I’m here.”

Anna’s voice echoed overhead. “Good, Catherine. You are safe?”

“Yes.”

“All right, dear. I’m going to wake you. I will count backward and when I reach one and snap my fingers, you will awaken and feel refreshed. Ready?”

“Yes.”

The countdown sounded as Cate smiled at the happy memory. Anna’s fingers snapped, and the vision faded.

Cate fluttered her eyelashes open. Three concerned faces stared back at her.

Marcus stroked her hair. “Welcome back, dear.”

Anna settled back in the chair with a sigh. “You scared us.”

“Are you okay, Cate?” Jack asked.

“I’m fine. I just...I lost track of you. I heard you but when I tried to access the vision, everything went haywire.”

“I told you to go back to your happy moment, but then we heard nothing from you for quite a while,” Anna answered.

“Your voice cut off, and I was trapped.”

“You were quiet for way too long, Cate,” Jack said, grabbing her foot and shaking it. “And then you were murmuring, but we couldn’t understand much of it.”

Anna grabbed her hand and patted it. “I heard you call out for me, and then you seemed responsive again.”

“I found the vision. I saw it again. I saw Gertrude. I saw the room. I memorized as much as I could. It’s definitely in a house of some kind. A big house. Old. Abandoned. Yellow walls. Parquet floors. Tray ceiling. Large windows.”

“Could you see anything outside of the windows that could tell us where it was?” Jack asked.

Cate shook her head. “No.” She flicked her gaze to Marcus, wrapping her fingers around his arm and squeezing. “We need to find her. She’s not well.”

“We will, dear. With the information you have, we’ll look for houses controlled by The Agency. It will take a while to comb through the records.” He straightened and flicked his gaze to Jack. “Come along, Reid, let’s—“

“I’m coming, too.” Cate pushed herself to sit, swinging her legs over the edge of the bed.

“No,” Marcus answered as Anna grabbed her arm to pull her back.

“You’ve just been through an ordeal, Catherine.”

“And Gertrude is going through a worse one. I’m not going to sit idly by resting from my tiny inconvenience while The Agency has her.”

Marcus hesitated, glancing at his mother before he returned his gaze to Cate. She tilted her head, staring at him with a pout. “Marcus—“

“I will bring the property list here,” he answered. “We will all take part in the search. Come with me, Reid, you can carry the files back.”

“Thank you,” Cate said, easing back into her pillows. Marcus strode from the room with Jack in tow.

“You are quite the fighter, aren’t you, Catherine?”

“I hope so. We need this issue solved.”

“I understand. When one of us is hurt, we must do all we can. I feel the same about my family. You included.”

Cate licked her lips, avoiding Anna's gaze. She likely wouldn't feel that way when they resolved this issue and she and Marcus split.

She raised her eyes to Anna's. She had to say something. To prepare her. It wasn't fair for the woman to assume their marriage was anything but a sham. Marcus had offered her a solution to save Dunhaven Castle from The Agency. He'd want his life back soon enough. She should be prepared.

Anna patted her hand again, stopping any statement on her part. "When you went to Eldinbury Castle in the middle of the night for Marcus, you revealed the depths of your strength. And I'm sorry to say, dear, but I think you will need that strength for this fight with The Agency."

Cate recalled the scene with Gianna when she asked her friends to repay their salaries to her. "They are terrible."

Anna offered her a tight-lipped smile. "Yes, I know. However, you and Marcus make an incredible team. You always support each other. And that is what will get you through this."

Cate swallowed hard again. "The thing is—"

"I know it sounds hollow, darling, but it's true. Marcus simply adores you, as do I. And we will both get you through this, difficult as it may be. We will stick together. Like family does."

Cate's features pinched. She opened her mouth to speak again when the doors opened. Jack hauled several folders overflowing with papers. He crossed to the bed and plopped them on the corner.

Marcus picked up one, thicker than an encyclopedia. "German holdings. Mother, this may be a good file for you to go over. You likely know many of these properties."

"Of course, dear," Anna said, accepting the folder.

He passed another thick folder to Jack who sank into the chair at the bottom of the bed and flicked it open. His eyes went wide. "They own all of this?"

"Indeed," Marcus said. "Their network is vast."

Jack wiggled his eyebrows as he fluttered his eyelids. "This will take more than a few days."

"We will mark anything that is not industrial and go from there," Marcus said, passing a folder to Cate before he eased into a chair with one of his own.

Several more remained stacked near Cate's feet. She stared at them before flicking open her own. The spreadsheet in front of her contained at least thirty properties per page. She shuffled through, finding similar content on the rest of the pages. “There are hundreds of these. Maybe thousands.”

“This will take time,” Marcus answered.

“They have more houses than you, Marcus.”

“Than us, dear,” he said with a wink.

Cate sighed. “My information isn’t going to help us at all. This list isn’t going to tell me that it has a yellow room with big windows.”

“That’s not true, Catherine,” Marcus said. “We know it’s not an industrial property or anything similar to it. We can rule out many of these.”

Cate shuffled through her papers again and scoffed. “And still have thousands of properties to check.”

Marcus shifted his gaze from his paper to her face. “We will find her, Catherine. I promise.”

Cate let her shoulders drop, and she nodded. “Okay.”

Jack caught her gaze, offering a tight-lipped smile before returning to his list.

Cate settled in, grabbing a pen and scanning the first page. She placed checkmarks near any property listed as residential. By the end of the first page, she had fifteen checks. Fifteen places to check on just the first page alone.

She flipped to the next page and ran the tip of her pen down the list, checking properties. After five pages, she tossed her pen down with a sigh. “Okay, I think I should try the bracelet again. Maybe I can get more details about this property.”

“You do not need to do that. And we have no guarantees that it will help us,” Marcus said.

“He’s right,” Anna agreed.

Cate heaved a sigh. “I’ve done five pages of this folder. And I have over fifty checkmarks already. At this rate, we’ll each have hundreds of places to check. We’ll never be able to check all of these.”

“There is nothing wrong with identifying properties before we try another angle,” Marcus said.

Cate puckered her lips, sucking in a deep breath before she picked up her pen and continued with her list.

She checked off a few more properties before she flipped to the next page. Her eyes glazed over as she hit page ten.

“I could use some tea,” Anna said, rising from her chair and ringing the bell. The servants delivered it shortly after.

“How are you feeling, Catherine?” Anna asked as she checked off a few more properties while balancing her tea in one hand.

“Well enough to try that bracelet again.”

Anna chuckled at her. “Perhaps after the tea.”

“Sounds like a plan. I should be up to only one hundred and fifty properties to check then with hundreds of pages left to go.” Cate took another sip of her tea as she scanned another page. She made a few checkmarks and turned the sheet over on the finished pile.

She browsed the first few properties on the page before she paused. She crinkled her brow and flipped back to the previous sheet. She searched it for the property that gave her pause.

The tip of the pen tapped it as she slid it down the page. Her heart skipped a beat as she stared at the property description. Why did this property draw her attention?

Cinderella Chateau. Cate furrowed her brow. Was it the whimsical name that drew her?

Something niggled at her. Heat washed over her as the memory of her experience during hypnosis flitted through her mind. Gertrude had said Cinderella. Cate glanced at the title on the folder’s tab. French Assets.

French. She’d heard people speaking in the background of her vision. They were speaking French. Gertrude had said Cinderella twice. This property fit.

She slid her saucer and teacup onto her nightstand. “I think I found something.”

“What is it, dear?” Anna asked.

“The thousandth checkmark?” Jack joked.

“No. The place we should start, I think.”

“Where and why?” Marcus asked.

“Cinderella Chateau. It fits, but more than that, in my vision, I heard people talking but I couldn’t understand them. I realize now that they were speaking French.”

“Based on that perhaps we should focus on the French properties. But why this one?” Marcus asked.

“Just before I left the vision to come back, Gertrude spoke to me. She said one word. I didn’t remember it until I saw this description. She said

Cinderella. She said it twice. I didn't know why she said it but seeing the name of this property, I think it may have been a clue."

Marcus studied the location. "It is remote enough. Abandoned for quite some time. It is an excellent possibility."

"Should we check it?" Cate asked.

"Yes, I believe so. It cannot hurt. Mother, would you mind continuing your work while Catherine and I—"

"And I," Jack added.

Marcus narrowed his eyes at him. "Perhaps you could assist Mother—"

"No, I think I'm best served going to the fairy tale chateau. No offense," he said, waving a hand at Anna.

"I disag—"

"Yes, Jack's right. He should go, too. In case I have another attack. I don't want you alone there with an unconscious me," Cate said, patting his arm.

He pulled his chin back as he glanced at her. "I am certain I will handle it, darling."

"I'm certain you can, too, but you shouldn't have to. Let's go. Can we do the location hop thing?"

"No," Marcus said with a pucker of his lips. "I can only location hop to places I am familiar with. I have never been to this property."

Cate let her head fall back between her shoulders. "Really? So, a drive? How long?"

"Certainly not. We'll simply use a time portal."

"Oh no," Jack said with a sigh. "Not that."

"As I said, you may prefer staying with Mother."

Jack shoved his hands in his pockets and heaved a sigh. "I'll make do."

"How wonderful for us," Marcus grumbled. "Do you remember the rules?"

"Go straight through so you don't try to trap me inside," Jack answered.

"That's not exactly it, but it will do," Cate answered as Marcus narrowed his eyes. "Where should we leave?"

"Here is fine," Marcus answered, stretching his hands out.

"Marcus Benjamin Northcott," Anna exclaimed, slapping her hands against the stack of papers she perused, "how many times must I tell you not to open your time portals in the house?"

Cate's jaw dropped open, and she shot an amused glance at Jack.

“Mother—“ Marcus began.

“Outside. I do not wish to spend the rest of the day picking up papers from your whirlwind. Now, out.” Anna shooed her hands at them.

“Fine. We’ll leave from the garden,” Marcus said. Cate and Jack followed Marcus from the room and through the halls.

“So, have you opened many time portals in the house?” Cate asked, her words laced with giggles.

“I do not see the issue with it.”

Cate offered him an amused grin as they pushed into the garden. “She has a point about the wind. With all those papers, it would take us days to clean up.”

“At least we will save her that. Are we ready?”

Cate nodded as Jack answered, “Ready as I’ll ever be.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow and opened his mouth to answer.

“Just open the portal,” Cate said before he could.

Marcus clamped his mouth closed and stretched out his arms. The sparkling portal appeared in front of them. When it opened fully, Cate pushed Jack forward, then followed behind him. Within seconds, they stared up at the red bricks of the rectangular house.

Black clouds painted the sky above it, and fog shrouded it. Cate shivered as she studied the facade. She wrapped her arms around herself as Marcus arrived.

“Are you cold, dear?” he asked, removing his jacket and slipping it around her shoulders.

“Thank you,” she said, burrowing deeper into it.

“Should we go inside?” Jack asked.

“Stay here while I check it first,” Marcus said.

“Check it first? We’re not...”

Cate laid a hand on his arm. “Jack, let him check first.”

Jack stepped back next to her and wrapped an arm around her shoulders. “All right. I’ll stay with Cate.”

“Make certain she is safe,” Marcus said as he strode toward the house.

Cate pulled Marcus’s jacket tighter around her as she glanced at the trees surrounding them. The remote property was the perfect place to hide someone. Would they find Gertrude inside or was this an ambush?

CHAPTER 23

Cate's breathing turned ragged as the loneliness of the area hit her.

Jack tightened his grip on her. "Cate, are you all right? Are you seeing something?"

She shook her head and stalked forward.

"Cate?" Jack called after her.

"He shouldn't go alone."

"Are you crazy? He's invincible. Let him go."

Cate shot him a glance over her shoulder as she hurried forward. "He's not invincible."

Jack huffed before he jogged forward. "Wait up."

Cate nodded at him as he joined her, matching her quick pace to the front door. She pushed inside, joining Marcus as he surveyed the entrance.

"Catherine, is something wrong?"

"You shouldn't be alone," she answered, threading her arm through his. "This could be a trap."

"Which is why you should have stayed outside."

Cate shook her head. "No."

Marcus smiled at her, tipping her chin up. "You are too stubborn for your own good."

"I don't want to have to save you again," she said with a coy grin.

"Let's hope it doesn't come to that." He scanned the space. "It appears abandoned. But we should still be on our guard. Catherine, let us know if you see the room from your visions."

She nodded. "I'm hoping we find Gertrude."

Marcus offered her a tight-lipped smile as he laced his fingers through hers and led her into the next room.

They explored the downstairs rooms, not finding Gertrude or the room from Cate's vision.

"Does anything look familiar?" Jack asked as they climbed the stairs to the second floor.

"The architecture looks similar to my vision, but I'm sure that's true for a lot of houses. I'm starting to worry this was a mistake."

"Well at least we can rule one of the million places to check off the list," Jack joked.

Cate offered him a half-hearted smile.

Marcus squeezed her hand. "There is no reason to worry, Catherine. There is a reason you were drawn here. You must learn to trust your gut."

Her half smile broadened to a full one. They searched a few of the rooms overlooking the front lawn, finding nothing. Cate chewed her lower lip as they stepped across the hall and into another room.

She scanned the room and shook her head as Marcus glanced at her. He wrapped an arm around her shoulders and guided her into the hall. She moved toward the next door, letting her fingers glide along the wall as she walked.

Her heart skipped a beat as it triggered a memory. While hypnotized, she'd experienced something similar to this.

"Catherine, are you all right?"

She nodded to him in silent response as she continued down the hall. They pushed into the next room, and Cate's pulse quickened.

Images raced across her mind, and she grabbed Marcus's arm. "This is it. This is the room I saw."

"Are you certain?"

"Yes," Cate said, taking a few more steps into the space. She spun, searching it. "She's not here. She was here in my vision. She's not here."

Marcus studied the room, shuffling further into it and tracing a hole in the wall.

Cate pursed her lips, her brow furrowing. "She's not here. My visions were useless. She's not here."

Marcus retreated to her, bracing her shoulders with his hands. "Your visions were not useless. They led us here. This is a clue. We must determine what it means.”

“How?” Jack asked.

Cate’s features pinched at his words.

Marcus glared at him. “There is a reason we were brought here by her visions. Trust me. I am far more experienced in these matters than you.”

Cate pressed her lips together as she traced a finger along the picture frame molding. “There has to be a reason I saw this. You’re right.”

“Of course, I am.” He offered her an amused smile, and she returned his expression.

“I hate to be the bearer of bad news, but I don’t see any clues here. It doesn’t even look like anyone’s been here recently.”

“Perhaps you should keep your opinions to yourself, Reid.”

Cate glanced out the window, her finger tracing the dirty and peeling sill. “He’s right. There’s nothing here. Maybe my visions aren’t right. Maybe they’re false.”

Her forehead creased as she recalled the future memory she’d seen when touching the rose.

“They are not false, Catherine. There is a reason you saw this room. There is a reason you saw Gertrude in it. We are missing something.”

“Yeah, Gertrude,” Jack answered. “Maybe there’s something in another room. There are two more up here that we haven’t checked.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow at him. “Perhaps you can check those instead of standing here making useless comments.”

“We should all go together,” Jack said.

“He’s right. No one should go anywhere on Agency property alone,” Cate said, wrapping her arms around herself again.

“Whenever you are ready, Catherine,” Marcus said, sliding an arm around her shoulders.

“I’m ready.”

Marcus nodded as he guided her to the door. She shuffled toward it, her mind aching from the disappointment. Her foot kicked something. The round object rattled across the floor, landing a few inches from her.

Her lips parted as she stared down at it. She leaned forward toward it. “What is this?”

Her fingers brushed it, and a plethora of images raced across her mind. She gasped in a breath as she snapped her hand back. “This was Gertrude’s.”

“Did you get a vision?” Marcus asked as she straightened.

She nodded. “I need to try again.”

“No,” he said, scooping it off the floor. “Just a moment. We should do this in a controlled way. We do not want you to pass out or suffer any ill effects.”

“Maybe we should go back to the palace?” Jack suggested.

“That is the first excellent suggestion I’ve heard from you, Reid. Yes.”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “No, I want to try here. What if this leads us to another clue?”

“There is nothing wrong with getting that information at Rosenberg.”

“Let me try again here,” she said. “Maybe it’ll tell us something about where else we can look.”

Marcus heaved a sigh and opened his hand. Cate stared down at the green button. She reached out for it, but he closed his fingers around it. “Do not push things too far.”

She nodded. “Okay.”

With a shaky breath, she reached her trembling fingers toward the fabric-wrapped fastener as he held it out to her. She let her fingers graze it, and visions began almost immediately. Instinctively, she pulled her hand back.

“Catherine?” Marcus asked.

“I’m okay. It’s okay.” She blew out another breath as he wrapped his arm around her shoulders. She pressed her fingertips against the button again. Memories flooded across her mind, most of them faster than she could process.

Gertrude sat in a chair in the center of the room with her hands and feet bound. Her head hung down to her chest. The image changed before Cate could make out anything else. People entered the room, rushing around faster than she could make out clearly.

She tried to focus on details, to slow the images, but she struggled as pain grew across her forehead. She kept her fingers planted on the button as her knees grew weak. Hands grabbed her shoulders and pulled her back. Weakness coursed through her. Someone lowered her to the floor.

“Catherine,” Marcus’s voice said, floating in the air while her vision blurred. She reached for him, and he wrapped his hand around hers.

She blinked rapidly, clearing her eyes until she could see her surroundings again. Marcus and Jack hovered over her.

"I'm okay. Just a little weak."

"You held on too long," Marcus said.

"I saw things. Some things, not many. Gertrude was here. Definitely."

"But she's not here now, so they're one step ahead of us again," Jack said.

"No," Cate said with a shake of her head. "No, I don't think so. I think she's here."

Cate shook her head and pressed a hand against her forehead.

"Easy, dear, we can discuss it further at Rosenberg."

"No, what I mean is I think Gertrude is here. Just not in this time. I think it was another time. The glimpses of clothing I saw in the visions looked older. Turn of the century maybe? I'm not certain. They went by too quickly."

"It's all right, Catherine," Marcus said. "We can work on it at home. That's excellent so far."

Cate nodded as she pushed up to her elbows. "If I can get one clear image, I may be able to pinpoint at least the decade."

Marcus rubbed her back as she sat up. "How do you feel?"

"Fine. I can stand."

Jack and Marcus helped her to her feet. She wobbled for a moment, grabbing Marcus to steady herself.

He clutched her hand, wrapping an arm around her. "Do you need to rest more?"

She squeezed her eyes closed for a second and shook her head. "No. I'm okay."

"Are you certain you can walk?" Jack questioned.

"Yes, I can. Let's finish searching the house." She took a step forward, struggling to stay upright.

"You need to rest for a bit more, then we can proceed." Marcus and Jack eased her back to the floor. Jack settled next to her while Marcus squatted on the other side. "Easy, Catherine, there's no rush."

She sucked in a deep breath and nodded. "Just a few minutes. I really want to make progress though. Even if it's just to finish the search here."

Marcus slid a lock of hair behind her ear. "And there will be no stopping you as soon as you've recovered your strength."

"You know it," she said with a wink and a smile. As she waited for her body to stop trembling inside, she attempted to recall any details from the visions driven by the button. They had already begun to fade from her mind.

She reached for details that she could not pinpoint. With a sigh, she let her head rest against her knees.

“Maybe I should try—“

A loud bang resounded, cutting off her statement. She startled, grasping hold of both men and snapping her gaze to Marcus. “What was that?”

“Stay here. I’ll find out.”

Cate grabbed his arm. “Wait, you shouldn’t go alone.”

“You are in no shape to go.” He glanced at Jack. “Take care of her. Make certain she rests.”

Jack nodded, sliding a hand around Cate’s shoulders. “I will.”

Marcus rose to stand and stalked from the room, pulling the door slightly closed behind him.

Cate heaved a sigh, her forehead pinching. “Go after him.”

“Cate, no way, I’m not leaving you.”

“He shouldn’t be alone.”

“Neither should you,” Jack argued.

“Fine, help me up and we’ll both go.” Cate struggled to push herself up to stand.

“No,” Jack said with a shake of his head. He pressed her shoulder down, planting her on the floor again.

“Jack, I’m fine. I feel better. I’ll just sit here and fret.”

“Then I’ll distract you.”

“How?” Cate asked flinging her hands out to her sides.

“We can talk.”

“About?”

“Can we talk about how odd it is that you’re fretting over him?”

Cate set her chin on her knees and wrapped her arms around her legs. “The Agency is not an enemy anyone should face alone.” She picked her head up, shaking it. “No, I can’t stay here.”

“All right, easy, Cate, let me help you. If you insist on wandering around for Marcus Northcott, at least let me help you.”

Cate allowed him to help her to her feet.

“You okay?” he asked as she stood for a moment.

“Yeah, I’m okay. I’m going to take it slow.”

“Cate Kensie taking it slow? That’s a first.”

She chuckled at him before blowing out a sharp breath. "Okay, let's—"

The door creaked open on its hinges. Cate expected to see Marcus returning, but instead, another figure stood in the doorway.

She placed a hand against the jamb, cocking a hip and sticking her hand on it. "Hello, little mouse," Gianna said with a derisive grin.

"What are you doing here?"

"That's what I should be asking you," she said as she sauntered into the room and swung the door closed. "You found this place far faster than I expected. I'm starting to think I underestimated you."

"I know you did," Jack said with a glare at her.

"Well, I certainly did not expect you to get Marcus Northcott to marry you. And now this. How interesting." She spun on a high heel and raised her chin. "You are proving a worthy enemy, but I'm up to the task."

"Where is Gertrude?" Cate demanded.

Gianna puckered her lips, pulling them up into a satisfied smile. "I suppose I should tell you. Because it won't matter."

Cate's heart skipped a beat. "What's that supposed to mean? What have you done to her?"

"Oh, nothing, darling. Don't trouble your semi-pretty little head over it. It won't matter if I tell you she's in 1911 because you'll never make it there."

"Don't count on that."

"Oh, but I do. And that's because I have another present for you." She waved a ring in the air before she slipped it onto her finger. She lunged forward and grabbed hold of both of their arms.

Cate tugged at her arm but found herself unable to pull away. The room melted around them, disappearing from her sight for a moment. She tightened her grip on Jack's arm.

Bright light shone around them in the next instant. Cate squinted against it as the world filled in around her. She shivered, pulling Marcus's jacket tighter.

Gianna smirked at them as she let go of their arms and stepped back. "Have fun, Cate. I don't think you'll be alive much longer. Have fun with the three emperors."

With a chuckle, she disappeared from their sight, leaving them standing in a field.

"What just happened?" Jack asked.

Cate sucked in ragged breaths as she spun, searching the surroundings with wide eyes. "I don't know but...I don't think we're in 1956 anymore."

"What?" Jack exclaimed, his voice shrill. "Where the hell are we? When the hell are we?"

"I don't know. But it doesn't look good." Cate stared at the thousands of tents set up on either side of them, shrouded in fog.

"Are we at some sort of campsite?"

The sun sat low on the horizon, still rising. "Okay, it's morning. There's the rising sun," Cate said, pointing at it. "So, that's east."

"East of what, we don't know," Jack said. "Is it a tourist site?"

Drums resounded, stopping Cate's heart. "Oh no."

"What is it?"

She pointed a finger toward a line of men marching from within one of the camps.

"What the hell?" Jack asked, screwing up his face.

"We're in the middle of a battle. She dropped us in the middle of a war."

Jack glanced back and forth between the two camps as soldiers lined up on either side. "Which side do we go to? Which side is ours?"

Cate glanced to her left, studying the flags whipping in the wind as the soldier rode in front of the troops. She glanced in the opposite direction, studying the flags and the uniforms.

"Cate? Do you have any idea? Because I think we should get out of the line of fire and fast."

She furrowed her brow, flicking her gaze between the two parties. On her left, a man rode up, yelling at his troops.

"Oh no," Cate said, covering her gaping mouth with a hand.

"What is it?" He followed the line of her gaze, studying the man who rode back and forth, shouting in another language.

Cate licked her lips and pressed a hand against her stomach. "That..." She slid her eyes closed for a moment, swallowing hard. "That is Napoleon Bonaparte. She dropped us in the middle of the Napoleonic War."

CHAPTER 24

The color drained from Jack's face as he stared at the man racing up and down on a white horse regaled in battle colors. "I-I-I..." He scrubbed his face and tried again. "I've got nothing here. Nothing."

"We need to get out of here. The battle is going to start any minute now. He's whipping his troops into a frenzy."

"Do you know what battle this is? Which side should we go to?"

Cate spun in search of landmarks and the other generals. She snapped her fingers. "Wait. Gianna said to have fun with the three emperors. Three emperors. This is the Battle of Austerlitz."

"Who wins?"

Cate fluttered her eyelashes. "Napoleon. Definitely."

"I hate to sound like a fair-weather fan, but perhaps we should go to the French side then."

"Do you speak French?"

Cate shook her head. "Not a word. And he speaks Corsican. His troops are a mix, but I don't speak any of their languages. You?"

"No."

Cate flung her arms out. "Where's Celine when you need her?"

Jack's eyes went wide. "Do you think she's close?"

Cate shook her head. "No, she lives in Maine. Well, Massachusetts right now. And even if she was traveling, I doubt she's in Austria."

"Damn," Jack cursed under his breath. A shot rang out from the Allied side, announcing the first wave of battle. "French-speaking or not, I think we'd better go."

"You're right," Cate said. They joined hands and raced away from the center of the battle. "We need a place to think."

"In this battle? Are you joking?" Jack asked as he tugged her along next to him.

Cate's mind raced as fast as her feet as she tried to problem-solve her way out of the situation. She stumbled, falling forward onto her knees as more gunfire erupted. A sob escaped her.

"Cate, we can't stop."

"Where are we running to?"

Jack gestured toward the battle. "Not to. From. We're running from that."

"But to where? Jack, we're stuck here." She dug the timepiece from under her dress. "This won't work. We're in 1805. With no way back. Nowhere to go. We're nowhere near Dunhaven Castle to even try the watch, and I doubt it'll work anyway."

"Okay, you're right. We need to think. Somewhere without cannons and stuff."

Cate glanced at the encampment behind the French lines. "There. We'll sneak into one of the tents."

"Is that wise?"

Cate climbed to her feet. "There's nowhere else. We're in clothes that don't fit the era. We can't possibly wander into town, a town that is under siege by the way, and ask if anyone minds giving us a place to think."

"Good point." A bullet whizzed by too close for comfort. "Tents. Yes. At least it's close."

They hurried further from the battle and ducked into the camp. A few men still milled around or hurried to join their units. Another outfit formed up, ready to head off into battle under their leader's orders.

Cate and Jack snaked through the haphazard placement of tents, using them for cover. They squeezed through a narrow passage between two tents. Jack inched to the corner and peered around them. Two men rushed past, carrying their weapons.

Jack ducked back, pushing Cate behind him. He peeked out again before he grabbed her hand and nodded. "Come on."

They hurried around the corner, past several other tents. "We need to find a place with few people. This is still too crowded," Jack said.

They turned another corner, coming face to face with a French soldier. Jack pulled Cate closer to him. The man pulled his chin back to his chest.

“Ahhh,” Jack began.

The man babbled something in French that sounded like a question.

“Ummm,” Jack stammered again.

The man stamped a foot on the ground and pointed to Cate, rambling more in French.

Jack wrapped his arm around her waist and tugged her closer to him.

The man spoke again, shaking his head and waving a hand toward a large tent. Jack glanced toward it, his forehead wrinkling. The man repeated his request, waving emphatically toward the tent again before he hurried away.

“Nice fellow. I think he was telling us to go to that tent. Maybe he wanted us to hide there.”

“I’m not certain about that,” Cate said. “But there aren’t many people around here. Maybe it’s not a tent housing soldiers.”

“You mean like a place for eating or meeting or something.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod as she yanked Jack forward. “Although, we probably should find some clothes and change if we can.”

Jack nodded, pulling a tent flap open and staring inside. “Nothing obvious in there.”

“Here!” Cate shouted, tugging pants, shirts, and jackets from a drying line.

“Stealing laundry during a war. What is happening?” Jack asked, grabbing the garments from her and leading her toward the large tent. He flung the flap back and scanned the inside. “It’s clear.”

They slipped in, closing the flaps behind them and securing them. Cate wandered to the cot and collapsed onto it. “This isn’t a meeting tent,” she said, patting the bedding, “but hopefully this is an officer’s tent, and we’ll be safe while they plan the battle and lead the charge.”

Jack tossed the clothes on a nearby table and leaned against it, blowing out a long breath. “I can’t believe this.”

“Neither can I,” Cate said, staring at the ground in front of her.

“She dumped us in the middle of a war.”

“In another time period.”

“To die,” Jack said.

“To die,” Cate repeated. She sank her head into her hands.

Jack shuffled to her and plopped on the thin mattress. He rubbed her back for a moment until she pulled her hands away from her tear-stained face. She threaded her fingers through his and they sat in silence.

“We’re stuck, right?” Jack asked.

“Yep,” Cate answered. She opened the face on the timepiece and showed it to him.

“It’s not slow,” Jack noted.

Cate shook her head. “Because we didn’t use it to go through a time portal. Which begs the question of what would happen even if we could make it to Dunhaven Castle. Could we find a time portal leading to our time and would this open it?”

Jack hung his head, shaking it. “I don’t know. And how would we get to Dunhaven? We’re in...Austria, you said?”

“Austria in this time. Even if this would work and could get us home. Or close. It would take months to get there. We can’t live here for months.”

Jack leapt from his seat and paced around the tent. “I don’t even know what to say. I don’t know what to do. I don’t know...”

“Okay, calm down. We need a plan. We need to think. Vet options.”

“What options?” Jack shouted, spinning to face her. His features pinched, and he slid his eyes closed. “I’m sorry.”

“You don’t have to apologize. I understand. This is a nightmare. And she knew it.” Cate balled her hands into fists and pounded them against the cot.

“Do you think Marcus might...”

“How could he find us?”

“Maybe she’ll tell him?”

Cate tilted her head. “Why would she do that? She wants me dead.”

“I can’t believe for the first time in my life I’m hoping to see the face of Marcus Northcott. And I’m sad that we won’t.”

“I doubt she’s even spoken to him,” Cate answered. “We’re on our own, Jack.”

“We don’t know—“

Cate shot him a glance that stopped his words. She pressed a hand to her chest. “He’s not upset. Not disturbed.”

“You can still feel his heart?”

Cate nodded. “It’s normal, steady, strong. He doesn’t know yet. Or at least, if he does, he’s not concerned.”

Jack paced back and forth again, flinging his hands in the air. “This is unbelievable. I mean, what the hell are we supposed to do now? There has to be something. We can...Maybe...”

“I feel the same way. I don’t know what to do. Going back and forth between one time period and another at Dunhaven Castle is one thing, but...we can’t survive in 1805 for an extended period. We have no clothes, no money, nothing.”

“Okay, we’ll have to get money. And clothes. And try to find our way to Dunhaven Castle. At least there we’ll know the family. They can help us search for a solution.”

Cate let her gaze fall to her lap, tapping her toes on the floor.

“If it takes months, it takes months. We’re not giving up.”

“No, we can’t. But—” Cate stopped mid-sentence, crinkling her brow.

“What is it?”

She pressed her hand to her chest.

“Cate? What is it? Are you sick?”

She shook her head, flicking her gaze up to Jack’s face. “I think Marcus knows we’re gone. His heart is pounding.”

“Do you think they have him? The Agency?”

Cate slid her eyes closed, feeling the rhythm of his heart thudding against her ribs. She snapped them open and shook her head. “No. This is different from when they had him. This feels...agitated but not in pain.”

“Do you think she’ll tell him where she took us?”

“I wouldn’t count on it. Not without some sacrifice on his part.”

“Maybe he’ll...”

Cate shook her head, clutching the edge of the bed as she fought the tears forming in her eyes.

“Damn it,” Jack said, kicking the leg of the table near him.

Cate pressed her hand against her chest again, pinching her eyebrows. “Wait.”

Jack spun to face her. “What is it? Did something change? Is he in pain or captured or back to normal?”

“No, none of those. His heart is still racing, but...it’s 1805.”

“Yeah?”

“I met Anna in 1810 at Rosenberg. So she’s at Rosenberg. Maybe even Marcus.” She flicked her gaze to Jack, the corners of her lips turning up ever-so-slightly. “We don’t need to get to Dunhaven, Jack. We just need to get to Rosenberg Palace.”

Jack stared at her, rubbing his chin. “Okay, so that’s a far sight closer than Dunhaven, but...”

“But?” Cate prompted when he didn’t speak.

He shook his head. “Cate, you’re not married to him yet.”

“I know. Anna doesn’t think we were married until 1810, but maybe she’ll listen. We can tell her I’m married to him in the future. She should understand. She’s very much aware of time travel.”

Jack blew out a long breath, setting his hands on his hips. “That’s not a great plan, but at least it’s a plan. And it won’t take months. How far are we from Rosenberg?”

Cate shrugged and shook her head. “I’m not certain. In our time, a drive from what is now the Czech Republic to Germany would probably be eight hours, but we don’t have a car.”

“So, this is roughly six hundred miles.”

“The average human walks maybe three miles per hour.”

Jack narrowed his eyes, flicking his gaze up. “Which is two hundred hours.”

“Eight days. Eight days of walking nonstop for twenty-four hours.”

“So, in other words, weeks of walking if we’re planning on sleeping at all.”

Cate covered her hands with her face.

“This is a nightmare,” Jack said, resuming his pacing.

Cate pulled her hands away. “Wait, horses. Horses can run pretty quickly. Maybe thirty miles an hour running, less trotting, but still quite a bit faster than walking. If we rode horses, we could cut this in half.”

“Okay. There are horses here. We’ll grab a few.”

Cate pursed her lips, patting her hands against the cot’s edge. “Great. So not only does this plan depend on finding our way to Rosenberg Palace, randomly showing up there, and convincing Anna that her very rich, very distinguished, very titled son married a common American in the future, but we also need to steal horses from the French army.”

“I know it doesn’t sound good, but it’s the best we can do. We’ll have to hope for the best.”

“And steal food along the way.” Cate doubled over with a groan. “Oh my gosh, our future depends on how good we are at being criminals.”

“Thank Gianna. She’s turned us into thieves.”

Cate shook her head and held up the jacket she’d already grabbed. “I hate her so much.”

“I’m not fond of her either. Even more so now. Every time I think that woman can’t get any worse, she surprises me. First, she kidnapped me and held me in a dungeon. Then, she tried to make me repay my salary after she ripped away my job and your estate. And now she’s stuck us in the middle of a war.”

“I’m sorry, Jack.”

“It’s not your fault,” he answered.

She stood and approached him. “It is. She’s after Dunhaven. She’s after me.”

“She comes after a Mackenzie, she comes after a Reid. That’s the way it is. We stick together.”

Cate nodded at him as he pulled her into an embrace.

“We’re in this together, Cate.”

She pulled away and smiled up at him. Her grin faded, and she cocked her head. “Wait a minute. Technically, I’m a Northcott now. Do you think we can use that loophole to get out of this?”

Jack shook his head but chuckled in spite of himself. “I doubt it. Somehow that’s made it worse.”

“Infinitely. And you thought the time I got shoved into the loch was bad.”

“Child’s play compared to this,” Jack said with a chuckle. “I’d give anything to fish you out of the loch again.”

They laughed together for a moment before Jack offered a groan. “Oh, I guess we’d better change. Hey, how’s his heart?”

“Not beating as hard as before, but it’s not steady and strong like normal.”

“But not captured or tortured or anything?”

“No, nothing like that. But normally his heart just beats in perfect rhythm. He is almost completely unflappable. But this is...different.”

“I wonder if he senses yours is different.”

“I don’t know,” Cate said, staring into space. “I hope we’ll be able to ask him.”

“We will. Think positive. All right, let’s change and begin our Bonnie and Clyde lifestyle.”

Cate shuddered and shook her head. "Right. I'll step out and keep watch while you change."

"Don't go racing off without me."

"I wouldn't dream of it," Cate said as she walked to the opening. "I'm counting on you to steal the horses."

"I suppose you'll expect me to saddle them, too."

"I can help. I helped the stablehand in 1810."

"Look at you, Cate," Jack said with a wink, "you're all ready for a life of crime."

She chuckled before stepping out of the tent. The sounds of the battle raged across the field. Cate wrapped her arms around her midriff and shifted her weight from foot to foot. Questions raced across her mind faster than she could process.

How would they navigate? How would they eat? What would they say when they got to Rosenberg? If they got to Rosenberg, her mind added.

She pressed her palms against her forehead as she paced in a small circle. Maybe they could steal a map before they left the camp.

Cate pressed a hand against her chest, focusing on Marcus's heartbeat. Slower than before, but different from the norm.

Something flashed across her mind, and her temples tightened. The tent flap fluttered open, and Jack stepped out in his French military uniform.

"It's a bit snug but it'll work," Jack said, tugging at the uniform. "Your turn."

"I think there are a few horses that way," Cate said, pointing them out.

"Okay, I'll think of a way to snag them while you change clothes."

Cate nodded and ducked into the tent. She hurried across to the cot where she left the clothes she's stolen. She unfastened her dress and shimmied out of it, tossing it aside. She glanced down at the slip, running a hand over the silky material.

She shook her head, deciding to keep it, and picked up the shirt. Voices sounded outside the tent. Her heart skipped a beat as she spun to face the opening. Had someone caught Jack?

The voice shouted again. What was happening?

She fiddled with the shirt, trying to find the opening with her shaky hands. The tent flap flew open and a man strode inside.

Cate held the shirt up in front of her as her jaw dropped open. She swallowed hard, staring into the eyes of Napoleon Bonaparte.

CHAPTER 25

The French military commander drew his chin back to his chest as he studied Cate. He raised his lower lip as he turned the corners of his mouth down and nodded his head. He waved a hand at her before he stalked to a container and pulled a bottle of wine from it.

“Ahhh,” Cate murmured as she tried to cover herself with the shirt. Her heart pounded and her throat went dry. Could she make it outside without him catching her?

Probably not given that she’d need to cross the entire tent, and he stood halfway across it. Even if she could, she’d have no clothes.

He murmured something to her in another language again, but she had no idea what he said. His Corsican accent made it impossible to make out. He poured a glass of wine, sniffed it, and took a sip as he studied her again.

He waved a finger at her, trying to tell her to do something but she had no idea what. After another sip of wine, he spoke again, seeming to become agitated.

Cate swallowed hard again. She had to do something. “Uh, hi, I’m Cate.”

“Américaine,” he said, arching an eyebrow.

“Yes, I’m American. And I’m lost. And I’m very sorry to have wandered into your tent.” It didn’t matter what she said, he wouldn’t learn any English until he was exiled ten years from now, Cate thought.

He grinned at her and spoke again. He twirled his finger in the air, signaling for her to turn around.

Heat rose in Cate's cheeks as the situation became obvious. "Oh, no, this is a mistake."

Napoleon took another sip of wine before he slammed the glass onto the table and stormed to her. Cate's eyes went wide as he grabbed hold of her cheeks and pressed his lips onto hers.

"Stop," she cried. "I'm not a prostitute." She pushed him back, showing him the ring on her finger. "Married, see?"

He furrowed his brow, reaching for her slip and tugging at it. "Prostitute."

"No," she said with a dramatic shake of her head. "Married." She pointed at the ring again. "Duchess." She pointed back at herself.

Napoleon drew his chin back before his face broke into a smile. He chuckled, doubling over. He grabbed her hand and rubbed a finger along the ring before he kissed it. He yanked her closer and kissed her cheek, tracing a line up to her ear where he whispered something she couldn't understand.

"You've got to be kidding me," Cate whispered.

His hands wandered down her back. She shoved him away before they cupped her somewhere she didn't want him touching. "Listen, Napoleon, I'm not here for this. I'm lost. My husband," she said, pointing to her ring, "is Marcus Northcott. Do you know him?"

"Marcus Northcott?" Napoleon repeated.

Cate nodded emphatically. "Yes. Oui. Si."

Napoleon slid his eyes sideways and shook his head. "Inno. Tu si mio."

He reached for her again, but she backed away, smacking into the cot and collapsing on it. With an arched eyebrow, he offered her a salacious laugh as he approached.

Cate gathered up the clothes she'd stolen and climbed to her feet. He reached for her as she tried to sidestep him, pulling her back against him and whispering something she couldn't understand in her ear.

He rubbed a hand along her belly, kissing her neck. She balled the clothes in her hand and spun to face him. "That's enough. I'm not here to be your prostitute!"

He stepped toward her, and she backed away from him. "No! I've had just about enough. First, the visions, then the hypnosis, then Gianna sends me here with no warning. I'm tired, I'm half-dressed, I'm a thief!" She waved the clothes in the air before she flicked a lock of hair away from her face. "And now Napoleon is trying to make me his latest conquest. No!"

She backed a few steps away. He called after her, but she ignored him. She spun away and lifted the tent's flap. Napoleon shouted behind her again, but she continued. She took one step outside of the tent when a harsh grip grasped her arm and yanked her back.

Napoleon tossed her down, shouting at her with a red face. She landed hard on her rear and the clothes she'd stolen spilled across the floor. He flailed his arms and wagged a finger at her.

She kicked her feet to propel herself backward as he chased after her. She smacked into a rifle, knocking it onto the floor. Napoleon grabbed her ankle and pulled her toward him. As she slid across the ground, she twisted to reach for the gun. Her fingers wrapped around the barrel, and she swung it behind her. The butt of the gun cracked him in the skull.

Blood bloomed from his temple, and his eyes rolled up in his head. He slumped forward, collapsing on her.

Cate sat stunned for a moment before she shoved his dead weight off of her and scrambled to her feet. She stared down at his limp form. Her eyes went wide, and her voice turned breathy. "Oh, no. I killed Napoleon. I can't believe this."

She dropped to her knees and pressed two fingers to his neck. She blew out a sigh of relief as his pulse thrummed against her fingertips. "He's alive."

Cate sucked in panicked breaths as her mind tried to recall all of the details of the battle. "Do they still need him?" she asked herself. "Uhhh, the battle started at eight. Forty-five minutes later, he orders a strike on the center. Then, later he moves the troops south. Did he do that already? Ohhh, if he doesn't wake up this could change the battle entirely."

Cate stood and paced for a few minutes, pressing her fingers to her forehead. She stared at the clothes strewn across the floor. With her eyes on the downed commander, she tugged on the pants and slid back into her shoes. She pulled the shirt over her head and stuffed both it and her slip into the pants before tugging the jacket over top. With a few twists of her wrist, she tamed her hair back and shoved it into her jacket. She snatched the gun from the floor before she grabbed the bottle of wine Napoleon had opened earlier.

She stepped to him and poured the liquid onto his face. He startled awake with a shout, wiping at his face.

Cate tossed the bottle down. “Wake up, Mr. Bonaparte. You need to win this battle.”

She spun on her heel and stalked from the tent. She pushed into the cold December air, shivering after the heated exchange in the tent.

The sounds of the battle raged behind her. She spun in search of Jack. “Jack?” she called, stalking a few steps forward.

Her breathing turned ragged as she spotted no sight of him. “Jack!” she called again. She tried to keep the panic at bay as the realization set in that he was gone. She was alone in a French military encampment in 1805.

“Jack!” she shouted again, her gaze shooting wildly around. A sob escaped her. She bit her lower lip and shook her head. “No. You can’t panic. Find him.”

She forced her breathing slower and searched in every direction. She peered around the corner of the tent. Two men walked with another man in front of them, nearing the line of soldiers preparing to advance. They shouted something at him as they shoved him forward.

“Jack,” she breathed. They must have pressed him into service for the battle, likely assuming he was a deserter. She shook her head and hurried toward them.

Before she reached them the unit marched out. “Oh no,” she breathed, trying to hurry forward to join them. The men marched out with Jack in their midst before she could. She cursed under her breath, following their direction as they advanced. There was no way she’d reach him before they entered the battlefield.

Cate’s forehead crinkled as another regiment crossed in front of her, slowing her progress even further. An officer raced past her, shouting and waving at her. She stumbled away, but he grabbed her and shoved her into the lineup. She mixed in with the others, in the middle of the group as soldiers rushed to join them.

She tried to keep an eye on Jack’s unit, but they were headed in the opposite direction. With a wince, she tried to fight through the soldiers and break free from them, but someone shoved her back into the line.

She marched forward toward the battle. The gunfire grew louder with every step. The regiment stopped marching. Cate stood in their midst, breathing hard from the walk and her nerves.

Orders were shouted. Mounted soldiers rode up and down. Banners flew, trumpets sounded, and drums beat. The unit lurched forward again, dragging Cate with them.

They swung to the left. Across the field, another unit lined up. Cate swallowed hard as the two sides came face to face.

One man across the battlefield raised a weapon and fired. The bullet struck one of the officers, knocking him from his horse. Fighting broke out around her. Gunfire exploded, deafening her. Men rushed forward with screams.

Cate stood still as the chaos erupted around her. The soldier-less horse reared up before racing wildly. Cate narrowed her eyes at it. She tightened her grasp on her rifle as she hurried toward the frightened horse.

With bulging eyes, the horse snorted and squealed. Cate raced to get in front of it. He barreled toward her, and she held her hand out to steady it. “Easy, easy, boy.”

The horse skidded to a halt. The dead officer remained attached to him, his ankle twisted in the stirrup.

Cate reached out and rubbed the frightened horse’s nose. “Easy, it’s okay.”

She wrinkled her nose as she freed the dead man’s leg from the tangled stirrup. His open eyes stared widely at the sky. Cate closed them before she stowed the rifle in the saddle and stuck her foot in the stirrup. She swung her other leg over and mounted the horse, grabbing the reins.

“Okay, buddy, I’m scared, too, and I don’t ride very well. So please don’t kill me.”

She tugged at the reins to turn the horse toward where she’d seen Jack marching. “Come on, buddy. Let’s go get Jack.”

The horse cantered across the field. She squeezed her knees against the animal to hang on. The ground in front of her exploded in a wide spray of dirt. It rained down around her as she tugged the horse to a stop.

A man rushed toward her with his weapon aimed. Cate smacked the horse’s ribs with her heels, setting it into a gallop. The gun in the attacking soldier’s hands fired, missing her widely. He tossed down the weapon and drew his sword.

Another cannon blast stopped her again. The man closed the distance between her. She spun the horse in a circle, seeking a way out. Her heart pounded as she reached for the sword stowed in the saddle. She withdrew it and slashed at the man, slicing his arm. He stumbled back a step, and she used the small window to set the horse to gallop toward Jack’s unit.

She approached the group as they attacked the Allied units in the South. She scanned the chaos, searching for Jack. She slowed the horse and stood in her stirrups. "Where are you?"

She spotted him across the field. "Jack!"

She plopped into the saddle and signaled the horse to run. It charged into the fray, skillfully skirting fighting soldiers as he raced toward his destination. She ducked low behind his flying mane, clutching tightly to the reins and hugging the saddle with her thighs.

"Come on, boy," Cate whispered.

The man next to Jack took a bullet to the shoulder, falling backward with a bloodcurdling scream. The man on his right fell forward with a bullet to the skull.

Jack stood alone as one of the enemy soldiers rushed toward him. He struggled with his weapon, unable to fire it.

"Jack!" Cate screamed, freeing the sword again as she galloped toward him.

He snapped his gaze toward her, removing his eyes from the man who charged toward him. The soldier lifted his sword, ready to swing.

Cate urged more speed from the horse. If she didn't close the gap soon, the man would plunge his blade into Jack's chest. Jack wouldn't survive this battle. He'd die on the battlefield.

CHAPTER 26

“*J*ack!” Cate shouted again as she thundered toward him on the horse.

He stumbled to the side, and the man charging him thrust the knife into the air instead of Jack’s chest. He whipped around to try for another attack.

The horse blocked him, racing between Jack and the foreign soldier. Cate slashed at him but missed.

She tugged the horse to a stop and swung him around. The man spiraled back as Jack wrangled a gun from one of the fallen soldiers near him. He aimed it at the man and pulled the trigger, but the weapon held no bullets.

Jack tossed it down and tried for another gun from the other soldier. His attacker slashed at him again. The blade sliced Jack’s shirt sleeve but drew no blood.

Cate urged the horse forward, lining up her sword again. The man stumbled a few steps away as she swiped at him, avoiding her again.

Cate tugged the horse back again, spinning it around for another pass. The man spiraled and charged toward Jack who tried to pull another gun from a dead soldier.

“Jack!” she screamed again. She’d never get to them in time even on horseback. The man lifted his blade, prepared to strike when a gun cracked. Jack ducked instinctively. The man fell backward onto his back, an expression of shock on his features as a wound smoked between his eyes.

Cate set the horse in motion again, cantering up to Jack and easing to a stop. It trotted around him in a circle. "Need a ride?"

"Yes, please," Jack answered.

Cate grabbed his hand and helped him mount the horse behind her. She set the horse galloping across the field, heading toward the French encampment.

"We need another horse," Jack shouted in her ear as the battle raged behind them.

"I know," Cate called over her shoulder. "We should try to find some food, too."

She guided the horse through the camp as soldiers dragged hurt men for assistance. Blood oozed from a variety of wounds. Soldiers screamed in pain as their compatriots carried or dragged them for medical attention.

"Thank God I'm not one of them," Jack said as Cate slowed the horse to a trot and approached a hitching post with several horses. Jack dismounted, then Cate hopped to the ground.

"Listen, Cate," Jack said as he heaved a saddle onto one of the horses, "those guys grabbed me and—"

"I know. They probably figured you were deserting," Cate said as she helped fasten the saddle.

"I tried to get away, but...well, anyway, thanks for finding me."

"Of course," Cate said, catching his eye across the horse's broad back.

"I can't believe you charged into the battle like that."

"I was already part of it," Cate answered. "I got shoved into another regiment before I could catch up to you."

"Ugh, Cate, I'm sorry," Jack moaned, untying his horse. "That must have been frightening to walk out and find yourself alone."

"It was almost as frightening as what happened before," she answered as they pulled the horses along. She ducked into a few tents in search of food, stuffing the meager rations she found into the pouch dangling on the horse.

"What happened before?" Jack asked, adding food to their supply.

"Napoleon Bonaparte thought I was his call girl."

Jack stopped walking and shot a glance toward her. "Like the Napoleon Bonaparte? The one we saw earlier?"

Cate twisted to answer him as she continued with her horse. "Yep."

Jack led the horse faster as he jogged to catch up with Cate. “Are you okay? What happened? He didn’t—“

“No,” Cate interrupted. “I...hit him with the butt of a rifle and knocked him out.”

Jack’s eyes went wide.

“I thought I killed him. But I only knocked him out. Don’t worry, I woke him up, so hopefully, I didn’t change history.”

Jack blew out a long breath as they threaded through the camp toward the edge furthest away from the fighting. “This is getting insane.”

“Tell me about it. And now we’re about to ride horses in a general, vague direction in the hopes of finding Rosenberg Palace.” Cate stopped her horse as they reached the final tent and stuck her foot in the stirrup, grabbing the pommel.

“At least we know which way is west,” Jack said as he mounted his horse.

Cate balanced herself on top of the animal, grabbing the reins. “We need to go southwest, technically, but let’s just worry about getting away from this battle for now. I’d like to make progress before we have to search for shelter.”

“Aye, I think we’ll need it. It’s a bit cold.”

“It’s December. I’m not surprised. The adrenaline helped before, but that’ll wane now that we’re not actively being shot at.”

Jack twisted and stared out over the battlefield. “Yeah, I’m pretty glad about that, cold or not. Let’s get out of here.”

They set the horses to a quick trot and left the camp behind. They rode until the sounds of the battle died off before they slowed the horses to a walk.

“I can’t believe Napoleon came on to you.”

“In his defense, I was wearing only a slip. I think he took that as a sign. I tried to explain, I even brought Marcus’s name into it, thinking he may know him, but he just wouldn’t take no for an answer.”

“Good for you clocking him like that.”

“Let’s just hope he’s okay enough to win that battle before we accidentally change history.”

Jack bobbed around as the horse meandered along. “Does it matter? Gianna doesn’t care. They change history all the time.”

“They are irresponsible.” The corners of Cate’s mouth turned up, and she started to chuckle. The giggle turned into a full belly laugh, and she slapped her thigh.

“What’s so funny?”

Cate continued to laugh. “I remember you lecturing me about changing history, even subtly. And now we’re faced with a situation where history is continuously changing.” Another sharp laugh escaped her and tears fell from her eyes. “And I almost killed Napoleon.”

Jack joined in, chuckling with her. “I never thought in a million years this would be happening. Napoleon hit on you.”

Cate doubled over, tears still streaming from her eyes. “He did.”

“We fought in the Napoleonic war. I nearly killed someone. Or he nearly killed me. And we stole two horses from the French army.”

“Along with clothes and food.”

“We’re thieves,” Jack said with a belly laugh.

“I’m a clairvoyant.”

Jack pointed at her with a hoot. “Married to a warlock.”

Cate chuckled a few more times before she sobered. “Yet we’re still stuck in 1805. Too bad my clairvoyance didn’t see this coming.”

Jack blew out a long breath as his laughing tapered off. “That’s still... odd to me, too.”

“It’s not any odder than it is to me. I can’t believe it. But it’s true. I can’t deny that these images keep running through my mind.”

“And you never had it before?”

“Well, I guess I did with the dream about my parents, but not to this extent.”

Jack cocked his head, rubbing his chin. “I wonder why. What prompted it? The temporalysis?”

Cate rubbed at her palm. “Maybe the joined blood.”

Jack crinkled his brow and shot her a glance as they continued along. “Explain this to me again.”

“He sliced my hand and his and then did some sort of magic. After our blood mixed, he said he’d be able to feel my heart in his chest. And I could feel his in mine.”

“That’s so bizarre. But then, what about this situation isn’t bizarre?”

Cate stared into the distance ahead of them. “Nothing. There is nothing normal about any of this.”

"I honestly miss the days when the under-butler stole some jewelry and our biggest problem was pinning the crime on him."

"Don't forget your genius legal maneuvering," Cate said, pointing a finger at him.

"Right. Back in the day, I sweated bullets over pretending to be a lawyer. Now, I'm hopping around in time with a warlock and a clairvoyant, and pretending to be a French soldier."

"Things certainly have changed and if Marcus is correct, they won't settle for quite some time."

"Let's hope he's wrong."

Cate shot him a sideways glance. "Sadly, he's not wrong often."

Jack pulled his lips back into a grimace as they meandered along. "That's scary."

"On all fronts." Cate glanced behind her then returned her gaze forward. "Maybe we should take a break and let the horses rest before we continue on the afternoon leg."

"You're right."

"I wonder if there's a barn or something around."

"Right," Jack said, rubbing his hands together. "I'm getting cold."

"Yes. I think we could use a break."

They found a shelter and spent a few hours allowing the horses to rest while they decompressed and warmed up. They avoided eating any of the food they'd grabbed, opting to ration it for when they felt hungry.

"Well, I guess we head west for a bit more before we try to get our bearings," Jack said.

Cate nodded as she mounted her horse and led it from the warmth of the barn they'd found. The cold air smacked them in the face as they headed into the gray day.

They set the horses to canter and made more progress toward Rosenberg Palace. After a time, they slowed the horses to a trot, continuing toward the now-setting sun. As they rode along the dirt road, a carriage approached behind them.

Cate and Jack pulled their horses to the side as the carriage whisked past them.

Jack waved a hand at it. "Aww, what I wouldn't give to be in a carriage. I can't believe how much I want to be in a carriage. My standards have really sunk."

“You and me both. No wind gusts chilling you to the bone. When Marcus and I came to 1810 for you, we took a carriage from Zurich. It wasn’t a comfortable ride by modern standards, but it sure beats this.”

“No kidding. I’m not sure how much more my rump can take.”

“And we only have days more of this to look forward to.”

“Fantastic,” Jack groaned. “When we get to Rosenberg, I’m going to ask if they can magically fix my behind.”

Cate chuckled as they continued, approaching the carriage that had passed them earlier. It sat in the middle of the road, unmoving.

Cate furrowed her brow, staring at the black carriage as she slowed her horse. “Umm, something feels off here.”

“Maybe they’re letting the horses rest.”

“In the middle of the road?” Cate asked. She shook her head. “Something’s wrong.”

Jack pulled his horse to a stop as Cate did the same. “What do you want to do?”

Cate considered it, gnawing on her lower lip. “I hate to turn back. We have limited food and days to go before we even get close to Rosenberg.”

“Keep going?” Jack asked.

Cate sucked in a breath and shrugged. “Let’s pick up the pace and give them a wide berth. They should think we’re French soldiers. Hopefully, they’re not from the other side and looking to snatch a few prisoners.”

“Right.” Jack gave his horse a nudge with his heels. Cate did the same, setting a quick pace as they moved forward.

They trotted toward the carriage, leaving the road to canter through the field next to it. The carriage shifted as they edged off the road.

Several people climbed from it. Two raised weapons, aiming them at Cate and Jack. “Stop!” one yelled.

“What should we do?” Jack asked.

“They’re at pretty close range,” Cate said, tugging on her reins. “I’m not sure we can get away without risking serious harm to us or the horses.”

“Right,” Jack answered. “I guess we’ll hope for the best.”

“If they plan to rob us, they will be sorely disappointed,” Cate answered.

“Dismount,” the man yelled.

Jack swung his leg over and climbed down from his horse. “We don’t have anything of value. We’re just soldiers.”

“Step away from the horse and keep your hands up. Both of you.”

Cate slid off her horse and held her hands in the air, stalking forward a few steps. The carriage shimmied again. The door opened and another man disembarked from the conveyance.

Cate’s heart skipped a beat as she recognized Elliott Stevens dressed in 1805 finery.

He grinned at her. “Well, well, well, how interesting to meet you here, Duchess.”

CHAPTER 27

Cate raised her chin as she struggled to stop her knees from wobbling.

Elliott Stevens smirked at her as he stalked a few steps forward.

“That is quite an interesting look for you, my dear Duchess.”

Cate licked her lips as she considered her response. “We had to get creative after Gianna dumped us here in the middle of the Battle of Austerlitz.”

“Creativity is something you seem to have in spades. You constantly slip through our fingers.”

Cate flexed her jaw as her nostrils flared, and she crossed her arms. “I’m not going to apologize for making it too difficult for you to kill me or steal from me.”

“I assume you have some sort of plan to get yourself out of this little pickle, Duchess?”

“It’s none of your concern.”

Elliott raised his finger in the air as he paced behind the carriage. “Actually, it is very much my concern. You see, I’m growing weary of this game.”

“Then stop playing,” Cate said, throwing her hands out to her sides.

Elliott chuckled at her. “It is almost a shame you won’t join us. You are feisty, I’ll give you that.”

“I would never join your side,” Cate spat at him.

Elliott squashed his lips together. “I figured as much. Unfortunately, you won’t have many choices soon.”

“Are we finished here?”

“Not in the slightest,” Elliott said. He narrowed his eyes at her as he squared his shoulders, clasping his hands behind him. “Get in the carriage, Duchess.”

“I don’t think so,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

His gun-toting goons shifted their weapons to Jack.

“I’m not asking,” Elliott answered.

Cate swallowed hard, shifting her gaze to Jack. “Let’s not do anything hasty.”

“Oh, this is hardly hasty. You have been a thorn in my side for far too long. I’m ready for the endgame. Now get in the carriage.”

Cate’s knees wobbled as she took a step forward. Her heart hammered in her chest. Jack stuck close to her side, walking forward with her.

“No, no, no,” Elliott said, waving his hand in the air. “Not him. Just you. We no longer need Mr. Reid.”

Heat washed over her as she glanced at Jack. Her skin prickled, and the hairs on her neck stood up. She couldn’t leave him here.

“Come along, Duchess, only you are invited.”

“No!” Cate shouted, stamping a foot on the ground. “Both of us or neither of us.”

Elliott barked out a laugh. “Oh, you are amusing. I can almost see the appeal. Though it’s the fact that you have no ability to follow through that makes it rather ridiculous. Now, come along, or we’ll shoot Mr. Reid.”

Cate stepped in front of him, blocking him with her body. “Then you’ll shoot me, too.”

Elliott sneered at her. “Don’t tempt me.”

“You’ll lose whatever leverage you think you have by kidnapping me.”

“Oh, I don’t think it. I know it. You, my darling Duchess, are going to bring us everything. Now, get in the carriage, or we will have to get physical, and I don’t think you want that.”

“I’m not going anywhere without Jack,” Cate said through clenched teeth.

Elliott scoffed and shook his head. He waved a hand at the men. “Grab her.”

“No!” Cate shouted as the men shouldered their weapons and stormed toward her. She backed away before she spun and ran toward her horse.

One of them grabbed her roughly, tugging her backward before she made it to the animal.

“No!” she cried, trying to wiggle free.

“Cate!” Jack shouted next to her as the other man held him back. He fought against the larger man, trying to wrench his arms from the man’s firm grasp.

“Jack!” Cate screamed, reaching for him. He tried to stretch his arms toward her, but the man held him back. Tears streamed down her cheeks as her attacker dragged her backward.

“Cate, no!”

“Jack,” she sobbed as the man spun her toward the carriage. She dug her feet into the dirt, twisting to gaze at him as she struggled to break free.

Jack ripped his arms away from the man and raced toward her. “Cate!”

He dove for her as the man behind him caught up. He whipped Jack back, tossing him several steps away before he swung at him. He caught Jack in the jaw, knocking him to the ground.

“No!” Cate yelled. She kicked and flailed her arms as her attacker picked her up.

Jack recovered and swung a fist at the man, but Elliott’s bodyguard blocked it, landing another blow against Jack.

It knocked him to the ground. The man strode toward the carriage, leaving Jack breathing heavily on the ground as his partner shoved Cate into the carriage.

They climbed inside after her, flanking her on either side as they shoved her into the seat across from Elliott.

Cate sniffled and wiped at her tear-stained cheeks. “Take him with us. We can’t leave him here. Please.”

Elliott sipped liquor from a glass, studying the amber liquid inside. He flicked his gaze up to her face. “Give me Dunhaven Castle.”

Cate shuddered at the request.

“No? Too bad for Jack.” He reached up to knock on the window.

Cate shot a hand out. “Wait!”

Elliott raised his eyebrows. “Are you willing to sign it over to me right now?”

Cate swallowed hard, her lower lip quivering.

“As I thought.” Elliott rapped against the window, and the carriage lurched forward.

Cate spun to stare out the rear window of the carriage. Jack climbed to his feet as they rode away from him. He raced to his horse and mounted it. He grabbed the reins of her horse and set them both in motion as he followed behind them.

Cate kept her teary eyes on him as he rode behind them.

Elliott took another sip of his brandy. "Well, this is annoying." He knocked on the glass again. The carriage slowed to stop.

Cate sniffled, wiping at her tears and expecting Elliott to order the men to drag Jack into the carriage.

Elliott took another sip. "Tell him to stop following us."

"What?" Cate asked.

"Tell him to stop following us."

"No," Cate said. "You can't—"

"I can. Tell him to stop following us, or I will stop him permanently."

Cate's features pinched as she fought back another sob. The man next to her popped the door open.

"Go on," Elliott said with a wiggle of his eyebrows. "And if you try to run, I'll shoot you in the leg. In this time period, it will be extremely painful to live through."

Cate's lower lip trembled as she climbed from her seat. Her knees wobbled, and she clung to the carriage to stay upright. She spun to face Jack who slowed on his horse.

"Jack," she said with a sniffle, shaking her head, "you can't follow us."

"Like Hell, I won't. You tell him that."

The crease between her eyebrows deepened as tears spilled onto her cheeks. "You can't. He'll kill you."

"I'd like to see him try."

"Please, Jack," Cate said with a sob.

"Cate..." he said, his face scrunching.

Cate wiped at her tears. "Go to Rosenberg. Get help. Please don't take a chance. Please, Jack."

"Okay," he said, his voice cracking.

She wrapped her arms around her as her stomach turned over.

"Come along, Duchess," Elliott said.

Her lower lip trembled again as she gave him one final look before she stepped up toward the carriage.

"Cate!" Jack called.

She froze, flicking her gaze back to him.

“We’ll find each other.”

She nodded as more tears spilled down her cheeks. “Count on it.”

Elliott tugged her into the carriage. She collapsed into the seat, and he knocked on the window. The carriage rolled forward. Cate twisted in her seat to stare behind her.

Jack stared after her. His horse pawed at the ground, nickering as he awaited the signal to continue.

Tears streamed down her cheeks as the carriage trundled away. She pressed her hand against the window as a sob escaped her. She pulled it back, covering her mouth as she continued to cry.

“Come now, Duchess,” Elliott said behind her. “You cannot be that upset.”

Cate twisted to glare at him. “You’ve left him to die.”

Elliott narrowed his eyes at her as he poured another brandy. “You have very little faith in your friend. Oh, or is he more than a friend?”

He held the glass out to her. She settled into her seat with a grimace.

“I’m curious. My subsequent steps may need to change based on your answer.” He waved the drink at her again, wiggling his eyebrows.

She smacked it from his hand. The displeasure on his face spoke volumes as he whipped a handkerchief from his pocket and wiped at the liquid spilled on his jacket. “What an interesting reaction. Should I be concerned that His Grace will not make an attempt to retrieve you from our clutches?”

Cate glowered at him as anger burned through her. She balled her hands into fists as the image of Jack stuck in 1805 in the middle of Austria danced through her mind. “He knows better than to make any deals with you.”

Elliott cocked his head, arching an eyebrow. “Really? You don’t believe he will come for you?”

“He’d be smart not to. You can’t be trusted.”

A slow smile spread across his features. “Do you realize what we can offer you?”

“Nothing,” Cate spat.

Elliott leaned forward toward her, his grin broadening. “That’s just not true. Join us. Convince your husband to join us. You would be surprised at the perks.”

“I don’t think so.”

“I understand he is a very wealthy man. I’m certain you want for nothing. But I assure you the rewards will be vast.”

Cate cocked her head, flexing her jaw. “Go back for Jack, and I’ll consider it.”

Elliott snorted a laugh. “You have no bargaining power here, Duchess.”

“Then why ask me for help with my husband?”

He shrugged, refreshing his own brandy and taking a sip. “I’m offering you an opportunity. A chance to do things the easy way. Do not misunderstand, we do not need you to bring him to our side.”

“Then let me go,” Cate answered.

Elliott laughed again, raising his glass in a silent toast to her. “Again, you misunderstand. We do not need you to convince him. We can do that ourselves. Though it will be far more painful for you and him than if you were to volunteer.”

“I will never give in to you.”

Elliott fluttered his eyelashes, flicking his gaze out the window. “More’s the pity. I fear you will regret that decision, but it will be far too late then. Now, I am tiring of this conversation. Fletcher, if you would be so kind?”

He waved a hand at Cate. She furrowed her brow a second before his meaning became clear. A sharp, shooting pain slammed through her head. Her eyes rolled back into her head and her world went black.

* * *

Cate’s eyes fluttered open. A dark room surrounded her as she lay on her back on a soft mattress. She gasped for breath before she pressed a palm against her aching head, squeezing her eyes closed. The memory of being knocked unconscious flooded back to her.

She forced her eyes open and allowed them to adjust to the darkness. “Where am I?” she whispered.

She slid her hands along the silky material enveloping her. With a furrowed brow, she reached for the curtain hanging from the tunnel and eased it open a smidge. She peered through the slit, searching the large room beyond.

With a shaky breath, she tried the other side, finding a window. She scrambled from under the covers and hurried to it, staring out into the late evening sky. Purple streaked it as the sun set behind her.

She searched the landscape for anything she recognized, but she found nothing. "It doesn't matter. I need to get out of here."

She spun to face the room in search of her shoes. After finding them near the bed, she tugged them on.

How far was she from Jack? Could she find him again? Her heart broke as she recalled leaving him on the road.

"I'm coming, Jack." She glanced around for anything useful but found nothing.

With a deep swallow, she wiped her sweaty palms against her pants and hurried toward the door.

She cracked it open and peered into the hall. Candelabras flickered up and down its length, revealing nothing. Her heart pounded as she swung it open. A shadow passed in front of her, and a figure blocked her way forward.

Cate stumbled back a step, her eyes wide. Her throat went dry, and her heart stopped.

Gianna sashayed into the bedroom with a cat-who-caught-the-canary grin on her features. She lifted the candelabra in her hand. The flickering candlelight twisted her smile into an evil mask. "Hello, mouse."

CHAPTER 28

Cate balled her hands into fists, ready to fight the woman to free herself.

“Don’t bother to make a fuss, Cate. You won’t get very far.” She waved toward the hall. Two bulky bodyguards entered, closing the door behind them and blocking it.

Cate’s stomach turned as she realized she was trapped.

Gianna set the candelabra on a dresser before leaning against it and setting a hand on her cocked hip. She stared at Cate with a smirk. “If it was up to me, I would have left you in 1805 on your own.”

“I wish you would have,” Cate answered.

Gianna’s grin broadened. “But this will be so much more fun.”

Cate struggled to stop her knees from wobbling as her body threatened to tremble all over. “I don’t agree.”

“Oh, I do. We have big plans for you, Cate.”

“I’m not joining you,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

“Good!” Gianna said, her eyes going wide. She pulled herself off the dresser and sauntered forward. “I hope you don’t. In fact, you agreeing now is my worst nightmare.”

Cate pulled her chin back as the woman closed the gap between them. She narrowed her eyes, staring at the dark marks rimming her neck.

“Admiring my necklace?” Gianna inquired.

“What happened?” Cate asked, flicking her gaze from the black marks to Gianna’s face.

“Your husband happened.”

Cate swallowed hard, narrowing her eyes.

“He nearly killed me when I told him what I’d done to you. Lucky for me, I escaped with my special trinket. Just a flick with a time period in mind and poof!”

Cate furrowed her brow. The pounding heartbeat she’d detected earlier must have been caused by his anger.

Gianna reached out to trace a finger down Cate’s cheek. “And I am so looking forward to doing even worse to you.”

Cate snapped her head away from Gianna’s touch. “You’ll never get the chance.”

“Oh, don’t tell me you’re going to give in and join us now,” Gianna said with a pout.

“Marcus won’t give in to you.”

Gianna’s eyes went wide, and she leaned closer, inches from Cate. “Oh, but he will. He won’t have any other choice.”

Cate shook her head. “No.”

“Oh, yes, dear Cate. He won’t be able to stand watching us torture you.” She leaned forward and whispered in her ear. “He will break. And then we will own him.”

Cate shoved Gianna away from her. The men across the room rushed forward. Gianna tossed a lock of hair back. “It’s fine. I’m fine.”

She raised her chin, the sneer returning to her features. “Oh, I am going to enjoy breaking you.”

She stalked to the door, yanked it open, and waved her slender fingers at an unseen person. A box appeared, and she grabbed it, spinning and tossing it across the floor. “Get dressed. Elliott wants to dine with you in thirty minutes.”

The men stalked from the room. The door slammed behind them, startling Cate as she stood in the center of the massive, dark space. Only the candelabra kept the blackness at bay.

Cate wrapped her arms around her midriff as she wandered to the bed and eased onto it. She needed a way out. And she needed it fast. She couldn’t risk staying here.

At worst, no one would come for her, and she’d die a slow, painful death at the hands of Gianna. At best, Marcus came for her and she’d die a slow, painful death at the hands of Gianna. Cate wrinkled her nose at her prospects or lack thereof.

She forced herself off the bed and hurried to the window again. The cold glass sent a chill through her body as she pressed her hand against it. Darkness grew with each passing moment. She glanced down at the ground below her. She needed to get to the first floor. Unless...

Cate grabbed hold of the handle and flung the window open. She leaned out as the icy wind chilled her further. The ground swayed below her while she pondered leaping. Could she make it?

She straightened, gasping for breath. She'd try another way. This would be a last resort.

She swung the window closed and hastened across the room, bypassing the crushed white box on the floor. She eased the door open a crack and peered in the hall. Nothing. She waited for several breaths before she let go of the ornate knob.

The candelabra glowed on the nearby dresser. She grabbed it and returned to the door, pulling it open further before she leaned into the hall and glanced up and down.

"Which way?" she questioned as she eased her door closed behind her and flicked her gaze back and forth.

On her left, the hall disappeared around a corner. On her right, it continued straight before branching.

Cate chewed her lower lip before she darted to the left and hurried to the corner. Holding her breath, she peered around it. Empty.

She let out a breath and scurried down the hall, holding the candelabra high overhead. Her heart pounded so hard, she worried someone would hear her coming. She rounded another corner, spilling into a wide hall that led to a grand set of stairs.

Her heart skipped a beat, and she raced forward, grasped the thick, wooden banister, and rushed down to the marble floor below. She flung the wide wooden door open.

A dark figure filled the opening as she attempted to take a step into the night. Cate stumbled back a step, her jaw falling open. Slow and steady footsteps approached from her side.

"You are meant to be dressing for our dinner," Elliott said as he strode from one of the rooms tucked to the side of the foyer. "Not racing into the night."

“I told you she couldn’t be trusted,” Gianna added, joining him and swirling her sherry in her glass.

Cate raised her chin. “Let me go. I can’t do anything to help you.”

Elliott let out a loud, belly laugh. “I disagree. But we should discuss that over dinner. Now, please, go change.”

“No,” Cate answered.

Gianna clicked her tongue against the roof of her mouth. “There is no point in refusing.”

“I won’t help you. I can’t help you. There is nothing I can do for you.”

“You can’t or you won’t?” Elliott questioned, signaling for her to follow him into the sitting room.

“Both,” Cate said as she stalked in behind him with Gianna following her.

“I very much disagree,” he answered, pouring a brandy and offering it to Cate.

She shook her head, refusing the beverage.

Elliott’s shoulders slumped, and he heaved a sigh. “Are we going to go through this again? Just take the drink. Duchess. It seems like you could use it.”

Cate grabbed the glass from his hand as Gianna circled around her and draped an arm over Elliott’s shoulder. “Oh, please let me kill her, Elliott. She’s useless.”

“That’s enough, Gianna. Our dear Duchess is quite useful in one capacity or another. But that we shall discuss over our meal. Now, run along and dress. I do not want you at my table in that uniform.”

Cate slammed the brandy glass on the nearby table, rattling the empty vase on it. “I’m not certain I care what you want.”

Elliott sipped his drink as he leaned against the mantel and stared at the roaring fire under it. “I admire your tenacity, but I grow weary of your refusals.”

“This is why I wish you would let me finish her. She is useless to us. A thorn in our side.”

“I thought you wished to break her?” Elliott questioned.

“I vacillate between the two desires. At the moment, I prefer a swift death at my hands.”

Elliott waved his hand at her, dismissing the conversation. “Not now.” He spun to face Cate. “I will not ask again.”

“Bring Jack here, and I will.”

Elliott narrowed his eyes at the statement. “There is so much I cannot wait to dig into at our dinner. I so hope I will not need to put a gun to your head.”

“Ohh, let me do it!” Gianna said, clasping her hands together.

Cate firmed her jaw but spun on her heel, grabbed the candelabra, and stormed from the room.

“I expect you to be prompt. Do not dally!” Elliott shouted as she mounted the stairs.

Her blood boiled and heat washed over her as she made her way back to the room she’d left behind. She curled and uncurled her fists with each step. She held back the tears filling her eyes, refusing to cry over The Agency no matter how grim things appeared.

She reached the room she’d awoken in and pushed through the door. Her breathing turned ragged as she collapsed back against it. She was stuck. She couldn’t get away.

Her mind stretched as she vetted through options. Her choices were few. She couldn’t run. She couldn’t hide.

She had to stay alive long enough to find her way out of the situation. Perhaps she could sneak away in the dead of the night. She would have to endure the dinner first.

With a tensed jaw, she stalked across the room and collected the box. She picked at the collapsed corner, trying to peel the lid off.

She found a lilac evening dress inside in the typical style for the era. A grimace formed on her lips as she tugged her jacket off and stared down at the dress.

A knock sounded at the door. “I’m not ready yet!”

A woman pushed inside with a nod. “I will assist you, Your Grace.”

Cate bit her lower lip as she nodded, acutely aware of how much she missed Andrea. She peeled off the stolen clothes and slipped into the dress, allowing the maid to fasten it.

“Your hair, Your Grace?” the girl asked.

“Leave it.”

She shook her head and pulled a long plume from within the box. “Mr. Stevens insisted.”

Cate sighed as she shuffled to the dressing table and collapsed on the chair. She stared at the wooden top without seeing it as the woman pulled her hair into an upswept style, affixing the feather to it. The fluffy plume cascaded onto her shoulder as the girl finished the style.

She hurried across the room and retrieved gloves from the box. “Your gloves.”

Cate pulled herself from her rambling thoughts, flicking her gaze up to her through the mirror. She sucked in a deep breath, rising to stand. The woman approached her, holding out the first glove. Cate slipped her hand inside as the woman shimmied the garment to her elbow. She slid the other on.

“Anything else, Your Grace?”

Cate shook her head.

“Mr. Stevens asked that you present yourself in the sitting room downstairs when ready.”

Cate licked her lips and nodded. The maid scurried from the room, leaving Cate standing in the center. Her head pounded, her muscles ached, and her stomach rolled.

She slow-blinked as she forced one foot in front of the other. Her train dragged across the floor behind her as she stalked from the room and down the hall. She followed the route she had taken when trying to escape, plodding down the stairs and into the sitting room.

Elliott sipped at his brandy from the wing-backed chair near the fireplace, his gaze shifting to her as she entered. The corner of his lips turned up at the edges, and his eyes sparkled as he studied her up and down, rising from the chair. “Well, I am beginning to understand exactly what it is our intrepid Duke finds so alluring.”

Gianna glanced at Cate, rolling her eyes. “I still don’t see the appeal.”

“That’s your jealousy speaking, Gianna, dear.” He approached her, his eyes never leaving hers. “Would you like a cocktail or would you prefer to go straight to dinner?”

“Dinner. I prefer to get this over with.”

Elliott offered his arm to her. Cate stared down at it with a frown before she flicked her gaze to his and slid her hand through the crook of his elbow.

He patted her hand. “I admire your spirit. I will so enjoy having you on our side.”

“I will never be on your side,” she said as he led her down the hall toward the dining room.

Gianna trailed behind them, her hips slowly rolling side to side as she down the rest of her sherry. “Don’t be so sure, princess.”

“Ignore her,” Elliott said as he led Cate to a high-backed chair and tugged it away from the table. Cate sank on it as he pushed it under her. She startled, her shoulders rising to her ears when he cupped her arms in his hands. “She’s jealous.”

Gianna sauntered around the table and plopped into a chair, whipping a napkin onto her lap. “I’m not. I’m frustrated.”

“Behave, Gianna,” Elliott said as he sat at the head of the long table. Servants descended on them and poured their wine.

Elliott swirled it in the glass before sniffing it and taking a sip. “Now, tell me, Duchess, what is your relationship with Mr. Reid? It seems rather... complex.”

“That’s none of your business,” Cate answered.

“Oh, come now. You are his employer, but what else are you? A friend? A lover? How does your husband feel about that?”

Cate flicked her gaze to him, her jaw flexing as her hand slid onto the table. Her fingers wrapped around her knife as she answered him. “It’s none of—

“My business,” he finished, waving a hand in the air. “Of course. You’ve said. Though I really need to know. You see, I need to understand how valuable you are.”

Cate slid the knife under the overlay fabric of her dress and into her pocket. “I don’t understand.”

“Don’t you?” Elliott questioned. “You continue to tell me you are not valuable, but I don’t believe that.”

“I’m not,” Cate said with a shrug as servants delivered their first course. She stared down at the liquid in her wide bowl.

Elliott stirred his soup before lifting his spoon to his mouth. He settled it back in his bowl and eyed Cate again. “I disagree. Please, eat, Duchess.”

“I’m not hungry.”

“You are really trying,” Gianna said. “The food is not poisoned.”

Cate flicked her gaze over the floral arrangement separating them and narrowed her eyes at the woman. “I wouldn’t trust anything you said.”

“She is quite right. At this moment, you are much more valuable to us alive. I am not certain what game you think you are playing, but I’m fairly certain if we apply the appropriate amount of pressure to you, your husband will give us what we want.”

“I doubt it,” Cate said. She sipped at the soup, sickened by how good the food tasted after having none all day.

“I don’t. After what he did to Gianna when he found out you were in 1805, I’d wager he will move heaven and earth to ensure no harm comes to you.”

“He will never join you.”

“Respectfully, I disagree again. The question is how much will you need to survive before he does. That should be the only question burning through your mind.”

Cate slid another spoonful of soup into her mouth, letting the warm liquid roll across her tongue.

“You don’t enjoy being harmed, do you, Duchess?” Elliot asked.

“Please say yes, because I cannot wait to try a few things,” Gianna said with a smirk.

“Does it matter what I answer?”

“Yes,” Elliott said after another sip of his wine. “It very much does. You are in complete control of this situation.”

Cate’s forehead crinkled as a servant collected her bowl.

“Don’t play coy, mouse,” Gianna said with a roll of her eyes. “You cannot possibly be that stupid.”

“Gianna,” Elliott said, his voice filled with restraint, “behave.” He flicked his gaze back to Cate, his eyes gleaming in the candlelight. “Think, Duchess.”

Gianna clicked her tongue and shook her head as the servants appeared with the next course. “Really, Elliott. Do you see now? She is far too simple to be of any good to us except as a pawn.”

Elliott held up his hand to shush the woman as he kept his eyes trained on Cate. “We want your husband on our side. You can bring him around.”

“And why would I do that?” Cate asked.

“Because, dear Duchess, if you don’t, we will make your life a living Hell.”

CHAPTER 29

The words echoed in Cate's mind as she stared at the food on her plate. She swallowed hard and flicked her gaze back to Elliott.

"You don't want that, do you? You don't want us as your enemy."

"I can't help you," she answered.

Elliott cut into his beef and popped a piece in his mouth, flicking his eyebrows up. "Can't or won't?"

"Can't," Cate answered, stabbing a green bean with her fork.

"You're lying," Gianna spat.

Cate focused her gaze on the woman across from her, studying the dark bruises around her neck. "I'm not. I can't do what you're asking."

"Elaborate," Elliott said as he sawed at his meat again.

"I have no control over Marcus's decisions." She poked at a potato cube before she slid the fork into her mouth.

"Oh, come now, Duchess. You're being far too modest."

"I am not."

Gianna arched her eyebrows and fluttered her eyelashes at Cate. Elliott's utensils clattered onto his plate, and he clasped his hands together, resting his elbows on the pristine white tablecloth. "Do you mean to tell me that a man who reacts as violently as Marcus Northcott did to his wife's disappearance gives her opinion no credence?"

Cate chewed the inside of her lower lip, attempting to come up with a response.

“I don’t believe that,” Elliott said with a shake of his head. He grabbed his wine glass, taking a sip before he tipped it toward Cate. “I believe he will do anything you ask.”

Cate sighed. Marcus hated The Agency. And their less-than-real marriage wouldn’t live up to Elliott’s expectations.

A cackle erupted from across the table. Gianna bent forward over her plate as she laughed. She slapped the table before she rested her chin in her palm and eyed Cate with a few more giggles escaping her. “I think, Elliott, what has our dear little Cate all twisted in knots is that her marriage isn’t real.”

Elliott flicked his eyebrows up. “You’ve mentioned this theory before. I disagree. Care to settle a bet, Duchess?”

Cate flicked her gaze up from tracing the pattern of the lace tablecloth. She studied Gianna’s features in the flickering candlelight.

“Come on, Cate. What’s the harm in admitting the truth?”

Cate slid her trembling hand into her lap. She fought to stop her entire body from shaking, pressing her fingernails into her palms.

Gianna tugged one of the flowers from the arrangement in the center of the table and twirled the stem between her thumb and index finger. She tugged a petal from it, dropping it to the linen tablecloth. “He loves her.” She yanked another petal and let it flutter down. “He loves her not. Which is it, Cate?”

Elliott studied her from the head of the table. “I find it so interesting that you will not answer. Is there some truth to Gianna’s accusation?”

Gianna smirked at her. “Come on, Cate. Admit it. What would it hurt? You married him just to keep Dunhaven Castle safe. How you knew our play, I haven’t yet worked out. But I imagine that has something to do with your illustrious husband’s intricate network of connections.”

Cate focused on her breathing, unwilling to admit anything.

“Now, wait just a moment, Gianna,” Elliott said, wagging a finger at her. “You see, that is something quite different than what I am asking.”

Gianna tossed the flower down and snapped her gaze to Elliott. “How so? I maintain they married for legal reasons only.”

“No. You said she married him to keep Dunhaven Castle safe.”

Gianna offered him an unimpressed stare. “Same thing.”

“Oh, no,” Elliott answered, waving a finger in the air. “No, no. Not the same thing at all.” A smile spread across his face, and he studied Cate.

“Perhaps our dear Duchess married for legal reasons, but the illustrious Duke did not. Oh, how interesting. Who is in love with whom?”

“You think he loves her?” Gianna questioned. “I honestly cannot see how. She’s nothing. Certainly not his type if his previous fiancée is any measure. And he can surely attract far better.”

“The heart wants what the heart wants. And I still maintain his throttling of you speaks volumes.”

“Marcus Northcott does not like to lose,” Gianna shot back with a shrug. “It may not speak to any emotional connection.”

“We shall soon find out, I think. Much to our Duchess’s chagrin.” He flicked his gaze to Cate, his features lit by the flickering candlelight giving them a more sinister appearance. “Unless you are willing to convince him. But before that, I am very curious to know your answer, dear. We can solve that mystery here and now.”

“Admit it, Cate. Your marriage is a sham,” Gianna said. “I’d love to know I’m right. I’d love to know if my case in the future has merit.”

Cate flexed her jaw, her nostrils flaring as heat rose in her body. “Your case will be right where it deserves to be. In the trash.”

Gianna scoffed. “Perhaps Mr. Smythe’s legal maneuvering will see my complaint thrown out, but, again, that’s not what I’ve asked. I asked if the case had merit because you have perpetrated a fraud.”

Elliott leaned forward, his lips parting, as the tension between the two women hung heavy in the air.

Cate swallowed hard, narrowing her eyes at the blonde across from her. Her lips twisted as she pushed her anger down. “Your case has no merit. Our marriage is real.”

The smirk on Gianna’s face faded, replaced by a scowl. “I don’t believe you.”

“I’m not asking you to believe me.”

“Oh, goody,” Elliott said with a clap of his hands. Cate snapped her gaze to him. “I was rooting for you as a couple. It will make our job so much easier.”

Cate shook her head. “I told you already. I do not control my husband’s decisions. Real or not, I cannot force Marcus to join you.”

Elliott smiled at her. “You do not need to force him, dear. You only need to ask.”

“I’m afraid you will be sorely disappointed by my ability to change my husband’s opinion of your organization.” Cate stood and tossed her napkin onto the table. “And now, if you’ll excuse me, I am the one who has grown weary of this conversation.”

Gianna slapped a hand against the table, rattling the dishes. “You have not been dismissed from this table.”

Elliott sucked in a breath. “I had hoped to share a dessert and an after-dinner cocktail, but if you are too tired, I understand.”

Cate nodded and took a step toward the door. She restrained herself from slipping her hand into her pocket and wrapping her fingers around the knife she’d sneaked from the table.

“Just a moment,” Elliott called after her.

Cate froze, her muscles stiffening and her shoulders rising to her ears. She held her breath as she twisted to glance at him.

“You haven’t given me an answer. Can we count on your cooperation, Duchess? Will you bring us Marcus Northcott?”

She let her shoulders relax and raised her chin. “I’ll give you my answer in the morning.”

“I look forward to it.”

Cate turned away from him and strode from the room. She held her breath as she continued down the hall, rounding the banister and sliding her hand onto the smooth wood. She tugged herself up the stairs and navigated to the bedroom.

Tension grew at her temples. She pushed through the door, slammed it shut, and collapsed against it. The emotions she’d held in check until now bubbled to the surface.

A sob burst from her as tears rolled down her cheeks. She slid down with her cheek pressed against the polished wood. Her shoulders shook as she cried, releasing the tension she’d experienced through the meal.

She twisted to press her back against the door. She tried to steady her breathing, sucking in shaky breaths as she struggled to control her emotions.

A knock at the door startled her. She wiped at her cheeks and climbed to her feet. After a few more snuffles, she inched the door open.

The maid who had assisted her earlier peered in. She curtsied. “Your Grace, would you like to change now?”

“Yes,” Cate answered, opening the door further.

The girl carried in nightclothes. Cate slid the knife from her pocket as the maid laid out the nightgown and robe. She tugged open a drawer on the nearby dresser and slipped the weapon inside.

The girl spun as she slid it closed and waited for Cate to cross the room. Within twenty minutes, she had Cate readied for bed. The girl disappeared from the room after another curtsy. Cate retrieved the knife from the dresser and slid it into her dressing gown pocket.

She settled at the window, staring out at the moon overhead. Frost tinged the edges of the window. She pressed her hand against it, feeling the coldness of the night through the glass. Her mind wandered to Jack. Where was he? Would he survive the night? Would she ever see him again?

Likely not, she thought as a shiver shook her. She pulled her hand away from the pane, rubbing it against the velvety material of her robe. She stayed at the window for another hour, waiting for the house to settle.

Her best chance at making it out of this house was in the wee hours of the morning. Restlessness coursed through her as she paced the floor of the room. Her adrenaline waned, but she feared falling asleep if she sat.

She couldn't risk sleeping through the best time for her to escape. Her mind spun out of control as she planned beyond her escape. What would she do? How far was she from where they'd left Jack?

She wondered if there were stables on the property. There must be. They'd arrived by horse-drawn carriage. She should steal a horse. And she shouldn't go far in any direction because she had no idea where she was or which direction to go.

Her features pinched as the realization of how dire her situation was crashed down upon her. Where was Rosenberg from here? How far had they traveled?

She squeezed her eyes closed, settling against the window again. "Think, Cate. You couldn't have gone too far. Rosenberg is likely still to the west."

She sucked in a deep breath. She'd ride in the opposite direction of where the sun rose.

Cate licked her lips and raised her chin, happy with her plan. She could do this. She could find her way home. She had to. She'd find Rosenberg first, then search for Jack.

She blew out a long breath, resuming her pacing back and forth. A knock startled her. She wondered if the maid had returned to check on her before retiring.

“Come in,” she called.

The door swung open, and Gianna sashayed into the room, still in her evening clothes. “Still awake?”

Cate swallowed hard, balling her hands into fists. “Like I could sleep while under the same roof as you.”

Gianna’s lips curled at the corners. She strode past Cate to the dressing table, picking up the brush and running her fingers over the soft bristles. “I feel as though our conversation at the dinner table was unfinished.”

“I don’t. I’ve said all I care to say.”

Gianna puckered her lips, letting the brush fall back onto her shoulder as she stalked closer to Cate. “What a shame. I would very much love to continue, so I think we will. You claim your marriage isn’t a fraud, but I disagree.”

Cate breathed out a sigh. “I don’t care.”

“I do. It affects all of my plans, you see. So, I would appreciate some clarification.”

“This conversation is finished,” Cate said, stepping to the side to skirt around the curvaceous blonde.

Gianna grabbed her by the wrist, yanking her back. “And I said it’s not.”

Cate tried to wrench her arm from the woman’s grasp. “Let go of me.”

“Not until we’ve got a few things straight. I have a different request than Elliott.”

Cate tugged at her arm again. “I’ve given you the only answer I can.”

“Then answer this question. What is more important to you? Dunhaven or your husband?”

Cate scrunched her eyebrows together. “What do you mean?”

“Which is more important to you? Your home and your friends or your husband?”

Cate narrowed her eyes at the woman, finally ripping her wrist free. “What kind of question is that?”

“A fair one. I have an offer for you.”

Cate stalked away from her, staring out the window. “I already know the offer. Bring Marcus to your side or face the consequences. I told you I’d let you know in the morning.”

“Oh, I have quite a different deal. One that you may find appealing.”

Cate twisted to stare at her, bringing a smile to Gianna's face. "I see you're sufficiently intrigued. Good."

Gianna rubbed the bristles of the brush against her other palm as she stalked across the room in one direction. "Elliott wants everything. I'm willing to give you something back."

Cate raised her eyebrows, prompting the woman to continue.

Gianna spun and retreated the way she'd come. "I'm willing to allow you to keep Dunhaven Castle. You keep your home. Your friends keep theirs. Everyone is happy."

"And what are you asking in return?"

"Marcus. Lure him here. Hand him over to us. Leave. Simple." She waved the brush in the air. "Oh, one more pesky detail. You will need to divorce him. We need him completely free for our purposes."

Cate stared at the woman as she cocked a hip and eyed her.

She flicked the face-framing lock of blonde hair back. "I think it solves all our problems. What do you say?"

"Get out," Cate answered.

Gianna slid her head forward, fluttering her eyelashes. "Really? You are willing to lose everything for him?"

"I'm losing nothing. You can't be trusted. I'd never make a deal with you."

Gianna sighed, flicking her gaze to the floor. "You really are stupid."

Cate raised her chin. "You'll never live up to your word."

"Neither will he. Let him go, mouse. Give him to us and save yourself."

Cate shook her head slowly.

Gianna puckered her lips, her nostrils flaring with irritation. "Well, I suppose I should thank you."

"Thank me?"

The blonde lifted her shoulder in a half-shrug. "Now I get to break you."

She stalked forward toward Cate. "And while Elliott gave you until the morning, I'd prefer to be ahead of the game."

She brandished the heavy silver brush, flicking the bristles again. "Let's start now."

CHAPTER 30

Cate's heart skipped a beat as Gianna stalked toward her, smacking the heavy silver brush against her palm.

She shook her head and pressed herself against the window sill. "I don't think Elliott will be pleased with your decision to up the timeline."

"I don't really care. I'm sick of the adoration of Cate Kensie. A few extra bruises won't hurt. There will still be plenty left to torture for your husband's benefit."

"No," Cate said with a shake of her head.

"Consider this payback for what your husband did to me for sending you to this time." Gianna raised the brush overhead.

Cate wrapped her fingers around the knife in her pocket and pulled it from the folds of fabric. She thrust it forward. "I don't think so."

Gianna stopped with her hand raised behind her and cocked her head. "Well, well, well, the little mouse roars."

"Leave, Gianna."

Gianna narrowed her eyes at Cate. "I don't think so. Let's have this out. At least now I have an excuse for attacking you."

Gianna widened her stance and wiggled her fingers. "Make your move, Cate."

Cate lifted her chin, fighting to steady her shaking hand. "No. Either make yours or leave. But I'm not attacking you."

"Afraid?"

“I’m not going to be goaded into a fight with you. Get out or attack me.”

“With pleasure,” Gianna growled at her. She lunged toward her, swinging the heavy brush. Cate skirted to the side, still holding the knife out.

Gianna spun to face her with her nostrils flaring. “Come on,” she said, encouraging Cate to make her move.

Cate shook her head. “No.”

“You are maddening,” Gianna answered. She sliced the hairbrush through the air. “Fight, Cate.”

“Leave, Gianna.”

“After I’ve bruised that pretty little face a few times.” She pounced forward, pummeling Cate and knocking her into the bed.

They struggled against each other as they slammed into the mattress. Cate flopped onto it, fighting to keep Gianna from cracking her with the brush. The knife slipped from her hand, thudding softly against the bedspread.

She twisted to find it. Gianna tossed the brush away and wrapped her hands around Cate’s throat. “Perhaps I’ll skip the small stuff and just go for the big finish.”

Cate gasped as the pressure increased against her windpipe. She ignored it and reached for the knife behind her. Her fingers grasped clumsily for the metal object.

“Say goodnight, Cate,” Gianna growled.

Cate winced as Gianna’s fingers tightened around her neck. Her vision blackened on the edges, and her lungs burned for air.

Her fingers finally latched onto the cold metal handle. She gripped it and swung it blindly overhead.

Gianna shrieked, releasing her grasp on Cate’s neck and stumbling backward.

Cate sucked in a breath with a groan and pushed herself up to sit. Gianna leaned against the wall, a hand pressed to her cheek. She glanced incredulously at Cate as she pulled her fingers away. Blood tinged the tips.

Cate swallowed hard as she stared at the large gash running from her lip to her ear. Blood ran from it, dripping off her jawline.

Cate’s eyes went wide, and she launched herself off the bed. She grabbed the post on the corner and flung herself around. She needed to escape before the shock wore off Gianna.

She lifted her robe and nightgown, keeping tight hold of the knife, and started toward the door. Gianna plowed into her from the back, knocking her to the hardwood floor. Her chin smacked against it and split open. The jarring pain jounced the knife from her hand again. It skittered across the floor.

Blood pooled underneath her jaw, and tears stung her eyes. Gianna's weight pressed against her. Her head lifted as the woman grabbed a fistful of Cate's hair and yanked back.

She pushed it forward, attempting to bang her forehead off the floor. Cate flailed her arms behind her as she lifted her hips. Gianna toppled to the floor, tugging Cate back with her.

Cate kicked and thrashed her arms, striking Gianna in the face again. She yelped in pain as Cate hit the wound she'd sliced into her cheek.

Cate used the temporary pause in the fighting to scramble to her feet and race to the knife. She snapped it up and continued to the door.

She flung the door open and raced through the doorway, smashing into an individual in the hall.

She took a stunned step back, raising the knife in the air.

Elliott held two glasses and a decanter of brandy. "Well, Duchess, this is not the way I had hoped to meet."

Cate backed up a step, gasping for breath.

Gianna shouted from inside the bedroom, "Restrain her. She attacked me."

Elliott's eyebrows shot up as he studied Gianna's limping form. He flicked his gaze to Cate. "What happened?"

Cate's features pinched as she sucked in another shaky breath.

"Well? Isn't anyone going to tell me what just occurred between you two?"

"I told you. She attacked me. Lock her up until Northcott is here. She does not deserve the treatment you are offering her."

"What were you doing here, Gianna? I asked you to stay away from our dear Duchess whilst she considered my proposal."

Gianna flexed her jaw, wincing as the wound on her cheek oozed more blood.

Elliott breathed out a sigh. "You should have that tended. Go now and see to it."

“Elliott...”

“I said go,” he snapped.

Gianna offered Cate a disdainful glare while she pushed past her, knocking her back a step as she strode down the hall. Elliott waved the glasses toward Cate’s bedroom. She raised the knife at him.

“You won’t make it further than the next hall, Duchess. Do not jeopardize what little goodwill is left on my behalf.”

Cate swallowed hard as she considered her options. She let her hand fall to her side and stalked into the room.

Elliott followed her into the bedroom, swinging the door closed behind him. He set the glasses and decanter on the tall dresser near the door.

“I’ll need the knife.”

Cate slid her eyes closed as she held it out in front of her. He pulled it from her hand and set it on the dresser. He poured brandy into both glasses before he held one out to her.

She wrapped her arms around her midriff and shook her head.

“Take it, Duchess. You need it.”

Cate accepted the drink from his hand, pressing it against her arm as she tightened her fingers around the glass and stared into the amber liquid.

“Tell me what happened.”

She flicked her gaze to him, his face lit by the melting candles of the candelabra. “Does it matter?”

He sipped at the brandy. “It does to me. What brought Gianna here? And what started the scuffle?”

Cate barked out a laugh as she paced the floor. “It was a bit more than a scuffle.”

“It appears she got the worst of it. How intriguing you are to me. It seems when you are backed into a corner you become quite fierce. What prompted such a reaction from you?”

“She attacked me.”

“Unprovoked?”

Cate shot him an irked glance. “She didn’t like my answers to her questions.”

“Which were?” he asked after another sip of brandy.

“She offered me Dunhaven Castle in exchange for Marcus.”

Elliott puckered his lips, stalking closer to her. “And you refused?”

Cate nodded. “And she did not care for my response.”

Elliott sucked in a deep breath. “Well, I hope my offer is still in contention. It will make things much easier for you. I can assure you Gianna will have no mercy when it comes to using you to convince your husband to join us. Especially now. I cannot imagine this latest incident will earn you any generosity on her part.”

Cate swallowed hard, giving him no answer.

“I’ll take that as a yes.” He raised his glass. “Again, I prefer you as an ally.”

He studied her for a moment before he sucked in a breath. “Well, I shall leave you to your thoughts. I only dropped by to inform you that your husband has been sent for.”

Cate snapped her gaze to him, her eyes searching his face for more information.

“I expect him to arrive early tomorrow morning. I shall expect my answer from you over breakfast.” He offered her a tight-lipped smile, his eyes lingering on her for a moment before he spun on a heel to leave. “I’ll send someone to attend to your chin.”

“It’s not necessary,” Cate said. “I’m fine and prefer not to be disturbed.”

“As you wish.” He offered her a final nod, collecting the knife, decanter, and his brandy glass and leaving the room. The click of a lock announced the end of any escape attempts through the door.

Cate stalked to the vanity and collapsed onto the chair. She took a long sip of the liquor before she set the glass on top. She studied the cut on her chin in the mirror before she wiped the dried blood away.

She sank her chin into her palm, wincing as the touch stung the scrape. Weariness crept over her. She fought her heavy eyelids, forcing herself to her feet. She crossed the room and twisted the doorknob. It did not give way. With her hopes of the lock failing dashed, she spun and studied the room. Could there be a secret passage?

She sucked in a breath and pushed off the door. After an hour of searching, she collapsed on the bed. She buried her head in her hands. With a deep sigh, she kicked her shoes off and lay on her side. Despite her agitation, her eyes slid closed in minutes, and she drifted to sleep.

When she opened her eyes, she found herself in her room at Dunhaven Castle. She gasped, scanning the room as she tossed back her covers. How had she gotten here? Had Marcus come in the middle of the night?

She slid from her bed and crossed the room, peering into the sitting room. A scream stopped her heart. Cate swallowed hard, racing to the doors to the hall and flinging them open. Another shout echoed through the halls.

She hurried toward it, racing past Molly's room and rounding the corner. Before she took another step, the image faded around her.

Cate's eyes fluttered open. She tugged her eyebrows together as she tried to place herself. Her heart sank as she found herself in the bedroom she'd fallen asleep in. No one had rescued her. She remained with The Agency.

She turned over to stare out the window. Streaks of light brightened the early morning sky. Cate let out a long sigh as a knock sounded at her door.

She pushed up to sit, clearing her throat. "Come in."

The lock disengaged and a maid scurried in, holding a dress. "Good morning, Your Grace. Your clothes."

Cate dragged herself from the bed and slogged to the dressing table. "Thank you."

The maid styled her hair and helped her change into the blue dress she'd brought. "Mr. Stevens has asked that you join him for breakfast in the dining room."

"Thank you," Cate said, dismissing the girl.

The maid scurried from the room, pulling the door shut behind her. Cate sucked in a breath as she attempted to prepare herself for the encounter. He'd demand an answer. He would not like her response. How long could she refuse before they harmed her? How long could she refuse before they realized she held no value?

She stared at herself in the mirror for a moment before her eyes fell on the empty brandy glass on the vanity. Her fingers traced the rim before she grasped it and smashed it against the heavy wood. It shattered into pieces. She carefully picked up one large shard between her thumb and forefinger and slid it into her pocket.

With her chin raised, she sucked in a deep breath and strode from the room. She snaked her way through the halls and down the wide staircase. Her gaze lingered on the double doors leading outside.

"Duchess," Elliott said before she could consider it any further, "I hope you slept well. I was just coming to check on you."

Cate snapped her gaze to him, her heart dropping as any chance of escape diminished. He offered his arm, and she reluctantly accepted it.

“Did you sleep? You did not answer,” he asked as he led her down the hall.

“I managed a little.”

Elliott offered her a smile as they entered the large room, lit by the morning sun. A groan sounded from the table.

Gianna sat in the same seat she’d had the previous evening. She slammed her teacup into its saucer and whipped her napkin onto her lap. “Maybe now we can eat. I’m starved.”

“Good morning, Gianna, dear,” Elliott said as he seated Cate.

She flicked a less-than-impressed gaze at him, the bandage on her cheek wrinkling. Cate stared at it. “Admiring your handiwork?”

She glanced sideways at the servant who poured her tea and nodded.

“Please, Cate, have a good look.” Gianna peeled the bandage from her face, revealing the long slice. She slammed a fist on the table, rattling the dishes.

Cate startled in her seat, sliding her eyes closed before she flicked her gaze back to the angry gash.

“Gianna, please,” Elliott said after a sip of his tea. “Let’s not make a scene.”

“She has disfigured me. I—“

“Enough,” Elliott said flatly. “We have discussed this.”

Gianna’s nostrils flared as she shot a glare in Cate’s direction. “You’ll pay for this.”

Elliott’s teacup clattered back into his saucer. “That is quite enough. I hoped to enjoy a pleasant meal.”

A footman delivered a steaming bowl of oatmeal to Cate. She picked up her spoon and pushed the thick, warm paste around before she raised a spoonful to her lips.

Gianna ate some of her meal before her spoon clattered into her bowl. “I cannot do it. She should not be treated this way.”

“If you cannot manage to contain your animosity, please take your meal elsewhere.”

Cate swallowed another mouthful of oatmeal, flicking her gaze to Gianna who sneered at her.

“I will not be chased from my rightful place.”

“Your rightful place is where I say it is. Remember that,” Elliott answered.

“I have done more for you than—“

“I will not discuss this here. You have been handsomely rewarded and will continue to be so. But you do not make the final decisions here, Gianna. Accept that.”

Gianna sucked in a long breath, her nostrils flaring as she blew it out. “You’re going to regret this, Elliott. Mark my words.”

“So noted,” he said as he lifted his teacup to his lips and shifted his eyes to Cate. “And how is your breakfast, Duchess? Up to your standards.”

“Yes, thank you,” Cate answered.

Across the table, Gianna offered a frustrated sigh, flicking her gaze into space. A butler hurried into the dining room and hastened to Elliott. He bent to whisper in the man’s ear. Elliott’s eyebrows shot up, and his lips curled on the edges. “Ah, thank you, Belmont.”

Elliott dabbed at the corners of his mouth with his napkin before discarding it on the table. “Well, it seems your husband has arrived, Duchess. So, I will need an answer to my question from last night. Can I count on your support? Will you deliver us Marcus Northcott?”

CHAPTER 31

Cate chewed her lower lip as her heart thudded in her chest, and her pulse quickened. She flicked her gaze to Gianna, her eyes falling to the laceration on her cheek. She flexed her jaw, feeling her own cut stretch and pinch. Her eyes lowered to the brown liquid in her teacup. Could she continue this war?

“Duchess? I’m afraid I will need your answer immediately.”

“She’s too stubborn. Time to make her pay.”

Elliott shushed his female compatriot. “I would like to hear our dear Duchess’s answer.”

Cate sucked in a breath, pulling her gaze from the tea and twisting her head to stare at Elliott. His lips parted as he awaited her answer, one eyebrow arching in anticipation.

“I’ll see what I can do.”

A tight-lipped and triumphant smile crossed his face. Gianna let her hand slap against the table. “Oh, Elliott, please don’t tell me you believe her. She’s lying.”

“We will take the appropriate precautions. And we will know soon enough if she is. I can assure you, Duchess, if you are lying, the repercussions will be immediate and severe.”

“I can’t guarantee you anything,” Cate said.

“Because you won’t even try. You’re bluffing,” Gianna said, crossing her arm over her chest.

“Oh, don’t discount yourself, dear. I have every faith that the request of your husband will not fall on deaf ears.”

Gianna pressed her lips into a thin line as she stared at Cate. “Let’s stick with our original plan. I have more faith in that than in Cate Kensie.”

“Come now, Gianna,” Elliott said as he rose, “I think we can all agree that this course of events is preferable. Recognizing the mutual benefits we can provide each other is far better than forcing one’s hand into agreement.”

Gianna glared at Cate. Elliott fluttered his eyelashes at her. “Are you still to be counted on?”

She flicked her gaze at him through her eyelashes before she balled her napkin and tossed it onto the table. She rose from her seat with another glare at Cate before she stormed from the room.

Elliott approached Cate and offered her his arm. “Ignore her. She is jealous.”

Cate stood and slid her hand around his elbow.

“You are making the right choice,” he said, patting her hand. “The benefits of The Agency are vast, even for someone as privileged as yourself and your husband.”

“Gianna’s attitude suggests I’m not making a wise choice.”

Elliott smiled down at her as he led her down the hall. “Gianna is jealous. Between us, I believe she had her sights set on your husband.”

Cate sucked in a deep breath as he pushed open the doors to a large library. “Wait here. I shall bring your husband to you soon.”

She nodded and stepped inside. The doors thudded closed behind her. She wrung her hands in front of her as she paced the floor. What had she done?

She settled on the window seat overlooking the cold landscape. Her heart pounded against her ribs, and her stomach turned over. She licked her lips as she wiped her sweaty palms against her dress.

She couldn’t deliver what she’d promised. The only question that remained was whether she would face The Agency alone or if Marcus would help her.

Voices sounded in the hall. Cate rose from her seat, squeezing her hands into fists until her nails dug into her palms. The doorknobs twisted, and the doors pushed open.

“I think you’ll find her quite well,” Elliott’s voice said. He paraded into the room with Gianna. Marcus followed behind them.

Tears filled her eyes as she spotted him. Her gaze fell on the odd-looking shackles around his wrists. They glowed with a blue, pulsating energy.

“Catherine,” he breathed as he pushed past Gianna and hurried to Cate.

She blinked up at him before she settled her gaze on the shackles.

“Are you all right?” he asked her.

She swallowed hard and flicked her gaze up to him. “More or less.”

He narrowed his eyes at her chin, lifting his bound hands to raise her jaw. “What is this?” he demanded, twisting to glance at Elliott over his shoulder. “You assured she was unharmed. She is not.” He turned back to Cate. “What happened?”

“A small, unfortunate accident. She is quite well, I assure you. Duchess, perhaps you can attest to this.”

Cate glanced around him. “We need some time alone.”

Gianna barked out a laugh. “I think not. Come on, then, Cate, I’m dying to hear your appeal.”

Cate kept her eyes trained on Elliott. “I can’t work miracles. This is not a stage play.”

Elliott narrowed his eyes at her. “I think we can allow them a private moment. It may prove most effective.”

Gianna snapped her gaze to the man, but he held a hand up to silence her. “You have fifteen minutes, Duchess. Then I want a progress report.”

Cate sucked in a breath, drawing her chin to her chest as she waited for them to shuffle from the room. “Fifteen minutes. I expect to be impressed.”

The doors swung shut behind them with a bang, and Cate’s features pinched.

Marcus lifted his bound hands to caress her cheek. “Catherine, are you all right?”

She sucked in a shaky breath and nodded. “Yes,” she squeaked out.

“That sounds less than convincing. What happened to your chin?”

She flicked her gaze up to him. “Gianna attacked me. I fell trying to get away.”

Marcus huffed out a sigh, his irritation obvious.

“I gave as good as I got,” she assured him.

He flicked his eyebrows up and returned his gaze to her. “The wound on her cheek?”

Cate nodded.

He cocked his head and sucked in a breath. "This will end today for you. I will ensure that they return you to Rosenberg and—"

"What?" Cate asked, cutting her eyes up to his. "No."

"Catherine, I will not allow them to harm you."

"No," she repeated with a shake of her head. She wagged her finger at him. "No, you're not doing that again."

Marcus sighed, pressing his lips together. "We have few other choices."

"We have some. We'll make some options. You can't sacrifice yourself again."

"I can, and I will. I will not allow this treatment of you to continue."

"I will come back here for you."

"No, you will not."

Cate offered him a stubborn glance through her eyelashes.

"Catherine, this cannot continue. Gianna is dangerous—"

"Exactly," she interrupted. "What do you think they'll do if you are no longer in the picture?"

"I will make sure that does not happen."

Cate tilted her head and puckered her lips. "You are always saying we cannot trust them. Why would we trust them now?"

"We are wasting time. I will not allow them to do what I know they will do to you."

"Neither will I. We need a way out of this. And then we need to find Jack. We were separated again when Elliott Stevens ripped us apart." Her eyes fell on the pulsating shackles. "I assume these stop you from doing any magic."

He nodded. "Who has the keys?"

"Who do you think?"

Cate pressed her lips together. "Gianna."

"Catherine, you cannot get the key. It is impossible. We must make certain you are safe first."

Cate sliced a finger through the air, her other hand on her hip. "I am not telling your mother that you are property of The Agency."

"Mother will understand that I—"

"No! I refuse to do it. We are not leaving here separately."

Marcus drew in a deep breath and shook his head. "This is not a discussion, Catherine."

“No, it isn’t,” she agreed. “You are not sacrificing yourself for me. It’s nonsense.”

“I have never once made a nonsensical judgment in my life.”

“There’s a first time for everything,” Cate said with a flick of her eyebrows.

“This is not a game.”

“No, it’s not. It’s my life and your life and a lot of other people’s, too. There’s no margin for error. We have to find a way out of this, and we have to do it together.”

“You will not take no for an answer, will you?”

Cate shook her head. “And you’d better not do what you did the last time. I’ll come back for you so I can kill you myself.”

One corner of his mouth tugged up. “While I appreciate your sentiment, there is no good option here. They will not simply allow us to refuse them. Not when they have the upper hand.”

Cate rubbed her chin. “No, I’ll have to get my hands on that key.”

“Catherine!”

“I can do it,” she promised, snapping her gaze up to his face. “I just have to get close enough to Gianna to use this.” She pulled the glass shard from her pocket. She whipped the handkerchief from his pocket and wrapped the glass in it before hiding it again.

“No, we’ll find another way.”

“This is the easiest way. I’ll easily be able to get close to her, she’s been chomping at the bit to put the screws to me. All I need to do is tell them I failed.”

“Failed at what?”

Heat rose in her cheeks as she eyed him. “I may have told them I’d try to convince you to join them. Once they realize I can’t do that, Gianna will try to force you to their side. And that’s when I’ll steal the key.”

“Catherine, this is the worst plan I’ve ever heard. No.”

“There are no other plans, Marcus. This is the best we have.”

“There are other options.”

“Like what? You can’t trade yourself for me. That’s worse. That means I need to come back here for you instead of just getting the key from Gianna.”

“Or you could simply move on. Mother will help you get back to your time and to Dunhaven Castle. I’m certain she’ll also help you locate Jack.”

“No,” Cate growled between clenched teeth. “I didn’t survive the Battle of Austerlitz and nearly kill Napoleon for nothing.”

Cate took a step toward the door when Marcus grabbed her by the elbow and tugged her back. “You did what?”

“It was an accident. I didn’t have much choice. Anyway, he’s fine.”

A knock sounded at the door. Cate twisted to eye the barrier, her heart skipping a beat. She spun back to Marcus. “We can do this. Together.”

She slid her hand into his and nodded. The door creaked open behind her. His hand tightened around hers as she glanced over her shoulder. Elliott stepped inside with two bulky guards, and Gianna hovered in the doorway.

“Well, have we made any decisions?”

“Sadly—” Cate began when Marcus tugged her behind him and stepped forward.

“Yes, we have,” he answered.

Cate’s eyes went wide as she stumbled back. “Marcus, no.”

“I want Catherine returned to Rosenberg immediately. I demand a cessation of all hostility against her.”

“This is not what we discussed,” she whispered.

Elliott cocked his head, puckering his lips. “There seems to be some misunderstanding. The lovely Duchess is most welcome in our membership. If she has managed to convince you to join—”

Marcus held up his hands. “I’ll stop you there. She has not.”

“Oh?” Elliott said with a frown. “But—”

“I demand Catherine be let go immediately.”

“I don’t think so,” Gianna said, stalking into the room. “She is far too great of an asset to us. She allows us to keep you in control.”

“My apologies, Duke, but I am still quite lost in this conversation. Why not simply accept the deal on the table? We take both you and your lovely wife into our fold and—”

“No. Catherine is not to be subjected to any of what The Agency offers.”

“Marcus, this is not what we discussed,” Cate said, grabbing hold of his arm. “Don’t do this.”

“It seems your wife is not in agreement. Perhaps you would like to—”

“That won’t be necessary. We do not agree on the subject. I am currently in your custody. I am trading myself for her.”

Cate slid her eyes closed and shook her head. “Marcus, no.”

“The discussion is over, Catherine. I have made up my mind.”

Her heart thudded as her mind shot in a hundred directions. Could she get the key before they escorted her away? Would she be able to return here and rescue him?

“So have we,” Gianna said as she stalked forward. “And it appears we do not see eye to eye either.”

Elliott stared at the floor for a moment, his hands clasped behind his back as he frowned. “This is a most disappointing turn of events.”

“Speak for yourself, Elliott,” Gianna said with a smirk made even more sinister by the slice across her cheek. “I’m about to have the time of my life.”

“Elliott, I expected more from you,” Marcus said as he sidestepped to block Gianna from Cate.

Elliott shot him a confused glance. “As did I of you.”

The man spun on a heel and disappeared from the room. The guards crossed toward them.

“Elliott!” Marcus shouted after him as Gianna lunged for Cate with an evil laugh.

“You should have agreed, Marcus.”

“Take your hands off her,” he shouted as Gianna yanked her toward the door. The two men restrained him from following.

“This would have gone so much easier if you’d only agreed. But then again, I do appreciate your stubbornness. It gives me the opportunity to alleviate so much stress.” She chuckled again with a tiny squeal of excitement as she dragged Cate from the room.

“Come along, my dear little Cate. We are going to have so much fun.”

Cate sucked in a shaky breath as Gianna paraded her down the hall toward a closed door. She flung it open when they reached it and forced Cate down the wooden stairs.

Candelabras lit the space below as Gianna continued to push her forward until they reached the bottom few steps. With one rough shove, she sent Cate tumbling down to the ground. She landed on her hands and knees.

Gianna stomped down the remaining stairs and yanked Cate up by her hair. She paraded her toward a chair with leather straps next to a table of instruments. Cate eyed them, swallowing hard.

She had to escape before those wrapped around her wrists. Before she became a prisoner, or worse, a victim.

CHAPTER 32

Cate gritted her teeth as Gianna forced her across the room. She dug her feet into the floor, trying to stop her progression. Pain shot through her as the woman twisted her hair tighter.

Cate clawed at Gianna's hands, trying to break free of her. They reached the chair. Cate arched her back away from it as Gianna tried to shove her toward it. She released her grasp on Gianna's hands and reached into her pocket. She wrapped a sweaty palm around the glass shard and pulled it out. Blindly, she swiped it behind her, slicing through the fingers that held her hair.

Gianna screeched, releasing Cate's hair as she stumbled back a step. Cate fell forward, smacking into the chair. She grasped it and pushed herself up.

"You bitch!" Gianna spat at her. "You'll pay for that."

Cate twisted and sliced the shard through the air again, narrowly missing Gianna as she leaned away.

Gianna shook her bloody fingers as she winced. "Come on, then."

"Give me the key to those magic handcuffs," Cate said.

Gianna barked out a sharp laugh. "I don't think so. If you want it, come and take it."

Cate's nostrils flared as she sucked in sharp breaths. Gianna inched to the side. Cate circled away from the chair, keeping the glass shard at arm's length.

"Come on, Cate. Make your move." Gianna signaled her to come closer.

Cate's heart pounded as she tightened her fingers around the glass.

"Here, let me make it easy." Gianna pulled a glowing key from her dress pocket and dangled it in the air. She tugged her lips back into a grin as she tossed it across the room.

Cate followed the key's path until it clattered to the floor and rolled across it. Gianna lunged forward, and Cate snapped her gaze back to the women, waving the shard again.

"Give it up, Cate. You're not going to win. I'm going to take everything you have. After I ruin that pretty little face of yours."

"I told you before I wouldn't let you have anything of mine."

"You won't have a choice, sweetheart." Gianna launched herself at Cate, plowing into her and knocking her to the ground. Cate struggled to keep hold of the glass shard as her shoulder slammed into the cold, hard floor. Gianna reached for her wrist and pressed it into the ground.

Cate fought to hang on to the makeshift weapon as the woman pounded her arm against the stone floor again and again. With her free hand, Cate clawed at her face.

Gianna released the pressure on her wrist as she fended off Cate's attack. Cate used the opportunity to wiggle free and slash at her again. The rough glass caught her sleeve, tearing into it and her flesh underneath. Blood bloomed from the slice, soaking the thin material.

Gianna sucked in a gasp as she grabbed at the fresh wound. Cate slid her heels toward her rear and braced them, shoving her hip in the air to topple Gianna from straddling her.

The blonde rolled to the floor next to her. Cate scrambled to her feet, still holding the shard. It pressed against her fingers, drawing blood. She shifted her gaze toward the key glowing in a dark corner of the room.

Gianna shot her an angry glare and climbed to her feet before Cate could cross to the key. "Going somewhere?"

Cate snapped her gaze back to Gianna, trying to anticipate the woman's next move. "Go for the key, Cate," she dared her.

Cate backed away from her and the key.

"What's the matter? Chicken?"

Cate circled behind the chair, keeping the heavy wooden object between her and Gianna. She inched toward the corner opposite the key.

Gianna grabbed the tray of tools from the table and flung it toward Cate.

She held her hand up, blocking the sharp instruments from hitting her face. When she lowered her arm, she found Gianna inches from her face. The woman slammed her into the wall. The air rushed from Cate's lungs.

She struggled against the woman who pinned her. Gianna wrapped a hand around her throat and squeezed. Cate struggled to draw in a breath. She clamped a hand over the blonde's face and shoved her back, pressing the shard into her neck.

A droplet of blood dripped down her neck before Gianna backed away. Cate wrapped a leg around Gianna's, tripping her. She fell backward, smacking into the chair.

Cate raced past her and scooped the key up from the ground before hurrying toward the stairs. Gianna crashed into her as she reached them. Cate crawled up a few of the steps, their edges poking into her ribs.

"I don't think so, Cate," Gianna growled as she elbowed her in the back.

"I do," Cate grunted back. She rolled onto her side and drew her leg to her chest before she kicked it out. Gianna slid down a few stairs.

Cate clamped onto the handrail and tugged herself up, clambering up a few more steps. She reached the door, her fingertips caressing the knob when Gianna wrapped her arm around Cate's neck. Cate squeezed the shard tighter at her side before she shoved it backward. It stabbed Gianna in the gut.

The woman gasped, releasing her hold on Cate. She stared at her with wide eyes before she fell backward, tumbling down the stairs and landing in a heap at the bottom.

Cate swallowed hard, unsure if Gianna remained alive or not. She sucked in shaky breaths, unfurling her fingers and staring at the glowing key. She curled her fingers around it again before she twisted the doorknob and climbed to the hall.

She eased the door shut and hurried forward. Elliott Stevens rounded the corner. He froze as he spotted her. Cate's heart stopped, and her blood ran cold. She couldn't make it to the library first.

She swallowed hard as she hurried forward to him. "Mr. Stevens, please, I just need a few more moments with my husband to convince him."

"Where is Gianna?"

Cate ignored the statement, clamping onto his arm with a hand. "He is extremely stubborn, but I'm certain I can achieve the result I had hoped to earlier. Just five minutes."

“The time for negotiations has ended, Duchess. I—“

“This is not the way you hoped things would go. And I must admit, it’s not the way I had either. What can it hurt?”

He glanced over her shoulder at the closed door leading downstairs.

“Please,” Cate said again, tightening her grip.

“I suppose five minutes will not hurt. Though I am quite perplexed that Gianna agreed to this.”

Cate swallowed hard as she fluttered her eyelashes at him, refusing to answer the statement. He wrapped an arm around her shoulders and led her to the library doors. He pushed them open. Marcus twisted to face them, his eyes going wide. The two men still on either side of him reached to restrain him.

Cate pushed past Elliott and hurried across the room.

“Catherine, are you quite all right?”

Elliot waved the men back. “Five minutes, Duchess.”

She reached Marcus and threw her arms around his neck, tugging him closer to her.

“Catherine, what’s happened?”

She pressed her cheek against his, whispering in his ear, “I have the key.”

His muscles tensed, and he leaned into her. “Touch it to the shackles, and they will open.”

She squeezed her eyes closed and nodded. She pulled away from him, staring up into his dark eyes as she slid her closed hand down his arm.

“Elliott!” Gianna’s voice screamed.

Cate’s heart stopped, and she gasped for breath. The voice called out again, this time closer. Cate’s knees trembled as she slid the key between her thumb and forefinger.

“Gianna?” Elliot questioned as she appeared at the door. A bloodstain marred the front left side of her dress.

She pointed a blood-soaked hand at Cate. “Stop her, she has the key!”

Elliott snapped his gaze at them. Cate pressed the key against the shackles. They snapped open, falling from his wrists. The corners of his lips turned up as electricity crackled between his fingers. He leaned forward toward her and whispered, “Get down.”

Cate swallowed hard, crouching low as he swung his hands out. Two white-hot fireballs slammed into the guards on either side of him. They fell backward, stunned and unmoving. With a stomp forward, an arc of energy buzzed over her head, shooting toward Gianna and Elliott.

A shriek split the air as firm hands grabbed hold of her and an arm wrapped around her. Her surroundings turned black.

Details filled in around her seconds later. She sucked in shaky breaths as she recognized her room at Rosenberg. She let out a sob as the pressure released around her shoulders.

"Catherine," Marcus began.

She interrupted him, spinning to face him and swallowing hard as she threw her arms around his neck.

He pulled her closer to him and stroked her hair for a moment before he pulled away. "Are you all right?"

She bit her lower lip and nodded, sniffing and wiping a tear away from her cheek. "Yeah, I'm fine."

He tipped her chin up, studying the scratch at the tip. With a swipe of his finger, he healed it. "Anything else?"

"No. I escaped pretty unscathed." She pressed a hand to her forehead as her heartbeat steadied along with her breathing. She flicked her gaze up to him and offered a weak smile. "I told you I'd get the key."

He offered her an amused smile with a shake of his head. "We really must stop finding ourselves in these situations."

"I agree."

"You must learn to defend yourself."

Cate flicked her eyebrows up. "Hey, I think I did pretty well. I drew blood three times and knocked her out again."

"That is not what I am referring to. We must stop her from doing what she's done to you this time around. I will not have you stranded in time again or worse."

Cate chewed her lower lip. "We need to find Jack. He's still stranded."

"I have search parties already looking for him."

"And we need to free Gertrude. I know where she is. Or when, rather. But I'm certain they will be moving her soon. We need to find both her and Jack as quickly as possible."

"We need to ensure your safety first."

"No!" Cate argued. "There's no time to lose. After what we just did, they will move Gertrude. And I'm sure they'll attempt to find Jack."

“Catherine, I will not go after either of them until I have given you the ability to protect yourself. Now, come along. This time there is no room for discussion.”

Cate heaved a sigh, opening her mouth to argue. He flicked his eyebrows up. “I will not take no for an answer.”

“Fine,” she said with a huff, “but I fail to see how you’re going to prevent this, short of never letting me out of your sight.”

Marcus led her from the room, sliding his gaze sideways to her as they strode down the hall. “That can be arranged.”

“That’s ridiculous. I wasn’t actually suggesting that.”

“Have you forgotten, dear, that I have a magical menagerie at my fingertips?”

Cate snapped her gaze to him as they rounded the corner, heading for the library housing the books on magic. “Do you have something to prevent unwanted time travel?”

“No. But I have something that can return you no matter where you are.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as he pushed the doors open to the library and waved her inside ahead of him. “That would have been more than useful yesterday morning.”

He crossed the room and opened the secret passage behind the bookcase. They descended into the darkness. Marcus lit the sconces around the massive chamber before he crossed to a shelf. He snapped open a small wooden box and retrieved the item inside. After uttering a few words Cate did not understand, he held it out to her.

“It’s a button,” she said, holding up the round brass object to the flickering firelight.

“A very powerful button.”

“It can return me to where in time?”

“Wherever I am,” Marcus said.

Cate stared down at the item laying in her palm. “Really?”

“Should you ever need me, you can return immediately to my side.”

Cate stared down at it, cocking her head. “How do I use it?”

“Just a simple rub with your thumb will return you.”

She closed her fingers around it and nodded. “Okay.”

“Shall we try it?” Marcus asked.

Cate's heart skipped a beat, and she swallowed hard, suddenly uncomfortable being sent away alone.

"We do not need to if you prefer not to."

Cate licked her lips and slid her shoulders down her back. "I'll try."

"All right. I'm opening a portal to Dunhaven Castle in April 2019. You should arrive in your bedroom. Use the button to return here."

Cate nodded, and he stretched his hands out in front of him. "Wait," she said, tugging at his elbow.

He arched an eyebrow as he twisted to face her. "Changed your mind?"

She shook her head. "No, but you're not supposed to open time portals in the castle."

Marcus tugged a corner of his lips back and thrust his hands out again. "Mother is not home."

Cate clicked her tongue as the winds began to swirl around her. The candlelight on the sconces flickered wildly as the portal sparkled in front of him. He gave her a nod. She swallowed hard and stepped through the portal. Moments later, she appeared in what was now her bedroom.

She stepped forward, glancing around the space. She hadn't arrived at Dunhaven yet. She wouldn't for almost two months. The dog beds were missing along with her personal items.

She eased onto the edge of the bed, recalling the first moments she'd seen the room. How naive she had been then. So much had changed. The sun coming through the windows glinted off her wedding ring.

She rubbed a thumb along it before she opened her hand and studied the thick, brass button. She stood and stalked forward. "Let's see if you work."

With a rub of her thumb across the round button, the room began to disappear around her. A tingly sensation shot through her body, and she experienced the sensation of falling.

A moment later, she stood in the dimly lit magical menagerie.

Marcus smiled at her. "Welcome back."

"It worked," she said, squeezing it in her hand.

"Of course, it did. I am no amateur, Catherine." He snapped the wooden box closed and slid it back on the shelf. "Now, shall we proceed with the other matters at hand?"

Cate lifted the timepiece from around her neck and unclasped it, sliding the loop of the button through the chain before she re-clasped it and hung it around her neck.

“Yes, we should search for Jack and—“

“No,” Marcus interrupted as he led her up the stairs. “We should find Gertrude first. If she is moved, we risk losing her.”

“But...” Cate said, her heart sinking as they reached the library, “Jack is out there all alone.”

“And I have people searching for him.”

“We can’t leave him here.”

Marcus pushed the bookcase closed. “I am not suggesting we do. But we have to make a choice.”

“Jack,” Cate said.

“You are sharper than this. Think, Catherine. If we lose track of Gertrude, it may be forever.”

“What about my clairvoyance? Maybe I can track her—“

“You are still learning how to use that. Let’s not pin our hopes on something that may not pan out. I prefer a sure bet. And so do you. We must leave Jack behind.”

CHAPTER 33

“No!” she shouted, her features pinching. “We can’t.”

“It’s not forever. We will bring him home, too, but we must take the opportunity for Gertrude before it’s gone.”

Cate licked her lips, pressing them together. She hated leaving Jack, but he made an excellent point. He also likely preferred to ensure the reason for their marriage ceased to exist. She only hoped he’d keep to his word to rescue Jack after they no longer needed to stay married. “You’re right. As much as I hate this, you’re right.”

Marcus squeezed her shoulder. “We will find him, Catherine, I promise. But we must save Gertrude first before we lose the chance.”

She nodded, taking solace in the words. He’d helped her find Jack once. They could do it again.

“Okay, so 1911. We need to go to the Cinderella Chateau then.”

“What date?” he asked.

Heat washed over her. “I don’t know. She didn’t tell me.”

“It’s all right—”

“No, it’s not!” Cate said, pressing a hand to her forehead. “We can’t check every day in that year.” She slid her eyes closed and stalked away, pacing the floor. “I should have known she wouldn’t have given me enough information.”

Marcus stopped her roaming. “Easy, Catherine, what do you remember from your visions?”

“Nothing. I couldn’t remember anything until your mother hypnotized me.”

“You saw the window. What was outside of it?”

Cate closed her eyes and tried to recall the vision. “I can’t. It’s all fuzzy.” She flicked her gaze up to him, tears welling in her eyes. “I’m sorry.”

“There is nothing to be sorry for, dear. We will find another way.”

“Take me back to 1956,” she said.

Marcus flicked his eyebrows up.

“I can try again. I can pinpoint something that can help us. At least narrow it down to the season.”

“You do not need to put yourself through that.”

“I want to.”

“Catherine—“

“Marcus...we don’t have time to waste. You said it yourself. Now, take me back to 1956, and let me try to find out where she is.”

Marcus heaved a sigh as he pressed a hand against her back. “Come on.”

“Where are we going?”

“I had better not open the portal in the library even if Mother isn’t home.”

Cate suppressed a giggle as they stepped into the hall and snaked their way to the garden. He stretched his hands in front of him once they were safely outside of the castle.

Cate licked her lips, hoping she’d be able to find some clue before it was too late. Marcus dropped his hands and twisted to face her. “That button does not work inside the portal. So, do not dally.”

“Right,” Cate said, pushing two pointed fingers ahead. “Straight through, no stopping.”

“Exactly.”

She smiled and nodded as he spun away and stretched out his hand again. Within moments, she stood in the same garden over a century later. Marcus arrived seconds after her, and they made their way to her bedroom suite.

Anna pursued the stack of papers they’d left her with. “Ah, there you are. Any luck?”

“Yes and no,” Cate said, wringing her hands.

Anna tugged the reading glasses from her face and set them aside. She stood, frowning at Cate before she took hold of her hands. "What's happened?"

"We need more information," Cate answered.

"No," Anna said with a shake of her head. "Something has happened. What is it?"

"Mother, we need—"

Anna waved his comment away as she kept her eyes focused on Cate. "Marcus, go fetch tea."

Cate sucked in a breath. "That's not—"

"I shall decide what is necessary and what is not. And right now, tea is necessary. Marcus will fetch it whilst you and I have a conversation."

Marcus offered Cate an apologetic glance. She smiled at him and squeezed his hand before he strode from the room, leaving them alone.

"Now, come and tell me all about what's happened," Anna said, leading Cate to the bedroom and easing her onto the bed.

"Gertrude was not at the chateau, but we found her bracelet. She's there...just in another time. We've narrowed it down to 1911, but I need to determine if I can glean any additional details about when in 1911 she is taken there before—"

Anna held up a hand, stopping her. "Just a moment. More happened."

Cate pressed her lips together. "Not much. I—"

"Catherine, dear, you are in a dress from a completely different era. And whatever happened to you during that time has frightened you terribly. Now, what happened?"

Cate squashed her features as she struggled to control her emotions. "We...Gianna found us at the chateau. Jack and I were alone, and she sent us to 1805. In the middle of the Battle of Austerlitz." Her eyebrow arched, and she fluttered her eyelashes as she remembered the surreal experience. "I almost killed Napoleon. Oh, speaking of, did he win the battle? I'm afraid I may have changed history."

"Don't worry about that now, dear. You must have been terrified. Marcus did not take the news very well either."

"I surmised as much based on the last encounter I had with Gianna."

Anna patted her hand. "He returned here after her confession. There was no consoling him."

Cate pinched her forehead. "I assume the impending confrontation with Gianna was not something he looked forward to."

"Losing you is the thing he fears the most."

Cate flicked her gaze away from the woman, certain color rose in her cheeks at the misstatement.

Anna pushed a lock of hair behind Cate's ear. "What happened next, dear?"

Cate nodded and sniffled. "After Gianna dumped us, we managed to escape. We planned to come here and hoped to get your help to return to this time, but..."

Anna rubbed her arm. "Go on."

"The Agency found us and separated us. They took me to a house. I don't know where."

"And that is where Marcus disappeared to earlier. I figured as much."

"I'm the cause of this." Cate pressed her lips together as she rubbed her forehead. "They want Dunhaven Castle. And now Gertrude has been taken, and Jack is missing again. And Marcus is—"

"Right where he wants to be." Anna squeezed her hand and grinned.

Cate forced a weak smile onto her lips.

"Oh, Catherine, I realize this is quite difficult. The Agency is not an enemy I'd wish on anyone. They are cruel and spiteful. But Marcus will do what is necessary to protect you." She flicked her eyebrows up. "And from what I've seen you make quite a formidable adversary for his enemies. It is quite refreshing how devoted to each other you are."

Cate swallowed hard at the words. She blinked a few times before he changed the subject. "We had to leave Jack somewhere in 1805. We cannot waste a minute in retrieving Gertrude before they move her again."

"I understand. How trying, though I assure you Marcus will not rest until both are found."

Cate pressed her lips together as she considered it. She could understand his reasoning to find Gertrude. But Jack? He had no motivation to retrieve her friend.

"He would do anything for you, Catherine. Do not fret."

Cate forced another smile and nodded. He must have really laid it on thick with his mother about their marriage. The truth would crush her. But she had larger things to worry about.

"I need to try the bracelet again."

“I had an idea about that. You’re still struggling to make sense of the visions even with our strategies. But what if you touch the bracelet again, and then I hypnotize you? You were able to detect things using that strategy the last time.”

Cate sucked in a breath, her fake smile turning genuine. “Yes. Okay.”

“Excellent. Then we shall use that tactic for now.”

“For now?” Cate asked, crinkling her brow.

“Well, yes,” Anna said as she rose and retrieved Gertrude’s bracelet. “We will continue our work after you have settled this matter. It may even be easier given that your nerves should be somewhat settled. At least, I hope so. But if I know The Agency, they will not allow you much downtime.”

Marcus returned with a maid scurrying behind him carrying a tray of tea. “Ah, here is the tea. Let’s have a sip before we begin.”

“Oh,” Cate started.

Anna cupped her chin. “It will settle your nerves, dear.”

“I could use that,” she answered with a sigh as Anna passed her a steam cup. She inhaled the aroma and took a drink. She let the warm liquid wash over her tongue and tried to let her muscles relax.

Anna flicked her gaze to her son. “Marcus, may I have a word with you?”

“Now is not the best time,” he said, pouring a cup of tea and handing it to her.

Anna accepted it, her eyes unwavering. She raised her eyebrows toward her hairline.

Marcus took a sip from the cup he had poured for himself before he settled it back into its saucer. “Of course, Mother.”

“Excuse us, Catherine, we won’t be more than a moment. Enjoy your tea, dear, and try to relax.”

Cate sipped at the warm drink again as they stepped from the room. She sighed as she considered the task ahead of her. She would be better prepared for it this time. Even if she became lost during her hypnosis, she knew how to come back.

She could do this. She would do it. She had to. Her mind wandered to the conversation occurring beyond her doors. What had Anna wanted to speak to Marcus about? A cold sweat beaded on her brow. Had she realized their marriage was fake? Had Cate tipped her off somehow?

The opening door interrupted any further thoughts. Marcus and Anna strode back in.

Anna set her saucer on the tray. "Shall we begin?"

Cate passed her teacup back to Anna and nodded. She lifted the lid on her music box, flicking a glance at the purple rose in its glass case. She conjured the future memory she'd had when she touched it.

Holding it in her mind, she swung her legs onto the bed and settled into the pillows.

"Are you ready?" Anna asked.

"Yes," Cate answered with a nod.

"Not too long. You must have the energy for the hypnosis after."

"I understand," she said, holding her palm out for the bracelet.

Anna dangled it from her fingers. "Good luck." She dropped it into Cate's palm. The cold metal smacked onto her skin and images began to form.

They fluttered through her mind faster than she could process. Her breathing turned labored, and tension formed at her temples. She tried to focus on the images as they rushed past.

The memories slowed, and she focused on one vision. Gertrude sat in the yellow room. Her head hung down to her chest. Voices rambled in another language. A piano played a song. She tried to focus on it when voices shouted over it.

The pain in her temples became blinding. If only she could spot one more detail. She flicked her increasingly blurry gaze to the window. With a flutter of her eyelashes, she tried to clear her vision, but the task proved impossible. Blackness crept from the edges of the room until it consumed her.

She snapped her eyes open with a gasp.

"You did quite well that time," Anna said as she hovered over her.

"I don't feel like I did well. I didn't get any additional details that can help us."

"But did you get any additional details overall?"

Cate squashed her eyebrows together. "Yes, I think so. More details than the blurry images."

"Then you have improved," Anna said as she dangled a medallion in front of her. "Now, let's try the hypnosis to clarify some of those details further."

Cate nodded and settled into the pillows, focusing on the sparkling gold pendant as Anna swung it back and forth.

After a few seconds, her eyelids grew heavy and her muscles relaxed. When Anna finished her countdown, her eyes drifted closed.

When she opened them again, she found herself in her sitting room. She smiled as she recognized the warm future memory the rose had shown her.

A moan emanated from behind her. She snapped her gaze toward it before she pulled the doors open. Blackness yawned in front of her.

"Catherine," Anna's voice echoed overhead. "Can you find the vision of Gertrude?"

"I'm trying," Cate said. "I'm searching through the darkness."

"Remember when you find it to focus on some clue about the date."

Cate stepped into the black hall with a nod. "Okay."

She crept forward until the warm light from her suite disappeared. She glanced over her shoulder, resisting the urge to turn and run back to safety. She needed information. With her shoulders squared, she continued forward until she struck something. She explored it with her fingertips.

The picture frame molding ran up the plaster wall. "I'm close. I feel the molding I ran into the last time."

"Good, Catherine. Excellent."

Cate pressed her fingers against the wall and used it to guide her. She reached the corner. Light bloomed from an open door. "I see light."

She moved toward it and peered into the room. Gertrude sat in the middle of the room, tied to a chair.

"I found her."

"What do you see, Catherine? Can you tell the season through the window?"

Cate flicked her gaze to the window. "It's snowing. It's winter."

"Good," Anna answered her. "Now, come back."

"No," Cate said, shuffling further into the room. "I can find more. There was music and a voice. I'll try for more."

"Be careful, Catherine. You do not want to become lost again. Keep in contact with me."

Cate continued around the room, approaching the limp form of Gertrude again. She knelt in front of her. "Gertrude? Can you hear me?"

She pushed the dirty blonde hair from the woman's face, cupping her chin. "Gertrude?"

The woman moaned in response, but she did not open her eyes. From the door, music floated into the room. Cate furrowed her brow as the piano music continued.

“Christmas. Someone is playing Christmas music.”

“That’s excellent, Catherine. Excellent work. Now, come back.”

“Wait, there’s something else. They’re speaking again.” Cate inched back toward the door. “They’re speaking French. I can’t understand it.”

She licked her lips, closing her eyes as she tried to pick out any words. She recognized two. It was all she needed. A smile spread across her face. “I know what date this is. I know where to go.”

“That’s excellent, Catherine,” Anna said. “Now, make your way to your safe place, and I’ll bring you back.”

Cate nodded and took a step toward the door when it slammed shut in front of her. She stumbled back a step, her lips parting as she stared at it.

“Catherine? Have you made it?”

“No,” she answered. “The door is closed.”

Cate hurried toward it and twisted the knob pulling on it. It didn’t budge. “I can’t open it. I’m trapped.”

“It’s all right. It doesn’t matter. I’ll bring you back from where you are.”

“Okay,” Cate agreed. Anna’s voice echoed overhead, informing her that when she snapped her fingers Cate would awaken.

The countdown progressed. Anna finished it. The sound of fingers snapping reverberated around the room. But Cate did not leave.

She stood in the center with an unconscious Gertrude.

“Anna? I’m stuck. That didn’t work.”

Cate dug her fingernails into her palm as she flexed her fists. “Anna?”

She received no answer. “Anna? Hello?” she called again.

No one responded. She spun in a slow circle, realizing she was trapped.

CHAPTER 34

“Hello?” Cate called again into the silence.

Anna’s voice no longer guided her. She had been cut off from all communication. She remained stuck inside her mind.

“Anna? Marcus?” she shouted.

She wrapped her fingers around the doorknob again and twisted it. It didn’t budge. She banged against it with a fist, jiggling the handle as she tried to force it open.

“I’m stuck,” she said, her voice laden with panic as she pressed her back against the door. “If you can hear me, I’m stuck. I can’t get out.”

She left the door behind and crossed to the window. She peered outside, finding nothing beyond it. “What happened to the outside?”

Blackness surrounded her. She spun to face the room again. Her heart skipped a beat as she stared at the now-empty chair in the room’s middle. “Gertrude?”

The woman no longer sat in the room. The yellow walls darkened, beginning to turn black on the top and bottom.

Cate pressed her fingertips to her temples as tightness twisted them. She squeezed her eyes closed. “Go back,” she told herself. “Leave.”

“I don’t think so,” a new voice said.

Cate snapped her eyes open. Gianna sashayed from a dark corner. In the shadows, the red gash on her face appeared even more menacing. Cate went stiff, squeezing her palms into fists again.

“You are stuck here, mouse.”

"I'm not a mouse," Cate answered through clenched teeth.

"Oh, but you are," Gianna said as she sauntered closer. "You're such a nothing. A nobody. You may as well be stuck here. You're useless."

She circled around Cate as she continued her taunting. "You got away from me, but I am working on something bigger. Something you won't get away from."

She stopped as she finished her loop, pressing closer to Cate. "Something that will destroy you and your Duke."

"I'll never let you have Dunhaven Castle."

Gianna threw her head back with a laugh. "Never say never, Cate. I have plans for you that may change your mind."

Cate scowled at her, throwing her shoulders back. "No."

"Don't be so quick to reply. You've yet to see the true power of The Agency. And you've yet to see the lengths I'll go to in order to crush you. You'll wish you had given in long ago when I'm finished."

"And you don't know how far I'll go to protect my friends."

Gianna arched an eyebrow as she circled in the opposite direction. "Oh? Does that include your husband? Because I doubt he'll go that far for you."

Cate bit her lower lip.

"No answer?" Gianna completed her arc and set her hands on her hips. "Aww, poor mouse. She's just realizing how right I am. Tell me, what are you going to do when he drops you? You can't win alone."

Heat washed over Cate as the words stung. She'd face this situation soon enough. Likely as soon as they found Gertrude. Which they couldn't do until she found a way out of her own mind.

Cate glanced around the room again in search of an exit.

"There's nowhere to go, Cate. You're here all alone with me." Gianna laughed at her again. "Maybe we'll win out sooner rather than later."

Cate hurried across the room to the door and tugged at it again. It wouldn't budge.

"There's no way out. Poor Cate. She's trapped in her own mind."

A wave of panic washed over Cate as she wrapped her arms around her midriff. Her eyes settled on the window. Blackness lay beyond it. But was there also a way out?

She crossed to it and tried the latch, finding it stuck.

"Oops, that won't work either."

Cate took a few steps back from the glass. She backed into the wooden chair Gertrude had occupied moments ago, sending it screeching across the parquet. Her eyebrows furrowed as she placed a hand against the back.

She flicked her gaze back to the window.

“Have a seat, Cate. Take a load off. You’re stuck.”

“Not if I can help it,” she answered, grabbing hold of the chair. She hurled it toward the window. It smacked into the pane, cracking it.

Gianna studied her blood-red nails as she cackled again. “Oh, the little mouse roars again. Too bad. Still not working.”

Cate retrieved the chair as it clattered back to the floor and tried again. The crack in the glass widened. She lifted the wooden object a third time and smashed it into the pane. The glass broke away, leaving sharp shards stuck.

A burst of icy air swept inside the broken window. Cate held her arms up against it as it tossed her hair wildly. Bits of glass dislodged as the gusts grew stronger. She collapsed to the floor, covering her head with her hands as the assault continued.

Gianna’s laughter stopped, replaced by a gurgle. Cate risked a glance, finding the large fragment of the razor-sharp glass poking from Gianna’s abdomen. She shot Cate a shocked glance before she slipped to the floor.

The wind continued to pound, shoving her limp form into a wall. The yellow-black barriers began to melt. Cate squeezed her eyes closed again as dust and debris floated around the room, carried by the gale-force winds.

A voice called to her, but she couldn’t hear it over the clamor. The voice called again as the wind came to a sudden stop.

Cate fluttered her eyes open.

“There you are,” Anna said with a smile as she stroked Cate’s hair.

Cate sucked in a sharp breath as she forced a nod and reached for Marcus’s hand. “I made it.” She tried to sit up, but Anna eased her back.

“No, not yet. Rest a moment.”

“I’m okay.” She flicked her gaze to Marcus. “I know the date. We should go.”

“You can rest for a moment. Then we’ll go.”

“How do you feel?” Anna asked as she poured Cate another cup of tea.

“Okay, I’m just...confused,” she answered as she accepted the saucer and sipped from the cup.

“About the visions?”

Cate shook her head. "Why do I get stuck? In both instances, I've gotten stuck."

"As I said, we've never used hypnosis to clarify clairvoyant visions. I'd wager it's one of two things. Either your mind is trying to show you something else, something it considers more vital than what you are seeking."

"Or?" Cate asked.

"Or there is some sticking point that blocks you from returning. A fear reaction, for example."

Cate pinched her eyebrows together.

"It may help to know what happens when you are stuck."

Cate shimmied up higher on the bed. "The door closed, and I got stuck. Gertrude disappeared. The walls started to turn black." She shifted her gaze to Marcus before sliding her eyes back to Anna. "Gianna came."

Anna drummed her fingers against her teacup. "Heavens, it could be either. Given your tumultuous relationship with that woman, you may have some fear of encountering her."

"Or your mind may be trying to show you a future threat," Marcus said.

Cate set her teacup on the saucer and slid it onto the night table. "We should go. I know what date. December 20, 1911."

Marcus stood and stalked to the end of the bed. "All right. I will retrieve her."

"What? No!" Cate shot up to sit and swung her legs over the bed. "I'm going, too."

"That is not necessary. You should rest. I will handle this."

"Definitely not. You are not going alone. No way."

Marcus heaved a sigh. "Catherine, I will be fine. I think Mother will agree you should rest."

Anna rose from her seat and waved her hands in the air. "Don't use me as your excuse, darling. This is between you and Catherine." Anna approached and pinched his chin. "And if it's all the same to you, I'd prefer her to go. I don't like the idea of you heading to an Agency stronghold alone."

Cate raised her eyebrows at him and offered a triumphant smile. "Let's go, dear."

Marcus huffed and took her hand. "I cannot believe you two continue to band together to defeat me."

They wound through the castle toward the garden. "You shouldn't go alone. She knows that. And I know that."

"I am perfectly capable of retrieving a woman from captivity."

Cate stepped into the bright sunshine. "I'm certain you are. But you shouldn't do it alone. And you don't have to." She offered him a smile.

The corners of his lips turned up before he let go of her hand and stretched his out. "Ready?"

She nodded. He opened the portal, and they traveled to the French Chateau in 1911.

Cate shivered as she arrived in the cold. Snow fell around her, and she wrapped her arms around her midriff. Marcus arrived a moment later. He removed his jacket and draped it around her arms.

"Thanks," she said, thrusting her arms through the sleeves and wrapping tighter in the folds of fabric as they stalked to the front door.

"Stay behind me."

"With your track record with The Agency maybe you should stay behind me."

Marcus shot her a glance, and she grinned at him. "I will never live down these instances, will I?"

"No. I feel pretty good about rescuing you twice," she said as they stepped into the empty house.

"Do you think anyone is here? In my visions, I heard things."

"It appears not," Marcus said as he scanned the rooms.

"Can you see through walls?"

He shot her a confused glance. "No."

"Oh, it would have been convenient."

"Sorry to disappoint," he said, leading her past a doorway as he peered inside.

"It's okay. I'll forgive you."

"The house seems empty," Marcus said after a glance into another room.

"Should we head up to the room?"

"I don't like this."

"You think it's a trap?" Cate inquired as they stared up the stairs leading to the second story.

Marcus narrowed his eyes. "I don't know, but I want you to stay close to me."

Cate looped her arm through his and nodded. Together, they climbed the stairs. Marcus glanced down both sides of the hall before he inched toward the room where they'd found Gertrude's bracelet in 1956.

Cate swallowed hard, tightening her grip on his arm as she glanced up at him.

He stopped. "Do you sense something?"

She shook her head. "No."

He tugged his arm from her grip and slid it around her shoulders, pulling her closer to him. She leaned into his chest as they approached the yellow room. They crept toward the partially open door. Cate peered in through the crack. A woman sat slumped in a chair in the room's center.

"There she is."

Marcus held her back. "Wait."

Cate's heart thudded as she stared at the woman. So close, yet still so far. She pressed her lips together as Marcus reached for the door. It creaked on its hinges as he pushed it open. Cate held her breath as she scanned the room, then flicked her gaze to him.

He nodded, and they proceeded inside. Cate hurried toward Gertrude and knelt in front of her. "Gertrude?"

She pressed two fingers to the woman's neck. "She has a pulse."

She glanced down at the ties around her wrist before she tugged at them. "We need to get her out of here."

Marcus crossed to the window and peered out before he approached Cate. With a touch, he burned away the rope holding Gertrude. She flopped forward, nearly toppling out of the chair before Cate righted her.

"Do you think she'll be okay?"

"She is likely drugged. We can take her to Rosenberg to assess her before returning her to Dunhaven."

Cate nodded as she stood. Footsteps sounded in the hall. Cate snapped her head toward them as Marcus tugged her back and shoved her behind him.

"Well, well, well," Gianna said as she strode stiffly into the room, "if it isn't our little mouse who could roar."

CHAPTER 35

Marcus wrapped an arm around Cate and reached for Gertrude. “I wouldn’t do that if I were you,” Elliott said before he could touch her.

Marcus flicked his eyebrows up in question. “I don’t see why not. We’ve won.”

He pressed a hand against the woman as he held Cate tightly. She expected to disappear from the room and reappear in Rosenberg, but they remained at Cinderella Chateau. Marcus’s brow furrowed slightly.

“She’s laced with anti-magic powder,” Gianna said. “If you touch her, you’re rendered powerless for a few moments.”

“I tried to warn you,” Elliott said. “But you did not listen. As you did not earlier, Duchess.”

Cate glared at him as he stepped toward the window and stared outside. “Though despite all that, I am quite glad to have this opportunity to speak again.”

Gianna offered a less-than-impressed glance at him as she settled her arms over her chest. “I’d rather just kill you and be done with it.”

Elliott twisted and wagged a finger at her. “Gianna.”

“Is that not your plan?” Cate questioned.

“It is not. Your earlier escape coupled with the coup you pulled at Eldinbury Castle only makes me want you in our fold more. Between your husband’s power and your resourcefulness, you’d make quite a strong addition to the team.”

“I think not,” Marcus answered.

“Let’s let the past be the past, shall we? Surely, we can find a way to work together toward a common goal.”

“There are no goals The Agency has that Catherine and I wish to be a part of.”

“Are you going to let him speak for you?” Gianna asked Cate.

“I agree completely with his statement.”

“Do you?” she asked as she sauntered around the room. “Are you certain? Perhaps you’d like to reconsider. It is likely you who will suffer the most in this war.”

Cate lifted her chin and sucked in a breath. “I am certain.”

“I guess stranding you in 1805 wasn’t severe enough. Don’t worry, I’ll find something that is.”

“Is there really no way to convince you?” Elliott asked.

“None,” Marcus assured him.

“I wouldn’t be so sure. People can do all sorts of things when they are pushed to their limits,” Gianna taunted.

Elliott spun to face them, his hands clasped behind his back. He sighed and shook his head. “I suppose then, there is nothing left to do here. Go ahead, Gianna, finish her.”

Gianna lifted her skirt and withdrew a knife from her boot.

“No!” Cate shouted, tearing herself away from Marcus and standing between Gianna and Gertrude.

Gianna’s lips curled into a smile. “Oh, you’ve made this easy.” She reached out and grabbed hold of Cate’s wrist, flicking a finger across the ring she wore on her right hand.

The room disappeared from sight, replaced by a barren landscape lit only by a cold winter sun.

“Welcome to the 1600s, Cate. Have fun. Ta!” Gianna backed a step away, waving a hand at her as she giggled and disappeared.

Cate scrunched her nose as she fished the timepiece from under her dress. The button dangled on the chain next to it. With an annoyed sigh, she grabbed it and rubbed a finger across it. She reappeared in the room next to Marcus as he launched a fireball at Elliott.

“Ah, there you are, dear. Just in time.”

“What?” Gianna questioned as Marcus tossed a fireball at her, knocking the knife from her hand. It skittered across the floor, landing in a dark corner as she cried out from the sting.

She wrinkled her nose and set her jaw, diving at Cate again. They disappeared from the room and reappeared in a new location.

“Let’s try the 1500s and see if that sticks.” Gianna shoved her back a few steps before she disappeared.

Cate shook her head, scrunching her features as she used the button to return to Marcus. “That’s becoming tedious.”

“Why are you back?” Gianna growled through clenched teeth as she dove toward Cate again.

They disappeared for a third time. When they reappeared in their new location, Gianna shoved Cate backward. She stumbled a few steps before plopping on the ground. “Perhaps 1743 will suit you better.”

She disappeared again, leaving Cate in the middle of another time period. With a grumble, she climbed to her feet and returned to 1911.

“Really, you should stop this, Gianna,” Marcus said as he pinned Elliott against the wall with a beam of light. “You can’t win.”

“I’m not a quitter,” she said, reaching for Cate again. Marcus shot a fireball her way, and she danced backward away from it.

Cate narrowed her eyes at the woman before she reached for her. “My turn.” She slid the ring from a still-stunned Gianna’s finger and flicked a finger across it. The room faded, replaced by a field overlooking a small town. Cate stepped away from her. “Welcome to Spain circa 1492.”

She rubbed her hand across the button and snapped back to the room with Marcus. Elliott gasped out a breath as Marcus let up on his assault.

“Catherine? Are you all right?”

“Yes,” she said, tugging the ring from her finger and placing it in his palm. “You can add this to your collection. Now you have two time-travel devices.”

“Where is Gianna?” Elliott gasped.

Cate flicked her gaze to Marcus. “Did she tell you where I was?”

The corners of Marcus’s lips curled up. “No.”

“Then I won’t tell you,” she said to Elliott. “Open the time portal. Let’s go home.”

“You can’t,” Elliott said with a groan as he tried to climb to his feet. Marcus dropped him back to his knees with a small fireball. “You can’t touch her and open it. You’re stuck. Stranded here with only conventional means to travel.”

“Open the portal,” Cate said as she tugged Gertrude up to stand. “I’ll take her through myself.”

“There’s too much danger of you becoming stuck inside.”

“Then location hop to Rosenberg, and I’ll follow with this,” she said, dangling the button on the chain.

“I will not leave you alone with him.”

Cate sucked in a breath and stared at him. “We have to do something. Can I get rid of the anti-magic stuff?”

“I am beginning to understand why you married her,” Elliott said as he used the windowsill to climb to his feet.

Cate shook her head at the man.

“I would suggest you take your leave, Elliott. We are finished here.” Marcus lifted the man from his feet and tossed him out the door before slamming it shut.

Cate followed the man as he flew by before she flicked her gaze back to Marcus. “Now what? We have to do something.”

“There is no good option,” Marcus answered.

“Well, we have to pick the best option,” Cate answered, tapping her foot on the floor. “We can’t leave her here.”

“Yes, I know, but I am not willing to risk your safety to take her. You cannot carry her through the entire portal, and I will not leave you here alone.”

“I can do it. Just give me a little extra time before you come through.”

”Catherine—“

“Marcus, there is no other choice. We have to—” Cate dropped Gertrude into the chair and grabbed her forehead.

“Catherine? Are you all right?”

Images flashed in front of her again as she groaned and sucked in a sharp breath. “Yes. I’m fine, but I’m having another vision.”

Marcus pressed his lips into a thin line. “We cannot stay here much longer.”

Cate squeezed her eyes closed for a moment before she righted herself. “The time portal is the best option. Just hold it open long enough for me to get through with her.”

Marcus shook his head. “I don’t like this, Catherine.”

“Neither do I. In fact, I’m a little worried, but there isn’t another option. And I trust you.”

He narrowed his eyes at her as he outstretched his arms. "Flattery will get you nowhere."

"Seems like it got me a portal back to Rosenberg Palace," she said with a cheeky grin.

He clicked his tongue at her. "Be careful, Catherine. One slip—"

"I know," she said as she tugged Gertrude up and slipped her arms around her chest.

The winds began to whip in the room as the portal opened. Cate glanced over her shoulder at the black opening. She dragged Gertrude backward into the darkness.

The absence of light surrounded her for far longer than she was used to. She bit into her lower lip as she hauled the limp woman through the portal. She continued backward, worrying that she might be stuck when warmth finally heated her back.

She twisted, squinting at the bright sunshine overhead when she stepped into the garden. She dragged Gertrude back a few more steps away from the portal and laid her on the lawn.

With a press of her two fingers to the woman's throat, she detected a pulse. Cate blew out a sigh of relief and turned to eye the portal. Where was Marcus? Another moment passed, and she rose to her feet. Still nothing.

Her heart pounded harder as the portal continued to swirl. She clasped her hands, wringing them. A moment later, he stepped through and the portal snapped shut behind him.

She heaved another sigh. "There you are."

"I wanted to leave you plenty of time."

"I had more than enough time. Then I started to worry you weren't coming."

"How is she?" Marcus asked as he dropped to a knee next to Gertrude.

"Her pulse is still weak, but she seems okay."

"We'll have Mother look at her," Marcus said as he scooped Gertrude into his arms.

Cate followed him inside. "I'll find your mother."

"Tell her we are in the crystal room."

Cate nodded as they parted ways. She hurried through the halls and down the main stairs, pushing into the sitting room. Anna sipped tea as she continued to peruse The Agency's properties.

“Catherine,” she said with a flick of her eyebrows toward her hairline. “Is everything all right? Did you find Gertrude?”

“Yes. She’s been drugged. Could you have a look?”

“Of course,” Anna said as she slid the saucer onto the coffee table. “Did you run into any trouble?”

Cate swallowed hard and fluttered her eyelashes as they strode into the foyer. “A little. You can always count on Gianna to make trouble.”

Anna stopped on the first step and grabbed Cate’s hand. “Are you all right?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod, “we are both fine. I...”

“Yes? What happened? Did she harm you?”

“I stranded her in 1492.”

Anna slid her head forward as her jaw fell open. “You did what?”

“I know I shouldn’t have, but—”

“But nothing. Bravo, Catherine. You really are quite clever. I am so pleased with Marcus’s choice in you.”

Heat rose in Cate’s cheeks as Anna tugged her up the stairs. She changed the course of the conversation. “They’re in the crystal room.”

Anna pulled her along through the halls before she pushed into a bedroom. Gertrude lay on the bed as Marcus stared out the window.

“Careful,” he said as they entered, “she is covered in anti-magic powder.”

Anna’s eyebrows shot up. “I suppose that explains some of what I’ve heard about your trip to rescue her.”

Cate crossed to him, slipping her hand in his as Anna assessed Gertrude.

“Mother, perhaps gloves would be appropriate.”

She fluttered her hand at him. “I am not planning on doing magic in the next quarter of an hour.”

Anna peeled up an eyelid and studied the pupil. “Would you care to share how you stranded Gianna in the 1400s, Catherine?”

Marcus arched an eyebrow. “Is that where you put her?”

“Yes. She kept using that ring to dump me in various times and locations. I finally got it off her hand and stuck her in the 1400s.”

“Excellent work. She is undoubtedly resourceful enough that she will find her way back. She is like a cat,” Marcus answered.

Anna straightened and faced them. “Gertrude is merely asleep. I’ll remove the anti-magic and monitor her. You two should go back for Mr.

Reid.”

Cate crinkled her forehead.

“She will be fine here. Go find your friend, dear.”

Cate grabbed her mother-in-law’s hand and squeezed. “Thank you.”

Anna kissed her cheek and pulled her into an embrace. “Be careful, dear.” She flicked her gaze to Marcus. “Take care of her.”

“Always,” Marcus answered as he took Cate’s hand in his and led her from the room.

Cate blew out a breath as they snaked through the halls for yet another trip to the past. “I hope we find him quickly. Then this whole mess can be over.”

Marcus offered no comment until they stepped into the garden. “Ready?”

She nodded, and he opened the portal. They arrived in the same garden over a century earlier and entered the castle. “Why don’t you wait—”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

Marcus drew in a breath as he considered his response.

“I’m not going to wait in my bedroom. You said you had people looking for him. When can we expect to hear from them?”

“I returned us to a few moments before Stefano is due back. He should meet us in the sitting room.”

“Okay, let’s go.” Cate led the way down the hall as Marcus hesitated. She spun to face him. “You coming?”

“Catherine, I think you should wait for me to discuss this with Stefano and then we’ll—”

“No. You can’t cut me out of the information. We’ve discussed this.”

He closed the gap between them and slid a lock of hair behind her ear. “I don’t wish you to be upset.”

She furrowed her brow. “Upset?” Her eyes grew wide, and tears stung them. “You think...”

“With any luck, he has been found. If not, we will find him. But there is no need for you to know the details of it if you find it worrisome.”

She set her jaw and blinked her tears away. “I’ll be fine.”

She took a step away from him before she twisted to face him again. “We’ll find him, right? You promised.”

He offered her a half-smile. “I did. And I always keep my promises.”

She returned his expression and slid her hand into his. They made their way downstairs to the sitting room. Stefano paced the space, already awaiting them.

“News?” Marcus asked as he strode inside.

Stefano clutched at his hat. “There’s a problem.”

Cate’s heart sank, and her stomach turned.

“I do not like to hear those words,” Marcus answered as he stalked to the drink cart and poured two brandies. He handed one to Cate before he took a sip of his own. “What is it?”

“He’s gone.”

Cate stiffened at the words.

Marcus slipped an arm around her and rubbed her shoulder. “Explain.”

“We searched near where you told us. We found the horses. But no Reid. He’s gone.” The man winced as he raised his eyes to Marcus. “He’s gone.”

CHAPTER 36

“What?” Cate questioned, her eyes wide. “What do you mean he’s gone? He can’t be gone.”

She snapped her gaze to Marcus, her features pinching as she stared at him.

“We’ll find him,” Marcus said, rubbing her shoulder.

“How? I’d like to believe that, but...” She pressed a hand to her forehead as her features pinched. “How?”

Marcus tugged her brandy glass from her hand and set it on a side table before guiding her to the sofa. “Sit down, dear.” He offered her the glass again. “We will find him.”

Cate popped up a moment later, the liquid in the glass sloshing wildly enough to nearly spill over the top. “Again, I ask how? What if he’s gone? What if The Agency took him again? What if they moved him to another time period?”

“Catherine, you are panicking over what may be nothing. The Agency seemed fully interested in you alone. I doubt they bothered with Mr. Reid after they abandoned him.”

“Then where is he, Marcus?”

“Wandering. Perhaps the horses got away from him whilst he slept.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped, and she collapsed onto the sofa. “Oh, Jack.”

Marcus rubbed a hand across her back. “We will find him, Catherine.” He cut his gaze to Stefano. “You checked the area near the horses?”

“In a fairly wide radius. Nothing.”

Cate groaned, letting her head fall into her hand.

“Do you have the horses?”

Stefano nodded. “We brought them back with us. Why?”

“They may offer us some clue. Take me to them.”

Cate rose to her feet.

“You wait here,” Marcus said.

“No, I want to go.”

“Catherine, there is no need. You are upset. I can look over the horses myself.”

Cate slammed the brandy glass onto the side table. “I’m going, too.”

Marcus fluttered his eyelashes. “All right. Come along.”

Stefano led the group from the room to the stables, speaking to one of the stablehands who showed them to two stalls with the horses.

Cate stared at the steed that had carried her through the battle before she moved on to the next one. “This was Jack’s.”

“Where are the saddles?” Marcus asked the stablehand.

He pointed to them, and Marcus squatted to study them. Cate looked them over from above while petting the horse’s nose. “Nothing is missing. None of the weapons. Nothing.”

She pressed a hand against her head again. “He’s out there with nothing.”

Marcus heaved a sigh as he rose to stand. Cate reached for the saddle to double-check the weapons. Her hand swept across the fastener, and a rushed image formed in her mind. She snapped her hand back.

“Catherine? What is it?”

“There’s something on the saddle that’s giving me a vision.” She dropped to her knees and reached for it again.

“Careful, Catherine. We do not want you to overdo it.”

“This could be Jack’s life.”

He squatted down, knocking her hand away. “I understand, but it does us no good if you are unconscious and cannot communicate anything about his location.”

Cate sat back on her heels as he searched the saddle. He tugged a scrap of fabric from the clasp and held it up.

“It must be a piece of his uniform. Well, his stolen uniform. I hope that doesn’t matter.”

“It seems your visions are tied to people you care for, so I would highly doubt it’s about a random French soldier. It must relate to Mr. Reid.”

Cate reached for it, and he tugged it away. “Do not overdo it.”

She nodded. “I won’t. But we need a clue.”

Marcus set the shred of fabric in her palm. Images began to form in her mind, racing past as she tried to focus on any details. They rushed past too quickly for her to make sense of. The tension built at her temples. She dropped the fabric before she passed out, gasping for breath.

“Anything?”

She shook her head as a lump formed in her throat. “It was too fast. I’ll try again.”

“No,” Marcus said, grabbing the fabric piece before she could. “You cannot try again yet. You’ll exhaust yourself and find nothing.”

“We don’t have time for this,” she said, clenching her fists.

“What we do not have time for is you to pass out trying to find him. The search will stall, and we will waste precious time.”

Cate’s face fell as she realized he was correct. “Maybe your mother can hypnotize me.”

“That would be an option if I knew where exactly my mother was at the moment.”

“You don’t know?”

Marcus rose to stand. “She is traveling. She could be anywhere.”

Cate pounded a fist against the ground. “You hypnotize me.”

“Hypnosis is not one of my many skills.”

Cate buried her face in her hands. “We have to do something.”

“Let’s return to the palace and discuss our options.” He offered her his hand. She heaved a sigh before she accepted it and climbed to her feet. Tears stung her eyes as they returned to the castle and pushed inside.

“You should—”

“Don’t even say rest. I can’t rest. I have to keep trying.”

“Catherine,” Marcus began with a sigh, “you cannot continue this until you pass out or worse.”

She pressed a hand against his lapel. “Trying in the stables was probably a terrible idea. I can do better. I just need to relax and remember my happy memory. And my music box would be nice.”

“I will retrieve it for you.”

Cate nodded as he stepped away. She grabbed his elbow before he took another step and winced. "And my rose."

He smiled at her. "Of course, dear. I won't be but a moment."

Cate offered a fleeting smile before he strode away before she wrung her hands as she paced the floor. She made two passes before her nervous energy drove her to the upstairs library. She pushed into the room and crossed to the book with information on her condition.

She pulled it open as she wandered to the desk, skimming the information in search of best practices or tips she could use to make the process easier.

Her finger traced the words as she whispered them aloud. "Remaining calm and relaxed when the visions press in is vital to information processing. Yeah, right. Easier said than done."

She continued to scan down the page. "Beginner clairvoyants often find visions painful as their mind attempts to block them. Even happy memories can be taxing on them. With practice, visions can become less frenzied."

She let her hand thud against the desk. "Yes, but how much practice? And how can I make it less painful?"

She flipped the page in search of more information. "Reminding oneself of happy memories, in particular, happy future memories can ease the pain of visions. When the visions push in, forcing your mind to turn to a happy vision can slow them and make processing easier."

Cate raised her eyes from the book and stared into space. She had one happy vision she could use. In her hypnosis, it was her safe place. Would it matter if the event would never occur?

The doors creaked open and Marcus strode inside. "I thought I may find you here."

"I was looking for more information to help with my visions."

"I expected nothing less," he said with a smile as he crossed to her. "Are you ready to try again?"

"Yes," she said as she slammed the book shut. "Did you get both the music box and the rose?"

"I did, yes. I put them in your room."

"Okay. Let's see if I can make sense of any of these visions."

They traversed the halls to the sapphire room. Cate pushed inside, finding her music box and her rose on the nightstand. She studied them as she eased onto the bed and opened the lid of the piano. Tinkling music filled the room. She lifted the glass off the top of the display case and grabbed the rose.

Her fingers caressed the petals, and she slid her eyes closed. Memories floated by as tension built at her temples. She sought the one clear memory she'd conjured previously. It floated by and her mind slowed. The tension released in her temples.

She opened her eyes as the vision continued. She'd managed to control this one. Could she do it again with the fabric scrap?

With a reluctant sigh, she returned the rose to its case and slid the glass over it. She settled back into the pillows and held out her hand. "Okay, I'm ready."

"Do not push too far. You can try again later if you must." He dangled the fabric over her upturned palm before he dropped it into her hand.

Memories rushed past and tension built in her as she struggled to make sense of them. Images stormed through her mind. She tried to find the happy memory. She forced her mind to search for it. Pain built across her forehead. She fought to ignore it, searching for one detail that could lead them to Jack.

Loud noise deafened her as she sought information. She gritted her teeth as the pain ramped up. The visions stopped suddenly, and everything went black.

She snapped her eyes open and shifted her gaze to Marcus. "You're pushing too far," he said as he slid the fabric into his pocket. "Did you see anything we can work from?"

She shook her head. "It went too fast. I heard something like thunder, but I couldn't make out what it was."

She slammed her fists against the bed. "Okay, let me try again."

"Absolutely not," he answered. "You must wait longer."

"We don't have time to wait," Cate insisted. "I can try again."

"Catherine, this is not a discussion. You will wait." He settled into the chair next to her bed.

She collapsed back into the pillows with a sigh, drumming her fingers against the bed. She banged her head into the soft pillow. "Just let me try again."

"No. You will not convince me. Why don't we have tea?"

Cate huffed as he pulled the cord on the wall to summon the servants. "Tea is not going to help."

“Tea always helps. Ask Mother.”

“Millions of Americans would disagree.”

“Too bad you married a Brit,” he said with a cheeky grin. The maid hurried inside and Marcus requested tea. She curtsied before she scurried from the room, returning shortly after with a tray.

Cate sipped the warm liquid as anxiety built in her. She polished off the drink in a few sips and slid the saucer onto her nightstand. “Okay, I’m done. Let me try again.”

“I have barely taken one sip, Catherine.”

“I can’t help that you’re a slow tea drinker.”

“Tea is meant to be enjoyed not inhaled.” He poured her another cup and handed the saucer to her.

She snatched it from him and sipped it. “Happy?”

“Infinitely,” he answered.

She sucked in a breath, taking another sip and forcing the warm liquid down as she waited to try again. Her muscles relaxed, and her apprehension eased. Perhaps Marcus was right about the tea.

He finished his cup, and she took the last sips of hers.

“How are you feeling, dear?” he asked as he set their saucers on the tray.

She fluttered her eyelashes and yawned. “Tired.”

“Perhaps you should sleep before we try again.”

“No, I—” she said as she struggled to keep her eyes open. The music box played as she let her head fall back into the pillows. “Maybe just a few minutes.”

Her eyes slid shut and blackness replaced her view of the room. Music droned on, sounding further and further away until she slipped to sleep.

* * *

Images floated past her as she stood in a dark space. “Hello?” she called out, her voice echoing off the emptiness.

Loud noises whisked by along with more blurry visions. “Where am I?”

She tried to make sense of the things that scurried along but she failed.

“These are visions,” she said to herself. “I need to see them.”

She chewed her lower lip, attempting to make the pictures move slower. She couldn't. Her breathing turned ragged and her heart pounded. She recalled the passage in the book. She closed her eyes and forced her mind to recall the happy visions. Her breathing slowed, and her pulse returned to normal.

The image of her suite at an unidentified moment in the future appeared. She smiled as the memory filled her with warmth. Her eyes slid open, and she stared at the image stuck in front of her.

"Jack," she breathed. Her heart skipped a beat, and the image skittered. "No!"

Her hands shook as the image flickered again. She pressed her lips together, forcing her mind to the happy vision.

The picture of Jack glowed to life again. She blew out a slow breath as she stepped toward it. "Where are you?"

She studied the details. He wore the French uniform. He stood inside a tent. His hands were bound. She reached a finger toward him. The image rippled as she touched it before it sprang to life. She stumbled back a step as it played like a movie.

"No, I don't understand. I can't understand you. I'm not French," Jack shouted.

Someone spoke in another language.

Jack shook his head. "I can't understand. I'm not French. I stole these clothes. I'm sorry, but I'm not French."

A new voice entered the conversation, unseen to Cate. Someone spoke French again, and the new voice replied in English. "You have been found guilty of deserting the army with stolen arms. The crime is punishable by death. You will be hanged at sunrise."

"What? No!" Jack began when the memory began to fade.

Cate's eyes went wide as she stared at the paling vision. "No! No!"

It disappeared as her body shook. She tried to search for the future memory again but it was gone. Her body shook again, and the blackness around her faded.

"Catherine, wake up," a voice called.

She snapped open her eyes, finding the sapphire room around her, and Marcus hovering over her, his hands wrapped firmly around her shoulders. "Catherine? Are you all right?"

She grasped his lapel, balling it in her fist. “I know where Jack is and if we don’t hurry, he’s going to be killed.”

CHAPTER 37

“Slow down, Catherine,” Marcus said. “What did you see?”

“Jack. I saw him. I saw a vision. It worked.” She sat up, her heart racing from the experience.

“Easy, dear. Take a deep breath, then tell me what you saw.”

Cate swallowed hard, grabbing his arm. “The visions came when I fell asleep. They were racing, but I slowed them. I saw him. I saw Jack.”

“Where?”

“He’s with the French army again. They must have found him. They accused him of deserting.” She gripped his arm tighter. “Marcus, they’re going to hang him at daybreak.”

She flicked her gaze outside to the setting sun. Her stomach turned over.

“All right. I will find him.”

“I’m coming, too.”

“I would argue, but I doubt I’ll win.”

“You won’t,” she said as she swung her legs over the edge of the bed. “And I’ll be fine. I’ll be with you, right?”

“Is that trust I detect in your voice?”

She offered him an amused smile as she rose. “It just might be. Come on, let’s go.”

“We’ll use a portal to go to Austerlitz after dark.”

“After dark?” she asked as she hurried along with him to the garden. “Why not now?”

"I would prefer not to appear on the fringes of the French army in nearly broad daylight."

Cate arched an eyebrow at him. "Good point. Okay, night it is."

They strode into the garden. Instead of opening the portal, Marcus spun to face her. "Before we go, there are some rules."

"Rules?" Cate asked, furrowing her brow.

"Stay with me at all times. Do not go off on your own. Do not disappear anywhere out of my sight. I don't care how strong of an urge you have to find Mr. Reid, we do not separate."

"Okay," she said with a nod.

He arched an eyebrow.

She lifted her shoulders in a partial shrug. "I said okay."

"I want to be sure it sinks in."

Cate tugged her lips back in a grimace. "The last time I was in that camp, Napoleon thought I was his prostitute, and then I got shoved into a regiment to fight. I have no desire to go anywhere alone while there."

"Good." Marcus stretched out his arms and opened the portal. Cate stepped inside once it opened, walking through the blackness into a dark night. She wrung her hands as she waited for Marcus.

He appeared moments later, and she breathed a sigh of relief as he wrapped his arm around her. "How will we find him?"

An owl hooted in the distance. Marcus pulled Cate closer to him before he stalked toward the noise, calling back to it. Cate squashed her eyebrows together as the bird landed on his outstretched arm.

"Why?" she managed.

He tugged a feather from the bird before he whispered a few words in its ear. When he lifted his arm, the owl fluttered off and sailed into the camp.

Marcus waved the feather in the air. An image formed in the air. Cate's eyes went wide as she stared at the bird's eye view of the camp.

"Is that..."

"Yes," Marcus answered. "Our feathered friend can spy for us."

A smile crossed her lips as she glanced up at him before refocusing her attention on the aerial image. "Too bad he can't see in the tents."

"Jack is a criminal. He will be guarded. We look for the tent with soldiers stationed in front."

"Right," Cate said as she leaned closer to him.

“Are you cold, dear?” He removed his jacket and wrapped her in it before he pulled her closer to him.

“There,” she said after tugging her arms into his jacket. “A tent with guards.”

“So it is. Come along.” He wrapped her hand in his and tugged her toward the camp. They snaked through the tents, careful to remain unseen.

“What’s the plan when we reach the prisoner tent? Are you going to blast them or what?”

“Blast them?”

Cate flicked her gaze to him, mimicking his summoning of a fireball with her hand. “You know, with the fireball thing.”

“That would draw far too much attention. I shall need to be more subtle.”

She nodded as they approached the tent. “Oh, the magic sleep thing.”

“Go into the tent as soon as I disable the first guard and find him. I will join you as soon as I’ve disposed of the second.”

“Okay.” She followed Marcus as he darted around the side of the tent and knocked one guard out with a touch. Cate slipped into the tent as the other guard shouted. His voice cut off as she scanned the dark space. “Jack? Jack, are you here?”

“Cate?”

“Jack!” she exclaimed, following the sound of his voice.

“Cate! How did you get here?” he questioned in the dark.

Bright light bloomed a moment later as Marcus stepped into the tent and lit it with a fireball that hovered above his hand.

“Oh, good, you found him.”

Cate hurried to Jack’s side as he rose to sit on his cot. She stared at the shackles around his hands and feet before she flicked a glance at Marcus. “Can you get rid of these?”

“Of course.”

With one quick blast, both sets fell away, freeing Jack. Cate threw her arms around him. “I was so worried when they found the horses without you.”

“How did you get away?”

Cate pulled away from him. “Carefully.”

“We should go,” Marcus said.

Cate nodded and stood, tugging Jack up with her.

“I assume you took care of the guard outside, though I’m not certain what will happen if I wander through the camp like this again. Maybe no one will recognize me, but—”

“I think we’ll take the shortcut.” Marcus extinguished the fireball before he wrapped an arm around Cate and clamped a hand onto Jack’s wrist. The confines of the tent faded away, replaced by momentary blackness before Cate’s room at Rosenberg replaced it.

Cate breathed a sigh of relief, letting her head rest against Marcus’s shoulder for a moment as she stared at Jack. “Thank goodness that’s over and you’re safe.”

“You, too. Cate, when they took you, I—”

“I know. I felt the same way. But it’s over now.”

“Thank heavens. We can’t waste any more time. We need to find Gertrude.”

“We did,” Cate said as she righted herself. “She’s safe. She is with Anna in 1956.”

“You found her? How?”

“Her bracelet,” Cate explained. “I figured out the date, and we managed to rescue her from The Agency.”

Marcus’s lips curled at the corners as he stroked a lock of her hair. “After Catherine stranded Gianna in the 1400s.”

Jack’s eyes went wide. “You did what? How?”

“I took her little time travel ring that she used to maroon us here off of her finger and left.”

“Good going, Cate,” Jack said with an amused grin. “Let’s hope that’s the end of her.”

“I would highly doubt that. As such, we should return to 1956, return Gertrude to Dunhaven, speak with her about the importance of not changing her will, and then go home. Undoubtedly, The Agency will already be concocting the next plan.”

“These people are like cats. They never stop.”

“And I doubt they will for quite some time,” Marcus said. “They did not grow into the organization that they are by giving up.”

Jack blew out a long breath and frowned. “Right. I guess we’d better get at it then.”

“Are you sure you can manage it?” Cate questioned. “This must have worn you out. You’re still recovering from the temporalysis.”

“I’m okay,” Jack said with a nod. “It’s fine. I can make it.”

“Are you sure? Jack, I don’t want to risk your health.”

“I’m sure. I’m strong as an ox, I promise. I’ve been milking it at Dunhaven so I don’t hear it from Molly and Mrs. Fraser.”

Cate chuckled.

“Then we should go,” Marcus answered. He stretched his arms when Cate batted them down.

“Stop opening time portals inside.”

Marcus heaved a sigh and shot her a sideways glance. “You are as bad as Mother.”

“I don’t want the room wrecked. Oh, wait, my rose and music box. I should take them back.” She crossed to the nightstand to retrieve both before they made their way to the garden. Marcus opened the portal, and they returned to 1956.

After snaking through the castle halls, they arrived in the crystal bedroom. Cate set her keepsakes on the dresser as she walked in. Anna still tended to Gertrude who remained asleep.

“Ah, Marcus, Catherine, you have returned triumphant.”

“Yes,” Cate said as she approached the sleeping woman. “We found him. I managed to work through a vision while asleep that led us to his location.”

A smile spread across Anna’s face. “Progress. Excellent. You are a fast learner.”

Cate returned her expression before she sank onto the edge of the bed and pulled Gertrude’s hand into hers. “How is she?”

“Perfectly fine. I have kept her asleep until you returned, however, I can wake her if you’d like to speak with her.”

“Yes, I would like that very much,” Cate answered.

Marcus kissed the top of her head. “I will leave you to discuss the matter with her alone, dear.”

“Ah, I’d like to stay,” Jack said, stepping forward. He glanced down at his clothes. “Oh, I hope I don’t frighten her.”

“She’s a time traveler, I think she’ll be okay,” Cate said with a chuckle. “And I think you should stay. She should know both of us still protect the secret.”

Jack nodded as he hovered behind Cate.

“Come along, Marcus. There are a few things I would like to discuss with you.”

Marcus gave his mother the slightest of flinches before he grabbed Cate’s hand and squeezed. “Good luck.”

Anna slid her arm around Marcus’s and tugged him away. “She will awaken in a few moments.”

“Thank you,” Cate said before the door clicked closed. She turned her attention to her ancestor. Jack slid his hand onto her shoulder and squeezed.

She reached back to grab it, threading her fingers through his as Gertrude’s eyes fluttered open. She sucked in a gasp, a fearful expression twisting her features.

“It’s okay, Gertrude,” Cate said, squeezing her hand. “You’re safe now.”

“Who are you?” the woman demanded. She flicked her gaze to Jack, her brow furrowing. “Is that...is that Jackie Reid?”

“Aye,” he said, circling the bed and plopping onto the side across from Cate. “It’s me, Lady MacKenzie.”

“But you—”

“Left, I know. My father died, and I came back. I worked for you for the last six months of your life.” He flicked his gaze to Cate. “Cate’s the owner of Dunhaven now.”

Gertrude studied her. “And you know the secret.”

“I figured it out pretty quickly, actually,” she said with a slight chuckle.

“So did those people,” Gertrude said, her face pinching again.

“The Agency. I know. They were at Dunhaven in 1942 during the war. They have been trying to get control of the castle ever since.”

Gertrude licked her lips, her brows pinching.

“Which is why we need you to change your will again. There’s a clause that requires me to be married—”

“I know. I didn’t want to put it in, but they forced me. It was all I could do to resist giving in to that wretched woman’s so-called agency.”

“I understand. But when we return you to Dunhaven, you must call Mr. Smythe and change the will. Please.”

She snapped a panicked glance at Cate. “Has Dunhaven been lost?”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. She lifted her left hand. “I’m married. But I wasn’t. We nearly didn’t catch it in time to correct things.”

“I’m sorry, dear. I tried my hardest—”

“It’s not your fault,” Cate said, patting her hand.

Gertrude shifted her gaze to Jack. "Are you..."

"No," Jack said, understanding the question without her needing to finish. "She's married to someone who can help us win against these horrible people."

"I see. Dunhaven must never be lost to them."

"We're working on that," Cate said with a smile.

Gertrude tugged one corner of her lips back as she cupped Cate's face in her hands. "You look so much like a MacKenzie. I am sorry we never met. Your father thought keeping you away would protect you."

Cate grabbed her hand and squeezed. "We're meeting now. And I'm glad for it. I just wish it had been under better circumstances."

Gertrude smiled and pushed herself higher on the bed as she glanced around the room. "Where are we?"

"Rosenberg Palace in Germany," Cate answered.

"Germany?" she questioned. "However did we get here? I believe they held me in France."

"They did. This is my husband's home. One of them," Cate answered.

Gertrude arched an eyebrow at her. "I see. Well, it seems you have the matter well in hand. I suppose we should return to Dunhaven, and I should get on with my end."

"There's no need to rush. If you feel tired..."

"I'm not ancient. I'm still in good shape. I do not need to rest like a child," Gertrude said.

Cate suppressed a chuckle at the woman's words, so very like her own protestations at times. "All right. I'll find Marcus. He can return us to Dunhaven."

Gertrude offered her a sharp nod of approval as Cate and Jack rose to stand.

"She reminds me of someone," Jack whispered as they made their way across the room to the door. "Where do you think your loving husband is?"

"Sitting room, maybe?"

"Wonder what mummy dearest wanted to talk to him about?" Jack asked as they snaked through the halls toward the foyer.

"Maybe about not opening time portals in the house."

Jack arched an eyebrow. "Wonder how Gertrude will take the time portal trip."

“She doesn’t seem afraid of much, so likely better than you,” Cate said, shooting him an amused grin.

“Very funny. Maybe if it wasn’t him opening them, I’d feel better.”

“Doubt it,” they said at the same time as they reached the foyer floor.

Cate crossed to the closed doors and knocked before they pushed inside. “She’s ready.”

“Excellent,” Marcus said. “We will return her to Dunhaven at once.”

Anna rose and crossed to Cate, pulling her into an embrace and kissing her cheek. “Be safe, dear.” She turned to Marcus as he strode across the room. “Take care of her. And think about what I said.”

“Of course, Mother,” he said, kissing her cheek before they left the room.

They collected Gertrude from the crystal bedroom and took her to the garden. After she confirmed the date of her disappearance, Cate explained the new time travel portals to her.

“The portal we use to access other locations is a bit different from the ones you are used to. They are quite chaotic,” Cate explained. “But once you enter, do not stop walking until you see Dunhaven Castle. Otherwise, you may become trapped.”

“I understand, though I do not see the appeal in time travel whatsoever, particularly in this form.”

Cate suppressed a giggle at the statement, shooting a glance at Jack as Marcus opened the portal. When the gale-force winds swirled around them, Cate signaled for Gertrude to enter. Jack followed behind her, then Cate.

Within seconds, bright sunshine surrounded her. She stepped forward to join Jack and Gertrude in the back garden at Dunhaven Castle.

“I never thought I’d see it again.”

Marcus joined them seconds later. “I will wait for you here.”

Cate nodded, and they set off toward the castle. They pushed in through the front door and escorted Gertrude to her bedroom.

“I will call Mr. Smythe today. I hope when you return, everything is corrected.” Gertrude pulled Cate into an embrace.

After a few more words, they parted ways. Cate and Jack hurried from the castle and returned to the garden.

“Finished?” Marcus asked as they rejoined him.

Cate nodded and sucked in a deep breath. “Time to find out if this worked.”

CHAPTER 38

“I hope so. I am afraid to go back and find out. I’m afraid something else will be haywire,” Jack said with a shake of his head.

“I guess it’s better to know as soon as possible,” Cate said with a squeeze of his hand as Marcus opened another portal to their time.

“See you at home, Cate,” Jack said with a nod before he stepped inside.

Cate followed behind him, arriving at Dunhaven Castle nearly fifty years later. She stared up at the relatively unchanged castle with a tentative gaze.

“Time to face the music,” Jack said.

“After we change, of course.

“Of course,” he said with a laugh. “I can’t very well talk to anyone like this.”

“Everyone should still be downstairs. We should have a clear path upstairs,” Cate answered as Marcus joined them.

They closed the distance to the castle, entering through the front door and hurrying up the steps and to their bedrooms to change. Cate eyed the music box on her nightstand as she tugged a cardigan over her tunic. Would she have any more visions, she wondered.

She slid her fingers across the piano’s tiny lid. “I sure hope not. They are not pleasant.”

With a smile at the small box, she spun on a heel and crossed to the sitting room. As she reached the door, she doubled over.

Pain shot across her forehead as images flooded through her mind. She fought to steady them and herself but lost the battle. She collapsed to her knees, clutching her head. Tears formed in her eyes, and her hands trembled as the visions continued. Voices murmured, but she couldn't make sense of them. Blurry figures moved around, but she couldn't make them clear.

As quickly as the sensation hit her, it passed. She sucked in a shaky breath and opened her eyes. She pressed her lips together, struggling to calm her nerves and slow her pounding heart.

A knock sounded at the door, startling her. "Coming," she called, forcing herself to her feet.

The door inched open. "Catherine? Are you all right?"

Cate took a steadying breath as she pulled the door open. He must have detected her pounding heart. "Yes, I'm okay."

"Really?" he asked.

"I had another vision. It took me by surprise. I wasn't prepared for it."

"Did you manage to make sense of any details?"

She shook her head. "No. It was all a blur. I guess I haven't quite caught on to this whole thing yet despite the strides I've made."

He offered her a tight-lipped smile. "I'm certain you will."

"Have you spoken with Mr. Smythe?" she asked as she joined him in the hall.

"Not yet."

"We should find him. With any luck, this whole mess is over."

He offered her another fleeting smile as they strode through the halls and down to the foyer.

Gayle hurried toward them from the library. "Oh, there you are. I'm so glad I found you. Mr. Smythe has requested to speak with you immediately. If you don't mind, I'll fetch the staff as well."

"Thanks, Gayle. Are we meeting in the library?"

"Yes, Jack's already there. I just need the Frasers and Molly." She squeezed Cate's arm before flitting past her to find the other staff members.

"Moment of truth," Cate said with a weak smile as they walked toward the library. She pushed inside, finding Jack in his usual armchair. Mr. Smythe sat opposite him, shuffling papers.

"Oh, good, Gayle found you. Excellent," he said as Cate and Marcus entered.

She shot Jack a hopeful glance, flashing her crossed fingers as she patted his shoulder before making her way to the sofa and perching on it.

The others joined them a few moments later.

“What is it now?” Molly asked as she took a seat next to Cate. “She wants me to also pay for the time I stayed here on vacation?”

“No, thank you all for coming,” Mr. Smythe said. “When I first announced the change in the will, I must admit to having been puzzled to have missed it. After a thorough investigation, we have found that this was not, in fact, Gertrude MacKenzie’s final will and testament. She updated it several years later and removed the marriage clause. The will is identical to the one I presented to you when we met in the States. You are, indeed, the rightful heir to Dunhaven Castle, married or not.”

A collective sigh of relief went up through the room, and Molly rubbed Cate’s shoulders. Cate pressed her lips together as she sucked in a breath and nodded. “Thank you, Mr. Smythe.”

“What about the lawsuit?” Mrs. Fraser asked.

“I am certain that will be dismissed given the new evidence that has come to light. It has no merit whatsoever now as the challenge is meaningless.”

“Oh, thank heavens. So, we are all safe.”

“Indeed, you are. And once again, I must apologize for the situation. I do not know how this could have happened, but I am pleased that we were able to rectify it quickly and as easily as possible despite some trepidation on your part for which I profusely apologize.”

“There’s no need to apologize, Mr. Smythe,” Cate answered. “I’m glad the matter is cleared up. Thank you for your diligence.”

“Well, I suppose this calls for a celebratory dessert tonight,” Mrs. Fraser said as she rose. “You and I had better get baking, Miss Molly.”

Molly sprang to her feet with a grin. “Definitely.” She turned to face Cate. “Congratulations. I’m so glad we don’t have to move.”

“Thank you,” Cate said with a smile.

Mr. Smythe stuffed papers into a folder and rose as Mr. and Mrs. Fraser and Molly left the room. “If you don’t mind, Gayle and I will stay on one more night and head back tomorrow morning.”

“Of course,” Cate answered, “stay as long as you’d like.”

He offered her a slight smile and a nod before he collected his briefcase, and he and Gayle departed.

“Well, I guess it did work,” Jack said as he climbed to his feet. “I can’t believe it, but it did.”

“Thank goodness. One bullet dodged.”

“I don’t want to know what they’ll throw at us next.”

A shiver ran down Cate’s spine as the memory of her vision crept back into her mind. She suppressed a shudder, wrapping her arms around herself as she forced a smile onto her face. “Whatever it is, we’ll face it together.”

“Sounds like a plan.” He shot Marcus a glance before he sucked in a breath. “I think I’ll go snag some biscuits from Mrs. Fraser while I still am considered ill enough to get away with it.”

Cate offered him a genuine smile and a nod. “Okay. Enjoy.”

He shot another glance at Marcus before he strode from the room, pulling the doors shut behind him. Cate blew out a long sigh as she collapsed onto the sofa.

A brandy glass waved in front of her. She accepted it and smiled up at Marcus. “Thanks.” After a sip, she sucked in another breath. “Well, I guess you’re off the hook.”

“Off the hook?” he asked.

“Yeah. I mean, we don’t need to be married anymore. And I’m sure you’d very much like to carry on with your life uninterrupted by the wife you never planned to have.” She forced a smile onto her face and flicked her gaze to him.

He narrowed his eyes at her as he studied her over the rim of his glass.

“Thank you. You didn’t have to do this, but I’m glad you did.”

“You are welcome, Catherine.”

She licked her lips, drumming her fingers against her thigh. “Anyway, I will speak to Mr. Smythe in the morning. He can draw up whatever paperwork is needed, and we can part ways.” She chewed her lower lip as the last words left her lips.

“Catherine—” Marcus began when a knock sounded at the door.

“I should get that,” she said, leaping to stand and setting the brandy glass on the table. She scurried across the room and flung the doors open, racing into the hall as she tried to steady her nerves.

Another knock sounded at the front door. “Coming!” she shouted down the hall.

She rounded the corner and opened one of the doors. Her heart skipped a beat, and she slow-blinked at her visitor who grinned at her.

“Hello, dear,” Anna said as she rolled her bag across the threshold and pressed into the house. “Oh, what a lovely little castle. It’s very cozy.”

Cate stared at the woman, finding no words as she eased the door shut.

Anna studied her expectantly. “Oh, no, I’ve interrupted something.”

Cate recovered her senses, shaking her head and swallowing hard. “No, not at all. I just...”

“Just what, dear?”

“Was in the library, and it took me a minute to get here, is all,” she fibbed before offering a nervous chuckle. “Let me get someone to take your things up to your suite.”

“Oh, lovely, yes, I would like to lie down after that long trip.”

“Right, of course.”

Marcus strode from the hall before she could leave, his brow furrowing. “Mother?”

“Yes, dear. I’ve made it.”

“I see. For what?”

“Catherine’s training, of course. You didn’t think I would abandon her, did you? She is far from mastering these visions. She needs help. And I am here to provide. I’ll stay as long as it takes.” She grinned at them both before she lifted her bag. “Oh, Catherine, never mind the help. I can carry it. If you’ll just show me the way. I hate to be a bother.”

“No bother,” she answered with another nervous giggle. She slicked a lock of hair behind her ear and motioned for Anna to follow her.

“I will take your bag, Mother,” Marcus said, pulling it from her hands and following them.

Cate wound through the halls, leading her to a large suite two halls away from hers. “I hope you’ll find it comfortable.”

“Oh, how lovely. Violet is my favorite color. Thank you, dear. Now, I’d like to rest. If I could just have a tray for dinner, that would be appreciated. I do not wish to cause a ruckus.”

“I will let Mrs. Fraser know. And it’s no bother at all. You’re welcome to join us for dinner.”

“Oh, no, dear, but maybe tomorrow. I’m quite tired.”

Cate smiled and nodded at her before Anna pulled her into another embrace. “Oh, it’s so good to be here, Catherine.”

“It’s good to have you.” She smiled at her and squeezed her arm before she and Marcus left the room.

Cate sucked in a shaky breath as she pulled the doors shut to Anna's room and took a few steps down the hall. She planted a palm against her forehead. "I can't believe this. Did you know she was coming?"

"No, I did not," Marcus said.

Cate let her shoulders slump and squeezed her eyes closed as she shook her head. "What are we going to do?"

"About?"

"Our divorce," Cate said. "We can't get divorced with your mother here."

"I would prefer we did not."

Cate huffed. "She will be devastated. She thinks we're really a couple."

"Technically, we are."

"That's not helpful." She breathed out another sigh as they reached the top of the stairs. "I'm sorry."

"Whatever for?"

She plodded down the stairs next to him. "You're stuck with me for who knows how long now."

"Catherine," he began as they reached the foyer floor, "we should discuss—"

Another knock interrupted his statement. Cate let her head fall back between her shoulder blades as she flung her hands out. "What now?"

She stomped to the door and flung it open, staring at the next visitor on her doorstep. Her brow crinkled as the blonde flipped a lock of hair over her shoulder and slid her sunglasses down. She looked familiar, but Cate couldn't place her.

"Hi," she said in a British accent with a grin as she chomped on her gum.

"Hello, can I help you?"

"I'm here to see Jack Reid."

"Oh," Cate said, the crease between her eyebrows deepening as she stepped back from the door and motioned for the woman to come in. It hit her why the woman appeared familiar. The pictures in Gianna's flat. This was the woman from the pictures. "Come in. May I ask your name?"

"Of course," she said with another grin as her heels clicked across the marble floor. "Amanda Reid. Jack's wife."

Cate stared at the woman as her stomach turned over. What had The Agency done this time?

* * *

THE END

TROUBLE AT DUNHAVEN CASTLE

CHAPTER 1

Cate stood in stunned silence, staring at the blonde woman in the foyer of Dunhaven Castle. Jack's wife? Her mind wouldn't allow her to fully accept what the woman had just told her. Was this some sort of trick by the Agency? Had they done this when they'd held Jack captive?

Her lower lip bobbed up and down as her eyebrows pinched together. She tried to form words, but she couldn't.

Next to her, Marcus recovered more quickly than she could. "Mrs. Reid, how lovely to make your acquaintance. Perhaps you would be more comfortable waiting in the sitting room whilst we fetch your husband."

"That'd be great," she said with a click of her tongue before continuing to chomp on her gum.

Marcus motioned toward the double doors as Cate swallowed hard. She stumbled toward the doors and pushed one open. The woman slid past her, gaping around the room as she entered.

Cate's hand lingered on the doorknob as she stared at the blonde, her eyes still wide. A warm hand wrapped around hers, and the door came closer to her before it slammed in her face.

Fingers touched her chin, twisting her neck sideways. "Catherine, come to your senses. You must find Jack."

"Jack," Cate repeated. "Right." Her gaze fell to the floor as she tried to force her feet to move her forward.

Marcus grabbed her elbow before she made it two steps. "Catherine..."

She flicked her gaze up to him. He shook his head before he slid his arm around her shoulders and led her down the hall to the library.

"I need to find Jack," she said as he shut the doors behind them.

"Mrs. Reid seems to be in no hurry," he answered as he crossed the room and poured a brandy. "Though I would check the room for valuables afterwards."

He held it out to her as she stared at the pattern on the area rug under the leather armchairs.

"Take it, Catherine. You need it."

She gingerly lifted the glass from his hand and took a sip. "How did this happen? This is The Agency. They've done it again. I just don't know how I'm going to break this to Jack."

"Presumably, the man will recall his wedding."

"I doubt it," she said with a shake of his head. "This has to be some trick. The Agency probably planted her."

"Really? Do you believe so?"

She stared at him, an incredulous expression on her features. "Yes. Jack's never said anything about a wife. This is going to come as a shock."

"Never mentioning her does not mean she did not exist."

Cate cocked her head, an unimpressed frown forming on her delicate features. "Marcus—"

"Never mind our opinions. Perhaps you would prefer if I fetched him?"

"No, no, that would be a disaster. You two aren't exactly each other's biggest fans."

"I would have no problem telling the man his...wife is here."

Cate took another sip of the brandy before she handed the glass back to her husband. "I'll bet. I can handle it. I was just surprised, that's all."

She shook her head as she bit her lower lip. "Things just keep going from bad to worse."

"We will fix everything, Catherine," Marcus promised.

She stared into his dark eyes, her heart tumbling at the words. "I'm sorry, but maybe it's best that your—"

Her words cut off as pain shot from temple to temple. She clutched her head, running her fingers into her hair as her features twisted. Her knees wobbled before they gave way, and she collapsed.

"Catherine!" Marcus called, though she barely heard him as blood rushed into her ears.

Images shot across her brain faster than she could process. An arm wrapped around her shoulders, and another slid behind her thighs before he scooped her into his arms.

The sensation began to wane as the doors magically blew open in front of them.

“I am taking you to rest.”

“No, wait, I’m fine. I just had another one of those visions.”

“And now you must rest. I will also inform Mother.”

“I’m fine, put me down.”

“You are not fine, Catherine,” Marcus insisted as he strode down the hall.

She heaved a sigh as she shook her head. “Marcus, please stop carrying me around. I need to find Jack.”

“You also need to rest.”

“I will rest later. After we’ve sorted out this mess with Jack’s wife.”

Marcus came to a stop, his lips puckering as he sighed. “Fine. But I will go with you.”

“Fine,” she answered with a nod. “Let’s try the kitchen.”

Cate grabbed his hand and pulled him toward the back stairs. “Were you able to make any sense of the images you saw in your vision?”

“No,” Cate said as frustration coursed through her and tears threatened to sting her eyes.

Marcus squeezed her hand. “Mother will be able to help.”

Cate stopped walking and faced him as she shook her head. “Marcus, she can’t stay here until I figure this out.”

“Why not?” he asked, his forehead creasing.

“This could take a while. I could never master this.”

“You will, Catherine.”

Her shoulders slumped as she stared down at their intertwined hands. “But she won’t understand...she thinks our marriage is real. You won’t be free as long as she is here.”

“Neither will you.”

She shook her head as she flicked her gaze to the floor. “But you have—”

“Catherine, there is nothing to worry about. Besides, I have a feeling The Agency is nowhere near finished with you, so it would be prudent for me to stay.”

“But you don’t have to be stuck married to me.”

“That doesn’t bother me, Catherine, unless you have a burning desire to be free. In which case, I shall tell Mother—”

“No,” Cate said, squeezing his arm as her eyes went wide. “No, don’t tell your mother anything. I don’t want her to hate me...or you. She’s too nice. She doesn’t deserve this.”

“Wonderful, then we shall remain husband and wife. I am certain Mother will be very pleased.”

Cate sighed as she rubbed her forehead. “Okay. I’m sorry, but okay.”

“There is nothing to apologize for, Catherine. Now, let us deal with the other spouse causing a ruckus.”

She smiled up at him, surprised he took the development in stride. She remained certain he would prefer to resume his crusade for Celine’s hand. However, his mother’s opinion on the woman hadn’t changed in centuries, so perhaps he wasn’t in a hurry to displease her.

She continued down the hall toward the kitchen. “I don’t even want to tell him. After everything that’s happened, this is just another blow. It’s not enough that they kidnapped him and he nearly died of temporalysis, but now they’re going to toss in this...woman as his wife. Like anyone would believe he married her.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her. “Really? I could believe it.”

Cate offered him an unimpressed sideways glance. “Of course, you could. You don’t like him. But...”

“But what? What about Mrs. Reid makes you think he wouldn’t have picked her?”

Cate paused for a moment before she answered. “Everything. She’s... uncouth and crass and...”

“Your gardener is hardly the epitome of grace, dear.”

“He is not my—”

“Gardener, I know. Yet he is. And for some men, those sorts can be very appealing.”

“Not you, huh?”

“Certainly not,” Marcus answered as they reached the kitchen.

Voices floated from within as Molly and Mrs. Fraser flitted around the room, readying the dinner for the day.

“Stop eating those biscuits, young Jack,” Mrs. Fraser warned. “You’ll spoil your supper.”

He chuckled as he bit into another cookie. “No, I won’t. I promise. I can still eat that roast you’re making with ease.”

Mrs. Fraser shook her head at him before her gaze landed on Cate and Marcus in the doorway. “Oh, excuse me, I didn’t see you there. You’re always sneaking up on me.”

“Hi, Mrs. Fraser. Sorry, I just needed to speak with Jack for a few minutes.”

Jack froze mid-chew, his forehead creasing as he stared at Cate. “Sure. What’s up?”

“Uh, it’s another problem with the west wing. It may be better if you took a look at it rather than me try to explain.”

“Right,” Jack said as he rose. “Let’s head up now.”

Cate shuffled down the hall, chewing her lower lip as Jack followed her. When they reached the stairs, he shot her a sideways glance. “Can you tell me now what this is really about? Is it The Agency again?”

Cate sighed, her voice quivering as she spoke. “I think so. We...have a visitor.”

“Oh, no. It’s not Gianna again, is it? I can’t deal with that woman right now.”

“No, it’s not Gianna.” Cate wrung her hands until they turned red. “It’s...”

“Cate, what is it?” Jack’s features twisted with concern.

“Jack, I don’t know how to say this, but...”

“Your wife is here,” Marcus blurted before Cate could find the words.

Her shoulders slumped, and she shook her head, disappointed in his bluntness.

Jack stood in stunned silence, shock etched into his features. “What?”

She pressed her lips together, her face melting with concern. “I know. This must be a shock...”

“Amanda’s here?”

Heat washed through Cate as she snapped her gaze up to Jack’s face. How did he know her name? “You know her?”

He bobbed his head up and down. “Yes. I never imagined she’d show up here. We’ve been divorced for years.”

Cate’s eyes widened. This wasn’t a trick of The Agency. Jack had actually married this woman. “She’s really your wife?”

Jack heaved a sigh as he nodded. “Yes, well, no.”

“What does that mean?” Marcus said, his tone slow and deliberate, betraying his annoyance.

“It means...I thought we were divorced years ago. I never expected her to turn up here. What does she want? Did she say?”

“She said she wanted to speak with you. And according to her, she is still your wife,” Marcus answered.

“That’s impossible. I...we...” Jack heaved a sigh as he shook his head. “I’d better speak to her.”

“Do you want someone to go with you?” Cate asked.

“Ahhh...” Jack set his hands on his hips and shook his head. “I don’t know. I don’t know what she wants. Or...why she’s here.”

“Why don’t I walk you to the room?” Cate suggested. “And we’ll go from there.”

“Thanks.” Jack nodded before he motioned for her to precede him.

With her heart pounding and her mind swirling with confusion, she led the way to the sitting room, swinging the doors open to find Amanda, her hands shoved into her pocket and a bubble of gum poking from her lips, staring at a painting.

“Amanda,” Jack said as he stepped inside, obviously recognizing her.

She sucked the gum back into her mouth and grinned at him. “Hey, Jackie.”

“Wh-What are you doing here?”

The blonde flicked her gaze to Cate who still hovered in the door before she snapped it back to Jack. “It might be best if we talked privately.”

“Sorry, I’ll leave you to speak alone,” Cate said as she searched Jack’s features for some signal as to what he preferred her to do.

“Thanks, Cate. I’ll meet you in the library when we’re finished to discuss that problem with the west wing.”

She forced a smile onto her face and nodded. He preferred to be left alone. What had happened between the two of them?

After a breath, she shuffled backward and pulled the doors closed behind her. Her hands lingered on the knobs as she stared at the wooden barrier.

“He preferred to handle her alone?” Marcus asked.

“Yes,” she said, her voice barely above a whisper. She leaned closer and pressed her ear against the wood.

“What are you doing?”

“Shh, I can’t hear anything with you talking.”

Marcus wrapped his fingers around her arm and tugged her away from the door.

“Hey!” she hissed, pulling back against him.

“Come along, Catherine, you shouldn’t eavesdrop.”

“But—“

“He will tell you what he wants you to know when he is finished.”

“Marcus...I can’t shake the feeling that...”

“That what?” he asked, releasing his grip on her. “That this is some devious plan by The Agency? Yet Mr. Reid knows her and admits to marrying the woman.”

Cate let her gaze fall to the floor. “Yes, you’re right. Why did he marry her?”

“I’m certain he had his reasons,” Marcus said as they entered the library. He poured her another brandy and offered it to her before he poured one for himself.

“But what were they? I just...can’t see Jack with her.” Cate shook her head before she sipped the amber liquid.

“Why? I think they are quite a good fit.”

Cate glared at him over the rim of her glass. “Really? I can’t see him with her at all.”

Marcus fluttered his eyelashes. “I cannot understand why.”

Cate heaved a sigh, unwilling to explain it to him as she sank into one of the leather armchairs, allowing the soft cushion to envelop her. “Never mind.”

“The fact is, Catherine, they are married. Or were. Though she still seems to think they are. Perhaps you do not know Mr. Reid as well as you think.”

Cate flicked her gaze to him, her features pinching at the suggestion. Was Jack more of an enigma than she thought?

She cradled her drink against her chest as she chewed her lower lip.

“Do not pout, Catherine.”

“I’m not pouting. I’m thinking.”

He arched an eyebrow at her, but before he could answer, the doors burst open and Jack strode inside, a loud sigh escaping him. He crossed to the drink cart without a word and poured himself a double scotch.

Cate studied him as he downed a long sip before wiping his lips with the back of his hand and settling his gaze on her. “Everything okay?” she asked.

“No,” he answered. “We’ve got a big problem.”

CHAPTER 2

Cate's stomach clenched at the words as she rose to her feet. With wide eyes, she prompted him for more information, but instead, he downed the rest of his drink before pouring himself another.

"What? With Amanda?"

"Yeah, with Amanda," Jack answered before another sip.

"Perhaps you can control your more base urges to drink away your problems and inform us of what you are yammering about," Marcus answered.

"Oh, I'm sorry, Your Grace. I just needed something to steady my nerves."

"We understand," Cate said with a bob of her head before she switched to a shake. "Except we don't. Jack, what's going on? You're really married to her?"

"Yes. Apparently."

"Apparently? Did you not know? Is this...a change in the timeline again?"

"No," Jack answered with a sigh as he set his glass down. He stalked across the room and collapsed into his usual chair before he buried his face in his hands. "I married Amanda in the original timeline. But I divorced her, too. Or so I thought."

"So you thought? So, The Agency changed things?" Cate eased into the chair next to him, her features still pinched with confusion.

“I don’t know. Amanda says she never filed the paperwork.” Jack rubbed his temples. “Which puts me in a fine mess.

“Okay, well, why doesn’t she do it now?” Cate asked. “Or is that why she’s here?”

“No, that’s not the reason she came. It’s much worse than that.”

Cate reached for his hand, giving it a squeeze. “Whatever it is, we’re here for you.”

“We?” Marcus asked.

Cate scowled at him with a shake of her head.

“He’s right. You shouldn’t offer until you know the trouble I’ve just brought to this doorstep.”

“Are you kidding? You were almost killed because of the trouble I’ve brought to Dunhaven.”

“Hardly, Cate. You couldn’t have known The Agency would come gunning for you. You’re doing your best to protect this secret and all the people in this castle. But this...this is my own stupid fault.”

“That’s sounds about right. Well, we’ll leave you to it then. Come along, Catherine, we should discuss your latest vision with Mother.”

“Marcus!” Cate shouted as he set his glass down and crossed to the door. “No. We can’t leave Jack to fight this on his own, no matter what it is.”

“He has asked us to do just that.”

“And we aren’t going to do it.” Cate gave him a stern look, speaking through clenched teeth.

“Really, Cate, I’m not certain you want to be involved in this mess.”

“We do. We’re here for you. Just tell us what’s going on.”

Jack sucked in a breath, sliding his eyes closed. Before he could speak a knock sounded at the door. Marcus swung it open to find Amanda on the other side. She eyed him with a half-smirk before she winked. “Hi there, handsome.”

He offered her an unimpressed stare and a sneer. “Is there something you needed, Mrs. Reid?”

“Amanda, I thought you were waiting in the sitting room for me?”

“I got bored. Look, Jackie, am I staying here or not?”

“I already told you I don’t live here. I have my own place, and you can stay there, all right? I just need to speak with Her Grace before I head off for the night.”

“Her Grace, my aren’t we impressive?” Amanda said to Cate.

“She is quite impressive, though it is no concern of yours,” Marcus said, stepping between them.

“Amanda, please,” Jack said with a shake of his head.

“But I’m tired. I’ve traveled a long way and want to rest. Either I’ll take a bedroom here, or I’ll be heading home.”

“Perhaps, Mr. Reid, whatever you have to say can wait until tomorrow,” Marcus suggested.

“I’d really rather here it now. Mrs. Reid, I’d be happy to have you stay with us. Let me have a bedroom readied—“

“No,” Jack interrupted. “That would be...too much to ask.”

“You’re not asking, I’m offering,” Cate said with a smile. She eyed Jack’s supposed wife, not liking the woman one bit. She preferred to keep a close eye on her.

Jack offered her a wide-eyed stare and a petrified smile. “Really, Your Grace...”

“Nonsense,” Cate said.

“Perhaps, dear, they ought to go home where they can be alone to talk freely,” Marcus replied.

“What kind of hosts would we be to make her wait when she’s tired? I’ll have Molly get something ready.”

“No!” Jack shouted, following the harsh statement with a nervous laugh. “No, no. Don’t do that. I’ll take Amanda home now.”

“Jack...” Cate cocked her head, studying him as she tried to get a read on why he insisted on removing her from the castle. Surely if they stayed, they could tackle this together. What was the issue here?

A shadow moved behind Amanda, and Molly appeared at the door. She skirted around the woman and crossed to retrieve the used tumblers. “Mrs. Fraser wanted me to check on you both since dinner is nearly ready. I didn’t realize you had a guest. Sorry.”

“That’s fine, Molly. We’re just—“

“I’m not staying for dinner,” Jack said, his voice hurried and shaky. “So, proceed without me.”

Molly furrowed her brow, the glasses clinking in her hand as she studied him. “Are you sick?”

“No, just...busy. I—“

“He can and should stay. We were just discussing that. Amanda, though, is very tired. I think she would prefer a warm bed and a tray of dinner.”

“That sounds lovely, Duchess,” the woman spat out with her usual smirk on her face.

“Yet Mr. Reid prefers to take his lovely wife home,” Marcus answered. “So—“

His statement was interrupted by the smashing of a glass on the hardwood floor.

Cate snapped her gaze to her housekeeper-in-training. The woman’s eyes were wide and her jaw agape. She looked completely stunned. “Molly? Are you okay?”

“Oh,” she said as her eyes turned glassy. “Sorry, Your Grace. I’m so... sorry. I—“

She clapped a hand over her lips before she raced from the room.

Cate stared after her, stunned into silence. “I should go check on her.”

“I’ll—“ Jack began before he shook his head. “Yes, you should go. And so should we.”

Cate crinkled her brow as she shot a pleading glance at Marcus. She couldn’t track down Molly and deal with keeping Jack here, too.

With a heavy sigh, Marcus flicked his gaze to Jack. “Perhaps it would be best if you and Mrs. Reid stayed. What with the problem in the west wing.”

“I really think that’ll keep—“

Marcus’s glare made him stop. With the situation in hand, she left them behind to deal with sorting the bedrooms and hurried after Molly. She paused in the foyer, wondering if she’d gone up to her room or back down to the kitchen.

She chose to start with the kitchen, assuming she wouldn’t have left Mrs. Fraser alone awaiting an answer on dinner. Cate hurried down the stairs, her heart in her throat, wondering what had upset Molly.

As she reached the lower level, the sound of sobbing reached her ears. It quickened her footsteps toward the kitchen. She found Molly leaning against the table, her face covered with her hands as her shoulders shook.

“There, there, Miss Molly.” Mrs. Fraser, a dishtowel slung over her shoulder, patted Molly’s back.

“Molly?”

Molly snapped her tear-streaked face up to eye Cate. “Oh, Cate,” she said, her features melting into tears again.

Cate crossed to her and laid a hand on her shoulder. “Molly, what is it? What happened?”

“I was so stupid.”

“About what?”

“Is that really Jack’s wife upstairs?”

Heat washed over Cate as she realized the reason for Molly’s upset. Had she been seeing Jack? “Oh, ummm...”

“He didn’t tell me had a wife. I feel like a home wrecker.”

“Now, now, Miss Molly,” Mrs. Fraser said, “you cannae be a home wrecker when you dinnae know there was a home to wreck. None of us did.”

“No, I didn’t know either. It was a shock.”

“I never expected him to be a liar.”

“I think that’s being unfair. From what I’ve gathered, which isn’t much yet, Jack thought he was divorced. So you didn’t wreck any homes. And he didn’t lie either.”

Molly sniffled. “Really?”

Cate nodded. “Yes. But I haven’t gotten much more information from him other than that. I’ve been trying to figure it out, but...it was a shock to everyone, including Jack.”

Molly fished a tissue from her apron pocket and blew her nose. “I guess I should give him the benefit of the doubt but...when you’ve been through a divorce once, you just...trust less.”

Cate rubbed her shoulder. “I understand. But I do think he deserves the chance to explain.”

Mrs. Fraser offered her a nod and a tight-lipped smile, indicating her agreement.

“I hadn’t realized you’d been seeing each other,” Cate said.

Molly centered her red-eyed gaze on Cate as she nodded. “Yeah, for a little while now. And I thought we were getting serious. Then this.”

“Well, again, I think this may be something unexpected, so let’s just take it one step at a time, okay?”

“Yeah,” Molly said with a nod, though Cate could tell she was still upset.

“It’ll be okay, Molly,” she said as she slid her arm around her friend. “Why don’t you head up for the night and take a tray in your room.”

“No, your dinner—“

“I can handle my dinner,” Cate assured her.

“But His Grace—“

“Will be perfectly fine if I bring him his meal instead of you.”

“I wouldn’t hear of it,” Mrs. Fraser scolded. “I will bring your meals to the dining room like a proper housekeeper. But I do agree you ought not appear in the dining room with those tear-stained cheeks, Miss Molly. Besides, Miss Andrea can help.”

“I’ll splash some cold water on my face,” she promised.

“No, you won’t. You’re going to bed, and that’s an order.”

Cate wrapped her arm tighter around Molly’s shoulders and guided her toward the door. “I’ll walk you up.”

“Thanks,” Molly squeaked out as they crossed to the door. “I’m sorry for the broken glass, too. I’ll pay—“

“For nothing. It’s fine.”

“Thanks, Cate. I’m sorry for being such a baby. I just...I guess I’m still raw from the divorce. It’s probably way too soon for me to have jumped into a relationship, but Jack seemed like such a nice guy.”

“He is a nice guy. And I’m sure there is an explanation for what’s going on right now. I think we need to give him some time.”

Molly bobbed her head up and down as she blew out a shaky sigh. “You’re right. I’m jumping to conclusions.”

“It’s no wonder. Your ex-husband was not a very nice man. You’re just a little gun-shy.”

“Yeah, he’s nothing like yours. I can’t imagine him ever cheating on you. He worships the ground you walk on.”

Cate offered her a weak smile, wondering how everyone would take it when they finally divorced so he could chase after Celine.

They reached Molly’s room, and she twisted to pull Cate into a hug. “Thanks, honey. I feel a little better.”

Cate rubbed her shoulder as she offered her a broader smile. “You’ll feel a lot better after some rest.”

“And some answers. Jack’s not quite off the hook just yet. He’s getting the benefit of the doubt, but that doesn’t mean he’s getting a free pass.”

“I wouldn’t dream of telling you to do that. I want answers, too. I was stunned when she showed up.”

Molly turned glum again, her lower lip jutting out in a pout. “Do you think he loves her?”

Cate shook her head. “I can’t see how. She’s not...” She raised her eyes to Molly. “He’d be trading up with you.”

Molly offered a tear-filled chuckle. “Aw, thanks. You don’t have to say that just because we’re friends though.”

“I’m not. I get a bad vibe from her. I just don’t like her.”

“Well, I appreciate the support. And I hope to get those answers soon. But for now, I’m going to turn in.”

“I’ll have Andrea run your tray up. Curl up in front of the fire and try to forget about all of it.”

Molly hugged her again before she disappeared into her room.

Cate hovered outside her door for a moment, her smile fading quickly. She needed answers, too. Her heart ached for her friend. She had suspected Molly and Jack were becoming close, but she hadn’t known how close.

Finding out he had a wife that he’d kept secret must be devastating, especially after a nasty divorce. Cate wandered down the hall, lost in thought. Why hadn’t Jack said anything to anyone? Had it been because he assumed he was divorced, and it was a matter best left in the past?

She heaved a sigh as she eyed a painting of a former Dunhaven Castle resident. At Dunhaven, the past never stayed buried.

As she rounded the corner, she found Marcus striding toward her.

“Is she settled?”

“Yes. In the burgundy room,” he answered. “And your secretive gardener is waiting in the library after seeing her off.”

Cate stifled a sigh. “He’s not secretive or—“

“The gardener, yes, I know. Old habits.”

Cate sidestepped around him. “Time to get some answers.”

“Perhaps after our meal.”

“Are you kidding? I can’t eat with this hanging over my head. I’m not even hungry.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow. “I was hungry.”

“Go eat,” she said as they reached the stairs.

“I would prefer to eat together.”

“Fine, we’ll invite Jack to dine with us and grill him over the roast.”

Marcus grumbled out a sigh. "Oh, joy. Just how I hoped to spend my meal."

"You'll live. This is why we should have gotten divorced faster. Then you could have enjoyed your roast however you liked."

"Listening to an earful from Mother."

Cate's shoulders slumped as her feet hit the marble floor. "She really will be disappointed, won't she?"

"She likes you very much, Catherine."

Cate pushed into the library, and Jack rose from his armchair. "Cate..."

"You're coming to dinner with us. You can explain there."

He blew out a long breath and shook his head. "I hope you can stomach it. It's not very good dinner conversation."

"I said the same, but was overruled," Marcus answered.

Cate gave him a narrow-eyed glance before she stepped toward the door. "Come on."

They made their way to the dining room where Mrs. Fraser already set out items. "I'll be right up with your dinners."

"I'll fetch my own, Mrs. Fraser," Jack assured her.

"Wow," Cate said as Marcus slid her chair in under her. "He's really avoiding this."

"I am not surprised."

After their meals had been delivered, and they were left alone, Cate dove into her questioning. "Are you really married to her?"

"Yes. I thought I was divorced, but she never filed. I'm still married."

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as she pushed a piece of meat around her plate. "I'm sorry, but I have to ask why you married her. She just doesn't seem at all your type."

"I didn't know I had a type," Jack said with a grin that faded quickly.

Marcus arched an eyebrow at him, a frown making it clear how he felt about the statement.

Jack winced and cleared his throat. "Sorry."

Cate let her fork clatter to her plate as she clasped her hands, leaning her forehead against them. "No, I'm sorry. This is personal, I know, but I can't help but get the feeling she's here to cause trouble."

"She is," Jack answered. "You're right."

"Why?" Cate asked with a shrug. "Is The Agency somehow involved in this?"

“I would not be surprised,” Marcus answered.

“I don’t know, Cate,” Jack answered, “but for your reason about why I married her...yes, you’re right. There is a reason, she’s not my type.”

Cate heaved a sigh of relief. “Thank heavens. I thought I was going crazy.”

Jack shook his head as he fidgeted in his seat. “No. I married her to protect her. From a crime.”

“What crime?” Cate asked.

Jack set his fork down, his features twisting with displeasure as he set his gaze on Cate. “Murder.”

CHAPTER 3

Cate's jaw dropped open as she stared at Jack. "What? You married her to protect her from murder? Are you serious?"

"Explain your vague statement," Marcus said. "Was she about to be murdered?"

Jack shook his head. "No. She...had a boyfriend who wasn't very nice. They got into an argument and..."

"She killed him," Cate finished, her expression grim.

Jack bobbed his head up and down. "And I gave her an alibi and married her. Stupid, but she promised it would only be temporary. Just until things settled down and the heat wasn't on her anymore."

"I guess that didn't pan out."

"No," he answered. "I thought she had filed for the divorce. We had the paperwork done before I left. I never thought about it afterward."

"Did she say why she didn't file them?"

Jack shook his head as he stared down at his half-eaten meal. "I don't even know how to explain the next bit."

"Simple. Tell us what happened," Marcus said with a sigh.

"But that's just it. I don't know. She came here claiming something completely different than what happened all those years ago."

Cate's eyebrows shot up. "Could history be changed?"

"Maybe," Jack said.

"What does she claim?" Marcus asked.

Jack pressed his lips together, his features pinching. "She says..."

His words trailed off as he opened and closed his hand into a fist. “She says she didn’t kill him.”

“Maybe she didn’t,” Cate said. “Maybe she lied all those years ago.”

Jack shook his head. “No, I witnessed it. That’s why I married her. So, I didn’t have to testify.”

“And now she’s saying she didn’t do it. Is he still alive?”

Jack shook his head, his features twisting further with upset.

“Well, then what does she claim happened?”

Jack set his eyes on her, his jaw flexing as he stared at her. “She says I killed him.”

Cate’s jaw dropped open again. “No, are you joking?”

“I wish I was. But she says she witnessed me kill him. She never filed the papers, and now she wants a married life with me or she goes to the police.”

Cate shifted her gaze to her plate. “Well, then we need to solve this.”

“If we can. I have no idea why she’s doing this.”

“I can guess,” Cate said with a wrinkle of her nose. “And her name is Gianna.”

“So, you think this is The Agency’s latest attempt to get at us.”

“Or distract Catherine from what is really important,” Marcus said.

Cate snapped her gaze to him. “Jack is important.”

“I am not saying he is not. But your visions are pointing to something large, and we have no idea what.”

“He’s right, Cate,” Jack said with a sigh as he let his gaze sink to his lap. “I can solve this on my own.”

“How?” Cate asked.

“At the very least, I can stay married to her. She says she’ll stay quiet as long as I provide her a nice life.”

Cate cocked her head, her lips tugging into a grimace. “And how long until she demands more?”

“I don’t know. But for now, while you work on those visions, I can deal with this on my own.”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “Marcus, we’re just going to have to find a way to do both. I’ll start looking into this tomorrow, then we’ll make a plan, though I suspect we’ll at least need to travel back to the night of the murder and see what’s happening now in the timeline.”

“Probably,” Jack said with a nod. “I appreciate that Cate. But, please, these visions are still difficult for you. Do what you need to do to take care of yourself.”

“I will. I promise. Anna is here to help. I hope to make some progress with them soon. But this situation is going to become untenable quickly. Not to mention the affect it’s having on Molly.”

Jack let his head fall back between his shoulder blades. “I know. When she ran out of the room...”

“She’ll be okay, she was just shocked. We all were.”

“I never told anyone. I thought it was over.”

“With The Agency, nothing is ever over,” Cate said.

Marcus sipped his wine. “And you can be certain it will get worse before it gets better.”

“I know,” Jack said.

Cate shifted in her seat as she pushed the peas around on her plate. “I hate to ask this, but...can you tell us what happened as you recall it on the night of the murder?”

Jack nodded before he swallowed hard. “I was at Oxford at the time. We had gone out for a drink. That’s when I met Amanda. She was a bartender. We often went to the bar she worked at. Occasionally, her boyfriend would come by. He was always rough with her. A few times I stopped him before things got out of control.

“I kept asking her why she stayed with him, but she never really answered. Anyway, one night I heard them arguing in the alley in the back. He was getting pretty rough with her, but before I could put a stop to it, he shoved her into a car.

“I followed the car to a posh hotel. He practically dragged her from it and into the hotel. I followed them. They went to a ballroom. There was some kind of party there. It was filled. I lost sight of them for a while, but when I finally found them, he was dead and she was holding a gun.”

Cate chewed her lower lip as she tried to piece together the relevant details. It seemed Amanda was the most likely culprit. She wondered if anyone else could have witnessed the crime. She’d look for more information tomorrow, but for now, she had only one suspect in mind. The question was, how did she prove it?

“Okay,” she said with a nod. “I’ll see what I can find out tomorrow. For now, we’ll have to play her game.”

“Thanks, Cate,” Jack said with a nod. “I appreciate your help on this. And I’m sorry for the trouble.”

After a sip, Cate set down her wine glass, waving the comment away. “Please. How much trouble have I dragged you into over the years?”

Jack flicked his gaze to Marcus, arching an eyebrow. “I suppose you have a point.”

Marcus offered him an unimpressed stare and a low grumble.

“Don’t worry, we’ll solve this. We always do.”

Jack offered her a weak smile as he collected his utensils and plate. “Well, I suppose I’ll turn in for the night. I really have no desire to stay awake and think about this anymore tonight.”

He rose, hovering at the table for a second before he spoke again. “Oh, Cate, thanks for going after Molly. I...we...”

“She told me,” Cate said with a nod. “I’m so happy for you both.”

A nervous chuckle escaped Jack’s lips. “That may be premature considering.”

“I think a conversation between you two would go a long way,” Cate said. “Though maybe tomorrow morning when you’ve both had some rest and some time.”

Jack nodded again as he collected his glass. “Good night.”

Marcus shifted his gaze to Cate as Jack shuffled from the room. “Mr. Reid and Ms. Williams?”

Cate flicked her eyebrows up. “Apparently so.”

“That is quite an upgrade from his current spouse.”

Cate’s features twisted into an amused smile. “Wow.”

“What?” he asked as he rose from his seat and offered her his hand.

“You like Molly.”

“Like is a stronger word than I would use. I find her...adequate as a housekeeper though a tad vocal. Servants should be seen and not heard.”

The statement did not diminish the grin on Cate’s features as she slid her hand around his elbow and walked from the dining room with him. “Uh-huh. You like her. And here I didn’t think you liked anyone.”

He clicked his tongue at her. “I like you.”

“Well, that’s obvious. With all my Agency problems and the general chaos that surrounds me, it’s hard not to like me.”

“Nightcap, dear?” he asked as they strode into the library.

“Yes. After this day, definitely.” She sank into the armchair with a sigh. “This is going to be a lot to manage between my visions and Amanda.”

Marcus offered her a glass of brandy. She accepted it, pressing it against her chest as her brows furrowed. “Do you think my visions have anything to do with the murder?”

“I doubt it,” Marcus answered as he slid into the chair next to her.

She pulled her gaze from the air and studied her husband. “Why?”

“Because of the way you are reacting to them. They are deeply personal. Otherwise, they wouldn’t cause nearly as much pain.”

“Really?”

“Yes. Recall when you had a vision of Mr. Reid’s predicament within Mr. Bonaparte’s camp. Painful, yes. But disabling, no.”

“I thought that was because I was learning how to handle them.”

“It was also because it was less personal to you.”

She cocked her head, her shoulders slumping. “Jack is pretty personal to me.”

“I am not being insulting. Of course, he is. Though he is less personal to you than...other things.”

“Other things? Such as?”

“Such as your own family. They are deeply personal. When Mother had visions of others, she was almost never bothered. But when her visions concerned her own family, she suffered greatly.”

Cate tried to imagine the poised woman struggling. She dealt with all facets of the supernatural with such ease, it was hard to believe she’d ever had any trouble.

“Was your mother always—“

“Yes,” Marcus said with a nod. “She came from a long line of seers dating back to the Oracle at Delphi.”

Cate slouched slightly in her seat. “Wow. I thought she was German.”

“Somewhere in her lineage, someone married a German. You are American, though your heritage is distinctly Scottish.”

“The Oracle at Delphi,” Cate repeated. She continued to be shocked by Anna’s acceptance of her, an unremarkable America with Scottish ancestry.

“She is quite a powerful clairvoyant.”

“I’ll bet,” Cate answered. “I really hope she can help me make sense of these visions I’m having.”

“I have no doubt she will. I have never known Mother to fail at anything.”

Cate polished off her brandy and set the glass on the coffee table before she rose. “I think I’ll go to bed.”

Marcus stood next to her. “Good night, Catherine.”

“Good night.” She offered him a fleeting smile before she left him behind. Her mind spun despite her desperate attempts to quiet it. The situation with Jack needed to be solved sooner rather than later. But where would they start? Would a trip to the past shed any light on the circumstances? Would a conversation with Amanda help?

She pressed her lips into a thin line as she pushed into her bedroom, finding Andrea turning back her covers.

“Good evening, Your Grace. All ready to turn in?”

“More than ready.”

“Long day?” Andrea asked as Cate sank into the chair at her vanity.

“Far too long of a day,” Cate said, letting out a deep sigh as Andrea pulled the brush through her hair. “Amanda’s arrival has really turned things upside-down.”

“That’s the woman claiming to be Mr. Reid’s wife,” Andrea asked.

“Not claiming. She is. He admitted it. He thought they were divorced, but she never filed. I really wonder if The Agency had anything to do with that.”

“It’s a good lead to follow,” Andrea said. “Did he say why he married her?”

“To protect her from a murder charge. But now, she claims he did it.”

“Do you believe there is any truth to that?”

Cate flicked her eyebrows up, glancing at her through the mirror. “That Jack is a murderer? No.”

“So, the woman is lying.”

“I think so.” Cate sank her chin into her palm. “I hope so.”

“If your gut says she is, she is, Your Grace. You are an excellent judge of character.”

Cate shifted her gaze to her own blue eyes. Was she? She didn’t feel like it lately. What if every decision she’d made up to this point had been wrong?

“All finished, Your Grace. Let’s get you into your comfy pjs.” Andrea stepped back and grinned at her.

Cate pulled herself from her pensiveness and forced herself to stand. Immediately, her knees wobbled and the room swirled around her. She took a stumbling step toward Andrea before she collapsed to the floor and her world went black.

CHAPTER 4

Cate's heart pounded as she raced through the halls of Dunhaven Castle. Fear gripped her so tightly, she had trouble breathing. She rounded the corner, staring at a set of double doors. Light gleamed from inside the room.

Her stomach clenched as she spotted them. Why was the hall so long? Time seemed to slow as she barreled toward the light. Worry tumbled through her mind, blurring her thoughts and forcing her to move faster.

Before she could reach the room, though, the image faded. She found herself falling through blackness until she finally hit bottom. The force pushed the air from her lungs.

She gasped for breath, her eyes going wide.

"It's all right, Your Grace. You're here with me, Andrea. You're safe."

Warm skin pressed against her hand as she fluttered her eyelashes, trying desperately to get her bearings.

Her breath came in ragged gasps as her eyes darted around the room. Andrea stroked her hair, still clutching her hand. "Deep breaths, Your Grace. That's it."

"Andrea?" her voice came out as a tired squeak.

"Yes, I'm right here. Conserve your strength. Would you like me to fetch His Grace?"

Cate tried to shake her head, but found herself too tired to do so. "No. I just...I can't move."

“His Grace warned me of this. Your attacks may leave you incapacitated. He says it’s nothing to worry about, though you must be cared for when it happens. I’m afraid I cannot lift you to carry you to the bed, but I know he can.”

“Please don’t leave,” Cate said. The fear she’d felt in her vision still twisted her stomach into a tight knot. She had no desire to be alone.

“All right, Your Grace. I will stay with you. Though, I shall still call for help.” Andrea wrangled her phone from her pocket and tapped the screen a few times before she smiled warmly at Cate.

“There, now His Grace will know.”

“It’s scary how fast you’ve become accustomed to technology.”

“I find it most convenient,” she said with a grin. “How are you feeling now?”

“Confused and exhausted.”

“Were you able to glean any additional details from the vision?”

Cate tried to pinch her eyebrows together, but even that effort seemed taxing. “I am here at Dunhaven. I’m running. But...”

“Yes?” Andrea asked before the doors burst open.

Marcus hurried across the room to Cate, kneeling at her side and pressing a hand against her cheek. “Well, at least your eyes are open.”

“Progress,” she said with a weak laugh.

“And she speaks,” he answered as he scooped her into his arms. “How long was she out?”

“About five minutes, Your Grace,” Andrea said as she trailed behind them, disappearing into the bathroom as Marcus laid Cate on the bed.

She returned with a wash basin and a cloth. After wringing it out, she placed the cool material onto Cate’s forehead.

“And have we made any progress with the vision itself?” Marcus asked.

Before Cate could answer, Anna, still tying her robe strings, rushed inside. “I’m here. What’s happened?”

“Catherine has had another vision, particularly taxing.”

Anna peered at her over Marcus’s shoulder. “Her eyes are open, that’s a good sign.”

“And she can speak,” Marcus said to his mother.

“Well, that’s quite a feat. Well done, Catherine.”

“Thank you,” Cate answered. “And, to answer your question, yes. I was telling Andrea that I’m here at Dunhaven and running. The first few times

I've had the vision, I assumed I was running away from something."

"But now?" Anna prodded.

"I'm running toward something, I think."

Anna eased onto the side of the bed, taking Cate's hand in hers. "Any idea what?"

"A room. It's in the next hall. I recognized the spot, but...there's nothing there. It's an empty bedroom."

"But in another time, it may not have been," Anna said. "With your time traveling, visions can come from any time."

"Right," Cate answered, defeat growing within her. She'd never be able to discern what these meant before the moment was upon her.

"Do not be distressed, Catherine," Anna said with a pat of her hand, "we will conquer this, too."

Cate tried to heave a sigh, finding the raising of her chest nearly impossible. "I just wish I could make more progress. Perhaps a visit to that room."

"We shall try it tomorrow," Anna said. "We should also practice more with your vision retrieval skills. Though we may wish to wait a day after this episode."

"I hate waiting."

Anna offered her an amused smile. "Are you always impatient?"

"Yes," Cate answered.

"No, she is not. Otherwise, she would not have married me," Marcus answered with a grin.

"Very true. One would need the patience of a saint to be married to Marcus," Anna said with a chuckle.

The small laugh she managed made her weary again. She struggled to keep her eyes open. "Was he a very trying child?"

"You have no idea," Anna said. "And quite a talented warlock almost from the start. I can remember him playing with fireballs even in his crib. He would entertain himself for hours."

Cate tried to imagine seeing a baby conjure the odd supernatural weapon, though she couldn't. And her exhaustion grew with every breath.

"But I will save those tales for another time. For now, you should rest," Anna said.

She hated to close her eyes, but she found it harder and harder to keep them open. When she opened them again, sunlight streamed through her curtains, announcing the arrival of a new day. She yawned and stretched, working out the stiffness in her muscles. Judging by the way she'd woken up, it seemed she hadn't moved an inch all night. Probably another side effect of the attack she'd had.

Her mind turned back to the vision. What was in that bedroom in some time period that she was so intent on getting to?

She planned on visiting the room today, but she didn't hold out hope for finding any clues. But maybe her visions were pushing her to do just that. Maybe she could make some sense out of what they meant if she spent a little time there.

Andrea peeked into the room from the sitting room. "Good morning, Your Grace."

"Good morning, Andrea," Cate said with a smile.

"And how are you feeling this morning?"

"Much better, thank you. Some of those take a toll." Cate flung the covers back and swung her legs over the edge of the bed.

Andrea lifted her feet back onto the bed and covered her. "Yes, both His Grace and the dowager duchess told me you are to remain abed until one of them checks on you."

"Remain abed?" Cate repeated as Andrea fluffed the pillows behind her to sit up.

"Yes, Your Grace. And I am sorry, but I will not allow you to parade around until they've seen you."

"I'm hardly parading. Just trying to get dressed to go to breakfast."

"I have already rung for your breakfast to be brought here," Andrea answered. "And then after you've eaten and someone has assessed your condition today, you may be able to leave your bed."

Cate pressed her lips into a thin line as she arched an eyebrow. "I'm going to have to speak with Marcus about this. I'm not a child."

Andrea's lips curled at the corners. "Good luck. I have never known His Grace to back down from something like this."

Cate recalled the few times she'd tried to argue her case and come up against the brick wall that was Marcus Northcott. "You're right. It'll just earn me some sort of magical enchantment that will stop me from walking or leaving the bed."

Andrea burst into laughter. "I can imagine that, yes. And we wouldn't want that."

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “So maybe I’ll let him believe he can dictate this.”

Andrea offered her a knowing glance. “Very wise, Your Grace.”

The door to her suite burst open, and Molly, looking much more rested and refreshed than she had last night, entered with a tray. “Good morning,” she said in her usual cheery tone.

“Good morning. I’m relegated to bed this morning after having been a little tired last night.”

“No problem, best to take care of your health.”

“And how are you this morning?” Cate asked her as she set the tray on the bed.

Molly offered her a warm smile. “Much better. You’re right, I was panicking. I think I need to just sit back and let things work themselves out. Jack and I had a conversation earlier and he explained some things.”

“Good,” Cate said with a bob of her head as she pushed the scrambled eggs around on her plate. “You two make a nice couple, you know?”

“Aw, I’m so glad you think so. I was a little worried about that.”

Cate screwed up her face as she sipped her orange juice. “Worried about what?”

Molly pressed her lips together as Andrea made herself scarce to allow them a private moment. She sank onto the edge of the bed, her features scrunching. “Well...I didn’t know how you’d feel about us dating. You know, two employees dating first of all—”

“Okay, first, you are not employees. You are friends. You’re practically family.”

“And second...I know you and Jack are good friends. I just...didn’t want you to think he was getting a bum deal.”

“Bum deal?” Cate exclaimed, letting her fork clatter onto her plate. “Molly, what are you saying?”

“Come on...I’m a down-on-my-luck divorcee whose first husband left her for another woman.”

“You live in a castle, so your luck has changed. Second, so your husband was an idiot, that’s not your fault. And now we know Jack is also a divorcee—or soon to be.”

Molly grinned at her. “We’re on equal footing now.”

Cate leaned forward to grab her hand. “Molly, in all seriousness, though, I’d never think that about you. I’m happy for you and Jack. I hope this pesky business with Amanda is cleared up soon.”

“So do I. I...want to move on. I want to be happy again. Not that I need a man to be happy. I’ve been happy since I came here. What I mean is...I want to go back to not feeling like I’m upset over this relationship.”

“I don’t blame you. And I think you will very soon.”

Molly smiled at her as footsteps approached her bedroom. Anna entered, eyeing the situation before she set her gaze on Cate. “I see breakfast has arrived. How are you feeling?”

“Much, much better.”

“You haven’t eaten much,” Anna answered.

“Oh, I just started, and Molly and I have been talking.”

“I should get going before Mrs. Fraser sends a search party out for me. Take care, Cate. And thanks.” Molly patted her hand before she rose.

After she’d left the room, Anna eased into her place. “Ms. Williams seems a lovely woman, though a bit over-friendly.”

“Molly is very friendly. But we were friends before I came here, too.”

“Ah,” Anna answered, arching an eyebrow.

“I’m sorry, I know this must be confusing. I’m not from the 1800s,” Cate said with a wince.

“No, I gathered that, though you made a good show of it when we met. This is your time.”

Cate nodded as she sipped her juice. “Yes. And I used to be a college professor before I inherited Dunhaven Castle. Molly was the department secretary.”

“I see. One of the oddities of modern life is the unclear distinction of classes. Oh well. The important thing is you are feeling better. And you may be even stronger if you’ll just finish those eggs.”

Cate chuckled as she picked up her fork and stabbed at a few of them. “So, I was thinking I could visit the room in my visions after breakfast and—“

“Oh, that may be too early. You should rest.”

“Honestly, I feel fine.”

“But another attack could paralyze you, dear. We must tread carefully. Marcus said you have another mystery on your hands. Something to do with Mr. Reid?”

Cate slouched a little in the bed, unsure she wanted to discuss it with her mother-in-law. “Yes. He...is in a bit of trouble.”

“With murder, I understand. And a...pesky bride who won’t go away.”

“That about sums it up,” Cate answered as she piled the last of her eggs on her fork and popped them in her mouth. Sometimes Anna surprised her with how down-to-earth she was.

“Hmm, and Mr. Reid is unable to handle the woman himself?”

“I’m not sure there is any handling of Amanda. She seems...”

Anna raised her eyebrows, her lips still forming a slight frown. “Oh, one of those, is she?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod. “I’m afraid Jack will need some help with this.”

Before Anna could respond, the doors to Cate’s suite opened again. Marcus strode inside, sliding his phone into his pocket.

“Good morning, Catherine, Mother.”

Anna tilted her head to accept a kiss on the cheek from him. “Marcus. Finally. I was beginning to wonder if you had abandoned poor Catherine.”

“Certainly not,” he answered as he skirted the bed and eased onto the other side, reaching for Cate’s hand.

“Really, I’m fine. There’s no need for all this fuss.”

“I shall let Mother be the decider of that.”

“She is doing quite well, though concern from her husband is not unwarranted.”

Marcus slid his eyes sideways to eye the woman. “Well, I am concerned, though I shall leave her in your capable hands.”

“Leave?” This time the frown on Anna’s face was unmistakable. “What are you saying?”

“Something has come up. It must be attended to immediately. There is no way around it.”

“Something? Or Celine?” Anna’s voice sounded venomous as she spat out the woman’s name.

“Something,” Marcus insisted.

“And is this something in Maine?”

“Yes,” he answered.

Cate’s eyes darted back and forth between the two of them as the argument unfolded. She tried to think of a way to interject and stop it, but nothing came to mind.

“Something has come up in Maine and it doesn't involve Celine? Is this what you’d like me to believe?”

Marcus dropped Cate's hand and rose from his perch on the bed. "Mother, of course it involves her. But it involves me, too. There is no avoiding it."

"Isn't there?" The iciness in her voice chilled Cate to the bone.

He clasped his hands behind his back, his features twisting with annoyance. "Simply put, no. Dominique has crawled from under whatever chateau she's been carousing in and is causing an exceptional amount of trouble. Trouble that could ruin things for me, too."

"I see." Anna frowned, her eyelashes fluttering. "Why you involved yourself in the lives of these people is beyond me."

"You know very well Father's role in The Order was—"

"Not what yours is. I shall remind you of that." Anna kept her eyes trained in space, refusing to look at him.

"It makes no matter now. The cards have been dealt, and I must make the best play for myself."

"Fine. We shall be fine. Just remember your wife here, alone, ill, and investigating a murder on behalf of her estate manager."

"Catherine is very capable. And she is not alone. She has you."

"She needs her loving husband here to dote on her. Not an ocean away running about with that woman and all the trouble she brings."

"Really, it's okay," Cate said with a pat of Anna's hand. "I understand. Damien and I are good friends. And I know they're doing their best over there, but Marcus is an exceptional warlock. His help is invaluable."

Anna leaned closer to her. "Perhaps, dear, but his duty is to you. Not her."

"Yes, but...I don't want him to stay out of duty."

"Well, it appears he is staying out of nothing because he is not staying." Anna crossed her arms, her lips tugging into a deep grimace.

"That is untrue. If I had my druthers, I would stay at Catherine's side always. Yet, if I do not take care of this...problem with Dominique, I will be unable to be at Catherine's side at all."

Cate drew her chin back to her chest at the words. "Is it really that serious in Maine?"

"I'm afraid it is. Dominique is not a woman to be trifled with."

"Well, I hope you get it sorted out soon. Keep me informed and if there's anything I can do..."

“It is far too dangerous for you in Maine, Catherine. It is best that you stay here under Mother’s watchful eye.”

“Mother’s watchful eye?” Anna asked. “If you expect me to report to you on Catherine’s behavior, don’t. As far as I am concerned, Catherine can have ten suitors lined at her door the moment you leave, and I will not say a word.”

“That is not at all what I meant,” Marcus answered. “And I trust Catherine will not do that. As she may trust with great confidence that my eye is not straying to any other woman.”

“I don’t have any suitors lined up,” she said with a grin.

“No, likely not. Catherine is too busy solving crimes and piecing together her visions for that. A fact that you are counting on whilst you disappear to the wilds of America to aid Celine in her crusade against her cousin.”

Marcus heaved a sigh as the argument raged on. “Mother, I have grown weary of this. There is nothing I can do. The Order causes chaos for both of us. It is in our best interest to work together.”

“Well, since nothing I say matters, then I suppose you should be on your way. Goodbye, Marcus.”

“Mother—“

“Goodbye,” she said with a wave of her hand.

He grumbled as he shot a glance at Cate. She lifted a shoulder and offered him a demure smile.

“Might I have a private word with my wife before I leave?”

Anna’s annoyance increased, and she curled her fingers into fists. “Fine. Catherine, do not put up with anything from him. You have my permission to slap him if needed.”

“Thank you,” Cate said with a demure smile as the woman rose and strode from the room. She shot Marcus a wince. “You’re in trouble.”

“Always,” he said with a grumble to his voice.

Cate couldn’t suppress a giggle at the words. “Well, unfortunately, it sounds like there isn’t much to be done about it. Things sound...dangerous in Maine.”

“They are. Dominique is always a problem.”

“Who is Dominique?” Cate asked.

“Celine’s cousin. While you’d know it from looking at her as they are nearly identical, you’d never believe it. She was one of the most dangerous, evil women on this planet. If she has resurfaced, it spells trouble, not only for your friends across the pond but for me, too.”

“Well, then you should go and help them and you.”

“I shall stay in contact. You should attend to your own health, though.”

“I will. Your mother and I have a plan. And I’ll be busy with Jack’s problem. But if you need anything...”

“I won’t. As I said, it is far too dangerous in Maine, Catherine. If any problems crop up with The Agency, though, let me know at once.”

“I think you have enough on your plate—“

“Let me know at once.” His dark eyes bore into her.

“Okay,” she agreed. “Good luck.”

“Thank you, dear. I shall return as soon as I am able.” He kissed her cheek before he strode from the room.

She stared after him, a growing knot forming in her stomach. Was the trouble in Maine merely a distraction? And would it cost her Marcus, the only man who seemed able to help her fight the shadowy network of villains she was up against?

CHAPTER 5

Cate threw back the covers before her mind could sink any further into worry.

“What’s this?” Anna’s voice said as she hurried toward her. “Up and about?”

“I can’t sit in bed all day.”

“You can whilst you have a cup of tea. Then we shall tackle the day.” Anna plopped on the edge of Cate’s bed and held the covers up for her to slide under again.

“You’re going to spoil me with all this lounging around,” Cate said as she complied.

“As it should be. You are a duchess, Catherine. Duchesses should be spoiled.”

Cate grinned at her as Molly arrived with the tea and took her breakfast tray. She wondered how badly Anna would take it when she and Marcus divorced.

Anna poured the tea and handed her a cup balanced on a saucer. “Duchesses also should be cared for by their husbands. Oh, I am sorry, dear. I feel I have failed as a mother.”

Cate sipped her tea, settling the cup in the saucer again as her eyebrows pinched. “Why would you say that?”

“My son has made some questionable choices in life and just when I thought he had finally made a turn for the better, I see he is pulled right back into that nonsense in Maine.”

“Sadly, I think Marcus’s fate is tied to Celine’s.”

“Is it?” Anna said after a sip of her tea. “If he hadn’t been so damned foolish in his younger years, perhaps it would not have been.”

“But then we wouldn’t have met,” Cate countered.

Anna flicked her gaze up from the liquid in her cup. “Really? Do tell. I thought you met at a dinner party?”

“Well, actually, we did. A dinner party in the seventeen hundreds right here at Dunhaven Castle. Jack and I were time-traveling to investigate a problem with the time rips. Douglas, my ancestor, was good friends with Grayson Buckley. He and Celine were visiting. And Marcus arrived, intent on staking his claim on her.”

Anna drew her lips into a thin line. “Why, I will never know.”

“Well, anyway, at that very dinner party, Marcus and I were seated together. So, if it hadn’t been for Celine, we may never have known each other.”

“It does not make up for the trouble she has caused. She always was trouble. Even as a young woman.”

“From what Damien tells me, trouble finds her.”

“Oh, rubbish. She invites it with her foolishness.”

Cate winced, slouching down in the bed. “Do you feel the same way about me? I’ve brought quite a bit of trouble upon myself.”

“Certainly not. You have merely been a victim of the circumstances surrounding you. And you also actively fight against them. You are quite interested in learning, too. She is content to sit back and allow others to help her.”

Cate shifted on the mattress. Celine seemed proactive to her, but she didn’t want to argue with her mother-in-law. Instead, she offered her a slight smile. “I do like to learn.”

Anna’s expression softened into a grin. “I know. I am certain it is one of the many reasons Marcus fell in love with you.”

The words brought heat to Cate’s face. She was fairly certain her husband didn’t love her.

“I’ve made you blush. Though I imagine you’ll turn redder if I admit your beauty is certainly a reason he is enamored.”

Cate huffed out a chuckle. “Yes, I’ll be red as lobster soon.”

“You already are,” Anna said with a giggle. “But that is just one of the things that makes you so sweet as a daughter-in-law.”

The knot in Cate's stomach twisted tighter. She would really miss Anna. "Well, I couldn't have gotten luckier with a mother-in-law. Marcus didn't tell me you lived at Rosenberg when we traveled there until the last minute. I was convinced you would hate me."

"But nothing could be further from the truth." She patted Cate's hand as she set her empty teacup aside. "Now, I think we should discuss your visions a bit more."

"I'd love to," Cate said as she offloaded her cup and saucer onto the tray. "I have a question, if that's okay."

Anna grinned at her. "Certainly."

"Why am I having them so suddenly? I've never suffered from anything like this before."

"You have. You admitted to dreaming about the death of your parents."

Cate flicked her gaze to her lap with a sigh. "Yes, but I wasn't having waking visions or collapsing."

"I'm afraid Marcus is to blame for that," she answered.

Cate raised her eyes to her mother-in-law, her brow furrowed.

"You have exchanged blood, haven't you?"

Cate bobbed her head. "Yes, we did."

"Marcus's blood is quite powerful. It has enhanced an ability that was once contained to your dreams."

Cate batted her eyelashes as she tried to process it. "Wow."

"Now, shall we talk more about the visions that are disturbing you?" Anna asked.

"So far, these ones are still beating me. My reactions are so extreme."

"Mmm, I suspect they are deeply personal and negative."

Cate furrowed her brow. What was deeply personal? Could it have to do with her parents?

"When I have had such extreme reactions as this, they always had to do with Marcus and something terrible."

Cate's heart thudded against her ribs as she tried to determine who the memory may pertain to. Was it Molly or Jack? Her parents? Who was causing this much consternation?

"Hmm," she murmured as she bit her lower lip. "Maybe it's something to do with my parents. I don't know who else would produce this extreme of a reaction. Jack? We're close friends."

“Mm, I doubt it,” Anna said. “While I’m certain your concern for Mr. Reid runs as deep as it does for any of your other friends, it is not the same as family.”

“So, my parents then. Which points us to the past because they have been dead for many years. Actually, this makes sense. The Agency orchestrated their car crash.”

Anna fluttered her eyelashes at the statement but offered no response.

“You don’t agree,” Cate said.

“I don’t. But I am not an authority on everything, dear, so I could be wrong.”

“Then who?” Cate said with a shrug.

“We shall take the necessary steps to find out,” Anna answered with a pat of her hand. “But only safely. I will not allow you to endanger yourself.”

“But if it helps us...or helps whoever this vision is about—”

“It does us no good if you are harmed. And believe me, I am just as worried about who this vision may concern. But endangering yourself will do us no good at all.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped. “I just feel like I’m not making any progress. I keep seeing these visions of running through the castle and what’s worse is—”

Her voice cut off as emotion choked her, leaving a lump in her throat.

“Take your time, darling,” Anna said with a rub of her hand. “Get it all out. It will help.”

Cate licked her lips as tears burned her eyes. “The feelings I have are so intense during these visions.”

“That’s what makes them exhausting,” Anna said.

“So, it’s normal?”

“The intense emotions? Yes. Think of it like a dream. Emotions are always more vivid in your dreams than you experience in real life in most cases.”

“But dreams aren’t exhausting.”

“Aren’t they? You’ve never woken up in a cold sweat with your heart pounding?”

Cate let her gaze fall to her lap. “Okay, yes. But this is...an entirely different level. I mean... the fear...the panic I feel...it’s...overwhelming.

Even now, I could just..." The tears brimmed again and a few trickled onto her cheek.

Anna wrapped Cate in her arms and stroked her hair. "There, there, Catherine. Just let it all out. This has been building in you for quite some time, and you need to release it."

"Why am I so panicked? That question haunts me every day. What is happening in my future that makes me feel this way?"

"It could be anything, darling. That's what makes this so tricky."

Cate pulled back from her, searching her mother-in-law's eyes. "You have some clue. There's something you're not saying."

"Not really. I haven't any idea what this is about. And to speculate may do more harm than good."

"What do you mean? How could it hurt if you tell me what you're thinking?"

"Simple. It could make you even more upset in the present. The last thing we need is your energy being drained by emotions spent on something I've said that is absolutely untrue."

Cate heaved a shaky sigh before she sniffled. "It's driving me crazy, though, and I'd really like to hear some ideas so my mind has something more to dwell on than the panic."

"Your mind should not be dwelling on this or on the panic," Anna answered.

"I can't stop thinking about it. I have never experienced this level of emotion before. What is happening, and who is it happening to?"

"Yes, I know how difficult this is. I can recall many an intense vision that struck fear into my heart." She adjusted the covers around Cate. "But do you know what always helps?"

"Figuring out what's going on?" Cate asked.

Anna shook her head with a smile. "No. A happy vision. It always soothes me."

Cate offered her a weak smile. "I don't think—"

"Try. You have one, remember? You found a future memory that soothes you. Use it."

Cate settled back in the pillows with a sigh before she flicked her eyes closed.

"Now," Anna said, "there is the tricky part. Before, we used the rose to induce it, but you must find a way to immerse yourself in it without a prop."

Cate's eyebrows pinched together at the words.

"If you are wondering why, it is because these situations will often crop up at the worst moments. You cannot carry the rose about wherever you go."

"That makes sense." Cate tried to clear her mind and allow the future memory she sought to fill up the empty space.

Random thoughts darted across, though. She desperately tried to remove them, wading through concerns about the murder investigation, her visions, Marcus in Maine, Molly's precarious relationship with Jack...

With a sigh, she flicked her eyes open, her fingers curling into fists. "I can't find it."

"You're not trying."

"I am trying!" Cate exclaimed. "The problem is I've got a thousand other things floating through my mind and I can't--"

"You will always have thousands of things floating through your mind. You must push past them. You must learn, Catherine. What I am asking of you is not impossible. You are not a special case who cannot achieve this."

"I sure feel like it at the moment."

"I am sorry to inform you that as special as you are to Marcus, and me, and the people in this castle, in the grand scheme of things, you are just an ordinary, run-of-the-mill clairvoyant with the same problems as all of the rest of us."

"Okay," Cate said with a sigh. "Fine. Can you at least give me some tips?"

"Hmm, well, I'll try." Anna stared into space, her eyebrows pinching. "It's been a long time, though I do recall some terrible visions of Marcus. But there was always one that calmed me. And I had quite an easy time retrieving it."

Cate settled back, letting her shoulders relax as Anna spoke about her experiences. "That must be terrible. I can't imagine having a vision of a child experiencing something awful."

Anna offered her a soft smile. "Well, there have been many with Marcus of that nature. One vision always helped me because it filled me with so much hope and reassured me that everything would be okay every time I called it up. Now...how did I do that? Well, it was quite easy as it was tied to a very special moment for me."

“What moment?” Heat rose in Cate’s cheeks as she winced. “Oh, I’m sorry. I don’t mean to pry.”

Anna slid a lock of Cate’s hair behind her ear. “You’re not, darling. The moment that brought me the lovely vision that always brings me comfort is the moment I first held Marcus as a baby. I’m certain that’s why I had such an easy time recalling it.”

Cate slouched further under the covers. “That makes sense.”

“Yes. All I need to do is recall the moment that I held Marcus, and I am able to find that vision. It brings me great comfort in all my times of sorrow.”

Cate smiled at her. “It must be a wonderful vision.”

Anna arched an eyebrow and grinned at her. “Yes, dear, it is. Do you want to know what it is?”

Cate’s features twisted as she tried to decide which answer was the best to give. She wanted to know, but she didn’t want to pry. “If you don’t mind sharing it, I’d love to hear it.”

“I do not mind at all. When I first touched Marcus’s soft skin and his tiny fingers curled around mine, I had the most glorious vision of a woman who would change his life and mine. A woman who would always make certain her family was protected and who would fight by his side.”

Cate forced a smile on her face as her mind worked overtime. If Anna had seen Celine in her vision, why did she dislike her so much?

Anna grabbed Cate’s hands and squeezed. “That woman was you, Catherine.”

Heat washed over Cate again as the smile faded from her face, replaced by confusion as she stared up at her mother-in-law.

Cate swallowed hard, still trying to acclimate to the news. “Me?”

“Yes, dear. You. I will never forget that moment. Such a lovely, comforting vision. He spent so much time on that other woman. So frustrating, but I knew you’d be along, dear. I could hardly contain my excitement when Marcus brought you to the palace.”

Cate recalled the moment. Anna had been kind and gracious. She’d been eager to spend time with Cate and had quickly dispelled the notion that she was displeased with Marcus’s choice. Had her vision been the reason?

“Oh, I could have danced with joy when you arrived.”

Cate offered her a nervous smile. Their marriage was fake. And visions were often misleading. Why had Anna associated so much peace with this one, she wondered?

“Maybe I can try your method of recalling the moment associated with the rose. Maybe that will trigger my future memory.”

“It may. Perhaps the night Marcus gave you that rose is special to you for some reason.”

Cate’s stomach tightened as she wondered about that, but she closed her eyes and tried to recall the evening in the garden at Rosenberg. The colors of the sunset had been so vibrant and so beautiful.

The breeze had been cool on her skin. She’d marveled at the unique color of the roses amidst the lovely gardens overlooking the rolling hills of the German landscape.

She’d turned to find Marcus offering her a rose. The moment tugged the corners of her lips up, and she found herself floating for a moment before she landed in her suite at Dunhaven Castle.

Her lips formed a fuller smile. She had found it. She’d navigated to her comforting vision. She allowed herself to stay there for a moment, wrapped in the warmth of the scene despite her questions about it.

She finally let it slip away as her eyes fluttered open.

“Well, it looks like you found it...or one,” Anna said.

“I did,” Cate said as she beamed. “I found it.”

“Good. Let’s try again, shall we?”

“Go to the memory again?”

Anna nodded. “Yes. It’s taking a bit of an effort to get you there. You need to be able to recall that very quickly, no matter what’s happening around you. So, we’ll keep practicing with it until it gets easier and easier for you.”

Cate bobbed her head up and down as she settled back into her pillows again. “All right. I’ll try again.”

She swallowed hard as she tried to relax. This time, questions poured into her mind over the happy future memory Anna used to comfort herself. She shoved them away, trying to recall that evening at Rosenberg Palace.

Her mind fought to bring back the vivid imagery it had just so easily captured moments ago. This time, it became fraught with questions and the lovely moment skittered, fuzzy and unclear.

Her eyebrows pinched together as she fought for control of her own mind. Before she knew it, she stood in her room at Dunhaven Castle. But this wasn't the right memory.

A shriek filled the air and sent her racing into the hall. She sprinted and skidded around the corner, the set of double doors coming into view.

This was the negative vision she'd been dreading, the one that left her frozen with fear. How had she gotten here? And would she soon find out what she was racing toward?

CHAPTER 6

Cate struggled to control her fear as she continued to race toward the double doors at the end of the hall. Her heart pounded hard against her ribs, and her knees wobbled as she pushed herself to race forward.

Her breath caught in her throat where a lump formed. Tears clouded her vision, but she pressed forward. She shouted something, but the vision began to fade before she could make out what she'd said.

Her eyes fluttered open again, and she found herself shaking uncontrollably under her covers.

"Catherine," Anna called to her, holding her hands, "Catherine, you are safe. You are in your bed."

But Cate couldn't stop shaking, despite it exhausting her. The fear still bubbled inside her, squashing out everything else.

Her features twisted as tears spilled down her cheeks.

"Your Grace, what shall I do?" Andrea asked Anna as she hurried into the room.

"Put another blanket on her and hold her tightly. She is in shock. Her vision must have gone to the negative one."

Andrea bobbed her head up and down as she hurried to fetch another blanket. She returned moments later and threw it over Cate before she climbed onto the bed next to her and pressed it around her.

"Catherine," Anna said, cupping her face as she sobbed, "you are all right. It was a vision, it is gone."

Tears continued to spill down her face, though her shaking eased. She flicked her glassy eyes up to Anna, her lower lip trembling. "Scared."

"I know. You are very frightened. Panicked, in fact. But the vision is gone now. Take a few deep breaths and calm yourself."

Cate tried to suck in breaths, but her chest felt like a vice gripped it.

"Deeper," Anna said. "Let your muscles relax."

Cate tried to follow the advice, still finding her fingers curled tightly into fists.

"Close your eyes," Anna tried.

Cate shook her head. "Afraid."

"Yes, I know you are. Afraid to slip back into that vision. But I will talk you through it. Listen to my voice, stay with my voice."

Anxiety gripped her as she considered following Anna's instructions. What if she slipped back into that awful moment? She couldn't handle it right now. She couldn't live with that fear and panic again.

But even when she was awake, the fear lingered, making it impossible for her to relax. Her muscles ached from holding them so taut.

After a few blinks, she finally let her eyes slide closed.

"Good, Catherine," Anna said. "Now, listen to my voice. Let my voice be the guide. It is calling you to a quiet place where you feel safe. You can begin to relax there. First, your toes, then your entire foot."

Cate focused her energy on relaxing her toes that had curled tightly. She found herself able to relax as Anna moved on to relaxing the lower part of her legs. She worked her way up until Cate finally found herself able to breathe easier and her hands no longer clenched in fists.

As she sucked in deep breaths, no longer trembling, she flicked her eyes open. "That was scary."

"I'm certain it was. This is quite a terrible one, isn't it?"

Cate nodded as she tried to sit up but found herself stopped by Anna. "No, dear, not yet. Let's take a few more moments, shall we?"

"It seems to be getting worse."

"I am unsurprised by this. Have you any additional information about it?"

The tears stung Cate's eyes again as she shook her head. "No. Same thing over and over. I'm running to those double doors at the end of the hall. And I'm frightened, panicked. My heart is racing, there's a lump in my throat."

Anna stroked her hair as she shot a glance at Andrea. "Something very personal, indeed."

"But what? That bedroom is empty. Could it be an ancestor?"

Anna pressed her lips together in a thin line. "Let us not worry about that, shall we?"

Cate's forehead crinkled. "But I am. My mind keeps searching for some reason this is affecting me so deeply. Maybe it would help me to know or figure something out. I wonder if I could find out who that bedroom belonged to in the past."

Anna cupped her cheeks in her hands. "I admire your spirit, but, Catherine, you must allow your mind to relax. Please do not dwell on it."

Cate stared at her, noting the emotion clouding her eyes. "There's something you aren't saying, isn't there?"

"No, dear. I know no more than you."

"But you have some guess. Whenever I mention a potential person, you don't say anything. Because you disagree."

Anna offered her a half-smile. "You are quite astute, Catherine. I have a suspicion, yes. But it is merely that. A suspicion. And I fear, again, that it may do more harm than good."

"I don't see how. This is already doing quite a bit of harm."

"You need a break from it. We shall visit the room later today, until then, I recommend you remain abed and work on something else. There is another matter that is drawing your attention, is there not?"

"Yes," Cate answered with a nod, "I do need to work on Jack's little problem."

"Then I would suggest you do that. Andrea can bring you whatever you need. I shall leave you to it and check later. Andrea, please stay with Her Grace, though, in case she should need something or suffer another spell."

"Yes, Your Grace," Andrea said with a nod as she finally left Cate's side and rose to stand. "What may I bring you?"

"My laptop for now, thanks," Cate said as she finally pushed herself up to sit.

"I will fetch it immediately," Andrea said with a bob of her head as she hurried from the room.

Cate blew out a long breath as she settled back in her pillows. "I am quite the invalid these days."

“You are not an invalid,” Anna answered, her expression reassuring. “But I will keep a watchful eye on your health whilst my son wanders the globe worrying over other things.”

Cate tilted her head, offering her mother-in-law a half-smile. “I completely understand the need for him to leave.”

“That makes one of us.”

Cate reached out to take Anna’s hand in hers, ready to provide comfort rather than receive it. “I trust him. If he thinks he needs to be in Maine, then he needs to be in Maine.”

Anna puckered her lips. “You have more patience with him than I have, Catherine.”

“I understand that you don’t like Celine—”

“That is an understatement.”

“But that doesn’t mean their goals don’t sometimes align.”

Anna sucked in a breath. “You are a saint, Catherine. And this is why you make the perfect wife for Marcus. But I swear to you if he ever hurts you, I will kill him myself.”

Cate crinkled her brow. “Can he die?”

“Oh, yes, he can,” she said with a bob of her head. “Difficult, yes. Impossible, no.”

Cate chuckled at the statement as Andrea arrived with her laptop. “On that note, I will thank you for your support and let you go enjoy your day while I do some quiet work.”

“Good luck with it. I shall check on you in a bit.” Anna wagged a finger at her as she rose. “And do not try to visit that room. Andrea, keep an eye on her.”

“I will not let her out of my sight, Your Grace.”

Anna kissed Cate’s cheek before she strode from the room.

Cate shifted her gaze to Andrea who stood at the edge of the bed. “You really don’t have to watch me, Andrea.”

“I do, Your Grace. You are a wily one.” Andrea offered her a wink.

“I’m not that wily. And I promise to behave.”

Andrea crossed the room and tugged an armchair closer to Cate’s bed. “And I shall be here ensuring that is true.”

Cate heaved a sigh as she dragged her laptop onto her lap. “Why don’t you go find a book or maybe your laptop to watch a movie. I feel badly that you’re just sitting there staring at me.”

“I have a book, Your Grace. As soon as I am certain you are settled, I shall fetch it.”

Cate patted the covers on either side of her. “I am settled. I’m going to research this murder. So, please feel free to get your book.”

As Andrea disappeared from the room, Cate considered shifting the laptop from her lap and making a run for it. She wanted to take a peek into the room just to settle her mind.

Before she could make a move, Andrea returned. “Everything all right, Your Grace?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod as she opened her laptop. “That was quick.”

“I always keep a book in your sitting room for just such an occasion.”

“Oh?”

“Yes. I was not about to go back to my room and give you the chance to escape.” Andrea plopped into the chair and offered her a grin.

“Escape?” Cate said, her voice incredulous. “Me?”

“You, Your Grace. His Grace has informed me of how strong-willed you are. He has made it quite clear as has the dowager duchess that you are to always be protected, even from yourself.”

“Even from myself, huh?” Cate shifted in the bed with a shake of her head. “You really picked the wrong family to be a ladies’ maid in.”

“On the contrary, Your Grace. I have grown very fond of you, and His Grace has been quite generous to me.”

“So, he pays you well to make sure I can’t escape, huh?”

Andrea opened her book as she grinned at her. “I have no complaints. Now, if there is anything else I can bring you, just let me know, otherwise, I shall be here reading quietly.”

“Thank you.” Cate focused on her laptop and pulled up a search page. She tapped her keys as she typed in a search related to the murder. A variety of results populated on her page.

She pursued them before she picked an article. The title blared in bold letters at the top of the page. Tragic Night at Regency Grand: Local Man Found Dead

Cate stared at the picture of the ritzy hotel before she dove into the article.

In a shocking turn of events, a night of luxury turned deadly at the prestigious Regency Grand Hotel. Local businessman, David Hensley, was found dead outside of the hotels' opulent ballroom late last night. Sources say Hensley was involved in a heated argument at the bar where his girlfriend, Amanda Greene, worked earlier that evening.

Police were called to the scene after hotel guests reported a commotion. Upon their arrival, they discovered Hensley's lifeless body and a visibly distressed Greene nearby. The circumstances of Hensley's death are still under investigation, but early reports suggest foul play.

Hotel staff and guests expressed their disbelief and horror at such a tragedy occurring in what is considered one of the city's safest and most prestigious locations. The Regency Grand's management has assured their continued cooperation with authorities as they piece together the events of this tragic night.

Cate frowned at the article. It gave her no more information than she had so far, but at least it didn't mention Jack. She wondered how many witnesses were involved. Could they get their names or find any of them? Certainly, they could find them in the past.

What would they say?

She chewed her lower lip as her mind picked apart the details of the article. She drummed her fingers against her thigh, wishing she had a pen and notepad. She couldn't get up to get one, and she hated to disturb Andrea.

"Something wrong, Your Grace?"

"I'm so sorry," Cate said, raising her eyes to her ladies' maid. "I need a pen and notepad. I'd like to make some notes."

"Of course, Your Grace," Andrea said as she set her book aside and scurried from the room.

Cate re-read the article as she waited for the materials.

Andrea returned with them quickly. "Anything else?"

"No, thank you so much, and I'm sorry to disturb you."

"It's no problem at all," Andrea said as she settled into her chair and opened her book again.

Cate settled back into her pillows as she wrote the questions filling her mind. Who was David Hensley? Who were the so-called witnesses who had alerted police? And how had he died?

The article gave scant details, but it didn't mention Jack. She didn't know if that was a good thing or a bad thing.

She returned to the search results and clicked on the second article entitled Murder at the Regency Grand. The sub-headline indicated that a bartender had been released without any charges.

She skimmed the article and discovered that the bartender in question was Amanda. After being questioned by police, she was released and cleared of any involvement due to an undisclosed alibi.

Cate's heart skipped a beat. Was Jack her alibi?

She jotted a note about it on her notepad along with the question.

The article continued, stating the police did not comment on whether they had any other suspects in the case.

The lack of charges, according to the journalist, fueled speculation and rumor in a case that gripped the city. Police had not yet ruled out any motives, though friends described Hensley as a charismatic, well-liked individual. The suggestion that he had some tumultuous relationships and business rivalries that could have led to the crime topped the list of theories.

Cate scrawled business rivalries across her paper with a question mark as she puckered her lips. What sort of business was David Hensley in, she wondered.

Maybe Jack would know the answer.

She moved on to a third article. Dated a year after the murder, it detailed the still-unsolved mystery. She perused the short write-up.

A year has passed since the unsolved murder of David Hensley at the Regency Grand Hotel, and the case remains as mysterious as ever. Despite extensive investigations, police have yet to bring charges against anyone, leaving the case cold and the city's residents with more questions than answers.

Several theories have emerged over the past year. Some believe Hensley's death was connected to his business ventures, possibly a deal gone wrong, while others insisted it was a crime of passion. Amanda Greene, Hensley's girlfriend at the time and the initial person of interest, has tried to move on, but the cloud of suspicion seems inescapable.

Cate paused at the line. How had she tried to move on? Was it because of her marriage to Jack that the journalist had suggested this?

The article went on to say that the hotel had seen a downturn in business after the crime with guests stating that they were unable to shake the association with the unsolved crime. It ended with the burning question: will justice ever be served?

A shiver snaked down Cate's spine as she worried it was about to be served with Jack's head on a platter.

"Everything all right, Your Grace?" Andrea asked.

Cate pulled her eyes from space and focused them on her ladies' maid. "Yes, just...more questions than answers."

Andrea closed her book. "You're researching the murder?"

"Yes," Cate answered. "It's been unsolved for a while. It's a cold case."

"Good thing you have the ability to return to when it wasn't."

Cate smiled at her. "I like the way you think, Andrea."

Andrea offered her a coy grin. "Yes, I know. I believe this is why His Grace felt us a good match for lady and ladies' maid."

Her mind wandered back to meeting Andrea in the fifties. Marcus had then brought the woman along to several other time periods. Her attitude toward time travel rivaled Cate's. She was open to every opportunity to be of service no matter the era.

"I wonder if it's possible to just go back and witness the crime," Cate said, her eyes narrowing as she chewed her lower lip.

"Witnessing is one thing, proving is another," Andrea answered.

Cate heaved a sigh. "You're right. Although at least we'd know who we were aiming for."

"Good point. However, you may also become a target."

Cate wrinkled her nose. "You're right. We have to figure something out, though."

"I'm certain you will," Andrea answered as a knock sounded at the door.

Her ladies' maid rose and scurried to the suite's double doors. A moment later, Jack appeared in her room with Andrea trailing behind him.

"Hi, not feeling well?" His features looked ashen. She imagined he wasn't having the best day given his wife's arrival.

"I'm fine, I'm not sick."

"Oh? I beg to differ. Mrs. Fraser has a pot of her famous chicken soup on after Anna summoned the staff to inform them you are not to be disturbed as you are unwell."

Cate gave him an awkward smile. "Sorry. She means well."

"She's terrifying. I'm afraid I might get my head chopped off if she finds out I'm here."

"She said it was okay to investigate the murder. And I need your help with that, so you're not disturbing me."

Jack glanced at Andrea before he focused on Cate again. "Uh..."

"Andrea's fine. She's been helping me with both the investigation and my other problem."

"More visions?"

Cate nodded. "This is why I'm in bed. They've been paralyzing."

Her shoulders slumped as the fear she felt during them welled inside her.

Jack eased onto the edge of her bed with a shake of his head. "Oh, Cate, I'm so sorry. Maybe it's best if I—"

"Don't say if you deal with Amanda on your own, because it's not. I need a distraction from whatever is causing these visions. If I don't, I'll go crazy. Or end up locked inside my own head."

"I don't know if that's true, Cate. Maybe your visions are this bad because you're worried about this."

Cate shook her head. "No, Anna says they are this bad because it's about something personal. She suggested I focus on the murder case to keep my mind from getting stuck on the visions."

Jack grumbled as he shot a glance sideways. "A murder case to distract. What kind of lives are we leading?"

"Interesting ones. I just wish I knew what personal thing has me so upset."

"Maybe it's something to do with someone trying to hurt you. That's pretty personal."

"Maybe. But I'm not in danger in the visions. I'm...running toward something, not away from it."

Jack rubbed his chin as he considered it. "How certain are you about that?"

"Very," she answered. "I've been through it enough times to know that I'm definitely running toward something. It's a room in this castle. I don't know why, but I'm trying to get there as quickly as possible."

"How do you know this?"

“I just...do. It’s odd, this thing I have. There are just details that you know, sort of like in a dream.”

Jack remained silent for a moment before he shook his head. “What if we tried to go to that room?”

Cate let her gaze fall to her lap. “I plan on it, but not yet.”

“Not yet? Cate, why not?” Jack questioned.

She chewed her lower lip, tears forming in her eyes as she flicked them up to his. “Because I’m afraid it might kill me.”

CHAPTER 7

Silence stretched between Cate and Jack after her ominous statement. Jack's wide eyes spoke volumes as he stared at her, his features ashen. "Cate..."

"I'm not..." She shook her head. "I'm being a little theatrical."

"I don't think you are. Cate, I've never known you to overflow circumstances."

She eyed him with a shrug. "I mean...this isn't easy. But...I don't think it'll actually kill me. I just...the emotions I feel are so raw, it's hard. Last night I couldn't move much after the vision, which is why I'm in bed today."

"This is insane." Jack sprang from the bed and paced the floor. "And they don't have any suggestions on how to fix this?"

"It's an odd thing, and it's just going to take time to learn how to deal with it. I'm already learning, but this is just a tough one. Anna is going to take me to the room later, but I don't want to go now because if I have that vision again..."

"I understand. As much as you want answers, you must be dreading them."

Cate nodded in a silent response to his statement. "So, instead, let's focus on something else."

Jack rolled his eyes. "Me. And my trouble, I suppose."

"That's what I was doing, yes." Cate waved the notepad in the air. "I actually looked up a few articles and took some notes, but I may need help making sense of them.”

Jack collapsed on the edge of the bed with a sigh. “I suppose in the interest of your health, we’ll have to talk about this.”

“I’m sorry. I know this can’t be easy, but the sooner we solve it, the sooner things will get back to normal,” Cate said.

Jack scrubbed his face with his hands before he nodded. “I suppose so.”

“Actually, we can put it off for a minute while I poke my nose into your business with Molly. Have you spoken with her?”

“This morning. I tried to make her understand. I think she does.”

“Did you tell her the entire story?”

“The whole sordid thing. She knows, at least, that there’s no romance between Amanda and me. Never was and never will be. I honestly thought we were divorced.” Jack leapt to his feet again, his fingers curled into fists. “I can’t believe she never filed.”

“It does seem opportunistic,” Cate said. “Like she was holding on to this in case she ever needed it.”

“I don’t understand it. I asked over and over. Why, Amanda?”

“What did she say?” Cate asked.

Jack shrugged and shook his head. “Nothing. She just shrugged and stood there. And then she gets that look. That damned look.”

Cate raised her eyebrows, prodding him to continue.

“The pouty look with the tears in her eyes like I’m the problem. Like I did this. She’s almost acting like I was really her husband and ran out on her.”

“I really think The Agency may be behind this. I wonder if we could get her to admit that.”

“What difference would it make if we did? Then, we’d know, but we still couldn’t do much about it.”

“We could if she’d just divorce you and leave.”

“Not when she’s trying to pin a murder charge on me,” he answered.

“I can’t believe she would say that. All these articles I read don’t even mention you—which is a good thing. Were you questioned?”

Jack bobbed his head up and down. “Aye, I was. But I was never even considered a suspect. It’s just...I was with Amanda earlier that night in the pub...and...at the hotel. And...I was her alibi.”

“But you said you lost track of them.”

“I did. But...”

Cate heaved a sigh as she shook her head. "You let her use you anyway. And I assume it came out that you two were seeing each other or something similar, and you married shortly after."

"We did, yes. A few days after the murder."

"Do you have any idea who did it? There's tons of speculation in these articles, but there were never any arrests."

Jack flicked his gaze to Cate, pressing his lips into a thin line. "Honestly, no. I...always thought...maybe Amanda did do it."

"And you married her anyway?" Cate exclaimed before she winced. "Sorry, I'm sorry, I didn't mean to sound so judgmental."

"No, it's fine. It's a valid question." Jack swallowed hard as he clasped and unclasped his hands. "I just...she...I thought if she had, it was because of how badly he treated her. Maybe it was an accident. And she just wanted to move on, so...I helped her. Stupid of me, but I never expected this."

"Of course not. You were just trying to help. Believe me, I understand."

"I'd love to believe that you do, but..."

"Jack," she said, placing a hand on his forearm as she shot him a glance, "I married a warlock to save Dunhaven Castle. Believe me, I understand."

A smile spread across his features before a laugh escaped him. "Oh, right. You probably do. We really drew the short straws on spouses, eh?"

Cate eyed him. "Sorry, I think you take the cake on this one. Mine isn't that bad. Just...strange."

"Strange isn't quite the description I would use for that man. All the...weird powers."

"But he's rather charming and very well-mannered."

"He also comes equipped with a flashlight, which is highly useful," Jack said with a laugh.

Tension eased away from Cate as she chuckled along with him. "Yes, very useful when investigating things. Oh, and the location hopping. Trapped? No problem, Marcus can just blink you to a new place."

Jack shook his head. "I can't get used to it. I don't know how you took it so in stride."

Cate shrugged. "I don't know. I guess...it all happened so fast, and I was so focused on finding you that...I didn't care what tricks he had up his sleeve."

"And I am ever so grateful you found me."

Cate reached for his hand and squeezed it with a smile before Jack glanced over his shoulder. "Where is the old ball and chain, anyway? I'm certain he'll pop in at any moment to dismiss me."

"In Maine," Cate said as she shifted her notebook. "Some pressing business with Celine's cousin."

"He left? Really? I'm shocked."

"I'm partially glad since now we can focus on this problem without him hovering. But I do hope he fixes whatever the problem is with this Dominique person."

Jack scrunched his features. "If she's Celine's cousin, why would there be a problem?"

Cate shrugged. "I assume they are on opposite sides. Anyway..."

"Yes, let's move on. Their lives are far too complicated for me."

Cate nodded as she consulted her notes again. "Okay, what can you tell me about the victim? The articles said he was a local businessman, but that's about all I found."

"He was, yeah. Quite a bit older than Amanda. Uh, he had a few local shops." Jack tugged one corner of his lips back. "Rumor was...he wasn't quite legitimate."

Cate's eyebrows shot up. "Really? What was he rumored to be involved in?"

"Money laundering," Jack answered.

"That's not true!" a new voice shouted.

Heat rose in Cate's cheeks as she flicked her gaze to the doorway to find a red-faced Amanda standing in it. "Amanda."

"It's not true. David was not a criminal. And you can't pin this on someone else by saying that."

Jack rose from his perch on the bed. "Look, Amanda—"

"Don't, Jack," she said as she poked a finger at him. "I just cannot believe you could do this, but I see why."

Her eyes landed on Cate. "You've been living comfortably here while I've been struggling just to survive."

At her words, the little dog next to Cate picked his head up and studied her.

"Oh, hardly," Jack argued.

"Come off it, Jack. Here you are, in the big castle, bowing to the lady of the house, spending the morning in her bedroom."

“Oh, now, Amanda, that’s going too far,” Jack warned. “Cate and I are friends. And she’s trying to help me out of this mess you created.”

“I created?” the woman shouted. “You did it! You killed him.”

Cate tugged her chin back to her chest as the woman issued the accusation.

“Amanda, I did not. I wasn’t even there.”

“Weren’t you? You were right there. Because you did it. I saw you do it.”

Jack shook his head. “I don’t know where this is coming from. But you need to stop.”

“I’m sorry, Jack. But I can’t protect you any longer. I won’t. I married you to help you. And to find out that all these years, you’ve been just going about your life on your merry way and leaving me to fight for everything, well, it’s too much.”

“But I—Bah, never mind. You won’t listen.”

Amanda crossed her arms and shook her head.

“All right, if Jack did it,” Cate said, “why didn’t you say anything to the police? Why did you marry him to protect him?”

“Because...I...I felt he deserved it. David was...difficult. And at the time, I felt a certain sense of freedom from him. I felt Jack had provided that. I was grateful. But now I’m starting to believe you were just jealous.”

“I was not. No offense, Amanda, but you and I weren’t exactly involved. I saw you a few times at the bar. That’s it.”

“Then why were you constantly after me?”

“I wasn’t,” Jack argued. “I’m sorry if you mistook my trying to stop Hensley from smacking you around as romantic interest, but it wasn’t.”

“Why were you in the bar so much then?”

“It was right near where we lived. That’s it,” Jack answered. “I was only trying to help. You seemed like a nice girl. I thought what he was doing to you was awful. I’d have stepped in for any woman in your position.”

Cate shifted her gaze back to Amanda, gauging her reaction. Tears shined in her eyes, but she wouldn’t back down. “I don’t care, Jack. You can’t talk your way out of this. You ripped away my life all those years ago, and you’re still trying to do that.”

Jack puckered his lips, his frustration obvious as he let his gaze fall to the floor and shook his head.

“All right, look, we’re getting nowhere here. Maybe it’s best if you go back to your room and relax, Amanda.”

“Until what? Until you throw me out?”

“No,” Cate answered with a shake of her head. “Just until everyone’s tempers cool off. We’ll figure this out.”

“There is nothing to figure out! I’ve been protecting Jack for all these years, and now, I’m finished. I’m going to the police. I’m going to recant my statement and tell the truth. I’m going to tell them you did it.”

Cate threw back the covers and scurried from the bed as Jack’s jaw clenched. “Now, wait, just a minute. There’s no reason for that.”

“Isn’t there?” Amanda shouted. “Speak for yourself, princess.”

“Easy,” Cate answered, her expression pleading, “just take it easy. There’s no need to rush to do anything. You’re welcome to stay here for as long as you’d like. No one is going to throw you out.”

“Really?” The woman crossed her arms, her features questioning.

Cate nodded. “Yes, really.”

“Why? Why would you help me? You seem awfully chummy with my husband.”

“Because I am Jack’s friend. And I want to help both of you. Now, I don’t know what happened all those years ago, but I do know that we need to sort out what’s happening right now.”

Amanda flicked her gaze to Jack before she lowered her eyes to the floor.

“Maybe we can even help figure out what happened back then,” Cate said

Amanda snapped her gaze back up to her. “I know what happened. Jack killed him.”

“I’m sorry, Amanda, but I don’t believe that.”

“So, you’re calling me a liar.”

“No, but I think you may be confused—“

“I’m not confused!” she shouted.

“Excuse me,” a new voice said. “What is going on here?”

Anna strode into the room, features pinched.

Amanda tightened her arms across her chest, his lips tugging into a frown.

“Catherine, you should not be up. And you certainly should not be engaging in an argument.”

“No, the princess shouldn’t be subjected to the likes of me, I suppose.”

“That is not what I said, but if you choose to take it that way, perhaps you have some guilt,” Anna retorted.

Amanda’s features twisted with anger. “I don’t have no guilt, lady.”

“Don’t you? Then why did you assume my statement referred to you?”

“I’m the one arguing with her.”

“Yes, and I said nothing about her being subjected to you, simply that she should not be arguing. She has suffered an episode and must rest. Now, if you can be kind, you may stay. But if you continue to pick a fight, you should go.” Anna arched an eyebrow as Amanda stared at her, a frown on her face.

Her eyebrow raised further, and she set a hand on her hip, continuing the stare down with Amanda.

“I’ll just...be in my bedroom. I could use some rest, too.”

“Yes, I think you could,” Anna answered as Amanda backed away. “I shall have tea sent up for you to help you relax.”

“Thank you,” Amanda said meekly before she offered a weak smile and spun on a heel to leave.

“Wow,” Jack said, “that was impressive.”

“Never let anyone push you around,” Anna retorted as she pushed past him to help Cate into bed. “And never flout my advice. Catherine, you should be resting, not fighting.”

“I’m sorry, but she wants to pin the crime on Jack, and I know he didn’t do it.”

“Of course, he didn’t.”

“Amanda wanted to go to the police,” Jack explained. “Cate was defending me.”

“Are you incapable of defending yourself?” Anna questioned.

“No, but—”

“Then why did you not do so?”

“Well, Amanda sees red the moment I speak.”

Anna eased onto the edge of the bed next to Cate. “And she has accused you of the crime.”

“Yes,” Cate said. “And this is a cold case. I researched it all morning, but I have more questions than answers. One of them being why Amanda seems to be convinced Jack did it. She says she saw him do it. Why would she lie?”

Anna heaved a sigh. "Perhaps she is not lying."

"I didn't do it," Jack said, heat in his voice.

"I did not say you did," Anna shot back in a measured tone.

"Well, if Amanda says I did it, and you say she isn't lying, then—"

Anna held a hand up as he spoke, shushing him. "Because Amanda's memory may have been tampered with. We do not know, but The Agency is adept at such things."

A chill shook Cate as the hairs on the back of her neck stood up. "I never thought of that. Can that happen?"

"Yes. They could implant a false memory. It is not simple, but it can be done. A woman as impressionable as Amanda is an excellent subject for just such an event."

"Do you think The Agency could have been behind the murder itself?" Cate questioned.

"I doubt it. Jack, you remember this from the original timeline, am I correct?"

"Yes," Jack said. "Yes, it happened. David was killed, I married Amanda, that all is correct."

"Then it's likely they are simply capitalizing on the event. That's typical for them. They are sowing chaos because they are working somewhere else and do not wish us to know it."

Cate's stomach turned over at the words. Would they ever be free of this? And what else was The Agency working on that they wanted Cate and Jack away from?

She sank her head into her hands as she shook it. "What else?"

"That, my dear, I believe is tied to your vision," Anna said as she rubbed Cate's shoulder.

Cate's gaze slowly rose to meet her mother-in-law's. If her assessment was correct, whatever they'd face after they'd solved this murder would be far worse than anything they'd faced before. And she wasn't certain she'd survive it.

CHAPTER 8

Anna patted Cate's shoulder. "Now, dear, let's not get ourselves all riled up. We shall face both problems together."

"Maybe you ought to work on Cate's. She's terribly upset over it. And I can handle—"

"I shall decide what is worked on, Mr. Reid. Catherine cannot constantly obsess over her visions. It is unhealthy. Your case gives her some measure of relief."

"But—"

"Have you or have you not both solved mysteries similar in nature to this in the past?"

"Yes," Jack said with a bob of his head.

"Good, then you shall do so again."

"But—"

Anna offered him a stern glance, cutting off his statement in one word.

"Right. Of course."

"And we will work on Catherine's visions in between your investigation. Catherine, this is an excellent opportunity for you to learn to balance things. You will always have visions. And you will always have many other problems."

"You're right," Cate said with a bob of her head. "I will. So, what should we tackle first?"

Anna rose to her feet and clasped her hands as she paced the floor in thought. "Well, perhaps a trip back in time is in order. After that, we shall work on your vision. Perhaps visit the room you have been seeing.”

Cate bit her lower lip as she considered it.

“Maybe the other way around,” Jack answered.

“No. The trip to the bedroom may incapacitate her. I’d rather she tackle the time travel first.”

“Right,” Jack said with a nod. “Good point. What date shall we go to?”

“Night of the murder?” Cate asked.

“And what?” Jack questioned. “Just...wait and see what happens?”

Cate shrugged. “It’s worth a shot. When we went back earlier with Randolph’s murder case, we didn’t learn much of anything from it.”

“No, we just spent lots of time in the past, and we were just as in the dark about the murder as we were when the whole blasted thing started.”

“Well, I guess we head back to the crime and find out what’s happening. Oh,” Cate said with a wrinkled nose, “it’s all the way in Oxford.”

“We’ll have to build in time to get there.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped. “Yeah. That’s inconvenient. I really liked time travel with Marcus. He just opens the portal wherever we need to go.”

“I can open a portal for you,” Anna said.

“Yes, but we wouldn’t be able to return.”

“Haven’t you the magical button that returns you?” she asked. “I thought Marcus gave you one.”

“He did. It returns me to wherever he is. And I doubt he wants me showing up in Maine. And what about Jack?”

“Perhaps you should,” Anna said before she shook her head. “Never mind. The button will return you and whoever you touch. Give it to me, I shall modify it to return you to me.”

“That would be very good. I was not looking forward to traveling.” Cate dug her necklace, containing the timepiece and button, from under her nightgown.

“At least it’s in modern times, Cate,” Jack said. “In the past, we’d had to go by horse or buggy or...on foot after I wrecked the car.”

“Still...I’m getting kind of spoiled with Marcus making things so easy.”

“And here I thought time travel of any kind excited you. Now, we’re getting picky.”

She giggled as she slipped the necklace off and handed it to Anna. She fiddled with the button, muttering a few Latin words before she handed it back. “Here you are. Switched.”

“Shall we try it?” Cate asked.

Anna arched an eyebrow at her. “Do you think me an amateur?”

“No,” Cate said with an apologetic smile, “but...”

“Then you shall be fine. Now, you should dress, and we will meet in a discreet location outside. I will open a time portal. When you have finished assessing the killer’s identity, return here and we shall discuss next steps.”

“Right,” Cate said as she swung her legs over the side of the bed.

Andrea pulled clothes from the cabinet. “Since it wasn’t that long ago, Your Grace, these clothes should do.”

“Yes,” Cate agreed as Jack pumped a fist in the air.

“Finally, we get to time travel in regular clothes.”

Cate grabbed them and hurried to the bathroom. “I’ll just be a minute.”

As she pulled the clothes on, Cate wondered what they would find when they stepped back in time. Would the mystery be easy to solve? Perhaps there was a clue overlooked, or a suspect that hadn’t been questioned. How easy would it be to pin the murder on the guilty person?

Her heart twisted as she considered their return. She’d have to face her visions again. She wondered what would happen... Would she finally make progress, or would this be another setback?

As she zipped her boots, she shook her head. “One problem at a time,” she murmured.

With her hair tugged into a ponytail, she emerged into her bedroom. “All right, I’m ready. Let’s go solve a murder.”

Jack swallowed hard before he nodded at her. “Okay.”

“There’s a mausoleum on the property which may be a good place to leave from,” Cate said.

“Yes, I do hate to open time portals in the house.”

Cate smiled at the sentiment, recalling the turmoil they created as she led the group from her bedroom. They stepped into the warm sunshine and made their way across the property to the mausoleum.

“Good luck, Catherine. I hope you find results. I will send you back several hours before the murder so you may get into the place easily.”

Cate nodded at her before she stretched her hands in front of her to open a time portal. The winds whipped around them as they waited for the hole to grow large enough to enter.

“It’s open! Go!” Anna shouted over the din.

Cate grabbed hold of Jack's hand as they stepped toward the black hole sparkling in front of them. They walked for a few seconds in blackness before they emerged in a new location.

Jack glanced around the abandoned alley. "This is the alley behind the bar where Amanda worked."

"And it looks like a few hours before sunset. Which gives us some time to get oriented."

Jack shifted his weight from foot to foot. "Or hide."

"Hide? Jack, we're here to figure out what happened, not hide."

"I know, but..." Jack pressed his lips together into a thin line as he sighed.

"What?" Cate asked.

"I'm not entirely comfortable being back in a spot where I could run into myself."

Cate sucked in a breath. "Oh, right. Yeah, that could be tricky, but...if you see yourself coming, we'll go the other way."

"Very funny, Cate. I'm still concerned the world will collapse in on itself with two Jack Reids around."

Cate giggled as she stared at him. "I've really missed time traveling with you."

"Oh yeah? I thought you loved His Royal Highness's magical powers."

Cate offered him a coy grin. "It's His Grace, and sometimes they come in handy."

"Like when you need to disappear quickly from a tight spot?" Jack asked.

She nodded, holding in a laugh.

"I still can't get used to that. One minute we were in a closet. The next we were on the street. I don't know how you do it, Cate. You make being a warlock's wife look so easy."

"It's a gift," she said as she glanced around. "Anyway, without his location hopping skills here to help us, maybe we should get out of this alley before we get caught."

"Yeah, by me. I can't handle that."

They hurried to the end of the alley and peered around the corner of the building.

Cate furrowed her brow as she flicked her gaze to Jack. "Wait, which of you can't handle it? Present you or past you?"

Jack glanced at her, his face twisted with confusion. “Me. This me. No, wait, that me. Neither me can handle it, Cate. At that age, I won’t be able to handle knowing about time travel. And at this age, I can’t handle telling myself about time travel.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as she nodded. “I think I get it. And I do really miss time traveling with you. Marcus is quite used to talking to himself at any age.”

“I can’t. Please don’t. The idea of one of him is enough. But two? I couldn’t handle that either.”

“It is rather odd,” Cate said as they stepped onto the sidewalk and hurried down the street toward the hotel. “Especially because they act somewhat different.”

“I really don’t know how you took to all this so easily. It’s not normal.”

“It’s definitely not that. Damien helps.”

They pushed into the doors of the hotel. “The ballroom is that way,” Jack said with a nod of his head. Let’s check it out.”

“Okay,” Cate said.

“Damien is odd, too. I don’t care how nice he seems. He’s an odd duck.”

“So am I, I guess,” Cate said with a shrug. “Maybe that’s why I don’t mind it. It’s kind of fascinating.”

“I’ll stick to plain old murders, thanks. Well, except this one. I’d have been happy for this murder to stay buried.”

“I’ll bet.” They stepped into the ballroom that was being readied for tonight’s event with hotel staff placing linens on tables and setting up chairs.

“I’m sorry, this is off-limits,” a woman with a clipboard said.

“Oh, we’re just passing through,” Jack said as he pointed toward a door across the way.

“Sorry,” she said with a shake of her head. “The entire area’s closed.”

“Oh, but—“ Cate tried but the woman flicked her hand toward the door as she marched them to it.

“Well, that went over well,” Cate said with a sigh as they stood in the lobby again.

“Really. And now we’re stuck out of here. My former self could dart past us at any moment.”

Cate glanced around, finding a restaurant on the opposite side. "Let's get something to eat. We can watch the entrance from there."

"Eat? How can you eat at time like this?"

"I thought you always could eat," Cate said.

"Not when there are two of me running around here. How did you handle it? Have you ever spoken to yourself?"

"No. I just saw myself when you were missing. So far, I haven't had any conversations with myself." She approached the host stand and requested a table for two.

They settled in at the table and perused the menu. "Now that you mention it, I could eat. Everything looks good to me."

"I figured," Cate answered with a chuckle. "You and your stomach."

"Oh? I suppose His Grace doesn't eat."

"Oh, he does. Usually in the most extravagant places." Her mind flitted back to their meal at a prestigious club while searching for Jack. "Of course. I'd expect nothing less. Oh, and given your recent travels with him, someone here may know you as the lovely Duchess of Wherever."

"Stratfordshire," she answered as she took a final glance over the menu.

"Right." The waitress approached, and they placed their order before resuming their conversation. "So, will you be leaving Dunhaven for Stratfordshire, then?"

"I've never been, but I can tell you, I will not be leaving Dunhaven at all. Dunhaven is my home."

Jack offered her a smile. "That's good to hear, Cate. I think we'd all miss you if you decided to reign over another kingdom."

Cate chuckled at him as she took a sip of her water. "I would miss all of you, too. I'm not going anywhere. Dunhaven needs me."

"Yes, we do," Jack said as their meal arrived.

"And we need you, too," Cate answered as she dove into her pasta. "So, we have to fix this."

"I didn't do it. I still can't believe Amanda says I did."

"I wonder if we can get Anna to hypnotize her. Maybe we can sort through clues that way, too."

Jack flicked his eyebrows up. "It's worth a shot, but I don't know if we'll get her to agree."

"Sometimes, you don't need a person to agree when Anna is around."

Jack wrinkled his nose. "She's as frightening as her son."

Cate's fork clattered to her plate as she laughed. "She is. I remember when I first met her, I was terrified. Marcus didn't tell me. I barely got a word out to her."

"She likes you at least. She looks at me like I'm a slug."

"Or like she's about to turn you into one," Cate answered, still chuckling.

Jack shook his head. "It's not funny. See how nice the grounds look around Dunhaven when you've only got a slug for an estate manager."

"Let's hope that doesn't happen. I'll do everything in my power to stop Anna from turning you into an animal or bug of any kind."

"Thanks," he said with a grin, "I really appreciate that."

"Anytime," Cate answered with a smile. "Well, I think we'd wasted enough time that the ballroom is now open, so maybe we can slip back into the back hall and catch a murderer."

Jack didn't move. Instead, he sat staring at the white linen tablecloth, a frown on his face.

"What is it?" she asked.

"I just...go catch a murderer. I don't like it."

Cate rose from her seat, her smile broadening. "You never do. But it has to be done, so let's get it out of the way."

"Fine, fine," he said as he slowly climbed to his feet. "We'll go find out who murdered this man, then all we'll have to do is prove it. And this entire mess can be finished."

"That sounds like a fantastic plan."

"Yeah," he answered, "let's hope it works out that way."

"What could go wrong?" she asked.

"Don't tempt fate."

They crossed the lobby, finding the ballroom doors propped open and guests filing in and out.

"I don't see anybody suspicious," Cate said, scanning the room as they crossed it.

"No, I don't either. Though I don't know what someone suspicious would look like to be honest," Jack answered, his gaze darting around the space.

"Gun-toting maybe," Cate said before she shot him a grin.

"Oh, right. What was I thinking? He's probably wearing a giant sash that says Murderer, too," Jack answered, wiggling his eyebrows at her.

“That’s what I was hoping for, yeah.” They stepped into the hall where the murder would occur in just over an hour and searched it for a suitable hiding spot.

“I don’t see a good place to hide,” Jack noted.

“Me either. I wonder if any of the smaller ballrooms are open. We could slip into one of those.”

“Aye, that’s worth a shot, I guess.”

Cate nodded as she crossed to a set of double doors and wrapped her fingers around the brass handle. She tugged at it, finding it locked.

Jack tried another set across the way but found it locked, too. Cate tried the last set at the end of the hall. As the door swung open toward her, she shot a glance over her shoulder and grinned at Jack. “Found one.”

“Great. It should give us a good view of the hall, too. We’ll be able to see exactly what happens.”

“Good, then we can solve this and put it behind us.”

“So we can focus on your problem,” Jack said with a nod as they slipped into the darkened room.

“I’m not certain I really want to focus on it. And I’m eternally grateful that I haven’t had any visions while we’ve been here. Maybe Anna is right, and I need the distraction.”

“Or you’re just that bad of a psychic.”

The voice that answered her made Cate’s skin crawl. She spun to scan the dark space, lit only by the twilight outside the windows. Heels clicked across the wooden floor as Gianna stepped from the shadows.

Cate’s fingers curled into fists at her sides as she stared at the woman’s smirk. “Of course, you’re here.”

“Yes, I am. And I’m so pleased to find you unprotected. Where is your duke?”

Cate refused to answer.

Gianna shrugged. “It doesn’t matter. All that matters is he’s not here. What a delicious opportunity.” She drummed the tips of her fingers together. “What to do?”

“You’ve caused enough trouble,” Cate shot back. “This is your worst, though.”

Gianna threw her head back with laughter. “Oh, really? Is that what you think? Well, well, well, I can’t wait for you to see what I have in store for you next. Though I really can’t take credit for digging up Amanda.”

“Oh? Who did that? Your superior or one of your minions?”

Gianna crossed her arms as she continued to chuckle. “Oh, no, darling. That would have been your loving husband.”

Heat washed over Cate as the woman issued the blame. “I don’t believe that.”

“I don’t much care, but it’s the truth.”

Cate swallowed hard as she tried to think of a response when a voice cut through the air behind them. “...fairly certain I left it in the small ballroom.”

Cate’s stomach dropped as footsteps approached. She shot a terrified glance at Jack. Someone may catch them hiding in the ballroom. Would they lose their secret spot before they witnessed the murder?

Light spilled in as the door started to open.

“Time to go,” Gianna said.

Cate twisted as the woman tore a card in half and tossed it toward them. Cate’s features pinched as an electrical energy crackled between the two pieces before it shot toward them. She lifted her arms to block the attack when the bolt hit her, jolting her body before the world went black.

When her eyelids fluttered open, she found herself in an unfamiliar location, staring up at a cloudless night sky.

Next to her, Jack groaned as he rolled onto his side. “What happened?”

“I have no idea, but I don’t think we’re in Kansas anymore.” Cate pushed herself up to sit, catching sight of a woman laying nearby, her features twisted.

“No kidding, I wonder where she sent us,” Jack glanced around, trying to get his bearings.

“I’m not sure but—“

Cate’s words were cut off as the woman nearby pushed up to sit, scanning the space before she screamed. “What happened? Where am I?”

Cate’s stomach twisted. The voice had been the same one who had almost caught them in the ballroom. She shot a panicked glance at Jack. Gianna had not only sent them spiraling through time, but she’d accidentally sent an innocent bystander with them. How in the world would they explain this to the poor, terrified woman?

CHAPTER 9

The woman's lips formed a terrified grimace as she touched the grass below her, her features incredulous.

"Oh, no," Jack said with a wide-eyed stare.

"Yeah, this isn't good," Cate answered as she scrambled to her feet. "Excuse me, excuse me."

The woman shot her a panicked glance.

"Hi, I'm Cate. What's your name?"

"A—Amy Grace," she answered.

"Well, Amy Grace," Cate said, trying to keep her voice tempered and even, "this may take a lot to explain, but you're perfectly safe. Just...in a new place...and time."

The woman nodded, her head bobbing slowly up and down before she snapped her gaze to Cate, her eyes uncertain. "What?"

Cate winced as she tried to think of the best way to explain what had just happened to the woman. "Well..."

"I think we're in London," Jack answered.

"But when?" Cate murmured.

"How did I get to London?" Amy Grace's features contorted as she shot a fearful glance at Cate and Jack. "What did you do to me?"

"Nothing," Cate said. "We are victims, here, too."

"Victims of what?" she asked.

Cate sighed as she scanned the area. "Of a group of people who are determined to make our lives horrible."

“Why did they pick me?” Amy Grace asked.

“You were caught in the crossfire. But it’s okay. We’re going to help you.” Cate reached a hand toward the woman to help her up.

Amy Grace stared up at her, the fear still lingering in her eyes.

“I promise we’ll get you home. I know it’s not a lot to go on, but you’ll need to trust us.”

“What if I don’t want to?” she asked.

Cate exchanged a glance with Jack, who shrugged.

“You’d be far better off if you did,” he answered. “You’ve just been sent to—”

“Well, just a second, Jack. If she’s uncomfortable, there’s no reason to force her. I feel responsible for what happened to you, and I’d like to help, but if you don’t want to come with us, that’s okay. I can leave my information with you, and you can find us when you’re ready.”

“Cate...” Jack began. “We can’t leave her here.”

“And I’d prefer we didn’t, but I’m not going to force her to come with us. I don’t want her any more traumatized than she is already.”

Amy Grace’s eyes darted back and forth between them as they spoke. “Okay, okay, you two seem normal enough. I’ll go with you. I still don’t understand how we got to London, though.”

Jack glanced around again. “The better question isn’t how we got here, but when are we?”

“What?” Amy Grace asked. “Why do you keep saying when? It can’t be too far from whenever they grabbed us, right?”

“Uhhh,” Cate said, shifting her gaze to Jack again with a wince.

“Well...” Jack rubbed the back of his neck, his nose wrinkled.

A car rolled past on the nearly empty street.

Amy Grace furrowed her brow. “Ha, look at the old car.”

“I’m afraid it’s not as old as you think,” Jack answered. “Wait here, I’m going to try to find a newspaper.”

“What did he mean by that?” Amy Grace asked.

“I’ll explain later,” Cate said as she wrapped her hand around Amy Grace’s. “Come on. Jack, wait up. We’re coming, too.”

Jack hurried ahead of them to the street corner and leaned closer to the newspaper box. He squinted at the date before he stood, running his hand through his hair as he rose.

“Well?” Cate asked.

“Nineteen fifty-five,” he answered. “Well, that’s not terrible, but not great.”

Cate pressed her lips together as Amy Grace shifted her gaze between the two of them. “Are you two playing a prank?”

“No,” Jack said with a shake of his head.

“Amy Grace,” Cate answered, keeping her voice calm and measured, “I have some more bad news. Well, it’s not bad so much as it is...strange. And it’s going to be difficult for you to understand.”

“Difficult to understand? That you’re fooling with me? What is the date, really? Have we been missing for over a day?”

Cate shook her head.

“More?”

Cate shook her head again. “No, it’s complicated. The people who did this...they can control not only location but...time.”

“They can control time,” Amy Grace repeated, her features unimpressed with the statement.

“Yes,” Jack answered. “Which is how we ended up not only moving from Oxford to London, but to nineteen fifty-five.”

“Nineteen fifty-five,” she said. “We are in nineteen fifty-five.”

“Right,” Cate answered. “Which is a stroke of luck, actually.”

“Well, I agree. As I said, this is not the worst time to be in. We’re not in a war, there are phones, cars. We can get to Dunhaven—“

“Wait, I’ve got the button for that. We can just use this. Although, that doesn’t help Amy Grace.”

“No, but it does let us return home where we are better equipped to deal with this.”

“Button?” Amy Grace asked.

Cate nodded. “I’ll explain later. Uh, Anna said it returns me and whoever I’m touching, so I guess I should touch both of you and rub it.”

Jack nodded as Cate dug the necklace from under her tunic and grabbed the button. She laced two fingers through Amy Grace’s and two through Jack’s before she flicked her thumb across the button. “Oh no.”

“Should it have worked by now or is there a delay?”

“There’s no delay. It should have worked by now. But it’s not working.”

“Do you think Anna disenchanting it when she changed it?” Jack asked.

Cate shook her head. “No. I’m guessing the electrical charge did something to it. Maybe that card was laced with anti-magic.”

“Anti-magic? What are you saying?” Amy Grace shouted.

“Shh, don’t say that so loud. Most people don’t know about magic,” Cate warned. “But I know someone who does. And like I said, it’s a lucky stroke we landed in London in this era. I know exactly where to go.”

“You do?” Jack asked.

Cate grabbed Amy Grace’s hand as she nodded. “Yes. If we can find a cab, I can get us there.”

“How will we pay for it?”

“Oh, right,” Cate said with a wince. “Okay, we’ll walk. I just...need to find Ellerby Crescent.”

“Ellerby Crescent?” Jack screwed up his face. “What’s there?”

Cate tugged Amy along with her as she sought to find her bearings in the massive city. “Marcus’s townhouse. And by extension, mine.”

Amy’s brow furrowed further. Cate offered her a smile. “My husband lives in this time...sometimes.”

“Your husband lives in nineteen fifty-five, but you’re from—“

“No, actually, we’re not from that time. We’re from the future,” Jack answered. “Never mind. Try not to think about it. Cate, will he know you?”

“Probably. We were married in the eighteen hundreds. And that version of Marcus knows me.”

“You married your husband who lives in the nineteen fifties during the eighteen hundreds...” Amy’s voice trailed off as she stared into space.

“It’s complicated,” Cate answered.

“And then some. Okay, I have no idea where Ellerby Crescent is from here, but I’ll ask at that pub up ahead.”

Cate nodded as he trotted into the bar, and she turned her attention to Amy Grace. “How are you holding up?”

“Just peachy,” she said with a frown. “I have managed to travel through time with two strange people who seem perfectly comfortable with this.”

“Jack and I have a lot of experience time traveling.”

The woman eyed her again, her forehead crinkling. “Oh, well, of course, you do. Apparently, you have traveled quite a bit. And been married in another century.”

“Actually, I was fake married in another century. I really got married in 2014. Although, to be honest, we time-traveled to do that, too. It’s all very confusing.”

“Sounds like it,” Amy Grace answered as Jack rejoined them.

“Okay, I’ve got the directions. Let’s head over to his...your...Ellerby Crescent.” Jack led them further down the sidewalk.

“Is it far?”

“No, not very, thankfully,” he answered before he leaned closer to Cate. “How’s she holding up?”

“I can hear you,” Amy Grace said. “And I’m...actively trying not to think about it. It’s disturbing to think I’d end up in the nineteen fifties. How will we get back?”

“Well, that’s what we’re trying to figure out. You see,” Cate said, “we usually have a way to return, but it seems the magical item they used to send us here fried my magic button. I’m hoping my husband can help.”

“Right, of course. The magic button,” Amy Grace said with a nod.

“I know it sounds strange,” Cate began.

“It sounds crazy, actually.”

They rounded a corner, and Jack led them up the block, across the street, and turned again onto Ellerby Crescent.

“Which one is it?” Jack asked.

“Fifty-five,” she answered. “Oh, it’s dark. Darn it.”

“You don’t have a key?” Jack asked.

“Not on me. I wasn’t planning on being in London today.”

Jack stared up at the dark house as Cate climbed the steps and rang the bell. “Maybe he’s asleep.”

No one answered, and she tried knocking, though the sinking feeling that no one was home grew in her. She heaved a sigh as she shook her head. “Sorry, looks like no one is home.”

“Maybe he leaves a key under the mat,” Jack suggested.

“I doubt it. He can unlock doors with magic. He doesn’t need a key.”

“So, what?” Amy Grace asked, her voice turning shrill. “What does this mean? We’re stuck?”

“No, of course not,” Cate said. “Do you know where Mr. Smythe’s office is?”

“Yes,” Jack answered with a bob of his head, “but Cate, William Smythe isn’t even alive yet.”

“No, but his father, Charles is. He can call Marcus.”

“Oh, right. You know his father. What was I thinking?” Jack squeezed his eyes closed as he shook his head. “Okay, well, I suppose if we leave now, we can make it to his office before it opens and wait for him there.”

Cate nodded as she glanced at the hints of light streaking the eastern sky. "Right. Okay. Hopefully, we'll have some help soon."

Cate shot a glance at Amy Grace, offering her an apologetic smile. "Sorry," she said. "Do you need to rest before we go?"

"No," she answered with a shake of her head. "I'd rather keep moving. When we stop, I can't stop thinking about how strange this is. Hopefully, I'll wake up and find out it was all just a really bad dream."

Cate smiled at her again as Jack led them on another trek through the city toward the law offices of Smythe, Smith and Smithton. They arrived as the city began to come to life with the birth of the new day.

Cate slicked a lock of hair behind her ear as they waited outside the offices. "I hope he remembers me."

"Me too," Jack answered.

A few people filtered into the office, offering them a strange glance as they passed by, before Charles Smythe appeared.

He stopped as he spotted Cate, his eyebrows furrowing. "Your Grace? I didn't realize you were on my appointment book today."

"I'm not," Cate said as she wrung her hands. "I've run into a bit of trouble. My plans fell through, and I had to stop in London. But I don't have my key for the London house."

"Oh, dear, well I certainly can help you with that. We keep a spare key here for emergencies."

"Oh, good. And can you also contact Marcus?"

"Of course. He should be in Germany. I'll call at once. May I offer you tea?"

"Yes," Cate said with a sigh of relief. "We'd love some. And thank you so much, Charles."

The man held the door open for them to enter the office, leading them to a richly decorated conference room. Cate eased into the chair with a sigh as the secretary scurried in with a tray of tea.

Amy Grace sipped hers as she leaned back in the chair. "I hope someone takes care of my poodles."

"Don't worry," Jack said, "with any luck, we'll return to the moment we left or shortly after. No one will miss you."

Amy stared down into her tea, her forehead creasing.

Any further conversation was stopped by the arrival of Charles Smythe. "I have your husband on the line."

He pulled a massive phone from the middle of the table closer to Cate. After he pressed a few buttons, he spoke into the receiver. "Your Grace? Yes, I have Her Grace right here. Just a moment."

Charles offered the phone to her. Cate settled her teacup onto the saucer and took the receiver. "Marcus?"

"Catherine. What are you doing alone in this time period?"

"That's a good question, and I can explain it later, but I need your help with a few things. Is there any way you could come to London?"

"Yes, I can. I will be there by mid-morning. Charles will send you to the house in a car."

"Thanks," she said before she replaced the receiver on the base and smiled at Charles. "Thank you, Mr. Smythe. Marcus is coming to London."

"Yes, and I have the car arranged to take you to the townhouse."

"Thank you," Cate said as she rose from her seat.

Charles handed her the key. "I will send a messenger to pick up the key whenever you'd like."

Cate nodded as he motioned for them to follow him from the room. After tucking them in the back of the chauffeured car, he waved them off.

Cate blew out a sigh as the car threaded through the streets toward the London townhouse she'd stayed at before.

"Your Grace?" Amy Grace asked as the buildings blurred by their window.

"Yes, Cate is a duchess."

"A time-traveling duchess?" she said. "Really?"

"I used to be a time-traveling countess, but I upgraded."

"Or downgraded. I'm still not certain," Jack said with a wiggle of his eyebrows.

Cate offered him an amused grin as the car slowed to a stop outside of the townhouse. "Very funny, Jack."

They climbed from the car and approached the house again. Cate slid the key in the lock and pushed inside the quiet space. "Home, sweet home. Make yourself comfortable."

She motioned toward the living room as she shuffled inside and plopped on the couch. "With any luck, Marcus can send us right back to where we came from."

"Let's hope," Jack said as he slid into an armchair.

Amy Grace hovered in the doorway, shifting her weight from side to side.

“Amy Grace,” Cate said as she sat straighter, “why don’t you sit down and try to relax? Hopefully, we’ll be home soon.”

The woman chewed her lower lip. “I’m worried about my dogs.”

“What kind of dogs do you have?” Cate asked. “I have teddy bears.”

“Poodles,” Amy Grace answered as she finally settled into an armchair. “Three. Blazer, Heidi, and Archie.”

“I bet they’re really cute,” Cate said with a smile. “Oh, can I offer—“

Her words cut off as Dembe appeared in the doorway with a bow. “Duchess, may I bring tea?”

“Oh, Dembe. I didn’t realize you were here.”

“I have just arrived. His Grace will arrive within the hour.”

“Oh, good. And yes, tea would be lovely. Would anyone like anything else?”

“I’ll be okay with the tea,” Amy Grace said.

Jack winced as he stared at the man. “Do you have any biscuits?”

“Of course, sir,” Dembe said with another bow before he left the room.

Cate flicked her gaze to him.

“What?”

She shrugged. “I’m surprised you didn’t ask for a Full English.”

“I could have, but I was trying to be polite,” Jack answered.

“I’m still confused as to how you two can sit there so calmly in the face of being transported through some magical mechanism back to another time period,” Amy Grace said.

“We’re rather used to it,” Jack answered. “Besides time-traveling to solve cold cases and the like, we’ve also accidentally been pulled through time by The Agency. And I’ve had the lovely experience of being imprisoned by them in another century, so this is a walk in the park.”

She stared at him as though he spoke another language.

Cate offered a nervous chuckle as she slid her eyes to Amy Grace.

“He’s joking, right?” she asked.

The laugh continued to roll from Cate. “Sadly, not.”

She bit into her lower lip as a shadow hovered in the door. Her eyes went wide, and she leapt from her seat. “Oh, good, Marcus is here.”

“Catherine,” he said as he strode into the room, his eyes scanning it. “And others.”

“Hi,” she said. “Sorry to pop in unannounced, but we’re having some... trouble.”

“With The Agency, I assume.”

She nodded as his eyes went to Amy Grace.

“And our friend?”

“Along for the ride,” Cate answered. “She accidentally got caught up in the crossfire.”

“I see,” Marcus said. “Perhaps a private word is in order, dear.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod. “Jack, can you stay here with Amy Grace?”

“Sure,” Jack said, offering her a dubious glance as she shot him a smile.

Cate snaked past them and followed Marcus into the foyer. He motioned for her to precede him upstairs. She climbed up, slipping into her bedroom.

“Sorry,” she said with a shake of her head as she spun to face him.

“Are you unharmed?” he asked.

“More or less. And very glad that we ended up in this time period in London so close to the house. I can’t imagine what would have happened if we’d ended up somewhere else. Especially with that poor woman who is stranded with us.” Cate wrung her hands as she chewed her lower lip. “I really hope she doesn’t tell anyone.”

“Not to worry, Catherine, once you return her to her time, I will ensure she has no memory of the incident.”

Cate flicked her eyebrows up. “You can do that?”

Marcus stared at her, a blank expression on his chiseled features.

“Right, of course, you can do that,” she answered with a nod. “All right, well...”

“What happened to your button?”

She dug it from under her tunic and slipped the necklace off. “It doesn’t work. Your mother re...magicked it or whatever.”

He tugged his eyebrows together. “She did what?”

“She...changed it. She made it so we go back to wherever she is, not wherever you are. Because you are in Maine doing something dangerous.”

“Am I? And I have left you unprotected. That doesn’t sound like me.”

“It was urgent. And this murder thing seemed to be an easy mystery for me to handle. Plus, your mother was there to keep an eye on me.”

She handed him the necklace.

He flicked his gaze up to her after he took it. “Highly doubtful she made an error.”

“I don’t think she did either. I think whatever Gianna used to send us here somehow shorted it out.”

“What did she use?”

Cate shrugged as she fluttered her eyelashes. “Some kind of card. She tore it in two and threw it at us. There were tiny lightning bolts that shot out of it.”

Marcus pressed his lips together as he shook his head.

“I’m sorry, I’m not explaining it very well.”

“No, I know exactly what you are talking about, Catherine. And unfortunately, I have very grim news.”

Her stomach turned over at the words as she snapped her wide eyes up to him.

“You are stuck in this time.”

CHAPTER 10

Cate's jaw dropped open as her stomach clenched. "Stuck? Like forever?"

"At least until we find a solution."

She pressed a hand over her heart as she shook her head. "Please don't scare me like that. Okay, the solution is to open a time portal for us."

"Unfortunately, that is not a solution."

Cate scrunched her features. "Why not? Oh...did someone use anti-magic powder on you?"

"No, Catherine. It has to do with the card used. The Ace of Hearts."

Cate offered him a questioning glance. "What about it?"

"It is designed to send the victim to another time...and freeze them there."

Cate's stomach clenched at the words. "Freeze them there? What?"

Marcus draped the necklace around her neck again. "No conventional means of time travel will work. We must seek a solution to this."

"You don't know the solution? Can't we...counter it with another suit or something?"

Marcus chuckled at her as he rubbed her cheek with his thumb. "Oh, I do enjoy you, Catherine."

"Thank you, but I'd rather you enjoy me in my own time period. And that we solve the murder Jack's being accused of, return Amy Grace to her time and erase her memory, and solve these visions that are haunting me."

“Well, Catherine, for the time being, you will have to work on some of those things whilst here.”

Cate paced the floor. “How in the world am I supposed to solve a mystery in the future?”

“You could work on the visions.”

She pressed a hand to her forehead as she spun and crossed in the opposite direction. “What about Amy Grace?”

“I could put her to sleep until the situation is solved,” Marcus answered.

Cate winced. “No. That seems...overkill. She’s been doing well so far. I don’t know how she’ll take this development though.”

“Likely better than the gardener.”

Cate let her shoulders slump. “I really wish you were the version of you that has evolved to not call him the gardener.”

“Sorry, I have not been upgraded yet, dear,” Marcus said with a grin.

She offered him an amused smile. “I suppose I’ll just have to take what I can get.”

“I will begin preliminary research on the card. I suspect the best place to begin will be the library at Rosenberg. I shall call Mother.”

“Okay. What can we do until then?”

“Nothing, dear. I will have Dembe prepare rooms for our guests. Oh, and if you wouldn’t mind, I’d prefer to dine at the club without them.”

“That’s kind of rude.”

“Fine, we will all dine out.”

Cate sucked in a breath as she nodded. “All right. If there’s any research I can do, let me know. Otherwise, I’m just going to pace the floor here until it’s time for dinner.”

“I shall send you to Rosenberg to help Mother.”

“But that leaves Jack and Amy Grace here...alone.”

“I won’t bite them,” he answered. “But fine. I shall send all of you.”

Cate nodded. “All right. Hopefully, we’ll find something that’ll be an easy fix.”

Marcus offered her a dubious smile as he reached for the door.

“It bothers me that you’re not saying anything.”

“Does it?”

“Yes,” she said with a bob of her head. “Why?”

“Because, Catherine, I do not wish to tell you that this will likely be another long haul. I know you prefer quick solutions.”

“Are you saying I’m impatient?” she asked, her nose wrinkling.

“I have not said those words, and I will not say them.”

She set her hands on her hips. “But that’s what you’re getting at. You think I’m impatient.”

He flicked his eyebrows up, clasping his hands in front of him.

“Why don’t you just say it?” she asked.

“Because I do not have the desire to die, darling.” He kissed her cheek before he stepped to the door. “Now, if you are ready…”

She heaved a sigh as she shook her head at him. “Yes, I’m ready.”

She squeezed past him into the hall and headed for the stairs. “We can use a location hop, right?”

“Of course,” Marcus said as they descended.

“No,” Jack answered. “No, I didn’t just hear what I think I heard, did I?”

Cate arrived in the foyer and winced at him as he hovered in the doorway to the living room. “Yes, you did.”

“Oh, no. No, no, no. Please. I’ve had enough already. Just send us home. Look, if we’ve got to go to Dunhaven to use the watch, we can do that. I’ll drive. I don’t mind.”

“Unfortunately, it’s not quite that simple,” Cate answered.

“Cate, I’ll even take the creepy portal through time courtesy of your husband. But, please, no location hop.”

“What’s a location hop?” Amy Grace asked.

“A horrible thing,” Jack said with a shake of his head.

“It’s not,” Cate countered. “It’s a…magical form of travel where in one second, we will be here, and in another, we’ll be at another location.”

Amy Grace stared at her for a moment before she shrugged. “Why not? We’ve already traveled through time, and you have a magic button. Why not this, too?”

“I told you she would take it better than the gardener,” Marcus said as he poured himself a cup of tea.

Cate shot him an unimpressed glance.

“That’s very funny, very funny,” Jack said as he paced the floor. “You can call me what you’d like. Call me the head weed puller for all I care. But please don’t whisk me across the world in one of those…hops.”

“Fine, we can leave you here. No problem,” Marcus answered.

Jack wrinkled his nose. “Okay, never mind. I’ll make the sacrifice.”

Marcus stared at him. “Wonderful. We shall leave after Catherine finishes her tea.”

“We could go now. I don’t need—“

His raised eyebrow silenced her.

“I’ll drink my tea.” Cate dutifully sank onto the couch and poured a cup of tea. She took a slow sip, flicking her eyebrows up at him as she settled the teacup into the saucer. “Happy?”

“Incredibly,” he answered. “You haven’t gulped it down.”

“Amy Grace, would you like more tea?” Cate asked.

“Sure,” the woman answered. “I may as well have another biscuit, too. I may need the energy for the trip to...where are we going again?”

“Germany,” Cate answered. “Marcus has a palace there with an extensive library.”

“Why do we need it?” Jack asked. “Can’t he just send us back to where we were?”

“No. Apparently, the mechanism Gianna used has stranded us here.”

“Stranded!” Jack and Amy Grace shouted at the same time.

“Temporarily, yes. No traditional means of time travel will work to return us to our time or...any other time. We’re stuck in nineteen fifty-five until we can figure out how to counteract that card she used.”

Jack slapped a palm against his forehead. “Oh, no. How could this happen? And why can’t you fix it? Aren’t you Oz, the Great and Powerful?” Jack shot a pointed glance at Marcus.

With an unimpressed stare, Marcus sighed. “This is not a fairy tale, Mr. Reid. Magic is messy. Can I fix it? Yes. Do I need more information to do so? Yes. We shall begin our search for information in Germany.”

“Why can’t the library be here?” Jack lamented as he grabbed another cookie from the plate.

“I would be most happy to leave you here, Mr. Reid,” Marcus answered.

“You’re not leaving Jack anywhere. We stick together.”

“Cate’s right. No splitting up. People get killed when they split up.”

Amy Grace raised her eyes to him, her teacup clattering into her saucer. “Have you known many people who have died?”

“No,” Jack answered, sliding his eyes to Cate. “But some of us almost have.”

“I have not.” Cate shook her head. “Don’t listen to him.”

She took the last sip of her tea and placed the saucer on the tray. "I'm finished, let's go."

"Patience, Catherine," Marcus answered as he strode from the room. "I must speak with Dembe before we leave."

Cate rose and paced the floor. "I hope we find some information in that library. It's incredibly frustrating to be stuck here."

"At least we're not stuck in a horrible time period. There are some modern conveniences here," Jack answered.

"Not enough. And we have no access to solve the murder."

"You're solving a murder, you said?" Amy Grace asked.

"Yes. One that was about to occur in the hall between the two ballrooms," Jack answered. "We were hoping to spot the culprit, until we were sent here."

"How odd. You time-traveled to witness a crime, but why not stop it?" Amy Grace asked.

"We can't," Cate said. "Well, more like we shouldn't. It could change the course of history. We try to meddle as little as possible with the timeline."

"But this crime was unsolved, so your solving it is meddling," Amy Grace pointed out.

"Yes, it is, but...there isn't much choice. Jack's been accused of it over a decade later."

"I see. And you didn't do it, I take it?" Amy Grace asked.

Jack shook his head. "Of course not. I wasn't even there at the time. But a witness says I was."

"That's awful. I can see why you'd want to change this history."

"First," Cate answered as she plopped onto the couch, "we'd like to know what happened. Maybe the case will remain unsolved, but we have to be able to clear Jack's name."

"Are there no other suspects?"

"Plenty," Cate answered, "from his girlfriend to some sketchy business associates, but no one the cops could pin it on."

Amy Grace drummed her fingers on the chair's arm. "Who didn't have an alibi?"

"That's another thing we'd need to look into if we can't identify the assailant clearly," Cate answered. "There's so much work to be done. This detour is incredibly frustrating to deal with."

Cate curled her fingers into fists before she shot an apologetic glance at Amy. "And I'm truly sorry that you got dragged into this."

"Don't fuss over me. I'm rather enjoying myself, actually. I've never time-traveled before. And I'd like to help with the investigation, both into how we'll get back and who murdered this person."

"Well, I really appreciate your offer, but..."

"But what?" Amy Grace asked. "I'm quite good at solving things. I read plenty of mystery books."

"Me too," Cate said with a smile. "And we're happy to have your help. I just don't want you to get caught in the crossfire here in either situation."

"I'm counting on you fine people to keep me safe."

Jack offered her a solemn nod. "We'll do our best. Just stick close to us."

"Well, I'm not going with him," Amy Grace said as she thumbed toward the door. "No offense, but he's kind of strange."

"It's okay. He is. So am I, to be fair," Cate answered.

"Not that strange," Jack answered. "I can remember when you were plain vanilla Cate."

"I'm still plain vanilla Cate. Now I just come with sprinkles," she said with a chuckle as Marcus strode into the room.

"Are we ready?"

Cate nodded as she rose. "Yes."

"Good. Now," Marcus said, holding out a hand, "everyone will need to touch my hand and in a moment, we will be in Germany."

They gathered around him, each of them placing their hand on his. The room faded away, replaced by the grandeur of Rosenberg Palace's sitting room.

"Wow," Amy Grace said. "This place is something else."

"There you are, Marcus," Anna said as she set down her teacup and rose. "And dear Catherine. How lovely to see you again, dear."

"Hello, Mother," Marcus answered.

She pulled Cate into a tight embrace before she stepped back and eyed the other two.

"And I see Mr. Reid is among us and along with..."

"Amy Grace...oh," Cate said, her brow furrowing. "I'm afraid I don't know your last name."

"Hoffman. Amy Grace Hoffman. I accidentally came along."

“Well, Ms. Hoffman,” Anna said with an arch of her eyebrow, “this is delicate work.”

“I’ve got the stomach for it. After all, I accidentally time-traveled today with my new friends, Cate and Jack. And now, I’ve...eh...what is it that we just did again?”

“Location hop,” Cate answered.

“Right. I’ve location hopped, so why not do a little research?”

“I see,” Anna answered. “I suppose at least you have a good attitude about it. Which is more than I can say for some of us.” She flicked a narrow-eyed glance at Jack before she plastered a smile on her face.

Before she could move them to the library, the doors burst open. A maid hurried in, carrying a black and white dog.

“Oh, Athena,” Anna said with a genuine grin that reached her eyes as she lifted the dog from the woman’s arms. “How stunning you look freshly brushed.”

“That dog reminds me of good sir Riley,” Jack said with a chuckle as Anna kissed the dog’s head.

“She should. She’s his mother.”

“What?” Jack asked. “Are you joking?”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “Riley was one of Anna’s dog’s pups. Oh, wait, that was in the eighteen hundreds. Maybe—“

“That is the same dog, dear. Mother couldn’t bear to lose her,” Marcus answered.

“Wow, I wish my poodles lived that long,” Amy Grace said.

“Oh, you have dogs. How lovely,” Anna answered. “Are they not simply wonderful?”

“I think so,” Amy Grace said with a nod.

Anna handed the dog back to the maid with a smile before she clasped her hands in front of her. “Well, I suppose we should begin. This way.”

She led them to the library on the second floor. “I have already pulled several volumes that may provide some insight. Though I fear we will not find many answers. This may take some doing, Marcus.”

“Yes, I agree. But we must start somewhere.”

“I’m happy to wade through what you’ve already identified,” Cate said. “I’m sure Amy Grace and Jack would love to help.”

Amy Grace settled into an armchair, extending her hand to Cate. “Just pass me a book, and I’ll do my best.”

Cate shifted a dusty volume from the top of the stack and passed it over to her. "Try this. The item used was the Ace of Hearts, so any references to it would be what we're looking for."

"Ace of Hearts. Got it," Amy Grace said with a nod.

Jack removed a book from the stack and eased into a chair next to the woman. "Ace of Hearts. Let's see what we can find."

Cate plopped into the desk chair, pulling another book from the stack as Anna and Marcus continued to peruse the shelves. She tugged it open, wrinkling her nose at the dust that plumed from it.

She traced a finger through the table of contents as she searched for any information on the card. While she didn't find any direct references, she did come across several chapters on time travel devices. She flipped to the first and scanned the entry.

When she'd first learned about time travel, she had been stunned. She and Jack had assumed that it only existed at Dunhaven. The addition of other forms of magic had left them speechless.

This chapter threatened to shock her again. There seemed to be no shortage of methods by which to travel through time.

She studied a few of them in depth, marveling at the differences that existed before she pushed herself to move on to seek information relevant to their predicament.

She found nothing that referred to the card used to trap them in nineteen fifty-five. With a sigh, she flicked to the next chapter, hoping to find more information there. After a cursory search, she couldn't find a shred of information that helped.

They spent the next several hours poring over the information in the library, coming to no solutions and finding limited information on the item.

With a heavy sigh, Cate slouched in the seat as her stomach grumbled.

"I told you it wouldn't be easy, Catherine," Marcus said as he returned a book to the shelf.

"I thought you were being cautious."

"Are there really vampires?" Amy Grace asked.

"No," Jack said with a shake of his head as Marcus answered, "Yes."

"There are," Marcus answered with a glare at Jack. "Of varying degrees."

"Hmm." Amy Grace crinkled her brow as she stared into space. "That explains a lot."

“Unfortunately, it does not explain how we can reverse this problem we have,” Cate said as she sank her chin into her palm.

“We shall have to pursue other avenues,” Marcus answered. “But for now, we should return to London and ready for dinner.”

“We should stay and work more on this.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her. “We agreed to dine at the club tonight.”

“And I really need to fix this so we can solve a murder.”

She held his gaze, her features shifting from insistent to pleading.

“Do not pout, Catherine.”

“I’m not pouting, but we need to solve this!”

“After you’ve eaten and slept. Mr. Reid is not going to be carted off for a murder yet to be committed. This is the safest place for him.”

“I can’t believe I’m about to say this,” Jack said as he rose from his chair, “but he has a point. Also, I’m starving. Those sandwiches we had for lunch weren’t nearly enough.”

“Thank you, Jack. I can always count on you.”

He grinned at her. “Well, actually, I’ve come to enjoy nineteen fifty-five. A time without a murder charge hanging over me or my wife.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped, but she rose from the chair. “All right, all right. We’ll go to dinner.”

“I have clothing arranged for everyone. Come along, we shall return to London.”

Within seconds, they hopped back to the townhouse, arriving in the sitting room.

Cate grinned as she spotted Andrea waiting for her.

“Hello, Your Grace. Shall we ready you for the evening?”

Cate nodded as she followed the others up the stairs. Dembe settled them in their new quarters. Within the hour, Cate descended the stairs, finding Jack tugging at his collar.

“I hate these things,” he answered.

“You look nice, though.”

“Why couldn’t you marry a guy who goes to a diner?”

Cate chuckled as she straightened his tie. Amy Grace joined them moments later.

“You look very nice,” Cate said with a smile.

Amy glanced down at the rose-colored cocktail dress. "Oh, thank you. It's...very fancy."

"I would expect nothing less from Marcus," Cate answered with a nod as her husband joined them.

"Are we ready?" Marcus asked as he joined them from the living room.

"Yes," Cate answered. "Though I maintain we could have had sandwiches at Rosenberg and continued our search."

"I disagree wholeheartedly," Jack answered. "I very much prefer a full meal. Though I'd rather it without this monkey suit."

"Have you no decorum whatsoever, Reid?" Marcus asked as they left the house behind and slid into the waiting car.

"Of course, I have. I used my napkin at every meal."

"How fortunate for us. Try not to embarrass us at the club."

Jack narrowed his eyes at the man before he slid them to Cate. She offered him an apologetic smile and a shrug as the car rolled to a stop.

Within minutes, they were seated at a central table in the dining room with a bottle of the finest wine on order.

Cate fidgeted in her seat, wishing they could make more progress on the problem rather than wait for an elaborate dinner, though Jack seemed pleased.

She scanned the room, wondering if anyone from The Agency was present. The last time they'd dined here, they had spotted a member, and she had met Ginger, who had been instrumental in helping them investigate.

She wondered if Ginger may be here tonight. With no sign of her, Cate excused herself to the ladies' room in search of her friend.

As she pushed through the door, another woman stepped from the ladies' room.

"Oh, excuse me," Cate said as she shuffled around her. She lifted her eyes with an apologetic smile to the woman, but the grin faded quickly as the woman pushed past her to cross to the lobby.

The hairs on the back of her neck stood up as she recognized Amanda Reid. But what was she doing in nineteen fifty-five?

CHAPTER 11

Cate stared after the woman as she crossed the space in her cocktail dress. She blinked her eyes a few times, wondering if she was seeing things.

The woman was definitely Amanda Reid.

Cate abandoned her trip to the ladies' room and hurried across the space as the woman disappeared into the hallway leading to the meeting spaces and offices.

Her heart thudded against her ribs as she tiptoed after the woman.

Amanda disappeared around the corner, and Cate hurried to it, peering around it. The hallway beyond was empty, making Cate's stomach drop. Where had Amanda gone?

She took a step into the hall when strong fingers wrapped around her arm. "Going somewhere, dear?"

She slid her wide eyes sideways to find her husband. With a sweet smile, she said, "Ladies' room."

"Which is that way. A fact of which you are quite well aware."

"Yes, but—"

"But?" He arched an eyebrow in the disapproving manner she'd come to recognize.

"I saw something. And I had to follow up."

"The last time you saw something and followed up, I had to pry someone's fingers from around your throat."

"Yes, I remember that, but—"

“Yes?” he prodded.

“I don’t think that would happen this time. What are the chances that lightning strikes twice?”

“When you are Catherine Kensie Northcott, they are quite good. What did you see?”

She smiled at his interest in her tale. “You’re not going to believe it.”

“Try me,” he answered flatly.

She lifted her chin as she grinned. “Amanda Reid. Jack’s supposed wife. I just saw her here in nineteen fifty-five. What would she be doing here?”

“An excellent question. Come along and let us ponder it at the table.”

Cate narrowed her eyes as she tugged against him. Gianna’s words floated through her mind. I can’t take credit for digging up Amanda. That would have been your loving husband. “Wait a minute...”

“What is it?”

“This is a good lead. Why don’t you want to follow up on it?”

“We have guests, dear.”

“Who are involved in a problem being created by Amanda who I have just seen roaming these very halls!”

“Yet she is not here now.”

“Marcus,” Cate said, setting her hands on her hips, “I demand to know what you know about this.”

“Nothing.”

“Really? Because Gianna says differently. Before she tossed that card at us, she said she didn’t send Amanda. You did.” Cate poked a finger at his chest.

“And you believed her?” he asked, his tone unchanged despite the accusation.

“I’m starting to. Why do you not want to follow her? Marcus, this could be a huge lead on the murder investigation that started this whole ridiculous issue.”

He heaved a sigh, pressing his lips together. “I do not wish to follow her because I know exactly where she is going. Stefano can handle the matter and report back whilst we enjoy our dinner.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat. “You know where she’s going?”

“Yes. There is a slight truth in Gianna’s statement.”

Her jaw unhinged as she stared at her husband. “I can’t believe you. Why would you do this? Why would you drag Jack’s wife back into the picture?”

“Because it is a matter that needed to be dealt with.”

“I can’t believe this.” Cate stalked a few steps away, crossing her arms as she frowned. “I thought I could trust you.”

“I have done nothing to lose your trust, Catherine.”

She whipped around to face him. “Except bring Jack’s wife to Dunhaven.”

“A woman he assumed he was rid of. A woman who now accuses him of murder. Would you rather that small detail have been revealed at another time? Perhaps when we are dealing with another crisis regarding your current visions? Or maybe after he and your housekeeper, Molly, have decided to wed. Would that have been an appropriate time?”

Cate glared at him, her hands on her hips. “You really need to tell me these things.”

“Would it have led to any less of an argument?”

“No,” she admitted, “but still...”

Heat washed over her, and she flicked her gaze up to her husband. “Oh...or did you tell me, and then you erased my memory?”

“I have not.”

“Ever?”

“Never,” he answered.

She arched an eyebrow. “How would I know? You could have erased my memory, and I’d have no idea.”

“I have never erased your memory, Catherine. Although, I am tempted to right now.”

She wagged a finger at him. “Don’t.”

“Fine. But can we dispatch with this argument? It is quite ridiculous. It matters not who found the current Mrs. Reid. It must be dealt with.”

“I guess you’re right,” she said with a sigh. “But we can’t do anything stuck here in nineteen fifty-five.”

“Can’t you? Did you not just stumble upon a lead?”

“A lead someone already knew about. Honestly, Marcus, will you please share information?”

“We have barely had the chance to share information. Now, you know it. I thought you preferred to focus on freeing yourself from this time, anyway.”

“I do. No, wait, I just want to solve the whole thing.”

“You always do, dear,” he said as he wrapped her arm around his and tugged her down the hall.

Cate let her shoulders slump as she meandered alongside him. “Why are things always this difficult?”

He patted her hand, offering her a consoling glance.

“Don’t give me that look.”

“What look?”

“That all-knowing, ‘poor Cate’ look.”

“I have no such look, Catherine. I’m attempting to be a doting husband.”

She shook her head at him.

“Are you not impressed?”

“I am not,” she said with a coy smile.

He puckered his lips before he frowned. “What a shame. I suppose I shall have to erase your memory and try again.”

“Don’t joke about that. It’s not funny.”

He offered her an amused glance as they reached the dining room. They crossed to the table and settled into their seats as their meal arrived.

Cate shot Jack a sideways glance, wanting to tell him about Amanda, but not in front of their dinner guest.

“So, you two got married a century ago, huh?” Amy Grace asked.

“Technically, no,” Marcus said. “While we did have a wedding ball over a century ago, we were not married until twenty-fourteen.”

Amy Grace’s forehead creased as he spoke the words. “But...you’re...so, technically, you’re not married now.”

Marcus wrapped his hand around Cate’s, displaying her wedding band and engagement ring. “We most certainly are.”

“But you’re not married yet. You don’t get married for over fifty years.”

Marcus grumbled as he glared at her. “I suppose we shall have to fix that. Perhaps a wedding in the sixteen hundreds will do the job.”

“Depends.” Amy sliced into her steak before she flicked her gaze back to him.

“On?” he questioned.

“Whether or not you plan on traveling back further in time, because then you wouldn’t be married then.”

Cate slid her eyes from the woman to Marcus as she chewed her food.

“What an interesting take. You are so...particular.”

Amy Grace shrugged. "It just seems straightforward to me."

"Really? I suppose given my life and abilities, marriage is different to me," he answered. "I've lived through many time periods. I would consider Catherine my wife in all of them."

"Wow, that's a tall order, buddy," she answered.

Cate suppressed a giggle at the statement, earning a sideways glance from Marcus. "I'm sorry."

"I'm with Amy Grace," Jack said after a sip of his wine. "It would be a tall order no matter who it was, but for you...that makes it even taller."

"And I suppose you find yourself a better candidate, Mr. Reid?" Marcus asked.

Jack shrugged. "I don't mean to brag, but I'm quite a bit funnier and some may even argue more handsome."

"Hmm, yet your wife is accusing you of murder while mine is still happily married."

"I'd question the happy part."

"All right, that's enough," Cate said before the argument turned heated. "I actually would say, I consider myself married to Marcus regardless of time period because of the strange lives we lead."

Marcus lifted his chin as he shot Jack a triumphant glance.

"Hmm, maybe because this is my first experience time traveling," Amy Grace said. "Although, if my husband appeared here, I guess I'd consider myself married too. Maybe it goes by the person, not the time period."

"Yes, that's how I see it," Cate said. "If you brought a younger version of me here, I wouldn't consider myself married, but this version of me is."

Amy Grace took a long sip of wine. "This is really making my head spin."

"The wine or the time travel?" Jack asked.

She glanced down at her glass. "Both."

"Best not to think too much about it, then," Cate said with a smile.

They finished their meal, keeping the conversation lighter. As they rose, Marcus kissed Cate's cheek. "Why don't you accompany Mr. Reid and Ms. Hoffman home, dear? I have some business to attend to."

She leaned closer, her brows furrowing. "Like business business? Or like business?"

"I don't know what you're saying, Catherine. It makes no sense."

"Agency stuff or just general business?"

“It has to do with The Agency.”

She nodded. “Then I’ll stay. Jack can take Amy back to the house.”

“No, you will go with them. I will report back as soon as I have finished. Never fear.”

“But...fine,” she said with a wrinkled nose. “I’ll wait up.”

“I would expect nothing less.”

“Where’s he going?” Jack asked as he strode away from them.

“Business,” Cate answered. “Let’s go home.”

They left the club behind and slid into the backseat of the waiting car to make the short trip to the townhouse.

Dembe greeted them with a bow as they entered. “I trust dinner was enjoyable?”

“Very,” Cate answered with a smile. “Amy Grace, do you think you’ll be able to sleep?”

“I hope so. I’ll let you know if I can’t.”

“Perhaps a cup of hot chocolate for your nerves, madam,” Dembe suggested.

Amy Grace tugged a corner of her lips back into a half-smile. “Oh, that actually sounds very nice. Thank you.”

“Of course,” Dembe said with a bow.

“Jack, can I talk to you for a second?” Cate asked as Amy climbed the stairs.

“Sure. I think. I’m a bit nervous about what you may tell me.”

“Sit down,” she said as she motioned to the armchair.

Jack eyed it before he flicked his gaze back to Cate. “Oh, no. It’s worse than I thought. Let me guess. Northcott wants to trap me in the thirteen hundreds.”

“No,” she said as she eased onto the couch. “But it is surprising.”

“Northcott wants to turn me into a toad.”

“Marcus isn’t going to do anything to you, Jack,” she said with shake of her head. “I promise.”

“That’s what you say. His glares at me say something entirely different.” Jack shivered.

Cate puckered her lips as she considered it. “Marcus glares at everyone that way.”

“Not you,” Jack noted. “He never glares at you.”

“He does. All the time. In fact, he just glared at me earlier this evening.”

“When? Which course?”

Cate lifted a shoulder. “When I tried to sneak off to follow a lead. He caught me and glared at me.”

Jack stiffened in his seat, leaning toward her with his eyes wide. “What lead?”

“That’s what I wanted to talk to you about,” she said, clasp and unclasp her hands. She eyed him, a pang of guilt tugging at her as she prepared to speak. “I recognized someone and started to follow them.”

“Who? Oh, wait. It’s another Northcott, isn’t it? There are two of him here.”

She shook her head. “No. It’s...Amanda.”

Jack’s jaw unhinged, and he stared at her, speechless for a moment. “What? It can’t be.”

“It was her. Definitely. No mistaking that woman. I’m sorry.”

“But...she’s...” Jack leapt from his seat and paced back and forth on the thick area rug.

“I think it’s time we realize that Amanda may not be as innocent as you once assumed she was. If she’s here in nineteen fifty-five, she has the ability to time travel. Which means she’s either Agency or...magic...or something.”

Jack shook his head, his jaw tight as he spun on his heel and crossed the room in the opposite direction. “I can’t believe this. I cannot believe this. Are these people everywhere?”

“We don’t know if she is part of the Agency.”

“What else could she be?” Jack snapped before scrubbing his face.

Cate sucked in a breath. “It seems likely that she is, yes.”

“Which means they did this on purpose. They deliberately put her in my path. And I stupidly fell for it.”

“Don’t beat yourself up for being a kind person.”

“Kind? A kind person would have just let her cry on their shoulder and offered her support. An eejit like me would marry her.”

Cate winced as she rose. “It may not have been your smartest decision, but we’ll fix it. Though this twist does make it more likely that you’re being set up by The Agency, and she is in on it.”

“She has to be. To say she saw me do it...twenty years later...”

Cate laid a hand on his arm. “I know this is hard. I’m sorry. But we’ll figure it out.”

Jack sucked in a breath, wrapping a hand around hers. "We always do."

She offered him a reassuring smile as the front door opened and Marcus strode inside. He eyed the scene before crossing to the drink cart. "Should I be jealous, dear?"

"Infinitely," Jack said. "I'm stealing your wife."

Marcus twisted to eye him over his shoulder before he returned his gaze to his brandy. "I do not find your version of humor appealing, Mr. Reid."

"That's a shame, but I understand. I'm afraid if I saw you laugh, I may not recover from it." He returned his focus to Cate. "I'm heading up. See you in the morning."

"Good night, Jack," she answered.

"That man is trying," Marcus said, staring out the window as he nursed his brandy.

Cate joined him, looking out over the street. "He's not."

Marcus heaved a sigh. "I am pleased that he prefers to deal with you."

"Give him a break. A woman he assumed he was divorced from has returned, told him they are still married, and accused him of murder. And now, she's shown up in this time. Does she work for The Agency?"

"No," Marcus answered. "A pawn for The Agency, probably. A member? Definitely not."

"How do you know?" she asked.

"You've met the woman, dear, she is hardly Agency material."

Cate wrinkled her nose. "I didn't realize they were picky."

"Exceptionally. Though not as particular as some other organizations."

Cate stared out at the streetlights lighting the trees. "They don't seem that choosy. They asked me to join."

He twisted to study her. "You are of great value to them, Catherine."

"Oh, right. Because of you."

"No, dear," he answered as he slid a lock of hair behind her ear. "Because of you."

"I don't think so. I'm hardly a catch for people like them."

"I fail to understand how you underestimate your worth, Catherine."

Cate twisted to stare out the window as she contemplated the statement. In the streetlight, a shadow shifted, sending her heart racing. She leaned closer to the window, her jaw unhinging. "Someone's out there!"

CHAPTER 12

Cate's heart hammered hard in her chest as she stared at the shadowy figure that moved through the night, carefully avoiding the glare of the streetlights. "Someone is there."

"Yes, I know. This pertains to the business I had at the club earlier. And it may be a lead to solve your problem."

Cate offered him a wide-eyed glance. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"Tell you what? That I was chasing a resource that may not pan out?"

"Well, something," Cate said with a shrug.

"Catherine..."

"Yes?" she asked.

"I may have a lead on your problem. With any luck, this shady individual making his way toward our home will be able to give us more information."

She offered him an unimpressed stare. "Very funny, Marcus. But I guess that's a start."

He grinned at her before he set his glass down and strode toward the door, opening it before the figure could knock. "Quickly, inside."

He glanced out the door, shifting his gaze up and down the street before he closed it.

The hooded man hurried into the foyer, his face obscured from view. Cate swallowed hard, her heart still pounding as she studied him. Once again, she found herself grateful for marrying Marcus—a man with the connections to quickly find solutions and the courage to deal with dubious characters.

“This way,” Marcus said as he showed the man deeper into the house. He opened a secret panel and they stepped into the windowless room Cate recognized as the one they used when they time traveled.

As they entered, the man pulled his hood back, revealing a long scar stretching from his right eye to his chin.

Marcus pushed the panel closed, then slid his arm around Cate. “Catherine, this is Ronault Dellacourt. Mr. Dellacourt, my wife, Catherine.”

He offered her a smile that bordered on a sneer, though she couldn’t tell if that was because of his scar or his attitude.

“Mr. Dellacourt, I trust you have some information for me?” Marcus continued.

“I do,” he answered, his deep voice gruff.

Cate’s heart skipped a beat as she hoped it would be something useful.

“General consensus is an Ace of Hearts is a show-stopper. Irreversible,” he answered, sinking her hopes into the depths of despair. “But lucky for you, I don’t take no for an answer.”

“Then, you found something?” Marcus asked.

“I did.”

He flicked his eyebrows up. “I’d say lucky for you, too, since I don’t tolerate failure. What have you found?”

“A vague bit of information that suggests there may be a way to reverse the effects. It’s tricky both to gather materials for and to pull off—“

“Do not worry about that. I am well-versed in difficult procedures. What do we need?”

“A quantum compass,” Ronault answered.

Cate pinched her eyebrows together. She hadn’t stumbled upon that in her research at all.

“Oh, is that all?” Marcus answered.

Cate snapped her gaze to him. “You know it?”

“I’ve heard of them,” he answered. “Tell me you’ve found one.”

“I may have,” Ronault said with a shrug. “I’m waiting to see if it pans out.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at the man. “You may have, or you did?”

The man’s lips pinched before he raised his eyes to Marcus. “I did. If this lead doesn’t do it, I will dig more. I’ll find your compass.”

“You’d better. My wife is most anxious to return to her time.”

The man shifted his dark eyes to her. She resisted the urge to wince as they bore into her. “We’ll get you home, Your Grace.”

“Thank you, Ronault,” Marcus said. “I expect to be informed as the situation progresses.”

He offered Marcus a nod before Marcus opened the secret panel. They said their goodbyes and the man disappeared into the shadows of the night.

“Wow, he’s really good at hiding,” Cate said as she watched him practically disappear into the shadows.

“Mm, yes, he is. Which is why I hired him. He will not make too many waves and lead trouble to our door.”

“So, how does this compass thing work?” Cate asked.

“That I cannot answer. I must research it. I’ve heard of it, but I’ve never encountered or used one.”

Cate’s stomach twisted into a knot at the words. She wondered how difficult it would be to escape from their predicament.

“Do not fret, Catherine. I am quite good at these things.”

She smiled up at him. “I know. I’m not fretting. Just wondering.”

“Your clever mind is quite attractive, dear.”

Her smile morphed into a coy expression. “So, you’re attracted to me for my brains, are you?”

“It is one of your finest features, yes. Although there are many,” he said with a tender smile as his thumb rubbed her cheek.

“Oh, yes. I’m filled with fine features,” she said with a laugh. “Well, I suppose we should get some sleep.

“I will see you in the morning, Catherine. Rest well.”

“Thank you,” she answered before she left the living room behind and headed to her room.

Within thirty minutes, Andrea had her readied for bed, and she slipped between the sheets, hoping to drift off quickly. Questions filled her mind as she tried to relax, though, and she found herself wandering through the maze of her current predicament, the murder charge Jack faced, and her daunting visions.

She wondered if she’d ever find answers to any of them. She twisted to find her music box on the nightstand. It brought a smile to her face, and she reached for it, spinning the dial to bring it to life. The soothing notes helped lull her to sleep.

When her eyes fluttered open again, the morning's light already filtered through her curtains. She yawned and stretched as she appreciated the tinkling music from her music box.

She rose, pulling her robe around her before she called for Andrea. After dressing for the day, she made her way downstairs, finding herself alone with Marcus.

"It seems everyone has managed to sleep," he said as she sank into the seat next to him. Dembe delivered her breakfast and poured her a cup of tea. "Did you sleep well, dear?"

"I did," she answered with a smile before biting into her toast. "I am ready to do research on this compass."

"Already done," Marcus answered. "I went to Rosenberg last night and retrieved several resources."

Cate raised her eyebrows as she sipped her tea. "I take it you did not sleep well, then."

"Sleep is not something I require."

Cate pondered the statement. "That's a very useful trick."

"What is?" Jack asked as he strode into the dining room and plopped in a sit across from her.

"Not sleeping."

"I disagree. I quite like sleeping. Almost as much as I enjoy eating." He grinned as Dembe delivered a plate full of eggs, sausage, toast, and bacon. "This is the only thing I like about you, Northcott."

Marcus offered Jack a questioning glance.

Jack readied his fork to dive into his breakfast. "Your food."

"I suppose I should be pleased."

"Marcus found something that may help us escape our little problem of being stuck here," Cate said, changing the subject before the two men argued.

"Oh? What is it? Some sort of magical device?" Jack sipped his orange juice as he waited for the answer.

"Yes, a compass."

Jack furrowed his brow. "Seriously? And this will uncure us?"

"It's not as crude as that," Marcus said with a frown. "But that is the long and short of it."

Jack sipped his tea before he settled the cup in the saucer. "Good. Well...I guess give us the compass, and we'll be out of your hair."

“Quantum compasses are not easy to locate, Reid. Once we have one, and have refined exactly how to use it for this purpose, only then shall you be...out of my hair, as you put it.”

Jack gave him a sideways glance as he retrieved his fork. “Well, I just figured you’d like to be rid of us so you can carry on with your...business. I thought you may have...nefarious deeds that need attending to.”

Cate shook her head at Jack, offering him an amused warning glance.

“There is never a time when my so-called nefarious deeds outweigh my commitment to Catherine.”

Jack narrowed his eyes at the man as Amy Grace wandered into the room, offering a good morning to everyone. “Well, what’s on the agenda today?” she asked as Dembe poured her a cup of tea after delivering her breakfast. “Magic pill boxes? Maybe a magic carpet ride? Oh, I know...I read a book once with a tiny teal dragon. Could we see one of those?”

“Sorry,” Cate said with a shake of her head, “there are no such things as dragons.”

Amy Grace stared at her for a moment, her forehead creased before she returned to her breakfast. “Of course, there aren’t. Magic buttons, time travel, location hopping, but dragons are ridiculous.”

“Obviously,” Cate said with a chuckle. “But we have some good news. We may have found a way to get back to our own time.”

“I suppose it doesn’t involve dragons.”

“No, it doesn’t,” Cate answered.

“Magic compass,” Jack said as he polished off his breakfast and rubbed his belly.

Amy Grace poked at a piece of egg white with her fork. “Oh right, that makes sense. Why didn’t I think of that? I suppose we just...point it in the direction we’d like to go and follow it.”

Marcus fluttered his eyelashes at her. “Even the newbie has more sense than you, Reid.”

Jack frowned at him. “Well, once Amy Grace finishes breakfast, shall we do the necessary research on this compass?”

“Yes,” Cate answered with a nod.

Marcus shook his head. “No. We must split our efforts. Someone must fetch the compass whilst others do the research.”

“I’m happy to do either,” Cate said with a smile as she dabbed the corners of her lips with her napkin.

“Unfortunately, the research requires my full attention,” Marcus answered, “so I must remain here.”

“No problem, Cate and I can fetch the compass,” Jack answered.

“Yes,” Marcus said, “I trust Catherine can fetch it and you can...go along with her.”

Jack narrowed his eyes at the man’s statement.

“Well, sounds like we have a plan, then,” Cate interjected before the conversation could turn into an argument.

“Guess that leaves me with you,” Amy Grace said as she stared at Marcus.

Jack rose from the table. “Aren’t you lucky?”

“Would have been luckier if he had a dragon, but here we are.” She shrugged as she tossed her napkin on the table.

Cate rose, pressing a hand against Marcus’s chest as the others shuffled from the room. “Be nice.”

“I am never anything but, dear.”

“You can be a little...overbearing,” she answered.

“Me? Overbearing? Never. I’m as cuddly as a kitten.”

“Uh-huh,” Cate said with a chuckle as she stepped toward the foyer, “a feral kitten, maybe.”

“Really, Catherine, I’m quite tame, and I promise to mind my manners.”

“You’d better. That poor woman is traumatized enough,” she said as they stepped into the foyer. “Where are we going to pick up the compass?”

“You should meet Ronault in the park at the end of the street. He will take you to it. Come directly here afterwards. Do not dally.”

“Got it,” Cate said with a nod. “No dallying.”

“I’m not joking, Catherine. It took all in me not to fetch another one of me so I could both research and go with you.”

“I’ve got it, pal, don’t worry,” Jack answered.

Marcus stared at him. “Forgive me for not feeling reassured in any way.”

“We’ll be fine. Jack and I have solved many a mystery before you came along.”

“That was before you were my wife.” Marcus shifted his gaze to Jack. “Do not let anything happen to Catherine.”

“You can count on me,” Jack said with a nod.

Cate threaded her arm through Jack's and led him through the front door into the bright sunshine. "At least the weather's nice."

"That's a miracle in and of itself. Also, we are on our own without your overbearing husband breathing down our necks."

"He claims he's not overbearing."

"Right, no, of course, he isn't."

Cate grinned at him. "Wouldn't you be the same with Molly?"

Jack heaved a sigh as he shook his head. "You got me, Cate. You're right. I suppose I can forgive him that."

"Plus, he's awfully handy in a crisis."

"So he is. Though we were doing just fine solving crimes through time before."

Jack tugged the corner of his lips back. "I suppose I ought to be thankful for his help with this situation. The Agency seems hellbent on putting us through it."

"They do. And with their tactics, we need a powerful ally."

"I just wish you weren't stuck with him, Cate. I feel terrible it came to that."

Cate pressed her lips together, trying to plaster on a reassuring smile. She wasn't certain it was as terrible as Jack made it out to be, but that was a matter for another time.

"Oh, Cate, I'm so sorry. I didn't mean to rub it in."

"You didn't," she answered quickly. "I just...was thinking about this compass." She steered the conversation away from the touchy subject, unwilling to discuss her feelings on the matter.

"Oh, right. Yeah, we've stumbled into an odd world, haven't we? Magical watches, buttons, and compasses. I wonder how this thing will work."

"That's the same question I had." She allowed her mind to switch from ruminations about her marriage to the problem at hand. "I would imagine we'll have to navigate something to fix this."

"Navigate what though? That's the real question."

"I suppose we'll find out," Cate answered as they reached the park.

Jack stopped on the edge of the grass, scanning the area. "How are we supposed to find this fellow?"

"He's not easy to miss. I met him last night." Cate rose to her tiptoes and searched. "There. Behind the tree."

Jack tugged his lips back into a deep grimace. “Yikes. He looks shady.”

“He seemed okay last night. Plus, I doubt anyone will mess with Marcus. He’s not exactly forgiving.”

“I suppose that is the upside of being married to Northcott. Outside of a few people, most won’t dare lay a finger on you lest they be turned into a toad.”

Cate grinned at him as they approached the hooded man. “Mr. Dellacourt...”

“Your Grace,” he said with a nod before he shifted his gaze to Jack. “I thought His Grace would be here.”

“No, myself and my associate, Mr. Reid, will be retrieving the compass. Do you have it?”

“I do not. I need some assistance to retrieve it.”

Cate’s pulse quickened at the words. “Magical assistance?”

“I don’t need any skills from your husband, just a...distraction. With your looks, you’ll do just fine.”

“Hey, whoa,” Jack said with a shake of his head, “you’re not dangling her like bait.”

Ronault straightened as he pulled himself away from the tree. “Then we’re not getting the compass.”

“Now, wait just a minute,” Cate answered, “we need that compass, so failure is not an option. Although, Jack has a point.”

“Darn right, I do. If this puts Cate in danger—“

“No, it’s not that,” Cate said with a shake of her head, “I’m just not certain I am a compelling enough distraction for you.”

Ronault raised his eyebrows, the expression making the scar on his face even more menacing. “Have you looked in the mirror lately, sweetheart?”

Heat rose into Cate’s cheeks as Ronault eyed her like a wolf. “Yes, I have, but I’m not...never mind. What do I need to do?”

“Flutter your eyelashes and offer a few sweet smiles. That ought to do it. I just need to slip past a few folks.”

“Wait a minute, how dangerous are these folks you need to slip past?”

Ronault shrugged nonchalantly. “I wouldn’t cross them twice if you know what I mean.”

“I do. And I don’t like it. I’ll be the distraction,” Jack said, raising his chin.

Ronault screwed up his face. “I don’t think that’ll work.”

Jack heaved a sigh as he shook his head. "I'm certain I can pull something off."

"Unless you plan to morph into a beautiful woman in the next fifteen minutes, I doubt it. Now, are we doing this or not?"

"Yes," Cate said with a nod. "I'm certain that is why Marcus sent me. I'll do my best."

"What should I do?" Jack asked.

"You are going to help me escape," Ronault answered. "Come on, I'll show you the way. You'll go around back to the window while Her Grace and I enter through the front."

"Who are these people anyway?" Jack asked as Ronault led them down the sidewalk.

"Band of magical traders. Nasty folks, but dim-witted enough to be taken advantage of from time to time."

"How did they come by the compass? Aren't they very hard to get?" Cate asked.

"Hard enough, but these folks are excellent at digging in the deepest, darkest corners of the earth to find things. It's how they exist."

"Oh," Cate said with a nod. She wondered how sure of a bet this was.

"It's just ahead. The brick building. See the alley on the side?" Ronault asked.

Jack nodded.

"You'll go in there. Stand just under the window. Make sure no one approaches that alley. Your Grace, we'll head in the front door. And once you've gotten them distracted, I'll head up to the safe. Give me ten minutes, no more, no less. Once the time is up, you'll take your leave. Understand?"

Cate swallowed hard as she nodded. She wiped her sweaty palms against her dress as she tried to slow her racing heart.

"I don't like this," Jack said as he eyed the dilapidated building.

"Too bad. Let's go." Ronault offered his arm to Cate.

She tried to hide her trembling hand as she slid her arm through his.

He led her to the door. "It should be open. You go in first."

"Wait," she said, her breath catching in her throat, "what am I walking into here?"

"A brothel."

Cate's heart stopped and her jaw unhinged. "What?"

He arched an eyebrow at her. "I am sorry, Duchess, but these folks aren't quite as refined as you're used to."

"I can't go into a brothel and distract people. I..."

"You'll do just fine. None of the girls will be awake at this hour. Only the men. And they'll appreciate a woman as lovely as you. Now, off you go."

He shoved her a step closer to the door. She swallowed hard again, shooting him a pained glance before she walked up the few concrete stairs and tried the doorknob. As Ronault suggested, it turned easily.

She pushed into the dimly lit space, trying to let her eyes adjust. The scent of liquor and cheap perfume hung heavy in the air. She eyed the dilapidated furnishings, assuming they looked better in the evening's light than what little of the morning sunlight lit them through the thick curtains.

"Well, well, well, what have we here?" A rough, unshaven man emerged from the shadows, eyeing her.

Cate offered him a nervous chuckle. "Uh, I...think I'm lost and was wondering if you could help me."

"Lost, are you? What a terrible shame a beautiful lady like you would come to be lost." His eyes traveled up and down her form. "That's a lovely ring you've got there, missus. Your husband would probably be devastated to learn you're lost."

Cate swallowed hard her grin faltered. "Yes. Which is why I need to get home. If you could point me in the direction of Ellerby Crescent—"

"Ellerby Crescent?" The man chuckled. "Well, we are well-to-do, aren't we?"

Cate tugged her lips back in a wince. Should she mention Marcus's name or not? "Not really. But I could give you a small bit of money for the help—"

The man darted forward and grabbed her, yanking her away from the door and toward the stairs. "I think not, my darling. You look like you'd fetch a pretty penny if we asked the old man for some money to get you back. So, until further notice, you'll be staying here."

Cate struggled but found herself unable to escape as he yanked her up the stairs. He shoved her into a room and slammed the door behind her. The sound of a lock clicking sealed her fate.

Cate clutched at her purse as her heart hammered against her chest. She was trapped, and she had no way to escape.

CHAPTER 13

Cate stared at the closed door, blood rushing through her ears as the gravity of her situation sank in. The man planned to hold her hostage and demand a ransom for her return.

She raced to the door and banged against it. “Let me out! You can’t do this.”

No one answered her. She hammered her fist against it again. “Let me out! You’re going to regret this when you find out who my husband is!”

The door unlocked. She stumbled back a few steps as it swung toward her, and the man entered again. “And just who is your husband? I’ll need to know so I can demand your ransom.”

Cate eyed the door over his shoulder before she dashed toward it. He grabbed hold of her in a bear hug. “I don’t think so.”

“Let go of me!” She thrashed in a desperate attempt to free herself.

“I’d really like to know who your husband is the way you were bragging about it so loudly a moment ago.” He tossed her backward, and she stumbled, landing hard on her backside.

“Too bad. I’m not telling you.”

“Really? You seemed to want to bigmouth it a moment ago.”

Cate pressed her lips together as she glared at him. “No. I’m worthless to you, so you may as well let me go.”

“Oh, you’re hardly worthless, dear. You can earn your keep here or we can ask your husband to pay it. The choice is yours. With that face, you’d do quite well here.”

She scrambled to her feet, her hands clenched into tight fists. "I'm not a prostitute."

"Yet," he answered. "And you don't have to be. Just give me your husband's name...and then hope he pays the ransom."

Cate tried to stop herself from trembling as a mix of anger and fear filled her. "Marcus Northcott."

The man's eyebrows shot up, and he eyed Cate up and down. "You don't say. You are the Duchess of Stratfordshire? Married to the Duke himself?"

"I am," Cate said, lifting her chin. "And he will not be very happy with you."

"Well, I had a ransom demand in mind, but this little twist has me rethinking. Time to up the ante. Give me your ring."

"No," Cate said, shoving her hand behind her back.

"Well, now, I need some proof that you're with me, don't I?"

She shook her head. "Not the ring, no."

He slid a switchblade from his pocket, opening it. The knife gleamed in the dim light streaming through the window. "Maybe I'll have to take something else."

She backed a few steps away as her mind spun, desperately searching for some escape. "Stay away from me!"

He crept closer to her, his knife at the ready when a voice shouted in the hall. Cate's heart hammered, wondering if Ronault had been caught.

The man glanced over his shoulder. "To be continued, Duchess."

He strode from the room, slamming and locking the door behind him.

Cate blew out a sigh of relief, pressing a hand against her chest. Her gaze darted around the room in search of a way out. She raced to the door and tugged at it, but she couldn't budge it.

With her breaths coming in gasps, she scanned the space, her eyes landing on the window. She hurried toward it and tugged it open, sticking her head into the morning air.

She glanced down at the alley below. Jack waited at the bottom next to a dumpster. "Jack!" she called.

He snapped his gaze up. "Cate?"

"Jack! I'm trapped!"

"What?" His eyes went wide.

"I'm going to jump."

“No!” he shouted. “Don’t do that. I don’t want your husband to kill me after you die.”

“I’m not going to die. I mean...I am if I stay here. The man is holding me hostage.”

“Wait, wait!” Jack scanned the alley before he scrambled onto the dumpster and stood. “Okay, try to hang from the sill, and I’ll see if I can grab you.”

“Okay.” Cate ducked back inside before she stuck her foot through the opening and straddled the windowsill.

She shimmied her way outside, clinging to the sill as she swung her leg over and dangled from it.

Strong hands wrapped around her legs. “Okay, I’ve got you. Let go.”

“Are you sure?”

“Yes, Cate, I’m sure. Now, let go.”

Cate released one hand then the other, slipping a little until he caught her around the middle. They wobbled for a second before they landed in a heap on the dumpster top.

She sat up, breathing a sigh of relief. “Thank goodness.”

Ronault slipped around the corner of the building and eyed them. “Oh good, you’ve escaped. Come on, let’s move.”

Cate’s forehead creased as Jack hopped down from the dumpster. “Escaped?”

“Yes. He did try to hold you for ransom, didn’t he?”

Jack helped Cate to the ground as she continued to stare at Ronault, her jaw agape. “You knew he’d do that?”

“Of course. What did you think he’d do, Duchess?”

“I don’t know...flirt with me. The way you said all that stuff about a pretty face keeping him busy. I figured I’d flutter my eyelashes a bit and be on my way.”

“With this bunch? No, no, my dear duchess.” Ronault shook his head. “With your face and those clothes, he recognized right away what a prize you were. I fully expected him to do exactly what he did.”

He dug in his pocket and held up an ancient compass. “Which gave me the time to retrieve this.”

He held it out toward her.

Cate stared down at it with a wrinkled nose before she snapped her gaze up to him.

“Well, go on, take it.”

Cate slid it from his hand and put it in her purse.

“Now, let’s go before they realize you’re missing, missus.”

Ronault started toward the main road, hesitating as Cate failed to follow.

“Well, come along.”

“I can’t believe you did that,” Cate said, finally forcing her legs to move forward. “What if I couldn’t have escaped?”

“His Grace said you are very bright and resourceful. I had every faith in you.”

“What if he put me in the basement?” Cate cried, her knees still shaky from the experience.

Ronault slid his eyes sideways to her. “He’s never done that in the past. Look, Duchess, it was a calculated risk.”

Jack slid his arm around Cate’s shoulders. “But still a risk. A risk we never should have taken.”

“Did you want the compass or not?” Ronault asked.

“Yes, but we didn’t need to risk Cate’s life,” Jack argued.

“Hardly a risk. Firstly, she is here, perfectly fine. Not so much as a scratch. And second, if she hadn’t escaped—unlikely, but still—His Grace would have ripped them limb from limb. It really wasn’t a risk.”

Cate swallowed hard, pushing the frightening memory of her brief captivity away. “Whatever, it’s over now. And we have the compass. Thank you for your help.”

“Of course, Your Grace. Tell His Grace payment may be handled using the usual method.”

Cate nodded as they stopped on the street corner.

“Good luck, Duchess. I hope you get home safely.” He offered her a fleeting smile before he spun on his heel and strode away from them.

“What kind of world have we gotten into?” Jack asked as he stared after him. He shifted his gaze to Cate. “Are you okay?”

She nodded as she sucked in a deep breath. “Yes. The shock has passed. I just...was surprised Ronault would have played that loosely with me.”

“I’m not. The man looks like a thug. He probably plays fast and loose with everyone.”

“But Marcus’s wife?” Cate shook her head as she meandered down the sidewalk.

“Oh, we have an ego, do we?”

“Sort of,” Cate said with a chuckle. “I just always assume Marcus is feared enough that I’ll be safe.”

“Except from The Agency. They hate him with a passion.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped as she shook her head. “They do. But they hate us, too, so he’s in good company.”

“Or we’re in bad company. I’m still concerned that marrying him made this worse.”

The statement sliced at her heart. Marcus wasn’t to blame for this. She shook her head as she pulled her thoughts together. “No, Gianna was after you when we went to the forties. We had no ties to Marcus then. At least not this one.”

She raised her ring finger in the air.

“True. And I nearly fell for her shenanigans then. She just seemed to be a flirt.”

“You men and your inability to resist a pretty face who fawns all over you.”

“Oh, come on, now. Who came home from the seventeen hundreds spouting about how Northcott had an old-world charm?”

Cate offered him a coy sideways glance. “He does. At least he doesn’t fall for Gianna’s advances.”

“Ohhh, I see. He has resisted the women who throw themselves at him which makes him a saint.”

She grinned at him. “That’s it. He is the perfect man.”

“Oh, Cate,” Jack answered with a laugh and a shake of his head. He heaved a sigh. “Seriously, though, I’m concerned about you.”

“There is no need, Jack. Marcus and I...are fine.”

Jack shuddered as the park came into sight. “Ugh, I hate it when you refer to yourselves as a couple. We’re not talking about your marriage and needing counseling or something.”

Cate stopped as they reached the corner of Ellerby Crescent. “I know. And I know you’re worried about me. But I’m fine. Really, I am.”

“I know you’re fine. You’ll always be fine. You’re Cate Kensie. You can make it through damn near anything. But I don’t want you to be fine. I want you to be great. Happy. Wonderful.”

She sucked in a breath and smiled at him. “I am. And actually, I’m Cate Kensie Northcott.”

Jack rolled his eyes as he offered her an amused glance. "Oh, right. Yes. How could I have forgotten."

"Yes, how could you? My ring is big enough to remind you."

"Yes, it is. I suppose what he lacks he makes up for in expensive baubles and houses. You have more houses than seasons, dear Duchess."

Cate looped her arm through his as they made their way toward the townhouse. "Yes, I do. And good thing for us one of them was within walking distance of where we were sent by Gianna this time."

Jack furrowed his brow. "Yeah, about that, what are the chances we came here and to a time where you saw Amanda?"

"I don't know. But that could be the clue we need to track down what's going on," she said as they reached the door.

"What do you think it means?" Jack asked. "Is she part of The Agency?"

"Marcus says no. He says not everyone associated with The Agency is a member of it. She may be working for them. Recruited for this specific purpose," Cate answered as she pushed into the foyer.

"So, they picked her. Why? Because they knew I'd fall for her act?"

"Try not to be too hard on yourself. These people are master manipulators."

Jack blew out a sigh as he shook his head. "I am hard on myself. I fell for their manipulations twice. Maybe you have a point about Northcott. At least he doesn't fall for them."

"His father was killed by them. He has a good reason," she answered as Marcus strode toward them.

"Catherine, I am pleased to see you back safely. Did you retrieve it?" he asked.

Cate pulled the item out of her purse and held it toward him. "We did."

"And we had some trouble, too, in case you're wondering. Your friend was very cavalier with Cate's life."

Marcus arched an eyebrow as he focused on Cate. "Is this true?"

"Yes and no. Ronault's plan...left a little to be desired, but we're here and we are safe."

"Barely," Jack answered.

"What happened?" Marcus asked.

"Your mate, Ronault—"

"He is not my mate," Marcus countered.

Jack heaved a sigh. "Do you want to hear it or not?"

Marcus motioned for him to proceed. "Ronault sent Cate inside where she was kidnapped to be held for ransom. She climbed out a window to escape."

"All part of his plan, he said." Cate shrugged.

"Remind me to discuss his plans with him. He is...a wildcard. At any rate, I am pleased you are safe." Marcus squeezed her arm.

"Have you made any progress on how to use it?"

"Yes, I have. I should understand how to use the compass by this afternoon."

Cate grinned at him. "Then we'll be able to return home this evening, right?"

"With any luck, yes."

"Okay, how does it work?" Jack asked.

Marcus motioned toward the living room. Cate shuffled inside, her eyebrows pinching. "Where is Amy Grace?"

"Upstairs resting," Marcus said as he poured a brandy and offered it to Cate.

She accepted it, her concern not dissipating. "Resting forcibly or..."

"No, dear. Simply resting of her own choice."

"Oh, good, okay," she said before she sipped her brandy. "Now, how can we learn about this compass? Is there something I could read or..."

"I thought it best for you to confer with an expert on the subject."

"That'll work. Do we go to him, or does he come here?"

"She, dear," Marcus corrected. "And I have brought her to you. Just a moment."

Cate bobbed her head after taking another sip of her brandy while Jack poured one for himself.

"So, who do you think this is?" Jack asked. "His mother?"

"No, she would have said yesterday," Cate answered with a furrowed brow. "But Marcus always has a person who knows something about something."

Jack nodded as he took a sip of his drink before he flicked his gaze to the entrance. His eyes went wide, and his jaw dropped open. He dropped his glass, causing it to smash into pieces on the hardwood under his feet. "You can't be serious."

Cate's stomach twisted into a knot as she eyed his reaction. Who had just stepped into the room that caused that much shock?

CHAPTER 14

Cate's heart thudded against her chest as she lowered her glass and twisted to eye the newcomer.

"Your expert, dear," Marcus announced as he stepped into the room next to her.

Cate's eyes widened, and she sat there in stunned silence, unable to tear her gaze away from the woman.

"Hello, Cate," the woman said with a soft grin.

Cate slow-blinked as she rose on wobbly knees. She pressed her lips together, desperately trying to make sense of what she was seeing.

"Cate?" Jack questioned.

She twisted to face him, her features pinching with confusion before she slid them back to her teacher. She hadn't expected it to be herself, but there she stood across the room. A carbon copy of her own form.

"I'm the expert?" she asked.

"Yes," Marcus answered. "You have successfully navigated through time twice using the compass. Who better than yourself to explain the ins and outs of it."

"I can't even..." Jack murmured. "There are two of you. Two Cates. Where is that Cate from?"

"The future," Cate said with a nod. "Many years from when you've come from."

Jack stepped closer, squinting his eyes. "Really? How many years?"

"Jack!" Cate answered.

“What? You don’t look very different. I don’t see any new wrinkles.”

“Hey,” Cate exclaimed. “I don’t have many wrinkles to start with.”

“But if you’re from years in the future you should have some.”

“We can debate that another time,” the future Cate said. “It’s important that you get home. And equally important that you solve this problem with Jack.”

“How do we solve it? Give us the answers.”

Future Cate sucked in a deep breath. “Unfortunately, I can’t. I need you to solve it. And I need you...or me, rather, to go through all of the things you’re about to go through.” Future Cate’s features pinched as she glanced at Cate. “I’m so sorry. But you will get through it.”

Cate swallowed hard as she studied herself, a near mirror image outside of a few minor differences. Her future self seemed...calmer, more at ease with things. “I don’t like that.”

“I know,” Cate said with a smile. “I’m you, remember? I didn’t like it either. But it’s a part of our lives. And you’ll have to live it. I could prepare, but...it would overwhelm you. You need to experience it yourself.”

“Oh, good, Cate has turned cryptic in the future. What does that mean? And are you going to tell us that we just need to wade through using the compass on our own, too?”

“Easy, Reid, do not attack Catherine because you are in shock over there being two of her.”

“I’m sorry,” he said with a wave of his hand, “but I’m starting to wonder if that’s really Cate.”

Future Cate offered him a soft smile. “It’s really, me, Jack.”

“Yeah? Prove it.”

“When we were in 1925, you helped me with my fiddly shoe clasp so we wouldn’t be late for dinner.”

Jack frowned at her.

“When we were trapped in Douglas’s lab, you told me I should have brought a Cate Kensie cardigan. And when I didn’t want to get rid of the sapphire necklace, you threw it in the loch.”

“He did what?” Marcus asked her.

“Sorry,” she said with a shrug. “And you sent it right back to me.”

“Okay, okay, so maybe you are Cate. Or you’re some kind of evil clone of Cate who knows all her memories.”

Future Cate wrinkled her nose as Cate did. Jack shifted his gaze between the two of them. "It's just not right."

Future Cate cocked her head. "Maybe you ought to rest while I talk to Cate."

"Rest? How can I rest when you're down here...being you."

Future Cate arched her eyebrow at him. "I'm sorry, but it's rather distracting, and I need Cate to focus."

His eyebrows pinched together as he grimaced at her.

"Catherine is correct, Reid. If you cannot do anything constructive here, you should leave."

Future Cate shot him a sideways glance. "Give him a chance to acclimate. You know he doesn't like magic."

Cate knitted her brows at the scene. "How far into the future are you?"

"Let's not focus on that," Future Cate answered.

"It's the fact that you won't say that makes me nervous," Jack noted with a wag of his finger. "Why can't you be honest?"

"Because it would..." Future Cate pressed her lips together. "You of all people should be arguing against me to answer that question."

"Well, I changed my mind," Jack answered. "Rules be damned."

"Cate needs to live through her life without a laundry list of information from me. It's too dangerous. There are too many things at stake."

"But yet you can tell us how to get home using the compass."

"That is necessary, yes. And it reveals nothing about future events," she answered.

Jack shot Cate a glance. She shrugged, offering him a fragile smile. "I think we need to listen to her."

"It disturbs me, Catherine, that you presume that I would bring someone here to mislead you."

Heat rose in her cheeks as she flicked her gaze to him, her features apologetic. "Sorry."

"You ought to be. I would never harm you."

"Ha!" Jack barked out.

He lowered his gaze to the floor as Marcus glared at him.

"You're right," Cate said with a sigh. "This Cate didn't just show up out of nowhere. Marcus brought her. So...she has to be the right Cate. A real Cate. Whatever."

"I don't like it."

“Hey,” Future Cate said, sticking a hand on her hip, “I’m the same person I was before. I’m just smarter now.”

“Smarter?” Cate answered.

“Of course, Cate,” Future Cate said with a laugh. “I’ve spent years researching. I’ve learned a lot.”

“Oh, right. That sounds like me. Well, I suppose we should stop debating this and sit down to discuss how to use this compass. I’d like to get back home. Although...”

Future Cate cocked her head. “If you’re tired after what happened this morning, we could talk later.”

Cate shook her head. “No, it’s just that...for twenty-four hours, I haven’t had one of those awful visions. I wonder if you could—“

Future Cate shook her head, offering Cate an apologetic, tight-lipped smile. “I’m sorry, Cate, but...you need to live through this.”

Cate’s features pinched as she sank onto the chair.

Future Cate rubbed her shoulder. A tingly sensation shot through her, but she wasn’t certain if it came directly from the contact or merely the idea that a future version of her was comforting her.

Future Cate knelt in front of her. “I know this is hard, but you’ll make it through. See?”

Cate’s lower lip trembled. “They’re so frightening, though.”

“I know. I remember. But you will make it through. Keep working with Anna. Don’t give up.”

“Can you at least give me a hint?” Cate asked. “No one will tell me anything, and I feel like everyone knows what’s happening but me.”

Future Cate pulled her into a hug. “It won’t be much longer before you understand, Cate. And then it will all make sense. Just a little longer.”

Cate sucked in a shaky breath as she pulled away and nodded. “Right. Okay. Well, I guess then we need to know how this compass works so we can move forward with Jack’s investigation and mine.”

Future Cate smiled at her as she squeezed her hands. “Do you have the compass?”

Marcus produced the object, and Future Cate took it from his palm with a smile. “Thanks.”

“Tea, Catherine?” he asked.

“Yes,” they both said at the same time.

“Oh,” Cate answered with a furrowed brow, “which one were you asking?”

“Both,” he answered as Future Cate grinned at him. “I shall inform Dembe.”

He strode from the room, and Future Cate shot Cate a smile. “He wasn’t willing to anger either of us.”

Cate glanced down at her future counterpart’s hands, clutching hers, her brow furrowing as she stared at the rings on her finger. Future Cate patted her hand as she rose and tugged Cate with her to settle on the couch.

Cate covered her face with her hands as she tried to steady her nerves. The reality of speaking with a future version of herself settled in, making her legs wobbly and her chest tighten.

“It’s okay, Cate,” Future Cate told her. “I know this is very overwhelming.”

“I guess you do,” she said with a sigh. “I just...tell me things get better.”

“They do,” Future Cate answered. “You are very happy. Things get easier.”

Jack shuffled to her and rubbed her shoulder. “Cate, if you don’t want to—“

“I do. I want to keep going. I just...needed some reassurance.”

Future Cate grabbed her arm and squeezed. “I know. I remember how difficult it was, especially at the beginning. But you should understand soon. It will all make so much more sense.”

“I wish it did now.” Cate sucked in a deep breath. “But that’s enough whining from me. Let’s talk about this compass. How can we use it to navigate back to...wait...I guess we need to go to the murder and drop off Amy Grace before we go back to our own time.”

“Can we go back to our own time?” Jack asked. “All of our time travel tools aren’t working.”

Future Cate glanced at him. “That’s from the effects of the Ace of Hearts. Once you counteract that, you’ll be able to use them freely.”

“Oh, right. Sorry, I’m not as learned as you. Either of you,” he said, shifting his gaze between them.

“It’s okay. But you’ll soon get used to this, too,” Future Cate said with a smile.

“No, that’s where you’re wrong. And if I do, it’s because that’s not the Jack in your time. It’s some imposter Jack who is pretending to be okay with all these odd things.”

Future Cate giggled at him. “No, it’s really you, Jack.”

“Are you certain? I don’t believe it.”

She continued to chuckle at him. “I’m one hundred percent certain we don’t have a fake Jack in the future. Trust me, I’d know.”

He arched an eyebrow, crossing his arms as he stalked across the room. “Whatever you say. I still don’t believe it. But please proceed with the lesson. I would very much like to get home and solve this little mystery with my soon-to-be ex-wife.”

“All right,” Future Cate said as she produced the compass. “Now, you may have noticed that this isn’t an ordinary compass.”

Cate swallowed hard as she studied it. The needle pointed toward the southeast. “I see. It doesn’t point north.”

“It’s a bit more complicated than that. Here, let me show you.” Future Cate dumped the compass in Cate’s hands.

The needle wobbled around wildly as though it was being pulled in every direction. Cate’s eyes went wide. “It’s...haywire.”

“Because your thoughts aren’t focused,” Future Cate said with a nod.

Cate glanced up at her future self. “Well, there goes our chances of using this. My thoughts are never focused. Maybe Jack—”

“No,” Future Cate said with a shake of her head. “You, Cate. You must do this. You must focus your thoughts.”

“But—”

“Cate,” her future self said, “focus. Let’s try to get you focused on the time you need to return to. I want you to close your eyes and focus on the last details you remember of being there.”

Cate crinkled her brow as she stared down at the compass as its needle wobbled in her hand.

Future Cate patted Cate’s knee. “Close your eyes.”

Cate fluttered her eyelashes before she nodded. She slid her eyes closed, inhaling a deep breath.

“Good, now, focus. Every detail you can recall.”

Cate allowed her mind to fill-in some of the imagery of the darkened ballroom they’d stepped into. It was hazy, but she attempted to piece them together her memory.

“Good, Cate, good.”

The sound of her own voice interrupted her thoughts. The fragile image she’d been building cracked to pieces.

She opened her eyes with a wince. “Sorry, I lost it.”

“I saw that. The needle was steadying before I spoke.”

“Maybe don’t speak this time,” Jack suggested.

“Unfortunately, navigating the time portal isn’t going to be done in a vacuum of silence. She will need to learn to cope with ambient noise, and other sensory distractions.”

“This is hopeless,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

Future Cate offered her a matter-of-fact look. “Obviously, it is not.”

Cate heaved a sigh. “Right. You’re right. I’ve clearly done this once before.”

“You’ve done it twice before,” Future Cate answered.

“Twice?!” Cate exclaimed. “Are you joking?”

“Oh, heavens. Are you saying that woman uses this card on us twice?” Jack asked.

“No, only that Cate will find herself in a circumstance where navigating a time portal will be necessary to survive. I can’t say more than that, but you can do this, Cate.”

“Okay, so, before she tried again, let me get this straight. Once she has the place she needs to go in her mind, the needle will...stabilize?”

“Yes, and point in the direction you should travel,” Future Cate answered.

Cate sucked in a deep breath as she stared down at the needle bouncing around in the compass. “All right. I’ll try again.”

She blew out a quiet breath and closed her eyes. She allowed the details to fill in again around her. This time, she focused on Gianna’s face moments before she’d thrown the card. Her heart rate increased as she recalled the moment.

“Good, Cate. That’s good.”

She fought to stop the memory from leaving her.

“Excellent, Cate,” Future Cate said. “You didn’t completely lose focus that time. Keep filling details until it feels like you’re there.”

Cate struggled to shut off all of the things from her present location. Sounds, scents, the way Jack’s pacing echoed in her ears, the soft air blowing past her skin. She filled in details of the ballroom, recalling the scent of the wood polish, the sound of Gianna's voice, the coolness of the air.

"Very good, Cate. You've almost got it completely steady."

She eked out the details from the farthest reaches of her mind until she heard the magic words.

"You did it!" Future Cate exclaimed.

She huffed out a breath as she opened her eyes, a smile crossing her features. She frowned as she spotted the needle, wildly bouncing around. "But..."

"You did it while your eyes were closed. Now you need to learn to do it with your eyes open, so you can watch the needle."

Cate's shoulders slumped as Marcus strode into the room, followed by Dembe. "How are we coming along, Catherine?"

"She's doing well," Future Cate answered as Cate said, "Okay."

"Oh," Cate said, "sorry. I never know which of us you're talking to."

"Yes, we need some way to distinguish the Cates," Jack said with a bob of his head.

"Actually," Future Cate said as she rose, "there's no need for that. Cate, you understand what you must do. You can continue to practice with it until you feel ready to head into the time portal."

Cate's stomach clenched as she stared up at her future self. "You're leaving?"

Future Cate nodded. "You'll be okay. You know what to do. Just... believe in yourself. You can do this."

Cate's features pinched as she glanced down at the compass, its needle wildly hopping around. She thought she'd had much more time with her future counterpart. It seemed far too rushed.

"I know you feel that I'm abandoning you," Future Cate said. "But I'm not. There's just nothing more that I can tell you and far too much danger that something could be revealed that shouldn't be."

Cate rose on wobbly legs, forcing a smile onto her features. "I...don't know what to say. Thank you."

Future Cate offered her a warm smile before she wrapped her in an embrace. "You'll do great, Cate. Just remember to focus. Even if you lose your place, focus."

Cate bobbed her head up and down, her stomach twisting into a knot as her future self stepped away from her.

Future Cate slid her fingers around Marcus's forearm. "Can I talk to you for a minute?"

"Of course," he answered. "I trust you will be fine with your practicing?"

Cate nodded, a fleeting smile crossing her features before he strode from the room with Future Cate.

"What the hell was that?" Jack asked.

"I don't know," Cate answered, still staring toward the foyer where they'd disappeared. "I wonder what she's saying to him."

Jack sidled up to her, his features pinched. "No, I meant the entire thing. A future you? Standing right in front of me, talking to me, talking to you... she hugged you. Was it weird?"

"A little," Cate said with a slow nod. "It was...bizarre. Marcus made it look so much easier when he talks to himself."

"Oh, at least I haven't witnessed that. That's worse. Way worse," Jack answered.

"Not for me. I..." Cate's shoulders slumped. "I could have used a few more hours with her. Maybe she would have said something to help me with these visions."

Jack heaved a sigh. "I can't imagine you're happy to return to our time and go through that again. It must be nice not to have them now."

"It has been. Although, I'm not certain if it's a product of being here or just a..." Cate crinkled her brow as pain shot across her temples.

"Coincidence?" Jack finished for her. "I'm starting to think there are no such things as coincidences."

Cate squeezed her eyes closed as she struggled to focus on the images crowding into her mind.

"Cate?" Jack asked, his voice sounding miles away.

She pinched her features together, gritting her teeth. She tried to focus on the images, but it made the pain worse. What had Anna said? Use the good memory to help with the bad?

She struggled to breathe, her chest tightening as she grabbed hold of the wing of the armchair to steady herself.

Warm arms wrapped around her. "Cate, I've got you. It's okay."

Her knees gave way, and she collapsed into his arms as she struggled to make sense of the visions.

Her lower lip trembled as she struggled to stay conscious, but the edges of her vision blackened. She fought to stay present, searching for that soothing future memory as she dug her fingers into Jack's arm in a desperate attempt to stay grounded.

The pain spread throughout her body, tightening her muscles and twisting her stomach into knots.

Tears streamed down her cheeks as Jack laid her on the sofa. He gripped her hand, worry etched into his features. "What can I do?"

She tried to shake her head, but she couldn't. Instead, she squeezed his hand as she rode out the rest of the attack.

The images in her head slowed, centering on the double doors at the end of the hall that she'd seen so many times before. The fear that accompanied the vision filled her, closing her throat and making her shake all over.

In her vision, she closed the distance to the door, a shout emerging from her lips as she laid her fingers on the doorknob. She gasped as the vision ended, leaving her almost paralyzed with exhaustion.

But her mind kept working, fixating on the new detail she had uncovered in its latest iteration. She'd shouted a name as she approached the door. Laura.

Her mother's name. Were these visions about her mom?

CHAPTER 15

The pain began to subside, leaving behind a numbness as she lay against the soft cushions of the couch.

“What’s happened?” Marcus asked as he entered.

“I—I—I don’t know...she...collapsed. She was talking, and stopped, then she seemed to have trouble breathing.”

Marcus pushed past Jack to take Cate’s hand and assess her pulse. “Catherine? Have you had a vision?”

“Yes,” she squeaked out.

“All right. Just relax. How are you feeling?”

“Tired,” she answered. “But I didn’t pass out this time.”

He smiled at her as he tucked a lock of hair behind her ear. “Good. You’re getting better. Mother will be pleased.”

“I used her advice,” Cate answered as she tried to sit up.

“Not yet, dear. You’re still too tired. Would you prefer to rest in your bed?”

“No, I’m not sick,” she answered.

He stroked her hair. “But you must rest. The more you rest, the sooner you will recover your strength to use the compass to return home.”

With a sigh, she forced her head into a tiny nod. “Okay, fine. Just help me—”

Before she could finish her statement, he scooped her into his arms.

“I can walk,” she answered. “I’m moving a little.”

“What you can do and what you will do are separate things, Catherine.”

She tugged her lips into a slight smile. "Well, I know how you love to carry me around."

"Yes, I do," he said with raised eyebrows as he laid her on her bed. "I shall fetch Andrea to tend to you."

"Thank you."

Jack hovered at the foot of her bed. "I'll wait with her."

Marcus nodded at him before he left the room behind.

"Well, I'm making progress," she said with a sigh. "Look, I'm moving and talking after one of my visions. After the worst one of those."

"Want to talk about it or would you rather I prattle on about something else to take your mind off it?"

She focused her gaze on him. "I'd like to talk about it. Especially since I got a new detail this time."

Jack's eyebrows raised as he pulled an armchair closer to her bedside. "What was it? Maybe it'll help us figure this out."

Before Cate could explain, Andrea pushed into the room. "Your Grace, His Grace said you had a vision. How are you feeling?"

"Tired, but hopeful," Cate answered.

Andrea smiled at her as she skirted the bed and eased onto the edge to take Cate's hand. "That sounds wonderful."

Cate bobbed her head. "Yes, as you can see, I'm making more progress on them not being so crippling."

"And she has a new bit of information," Jack added. "I'm waiting to hear it."

"Oh, good, perhaps that will help us."

"Tremendously, I think," Cate said with a grin. "It's a detail that has clarified everything, though it has also made some things less clear."

"As always with these visions, Your Grace," Andrea said.

Cate knitted her brows. "Yes. As always."

"What was the detail?" Jack asked.

"Well, I had the usual vision. Terror striking at my heart as I run through the halls of Dunhaven. I rounded the corner and ran toward the double doors. This time I reached them. I had my hand on the handle when I called out a name."

"What name?" Jack asked.

"Laura," Cate answered.

"Laura," Jack repeated. "Do we know a Laura?"

His eyes went wide, and he snapped his fingers. "Oh, I wonder if that's Amanda's real name. Though she's not in the bedroom you indicated."

Cate shook her head. "I know a Laura."

"You do?" Jack asked. "Well, who is she?"

A smile spread across Cate's features. "My mother."

"Oh," Jack said, his eyelashes fluttering. "Right. Your mother. So, the visions are about your mother, you think?"

Cate nodded. "It fits with what Anna said—that these are so crippling because they're personal."

"Right, your mother would make sense then."

Cate let her gaze fall, her lips curling. "But what doesn't make sense is what is she doing at Dunhaven? She'd never been to Dunhaven. My grandparents left the country when my father was only five. I know because I convinced them to do it. Well, Marcus did, but still..."

"Perhaps they came back before you were born or when you were a baby," Jack suggested.

"And they never mentioned it to me? Maybe," Cate said with a shrug. "But why?"

"For your safety, Your Grace? Do you think?"

"No wait, that can't be right. Gertrude met them in the United States, but she never mentioned them being at Dunhaven." Cate let her head fall back to the headboard behind her. "None of this makes any sense."

"It must, somehow. Your mother must have been at Dunhaven at some point in the past. Perhaps history is different now. Or The Agency lured her there," Jack suggested.

Cate pressed her lips together, her features pinching. "That would make sense. That's why I'm afraid and running to her. I wish I had some other clues about when this may have occurred."

"Maybe next time you will get the door open, Your Grace, and you will be able to glean a clue from the clothing."

Cate offered her ladies' maid a smile as she squeezed her hand. "That would be great. I'd really love to solve this mystery." She snapped her gaze to Jack. "But not before we solve yours."

"Bah, what's a murder charge when The Agency is after your mother?"

"I wonder if that's what this is all about. Did they distract us with the murder charge while they somehow meddle with the past. Meddle with my parents again?" Her jaw dropped open as the blood drained from her face. "Are they trying to kill me as a baby?"

"I suppose we could time travel back to when you were born and see if you were at Dunhaven," Jack suggested. "Well, once we can time travel again."

"I promise to keep working with the compass, just as soon as I've gathered a little more strength."

"Take your time, Cate. We're not stuck anywhere horrible. We'll go when you're recovered and ready," Jack said.

She offered him a warm smile. "Thank you. Well, I suppose I should get a little rest now, then so I can practice later."

"I'll leave you to rest as long as Andrea is staying with you."

"I am, sir," Andrea answered with a smile. "I will take good care of her."

"Good. If you need anything, Cate—"

"I'll ask," she said as she reached for his hand and squeezed it.

After a last smile, he left the room behind. Cate slouched down in the bed.

"You should try to close your eyes, Your Grace. Perhaps a nap will help fortify you." Andrea retrieved an extra blanket and draped it over Cate.

Cate tugged it higher around her, tracing the edge with her thumbnail. "While I would love to nod off and hope I wake up feeling better, my mind just keeps whirling. Every clue I get makes less and less sense. Each time I think I'm on the cusp of a breakthrough, it makes me even more confused."

"The Dowager Duchess did say these things can get very confusing, and are often not what they seem."

"Yes, she did." Cate flicked her gaze to her ladies' maid. "Did she say anything to you? About these visions?"

Andrea eased onto the mattress next to Cate, taking her hand. "Nothing specific."

"But something," Cate said, searching the woman's face for answers.

Andrea lifted a shoulder. "It's nothing, Your Grace. She is only conjecturing."

"Conjecturing what, though? I do wish you or she would say. It would be so helpful."

"But it's nothing more than conjecture about the subject. Which cannot help you at all."

Cate heaved a sigh, letting her gaze fall to her lap.

“Your Grace, I am so sorry. I do wish I could say more to help you...”

Cate patted Andrea’s hand. “It’s okay. I understand. You don’t want to confuse me more.”

Andrea offering her a consoling grin as she nodded. “Yes. And I’m so afraid to do that. I don’t want to make things worse. And that is the same reason the Dowager has given for now saying what she suspects.”

“You’re probably correct. Every time I think I can’t get more confused, I get more information and things get worse. It’s probably best to just let events unfold. Even I told myself that.”

Andrea chuckled at the words. “I did speak with your future self earlier. It was so lovely to see you.”

Cate winced. “It was odd for me.”

“Oh, yes, it was the first time you’ve spoken with yourself, wasn’t it?”

“Yes, it was,” Cate answered with a chuckle. “And very odd. And even I wouldn’t tell myself what was happening or give myself a clue. If you can’t count on yourself, who can you count on?”

Andrea laughed as she nodded. “Correct. How are you feeling?”

“Much better. I’m improving at a faster rate, so that’s also progress.”

Andrea grinned at her. “You are making excellent progress, Your Grace. The Dowager will be so pleased when you return.”

“I will be pleased when we return, too. I just want to try to make some progress on any front, including the murder that we started investigating when Gianna struck again.”

“I’m certain you will be there very soon. You do not stay down for long.”

“Thank goodness. And on that note,” Cate said as she pulled the compass from her pocket. “I think I will practice—“

“Is that wise, Your Grace? Perhaps I should consult with His Grace first.”

Cate shot her pleading glance. “Or you could just let me try it and if I get too tired, I’ll stop.”

Andrea tugged the corner of her lips back. “All right. As long as you promise to stop if you become overexerted.”

“I promise. Believe me, I do not want to be worse off than I already am. Marcus will have me sedated if I am.”

Andrea giggled at the statement as she nodded. “Yes, he will. What must you do with the compass?”

“Concentrate on the details from the moment I want to return to and the needle will steady. Can you let me know when it’s steadying? I haven’t been able to master this with my eyes closed yet, and I’d like to do that before I try with my eyes open.”

“Of course, Your Grace. I will watch the needle while you do your work.”

“Thanks.” Cate sucked in a deep breath and let her eyes slide closed. She conjured the image of the last few seconds before Gianna had cursed them with the card. The scent of wood polish rushed back to her along with the dust motes floating in the sun streaking into the dimly lit room.

The snarky bite to Gianna’s voice tumbled through her mind along with the delicate warmth she felt from Jack next to her.

“It’s steady, Your Grace,” Andrea whispered.

A smile spread across her lips, but she fought to maintain her concentration rather than celebrate.

“Still steady for the most part.”

She held the image for a few more moments before she snapped her eyes open. The needled wobbled wildly in front of her, but it didn’t matter. “I think I’ve got it. Now, I just need to try with my eyes open.”

“You’re doing so well, Your Grace.”

Cate chewed her lower lip as she continued to grin. She let her head fall back against the pillows. “I’m going to try as soon as I take a little rest. I don’t want to overdo it and end up sedated.”

For a few minutes, she basked in her newfound skill, trying to keep the questions haunting her from clouding her mind.

With a deep breath, she pulled her head up and adjusted the covers. “All right, I’m going to try again.

“Good luck,” Andrea said with a nod.

Cate fixed her gaze on the needle that bobbed around wildly, struggling to visualize the room’s details in her mind. Concentrating on them became increasingly difficult as she watched the constantly moving object. After a few minutes, she flicked her gaze elsewhere with a sigh.

“It’s all right, Your Grace. Just take a rest, then try again.”

Cate nodded, closing her eyes for a second before she sucked in a breath and eyed the compass.

She allowed her vision to blur slightly as the memory came into view. She forced herself to recall all of these sensory details, pulling back the scents, sounds, feelings, and sights.

The needle's wild motions slowed, still flopping around, but in a smaller arc.

"It's working," Andrea whispered.

Cate continued with her memory, filling in the finer details such as how the light caught Gianna's hair and the slight smudge of her eyeliner.

The needle trembled slightly but pointed in one direction. "I've done it," she said, the sound of her own voice not disturbing the steady point.

"You have. You should be able to return soon, Your Grace."

"Yes. I'll rest a bit more, but with this progress, I think we'll be ready to leave this evening."

"What's this?" Marcus asked as he hovered in the door. "Ready to leave already?"

Cate grinned at him as she nodded. "I think I have this compass thing working."

He offered her an impressed grin. "Do you? I am not surprised, Catherine. You are a quick learner."

"I think I'll be ready to leave by tonight. Then we can finally get a start on solving this mystery. After we make sure Amy Grace is okay."

"Ah, yes, your friend. We will need to ensure she does not remember this."

Cate crinkled her forehead. "How are we going to pull that off? We'll return to the past just before the murder, and then we'll need to see who the murderer is and get Amy Grace to you."

Overwhelm coursed through her as she tried to decide on an order of events that made sense.

Marcus crossed to her and eased onto the edge of the bed. "Do not worry, Catherine. Solve your mystery, then bring the woman to me. I will handle it."

"Right. Okay. She seems like a good enough sport. Maybe she'll even enjoy helping us."

He rolled his eyes. "When she isn't pestering you about that teal dragon that she insists must exist somewhere. She continues to ask about a woman named Paige Turner. I have never heard of a more ridiculous name in my life."

Cate scrunched her features. "I wonder where she got that name from?"

"I have no idea, and truthfully, I do not wish to know. The idea of dragons, specifically, a tiny dragon is preposterous."

"Right. Only Dracopires."

"Those are obviously real," Marcus said with a matter-of-fact glance.

"Obviously," Cate said with a giggle. "Well, anyway, at least soon we will be out of your hair."

She paused her features pinching again as she flicked her gaze to her lap. "And in need of your help somewhere else. I'm sorry."

He smiled at her as he caressed her cheek. "Do not be. I will always be here for you."

"Sometimes two of you are here for me," she said with a chuckle.

He winked at her as he rose. "I shall have Dembe bring your lunch here. You can continue to practice with the compass. We shall make plans for you to leave this evening."

She nodded at him as she grabbed the compass again, prepared to practice. After a fortifying cup of tea, she spent the next several hours perfecting her ability to focus on the memory.

By the time their departure arrived, she felt confident to navigate through the time portal. They gathered in the windowless hidden room. Cate wiped her sweaty palms against her leggings as she waited for Marcus to open the portal.

Her heart thudded against her chest as she began to second guess her own abilities at navigating through the time-space continuum successfully.

Marcus offered her a consoling smile as his thumb rubbed her cheek. "You will be fine, Catherine."

Her smile faltered but did not fail completely as she nodded. "Okay, well, let's head back."

"Are you sure you're ready, Cate? There's no rush," Jack said.

She pressed her lips together as she sucked in a steadying breath. "I'm ready. It's time to solve a murder."

"I shall open the portal then. Make certain you stay together. And use the lantern I gave you to see the compass. I will see you in thirty years or so." He wiggled his eyebrows at her before stretching his hands in front of him.

The small sparkling appeared in front of them, and the winds picked up. Amy Grace pressed closer to Cate as the hole grew larger.

“This is normal, right?” she shouted over the din.

“Perfectly,” Cate assured her with a nod.

The portal opened fully.

“Good luck, Catherine,” Marcus called over the noise.

Jack held the lantern higher to cast the warm glow over the compass’s bouncing needle as they stepped inside.

The portal snapped closed behind them, startling Cate as the blackness enveloped them. A shiver snaked down her spine as an icy chill wrapped around her. She hadn’t realized how cold the time passage was since they only spent a few seconds in it, usually.

She glanced down at the needled wildly swinging around. With a deep breath, she started to focus her energy on where they needed to go.

“The needle is steadying,” Jack whispered. “Good job, Cate.”

Her eyebrows pinched together as she pulled more details of the memory into focus before taking a step forward. The needle pointed straight ahead as she pivoted and continued forward.

“It’s working. Cate, it’s working,” Jack said, his voice breathy with excitement.

She dared not answer him and lose her focus, so she only responded with a smile. They continue another two steps forward when a pain shot across her forehead.

Her stomach clenched, and she sucked in a shaky breath. “Not now.”

“What is it, Cate?” he asked.

The pain grew more intense, and the corners of her vision faded to black. “Oh, no.”

“Cate?”

Her hands trembled. A tear rolled down her cheek, and she dumped the compass in Amy’s hands. “Hold this. I’m going to—“

The world turned black, and her knees buckled as she slipped away from consciousness.

CHAPTER 16

Her heart raced as her feet pounded along the thick runner in the hall. I'm coming.

Her mind informed the unknown person at the end of the hall that she was coming for them, that she wouldn't leave them.

She barreled toward the double doors, her hands outstretched and reaching for the handle.

The cold brass sent a shiver down her spine as she reached for it, wrapping her fingers around its slim form.

"Laura!" she called before her eyes shot open. She gasped, trembling as she found herself in a black space.

"It's okay, Cate. You're okay."

Amy Grace held the light over her. "Cate?"

"She can't talk. After those visions, she often can't talk."

Cate trembled all over, clutching Jack's arm as she tried to force her lips to move. "I'm okay."

"Oh, good. She can talk. That's good. Cate? Another vision?"

"Yes," she answered. "I'm afraid it was fairly taxing."

"It's okay," he said as he cradled her in his arms. "Just take all the time you need to recover."

Another chill shook her, and she waged her head. "No, I think I'd better try to gather my strength and get us back."

"Cate, I don't know if you can or if that's a good idea," Jack answered as she struggled to stand.

“I don’t think staying here is a good idea, either.” Her knees barely held her as she rose.

Jack steadied her, concern etched into every line of his face. “Cate? I think you should rest.”

“It’s cold here. I’m afraid we may freeze. And we have no idea what may be lurking in this portal.”

“Lurking?” Amy Grace questioned. “Maybe a teal drag—“

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “I’m afraid that may not be what’s lurking. I don’t want to take any chances. But I’m a little unsteady.”

“Just lean on me, Cate,” Jack answered as he wrapped an arm around her. “You focus on the compass, and I’ll drag you along with me.”

She nodded as Amy Grace slipped the compass back into her hand and slid an arm around her waist. “I’ll help you, too.”

“Thank you,” Cate said with a gracious smile at the woman.

Jack held the lantern high over their heads as Cate worked to steady the needle again. Exhaustion made the task difficult. She wanted to close her eyes and curl into a ball. Her limbs tingled, and she struggled to lift her feet as Jack finally moved in the direction of the needle.

Her head lolled back, and they slowed to a stop. “Sorry,” she answered, tugging it back up.

“This isn’t working,” Jack answered, handing the lantern to Amy Grace.

“I’m just...really tired. I can keep going.”

Jack shook his head as he scooped her up. “I’ll carry you. Focus on that compass.”

She let her head fall against his shoulder, and her eyes slid closed. “Let me know if the needle falters.”

“I will.”

With her eyes closed, she found it easier to focus on the location despite her exhaustion.

“It’s steady, Cate,” Jack’s voice said as they moved forward through the chilly realm.

She held the image in her mind, hoping they’d soon reach the end of the time portal and exit into the real world.

Finally, warmth surrounded her instead of icy coldness. She struggled to force her eyes open.

“We need to take her somewhere,” Jack said.

“My place,” Amy Grace answered. “She can rest there.”

Cate pried her eyes open. "The murder," she answered.

"You're too tired, Cate."

"I can do it," she insisted. "Then we can decide how to proceed."

"How to proceed? You need rest," Amy Grace answered. "You stay here. Jack and I will go watch for the crime to be committed."

Cate heaved a sigh as she collapsed to the floor in the dark, empty ballroom. "Okay."

"Don't go away," Jack said with a grin.

"Very funny," she answered. "See if you can work on his comedy routine while you're sleuthing, will you?"

"I'll do my best," Amy Grace answered with a nod. "Come on, before we miss it."

"Wait, wait," Jack said. "Are you certain you want to see this? It may be...upsetting."

"Upsetting? You're going to watch, aren't you?"

"Yes, but—"

"Don't say you're a man. I can stomach it. And it has to be done. So, let's go." Amy Grace waved for him to follow her to the door.

Cate sat quietly against the wall as she eyed them peering from a small slit in the doors into the hallway.

After a few moments, their muscles went stiff, and they shared a glance before they hurried back to her.

"Well? Did you see it?"

"Yes, and no," Jack said with a shake of his head.

"What happened?" Cate asked.

He shifted his weight from foot to foot. "I'd rather explain it when we're somewhere safe. This place gives me the creeps after we got stuck in another time."

"We can go to—" Amy Grace began.

"I think that's a bad idea," Jack said. "We don't want anyone following you to your home."

Cate nodded as Jack pulled her to stand. "He's right. We'll have to take her with us. The button should work now."

"Oh, right, we're back to the magic button," Amy Grace said with a nod.

Cate held out a trembling hand, still shaky from her exhaustion. "Hang on to me. We'll be back at Dunhaven Castle in no time."

“Okay,” Amy Grace said with a shrug as she clamped her fingers around Cate’s wrist. Jack held on to her hand, and Cate flicked her thumb over the button.

The world blurred around them before coming back into focus. Moments later, they found themselves in the familiar library once again. Anna set her teacup in its saucer and slid it onto the table. “Ah, there you are.”

Cate collapsed into her chair with a heavy sigh.

“She had another vision during the time portal journey.”

“Oh, dear,” Anna said as she hurried to Cate’s side. “You’re doing quite well, though.”

“Yes,” Cate answered. “Just tired. I’m fine, though.”

“Let’s settle her in bed,” Anna said to Jack, “and then we can discuss what happened. I trust you did see something from the night of the murder?”

“Jack and Amy Grace did. And I’m dying to hear it. So, please, someone either tell me or carry me upstairs.”

“Jack, if you wouldn’t mind,” Anna said. “Though this is why Marcus should not have left.”

“I know he loves to carry me. He’ll be sad he missed the chance,” Cate said with a weak smile as Jack lifted her to carry her upstairs.

They traversed down the hall to the main staircase.

A wide-eyed Molly appeared from the back hallway. “Is she sick?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod. “I overdid it. I’m going to rest.”

“Good.” Molly shifted her gaze to Amy Grace. “Are you a nurse?”

“Uhhh,” Amy Grace began.

“Yes,” Jack said with a nod. “Amy Grace. Cate’s nurse. Come along, Nurse. Let’s get Lady Cate settled.”

“Right away, sir,” Amy Grace said as she followed him up the stairs.

They navigated through the halls to Cate’s bedroom suite. Jack laid her on the bed, and Andrea fussed over her, making her comfortable.

“How did I do with the nurse bit?” Amy Grace asked. “It felt convincing on my part.”

“Great job,” Jack answered, clapping her on the shoulder. “No one will suspect a thing.”

“Your castle is beautiful,” Amy Grace said.

“Thank you,” Cate answered with a smile. “I’m sorry to drag you here. And don’t worry about your dogs. We’ll get you back home before they even know you’re gone.”

She patted the two furry pups pressed on either side of her. “These are mine. Riley and Bailey.”

Amy Grace eased onto the side of the mattress to pet Bailey’s head. “They are very cute. I miss mine.”

“We’ll make sure you get home to them,” Cate said, patting her hand. “I promise.”

“In the meantime, we have a murder to solve,” Jack answered. “Sort of.”

“Sort of?” Cate asked. “What happened in that hallway? Did you witness a murder or not?”

Jack and Amy Grace exchanged a glance.

“Well, yes and no,” Jack answered.

“What does that mean?”

“It means...one minute, people were standing in the hall, in the next they were gone, and then in the next, there was David...dead.”

Cate heaved a sigh, her eyebrows pinching. “What? People were there, then they disappeared?”

“Right in front of our eyes,” Amy Grace said with a nod. “If I hadn’t seen it with my own eyes, I wouldn’t have believed it.”

“Who were the people?” Cate pressed.

Jack paced back and forth at the foot of Cate’s bed. “David, Amanda, and another man. I’ve never seen him before.”

Cate shifted on the mattress as she tried to parse through the details. “So...okay, give me every detail you can.”

Jack continued his trek back and forth across the area rug. “David and Amanda were fighting. They came barreling into the hall, shouting at each other. But then the other man appeared. I thought surely, he was going to kill him, but instead, Amanda just stopped speaking mid-sentence.”

“When the man arrived, did he come from the ballroom, or did he just appear?”

“He slipped in front the ballroom. And Amanda went nearly comatose.”

Cate chewed her lower lip. “I wonder what he did to her. This must be related to The Agency. What did he look like? How was he dressed?”

“He was dressed like a waiter,” Amy Grace said. “Cocoa brown hair with a wave to it. Chocolate brown eyes. Pointed features.”

“Okay,” Cate said with a nod. “Do you think you could identify him if you saw him again?”

Amy Grace nodded. “Definitely. I memorized his features so we could identify him later.”

“Okay, then what happened?” Cate asked, cutting her gaze to Jack.

“The second he walked in, Amanda stopped talking and went mute. She was almost like a frozen doll. He said a few words to David. David shook his head. It looked like he didn’t agree based on that and his posture and gestures. The man didn’t really react other than a smirk, and then they just disappeared.”

Cate twisted the blanket over her legs between her fingers. “This doesn’t sound right.”

“No kidding. And then after a second, David’s body appeared there, dead, and Amanda was back, too.”

“This is The Agency. They are interfering in this. Or they set this up to begin with. This explains why Amanda thinks you did it.”

“It does?” Jack questioned.

“Yes. She’s been brainwashed. Anna was right.”

Amy Grace’s features pinched. “Who is this woman?”

“Jack’s wife. Sort of. She’s here, accusing him of the murder.”

“Well, he obviously didn’t do it,” Amy Grace said as she lifted her chin. “And I can clear him. He was with me.”

Cate winced. “Technically, you can’t do that. That’s not the right Jack you were with.”

She screwed up her face. “Huh?”

“I’m the Jack from this year,” Jack said as he poked a finger toward the floor. “The Jack from that year was following Amanda. So, you couldn’t have been with him.”

Amy Grace’s eyes went wide, and her forehead creased. “Oh...wow, this time travel stuff is...confusing. Okay, so, I can’t give him an alibi because I was with Future Jack and not Present Jack.”

“No, you were with Present Jack and not Past Jack,” Jack corrected.

“No, Present Jack,” Amy Grace answered with a shake of her head.

“What? I’m Present Jack.”

“You’re Future Jack.”

“Actually, you’re Future Jack to her, but normal Jack to you. And she’s Past Amy Grace to us but normal Amy Grace to her,” Cate explained.

“What?” Jack asked as he scratched his head.

“Time is relative at this point. So, her current time is in the past, and our current time is now. But this is the future to her, but the present to us. And her time is the past to us, but the present to her.”

Jack collapsed on the edge of the bed and shook his head. “Okay, we have to stop. My head is going to explode. Let’s just go with you can’t give me the alibi because I’m not the right me.”

“Right,” Amy Grace said with a nod. “You are the wrong you. There is another you there who is the right you, but since I was with the wrong you, I can’t help the right you at all.”

“Right,” Jack said. “I think.”

He leapt to his feet and resumed his pacing. “So, what do we do now so all versions of me don’t go to jail for murder?”

“I think we’re going to have to confront Amanda.”

Jack rubbed his chin. “Do you think she has any information about the man?”

“She must. She has to know something.”

“But will she tell us.” Jack ground to a stop, setting his hands on his hips.

“Maybe,” Cate said, “with a little persuasion?”

Jack tugged his lips into a frown. “Persuasion? Do I want to know what you mean by that?”

Cate’s shoulders slumped. “I don’t mean anything...weird. I’m not going to waterboard her. But maybe Anna can hypnotize her.”

“Do you think she’ll agree to that?” Jack asked.

Cate pushed the covers back as she swung her legs over the edge of the bed. “There’s one way to find out.”

Jack shook his head as he hurried around the side of the bed and lifted her legs back onto the mattress. “No, no, no, you can’t get out of bed. You need to rest.”

“And we need to gather more information, Jack. We have to go.”

“I’ll go,” he insisted.

Cate heaved a sigh. “You just set her off. It’s better if I go. I’ll take Anna.”

“Wait just a moment,” Jack said. “Your nurse here may have something to say about this.”

Amy glanced at him, her features scrunching before he poked her shoulder. “Oh, right. Yeah, uh, maybe you shouldn’t do this.”

“That’s it? That was weak,” Jack complained.

“Sorry. It’s her house. And we do need to solve a murder.”

“Wait,” Cate said with a snap of her fingers, “I have a better idea.”

She pressed her lips together as a small smile formed on her lips. “Amy Grace, how do you feel about acting?”

CHAPTER 17

“This isn’t going to work,” Amy Grace said with a shake of her head.

“I think it will,” Jack answered as he studied her up and down.

She offered him an unimpressed stare as she flicked open the leather wallet. “This badge doesn’t even look real. And it says I’m Officer Playwell Kidd.”

“No one’s going to look at that. Just...flip it real quick.” Jack made a flicking motion with his wrist.

Amy Grace sucked in a breath as she practiced her credentials display. “Fine. But if I get caught...”

“Don’t worry, you’ll be okay.”

Cate hurried into the room. “Is she ready?”

“Yep,” Jack said as Amy Grace said, “No.”

Cate shot her a wide-eyed glance and an apologetic grin. “I really think this is the best possible way to do things. I’m sure you’ll be great.”

“Good thing I’ve read a lot of mysteries.”

“You’ll be perfectly fine. Jack managed to use the legal skills he learned from Law & Order to get two people out of jail,” Cate said as she wrapped her arm around Amy Grace and led her into the hall.

“Now, remember what we went over. You’re here to take her statement, but due to the inconsistencies in what she said then and what she’s saying now, you want to hypnotize her to ensure the details.”

“Right.” Amy Grace nodded as she fluttered her eyelashes. “Whew, my heart is beating fast.”

Cate patted her arm. “You’ll be okay. You’ll do great. I know you can do it.”

Amy Grace blew out a shaky breath as they arrived at a set of double doors.

“Ready?” Cate raised her eyebrows, her features expectant.

Amy Grace firmed her lips and nodded. “Yes.”

Cate twisted to face the doors, raising her fist to knock. Cate’s heart thudded against her ribs as she flicked her partner in crime a tentative smile.

The door whipped open in front of her.

Amanda eyed them both, her lips tugging into a frown. “What do you want, princess?”

Cate heaved a sigh at the words but forced a smile onto her lips. “I have a visitor for you.”

Amanda glanced around her, eyeing Amy Grace. “Who is she? Some friend who is going to plead your case or worse?”

Cate opened her mouth to answer when Amy Grace stepped around her. “Amy Grace Hoffman, Scotland Yard.”

She flashed the badge quickly before she shoved it back into her pocket. “I’m here to take your statement about what happened on that fateful night when David Hensley met his end.”

Cate flicked her eyebrows up as she watched the woman play her role.

“You’re from the police?” Amanda asked, crossing her arms.

“Yes,” Amy Grace barked at her. “May I come in and take your statement?”

Amanda shot a surprised glance Cate’s way. “And you let her in?”

“You have a story to tell, and it’s important that you tell it. Whether I believe it’s true or your memory is incorrect isn’t the point.”

“Wow, you surprise me, princess. I thought for sure you’d be keeping me under lock and key.”

Cate’s jaw flexed as she forced a smile onto her features. “Like I said, we need to get to the bottom of this, and your story is part of that.”

Amanda stepped back, allowing Amy Grace to enter the room. Cate stepped toward the door when Amanda stopped her. “I don’t think so, princess. I need to be able to speak freely.”

“Actually, I would prefer another witness while I question you if you wouldn’t mind,” Amy Grace answered.

Amanda heaved a sigh and shook her head as she waved for Cate to enter. “Fine.”

Cate slid past her into the bedroom, tightening her arms across her chest as she prepared for Amanda’s accusations against Jack.

Amy Grace pulled a notebook from her pocket along with a pen and flipped it open. “Let’s start from the beginning. What was your relationship to David Hensley?”

“We were dating,” Amanda said with a shrug.

“How long?”

“Little over a year.”

Amy Grace nodded as she scribbled in her notepad. “And what was the nature of your relationship? Were you cordial? Was the relationship difficult?”

“We had our problems like any couple. We argued sometimes. Other times, we were great. Normal relationship.”

“Normal? I have witnesses saying he was often loud and borderline violent with you. Did it ever go further than just loud? Did he ever hit you?”

Cate slid her eyes sideways to study Amanda’s reaction to that question, impressed with Amy Grace’s questioning.

Amanda huffed out a breath. “I see what you’re trying to do here. You’re trying to pin this on me. But you’re not going to do that. I didn’t do this.”

Cate winced at the words, shooting a panicked glance at Amy Grace, who didn’t seem bothered at all.

The woman shrugged, a nonchalant expression on her features. “You can think what you want. I’m just trying to get to the bottom of this. Now, did you or did you not have a tumultuous relationship with the deceased?”

“Yes, okay, yes, I did. We argued publicly several times, but I didn’t kill him.”

Amy Grace jotted a few notes down as she nodded. “No one’s saying you did, Mrs. Reid. But we need to get to the bottom of this and your statement switcheroo isn’t helping matters.”

“I can’t help it. I can’t keep lying.”

“So your original statement was a lie.” Amy Grace eyed her sternly.

“Yes,” Amanda said, “and I am very sorry about that but—“

“Why did you lie?”

Amanda licked her lips, shifting her weight. “I, uh...I thought I was doing the right thing. Jack was a nice guy. I didn’t want him to pay for something that...”

“That what? You didn’t want him to pay for something that he did? You didn’t want him to pay for something that he didn’t do? What?”

Amanda shook her head, letting her gaze fall to the floor. “I don’t know why I did it, okay? I just did.”

“And then you went on to marry the man. This man who killed your boyfriend, according to you. You married him. Again, why?”

“I...he...I’m sorry, this interview is too much for me. I can’t do this.”

“Unfortunately, Mrs. Reid, you insisted we do it,” Amy Grace pressed. “And now I have to follow through.”

“Well, now I’m not so keen on it, okay?”

“Aw,” Amy Grace said, narrowing her eyes at the woman. “Well, that’s just too bad. I need answers. And I’m going to get them from you. This isn’t a game. The law isn’t here to play with at your whim because you’re mad at your husband.”

“That’s not it at all!” Amanda shouted back.

“Then, what is it, Mrs. Reid? Tell me. What made you show up on his doorstep over a decade later and claim he’s the guilty party?”

Amy Grace raised her eyebrows toward her hairline. “No answer? Well, I have a way to get answers.”

“What are you going to do to me?” Amanda asked, wrapping her arms around her midriff.

“I want you to be hypnotized. We’ll get to the bottom of what happened that way. You may want to play games, but your subconscious will give us all the answers that we need.”

“No,” she refused with a shake of her head. “No, I won’t do it. I’m not going to allow you to manipulate me. Jack killed him. I witnessed it. I don’t know what else to tell you.”

Amy Grace wrote another note on her notepad before she flicked it shut. “Fine. If that’s all you have to say, I think we’re finished here.”

“Are you going to arrest him?”

Amy Grace shrugged. “I’ll take this back to my office and see what my superiors think. But I can tell you the word of what may be a disgruntled wife over a decade later may not do the trick. I'm sorry, Mrs. Reid, but without any way to corroborate this, your statement may be absolutely useless."

Cate pressed her lips together as Amy Grace strode toward the door. Amanda stared at a spot on the floor, her features pinched. "Wait..."

Cate spotted the fleeting smile on Amy Grace's face before she spun to face the woman.

"Is there something else?"

"I'll do it," Amanda answered, sinking onto the edge of her mattress. "I'll do the hypnosis thing."

"Good," Amy Grace answered as she raised her chin. "That's very good. That will help the investigation quite a bit."

"When and where?"

Amy Grace raised her hands to the sides with a shrug. "How's right now?"

Amanda glanced at her. "Are you a hypnotist?"

"No, but I believe Her Grace's mother-in-law is a very practiced one. She can do it."

Amanda leapt to her feet, her fingers curled into fists. "No! No, I won't have her mother do it. She'll plant information. She will distort the facts."

"I'm not going to allow that to happen." Amy Grace shook her head. "I'm well-versed in how this works. I just want her to put you under, then I will ask the questions, and you will tell us what you remember."

Amanda swallowed hard. "I want it recorded. I want to hear what I say."

"I think that would be an excellent idea," Amy Grace answered.

"Fine." Amanda tightened her arms around her midriff again. "I guess bring her in."

Amy Grace shot Cate a glance. "I'll come with you, Your Grace."

Cate opened the door, and they slipped into the hall. "Wow," Cate whispered as they hurried to find Anna, "that was excellent. Even I believed you were from Scotland Yard."

"Thanks. I really enjoyed it. And at least she agreed."

"Let's hope Anna can do the trick." They hurried down the stairs and to the library.

Anna sat near the fireplace drinking a cup of tea as she perused a book.

"We have good news," Cate said with a grin. "Amanda has agreed to be hypnotized. Do you think you can use that to clear up whether or not her recollection of that night is a false memory?”

Anna snapped the book shut, setting her tea aside and rising. “It may take some work, but yes. We should be able to sort fact from fiction. Where is she?”

“In her room,” Cate answered.

Her mother-in-law bobbed her head. “Let’s see what information we can find.”

Cate led the two women back to Amanda’s room. Anna flitted closer to the bed, offering the woman a polite smile. “Hello, Amanda.”

“Hi,” she answered with a frown. “I’m not happy about this, but...I’m willing to give it a go.”

“Don’t worry,” Amy Grace said, “I’ll be here the entire time. And I will make certain they record the entire thing.”

Amanda nodded as she shot a frown at Cate, her eyes narrowed. Cate shrank back, trying not to roll her eyes at the woman’s suspicion. She was lying, yet she was going to play the victim.

Anna settled into an armchair she’d dragged closer to the bed and pulled a gold medallion from her pocket. “Now, Amanda, I want you to lie back and try to relax. I know it may seem difficult, but listen to the sound of my voice and keep your eyes on this locket.”

Amanda swallowed hard and sank into the pillows. She glanced at the gold jewelry swinging on the chain. It swayed back and forth lazily as her eyes slid side to side to follow it.

“Good, now I’d like you to just concentrate on the sound of my voice. And as you listen to me talk, you will begin to feel more and more relaxed. First, your feet and the bottoms of your legs, then your thighs. They feel like they are sinking into the bed.”

Anna continued to swing the medallion back and forth. “And then your torso, your arms, and your head. And now you’re feeling so relaxed that you can let your eyes slide closed. Just focus on the sound of my voice.”

Amanda’s eyelids grew heavy before they finally closed.

Anna pocketed the medallion. “Very good, Amanda. You’re still feeling relaxed. I’m going to count backward from ten and when I reach one, you will be completely relaxed. Ready?”

“Yes,” she murmured in response.

“All right.” Anna began a slow count backward, landing on the number one.

“Are you relaxed, Amanda?” Anna asked.

“Yes,” she answered, her voice a whisper.

“Good. I’m going to ask you some questions, Amanda, and I’d like you to answer truthfully. Do you understand?”

“Yes,” the woman said.

“If you don’t answer truthfully, there will be a consequence, and you won’t like it very much.”

Cate wrinkled her nose at the statement. What did Anna plan to do if she suspected a lie?

“What is your full name?” Anna asked.

“Amanda Leigh Reid.”

Anna lifted her chin and frowned. “Mmm, yes, that is the name you are using right now, but what is your real name?”

Cate’s breath hitched as she waited for the answer. She’d seen Amanda in the 1950s. Was that her real time period?

“Lucy,” she answered without hesitation. “Lucy Thorne.”

“Lucy Thorne,” Anna answered. “And where is Lucy Thorne from?”

“Rye,” she answered.

Cate’s eyebrows furrowed as she quickly found the location and scanned a brief paragraph about the small town near the coast.

“And when is Lucy Thorne from? What era is yours, Lucy?”

Amanda didn’t answer, her eyebrows pinching.

“Lucy,” Anna prodded. “When were you born?”

“2024,” she answered.

Cate couldn’t stop the gasp that escaped her. The woman wasn’t even born yet. She was from some era in the future.

“Do you know what year you are in?” Anna questioned.

“Yes,” she answered.

“So, you have been sent back in time. For what purpose?”

Her features remained blank as she answered, “I do not know the purpose I serve, only that I serve them.”

Anna sucked in a breath, her eyes narrowing as though she assessed the truthfulness of the answer. “Who do you serve?”

“The Agency,” Amanda answered.

“And The Agency has not shared with you the purpose you serve?”

“No,” Amanda said. “It is not mine to know. Only to do as I am told.”

Anna shot Cate a glance before she returned her gaze to Amanda. "All right, Lucy, let's continue in a different direction for now, shall we?"

"All right," Amanda answered.

"I want you to think back to a very particular evening. The evening David Hensley was killed. Do you remember this evening?"

"Yes," Amanda answered.

Cate's heart thudded against her chest. She licked her lips as she waited to hear the truth about what happened that night. While likely none of this would be admissible, at least they could start to track down the guilty party and spare Jack a murder charge.

"You say you witnessed David's murder. Is this true?"

"Yes. I was there when he was murdered," she answered.

"Who did it?" Anna asked.

Amanda hesitated for a moment, her eyebrows pinching together before she spoke again. "Jack Reid."

CHAPTER 18

Cate's heart plummeted at the words she'd spoken. Jack couldn't have done it. She knew he didn't do it, but even under hypnosis, Amanda claimed he did.

"Jack Reid?" Anna repeated. "Are you certain?"

"Yes," Amanda answered. "I saw him do it. I watched David die."

Anna puckered her lips as she studied the woman. "Describe the sound he made as he died."

Cate's stomach twisted into a knot. Why would Anna ask such a question? Did the gruesome detail matter?

"I don't recall," Amanda answered.

Amanda's eyebrow arched. "What did you smell when he died?"

Amanda hesitated again before she answered, "I don't recall."

"Describe what you witnessed when David died," Anna pressed.

"Jack...killed him," Amanda answered.

"How? Describe the events. You two were arguing, correct?"

"Yes," she answered. "He had a temper, and we often argued."

"And then what?"

"Jack burst through the doors. He crossed to us and strangled David."

"Strangled. And yet you do not recall the noise either of them made?"

"No, maybe I blocked it out," Amanda offered. "It is a terrible memory."

"Your subconscious has access to it. You may prefer not to speak of it, but your subconscious has all the details. Describe them to me now."

Amanda's forehead creased again. "Jack crossed to us and strangled David."

"More details," Anna pushed.

"Jack crossed to us. He put his hands around his neck and strangled him."

"Is that all you can tell me?"

"Yes," Amanda answered.

"All right, Amanda, I'm going to bring you out of this now. When you awaken, you will not want to speak about this at all. You will ask to be left alone to rest. Do you understand?"

"Yes," Amanda answered.

"Good. I will count backward from ten. When I reach one, you will awaken and ask to be left alone to rest." Anna started her countdown, and when she reached one, Amanda's eyes fluttered open.

She pushed up to her elbows, eyeing them.

"How do you feel, Amanda?" Anna asked.

"Okay. But I would like to rest."

"I understand." Anna smiled at her as she rose. "We will leave you to rest."

"Thank you," Amanda said, her forehead creasing as she settled back in the pillows. "Yes, I would very much like to rest undisturbed."

Anna flicked the light off near the bed, and they shuffled from the room into the hall. Cate's fingers curled into fists as she fought the upset welling inside her. "We've learned nothing. She just keeps insisting Jack did it. If Amy Grace had really been from Scotland Yard, they'd have him in handcuffs already."

Anna slid her arm through Cate's and led her down the hall along with Amy Grace. "She is lying."

Cate's forehead pinched. "I think so, too, but that hypnosis trick didn't work to get the truth out of her."

"We will need to try several more times," Anna explained. "But I am certain she is lying."

Cate's lips parted as she tried to make sense of the statement. "How do you know?"

They pushed into the library and found seats around the fireplace.

"She cannot describe a single sensory detail from the murder she supposedly witnessed. If you had witnessed a murder, you would recall things. You may block them out, but in a hypnotic state, you would recall them. A gurgling noise from the victim, the smell of sweat from the attacker, the redness of their faces, the bulging of eyes. Something would have stuck with her if she'd truly witnessed that crime.

"Instead," Anna continued with a shrug, "she simply repeats the narrative she has already been given. Jack killed him. That has been ingrained in her with a false memory."

Cate settled deeper into the cushion, her eyebrows knitting. "What if she suppressed it?"

"No. Her subconscious would recall the details. We may even witness her becoming upset as she relives them during the hypnosis, but she would recall them."

Cate drummed her fingers against the chair's supple leather. "So, how did this happen? Was she lying when she said she saw Jack kill David even under hypnosis? You said she had to tell the truth or else something would happen to her, but how could you tell?"

"No, she wasn't lying per se. She was repeating what had been drilled into her, likely through some form of mind control."

"Mind control." Cate's thoughts whirled at the nugget. Had they somehow brainwashed Jack's wife? And could it be undone?

"I'm still wrapping my mind around the fact that the girl lying in bed upstairs hasn't been born yet," Amy said.

Cate shot her another stunned glance. "Right. You're right. I wondered about that because I have seen her in the 1950s, then in your time, and now here. This is so...confusing, which doesn't make things any easier."

"No. So, this Agency...they recruited her in the future, and what? Brainwashed her and sent her back to the past?" Amy Grace asked.

"She was likely sent back to the past for the express purposes of marrying Mr. Reid. Once the murder occurred, The Agency capitalized on it."

Amy Grace shook her head as she massaged her temples. "I hope I can stand this stuff without my brain exploding. My mind is ready to burst."

"Let's take a break," Cate suggested. "I'll fill Jack in on what's happened, and we'll give our next steps some thought."

"All right," Amy Grace said. "Oh, uh, not to be a pain, but should I just stay here?"

“No, no, let me get you a bedroom. You can have a nice cup of tea and lie down for a bit.”

“I don’t want to impose,” she said as she rose with Cate.

“No imposition. I’ve got plenty of them.” Cate laughed as she led the woman from the room. “I’ll be right back.”

“I’ll be here when you’re ready, dear,” Anna answered.

Amy Grace followed behind Cate as she led her down the hall to the main staircase. The woman chewed her lower lip as they climbed.

“Everything okay?” Cate asked.

“I’m just...worried about my dogs.”

“Aw, I’ll bet. But I promise as soon as we can, we’ll get you home to them and they won’t even know you were gone. Time travel is nice like that.”

“I still can’t figure that out. Time is passing, and I’m not there.”

“No, you’re here. But you can live for days and days here and still return to the moment you left, and no time has passed there.” Cate snaked through the halls toward a rose-pink bedroom.

“I believe you but...I just can’t wrap my head around it.”

Cate patted her on the shoulder. “You get used to it after a while.”

“I’m not sure I want to.”

Swinging the door open to the bedroom, Cate chuckled. “Well, I’m certainly glad to have you along for this ride. You did very well with the Scotland Yard bit.”

“Glad to be of service,” Amy Grace said as she stepped inside, her eyes rising to take in all the details. “Wow. This is fancy.”

“I hope you like it. I’ll have Molly bring some tea up for you.”

“I appreciate that very much. Thank you.”

With a nod, Cate left her behind to explore the room and hurried down to the kitchen to pass the message along to Molly.

“Your Grace,” Mrs. Fraser said, her eyes wide. “What are you doing up? Aren’t you ill?”

“I’m feeling much better. I’d like to have tea sent up to Amy Grace.”

“The nurse?” Molly asked.

Cate bobbed her head. “Yes. She’s in the rose-pink bedroom in the west hall.”

“You shouldn’t be out of bed ordering tea for your nurse,” Mrs. Fraser said with a wag of her finger.

Cate chuckled. "I'm perfectly capable of ordering tea. And I'd like to get her settled in, too."

"That's you, Cate," Molly answered as she began to prepare a tray. "You're always trying to settle everyone else. You should be settling yourself."

"I will. I'm just trying to do a little to keep my strength up."

"Well, so long as it's very little, Your Grace," Mrs. Fraser answered with a nod and a wag of her finger, "else, I'll have to put my foot down. I don't want His Grace returning to find out we didn't care for you properly."

"You are doing just fine taking care of me. Marcus can't possibly object."

"He can, and he very well may," Mrs. Fraser warned. "He likes things just so. Typical English Duke."

Cate chewed her lower lip as she eyed the preparations for their meals and Amy Grace's tea. What would everyone think when they divorced? She wondered if he'd erase their minds so they didn't recall their marriage at all.

Her stomach clenched as she wondered if he could erase hers, too. It may be best if she didn't remember it either.

"Your Grace? Is everything all right? You look as though you've lost your best friend," Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate plastered a smile onto her features and nodded, pulling her mind away from her musing. "Yes. Just wondering how things are going in Maine."

"Is that where His Grace went?" Molly asked.

Cate bobbed her head. "Yes. Remember Celine, Damien, Michael..."

Molly smiled at her. "Who could forget the people who helped bring Jack back to us?"

"Right," Cate answered, "they are from Maine and needed a little help with a problem of their own."

"Aw, that's sweet that he'd help them. I'm surprised you didn't go, too," Molly answered, pouring steaming water into a teapot.

Cate pondered it. He hadn't asked her to go. In fact, he'd explicitly said it was far too dangerous. She wondered if that was true or if he merely didn't want to be burdened with a spouse.

She knew the score. Their marriage was fake. But still, a hovering wife may put a damper on his plans to woo back his former love interest.

"Well, with my illness..."

“I didn’t think His Grace would allow it,” Mrs. Fraser finished for her. “I’m surprised he left your side, though. It must be a large issue for him to attend to.”

“I’m sure it is. And I’m really not that sick, so I’m certain he felt more than comfortable leaving me here in your very capable hands.”

“Tea’s ready,” Molly said with a cheery smile. “I’ll run it up.”

“I’ll walk up with you. I’m going to be a good patient and rest.”

Mrs. Fraser raised her eyebrows, surprise etched into her features. “Well, progress! Our Duchess Cate taking it easy.”

Cate laughed at her comment before she ducked out of the kitchen behind Molly. She had no intention on resting. She had too much of a mystery on her hands with Jack’s trouble.

She wanted to inform him of what had happened with Amanda and hope that they could figure out a direction to move in. Their investigation was stuck in quicksand.

“So, how long will the nurse be with us?” Molly asked.

“Uh, not very long,” Cate answered. “She’s only here to make sure I don’t get any worse. As soon as I’ve proven that I’ve turned a corner, she’ll go back home.”

“Well, I hope you have turned the corner,” Molly answered.

Cate offered a polite smile, knowing she hadn’t. She’d gotten no further on the issue causing her to faint at every turn.

They reached the foyer, and Molly started up the stairs. She twisted to find Cate heading for the library. “I thought you were going to rest.”

“I just need to check in with Anna,” Cate answered. “Then I promise I will.”

Molly nodded at her before she continued up the steps with the tea tray. Cate chewed her lower lip, hurrying down the hall.

Too many loose threads were dangling. She wished she could grab hold of one and unravel the mystery before it unraveled her.

She pushed into the library, finding Anna with her book.

She glanced up from the pages with a smile. “Have you gotten your friend settled?”

“Yes,” Cate answered. “And now I think I need some help from you.”

Anna snapped the book shut and set it down on the cushion beside her. “Of course, dear. There are several ways we can continue forward in our search for information with Ms. Thorne—“

Cate plopped into the chair across from her. “Yes, I’ll need help with that, too, but that’s not what I meant.”

Anna’s eyebrows shot up. “Your visions?”

Cate sucked in a breath, suppressing a shudder at what was quickly becoming her least favorite subject. “Yes. I had two more while we were stuck in the past. I got a bit of information, but it’s not doing me any good. I’d like to practice more. Maybe in the room I’m running to in my visions.”

“Tell me about what you learned,” Anna said.

Cate sucked in a breath and nodded. “It’s still the same vision. I’m running down the hall toward those double doors. I’m afraid. But in these latest ones, I’ve reached the door.”

“Progress.”

Cate gave her a weak smile as she nodded. “Yes. And...I call out a name. This is where the real progress is, though it makes no sense to me still.”

“What is the name?”

“Laura,” Cate answered, her mind conjuring an image of her mother’s face.

“And what about that confuses you?”

Cate raised her shoulders, tension building in them. “Well, you were right. These are personal because they are about my mother. But when was my mother at the castle? No time that I know of. It must be in the past. But when? And am I changing the past by bringing her here?”

Cate’s features scrunched as she realized she was no closer to answers.

“Catherine, I know this is difficult, but you must learn that visions can be incredibly difficult to sort through.”

“It doesn’t make it any less frustrating. I get one answer solved, and it gives me ten more questions.”

Anna offered her a cryptic smile.

“What?” Cate asked.

“I didn’t say anything.”

“No, but you...have a look. A look like I haven’t solved anything.”

Anna rose from her seat on the couch and approached Cate, stroking her hair as she perched on the arm of the chair. “I have something to say, though I do not wish it to sound harsh. If you are not in a place to hear it, I’ll hold my tongue.”

“I’d rather you just say it. I don’t want people to hold back. I’m not sickly.”

“No, but you are stressed. Exceptionally over these visions. I do not wish to make things worse. But there is something you should consider.”

“What is it?” Cate asked.

“So far, your assessment of the visions has been very closed-minded.”

Cate furrowed her brow as she lifted her gaze to her mother-in-law.

“Don’t be offended. This is all new to you. But I feel it is something I must mention.”

Cate assessed the statement, trying to determine what it meant. How was she being closed-minded? She’d barely made any suppositions about the visions because, until recently, she hadn’t had anything to latch on to.

Even now, she had precious little, but from what she did know, she hadn’t jumped to any conclusions.

“All right,” she finally answered, “but I don’t see what you mean?”

Anna offered her a consoling smile. “You’ve assumed the Laura you’re running toward is your mother. But it could be another Laura.”

Cate wrung her hands in her lap. “But that’s because you said it was deeply personal. I don’t know any other Lauras who I have a deeply personal connection with.”

“Yet,” Anna answered. “You don’t know any Lauras yet.”

Cate sucked in a breath as she realized what Anna was hinting at. The Laura she raced to could be a part of her future. Which meant she was no closer to solving anything. How could she guess at her future?

She would never be able to solve her visions.

CHAPTER 19

A flurry of emotions sped through her from despair to anguish, and Cate sank her head into her hands as tears welled in her eyes.

Anna's hand rubbed her back as she chewed her lower lip, trying to hold her emotions together.

"Catherine, you shouldn't take it so hard. It's not a criticism of you, just a bit of helpful advice."

Cate shook her head as she wiped away the tears that had fallen to her cheeks. "I'm not...it's not..."

Her features pinched again.

"Tell me what's upsetting you," Anna said.

Cate's lower lip trembled as she glanced through glassy eyes at her mother-in-law. She would truly miss the woman after her divorce, and she wondered if they could remain friends. Likely not. The woman would probably be angry about what had occurred and blame Cate for roping her son into a loveless marriage.

Cate swallowed hard, facing her present instead of her future. "I don't feel it's a criticism, but I don't understand it. I don't understand anything. I keep having these visions over and over, and I'm getting nowhere nearer to the truth. I'm just frustrated."

"Perhaps, then, we shouldn't visit that room. Maybe it's best if you put it out of your mind for a bit and focus on the situation with Mr. Reid."

Cate pressed her lips together into a thin line. Was it best that she did that? Or would she be better off searching for answers in her future?

“No,” she said as she clenched her fingers into a fist around the tissue she’d fished from her pocket, “no, I have to face it. If I let this vision beat me, I’ll never learn.”

Anna’s features softened. “You are a fighter, and an excellent pupil. I am reminded every day of why Marcus chose you as a wife.”

Cate swallowed hard, forcing a smile onto her features.

Marcus hadn’t chosen her. He’d done her a favor.

“I know I usually make you blush when I tell you that, but it is the truth, Catherine. Your quiet strength, your curiosity, and your willingness to fight. It is what drew him to you. And what binds you together.”

This was going to be so difficult when they separated. Not only the fall out with the others around her, but the one that would occur privately for her. But she couldn’t face that now. She’d deal with it when it happened. She had too many other things on her mind to cry over her future.

Though, she assumed she had better start thinking about it since Anna seemed to think the Laura she’d become so close to would fill it.

“Maybe we should try visiting that room,” Cate said, deflecting from answering anything about her marriage.

“Are you certain you feel up to it? You are very upset.”

“Yes, but then I will be less upset. I’m facing it. Right now, I’m falling apart because I haven’t faced it. But at least I’m doing something.”

“All right, then. If it becomes too much for you, we’ll merely move on to Mr. Reid’s dilemma.”

“At least we made some semblance of progress on that. We know her claims are false. We just need to prove them.”

“And we will all work on that. But first, let’s satisfy your curiosity with this room.”

Anna rose and held a hand out to Cate. Cate clung to it, needing the steadiness the woman provided as she rose. She wasn’t certain what would happen when she stepped into the room that had been haunting her visions, but she hoped it would lead to some clarity.

With a deep breath, she skirted the chair and headed for the doors.

Her heart hammered against her ribs as she climbed the stairs. In a moment of weakness, she nearly stopped herself from threading through the halls toward the room in her visions. Her fingers curled into fists as she willed herself along toward it. She had to find answers.

As she rounded the corner, the double doors at the end of the hall coming into sight, her breath hitched. Her fingernails dug into her palms as the sense of déjà vu swirled within her.

A warm hand slid around her shoulders. "Take your time, Catherine."

Cate offered her a nervous smile, the expression faltering within seconds.

"It's all right, dear. In fact, let's pause here. Is this the direction you were coming from?"

Cate shook her head. "No, I..."

Her shoulders slumped as her eyebrows pinched.

"What is it, dear?"

"I don't know why I think this, but I feel like I was coming from my bedroom. But I don't think I started out in my bedroom in any of the visions. I'm just running from that way to this hall."

"Good, that's fine. Your gut reaction is likely correct. Let's shift there and retrace your steps from the bedroom, approaching the door in the same direction as you do in your vision."

Cate bobbed her head, though she wasn't certain she agreed. Her muscles tensed as Anna led her to the next hallway.

"You may experience some of the emotions you experience in your vision this way. But you are perfectly safe."

"Right." Cate pressed her lips together into a thin line as she repeated Anna's words over and over in a mantra.

Her trepidation built as they spun around to approach the hall. Her heart thudded, her palms turned sweaty. The future memory of her racing down this hall toward some unknown problem that had twisted her stomach in knots manifested.

"Breathe, Catherine," Anna reminded her.

She realized she'd been holding her breath, her chest constricted as they approached the corner.

She forced out an exhale through her lips and pressed on around the corner.

"Does this feel right?" Anna asked, hesitating at the end of the hall.

Cate nodded, unable to formulate words. "Y-yes," she whispered.

"It's all right, Catherine. These visions are terrifying, but there is nothing to be afraid of now."

“To be honest,” Cate said as they took a few steps closer to the doors at the end, “I’m a little afraid of having the vision again.”

“Of course, you are. And you may. The feel of the brass knob on your fingers may trigger it. The opening of the door could bring a new rush of it. But it also may bring some clarity.”

“Okay, I’m preparing myself for it,” she responded. “And maybe this time, I’ll actually manage to get through it.”

“It’s all right if you don’t. This is not a race to mastery.”

“I feel like it is. How long did it take for you?”

“Oh, darling, I had a much different life than you, but for me even, it was hardly fast. More like a slow crawl on my knuckles over glass.”

The statement elicited a chuckle from Cate, easing some of her nerves.

“Perhaps we should have bought your rose. It’s comforting to you.”

“It’s okay. I have that memory floating in the back of my mind, though I’ll admit, I’m trying to concentrate on details from this vision.”

Anna stopped her, twisting to face her as they stood in the middle of the hall. “Here is a tip. I realize your mind is searching for answers, so it is natural to focus on the vision, but try focusing on your happy vision.”

Cate’s brows knitted as she parsed through the advice. “Really? What if I miss something?”

“It’s far likelier that you will miss something when you are hyper focused on the vision, combing through it, because your mind is overtaxed and burdened. It’s less likely you will miss something if you aren’t forcing anything. Then, things tend to flow more freely.”

“Right,” Cate said, “okay. Focus on my happy vision.”

Anna nodded.

Cate slid her eyes closed, trying to bring the full future moment into her mind, focusing on every detail she could recall. She opened her eyes, a smile playing on her lips. “I have it.”

“Good, hold on to it and let’s continue.”

Cate sucked in a steadying breath as Anna led her further down the hall. Her future memory slipped a little, replaced by details of her vision. Her forehead creased as she fought to hold on to the happy moment in her future.

“Doing all right, darling?” Anna asked.

“Yes,” she answered with a shaky voice. “Trying to hold on to my happy future memory, but it’s slipping.”

“It’s all right. This needn’t be perfect. If you slip, you slip. Just let things come naturally, dear.”

“I’m trying.” She fought the urge to shudder all over as they approached the doors.

Images of her reaching for the doorknob shattered the peace she’d found in her comforting vision. Her legs wobbled.

“Can you reach for the door?” Anna asked softly.

Cate bobbed her head, stretching a trembling hand toward the brass knob. More emotion and images flooded her mind, taking her breath away.

“Breathe, Catherine. I know this is difficult, but you must remain as calm as possible.”

She clung to her mother-in-law’s words, reminding herself that she was safe, pulling on the emotion from the happy memory.

The sound of her panicked voice calling for Laura echoed in her mind.

Before she could second-guess herself, she swung the door open, holding her breath as she peered into the room beyond.

She gnawed at her lower lip, expecting something to happen. She wasn’t certain what, but she almost anticipated a monster to leap out at her.

“Anything?”

Cate shook her head. “No, nothing. Nothing is triggering anything.”

“All right. Perhaps that is enough for the day,” Anna suggested.

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “I want to go inside.”

Anna offered her a supportive smile and a nod. Cate stepped into the quiet room, scanning it in search of some clue that could help her unravel the vision.

She spotted nothing that meant anything to her. She crossed to the bed, running a hand over the dust cover spread across it. Maybe if she touched the actual bed, it would trigger a vision. Objects had a way of doing that.

She grabbed the post poking toward the ceiling before she traced her fingers down to the mattress. She slid her fingers under the dust cover and ran her hand along it.

Nothing popped into her mind. With her lips pressed together in a thin line, she shifted her gaze to other furniture items in the room. Doubtful any of them would help, she heaved a sigh.

“What is it, Catherine?” Anna asked from the doorway.

“I’m trying to trigger something. I thought maybe the bed would do it. You know? If my mom was here at some point...” Her voice trailed off as she let her gaze slide to her mother-in-law. "I know I'm not supposed to assume that, but...I just...whoever this Laura is, she was in this room, I guess. And...I thought touching something here would trigger a vision. It's happened before."

"Yes, physical objects can do that. Perhaps not the bed, but something else," Anna suggested.

"I'll try everything here. Honestly, I'm surprised the touch of the doorknob didn't help."

"This can be unpredictable."

"Tell me about it. I guess if it was predictable, though, we could easily control the world."

Anna chuckled at the statement. "It would certainly help."

Cate crossed to a dresser, lifting the sheet that covered it and running her fingertips along the smooth surface. She slid her eyes closed, hoping to find something in her mind's eye.

Maybe she was trying too hard. She let her brain relax, pulling the happy future memory into her thoughts as a distraction. But it didn't help. Nothing crept into the fringes of her mind even remotely related to this room and what was happening in it at some undisclosed time period in her future.

She pulled her hand away as she rolled her eyes, her hopes sinking. "I know I shouldn't feel like this is a setback, but I do."

"That's natural, darling. Continue to explore until you've satisfied your curiosity."

Cate bobbed her head as she wandered around the room, trying the other pieces of furniture. Nothing brought even the whiff of a vision to her. She ended her quest in the center of the room, spinning in a slow circle as she gnawed at her lower lip. "Nothing."

"It may be for the best. These visions are becoming quite taxing on you."

"What's taxing is that I'm nowhere closer to solving them."

Anna offered her a consoling glance. "Let's work on our other problem, shall we?"

"Okay," Cate answered as she took a step toward the door.

Within seconds the room around her melted, her vision darkening on the edges. Her footsteps faltered, and she grabbed the post on the bed to steady herself. Her head snapped back as a violent vision tore through her.

Jumbled images rushed through her mind in a maddening mess. As she fought to make sense of them, her limbs turned weak and her senses began to close off.

She collapsed onto the floor in a heap.

CHAPTER 20

“Catherine?” a muted voice called to her. “I am here with you.”

Cate struggled to open her eyes, her eyelids fluttering before they fell shut again. She moaned and made a desperate attempt to move her leaden legs and arms. She must be exhausted again from the force of the vision that had torn through her moments ago.

Perhaps she could use this time to sort through the jumbled mess that had brought her to her knees.

Her brain refused to cooperate, though.

“Catherine.” She recognized Anna’s voice, though it sounded further away this time.

She wanted to answer, but she couldn’t.

“Catherine, try to focus on my voice.” The sound warbled, distorted by something.

Cate’s forehead pinched as she forced herself to focus on Anna’s voice which trickle in and out.

She had to force her eyes open so she could use her surroundings to ground her.

With a concentrated effort, Cate snapped them open. A gasp escaped her as she peered around in her surroundings. Where was she?

She shook her head. She was in her bedroom, but Anna was nowhere to be found. She had heard her voice only moments ago.

Cate flung back the covers, staring down at her pajamas for a second as she wondered how she’d gotten into them.

A bloodcurdling scream filled the air, and she snapped her head in its direction as she pulled her robe around her shoulders.

She tore from her bedroom as another scream echoed in the halls. It was coming from the bedroom she stood in...or had stood in. Her mind tried to wrap itself around what was happening.

She turned the corner, fear building in her. Was she stuck in her vision?

She ran to the end of the hall, but the world around her started to collapse, falling away piece by piece as her fingers wrapped around the handle.

Words and random images tore through her mind again. She tried to latch onto any of them, but it was impossible. As she fell through darkness, one image formed and etched itself into her brain. Her startled features.

She awoke with a sharp gasp in the bedroom she'd collapsed in.

Anna hovered over her. "There you are."

"What happened?" she questioned, her eyes wide as she took in her surroundings and her breath ragged.

"You collapsed. I assume something to do with the vision. Did you experience it again?"

"Ah, something like it. I don't know, it was different."

"How so?" Anna asked, her hands still wrapped around Cate firmly.

"Like...like I was there. Like I was inside the vision."

"Ah, yes, that can happen. Did you glean any details from the new experience?"

"Not really," Cate said with a sigh. "It was mostly the same thing. I was in my bedroom, heard a scream, and ran toward that door. When I started to open it, the world fell away. It was just a jumble of images and words. Except for one thing."

Anna slid a lock of hair behind Cate's hear. "What was it?"

"The image of me, startled, scared. I...don't know why or how. Maybe I caught myself in a mirror before the world collapsed around me."

Anna pulled her closer into a tight hug. "Try not to think about it so much, darling. It's difficult to pry apart, I know. And not know is just as difficult. I understand that. But there is nothing you can do at this moment. How are you feeling otherwise?"

"Okay. At least I don't feel as exhausted as I normally do."

"Still, you should rest. Let's get you back to your bedroom, shall we?"

“Ugh,” Cate said with a roll of her eyes, “I’m so sick of resting. That’s all I do is rest. No, I need to start solving things. And if I can’t make progress on this front, then I’ll make it on Jack’s. I should fill him in, and we should talk about next steps.”

“All of which can be done from the comfort of your bedroom,” Anna argued. “Really, Catherine, you are a duchess. You ought to act like one.”

“Duchesses do not spend their days lounging in bed,” Cate answered as Anna rose and tugged her up to stand.

“Of course, they do. I, myself, spent many a day lounging in my bed. It is our birthright.”

Cate offered her an amused smile. “I wasn’t born to this like you.”

“You were born to it, Catherine. It matters not that you were American-born and bred. You were made to be a duchess. It was your destiny. Now that you have fulfilled it, it is time to step into the role fully.”

Cate’s brow furrowed at the words, and her heart sank. This poor woman was simply trying to guide her into the life she assumed she’d lead. She had no idea Cate would return to her previous station soon enough.

“Catherine, do not be hesitant to be the Duchess of Stratfordshire. I sense a reluctance in you, as though you are waiting for the other shoe to drop. It will not. Take your rightful place.”

She offered a nervous chuckle as she avoided her mother-in-law’s gaze, certain her cheeks were bright red.

“Perhaps once you’ve dealt with a few of these situations that are burning brightly in your mind. After at least Mr. Reid’s is solved, I will take you to the Stratfordshire estate. And you will begin to flex your muscles there.”

They arrived at the bedroom, and Cate gave her a nod and an awkward laugh in agreement.

“I will find Mr. Reid. You rest. Even if you choose to do it on the chaise, you must rest.”

“I promise. I will be a lazy duchess,” Cate answered with a wink.

“Good.” Anna spun a heel and meandered down the hall

Cate disappeared into the quietness of her room, breathing a sigh of relief to be finished with the conversation about her role as Marcus’s wife. It was getting harder and harder to keep up the charade. She’d have to confess soon. She couldn’t keep lying to someone she cared for so much.

She shoved it aside, unwilling to deal with it now, and crossed to her bedroom to retrieve her phone before she curled on the chaise with her two dogs.

It had been so long since she'd had these quiet moments to herself. At every turn, they'd been plunged into a crazy circumstance by The Agency.

She let her head fall back against the soft fabric as her mind flitted from trouble to trouble. Her phone chimed, interrupting her thoughts.

Her screen glowed with a new text message. She smiled as she spotted the name attached. Damien.

She toggled into the message. Hey Cate. Just checking in to see how you are.

She responded to him, the smile still playing on her lips. I'm doing fine. I heard you all are having some troubles though. You okay?

Riley pawed her before climbing onto her lap, and she stroked his silky fur, allowing the act to ease both of their nerves until the next message arrived. We're okay. We're dealing with it. Crazy stuff, though.

Cate shook her head at the phone, wondering what was so crazy. On second thought, she may not want to know. Though she did worry about Marcus.

She switched over to the message thread with her husband and sent him a text, feeling somewhat stupid. To cover her feelings, she returned to the message from Damien and answered. I wish I could help, but I'm certain you are far better at dealing with these things than I am. I'm still getting used to magic. At least you have Marcus to help. He is helping, isn't he?

A message from her husband popped onto her screen as she sent the other. Something has come up. I will be away longer than anticipated. I hope everything is quiet in Dunhaven.

She answered that she was a fine and not to worry before she returned to Damien's.

It's okay, Cate. And yes, weirdly, he's helping...I think. I mean, he's helped us in the past. That's all thanks to you. So...thanks.

Cate laughed out loud at the text before she typed back a new response. Me? I doubt that. Can't take credit, sorry.

His response was immediate. I'm serious. Married Marcus is so tame. Keep up the good work. I'll check in with you later.

She let her head rest against the back of the chaise again as she shook her head at her friend's message. She enjoyed the relationship she'd found with him. It was one of the saner things to have come out of the strange situation where she'd met them.

She stared down at the wedding ring on her finger, her thumb rubbing it as she waited for Jack to appear. Outside of the friendships she'd formed, nothing else seemed sane at all.

Finally, her doors burst open, and Anna strode in with Jack. "I found him."

"Good," Cate said with a smile. "And I have been resting as promised."

"Another vision?" Jack asked.

Cate nodded. "Yes. I went to the room I've been seeing. Nothing triggered anything, but just before I left, I had the vision. It felt...immersive this time. No new information, just an image of my terrified features staring back at me. I guess just more confirmation about how scared I am in these visions."

"Too bad we can't nail down a time period or something that could help us explore."

"I know," Cate said with a sigh as Anna settled into an armchair.

"Now, Catherine," she said, "you know how I feel about you dwelling on these visions. Especially when there is work to be done on other fronts."

Cate sucked in a breath and smiled at Jack. "Yes. We made some progress. Not much, but some."

"Her Grace said something about the result of the hypnosis you did on Amanda," Jack answered. "What happened? Did she name the killer?"

"She did," Cate said, her smile turning into a wince. "She said it was you."

Jack's eyes went wide. "That's crazy. I'm innocent."

"I know. But we were able to sort out that it is a false memory. It's been planted. She can't recall a single detail about the crime," Cate said. "So, we know she's lying."

"Now, we have to prove it."

"I may have an idea on that front," Anna said. "It's a bit of a...workaround, and it may be difficult, however, I think we can pull it off. But it'll take a bit of work on your part."

Cate's heart thudded faster at the words, a slight smile spilling across her features. "What is it? I'll do anything to help track this down."

"Well, it's an object called a time tracer. Very finicky, but it may help us."

“What does it do?” Jack asked.

Anna raised her eyebrows. “Well, it can literally determine where people have been through time. Based on what you saw and what we know about what Amanda has told us, it appears that they skipped to another time. This is where the murder likely occurred, and where Amanda received her instructions on what to say.”

“So, this object will allow us to determine where they landed in time?” Cate asked.

“Well, yes and no. It’s incredibly tricky to use and on top of that, we’ll need to place the object on Amanda or David.”

Jack chewed his lower lip as he crossed his arms. “I can do that. I can get it on her. She knows me. She trusts me.”

“All right. But here is the problem...we also need to get it off of her when she returns.”

“Okay,” Jack said with a nod. “We’ll do whatever we have to do.”

“If you pull that off, we’ll be able to parse apart where they went roughly. Though, it will be very rough.”

Cate nodded at her. “All right. Then we know what we have to do. We need to head back to the murder and slip this time tracer onto Amanda.”

“Try to put it into a pocket or on her clothing,” Anna said. “She’ll be wearing the same thing when she comes back. You’ll just need to retrieve it.”

Jack sucked in a breath. “Okay, what is this thing we’re working with? Big, small, heavy, light?”

“It’s a pin. A small brooch.” Anna pulled a tiny red jewel from her pocket and laid it in her hand.

“Oh, okay. I have an idea. I should be able to get it onto her.” Jack perched on the edge of an armchair. “That night...I told her I had a surprise for her. I’ll give her that and tell her it’s to remember my friendship.”

“That’s perfect. Hopefully, she won’t take it off,” Cate said with a nod. “Well, when shall we go? Now?”

“It’s up to the two of you. Whenever you feel prepared,” Anna answered.

Cate swallowed hard, her pulse quickening. “I’m ready whenever you are. This will be your show, Jack. I’ll just be there for moral support.”

“I’ll need it,” Jack answered. “But I’d like to get it over with.”

Cate nodded. "Then we'll go now. Same plan as before? Leave from the mausoleum and use the button to get back."

"Hopefully, we won't get sent to any random locations with a playing card," Jack said with a shake of his head.

"I've got the compass if we need it. I did tell myself I used it twice."

"Well, at least we know what we're doing with it if we need it again," Jack said. "Should we go?"

"No time like the present." Cate shed her blanket and rose. "Should we take Amy Grace back?"

"No," Anna said with a shake of her head. "You'll need to go back earlier than the last time. We'll worry about returning Ms. Hoffman to her time when you are not working with this object."

"Oh, good point, yes. I suppose we should worry about that when we can devote our full attention to it. I don't want to ruin her life by messing that up." Cate flicked her gaze to Anna. "Will you make sure she's all right?"

"I will. Don't worry about anything here." Anna stood and handed off the brooch to Jack. "Good luck. When you return with the time tracer, we'll sort through what we learn from it and discuss our next steps."

After discussing a few details, they made their way to the mausoleum for Anna to open the time portal, this time to hours before the murder.

As the dark hole yawned in front of them, Cate swallowed hard. Would they finally be able to free Jack?

CHAPTER 21

Shaking off a shiver, Cate stepped into the afternoon light of Jack's college days. He stood waiting for her in the alley they'd arrived in the last time.

"Odd to think that we'll be arriving here in a few hours," Jack said with a shake of his head. "This time travel stuff is strange."

"No stranger than the thing Damien and his crew are dealing with," she answered.

"Do I even want to know?"

"Probably not, but I'll tell you anyway if you'd like."

"I suppose it'll help us pass the time, but first we should handle our business. Amanda comes on shift in thirty minutes, if I recall. I can give her the brooch then."

Cate nodded. "Do you want to wait in the bar until then?"

"If we can. You probably ought to stay out of sight. We don't want her thinking I've got a new girl."

"Oh, right. Maybe I should wait across the street in the bookshop."

"And split up? Are you crazy? I could get stuck here while Gianna sends you...who knows where. And then there will be two of me running around. No...three of me. There will be me, other me, and past me." He rubbed his temples. "My head is starting to hurt."

"I'll hide in the ladies' room."

"No," Jack said. "You'll sit in plain sight where I can see you. We'll just...sit apart."

Cate sucked in a breath as he drew the door open, the warm air scented with hops floating past her nostrils. “Okay. I’ll take the dark shadowy booth in the back.”

She bit her lower lip as she stopped talking to him, and wandered to a wooden table tucked in the back so no one spotted them together. She slid into the booth, positioning herself so she could see Jack on his barstool.

She blew out a long breath, drumming her fingers on the table. Thirty minutes to wait seemed like an eternity. Her mind spun with questions and issues. She hoped this would be as easy to pull off as Jack expected.

She chewed her lip. Getting this item back from Amanda would be the larger issue. She’d likely accept the gift, but trying to find her to get it back may be difficult.

Her heart thumped against her ribs. She glanced at the clock, swearing it had stopped. As a distraction, she traced the wood grain on the table. When she finally flicked her gaze back to Jack’s seat, her heart stopped.

He was gone. Heat washed over her as she stiffened, her gaze darting around the bar in search of him.

She found him standing near a dartboard speaking with someone. He twisted, catching her eye and wiggling his eyebrows. What was he trying to signal to her?

He tilted his head oddly. She wrinkled her nose. What is he doing?

Jack sipped his ale before he grinned at the man he spoke with and answered. As the man lined up another dart to throw, Jack turned toward Cate, furrowing his brows as he gave her the strange nod again.

Cate winced and shrugged. He responded by wrapping a hand around his stein, one finger pointing.

She wrinkled her nose, trying to follow the line of it. It ended with a man in a plaid cap, the hat low on his head, hiding most of his features as he hunched over his beer.

What was the interest in him, she wondered?

Jack gave the man one final comment before he strode back to the bar and grabbed a napkin. He fished a pen from his pocket and scrawled something on it before he strode toward Cate. The napkin fell from his fingers, sliding across the floor as he pushed into the men’s room.

Cate scurried from her seat to grab it. As she regained her seat, she squinted at his scrawl. Plaid hat is the murderer.

Her heart thudded and her palms turned sweaty as she snapped her gaze to him. He was the one they'd seen with Amanda and David?

This could be a chance to catch him in the act. Maybe they didn't even need the time tracer.

Her mind searched ways to use this to their advantage. Could they confront him? Or prevent the murder?

"Psst," a voice whispered from behind her.

She twisted to see Jack's face in the slit of the door to the men's room. "Cate, that's him."

"I know," she hissed, trying not to turn toward him and give their conversation away. "Maybe we can follow him."

"We may need to. Amanda is late."

Cate arched an eyebrow. Had she always been late or was this a new development?

"We'll have to leave soon because I'll be coming here in about...twenty minutes."

Her stomach clenched at the words. Past Jack's arrival would ruin everything.

"We need to leave soon, then," she murmured. "We'll follow Plaid Hat. Maybe we can slip the tracer onto him."

"That's a risk, but...it's one we may have to take. I can't believe she's not here."

"Any place we can check for her?"

Jack didn't answer for a moment. "I don't know. And I'm not certain if we should try that or stick with Plaid Hat."

Cate tugged her brows together tightly. "I say we stick with Plaid Hat. If we have the opportunity to get that tracer on Amanda, we take it. They should come together at some point, right?"

"Right. Perhaps right before the murder, but still, maybe we pull it off somehow."

"Okay. I'm going to leave now. You follow me. We'll go to the bookshop and watch for him to leave."

"Cate, be careful leaving here, for heaven's sake."

"I will," she said with a nod.

She twisted the napkin in her fingers, taking the clue with her as she rose and took a step toward the door. With a shake of her head, she twisted and retreated toward the bathrooms.

“Give me the tracer. I’ll try to put it on him.”

“Cate, that’s dangerous.”

“We don’t have much choice. We can’t get it on Amanda. Now, give it to me before we lose our chance.”

“Cate...”

“Jack!” she hissed, her teeth clenched tightly. “We’re going to lose our chance and have to come back again!”

He heaved a sigh as he dug into his pocket and shoved the brooch forward through the opening in the door. She grabbed it, eyeing the small gem and its attached pin. She likely couldn’t get it pinned on him, but maybe she could drop it into his pocket.

The only problem would be getting it back from him when they arrived back with David’s body.

Her mind spun as she second guessed her plan. Maybe she ought to wait for Amanda. Past Jack wouldn’t recognize her when he came into the bar.

“Cate?” he whispered behind her.

“I’m thinking. What if we can’t get this back from the man? Maybe I should try to pin it on Amanda when she comes into the bar. Neither of you will recognize me. I can do it.”

“I’m not certain she’ll take it,” he answered. “Let’s go to the bookshop and regroup. We need another plan.”

She nodded, closing her fingers around the gem and heading for the door. She hesitated as she skirted around the man, wondering if she could somehow get it on him, but she decided against it, too afraid they’d never get it back and lose their chance to trace them through time.

Instead of placing it on him, she pushed through the door into the spring air and hurried across the street to the bookshop. A man in a cap and a lazy cat lounging on the counter greeted her as a bell rang over her head.

She breathed in the scent of old books as she wandered into the stacks to wait for Jack. Her fingers lingered on a well-worn copy of The Time Machine, appreciating the irony.

The bell above the door chimed again, and she peered from between the shelves to find Jack scanning the bookshop.

She waved a hand, drawing his attention, and he crossed to her, slipping between the shelves. “What should we do?”

“I don’t know. I’m worried if we put the tracer on the Plaid Hat, we won’t get it back. But I’m worried we won’t get it on Amanda. Especially with her being late.”

“I know. And I wouldn’t have known if she was late for her shift or not back in the day. She was there when I arrived, but...we can’t chance it.”

“I can chance it, but I’m not certain I can get this pin on her.”

Jack shook his head as a curse escaped it. “Blast it. Why is everything so difficult?”

“Because we’re time travelers up against a massive evil agency?”

Jack heaved a sigh as he shook his head. “Stop making sense. Okay, we need a plan and fast.”

“Well, not fast. We have a few hours to wait...again.”

Jack rolled his eyes. “Oh, yes. We came earlier this time. For all the good it did.”

Cate sucked in a breath, squeezing his arm. “We could read a time travel book.”

He offered her an unimpressed stare. “That’s very funny. Maybe we can pass the time with your stand-up comedy act.”

She wrinkled her nose and shook her head. “Nah. It’s not becoming of a duchess.”

“Well, I suppose we could go to the restaurant and asked to be seated away from the other versions of ourselves.”

“What if we get the same waitress?”

“Tell them we have a set of twins and we’re playing a prank.”

Cate crossed her arms, leaning back against the shelf with a shake of her head. “This is really becoming complicated.”

“Sorry,” Jack answered with a penitent glance. “I can’t help but feel this is my fault.”

“Don’t,” Cate said. “It’s not.”

“It is. I had to go and be a hero.”

“You were set up. During our hypnosis session, she admitted her real name isn’t Amanda.”

“She was using a fake name? What is it?”

“Lucy Thorne. And it gets a little weirder.”

Jack scrubbed his face as he paced the floor. “Weirder? Oh, no. Is she a vampire?”

“No,” Cate said with a chuckle. “She’s not...but...”

His eyes went wide as he stared at her. “But?”

Cate bit her lower lip, glancing up at him through her eyelashes. "But... this isn't her time. She was recruited and planted here by The Agency. She was here to do a job. You were that job."

His features turned stony. "I can't believe this. When did she come from then?"

Cate raised her eyebrows. "Well...she was born in 2024."

"What?!" Jack exclaimed. "She hasn't even been born yet?"

"Nope. She hasn't even been born in our time."

He rubbed his temples. "It's too much. No wonder I was had. She probably..."

"Studied you. Knew how to play up to you. Yep. So, you weren't so much had as you were...manipulated by a woman who had trained to do just that."

"And now we're all paying the price."

"Jack, you can't think like that. They've come after me, too."

"Indirectly, yes. I suppose you were too smart to be conned whereas I was not."

"We have no idea if they'll manipulate me," she answered. "They very well may be."

"You're not married to...oh..." He tugged his lips back into a wince as he shot her a glance. "Actually, you are married to a rather odd person."

"Odd, yes. But I don't think he's conning me."

"Well, he hasn't accused you of murder...yet."

Cate chuckled at the statement. "No, he hasn't. But that doesn't mean they won't use some other aspect of my life. They killed my parents, Jack. And now...this vision...it seems to suggest they're doing something else to my mother."

"Nothing else on that front to help us figure out how?"

"No," she answered. "Just that stupid image of me terrified stuck in my brain after I call out to my mother. Or...Laura. Anna told me not to assume it's my mother."

"Kind of an odd coincidence if it's not, no?"

"I think so, too. I think she may know more than she's saying, but...she won't tell me."

Jack cocked his head. "Why not? Why wouldn't she help you?"

Cate shrugged. "She says she doesn't know, merely suspects. And if she is wrong, it could make things worse for me than to just ride out the visions."

She doesn't want to overwhelm me."

"How can answers overwhelm you?"

"Same thing I thought, but here we are. Stuck with trying to figure this out and wonder who else Laura could be."

Jack rubbed his chin. "No idea. Sorry I'm not more help."

"Well, it's my life. This is someone I'm supposedly close to, and I can't figure it out, so..." She threw her arms out to the side. "Go figure."

"I'm sorry, Cate. For what it's worth, when we finish dealing with this...saga, I'll do whatever I can to track down information."

"Thanks, Jack." She squeezed his hand. "I appreciate that. We'll figure it out. Both situations."

The bell jangled above the door and a cool breeze swept in past them. Boots clomped across the creaky hardwood, approaching their location. Cate twisted around to peruse the books while Jack stared at the opposite shelf.

Someone turned the corner, and Cate worked to stay focused on the books in front of her. Her pulse raced and sweat beaded on her brow.

The figure approached her, and she glanced sideways to offer a polite smile and step around them when her eyes went wide.

Standing in front of her was the plaid-hatted man. Standing in front of her was a murderer.

CHAPTER 22

Cate tried to hide her trembling hands and force a smile onto her face. She reached into her pocket, her fingers sliding around the time tracer. She wondered if she could somehow place it on him.

Her mind whirled as she tried to make her decision, offering him a polite, “Excuse me.”

As she tried to step around him, he reached out, grabbing her arm. “I don’t think so, duchess.”

Cate’s eyes went wide, and she twisted to eye Jack who already stepped forward, determination etched into his features.

The man latched onto his arm, too, and in an instant, the world around them crumbled.

Cate’s heart hammered out a frantic rhythm. “Jack!”

“Cate, I’m here. I don’t know what’s happening.”

“What’s happening,” the man grumbled as the world settled around them again, “is I’m stopping you two from ruining our plans.”

Cate glanced around her new surroundings as the man finally let go of her arm. She shivered as the damp air sent a chill snaking down her spine. Her stomach twisted into a knot at the sight of the bars closing them into a cell.

“Where did you take us?”

“Where you belong. Let’s see you solve this little problem from inside your cell. Guard!”

A brawny man with a weapon strode into the room outside of the cell.

“Look who I caught,” the man in the plaid hat said with a grin.

“I need to move our fair duchess to another cell.”

“I’ll grab the keys,” the other man answered. “And let the others know.”

“No, no,” Plaid Hat answered. “I want to be the one to tell them. It’s my coup, after all.”

The guard nodded before he left them behind to retrieve the keys. Before he returned, Jack slid an arm around the man’s neck, wrenching him backward.

Startled, Cate pressed herself against the wall, her jaw hanging open.

“You’re not going to tell anyone anything,” Jack growled. “You’re going to let us go.”

“Jack, stop. We’ll use the button to go now before anyone comes back.”

“I’m not letting go of him. Grab onto me, and we’ll try it.”

Cate tugged the chain from under her shirt and isolated the magic button. Clamping a hand onto Jack, she rubbed it. Nothing happened.

“Again?”

“It won’t work,” the man said with a grin. “You’re in a magic-suppressing cell.”

Cate’s heart plummeted. They’d used one of these cells with Marcus, preventing him from using any of his magical abilities. And now what little magic they had at their disposal was squashed, too.

“Oh, no,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

“Magic-suppressing cell? That can’t be real.”

“It is,” Cate answered. “They used it on Marcus.”

Jack tightened his grip on the man’s neck until his cap fell off and his features turned red. “Fine. Then we’ll have to wait until we’re out to use it.”

The guard re-entered the room, keys dangling from his fingers.

“Don’t come any closer,” Jack shouted. “Not unless you want your buddy to die.”

The man froze, his eyes going wide at the scene.

“Toss the keys to the cell and put your hands in the air.”

“Don’t do it. He’s not going to kill me. He hasn’t got it in him. Go fetch help!” Plaid Hat yelled.

The guard shifted on his feet, uncertain what to do.

Jack shook the man hard, determination etching his face. “I will kill him. Make no mistake. You leave this room, and you’ll come back to a dead man.”

“I’m only a foot soldier. My death means nothing,” Plaid Hat answered. “Go fetch someone. It’s more important that we have the duchess under our control than my life.”

Cate screwed up her face. What sort of person was willing to sacrifice their life for a cause like this?

“Go!” Plaid Hat shouted.

“It’s no use, Jack, let him go. We’ll find another way. You don’t want his blood on your hands.”

“Listen to your lady friend,” the guard answered. “Let go of him and both of you get against the back wall.”

“Okay, we’re—“

“No,” Jack said with a shake of his head. “No. Throw the keys over. Cate, you take them, and you open that cell door.”

“You’ll never get away with it,” the guard answered as he tossed them into a heap.

Cate hurried forward to the bars and stuck her hand through, barely able to reach them with her fingers. She managed to tug them closer.

“Open the door, Cate,” Jack said from behind her.

She fumbled with the keys, her hands shaking as she isolated one and worked to shove it in the lock. She finally got it in and twisted, but it wouldn’t turn.

With a curse under her breath, she yanked the key out and dropped it on the floor before moving on to the next one.

She wrinkled her nose, retrieving them and trying another. On her third attempt, she finally found the right key. The lock clanged as she twisted it and let the cell door swing open.

“Move,” Jack boomed behind her as he forced the man forward.

“Don’t let her go!” Plaid Hat shouted from behind her as she scurried into the outer chamber, keeping her distance from the guard. “You fool, grab her before she can escape!”

Cate twisted to find Jack, hoping to latch onto him and escape, but before she could the man in the plaid hat lunged toward her. Jack struggled, red-faced, to hold on to him, but the man hit him in the gut with a well-placed elbow.

A sharp breath escaped Jack’s lips as he stumbled backward. The man in the plaid hat latched on to Cate as the guard leapt forward to shove Jack into the cell and slam it closed.

Cate struggled to free herself from the man's grip, but she found it impossible. She dug her feet into the stones of the floor, hoping not to be driven backward.

"Cate, use the magic to escape. You can come back for me!" Jack shouted.

But with a firm grip holding both her arms, she couldn't reach the necklace even if she tried. Instead, with the help of the guard, they wrangled her into a separate cell and tossed her back. She stumbled and slammed to the floor, pain shooting through her hip.

The cage slammed shut in front of her as she raced toward the opening in a desperate attempt to escape it.

"I don't think so, Duchess," Plaid Hat said with a grin. "And now, I'm off to do my business. Tell Gianna I'd like to speak with her once I've finished."

The guard grunted. "You won't get an audience with her."

"I will now that I've landed the duchess." The man smirked at the guard. "See you around, duchess. Or not."

The two men strode away, chattering about his upcoming task with David.

Cate gripped the bars of the cell, leaning her head against the rough surface.

Jack's voice cut the quietness in the large room. "Oh, Cate."

"I couldn't get to the button. And I wasn't leaving you, anyway."

"Try it now."

"I don't want to leave you."

"I don't care. You can come right back with Anna's help. Just try it."

Cate fished her necklace from under her tunic and flicked her thumb across the button. "Nothing. I'm probably in one of those magic-squashing cells."

"I can't believe they have those."

"Believe it. They had Marcus in one when I had to rescue him."

"Wait, wait, wait," Jack answered, his voice echoing off the walls. "You had to rescue him?"

Cate chuckled as she recalled her frantic race to the German castle to find him. "I did. After he traded himself for you, I went back to the castle later that night."

"You never cease to amaze me, Catherine Kensie."

“Northcott,” she reminded him.

“Right. Catherine Kensie Northcott. That’ll take some getting used to.”

Cate rubbed at the diamond sparkling even in the dim light. She had already gotten used to it. With a shake of her head, she decided not to dwell on what she couldn’t control. “We have to find a way out of here.”

“I’m not certain that’s going to happen, Cate. I don’t think they built these cells for people to escape.” The bars rattled as if to punctuate the statement.

“I know, but we need to try. We’ll have to...I don’t know...maybe I can pick the lock.”

“Pick the lock? Just what has Northcott been teaching you?”

Cate reached back to find a bobby pin in her hair and pulled it free, wincing as a few hairs came with it. “Not to pick locks. He can open them with magic, remember?”

“Oh, right,” Jack answered. “What is that scraping noise? What are you doing?”

“Trying to pick the lock,” she answered as she searched for the hole blindly.

“Do you think you can?”

She shrugged even though he couldn’t see her. “I’m not sure. Marcus’s cell required a special key, but this one looked like a normal key to me. So maybe.”

“I hope so. Then we can escape from here.”

Cate froze, her mind whirling. “But should we?”

“Cate, are you kidding? Yes, we should.”

“You heard Plaid Hat. He’s going for David. And likely bringing both him and Amanda here. We could grab her and stop them from brainwashing her, and maybe even prevent the murder entirely.”

“Cate, that’s dangerous ground.”

She frowned as she fought with the lock again. “I know, but...I’d rather that than you be accused of murder.”

The loud sigh that answered her told her he didn’t agree.

“Look, Jack, we need to do something. Nothing we’re doing is working so far, and we need to wrap this up.”

Silence stretched between them for a moment before Jack finally answered. “I know. I’m sure this is wearing on you with your visions looming, too.”

“It’s not that...” Cate shook her head, dismissing the visions from her mind so she wouldn’t collapse and lose her bobby pin. “I want this to be over for you. For Molly. For all of us. We’re a family, Jack. What affects one of us affects all of us.”

Jack sighed again. “I appreciate that, Cate. I’ve been feeling awfully guilty about this.”

“Well, don’t.” Her fingers twisted the bobby pin in a desperate attempt to escape. “Should I feel guilty that I have these visions that are making me collapse?”

“Of course not.” Jack scoffed. “Don’t be ridiculous.”

“Then you can’t feel bad about this murder charge. It wasn’t your fault either.”

“If I hadn’t been such a blasted idiot falling for Amanda’s nonsense, we wouldn’t be in this situation.”

“No, we may be in a lot worse of one.” Cate groaned as she thudded her head against the bars. “I can’t get this lock.”

“Take a break. You’re probably all twisted up about getting out right away, but maybe you just need a minute to breathe.”

She slid her hands back into her cell, her fingers toying with the bobby pin. “I wonder what would happen if I stuck my hands out and used the button. Would just my hands go?”

Silence stretched again before Jack said, “I don’t think I’d try that.”

“You’re probably right. But we need to get out of here.”

“We need a plan once we do. I don’t want to escape from my magic-blocking cell only to get caught again while we argue about whether or not we’re returning home or staying here to search for the murderer and Amanda.”

Cate heaved a sigh. “I know. Though, I still think we should stay here. Although...”

“Yeah?”

Her fingers reached into her pocket to rub the bejeweled brooch. “I wonder if we could just come back here after filling in Anna. We have been carrying the time tracer. So...it should be tracing us, too, right? We should be able to find our way back here.”

“Hmm, I hadn’t thought of that, but I suppose we could.”

“Do we chance it, though? Anna said it would be tricky. I’m not sure. Plus, where are we in the world? We could be anywhere.”

“Is this the place I was being held?” Jack asked.

“No,” she answered with a shake of her head. “This isn’t the place you were held. I know that. Those cells looked different. So, we’re in another Agency stronghold. They have so many, it would take forever to track down.”

“All right, you make a good point. We’re already here. But...can we get out of these cells, and then this dungeon? There’s a guard out there.”

“I know,” Cate answered as her mind worked to find a solution. “Even if we get out of the cells, we’d need to deal with him.”

She cursed under her breath.

“What?” Jack asked.

“Sometimes I wish I had Marcus’s magic. He just blows people down with some kind of electric arc or a fireball.”

“I remember seeing that battle between him and Celine. And to be fair, I wouldn’t mind that power right now. Maybe you can throw a fireball.”

Cate threw her head back in laughter. “Thanks for that. I needed a laugh.”

“I’m serious. You’re a clairvoyant. Maybe you have magic, too.”

“I don’t think so,” she answered as she held her hand out to stare at it. She narrowed her eyes, flicking her wrist around to try to conjure some sort of magical weapon, but nothing happened.

“You’re trying it, aren’t you?” Jack asked.

She slid her hand behind her back against the cold stone. “No.”

“Yes, you were. You were trying to conjure a fireball.”

“No, I wasn’t,” she claimed.

Jack’s laughter echoed off the cold walls. “You were. Oh, Cate, that’s really amusing. Thank you for that.”

“Okay, so I was. Just in case. I mean, maybe I’m magic, too.”

They were quiet for a beat before Jack asked, “Could you?”

“No. If I could, you’d know about it by now.”

He sighed. “Ah, well. It was worth a try.”

“I’m going to ask Marcus next time I see him. It’s a handy tool to have.”

“It may be...though, I’m not certain I can manage watching you conjure one of those light orbs and toss it at someone.”

Cate returned to the lock, inserting the bobby pin into it again. “What if that someone was Gianna?”

“I’d pay to see that one. Although, it would still be odd to see you throw a light orb.”

“Well, don’t get your money ready yet. I probably can’t do it.” A clank sounded before a creak as her door fell open. “But what I can do is pick a lock.”

She grinned at him as she stepped from her cell and approached his.

His jaw fell open as he spotted her. “Cate! Good going. Now, open mine.”

“I’m trying,” she answered as she stuck the pin into the keyhole and fiddled with it.

“How’d you get yours? Just do the same thing.”

“Yeah, that was pure luck, I think.”

“Hopefully, you’re still lucky.”

She wrinkled her nose as she continued to fiddle with the pin, desperately trying to free Jack. As she worked, a voice shouted behind her.

He sucked in a breath, his eyes going wide as he glanced at Cate. She raised her gaze to his.

“Cate, someone’s coming.”

CHAPTER 23

Cate's heart thudded hard against her ribs as she frantically fiddled with the bobby pin in the lock. "Come on, come on."

"It's no use, Cate. Get back in your cell before you get caught."

"What if they check it and lock it again and we can't get out?"

"We'll cross that bridge when we come to it."

"Well, then I'm staying out here," she said, her eyebrows pinching together as she continued to work. "Either way, I'll end up locked up in that cell again, probably."

"No, Cate! You may end up far worse off if they catch you out here. And you'll likely lose your little lock pick, too."

"We have to escape, Jack!"

"Get in your cell!" he growled at her, his knuckles turned white as he gripped the cell bars between them.

With a sigh and a groan, she tugged the pin from his lock, shoved it into her pocket, and hurried into her cell, pulling the bars closed.

A second later, two figures appeared at the far end of the room. The guard led a well-dressed man in a business suit into the space. Cate tried to assess his wardrobe, guessing it came from sometime in the 1950s.

"Here they are, sir," the guard said, waving at Cate and Jack.

"Well, well, well, I must say," the man answered as he closed the distance between them, "I'm honored to be in the presence of the Duchess of Stratfordshire."

"Who are you?" Cate demanded.

“Thomas Holden,” he answered. “A full-fledged member of The Agency, though, not quite at the rank you’re used to dealing with. But with this little coup, I just may be.”

“I demand—” Cate began.

“Nothing,” Thomas answered. “You may demand nothing. I only came to see you. To try to understand why you are so...difficult.”

“Difficult? I suppose that is because The Agency continues to attack my family and try to kill me and the people I love.”

He chuckled at her, clasping his hands in front of him. “That’s not what I meant.”

“What did you mean, then?” Jack asked.

The man flicked his eyebrows up as he began to pace the floor. “The Agency has tried and failed numerous times to capture our dear duchess and either turn her to our side or...dispose of her. And each time, she has managed to slip right through our fingers.”

“Your point?” Cate asked through clenched teeth.

“My point is that this time, you will not. I will be the man who finally deals with you. I will be the hero.”

Cate sucked in a breath as she stared at the man looking to make a name for himself by ridding the world of her. “You may not want to be too hasty. My husband is a powerful man. A man The Agency would very much like on their side.”

“And a man who will never join us. No, I will not summon him, Your Grace. I will not fall prey to your trap. Somehow, you always manage to escape our clutches with his help.”

“And sometimes he escapes with mine,” she informed the man, keeping a tight hold on the bars so the door didn’t swing open.

“You are an impressive specimen. It is obvious why he married you. However, this will be the last of it.”

“If you harm me or anyone close to me, the wrath you will receive—”

“Oh, now, now,” he said, waving his hand in the air, “let’s not get too perturbed. I haven’t said I was going to kill you. But I will not bring your husband here. Instead, we will negotiate at another site.”

“Where is here?” Cate asked.

“Wouldn’t you like to know?”

Cate lifted her chin. “Yes, I would. And since you are so confident in being able to rein me in, there should be no harm in telling me.”

He smirked as he stepped closer to her cell. Her heart thudded hard in her chest, worried he may touch the bars and discover she'd opened the cell door.

"I am not going to fall for this," he answered, stopping short of the cell door. "I will not be manipulated by you. No, you will remain in the dark. I will, however, keep you updated as to when you can expect to join our ranks. I imagine your husband will be most anxious to have you returned. Though, I don't plan on handing you over to him until he's proven himself to The Agency."

Cate's stomach twisted into a knot at the words.

"Good day, Duchess." Thomas offered her a slight bow before he strode away with the guard in tow.

Cate slid her eyes shut, breathing out a sigh of relief and anxiety. This man could be a dangerous problem with his desperate desire to make a name for himself. But at least he hadn't caught that she'd opened her cell door.

"Cate, we need to get out of here. Or you do."

"I'm not leaving you here after that. No way. They'll kill you just to punish me or use you to force our hands."

"I don't think I'm enough leverage to force Northcott's hand."

She swallowed hard, still in her cell as they waited to be sure no one returned. "He sacrificed himself for you once before. So, it may be."

"I still find that...mind-boggling."

"I know you do, but, Jack, he literally traded his life for yours." Cate pressed a hand to her heart as she recalled feeling the effects of what The Agency did to him in the hours that they held him captive.

"Okay, so then we need to get out of here. Both of us. So, I need your lock-picking skills."

Cate finally pushed from within her cell and hurried to his. "I'm not so sure they're skills as much as random luck, but I'll try my best. I still say we need to stay here and finish this with Amanda."

"Cate! Are you crazy? This guy is out to make a name for himself. We need to get out of here as soon as we can. We can't take any chances."

"We need to wrap this up, Jack. We can't keep going back to that time period over and over, trying to make something happen. Pretty soon, Oxford will be overrun with Cate and Jacks."

“Oh my word,” Jack said as he rubbed at his chin. “There could be dozens of us running around.”

“Right. Which I would very much like to avoid.”

Jack blew out a long breath. “Wow, I really can’t even with this time travel stuff anymore.”

“Tell me about it. I’m still reeling from knowing Amanda actually hasn’t been born yet.”

“I robbed the cradle,” Jack said, his voice pensive.

Cate stopped fiddling with the lock as a laugh bubbled up from her belly. “You did. You really did. I mean...she’s what? Forty years younger than you?”

He hooted at the statement. “Forty years younger. Oh my. What have I done?”

She grinned at him, still working on the lock.

“Well, now, just a minute,” he said, wagging a finger at her. “I think Northcott has taken the cake on this. He beats me by a mile. You’re what? Two hundred years younger than him?”

“At least,” Cate said with a nod. “He was around in the seventeen hundreds. I wasn’t born until the late twentieth century.”

“There we have it. He’s the real cradle robber.”

She chuckled as she jiggled the bobby pin again, and the lock clanked. Her eyes went wide as she snapped her gaze up to Jack. “I did it.”

A grin formed on Jack’s lips as she tugged his door open. “Cate, great work. Now, let’s get out of here.”

She shook her head. “No. We need to stay here and find Amanda.”

“Cate! We need to go. You heard that man. He’s going to use you to lure Northcott into The Agency. What do you think he’s going to do once he finds out you’ve escaped?”

“Lock this place down and search for me. But Amanda should be arriving at any moment along with Plaid Hat. We need to stay here and find her.”

“And then do what with her?”

“Take her back to Dunhaven?” Cate said, her voice questioning.

“Oh, that’s lovely. Then we’ll have two Amandas running about the castle.”

“Well, obviously, we need to keep them away from each other. But we need to do something. And this way we can consult with Anna.”

Jack heaved a sigh as he shook his head. "Fine, fine. I hope this doesn't make things worse.

"Worse? I don't see how we could be any worse off than we are right now."

"Don't tempt fate. We don't need any more problems."

"Right." Cate nodded as she glanced at the door leading from the cells. "We need a plan for that guard. Should we lure him inside or just go on the offensive as we go through the door?"

Jack pressed his lips together as he followed her gaze. "Are you sure you can't conjure a fireball?"

"I'm sure." She flicked her wrist around to demonstrate. "See?"

"Are you really trying?"

She offered him an unimpressed stare.

"Okay, fair enough, that's not an option." Jack rubbed his chin. "Maybe we ought to—"

Cate's stomach clenched as voices echoed from the room outside theirs. "Shh, someone's coming!"

"What should we do? Go back inside the cells or try to spring out at them?"

"Cells?" Cate winced. "I hate to do it, but we don't know how many people are coming."

"Good thought. We'll go back in the cells and hope no one notices."

Cate nodded as she hurried toward hers. "Oh, I held my door shut so it wouldn't swing open. You may want to do the same."

"Right." Jack slipped into his cell and pulled the door closed, wincing as it creaked.

Cate did the same. Her heart hammered in her chest as shadows grew larger on the wall leading from the room. Perhaps they should have left without waiting for Amanda, though she hated to lose the opportunity. But now, stuck in her cell, waiting to see what fate brought through the doorway, she wondered if she should have escaped when she had the chance.

"Put her in the first cell. We'll be working with her later today," Thomas's voice answered.

Two men appeared, Thomas and the guard, who carried a limp Amanda in his arms. He carried her inside and laid her on a cot before he locked her in.

“No need to lock it, most likely. She’ll be out for hours. She needs her rest before we begin the process to implant the memories,” Thomas answered.

Cate’s breath hitched at the words. If they could rescue Amanda now, she’d never have those memories. They may not be able to prevent David’s murder, but they could stop Jack from being framed.

She wondered where David was. Perhaps they had taken him to a different location.

Maybe it was for the best. Preventing the murder outright could change too much of history.

Thomas flicked his gaze to Cate as she peered through the bars, careful to hold the door steady. “Well, Duchess, our plan is in motion. Soon, Amanda will recall only that Jack killed David Hensley. Mr. Reid will be a wanted man.”

“Where is David? What have you done with him?” Cate demanded.

“Why, he’s right here,” Thomas answered with a grin. “Maybe you can get to know him before your untimely demises.”

More shadows stretched on the wall before two figures appeared. David, his face pale, marched into the room with his hands raised in the air. Behind him, Plaid Hat pressed a gun into his back. “Into the cell.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat. Could they prevent his murder, after all? And would it help or hurt?

Her jaw flexed as the door slammed shut behind David. If they hoped to escape together, she’d now have to open two cell doors. She hoped her lock-picking skills were up to snuff.

Her heart continued to hammer until the three men shuffled from the room, leaving the four prisoners behind.

“David?” Cate called as she waited to make certain no one would return.

No one answered.

“David? It’s okay. We’re friends.”

“No one is my friend right now. That little witch set me up. I thought she was going to kill me, but this is worse.”

Cate winced as she realized he would soon be killed anyway as part of The Agency’s plan.

“David? It’s Jack Reid.”

“Jack?” The man’s voice wavered as he answered, approaching the door of his cell.

“Yeah, I’m here. This is a mess. And I’m sorry to say you’re caught in the crossfire of a war that has nothing to do with you.”

“Fat lot of good it does me now. You did this to me. You and her.”

Cate wrinkled her nose at the harsh words. It was obvious the two men didn’t get along.

“I didn’t do anything to you, but it is my fault,” Jack said.

“That’s not true,” Cate interjected. “This isn’t Jack’s fault, it’s mine.”

David flicked his gaze to Cate. “And who are you?”

“Catherine Kensie Northcott,” she answered. “I’m the reason this is all happening.”

“That’s not true either,” Jack said. “She isn’t the entire reason. There are things in this world that you don’t understand. All Cate and I are trying to do is protect the world from people like this.”

“Well, you’re doing a terrible job if you’re both stuck in a cell.”

“Sorry,” Cate said. “That happens pretty frequently with us. But...we usually get out of it.”

“Bully for you.”

“If we do...would you be willing to come with us to escape these people? We’ll return you to your life as soon as it’s safe.” Cate shifted her weight as she awaited his answer.

Silence stretched between them as she waited for an answer.

“How do I know you’re providing me safety? You could be worse than those people. Reid isn’t exactly my favorite fellow, you know?”

“I’m not, but come on, I’m not a bad guy and you know it.”

“I know nothing of the sort. I know you’re constantly trying to undermine me and Amanda. Filling her head with nonsense.”

“That’s because you’re already filling her head with ideas that she’s not good enough. Putting her down and the like. Who does that to someone they supposedly love.”

“I’m not putting her down, but she’s got these crazy notions. And...ah, never mind. I’m not going to argue with you.”

“All right, so what is your decision?” Cate asked.

“I’ll tell you when you escape and can offer me something.”

Cate rolled her eyes, annoyed with the man’s answer. “Fine,” she said as she pushed open the door to her cell and hurried toward Amanda’s. “I’ll take that answer now, though to be fair, I almost don't want to take you anymore."

Jack followed behind her as David stiffened in his cell, his forehead creasing. "How did you—"

"She has a host of skills. And she happens to be a duchess with a very powerful husband," Jack answered, "so I wouldn't cross her."

Cate shoved her bobby pin in the lock of Amanda's cell and twisted it, hoping to make short work of the lock.

"Oh? A duchess? And how did you get involved with her? Oh, let me guess, you played up to her, too?"

"No," Jack said with a shake of his head. "I'm her estate manager. Went back home after I left Oxford."

David narrowed his eyes as Cate continued to work on the lock. "After Oxford? You're still at Oxford."

"Sorry, mate, I'm not," Jack answered. "I'm not the Jack from the time you live in. I'm Jack from the future."

David threw his head back with laughter. "Jack from the future. Okay, right. Like that movie? With the crazy-haired doctor?"

"No, not like that. We don't have a car."

"Because where you're going you don't have roads?" David asked with another chuckle.

"Very funny," Jack said. "But no. Come on, you just time traveled with the plaid-hatted fellow, but you don't believe we're from the future?"

The lock clanked, and Cate swung the door open. "I got it, Jack. Grab Amanda."

She stepped closer to David's cell. "We are from the future. Now, what's it going to be? Am I opening this door or are you taking your chances with The Agency?"

David narrowed his eyes at her. "Open it."

With a deep breath in, she slid the pin into the lock. Jack emerged from Amanda's cell with her cradled in his arms.

Voices and footsteps grew closer. Cate's heart thudded against her ribs as she shot a wide-eyed glance at Jack.

"Someone's coming," he whispered as he approached her.

"I know...but...I don't have David's cell open yet."

"We have to leave," Jack argued.

"You can't leave me. Open the door."

“I can’t!” Cate exclaimed as she tried again, but failed to open the lock.
“I’m sorry.”

“No, you can’t leave me.”

She chewed her lower lip as she fished the necklace from under her tunic and eyed the button. They had to escape, but they couldn’t leave David behind. If they didn’t go now, though, they’d never get another chance.

She had to make a decision soon, or they’d be trapped. Or worse.

CHAPTER 24

Cate's breath turned ragged as she tried to think through their options. Soon, someone would walk into the room, and they'd be out of time.

Her breath caught in her throat as Jack shot her a wide-eyed glance. She clamped a hand onto Amanda's limp arm. "Quick, grab onto me."

Cate pushed her elbow out toward David.

"What?"

"Grab onto me."

He crinkled his brow as he latched onto her elbow. Jack reached his fingers toward Cate's arm as she shifted close enough for him to touch.

Figures entered the room as Cate's heart hammered hard against her ribs. Thomas's jaw fell open as he stepped inside. "Guards! Get more guards!"

Before anyone could approach them, though, she flicked her thumb across the button. The world began to fall away around her, replaced by blackness.

Seconds later, the library at Dunhaven Castle filled in around them. Her heart continued to beat hard as she glanced around, spotting Jack, an unconscious Amanda, and David.

Anna rose from a seat near the fireplace with a smile. "Hello, dear. I see you have found some friends."

Cate let her pulse return to normal before she answered. "Yes. Sorry, we had...an incident."

“Hmm, well, it seems you have handled it. I know Amanda, but who is this person?”

“David Hensley.”

Anna arched an eyebrow at him. “I see. Mr. Hensley. I hope you understand that you owe my daughter-in-law and Mr. Reid your life.”

“I do. I don’t believe it. But I do. One minute, I was in a cell, and the next...” He grabbed onto an armchair and skirted it, collapsing onto the seat. “I must be drugged.”

“Close, but not quite.” Anna reached for the man’s cheek, and he slumped off to sleep.

“That’s handy,” Jack answered.

“Indeed. And I assume this is Amanda from your Oxford days?”

“Aye,” Jack said. “We...got caught by the murderer. He took us to some castle and put us in cells.”

“And they arrived with David and Amanda shortly after. We thought it best to escape with all of us. There was no way we could have placed the time tracer. Amanda never showed up at the bar before the Jack from that time did.” Cate offered Anna an apologetic glance.

Anna patted her arm. “You did the right thing. Let’s get them settled somewhere in the castle where we can keep an eye on them while we consider our next steps forward.”

“Which I cannot even fathom,” Cate answered. “But we’ll put them in the south wing, I think. Away from the other Amanda and the rest of the bunch. How is Amy Grace?”

“Resting. We should return her soon, perhaps before we determine what to do with these two.”

Cate raised her eyes to the ceiling as she shook her head. “How can we figure this out? This is...history-changing stuff that we’ve done.”

“Yes, it is,” Anna said with a nod, “but The Agency certainly has done this multiple times. Has anything catastrophic happened?”

Cate’s brows pinched as she led Jack, Anna, and Amanda to a set of back stairs. David followed behind them like a zombie, still asleep, but following Anna’s orders.

“No,” Cate admitted. “No, nothing that catastrophic has happened. Well, outside of the havoc wreaked on our lives.”

“Yes, but the world has continued to turn, and most people are blissfully unaware any changes have been made.”

“Are you saying that there is no butterfly effect?” Jack questioned as they threaded through the halls.

“Oh, there is. It’s just far more exaggerated than it actually is in real life. Tiny changes here and there won’t amount to much of anything.”

“So...stopping the murder may not change history very much?” Cate asked, her stomach churning as she considered the alternatives.

“As long as we play things right, no,” Anna answered when Cate stopped at a door and swung it open for Jack to enter.

“But how will we know if we’re playing things right?” Cate’s features pinched as she vetted ideas.

“We will attempt to minimize the changes. Of course, much of it will depend on our subjects.” Anna waved a hand at David as he trudged behind them to the next door.

“You have a plan,” Cate said after tucking David into a room and closing the door behind him.

“I have a suggestion,” Anna answered. “Mr. Reid, how close were Amanda and David?”

“Dating,” he said with a shrug. “I’m not sure beyond that. Why?”

“Dating for a while? Dating casually? On and off?”

Jack sucked in a breath. “They had a tumultuous relationship, but...I had the impression they were together for a bit with no plans of breaking up when he was murdered.”

Anna bobbed her head.

“What are you thinking?” Cate asked.

“I’m thinking we send these two off together to live a quiet life. The downside is, they may be discovered. But the upside is, they both more or less disappear around the same time they already had. Minus the complication of the marriage to Mr. Reid.”

“And then what?” Jack asked.

“Then the problem is solved, more or less,” Anna answered. “Though, again, this all depends on whether or not they agree to this.”

Cate drummed her fingers against her forearm as she hugged herself. “Could it be that simple?”

“You may have made it that simple by rescuing them when you did. It certainly solves quite a few issues and allows us to move on with the investigation into your visions.”

Cate shot Jack a wide-eyed glance. “What do you think?”

Jack rubbed his chin as he shook his head. "I don't know. It seems far too simple. So...if we do this...if we convince them...when this is complete, we'd come back here and what?"

"No one would be any the wiser. Amanda would never show up, you'd have never been married, the problem is solved."

Jack shifted his weight from side to side. "I don't know. This is a big change. And we're not supposed to change history."

"What's the alternative?" Cate asked. "We take David back to be killed? Or worse...we have to kill him ourselves."

"I'm not doing that," Jack said with a shake of his head.

"Me either. I'll do a lot of things to protect Dunhaven Castle, but not murder someone even if they were already dead. Or...were they? I don't know." Cate shook her head. "The time travel stuff is getting to my head, too."

"If you really want to set things up the way they had been, we could fake his murder, pin it on The Agency, and let David and Amanda move on."

Cate massaged her temples as she considered it. "Wow. That's...a lot."

Anna shrugged. "Again, all of this hinges on David and Amanda's decisions. Without them, we may be stuck."

Cate pressed her lips together. Her mother-in-law was right. Without their cooperation, and their continued cooperation, they couldn't pull off this plan. "What are the chances they follow through for the duration of their lives, too?"

"That is a consideration, yes," Anna said with a nod. "Especially with The Agency in contact with Amanda."

"They could still get to her. She was born in the future," Cate said. "I saw her in the 1950s. She could have been recruited as a child."

"So, what do you want to do?" Jack asked.

Cate offered him a wide-eyed glance as her stomach churned. "I don't know."

"What you need to do is defeat The Agency," Anna answered.

Cate scoffed. "If only it were that easy."

"It may have to be. They will continue to push until they defeat you or vice versa."

Cate lifted her shoulders. "I imagine this will be a lifelong fight. Never-ending. Which really...makes me nauseous."

“Tell me about it.”

“You cannot endure this all your life. They can be driven back, but you must fight fiercely. Until we do, we must take the necessary steps to ensure these sorts of issues do not continue to crop up.”

“So, we safeguard against distractions while we use our resources to take them down?”

“Or at least dismantle the arm that is so focused on you,” Anna answered. “Gianna, specifically. She has a bit of an obsession.”

Cate shook her head as she heaved a sigh. “I don’t know why. I wish I had never gotten on her radar. I suppose it was our trip to the forties that did it.”

“No offense, but she set her sights on me on that one. This is my fault. I was so stupid to have even bothered to speak to her.” Jack wrinkled his nose as he frowned.

Anna cocked her head and raised a shoulder. “Sorry, Mr. Reid, but I believe Gianna’s problem is with Catherine. She cannot compete with you, dear. You have a quiet strength, and a sweet personality. Something she sorely lacks. You also have a powerful husband who is devoted to you. Another thing she sorely lacks.”

Cate’s stomach twisted at the words. Before they did anything else, she needed to tell Anna the truth.

“Catherine?” Anna asked as she stared at the carpet beneath her feet. “Are you all right?”

“Yes, I...”

“We’ll figure it out, dear. And don’t worry, you won’t murder anyone.” Anna offered her a cheeky grin meant to console her, but it only made her feel worse.

Her features pinched as she tried to offer a nod.

“Oh, darling, what is it?”

“Cate? Are you okay?”

“Yes, I just...I need a moment alone with Anna. Can we pick this up later?”

The worry etched in Jack’s features intensified. “Sure. Are you sure you’re okay?”

“I am. There’s just something I need to speak with her about. And we should take some time to consider our options and how we’ll approach David and Amanda.”

“Right,” Jack said with a nod. “I’ll put my thinking cap on and we’ll reconvene in a bit.”

She squeezed his arm, forcing a smile onto her face.

They parted ways at the next hall with Cate and Anna continuing to her bedroom suite.

“Have you had more on your visions?” Anna asked as Cate closed the doors behind them.

“No,” she said, tears already forming in her eyes. How would Anna take the news?

Cate’s hands trembled as she motioned for the woman to sit down in one of the armchairs while she perched on the opposite one. Her stomach twisted into a tight knot, and her throat parched.

“Oh, darling, what is it? Something has you terribly upset?”

Cate pressed her lips together to stop the lower one from trembling. Anna had turned into such a staunch supporter. She hated to lose the woman’s support, respect, and affection, but she couldn’t keep up the charade.

Perhaps she should have tried to stick it out until after Jack’s problems were solved but she couldn’t.

The pressure weighed down on her too much, threatening to crack her apart.

Before she could speak again, Anna rose. “I’m ringing for tea. You clearly need it.”

Her mother-in-law made this worse and worse with every passing moment, showing her every bit of comfort and affection owed her.

Anna returned to her seat, leaning forward to take Cate’s hands in hers. “Now, tell Mother what is bothering you.”

The words caused the tears welling in her eyes to escape to her cheeks. Her stomach clenched again as she sobbed.

“Oh, dear, this is something quite big. Tell me, darling, so I can help you with it.”

Cate wiped at her cheeks as she attempted to compose herself. “I...don’t know where to begin.”

“At the beginning, dear,” Anna said with a bright smile as Molly popped into the room.

Cate twisted away from her, holding in a snuffle as Anna requested tea.

“Right away, Your Grace,” Molly answered, then disappeared, pulling the doors closed behind her.

Cate finally sniffled and fished a tissue from her pocket. “Sorry.”

“It’s quite all right. Now, tell me what’s wrong.”

“You have been...so accepting of me. So wonderful.”

“Well, I hope that isn’t a complaint.”

Cate offered her a fleeting smile. “It’s not. But it’s the reason I can’t keep doing this. I can’t keep lying to you.”

“All right. When you are ready, tell me the truth.”

Cate swallowed hard, her last meal threatening to rise up into her throat. “You keep saying...”

She paused to blow out a shaky breath, digging deep within herself to find the strength to speak the words. “Marcus isn’t in love with me. Our marriage is fake. And I’m so very sorry that I lied to you about it. I feel awful. But each time you talk about our relationship, it just reminds me that I’ve done this terrible thing. I’m so very sorry. I know you may not be able to forgive me, but I treasure the friendship we have. Which is why I can’t keep lying.”

Anna’s eyebrows pinched together as she studied Cate.

Cate braced herself for the tongue-lashing she would inevitably receive, wondering how large the fall out would be. She hadn’t considered it before, but the woman was the mother of a powerful warlock. She surely had tricks up her sleeve that could make life very uncomfortable.

As Cate sat in the uncomfortable silence, she wondered if she’d just made a grave error in judgment. And what it would cost.

CHAPTER 25

Anna tilted her head, the confused expression still on her face. Cate shifted in her seat under the woman's intense stare, preparing herself for the onslaught that would come from the admission.

After a moment, the corners of Anna's lips tugged upward. She glanced at the carpet as a chuckle escaped her before it turned into a full-blown laugh.

When she refocused her gaze on Cate, her features held a genuine smile. She patted Cate's hands. "Oh, Catherine, you are a dear."

"What?" Cate asked, screwing up her face. "But...I...I just told you we've been lying to you."

Anna's shoulders shook with another laugh. "You think you have been lying to me. You have not been."

Anna shook her head again, the smile still playing on her lips. "Oh, Catherine, I understand your marriage was not conventional. I have no illusions that you and Marcus met at a party—that he swept you off your feet and you raced to the altar unable to bear being apart. What sort of foolish woman do you think I am?"

"I don't think you're a foolish woman at all. But..."

"But nothing, dear."

Cate tugged her eyebrows together, her lips pulling into a wince. "You don't understand. We're going to get divorced. I...almost had Mr. Smythe draw up the papers already. I can't keep him from—"

"From what? His heart's desire? A life without you?"

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod.

Anna heaved a sigh, the smile finally lessening a little, replaced by a consoling expression. “Oh, Catherine...”

“I know. And every time you say how in love he is, and how wonderful our marriage is, I just...I can’t bear it any longer. I don’t want you to be shocked when it happens.”

Anna fluttered her eyelashes. “I doubt I will be. Because I simply do not see it happening.”

Cate tugged her chin back to her chest. What was Anna thinking?

“Darling, many a marriage begins without the heat of passion. When I married Marcus’s father, I certainly hadn’t been overwhelmed with love and devotion so much so that I couldn’t bear to be apart from him. We met once before I was marched down the aisle.”

Cate swallowed hard. “I hadn’t realized you were an arranged marriage.”

“Yes, of course. That doesn’t mean our marriage was loveless. Quite the opposite, in fact. Merrick and I were very devoted to each other, and I was very much heartbroken when he was taken from us.”

Cate reached out to pat Anna’s hand. “I’m so sorry.”

“Quite all right, dear. It has been centuries... though time helps, the void in one’s heart never disappears.” She forced a smile onto her face. “Let us hope you never know that pain.”

Cate’s lips tugged into a slight smile, and she sniffled. “I’m sorry that you do, but I still don’t think you understand. We only married—“

“For your inheritance, yes, I am aware. Catherine, do you really believe me this dim that I do not know what is going on with my own son?”

Cate shook her head, her features pinching. “No, I don’t mean to imply that at all...just that...well, I thought we were doing a rather good job of fooling you.”

The comment made Anna chuckle again. “Oh, Catherine. I am not fooled easily. And I know my son. I also know a man in love. Marcus is devoted to you, darling. Do not think otherwise.”

Cate chewed her lower lip, unconvinced. Anna had to be fooling herself into believing their relationship was more than a simple arrangement.

“Did you really think that I didn’t know?” Anna asked.

“Well...yes,” Cate answered with an earnest nod.

Anna shook her head, another giggle escaping her. "It's no wonder you are so dear to me. Now, I will not pry, and I have already told you my take on it, but I believe you both are quite dedicated to one another. And it will only grow stronger with time."

Cate lowered her gaze to her lap, weary of continuing the argument. She had done what she intended: she'd informed Anna of the true nature of their relationship. That way, when they divorced, Anna wouldn't be too shocked.

"Let's stop this silly talk of divorces and move on to solving some of our other more pressing issues, shall we?"

Cate sucked in a deep breath as she nodded. A knock sounded at the door before they could move on, and Anna rose to answer it.

"Ah, tea, lovely."

Molly flitted in with a grin on her face. "And a visitor."

Cate's stomach clenched as she wondered who it was, noting the three cups on the tray rather than two.

"Who is—" she began when her husband strode into the room. "Oh."

"Marcus, what perfect timing," Anna said. "I'm glad you are here."

Cate cringed inside. Her timing couldn't have been worse at admitting the truth to Anna.

Anna thanked Molly and closed the door behind her as Marcus narrowed his eyes at Cate.

"Yes, it appears my timing is fortuitous. What have you said to make Catherine cry?"

"That is no doing of mine," Anna answered with a shake of her head as she poured the tea. "It is between you and Catherine."

Cate's eyes went wide as she accepted her teacup. "I just...it's too many things going on, that's all."

Marcus puckered his lips as he flicked his gaze between the two women before he sipped his tea. "Hmm."

"Yes, hmm," Anna answered. "Maybe instead of flitting off to Maine you should have been here helping your family."

"Mother, I told you it was unavoidable. And I am not staying. The situation grows worse in Maine. I am merely here to check in."

"Merely here to check in?" Anna slammed her cup onto the saucer and set it aside, her jaw clenched. "Here your wife sits dealing with visions that are robbing her of any peace whilst she also prevents a murder and constant taunts from The Agency, but you are merely here to check in? Marcus, I warn you I am seconds away from striking you to knock sense into your head.”

Marcus’s posture stiffened at the lecture, though he did not lash out. “It is unavoidable, I have told you this. Now, if you wouldn’t mind, I would like a moment alone with Catherine.”

Anna heaved a sigh as she rose. “Fine. I suppose I should take solace in the fact that you have a moment to spare for your wife. And do not slink off afterward, I must speak with you.”

“Yes, Mother, of course.”

Anna offered him a fiery glance before she strode from the room. Marcus sighed, then took another sip of tea. “What happened?”

Cate winced at him, her nose wrinkling. “I may or may not have told your mother our marriage was fake.”

He slid his eyes closed as he set the teacup on the table. “Wonderful.”

“Sorry,” she answered, her lips still firmly tugged into a grimace. “I thought I was helping.”

“It’s fine. I will handle it. And Mother. What has made you cry?”

She shrugged. “I felt really bad lying to her. I thought she was going to let me have it.”

“Mother adores you. She would never quarrel with you.” Marcus sipped his tea before he settled his cup in its saucer with a frown. “She will let me have it.”

“I’m sorry,” Cate said, her nose wrinkling as she shot him an apologetic glance.

“It’s fine, Catherine. I cannot complain. I have, after all, left you here to deal with everything on your own, but I promise it is—“

“Unavoidable, I know. And it’s fine. Really. I can’t keep relying on you to solve my problems. We won’t be married forever. I have to solve them on my own.”

He didn’t answer her comment, instead moving on to another topic. “What have you found so far in Mr. Reid’s case?”

Cate tugged her lips into a wince. “I accidentally prevented the murder.”

“I see you have taken well to breaking rules. How did you manage it?”

“Your mother discovered that Amanda—whose name isn’t even Amanda—had false memories implanted about Jack being the murderer. So, Jack and I went back to try to put a time tracer on her to learn where The Agency had taken her to do this.”

“So, she is an Agency recruit. I thought as much.”

“Yes, her real name is Lucy Thorne. And she hasn’t even been born yet.” Cate shook her head as she tried to wrap her mind around the strange situation. “Anyway, we couldn’t put the tracer on her. And while we were in a bookshop trying to figure out what to do next, the man who Jack thought was the murderer found us and took us somewhere and put us in a dungeon.”

Marcus’s eyes went wide as his teacup rattled in his saucer. “He did what? What dungeon?”

Cate shrugged. “I’m not sure. I didn’t recognize it, but it had those magic-dampening cells—though they were different from the one you were in. And there was a man there named Thomas Holden.”

Marcus screwed up his face. “I don’t know the name.”

“I don’t think he was a very high-ranking member of The Agency, though he thought he would be after our capture.”

“I assume Mother found you?”

“No, I picked the locks, and we escaped. But not before they brought Amanda and David Hensley to those same cells. I used the button to bring us all back here.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes. “So, there are two Amandas here and the victim?”

“And Amy Grace. We still haven’t taken her back to her time.”

“My, you’ve had your hands quite full, Catherine. No wonder Mother is ready to strangle me. And your visions on top of it all? Have you made any progress there?”

“I think they’re about my mother. I called out the name Laura. And I’ve just had a clear image of me looking very frightened. Other than that, no, nothing to write home about.” Cate heaved a sigh as she took a long sip of warm tea.

“I see. Well, we should deal with at least some of these issues before I return to Maine.”

Cate flicked her gaze from the amber liquid in her cup to his dark eyes. “I can manage it. Don’t worry about me.”

“But I do. Also, you cannot erase that woman’s memory, so I must help you.”

“Right.” Her eyebrows flicked up as she sat straighter. “Oh, that reminds me. I can’t do any of the fireball stuff right?”

His features crinkled. "Fireball stuff?"

She flicked her wrist, mimicking the way he conjured a fireball.

Amusement crossed his features, a sight she had rarely seen before.

"Oh, Catherine, you are a dear."

"I didn't think so. It just seemed handy...especially when I got stuck in that cell."

"Since you continue to find yourself in compromising situations, I will teach you how to defend yourself the moment I return from Maine."

"With a fireball?"

"Not quite. Sorry, dear, you do not come equipped with those."

She offered him a slight smile. "That's fine. And like I said, you don't need to worry about me. I'll be fine. I've been getting myself out of trouble for a while now--"

"And you no longer need to do that. We will handle it when I return from Maine. Now, we should manage the situation with Ms. Hoffman. Would you gather her whilst I speak with Mother?"

Cate set her teacup aside and nodded. "Yes. I'll tell her we're ready to take her home. We'll meet in the library."

"Good," Marcus answered, setting his cup and saucer on the tray.

"Good luck," she said as she rose and straightened her tunic. "I'm sorry."

"Do not apologize, Catherine. I can handle Mother."

Cate offered him a dubious glance.

He heaved a sigh as they strode into the hall. "Mostly."

She chuckled as they parted ways, with him heading toward Anna's room while Cate navigated to Amy Grace's. She knocked at the door but received no response.

Her forehead crinkled as she tried again. "Amy Grace?"

Her pulse quickened, and she tried the knob. The door swung open to a darkened bedroom. "Amy Grace?"

Cate peered into the room, finding it empty. She hurried across it and glanced into the open door leading to the en-suite bathroom. "Uh-oh."

With no one in the room, she hastened into the hall in search of the woman. Her gaze flicked back and forth before she selected a direction. She'd search the castle, but first she'd find some reinforcements.

As she rounded the corner, voices floated from Anna's room.

“...haven’t told her anything,” Anna said, her voice incredulous before she heaved a sigh.

“The situation is delicate, Mother. I have attempted to explain that several times to you.”

“It has become even more delicate after the discussion I just had with Catherine.”

Cate hesitated, wondering if she should turn back or continue to Anna’s door.

“I will handle it.”

“Oh? Will you? Before or after you run off to Maine again.”

This time Marcus sighed. “That is—“

Cate twisted on her heel, ready to retreat.

“Don’t bother. I care not what is happening in Bucksville. I care what is happening here. With Catherine. Do you know she believes Laura to be her mother?”

Cate froze at Anna’s words, tilting her head as she furrowed her brow.

“And you have told her anything?”

“No,” Anna answered. “I have hinted that she should not be so shortsighted, but other than that, she has no idea who Laura is.”

“It is best kept that way,” Marcus answered. “As for the rest, I will handle it when the time is appropriate.”

Anna sucked in a breath. “Fine. I will trust you to do what is best. Though know that I disagree.”

“I already know, Mother. Now, we must handle the other situations. I am to meet Catherine in the library—“

Cate’s heart thudded hard against her ribs, and she scurried down the hall, breaking into a run to put distance between her and her spouse and mother-in-law.

She reached her room and closed herself inside of it, gasping for breath. Her mind worked overtime to process the information. Anna and Marcus knew who Laura was and were deliberately keeping it from her.

Why?

CHAPTER 26

Cate pressed her trembling hand against her forehead as she slid her eyes closed, desperately trying to compose herself.

The words she'd just overhead floated through her mind, stinging her again. Have you told her anything?

No, she has no idea who Laura is.

Cate swallowed hard, realizing they had every idea who Laura was and had kept it from her.

For what reason, she didn't know. But they'd been lying to her since these visions had started. Or at least since she'd identified Laura as part of them.

She twisted her fingers into fists, setting her jaw. She had to confront them. She had to know what they knew.

Her heart thudded hard against her ribs, and she spun to face the door. She imagined the conversation in her mind as her fingertips lingered on the knob.

With a huff, she shook her head. She couldn't confront them until the other situations were handled.

They needed to return Amy Grace to her own time and convince Amanda and David to disappear. Only after those two things were settled could she focus on determining why her husband and mother-in-law had lied to her about her visions.

A knock startled her, pulling her from her thoughts and sending her heart pounding against her ribs once more.

She tugged open the door, finding Jack on the other side. With a deep inhale, she settled her nerves, forcing her heart rate back to normal.

“Cate? You okay?”

She swallowed hard as she nodded, chewing her lower lip and forcing the thoughts about what she’d overheard from my mind.

“You don’t look okay. Did something happen?”

“We’re going to take Amy Grace back to her time and then deal with David and Amanda. If all goes to plan, we should have this wrapped up today, I hope.”

Jack skirted past her into the room, rubbing his chin. “So, if this works...I’ve never been married to Amanda.”

“Right,” Cate answered with a nod. “We should return to find everyone else blissfully unaware of your marriage.”

As she said the words, she wondered if that was what would happen with her own spouse. Would they quietly divorce shortly after their marriage, and she would return to a household none the wiser?

“Cate?” Jack asked. “Something’s bothering you. Have you had another vision?”

Cate shook her head. “No. I just...I couldn’t find Amy Grace and...”

“She’s in the kitchen,” Jack answered. “With Molly and Mrs. Fraser. I came from there just now after hearing your beloved spouse is back in residence.”

She sighed. “Only to wrap up the loose ends we need his assistance with. Then he’s back to Maine.”

“How lovely of him to stop by.”

Cate’s hands clenched into fists again.

Jack eyed them, flicking his eyebrows up. “I see you’re as tickled as I am about it.”

Cate licked her lips, weighing the idea of telling him her suspicions. She raised her gaze to his, her shoulders slumping. She had to tell someone. “I think Marcus and Anna are hiding something from me.”

“I’m not surprised. Those two are hiding a lot of things if you ask me. We know he comes equipped with a flashlight, but what else? She can put people to sleep with a touch—“

“I knew that about him. He used it on me when he kidnapped me in the 1700s.”

“Oh, right. I’d forgotten that we had placed our trust in a man who nabbed you from these very halls.”

“I try not to think about it because...”

“Because?”

Cate’s features crinkled as she refused to admit her feelings to herself. “Nothing, never mind. The thing is...I think they know who Laura is, and they aren’t telling me.”

“Why? Are they determined to torment you?”

Cate sucked in a breath, her happy future memory taunting at her. “I don’t know. I don’t want to believe that. Anna has been such a help to us...”

“Has she? Or has this all been set up by the Northcotts?”

Cate frowned at the words, though mostly because she couldn’t stop but wonder the same. Was that warm future memory that had gotten her through so many terrifying moments all fake? “I don’t know.”

Her features pinched as she struggled to make sense of things.

“Oh,” Marcus’s voice said from behind her, making her startle. She batted her eyelashes to make her tears recede. “I hadn’t realized you were waylaid by Mr. Reid. Have you readied Ms. Hoffman?”

“Not yet,” Cate answered, desperately trying to steady her voice.

She failed. Marcus skirted around her, an unimpressed frown settling onto his features. “I hadn’t realized Mr. Reid was upsetting you either.”

“It’s not me upsetting her,” Jack shot back.

A pang of regret raced through her as she wondered if Jack would confront Marcus before she was ready.

“Then what is?” Marcus asked, his focus never leaving her.

She pressed her lips together, swallowing hard. “We need to have a talk once we’ve gotten these other situations squared away.”

“Concerning?”

Cate let her gaze fall to the floor, her heart thudding hard again. “Laura.”

She glanced up at him, trying to read his expression, but, as usual, it was unreadable.

“Then I suppose we should locate Ms. Hoffman and return her before we work on Amanda and David.”

Cate bobbed her head. “She’s in the kitchen. I’ll get her.”

“Good. We’ll meet in the library as planned,” Marcus answered.

Cate stood for a second, eyeing both men before she spoke again. "Maybe you should come with me, Jack."

"Oh, right," Jack said with a nod. "Sure."

Cate offered her husband a weak smile before they stepped into the hall, putting distance between them.

"Are you okay?" Jack asked.

"Yes," Cate answered. "We have a job to do."

"Cate...I just don't know how you're doing this. The nerve of that guy to blame me for upsetting you."

Cate studied the red runner beneath her feet as they descended the stairs. "I don't know. I don't understand why they're doing what they're doing, but there must be a reason."

"Yes, they're lying to us because they have some other agenda," Jack answered.

Cate shook her head. "I really don't want to believe that."

"Cate, I know this is hard. I know you two...three...whatever, you and the Northcotts went through some things together while you were searching for me. And I don't mean to sound ungrateful for what they did, but—"

Cate stopped as they reached the stairs leading to the kitchen. She raised her gaze to his, her features pinching. "There's something else."

Jack's face went blank, concern flashing through his eyes. "All right."

"I, umm..." She shook her head, unsure she wanted to get into all of it. But she'd made no sense of it on her own. Maybe an outside insight would help. "I have a future memory..."

"The vision, yes."

She winced. "No. When Anna started teaching me how to deal with my visions, she told me to find a comforting vision."

Jack burst into laughter. "Are any of them supposed to achieve that? Aren't they all gloom and doom?"

"No," Cate answered, shifting her weight from foot to foot. "Let's go into the sitting room."

He nodded, following her to the set of double doors. They slipped inside, shutting out the rest of the castle. "You're scaring me."

"I'm scaring myself," Cate answered. "I can't make any sense of this."

"Okay, so you were supposed to find a warm, fuzzy future memory. Did you?"

Cate bobbed her head. "Yes. I did."

“Okay. Congratulations. At least we know there’s something positive in our future.”

“The thing is...” She hesitated again as she perched on the edge of the couch. “The warm, fuzzy memory involves Marcus.”

“I take it back. There is nothing positive about our future.”

Cate pressed her lips into a thin line as she shot him an unimpressed glance. “Very funny, Jack. Although, you’re striking at the heart of my point. How is Marcus still in my future? And why he is my warm, fuzzy memory? If he’s lying to me...”

Jack collapsed onto the loveseat across from her, his hands clasped. “Why are you still with him?”

“Exactly.”

“When does this memory occur?”

Cate shrugged. “I don’t know. That’s the other problem. This could be five minutes from now, five years from now...” She let her head fall into her hands. “I asked Anna if they could be fake.”

“And?”

“She said no.”

Jack bobbed his head around. “Well, we do think she’s lying to you. Maybe she’s lying about this.”

Cate sucked in a sharp breath. “Maybe she planted the future memory. Like Amanda’s.”

“Ohhh, Cate. Maybe.”

Cate furrowed her brow again, wondering why the Northcotts would do this? What did it gain them? “There’s more, too. And again, this could be more lies but...”

“Do I want to know?”

Cate wrinkled her nose. “Probably not, but I’m going to tell you anyway. Anna says her warm, fuzzy vision is of me.”

“What? Anna had a vision of you? When?”

Cate flicked her eyebrows up as she recalled the tale. “When she first held Marcus.”

“As a baby?”

Cate nodded.

Jack leapt from his seat, pacing the floor. “Hard to imagine that fellow as a helpless babe.”

“Baby, yes. Helpless, apparently not. Anna says he could conjure fireballs from birth.”

Jack screwed up his face as he shot her a glance.

“Yeah. A frightening thought, right? I can’t imagine what I’d do if I had a baby who could do that.” Cate rose, drumming her hands against her leggings.

“Anyway, there you have my entire convoluted story. Now you see why I can’t make heads or tails out of any of this. Nothing makes sense, and nothing adds up.”

Jack grabbed Cate’s hand and squeezed it. “As soon as we finish this nonsense with my murder charge...we’re working on this. We’ll figure it out, Cate.”

“Thanks,” she said with a weak smile.

“Now, let’s go return this poor lady to her own time and...erase her memory. That’s...” Jack’s features settled into a concerned expression. “I don’t like that he can do that.”

“I asked him if he’s ever done to me,” Cate said with a tentative grin.

“Has he?”

“He says no, but...how would I know? He could have erased my memory and then just lied about it.”

Jack rubbed at his temples. “I can’t take this. I wonder if we can go back and pretend we live in a time before we knew any of this.”

“Sorry,” Cate answered with a grimace, “but I’m sure Gianna would find us.”

“That woman.”

“I suppose we need to keep reminding ourselves that she’s the real enemy here.” Cate crossed to the door, her fingers lingering on the doorknob.

“Yes, she is...but I can’t help but wonder who is in league with her. And have they infiltrated this house.”

“I really hope not.” Cate’s features pinched as her stomach twisted into a knot. Had she invited the enemy into her home?

“Me too, but...if The Agency will go to any lengths.”

“You think this is all a ploy, and the Northcotts really are Agency?”

Jack bobbed his head in answer. Cate’s shoulders slumped at the agreement. “Wait...I wonder if Damien would know.”

“Do you think? I mean, maybe they keep things close to the vest.”

“I’m sure they do, but come on, Celine nearly married him. She may have some idea.”

“It’s worth a shot. Ask him when we get back from returning Amy Grace. But let’s get through that bit first, okay?”

“Yes, I agree. She’s been a good sport, and she really helped with the investigation, but...time for her to go back to her normal life.”

“I’m ready to ask if she wants a roommate. Maybe Northcott can wipe my memory, too.”

“Do you like poodles?”

“I love them,” Jack said with a grin as they stepped into the hall, nearly running into Amy Grace.

“Oops, sorry. I hope you don’t mind, but I took it upon myself to wander downstairs for a snack,” she said.

“You’re welcome to wander anywhere,” Cate said, plastering a smile on her face as she shoved her concerns to the back of her mind. “We were just looking for you though.”

“Oh? You need me to play bad cop again with what’s-her-name?”

Cate chuckled. “No. We’ve got that solved.”

Amy Grace’s eyes went wide. “Did you? You caught the murderer?”

Cate wrinkled her nose as she shook her head. “No. Not quite. We actually prevented the murder.”

“You did? Won’t that...mess everything up? I mean...David was supposed to die, and now he didn’t.”

“We’re hoping it doesn’t,” Jack answered. “There wasn’t a good way around it.”

Amy Grace’s forehead creased as she stared at him.

“Things happened, and there wasn’t a choice,” Jack said.

“We couldn’t leave him there to die. I had to save him,” Cate added.

“I wonder how different things will be. Have you noticed any ripples yet? Maybe some people won’t be born. Or maybe they will be born. Or what if—“

“We haven’t noticed anything yet, so our fingers are crossed. Anyway, given that things are settled, we now can finally take you home.” Cate grinned at the woman.

Amy Grace’s lips tugged into a slight frown. “Oh.”

“You can see your poodles again. I know you’ve been worried about them.” Cate kept the smile plastered on her features.

“Yeah, I do miss them. But...”

“But?”

“Well...I thought I could stay here and help you solve crimes.”

“Oh,” Cate said, screwing up her face as she shot Jack a glance, “that’s sweet of you, but I really hope we don’t have many more crimes to solve.”

Amy Grace shifted her gaze between the two of them. “Do you really believe that?”

“Yes?” Jack said, his voice questioning.

“Well, if you need any help, you know where to find me. I’d be happy to help. Although, I’ll be older, so maybe come back to get me at this age.”

“We will do that,” Cate said with an awkward laugh as she reminded herself that the woman would have no memory of them. “Anyway, Marcus is waiting for us in the library, so we should go.”

“Right.” Amy Grace bobbed her head before they set off down the hall to the library to collect Marcus.

Within fifteen minutes, they’d returned to the Oxford area over two decades earlier. Amy Grace pushed through the door of her charming townhouse. Three poodles bounded toward her as though she’d been gone for years.

“I know,” she said as she petted each one. “It’s been a long time, hasn’t it? No, actually, it’s only been fifteen minutes. That’s odd.”

“You never get used to that,” Jack said.

“Can I offer you some tea?” she asked.

“No, we need to be going, but...thank you so much for your help with all of this. We couldn’t have done it without you.”

Amy Grace grinned at them. “You’re welcome. I’m glad to have been of assistance. And if you ever need help in the future—“

Marcus touched her cheek before she could finish the statement, and she slumped into his arms.

“You could have let her finish,” Jack complained.

“She won’t remember it anyway,” he answered as he lifted her into his arms and carried her to her bedroom. After murmuring a few words and a swipe across her forehead, he fixed his gaze on Cate. “She’ll think she’s had a fantastical dream.”

Cate stared down at the sleeping woman. “I feel sort of bad. She was very helpful. And a good sport.”

“Yes, she was,” Jack agreed, “but she’ll be far better off without us than with us.”

“I agree. The Agency is no picnic. I don’t want anyone else exposed to them.”

“I guess we should return and deal with Amanda and David. Let’s hope that goes as smoothly as this did.”

Cate nodded. Marcus stretched his arms out before Cate batted them down. “No! Not in the house.”

He rolled his eyes. “You are as bad as Mother.”

“Someone has to keep an eye on you,” Cate answered as they made their way out of the house. “And I don’t want to leave her house a mess from all that wind.”

They found a suitable spot and returned to the present, arriving at the mausoleum across the property.

“Now, on to the other problem,” Jack said.

Cate nodded at him before her eyebrows pinched together. The castle in the distance morphed and twisted in front of her. She blinked her eyes, certain she was seeing things.

“Cate?” Jack asked, his voice sounding miles away.

Marcus placed a steady hand on her. “Catherine?”

She reached for him but before she could latch on, her knees buckled and she plunged into darkness.

CHAPTER 27

Cate's heart hammered as she glanced around, finding herself in her darkened bedroom. What had happened? She'd felt herself collapsing, but she'd expected to wake up in the mausoleum, not in her bedroom what seemed to be hours later.

She wrapped her arms around herself as a chill cut through her. A scream sounded from another part of the castle. Her heart plummeted as she realized she wasn't in her bedroom. At least not in the present time. She was somewhere else, living through her vision again.

Before she could think, her feet were already moving, pushing her toward the sound. A drive deep inside told her she needed to be there.

She flung the doors open to her bedroom suite and sprinted down the hall, turning the corner and heading for the double doors at the end.

"Laura!" she called as her fingertips wrapped around the doorknob and twisted.

She pushed into the room, her heart pounding. She'd never gotten this far before. What would she find?

The moon cast long shadows across the bedroom. She searched the space, finding a figure huddled in the bed, covers pulled tight around them as they stared at the window, their back to Cate.

Cate's forehead crinkled as she crept forward, her trembling hand outstretched. If she could see the face, she may be able to determine who Laura was.

Her fingers wrapped around the figure's shoulders, and the woman whipped around to face her with terror-filled eyes.

Cate's stomach twisted into a tight knot as she stared at her own face.

She fluttered her eyelashes, trying to process it, but the world began to fall away around her, cracking into pieces and leaving her floating in the darkness.

After falling for a moment, she opened her eyes, gasping as she vaulted upright.

"Easy, Catherine, you've had another vision," Marcus said, holding her tightly.

She sucked in deep breaths. "I know. I know, I saw..."

"What, Cate?" Jack asked, his features pinched.

"Me. I saw me again. I called out to Laura, but when I went into the room, the woman's face was mine. I don't...understand."

Marcus heaved a sigh as he rubbed her shoulders. "Let's go back and discuss it with Mother."

"Yes, I would very much like to discuss it with both of you," Cate said, her mind regressing to the conversation she'd overheard earlier.

"And we want answers," Jack added as Cate rose.

"Can you walk?" Marcus asked.

"Yes," she snapped, "I don't need to be carried."

"Need or want. Those are two different things."

"Need," she answered, her nerves raw from the emotion in her vision.

Jack wrapped his arm around her shoulders. "It's okay, Cate. Let's head back."

They made the trek across the property to the castle, warm lights glowing from within as it welcomed them back.

Cate heaved a tired sigh as they entered through the towering oak doors.

"You okay, Cate?"

"Yeah, just tired."

"But walking and talking. You are improving, dear."

"I still don't know anything," she shot back.

"It will come in time."

"Or you could tell me. You know something, don't you?"

"Catherine—"

"I heard you talking to your mother earlier. You know who Laura is, and you won't tell me."

Anna descended the stairs, her eyebrows shooting up. “What’s going on here?”

Cate shifted her weight, exhaustion coursing through her.

“Cate had another vision. She saw the person in the room, but it was herself. She’s confused and upset, and you’re holding back on her. That’s not helping!” Jack shouted.

“We are not holding back on purpose,” Anna answered. “But we cannot deal with that now. We have trouble.”

“Trouble?” Cate asked, her stomach clenching.

“Yes, trouble. A great deal of trouble.”

“What happened?” Jack’s eyes went wide. “The murder. It still happened somehow, didn’t it? I’m still in trouble. Have the police come for me?”

“No,” Anna said, “Mr. Reid, try to stop making things all about you.”

“What is it, then?” Cate asked.

“Something is disturbing the timeline. There is a temporal anomaly that I can sense.”

Marcus’s eyes went wide. “From?”

“I don’t know.”

“Is it related to what we did? We prevented a murder,” Cate said, her stomach twisting into a tight knot. “What if we changed things so much that the world is just catching up?”

“No. No, it’s not that. Something is happening now. But I don’t know what.” Anna pressed her lips together into a thin line. “But I think we had better very quickly fix the situation with David and Amanda before this unravels. It needs our full attention.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod. “But I don’t know how to fix that.”

“I’ve moved them to Rosenberg,” Anna said. “Just in case. But we’ll need to travel there and convince them to live a quiet life somewhere.”

“Do you think they’ll go for it?” Cate shifted her gaze to Jack. “You know them best.”

“David? I don’t know about that. He was a pretty prominent businessman.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped as she heaved a sigh. “Great. So, this will be an uphill battle.”

“And that’s only the first of it,” Anna answered.

Cate’s features pinched. “What’s the next?”

“Where do we put them? We’ll need to hide them in time somewhere.”

“Perhaps the late nineteenth century. They will be much harder to track before the advent of mass media,” Marcus suggested.

Cate scoffed, shaking her head. “Oh, please. That makes our job ten times harder. We have to convince them to slink off and live a quiet life in an era that lacks all modern conveniences.”

Cate slapped a hand against her forehead as she paced back and forth.

“Maybe they’ll be more open than we think,” Jack said. “Amanda loved reading those historical romances back in the day.”

“Reading it and living it are two very different things,” Cate answered.

Jack shrugged. “Maybe we’ll get lucky.”

“Let’s hope so.” Cate chewed her lower lip. “Otherwise, I don’t know what we’ll do.”

“I have another idea,” Anna answered. “But you won’t like it.”

“Oh, boy,” Cate groaned.

Jack wrinkled his nose. “I’m almost afraid to ask, but what is it?”

“We don’t have to prevent the murder. We can let them go back if they want to. But we will need to kidnap the former version of Mr. Reid so he cannot appear anywhere near the event nor marry Amanda.”

“Ohhh,” Jack murmured.

“But she’s programmed to think he’s done it. Won’t they do that again?”

“They cannot if he is nowhere near that pub or that hotel that night. In fact, we’d need this Mr. Reid to appear somewhere else. Maybe a sudden trip home to Dunhaven, and he’s spotted a fuel station miles away, thus giving him an appropriate alibi.”

Cate pressed her lips together as she processed the idea. It could work. But she hated to be responsible for a man’s death. She flicked a questioning gaze to Jack. “What do you think? It’s you who stands to lose the most if we don’t play our cards right.”

“I don’t know, Cate. I mean, on one hand, convincing them to stay put and out of sight is a big gamble, especially with The Agency.”

“But on the other, we’re sending a man to his death,” she answered.

He nodded, his features twisted with the agony of the difficult decision.

“You are not sending him to his death,” Anna answered. “He has already died. He died in every timeline so far. Someone killed him. He is merely fulfilling his destiny.”

“Then why does it feel so wrong?” Cate lamented.

“These choices always are,” Anna answered. “It’s extraordinarily difficult to know what’s best. And whichever you make, you must be sure about it so you don’t spend your life second-guessing.”

Cate’s features crinkled as she slicked a lock of hair behind her ear. Anna’s comforting words were helpful, but with her current suspicions about her mother-in-law and husband, she wondered if following their advice was prudent. “Can you give us a minute to talk?”

Anna arched an eyebrow before she sucked in a breath and nodded. “All right.”

Jack followed Cate into the sitting room, and she closed the doors behind them. “This is a mess.”

“Yes, I know. And I don’t know what to do.”

“Neither do I. My mind just keeps going round and round. And I don’t know who to trust.” Cate clapped a palm over her forehead as she sank onto the couch cushion.

“Oddly, the Northcotts didn’t have a suggestion they seemed to be lobbying for,” Jack answered, perching on the edge of the armchair next to her.

“You’re right. I just...the whole thing about them knowing who Laura is and not telling me is really throwing me.”

“Maybe we ought to ask them.”

“I asked. You heard their response. They aren’t doing it deliberately. What does that even mean?”

Jack rose from his seat. “All right, well, I think you need to settle your mind with that before we do anything else.”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “No, we need to solve this before that time anomaly or whatever Anna is sensing causes more problems.”

“If she’s sensing anything. What if that’s a ploy?”

Cate’s breathing turned ragged as she tried to sort through the possibilities. Everywhere she turned, something was going wrong. “I don’t know.”

“Cate,” Jack asked, easing onto his seat again, concern etched into his features, “are you all right? Are you having another vision?”

“No,” she answered. “I mean yes. Oh, no, I’m not having a vision, yes, I’m all right. But we need to make a call here. This affects you the most, so whatever you’re comfortable with is okay with me.”

“Oh, sure, put it on me, the lowly gardener.”

“Oh, now you’re the gardener, huh?” she asked, levity returning to her voice.

“I am.” He grinned at her before the expression slipped from his features. “In all seriousness, I’m not certain I can return David to be murdered.”

“Neither can I. Okay, I think we have our decision, then. We need to convince them to go live somewhere quietly.”

“Right,” Jack said with a nod. “Okay. Let’s hope this works out.”

“Believe me,” Cate said as she rose, “my fingers are crossed. I want this to be over for you.”

“Admit it, you just want your gardener back.”

“I also want Molly to be happy.” She wagged a finger at him. “If you hurt her...”

Jack held his hands up. “I promise I won’t. I like Molly...a lot.”

Cate smiled at him. “I’m happy for you. And her. She deserves it after that idiot she just divorced.”

“Oh, my, Cate Kensie’s getting salty.”

“Cate Kensie Northcott. I’m allowed to be salty now. Actually, it’s encouraged.”

“Oh, right. I forgot. Now that you’re a duchess,” he said with another grin as they stepped to the door.

Anna whipped around to face them, her features questioning. “Have we made a decision?”

“Yes. We’re going to try to convince them to live a quiet life somewhere,” Cate said with a nod. “Neither of us felt comfortable sending them back knowing he’d get killed.”

“All right, then we should speak with them right away,” Anna said. “Before this other issue...explodes. Marcus—”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “We’ll do this. Jack and I.”

Anna raised her eyebrows again. “All right. We will await word in the library.”

Cate nodded and they parted ways. Her stomach twisted into a tight knot as they approached David’s bedroom.

“You ready?” Cate asked.

Jack nodded. “No, but go ahead.”

She offered him an amused glance before she knocked on the door.
“David? David, it’s Cate and Jack.”

They waited for a moment before she tried again, calling once more. No one answered and no one opened the door.

Cate and Jack shared a questioning glance before Cate set her fingers on the knob and pressed her ear to the door.

“Do you hear anything?”

She shook her head before she twisted the knob and pushed it open. Her heart skipped a beat as she scanned the darkened space. No one was there. David Hensley was gone.

CHAPTER 28

Cate's knees wobbled as she raced across the room to peer into the bathroom. Empty.

She twisted to face Jack. "Where is he?"

"Maybe he's with Amanda," Jack suggested.

"Let's check." Cate's heart hammered against her ribs as she raced from the room to the next bedroom.

With ragged breath, she pounded against the door, but no one answered.

"Maybe they went for a walk?" Jack asked, his features twisting as he rubbed the back of his neck.

Cate plowed into the room, finding it empty, too. "Oh, no. Even if they did go for a walk, we need to find them and get them back here so we can convince them to leave."

"Wow, that sounded...odd but you're right. I can head out to see if they're here."

"Okay, I'll—"

Cate's voice cut off. Jack snapped his gaze to her. "What?"

She hurried across the room and snatched a tented paper from the nightstand. "There's a note addressed to us."

Jack hurried to her side, peering over her shoulder as she flicked it open and read aloud. "Dear Cate and Jack. Thank you so much for helping us. David and I now realized the grave danger we faced from The Agency. My life would be tied to them in constant service while David's would be gone if it hadn't been for your help."

“With that said, we have decided to leave and live a quiet life off the grid. You will never hear from us again. Good luck to you, and thank you for all you’ve done.

“Signed, David and Lucy.”

Cate glanced at Jack, her eyes wide. “Seriously?”

He rubbed his neck with a shrug. “I suppose we should be glad, but...”

“You’re worried.”

“A little, but maybe it’s best this way. We didn’t have to convince them to go somewhere. And if they ever do turn up...it won’t be because we forced them to stay away.”

“I wonder if we should still send someone back to keep you away from the pub that night,” Cate mused.

“Wait, let’s check the news.” Jack fished his phone from his pocket and searched for David Hensley.

No articles about his murder turned up.

“Could we be this lucky?” Cate murmured.

“Maybe,” Jack answered. “Did your husband say something about The Agency giving up on certain aspects?”

“He said they are only distractions to us while they work on something larger. Do you think this is what that was?”

“Could have been,” Jack said with a nod. “I’m not that important.”

“Of course, you are,” Cate answered.

“You know what I mean, Cate. I can’t give them Dunhaven. They were working on something else.”

“I wonder if it has to do with the disturbance Anna sensed.”

“Or your visions.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped. “If it has to do with my visions, we may be sunk. In each one, I’m terrified. So, they’re winning.”

“Let’s hope not,” Jack answered. “We should update the others.”

“First, I think we should check on the other Amanda. Or...”

Jack’s face drained of color. “Oh...I wonder if she’s disappeared, too?”

“Let’s find out.” With the letter in hand, Cate crossed to the door and stepped into the hall. They crossed to the other side of the castle where the other Amanda’s room now sat empty.

Cate sank onto the edge of the bed. “I guess that’s that. She never came here.”

“That...boggles my mind. So...I wonder if I’m off the hook with Molly?”

“That’s easy enough to check, I guess,” Cate answered.

“Mind if we make another stop before we visit your loving husband?” Jack asked.

Cate shook her head, her lips curling into a smile. “Let’s go see if this problem is actually fixed.”

Cate’s stomach twisted as they wound through the halls of the castle to the kitchen downstairs. Molly grinned at them as they entered. “Hey, there you are.”

She leaned forward to kiss Jack’s cheek. “All done for the day?”

“Oh, uh, just a bit of discussion on a few projects,” Jack said. “I’m only here to snag a biscuit.”

“Hey,” she said as she batted his hand, “you’ll spoil your dinner.”

“Miss Molly is right, young Jack. Best you go discuss those projects so you don’t spoil Her Grace’s dinner.”

“I’ll be fine,” Cate answered, catching Andrea’s eye and motioning for her to leave with them.

They retreated into the hall a safe distance when Cate leaned closer to Andrea. “I need to ask you something about Molly, and you have to be completely honest.”

“Of course, Your Grace,” Andrea said with a nod.

“Is there any reason Molly may be upset with Jack?”

Andrea flicked her gaze to Jack before her features scrunched. “Not that I’m aware of, Your Grace. She seems very happy with him.”

“Has she mentioned him being married or someone named Amanda?”

“No,” Andrea answered. “Is this...has there been some change in time?”

Cate bobbed her head as Jack heaved a sigh of relief. “Yes. For the better. No one seems to remember now, which is good.”

“Would you like me to check further on it?” Andrea asked.

“No, we should be okay. Thank you, Andrea. And I’ll see you later.”

Andrea offered her a bright smile before she returned to the kitchen.

“Well, seems like I really dodged a bullet, mostly thanks to you, Cate.”

“Happy to help. I’ve certainly dragged you through enough since I’ve arrived.”

“Now, let’s go focus on you and your problem. Time for the Northcotts to be honest about what they know.” Jack smacked one fist against his palm.

Cate nodded, though her stomach twisted into a tight knot as they climbed the stairs.

Would she finally have answers? And would she like them?

By the time they reached the library, her knees wobbled.

“Well? Have you convinced them?” Anna asked.

Cate waved the note in the air. “No need. They’re gone.”

Anna slid the paper from between her fingers, scanning it before she shot Marcus a glance. “Well, it seems they have solved our problem.”

“Should we leave it at that?” Jack asked. “Or should we try to find them and make certain they’ll stay gone?”

“We haven’t the time to find them. The anomaly is growing stronger. We need to focus on it.”

Cate sank into her armchair. “What is this anomaly?”

“Some problem. Something wrong. Something that needs tended to.” Anna eased onto the sofa, her features pinched. “But we must determine how and what.”

“So, you don’t know anything more than that?” Jack asked.

She shook her head. “No. I’m sorry. I would venture to say it is related to Catherine’s visions, but we haven’t much progress on that.”

Cate stiffened, her eyebrows pinching as she frowned. “No, I haven’t made much progress. But I suspect you know a lot more than you’re saying.”

“Catherine, we do not know anything. Though I have my suspicions. But you should know that giving away the future can be...dangerous. Especially if I am wrong.”

“I’d like to know either way. You have some guess. Maybe telling me would be the key to unlocking everything.”

“You would reject the idea immediately, Catherine,” Marcus answered before he offered her a brandy.

“No, I don’t want a brandy. I want answers. Whether I will reject them or not. You two have been keeping things from me this entire time. And I’d like to know why.”

Anna flicked her gaze to Marcus.

“Fine,” she answered, “I will tell you.”

“Mother—“

“She should know. Perhaps it’s better this way. Perhaps she will be more prepared even if she doesn’t accept the answer.”

Marcus pressed his lips into a thin line, shaking his head.

Anna wagged a finger at him. “This would be easier had you done what I told you to do in the first place.”

“Mother, I—“

“Don’t Mother me. This is your fault, Marcus. I have told you time and again what must be done. Instead, you slink off to Maine to bury your head in the sand. That was always your problem.”

Cate’s gaze bounced back and forth between the two of them as they argued about something she couldn’t quite understand. What should Marcus have done that would have made this easier? What did they know?

“Fine. Tell her. When she doesn’t accept it, you’ll see.”

She rolled her eyes at him before she twisted to face Cate. “I must apologize for my son who is a hopeless case.”

Cate offered her as warm a smile as she could muster.

Outside, lightning tore through the sky and thunder boomed. All eyes turned toward the window, and Jack took a few steps toward it. “I didn’t think it was supposed to rain today.”

Anna leapt to her feet, her fingers twisted into fists. “It was not. This isn’t a rainstorm. This is the anomaly.”

Cate’s heart sped, and she swallowed hard. “Anomaly? What’s happening? Will it be some kind of a vortex? Like when we had the universal time portal emerge?”

“No, it will be—“

Another crash of thunder and flash of lightning interrupted Anna’s statement, followed by frantic banging on the front door.

Cate’s pulse quickened as she hurried toward it with the others in tow.

She tugged open the door to find Damien collapsed against the jamb. He spilled inside, clutching his stomach.

Cate’s eyes went wide as she stared at the blood splotch on his shirt and the red stains on his fingers. He gasped for breath as he collapsed with a wince.

“Damien!” Cate dropped to her knees next to him. “Oh my goodness. He’s shot.”

“Cate,” he said, reaching for her cheek. Blood smeared across her skin as he grabbed her roughly. “You have to go.”

“What?”

Marcus tugged at her arm. “You have to leave now, Catherine. This is the trouble Mother sensed. You must go.”

“Go where?” she cried as she struggled against him.

“Twenty years,” Damien gasped as Jack pressed his hand against his wound. “Future.”

Cate’s eyes went wide. “What?”

“Catherine, now.”

“Go, Cate, she wasn’t far behind me.”

His statement was punctuated by a bullet buzzing past and smacking into the banister of the grand staircase. Cate ducked instinctively as a spray of wood exploded.

“Take her, I will tend to Damien,” Anna said.

“No! What about Jack? And Damien could die.”

Marcus dragged her as she fought him before he scooped her up into his arms. “Damien is an immortal, he will heal. I will ensure Mr. Reid is safe. You must go, Catherine.”

“No!” She kicked her feet as she craned her neck to study the scene unfolding in the foyer. Jack and Anna dragged Damien into the safety of the sitting room before slamming the doors closed.

A second later, Gianna appeared. She scanned the space, her eyes locking on Cate.

She raised her weapon, but before she could fire, Marcus ducked into the library. The doors slammed shut behind him, and he set her down.

“Break down the doors!” Gianna’s voice commanded.

A loud bang sounded against them as Marcus stretched out his arms. “The moment the portal opens, you must go.”

Cate bobbed her head, and her knees wobbled as the wind picked up, papers swirling.

The dark hole opened in front of her. “It’s open, go!” Marcus shouted.

She glanced back at him, her breath catching in her throat before she stepped inside the portal. As she entered the dark space, the crack of the doors splintering sounded behind her, followed by a single gunshot.

Cate held her breath as the portal snapped shut. She froze, stuck in darkness as she realized she was trapped between time.

* * *

THE END

RECKONING AT DUNHAVEN CASTLE

A CATE KENSIE MYSTERY

CHAPTER 1

A sharp banging against her front doors sent Cate's heart spiraling higher. Her chest constricted, breathing turning difficult as she struggled to focus on the matter at hand.

"Break down the doors!" Gianna's voice commanded from outside Dunhaven Castle's library.

Time stood still as she pressed a hand against her sweat-beaded brow. Her mind swam and the room spun. Damien lay bleeding on her foyer floor after imparting the fateful news that she needed to travel twenty years into the future.

She's wanted to know more, but Marcus had carried her—kicking and screaming—to the library, bolted them inside, and demanded she leave in the time portal.

Marcus stretched out his arms, a twinkling sparkle glowing to life in front of her. "The moment the portal opens, you must go."

Cate's lower lip quivered, her knees buckling as the portal's wind scattered papers around her in a chaotic swirl. She nodded, tears welling in her eyes.

The dark hole yawned in front of her. "It's open, go!" Marcus shouted.

She glanced back at him, her features pinching in anxiety. Taking a deep breath, she turned toward the shimmering veil of the portal. The air thickened as she approached, the boundary between her world and the unknown manifesting as a curtain of swirling mist and pulsing light. With a hesitant step, she crossed the threshold, the familiar world fading into a corridor of eerie luminescence and shadow.

The dark space surrounded her, but before she could navigate it, the sharp crack of the doors splintering sounded behind her.

But what followed made her heart plummet. A single gunshot pierced the air.

The bullet whizzed past her, somehow entering the portal.

She held her breath as suddenly, everything shifted. The portal snapped closed.

Cate froze, stuck in the darkness. In every other instance, Cate had moved forward briefly until she'd stepped into the new time. But Marcus had warned her of the dangers of becoming stuck between times.

She knew the consequences of the portal closing while she remained inside, stuck between two time periods. She may never find her way out. She could be trapped here forever.

Cate gasped, her eyes searching the darkness for a sign of any help. But there was nothing.

Her breathing turned ragged, her stomach lurching. She would never get out of here alive.

She fluttered her eyelashes, a sob escaping her as she pressed a hand against her forehead. The type of death she would die haunted her. Would she starve? Freeze?

A shiver snaked down her spine as the chilly air, normally nothing more than a quick sensation set in.

With her arms wrapped around her, she glanced over her shoulder. She couldn't go back. But would Marcus come through? Could he find her?

She licked her lips, forcing herself to remain calm. She had to think. She couldn't just resign herself to death in between time periods. She had to fight back.

She couldn't wait for Marcus Northcott to find her. She wasn't even certain he could find her.

Her fingers found the wedding ring on her finger, rubbing it. He had no reason to risk his life to come after her. They were married in name only. Perhaps he'd rather she disappear so he could be rid of her.

She let go of the warm gold band, her fingers brushing the diamond ring she sported as the Duchess of Stratfordshire.

The events of her life from the time she'd spoken with William Smythe in her tiny apartment flashed before her. She'd gone from a simple college professor to a countess, and then a duchess. She'd solved murders, thefts, and found her best friend when he'd been taken by The Agency.

Cate lifted her chin. She could find her way out of this. If there was a way, she'd seek it out and escape.

"You have to move forward, Cate. You have to find the way out."

She inched her foot forward, pushing herself to move through the darkness. Tears stung her eyes as she crept forward, finding nothing—no way out, nothing.

"Hello?" she called out, wondering if anyone—or anything—lurked in the darkness.

Nothing answered her. She wasn't certain if that was a good or a bad thing.

She stretched her fingers out in front of her, blindly feeling in the blackness. With a hard swallow, Cate tried to find something, anything to tether herself to the world between times.

There had to be a way to break free from this portal. "Why didn't I ask Marcus about what to do if this happened? I'm certain he would have had some advice."

As she moved forward, her mind returned to the time she'd left behind. What had happened to cause the portal to snap shut?

She'd heard a gunshot. Marcus couldn't have been hit; she'd felt the bullet buzz past her in the time portal. Where had it gone?

Did it disappear into the future, or was it trapped inside here with her?

With a huff, she shook her head. "Does it matter, Cate?"

It didn't, she decided. Her mind was merely searching for anything she could use to distract herself from the terror building within her.

She swallowed hard as emotion finally overcame her. Tears spilled to her cheeks, and she sank to her knees, covering her eyes with her hands as she sobbed.

She doubled over, curling over her legs tightly as she cried until something stopped her. Her heart skipped a beat as she raised her head, her cheeks tear-stained.

Sucking in a sharp breath, sniffing before she strained to listen for the sound she'd heard.

Her eyes widened as the noise cut through the quiet blackness again. Voices.

Her skin puckered into goosebumps. Wiping at her cheeks, she climbed to her feet and held her breath as she waited to hear it again. If she could find the source, maybe she could find her way out.

“Hello?” she called, a new urgency in her voice.

No one answered her, but the voices continued. With her other senses deprived, the echoing voices seemed easier to follow, even with the distortions from the reverberation off the wallless, seemingly endless space.

Her footsteps made no sound as she broke into a light jog. The voices became louder and clearer with every step.

Her breath caught in her throat as she recognized one voice. Her lips curled at the corners, tears filling her eyes again. “Damien,” she whispered.

She raced forward as she heard him speak again. A glimmer of light appeared in the distance.

Cate raced toward it. “Damien!” she shouted.

She hurried toward the glow of light, her features scrunching as she approached it. Her lips parted, and she reached toward the glassy window that separated her from the world.

Her fingers pressed against it, a strange tingling shooting through her body as she touched it. “No,” she murmured as tears fell again. “Oh, no.”

She pressed her hands against the window, staring at the scene on the other side of the window. Damien paced the floor in front of the fireplace in the library. “Was it totally necessary?” he asked someone seated in the armchair.

“Damien! Damien!” Cate screamed, pounding her fists against the glass. “Damien, please hear me!”

“You know it was,” a crisp British voice answered him.

“But...” Damien heaved a sigh. “Sometimes this feels wrong.”

“Stop being a child. You know very well it is not wrong.”

“It feels wrong. She wasn’t that bad.”

“But she wouldn’t marry you, would she?”

Damien flung his arm in the air. “No. But that was on principle. She didn’t want to be tied to The Order.”

Cate crinkled her brow. The Order? She recalled the name of the supernatural organization more powerful than the The Agency. Why was Damien discussing being tied to The Order?

Her eyes widened, her heart skipping a beat as the woman in the chair rose. “Celine?”

Celine flicked a lock of her hair over her shoulder, arching an eyebrow as she sipped at her brandy. “That was Cate’s problem. She should have given in. You would have made a nice husband for her. But she just couldn’t give up those precious principles, could she?”

“And it cost her Dunhaven Castle.”

Celine curled her lips into a devilish smile. “Yes, it did. More for me.”

Cate stared, her heart hammering at the scene. When did Celine side with The Order? And why had she stolen Dunhaven Castle?

Cate shook her head, her fingers digging into her hair. She stumbled away from the window before she backed into another. With a gasp, she twisted to stare into it.

In the scene, Jack stared at a portrait of Cate. “Oh, Lady Cate,” he said with a shake of his head, “you were taken from us too soon.”

Molly wandered into the room with a cup of tea. “Talking to her again?”

“I was. I still can’t get used to the idea that she’s gone.”

Molly offered him a consoling smile. “It’s not your fault, Jack. You couldn’t have prevented that accident that took her from us.”

“Accident?” Cate cried. “I’m dead? What is going on here?”

She shook her head, stumbling away from the window to another. Another nonsensical scene played out where Cate still worked at Aberdeen College, barely scraping by. Still another showed her at Dunhaven Castle but married to Jack.

Her mind swam as she tried to piece together everything she’d seen. What were these places?

Cate raced away from them, her lips forming a grimace as she fought to get into her constricted chest.

She was trapped in a nightmare. And there was no escape from it, it seemed.

Perhaps nothing she’d seen was real. Maybe she’d lost her mind. Could she have been running longer than she realized? Maybe she was dehydrated, suffering from exhaustion.

It could have triggered some strange side effects where she had delusions.

When she no longer heard voices coming from all directions, she slowed, coming to a stop and collapsing to her knees. Her lower lip began to tremble. She reached down to grasp the timepiece hanging around her neck.

Her hand hit the other object now on the chain. Her heart lifted as her trembling fingers lifted the compass closer to her face. In the near blackness, she could barely make out the spinning needle.

"The compass," she said, her voice breathy. "I can use the compass to navigate."

She swallowed hard, sliding her eyes closed as she focused on Dunhaven Castle twenty years in the future. With measured breaths, she slowed her mind, focusing on where she needed to be.

Her breathing turned rhythmic, and she opened her eyes, finding the needle steady and pointing in a specific direction.

She slowly rose to her feet, the needle wobbling. She stiffened, desperate to keep it steady. With a lick of her lips, she managed to stabilize it.

Blowing out a shaky breath, she inched forward in the direction it indicated. Her muscles began to ache as she held them taut, reminding herself to breathe with every step she took.

Light grew in the distance, and her lips curled into a smile. It must be the other time. She continued forward toward it, dropping the compass as the pinpoint grew stronger and brighter.

As she approached it, she noted the flickering flames of torches and the stretch of long stone walls. Cate's footsteps slowed, her lips parting.

She studied the opening in the stone when movement caught her eye. She shifted her gaze to the side of the gaping black hole.

A cloaked figure floated toward her. She backed up a step, her eyes going rounder.

"Welcome, traveler," the creature said.

"Hi," Cate breathed.

"You wish passage."

"Yes, I need to get to—"

"The labyrinth knows your destination. But in order to arrive, you must pass through it. Solve it and find your freedom. Fail to do so, and you will remain my prisoner forever."

Cate swallowed hard, her heart hammering against her ribs. “What do I need to do?”

CHAPTER 2

Cate licked her lips as the wispy figure floated closer to her. Red eyes pierced through her as she swallowed hard, curling her fingers into fists.

“The answer is simple,” the creature growled. “You must traverse the labyrinth of time.”

Cate glanced over the cloaked figure’s shoulder, her stomach plummeting as she stared at the opening in the stone wall. Shrieks sounded from inside, making her tremble. “Is there any other way?”

“You may stay here forever as my prisoner.”

“That’s not an option,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “How do I know this isn’t a trap? How do I know that I won’t walk into that labyrinth and become trapped. Or that if I make it out, you’ll make good on your promise.”

“I have no reason to lie.”

“I don’t know that. I need a contract. Something that binds you to your word.”

The cloaked figure remained silent for a moment before he reached into his robe, removing a scroll. As he let it unravel, Cate’s eyes widened. “Why is it so long?”

“It outlines the details of what you are accepting. You must complete the labyrinth and emerge on the opposite side before you will be permitted to leave this realm.”

“And you? What must you do?”

“Let you go if you can make it,” the hooded figure said.

Cate stared at the contract before she nodded. She had no other choice—she had to go through the labyrinth. She had to make it to the other side so she could make it to Dunhaven Castle in the future. She needed to save her friends. She needed to defeat The Agency. And she needed to find the source of her visions.

“Fine. I agree.”

The hooded figure produced a quill, thrusting it toward Cate. “Sign your name, then I will make my mark.”

Cate scribbled her name across the leathery paper before the creature scrawled his.

“It is done. You may begin.”

Cate nodded before she stepped forward toward the entrance, her stomach twisting into a knot. She glanced over her shoulder, eyeing the creature again.

The words sent a shiver snaking down her spine as she returned her gaze to the blackness between the two stone walls. Her breath caught in her throat, and she struggled to stop her lower lip from trembling. But she had to move forward. She had to defeat this labyrinth. She had to make it to the future.

She sucked in as deep as breath as she could manage and stepped forward, disappearing into the maze of stone. She navigated the labyrinth's twisting corridors, her footsteps echoing on the damp, cobblestone floor. Each turn revealed walls cloaked in creeping vines that whispered secrets of the past. Shadows danced at the edge of her torchlight, forming shapes that seemed almost human, only to dissolve into the mist when she dared look directly at them.

As she hit her first dead end, her shoulders slumped. She twisted to return in the direction she'd come, suddenly finding herself unable to move.

She jerked her body, but it felt like she was in quicksand. Cate swallowed hard. Had this been the trick? Was there no way out of the labyrinth?

Noise bombarded her as she fought to free herself from whatever had a hold on her. As she struggled, her features pinched. She held her breath, realizing what she was listening to. The awful screech of metal on metal following by the forlorn sound of a horn blaring through the quiet night made her stomach churn. This was a memory from another time. Her parents' death.

Tears welled in her eyes, spilling over onto her cheeks. She slid her eyes closed, pressing her lips together. The memory replayed over and over and over again. And she found it more and more difficult to move from the spot she was stuck in.

She screamed, a raw, guttural cry that echoed off the labyrinth's uncaring walls. As she struggled, the quicksand grip of her fears tightened. With each desperate tug, memories flooded her mind more violently — the crunch of metal, the shattering of glass, the last time she saw her parents' faces. Panic clawed at her chest, her breathing ragged.

She chewed her lower lip, summoning the future memory that usually soothed her when she suffered from visions.

She sucked in slow steady breaths, navigating the maze of her mind to find it and latch onto it. Her mind filled in the spaces of her private sitting room at Dunhaven Castle. She felt the smooth, polished wood of the mantel under her fingertips.

Her gaze shifted across the room, focusing on the man there. Her lips curled into a soft smile.

As her mind played the memory over and over, the grip on her muscles lessened. Finally, she found herself able to move away from the dead end.

When she turned the corner, Cate collapsed against the cold stone. Her pulse still raced from the experience.

"Don't run into another dead end, Cate," she chided herself before running her fingers through her hair.

She reached down, grabbing her timepiece again to steady her when she shifted her hand to her compass. She lifted it, wondering if it could lead her through the labyrinth with limited frustrations.

"Come on, come on," she said, willing the compass to steady and point in the direction she needed to walk.

She struggled to steady her breathing, forcing her heart rate lower until the needled stopped its wobbling and pointed in a single direction.

Cate swallowed hard, attempting to keep her focus as she tried to move along the correct route. It was harder than she expected. She found herself unable to move forward along the correct course, running into walls at every turn.

She skirted around an opening in the wall, moving forward toward her goal only to find herself stuck again. She backtracked before another horrible memory could hit her and make her lose focus.

As Cate turned the corner, the stone walls disappeared, replaced by something more familiar. She reached out, her brows furrowing, to touch the walls of the hallway containing her bedroom at Dunhaven Castle.

“What is this?” she breathed.

She glanced down at the compass, its needle gyrating in a frantic dance. Clutching it tightly, she shut her eyes, drawing deep, measured breaths to calm the storm within her. The labyrinth seemed to pulse with a life of its own, the stones whispering ancient curses. Just as she centered her focus, a piercing shriek sliced through the silence, a sound so despairing it seemed to claw at her very soul. Cate’s heart thundered against her ribcage, a primal fear rising as the echo of the scream reverberated off the unseen labyrinth walls.

She dropped the compass, racing toward the sound with an urgency that panicked her. “I’m coming!” she shouted, uncertain as to why she’d spoken the words.

She rounded the corner, barreling toward the double doors at the end. She recognized the scenario as the one from her visions. Would she actually make any sense of it this time?

As her fingers wrapped around the cold door handle, she hesitated, puffing for breath as she pushed the door open.

“Laura?” she called.

A figure huddled in the bed across the space. A light bloomed to life, and she found herself staring at a face very similar to her own, only younger.

The girl’s mouth opened, starting to speak, when the entire image disappeared from her view.

“No!” Cate called, her fingers curling into fists. “No! I need to see more.”

With a shake of her head, she leaned against the wall, frustration roiling inside her.

“Focus, Cate.” She thought of a future memory, using it to calm her nerves before she forced herself to focus the needle on the compass.

“All right, come on. You can do this,” she encouraged herself.

As she stepped forward, she consciously tried to move in the direction of the needle despite any obstacles she found. She didn't want to run the risk of becoming trapped in another memory or vision.

She used every available resource to move only along the route the compass pointed, including scaling a dead tree and leaping across one of the stone walls to maintain her course.

The number of passages became more and more confusing as she passed the center point of the maze.

"Halfway there, Cate. Keep moving," she murmured to herself.

The needle wobbled as she was faced with two parallel corridors that went in opposite directions at their ends. "Which one?"

She pressed a hand against her forehead, before she finally picked the one on the right. As she moved forward, the compass needle pointed forward. The corners of her lips curled until she turned the corner at the end.

Her smile faded, replaced by a wide-eyed stare. In front of her stood a snarling wolf, crouched and ready to attack.

Cate slowly backed toward the corner. The wolf stalked forward, ready to give chase.

She'd never outrun him. She'd never get away.

As she smacked into the corner, she crouched down into it. Could she slink away before the wolf got to her?

The growl turned more menacing, and the wolf sprang forward, galloping toward her. Cate covered her head with her arms, waiting for teeth to sink into her skin.

She peered out between her arms, her breath catching as the wolf leapt toward her. He disappeared a moment later, dissolving into the wall behind her.

She glanced over her shoulder before she flicked her gaze down the corridor, finding the wolf snarling at her again.

"It's fake," she said.

With a shaky breath, she rose to her feet, slowly walking toward the animal. It growled menacingly before he crouched lower.

Cate held her ground, moving forward until the wolf raced toward her, passing through her before he leapt into the wall and disappeared.

She picked up the compass, a grin forming on her features as she used it to navigate the final few corridors and step out of the maze.

As the stone walls fell away, she whooped. "I did it!"

The cloaked creature appeared in front of her. "You cheated."

"I did not. I made it through the labyrinth."

"You did not inform me you had the compass."

"You didn't ask, and that contract didn't say I couldn't use it. I made it through your labyrinth. A deal is a deal. I want out of here."

The creature growled before he waved a bony hand into the blackness. A glowing portal formed. "Be gone."

She raced toward it without another word, entering through the sparkling portal and walking straight through the blackness.

Bright light seared her eyes seconds later, and she lifted an arm to shield herself.

Through tears, she spotted the distorted form of Dunhaven Castle in the distance, and her heart leapt with joy.

"Catherine?" Marcus called.

She shifted her gaze away from the castle, finding him striding toward her. Had she gone to the wrong time? He looked no different. But why would he be at Dunhaven Castle twenty years in the future?

"Marcus?"

"Catherine," he said, relief in his voice as he reached her and pulled her closer. "You made it."

She settled against him, finding unexpected comfort with him after her ordeal. "I did. Barely. But I made it. Is this the right time? Twenty years...I was supposed to come forward twenty years."

"Yes," he said as he pulled back from her, staring down at her.

"Good," she said with a sigh of relief.

As heat washed over, awkwardness swirling within her, she skirted around him, hurrying toward the sprawling form of Dunhaven Castle on the hill ahead of her.

"Catherine, wait," Marcus warned as he followed close behind.

"Wait for what?" Cate called over her shoulder as she continued her hard pace toward the comfort the castle promised.

"There are things we should discuss."

Cate bobbed her head. "We can discuss them once I've settled inside. I just want to sit down and take a breath."

"But—"

“But what?” Cate interrupted, flinging her hands out. “It hasn’t been that long, right? I still own Dunhaven Castle, don’t I?”

“Yes, you do,” Marcus conceded, “but– “

“That’s all I need to know,” Cate said with a curt nod. “We’ll discuss everything else later.”

She reached the castle, pushing through the front doors and into the familiar foyer, breathing a little easier. Her lips turned up at the corners as she strode across the marble floor, ducking into the hallway on the right.

Her muscles began to relax, the familiarity of her home soothing her. Dunhaven Castle still stood, and it was still hers. She’d deal with the rest later.

She breathed in the familiar scent of her home as she hurried down the hall, seeking the comfort of the library’s leather armchairs.

When she reached the double doors, she swung them open. As she stepped inside, a young man rose from one of the chairs. No more than seventeen, his chiseled jaw and dark hair reminded her of someone.

He peered at her with wide blue eyes. “Mother!”

Heat washed over Cate at the greeting. When had she had a son?

CHAPTER 3

The boy took a few steps toward her, his features pinching. “Mother!” he exclaimed, his blue eyes fixed on her. “You’re back. We did not expect you.”

Marcus caught up to Cate as she hesitated in the doorway, her lower lip bobbing up and down as she struggled to make sense of the situation. Why was he calling her mother?

“Father!” the boy said, shifting his gaze to Marcus.

Marcus held his hand up, nodding. “Logan, give us a minute, won’t you? Your mother isn’t feeling well.”

Logan shifted his weight from foot to foot, his eyes falling on Cate, concern etched in his young features. Cate studied him, her knees wobbling. Of course, he looked familiar. He looked like Marcus, only without the man’s dark eyes.

He’d called him father. And her mother. But...that couldn’t be.

Their marriage wasn’t real. They were on the verge of a divorce in her time.

Marcus grasped Cate’s arm and led her down the hall and across the foyer to the sitting room. Her stomach twisted with every step as logic defied her.

She pressed her palm to her forehead as she stood in stunned silence while Marcus closed the door behind them.

He strode across the room and poured her a brandy, holding it out toward her. She licked her lips, accepting the proffered glass with a shaky hand.

“You should sit,” he suggested.

She stared blankly ahead before she flicked her gaze to him. The resemblance between him and Logan was unmistakable. The teen boy in the library had the same chiseled features, the same dark hair. The only difference was his eye color, reminiscent of the blue eyes of the MacKenzies. Closer to Cate’s own eye color.

The words echoed in her mind again. Mother. Father. No, it couldn’t be. She must have taken a wrong turn. Or the time wraith had tricked her. Perhaps he had sent her into one of the places she’d seen when she’d explored the time portal—the ones where nothing made sense.

Cate slid her eyes closed, shaking her head. “Sit down? Are you serious?”

“You are likely in shock. Both from the time portal and the experience with Logan. I told you there were things to be discussed.”

“Things to be discussed?” she repeated, her voice trembling as much as her hand, causing her brandy to dance dangerously close to the rim. “Are you joking? Marcus, there is a child in the library. My child!”

She paused, her mind reeling before she sank onto the edge of the loveseat, her voice turning breathy. “Our child.”

Marcus remained silent as she stared into the brandy before downing it in on gulp. She waved a shaky finger at him. “Wait, when I was in the time portal, I ran into a bunch of worlds where things were all mixed up. One where I’d died, one where Celine owned Dunhaven Castle and had a British accent, and one where Jack and I were married. Is that what this is? One of those mixed-up worlds?”

Marcus shook his head. “No. This is the correct time band.”

“Are you sure?” She wrinkled her nose as she waited for the answer.

“Yes,” he answered. “This is the same time band you left twenty years ago after Damien told you to come here.”

“Oh,” she murmured, covering her open mouth with a still shaking hand. “We have a child?”

“No,” Marcus answered with a shake of his head as he leaned against the mantel.

Cate’s brow furrowed as she clung to the momentary idea that it had been a big mix-up, and her life wasn’t spiraling out of control. Perhaps the blue-eyed boy’s exclamation in the library was not meant for her.

“We have three children.”

The statement rendered her speechless, her jaw falling open as she stared at him, the words not making any sense to her.

“How did this happen?” she finally managed, her voice just above a whisper.

Marcus arched an eyebrow. “Really, Catherine, I thought you more learned than that.”

She pressed her lips together, shaking her head at him. “That’s not what I meant. I mean, how did we stay married and have three kids?!”

Marcus opened his mouth to answer when the doors to the sitting room burst open. Cate’s eyes widened as a teen resembling her stepped inside, followed by a younger girl, her dark hair and dark eyes a match to Marcus’s.

“Daddy!” the older girl exclaimed, a broad grin on her face.

Cate’s eyes widened as the younger version of herself sprinted across the room and flung her arms around Marcus’s neck. She pulled her chin back to her chest as the man kissed her cheek and pulled her into a fatherly embrace. “Hello, darling.”

The smaller child raced to Cate’s side, interrupting her slack-jawed watch of the events between Marcus and the other girl.

“Mummy!” the child cried, leaping into Cate’s lap and flinging her arms around Cate’s neck in a tight hug.

“Oh!” Cate exclaimed as she set her empty glass down on the coffee table and wrapped her arms around the child who very clearly wanted her attention.

“When did you arrive?” the older girl asked Marcus. “We weren’t expecting you.”

“Mummy, will you play a game with me?” the child in Cate’s lap asked.

“Not now, Anna,” Marcus answered. “Your mother is rather tired from traveling. We should let her rest.”

“Ohhh,” the child groaned with a pout. “But Daddy—”

“Stop whining, dear. Laura, take your sister to the nursery, please,” Marcus said.

Laura’s lips formed a pout, her shoulders slumping slightly, though she complied with Marcus’s request, holding her hand out to the younger girl. “Come on, Anna.”

“No.” Anna shifted in Cate’s lap, an exaggerated frown on her features. She crossed her arms and leaned into Cate.

“Anna!” Laura cried, impatience in her voice.

“Anna, be a good girl and go with your sister to the nursery. Mummy will spend time with you later.”

Anna wrinkled her nose, shooting Cate a glance. Cate nodded, offering her a fleeting smile, making a promise she wasn’t certain she could keep. The child gave in and slid off Cate’s lap, grabbing her sister’s hand. “Fine.”

“Good girl,” Marcus said as Laura led the child from the room. The older girl glanced over her shoulder one last time as she hovered in the doorway, her crystal blue eyes focusing on Cate before she pulled the child into the foyer.

Marcus crossed the room and closed the doors behind them. Cate slumped back against the couch, covering her face with her hands. “Why is this happening?”

“You traveled twenty years into the future, and you refused to discuss the changes that had occurred in that span before storming into the castle,” Marcus answered, matter-of-factly.

Cate let her hands fall to her thighs with a sigh. “That’s not helpful.”

“Helpful or not, it is the truth. I’m surprised, Catherine, given your cautious nature that you expected life to remain unchanged after nearly two decades.”

“Again, not helpful. I did not expect this to have been the change. I’m surprised given my cautious nature that we have three children. Maybe I should leave. I can’t handle this. I don’t even know their names!”

“The oldest is Logan, after your father. He is seventeen. Then Laura, after your mother, who is fifteen, and then Anna after mine. She is eight. And I would not advise leaving now that they have seen you.”

Cate crinkled her brow. “Why not?”

“Had you not come inside, we could have had you stay elsewhere, and the children would have been none the wiser. But you cannot disappear now that they have seen you.”

“Why? Where am I?” Cate shook her head, pressing a hand against her forehead. “Where is there real mother?”

“You are their real mother, Catherine. If you are asking where your counterpart from this time is, she is in Germany. There have been some... complications with a supernatural issue. She is recovering there. Perfectly fine, just in need of Mother's care. We did not tell the children all of the details."

Cate let her head fall back against the pillows, her eyes squeezing shut. "Perfect."

"Laura, in particular, would be devastated if you left now."

Cate popped her eyes open, focusing on Marcus. "What's wrong with Laura?"

"She is quite in need of her mother."

Cate slapped a palm to her forehead. "Oh, great. Too bad her mother isn't here."

"To Laura, her mother is here."

"I am not that poor child's mother. I barely know her."

"Catherine, she does not realize that," Marcus answered. "And she misses you terribly."

"Why not? Surely, I look different. I should look younger to them, right?"

Marcus offered her a soft smile, his thumb caressing her cheek. "You did not think I would allow time to ravage any of your beauty, did you?"

Before Cate could answer, the doors popped open. A redhead, her hair pulled into a French twist wearing a chic business suit, stepped inside.

Cate's eyes went wide. "Molly?"

"Welcome home, Your Grace," Molly answered with a broad smile. "I hope I'm not interrupting, but I wanted to check with you about dinner. Will you be dining as a family this evening or would you prefer a tray in your room?"

"Uh—" Cate mumbled, trying to imagine sitting down to dinner as a family while she struggled to remember her children's names.

"Her Grace will take a tray in her room. I am not certain she's feeling up to dining with the children."

Molly nodded. "Of course. Is there any unpacking I can assist with?"

"No, Molly, I—" Cate started when Marcus interrupted her.

"That will be all, Molly. Her Grace can discuss further plans with you later. And as soon as I have her settled, I would like a word."

Molly smiled and nodded, reaching out to squeeze Cate's hand. "Good to have you back."

Cate collapsed onto the couch again as Molly left the room. "Please tell me we at least hired someone to help Molly with the meals since she now has three children to feed.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow. “Molly oversees a staff of twenty, dear. She is now Head Housekeeper. She rarely makes meals, though she does bake cookies with the children on occasion.”

Cate sat in stunned silence, trying to fathom the depth of the changes that had occurred in the last twenty years. Not only had she stayed married to Marcus—why, she still didn’t know—but she’d also had three children with him, and her once-simple staff of three had grown into a team of twenty, all of whom were overseen by Molly. “I’m a stranger my own life.”

“You should rest.”

Cate stared at the woodgrain of the coffee table as she gave a slow nod. “Yes, I think I will.”

Slowly, she climbed to her feet. “Am I at least in the same bedroom?”

“Yes,” Marcus answered as he snaked an arm around her, his hand resting gently on her back.

“Thank goodness for small things,” she said with a shake of her head.

“I’ll walk you up.”

She rubbed her temples while she considered declining. Fear of running into the children again as she snaked through the halls made her change her mind. She still wasn’t certain she trusted herself enough to deal with them. Was Laura the older or the younger?

She nodded in response to his statement and allowed him to lead her to the foyer. “So, Laura is the older girl.”

“Yes, dear,” Marcus said with a nod.

Cate bobbed her head as they climbed the stairs. “Okay, and she’s fifteen. And the boy...Logan...he’s seventeen. Almost an adult. Is he going to college?”

“Of course, Catherine. He is going to Oxford after he finishes his final semester at Eton.”

Cate’s eyes went wide. “Like where the royals go to school?”

“Certainly,” Marcus answered. “What else would you expect for a Northcott?”

“Right,” she said, her mind still wrapping around the situation. As they wound through the halls, Cate glanced out over the property. Five children frolicked in the yard.

Cate stopped, her hand falling to the stone sill. She recognized the three she’d already met. She shook her head, correcting herself: her children not the children.

But the two others, one red-headed girl and one red-headed boy who both to be around the age of her middle child, ran around with them.

“I thought you said we had three kids.”

“We do. Logan, Laura—”

Cate waved a hand in the air. “And Anna. Yes, but who are the other two?”

“Those are the twins. Malcom and Maggie.”

“Whose twins?” Cate asked.

“Perhaps we should discuss it later.”

Cate raised her eyebrows, her lips parting. “Are you joking? It can’t possibly be more of a shock than finding out we have three kids together.”

Marcus offered her an unimpressed stare, his lips drawn into a thin line. “Fine. They are Molly and Jack’s children.”

Cate snapped her gaze back to the children playing outside. “So, Molly and Jack got married and had twins?”

Marcus guided her away from the window. “May I remind you that you insisted...again.”

“It’s fine. I’m not shocked. I knew they were seeing each other. I just...twins. Everything is so different. When I left, both Molly and I were single and childless. Now...”

“They live in the east wing. You were not single.”

“Marcus, I practically was. We were nearly divorced.” Cate’s forehead wrinkled as she considered the changes at Dunhaven Castle in two decades. Her head spun, and her stomach somersaulted.

He led her into her suite. “We will discuss it later. You should rest. I will see that you are not disturbed.”

Cate nodded, and Marcus departed from the room, closing the doors behind her.

She scanned the space. It looked so much the same, yet so many things had changed. Pictures littered the mantel.

She picked up the closet, smiling at it. The picture of her and Molly cheek-to-cheek at her first New Year’s Eve party in the castle warmed her. She pressed it to her chest as she eyed the rest of the framed photographs on the mantel finding a picture of her and Marcus in front of a large Christmas tree in formalwear. The stunning diamonds around her neck, and the massive ring on her finger sparkled.

In the next picture, her three children beamed at the camera while sitting in the library.

Another showed the Reid children with her three in front of a Christmas tree in the sitting room. Her youngest hugged Jack and Molly's daughter, while their son first bumped with Logan.

The last picture was a large, framed photo of Cate and Marcus with their three children. The smiling family appeared happy with Marcus and Logan standing tall behind an armchair while Cate grinned from her seat in the center, her arms wrapped around her two daughters who each perched on the arms.

Her eyes gravitated to the gold band on her ring finger, eclipsed by the massive diamond in front of it. She grabbed the photograph, tracing her smiling face.

She looked so happy. But how had it happened?

Marcus was in love with another woman. How had they built a family together?

The thought plagued her as she stalked to her chaise and collapsed onto it. Her stomach churned as too many thoughts crowded into her mind. With the photo of her and Molly still clutched to her chest, she closed her eyes, drifting off to sleep.

Her dreams were filled with frightening images of the time labyrinth, her children hating her once they found out she was a fraud, and all her happy pictures being nothing more than a fraud.

When she opened her eyes to a darkened room, she found a figure looming over her. Her breath caught in her throat, and she stifled a scream as she stared up at the dark person.

Who was in her bedroom?

CHAPTER 4

Cate's muscles stiffened as she pushed herself sit higher, her trembling hand searching for the light. Her heart rose into her throat as her chest constricted.

Light bloomed to life, blinding her for a moment before she stared up into her own face. Her features twisted as she desperately tried to make sense of what was happening.

"Mummy?" Laura asked, her features pinching with concern as she eased onto the edge of the chaise. "Are you okay? Are you sick?"

Cate slid her eyes closed, a long exhale escaping her as everything flooded back to her. She was twenty-years in the future, and that wasn't her face, it was her daughter's.

With a lick of her lips, she shook her head. "I'm not sick. I'm sorry, I was asleep. You startled me."

Laura's forehead creased more as she stared at Cate, her features turning pained. The door to the hall creaked open further, and Marcus strode in, his footsteps faltering as he spotted Laura.

His eyebrow arched. "Was I unclear that your mother was not to be disturbed?"

"I'm sorry, Daddy, but—"

"No buts, Laura. When I said your mother was not to be disturbed, I meant she was not to be disturbed."

Laura's features pinched, her lower lip trembling.

“It’s all right,” Cate said, brushing a lock of hair over her daughter’s shoulder. “I’m afraid I was asleep, though, and Laura startled me.”

“Which is exactly why I gave specific instructions for you to allow your mother to rest. Now, Laura, it is time for you to get ready for dinner.”

Laura shifted her gaze from Marcus back to Cate. “See you at dinner, Mummy.”

“Oh—” Cate said as Molly flitted into the room with a tray and a grin.

“Your dinner, Your Grace.”

Laura’s lips tugged into a frown as she tilted her head, staring at Cate. “You’re not coming to dinner?”

“Your mother is very tired, Laura. She needs to rest.”

Laura’s voice cracked with quiet defiance. “I’ll stay here, with her.”

“No, you will not,” Marcus answered, his voice firm. “You will go and ready for dinner. We will dine as a family.”

“Without Mummy,” Laura retorted, her voice strained.

“Laura,” Marcus warned.

Anna lingered at the doorway, her small frame dwarfed by the hall’s expanse. “Mummy, aren’t you joining us for dinner?” Her voice was a blend of hope and worry, tugging at Cate’s newly awakened maternal instincts.

Marcus heaved a sigh, his jaw clenching. He opened his mouth to reply, but Cate answered first, trying to diffuse the situation. “Uh, not tonight. Tomorrow, I will. I promise.”

Laura stared at her with glassy eyes. Cate stroked a lock of her hair. “I promise.”

“Girls, you should ready for dinner,” Marcus said as he pressed a hand against Laura’s back.

She frowned but rose and headed for the door, taking Anna’s hand in hers. “Come on, Anna.”

Molly set the tray down on Cate’s side table. “I’ll check on them,” she said with a wink. “You rest.”

Cate clicked her tongue as she swung her legs over the chaise, letting her head fall into her hands with a long exhale. “Ohhh, this is not going so well, is it?”

“It will be fine, Catherine. You are overwhelmed. You will adjust.”

“I’m not so sure. Marcus, I still don’t understand what happened. We were about to get a divorce. You’re in love with someone else. The only reason we didn't get divorced was because your mother showed up."

"That is not true, Catherine."

"What?" she asked, her features pinching. "It's all true."

"Yet, it is not."

Cate leapt to her feet, pacing the floor. "We had the divorce papers in our hands. Your mother showed up. I said we couldn't get divorced with her at Dunhaven Castle, and then you said, I'd prefer we did not with my mother here."

"That is not what I said."

Cate slid her head forward, prodding him to explain.

"I said I would prefer not to divorce. Period. There was no caveat."

Cate pressed a hand to her forehead. "What? No, that's not—"

"It is, dear. I did not wish to divorce you, I only would have had you preferred it."

"What about Celine?"

"What about Celine?" he echoed.

"You love her."

He shook his head. "No. I did not. I never loved Celine. And she is happily married to that idiot Buckley."

Cate arched an eyebrow.

"What? I still do not like the man," Marcus said with a shrug as the door creaked again, two little dogs racing in.

Cate's eyes went wide as she stared down them. "Riley? Bailey?"

She collapsed on the chaise as they leapt up to lick her cheek. She gathered them in her arms. "How?"

"I could not bear to see you saddened by their deaths. They will live as long as you do, dear." He offered her a slight smile, his finger tracing her chin.

Her eyebrows knitted as she studied her husband, her entire perspective suddenly shifting. All the emotions she'd felt, everything that she'd tried to deny about her growing affection for him, he'd felt the same way about her?

"You should eat. I will ask the children to allow you to rest for the evening. Now, I must go to dinner."

"Of course," she said with a nod as she rubbed the soft fur of her dogs' heads.

He strode to the door, and before he stepped out, she called to him. "Hey, Marcus?"

He twisted to glance at her over his shoulder.

"Thanks." She offered him a smile, and expression that he returned before he stepped from the room.

Silence pervaded the space, and she smiled down at her dogs before she pulled the tray onto her lap and grabbed her fork.

With things slightly clearer, the tension between her shoulders relaxed a little. She still had a long road ahead of her, an uphill battle as she struggled to learn everything she'd missed in the last twenty years and figure out why Damien had sent her here.

Why this time? Why now?

A burst of cinnamon and brown sugar mixed with yam exploded on her tongue as the edges of her vision darkened. She sucked in a breath, the vision of her racing down the hall racing through her mind.

She focused on her future memory, one that now made far more sense than it had before as she fought to stay conscious.

She managed to keep her eyes open, despite exhaustion coursing through her, but the pieces of the puzzle fell into place. She hadn't seen herself in that room. She'd seen her daughter. It was her daughter's scream that called to her, it had been her daughter's room she raced to, and it had been her daughter's frightened face that had greeted her.

"Laura," she whispered. Marcus's words echoed in her mind. Laura is quite in need of her mother. "Why?"

She'd have to ask Marcus about it later.

For now, it was all she could do to move the fork from her plate to her lips. She pushed through, finishing the meal and shifting the tray onto her table.

With a deep sigh, she rose from the chaise and shuffled into her bedroom. Before she could search for her pajamas, a quiet knock sounded at the door before Andrea let herself into the suite. "Your Grace."

"Andrea," Cate said with a broad grin. "Oh, I'm so glad to see you."

"Well, that is wonderful to hear. I hope you were not able to rummage through that wardrobe on your own."

"Heavens no," Cate said with a chuckle as Andrea tugged open the tall door and removed her pajamas.

"Now, let's get you changed."

As Andrea helped her switch from her clothes to her pajamas, soothing her nerves with the familiarity, Cate relaxed a little more. When she finally climbed into bed, the shock of what happened had already begun to wear off.

Maybe after a good night's sleep, she could tackle the reason she'd been sent here. She relaxed back into the pillows when the door to her suite creaked open. She assumed it would be Molly collecting her tray, but instead, she spotted her daughter, now wearing her robe and pajamas. The girl peered into the bedroom, her hands clasping and unclasping. "Mummy?"

"Laura," Cate said, pushing herself a little higher in bed.

The girl inched closer to the bed. "I know Daddy said we should leave you alone but—"

She licked her lips, her gaze sliding sideways as her eyes turned glassy again.

Cate shifted over, patting the bed next to her. "Sit down."

She hurried to claim the spot Cate offered, her fingers toying with the ties of the robe she wore. Cate glanced sideways at her daughter, trying to be supportive in some way. She reached out to stroke her hair. "Is everything okay, Laura?"

Laura didn't answer, her lower lip trembling.

"Laura? What is it?"

Laura pressed her lips together before she twisted to face Cate, a tear falling to her cheek. "Are you and Daddy getting a divorce?"

"What?" Cate asked, her head shaking. "No. Why would you think that?"

"Because you were gone. And now you're back, and Daddy keeps telling us not to talk to you. And earlier when Anna and I left, I came back, and I overheard you say you had the papers already." A sob escaped her daughter as she wiped at her cheeks, more tears falling.

"Oh, sweetie, what you heard...you misunderstood."

Laura studied her face.

"We're not getting a divorce, I promise."

Laura collapsed into Cate's arms, and Cate snuggled her closer, stroking her hair. "It's okay, Laura. You can stop worrying, okay?"

"Mummy?" a new voice said.

Cate glanced to the foot of her bed, finding Anna in her pajamas. The child glanced from Laura back to Cate before she sniffled.

Cate held her free arm out, and the little girl scrambled up onto the bed, snuggling into Cate's other side.

With a deep exhale, she cuddled the two girls closer. Within minutes, they'd both fallen asleep in her arms.

She shifted her gaze from one to the other. Maybe parenting wouldn't be as bad as she thought.

A smile curled her lips as the door to her room creaked again, thudding softly closed. "Catherine, I have—"

Cate shushed him, waving a finger in the air.

Marcus froze in the doorway, his eyes shifting between the two girls.

"They just fell asleep," Cate whispered.

"I am sorry," he answered in a low voice. "I told them specifically not to come. I will take them back to their own beds."

"It's okay," Cate said. "Leave them here."

"Are you certain?" Marcus asked as he stroked a lock of Anna's hair after easing onto the edge of the bed.

Cate bobbed her head. "Yes. Leave them. You were right, they don't understand."

Marcus eyed the two girls in her arms. "I think they understand perfectly. Their mother is home."

"I think I know what was wrong with Laura," Cate whispered as Marcus leaned back against the pillows, leaning closer to rub Anna's arm.

"She confided in you? She wouldn't tell me anything," Marcus said.

"She thought we were getting a divorce."

Marcus puckered his lips as he glanced at Laura before he focused his dark eyes on Cate. "Are we?"

"No," Cate answered. "Right? Did I misunderstand the conversation earlier?"

He shook his head as he let his arm fall around her, tugging the group of them closer. "No, you did not. And if I have my way, we will not divorce."

"If Laura has her way, too. And I told her she did."

"And what about your way?" Marcus asked, shifting a lock of Cate's hair away from her face.

She studied his face, pressing her lips together as her features pinched. "I had those papers drawn up because I thought you wanted to return to your life—to marry Celine."

"Mother was correct about her bringing out the worst in me."

“You could have said something. Remember how we were supposed to be honest and open?”

“That applies to us both, dear,” he said as he tapped her nose affectionately.

Cate laid her cheek against Laura’s hair. “There is something else we need to discuss.”

“What is that?”

“The visions I have been having. They’re about Laura. I finally understand now that I’ve met her. It’s her room I’m running to, it’s her frightened face I’m seeing.”

Marcus’s fingers gently stroked her hair. “Yes, I told you there is something going on with her. But she refuses to confide in me.”

Cate knitted her brows. “Do you think it was the divorce thing?”

Marcus narrowed his eyes. “Sadly, I do not believe so.”

“And she’s said nothing?”

“Nothing,” he answered. “Not even to your counterpart from this time. She refuses to speak of it.”

Cate glanced down at her sleeping daughter. “What could it be?”

She stroked Laura’s hair, wondering if the girl may confide in her. Had Laura’s problem been the reason Damien sent her to this time or was it something else?

CHAPTER 5

Cate paced the floor of her suite, the late morning sun streaking the floor with long shadows as she chewed her lower lip. The conversation she'd shared with Marcus last night still echoed in her mind.

Her visions of Laura had been terrifying, and she hadn't yet faced that moment. Would it still occur now that she was in the future or had her trip through time changed everything?

She spun on her heel, ambling in the opposite direction, her brows knitting tightly. It couldn't be her fear over Cate and Marcus divorcing. Both she and Cate had been terrified in her visions. The reaction seemed far too extreme for something like divorcing parents.

Despite it being a big thing for a teen, she doubted it struck that much terror into Laura's heart.

So, then, what could it be, she asked her as she huffed out a breath.

While she'd felt a strong maternal connection to the children when she'd met them, she felt woefully inadequate to tackle any problems with them. After all, they may be her children, but she didn't know them. She hadn't raised them.

Laura hadn't even confided in her counterpart in this time. What made Cate think the girl would confide in her?

She slapped her thighs with a heavy sigh as she returned to the mantel to study the pictures, her heart heavy as she tried to determine how she could help the poor girl.

As she rubbed at her forehead, the door popped open, and Marcus strode inside. "Catherine, you have barely come out of this room. Is something wrong?"

"No," she said, tugging back one corner of her lips. "I'm just...you know, avoiding our kids."

He wiggled his eyebrows, his features curving into an amused smile. "And here I thought we had combatted that issue last night."

She leaned an elbow against the mantel, fluttering her eyelashes. "Well, we had until I started to overthink everything."

"Overthink what?"

Cate rolled her eyes. "Everything. I must be here because of the visions I had about Laura, but how can I get her to confide in me when she won't even talk to her real mother."

"You are her real mother, Catherine."

"You know what I mean. The other version of me, the one who raised her, who knows her. She won't say a word to her. There is no way she's going to tell me what's wrong. She's going to be able to tell that I'm a fraud from a mile away."

"That did not seem to be the case last night. She slept quite soundly with you back home."

Cate furrowed her brow. "She hasn't been sleeping?"

"No. She awakens in the middle of the night screaming."

Cate pressed her lips together, the detail fitting with her vision. "That is exactly what my visions are like. I'm running to her because she's screaming in the middle the night."

"You should not doubt your ability to get through to her. It is obvious how deeply you care about her."

"But I don't know her, Marcus. You do, the me from this time does, but I don't. I don't know her favorite food or her favorite show. I don't know if she was afraid of monsters under her bed as a kid or the dark. I don't know anything about her." Cate held back the sob forming inside her as she shook her head.

"I am not certain you need to know her favorite food to comfort her, Catherine. She loves you, and she can feel that you love her, too." He stalked closer to her.

"You love her, and she won't confide in you."

“No, she will not,” he answered. “But she has always been closer to you.”

Cate arched her eyebrows as she stared up at him. “Really? She seemed closer to you, yesterday.”

“She is uncertain of you at the moment. Laura has struggled with her magic. For a long time, she detested it because it made her different from you. She is only coming out of it now.”

Cate’s forehead creased. “Did I make her feel that way?”

“No, you always encouraged her. Logan had no difficulty accepting his powers. He only wishes they were stronger. Anna...well...”

“What?” Cate prodded.

“Anna enjoys her powers, but she only uses them when she chooses. She’s quite difficult. A bit too much like her father.” He grinned at her. “But Laura is very much like you. Quite sensitive, and very eager to be accepted.”

“I guess she’s the typical middle child,” Cate said with a sigh. “All right, I’ll try my best. But I don’t make any promises.”

“I have no doubt that you will manage to reach Laura. You are her mother.”

He slid a lock of hair behind her ear as he smiled down at her. She wrapped her fingers around his hand, her lips curving. She recognized the moment about to occur. It was her future memory. The one she found so comforting.

Even now, it brought a sense of peace washing over her as they stood together, tucked in the privacy of her bedroom suite.

“I know, this moment...well...the one that’s about to happen is the future memory that I see when I touch the rose you gave me.”

“The one Mother taught you to use to calm your painful visions.”

Cate nodded. “Yes.”

“Well, then I suppose we should make it a good one. I love you, Catherine,” he replied before he leaned closer to press his lips against hers.

She leaned into the kiss, recalling the moment feeling exactly like this in the vision she’d had. She hadn’t expected it to happen, doubted that it would come true, but living through the moment brought both a measure of comfort and worry to her.

If this moment had come to pass, when would the terrifying vision with Laura rear its ugly head.

Marcus pulled back, stroking her cheek with his thumb. "Feeling better?"

"Yes and no. I will feel better when we solve this issue with Laura."

"So will I. Before you go to her, I came to tell you that Celine, Damien and Michael should be arriving later today."

"Oh, okay," she said with a smile. "It'll be nice to see familiar faces."

He grinned at her before kissing her forehead. "Good luck with Laura."

"Thanks," she said, her hand lingering in his. "I'll need it."

She finally tore her fingers from his and left her room behind. She knew the way to her daughter's room by heart, having traversed the route many times before in her visions.

Her stomach twisted into a tight knot as she rounded the corner. Memories of her visions flitted through her mind. She shoved them aside, her fingers curling into fists as she approached the door.

With a shaky exhale, Cate raised her hand, hesitating before she finally forced herself to knock.

"Come in," Laura called.

Cate pushed inside, her breath catching in her throat as she stepped into the now-familiar space. Her eyes went directly to the bed. She found it empty.

With a hard swallow, she searched the rest of the room, finding Laura on the window seat with a book in her lap. Cate forced a smile onto her face as she approached her daughter, clasping her hands behind her back. "Hi. Mind if I sit?"

Laura quickly moved her legs, curling them under her to allow Cate room on the loveseat. "How are you feeling, Mummy?"

"Uh, better," Cate answered with a nod as she slicked a lock of hair behind her ear. "What about you?"

Laura offered her a smile, but Cate read it as fake. She wondered if that was the case or if she just didn't know her daughter well enough yet. "I'm fine, Mummy. And I am very sorry about last night."

"There's nothing to be sorry about, Laura," Cate said as she reached for her daughter's hand. "You were upset. And I was glad I could be there for you."

Laura nodded before she shifted her gaze out the window.

Cate tilted her head to catch her daughter's eye. "Is there something else upsetting you?"

Laura fluttered her eyelashes as she glanced at Cate. She shook her head, her eyes darting everywhere except to Cate. “No. Just...you’re definitely not divorcing Daddy, right?”

“Definitely not,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

Laura bobbed her head. “Okay.”

“Laura...I feel like there’s something you’re not telling us. But you know you can tell me anything, right?”

Laura avoided her gaze again, pressing her lips together. “I know. I just...there’s nothing, Mummy.”

“Are you sure? Daddy said you’re having nightmares.”

“It’s nothing,” she answered. “Just a few bad dreams.”

“Well, sometimes those mean something is going on that’s bothering us deep down. Maybe talking about the dreams will help us figure out what’s bothering you.”

“Really, Mummy, it’s nothing.” Laura squeezed her hand. “I’m just so happy to have you home.”

“I’m happy to be home.”

“Maybe we can read a book together like we used to?” Laura asked.

“I’d like that,” Cate said with a kiss to her daughter’s forehead. “Why don’t you pick one, and I’ll order us two copies, and we can discuss it over tea and cookies?”

Laura grinned a little more genuinely as she nodded. “All right. I’ll look on my list.”

Cate sat for a moment, wondering if she should push a little further, but before she could, a knock interrupted them.

“Yes?” Cate called.

Marcus poked his head inside. “Catherine, they have arrived.”

“Oh, thanks. I’ll be right down,” Cate said before she twisted back to Laura.

“Go, Mummy.”

“Come down,” Cate said as she rose. “Say hello.”

“I will as soon as I put my book away.”

Cate rubbed her cheek before she pressed her lips to her forehead again and left her daughter behind. Marcus slid an arm around her shoulder as she stepped into the hall. “Any luck?”

“No,” Cate said with a sigh, “but we did agree to read a book together, so maybe she’ll open up after that.”

Marcus smiled at her. "You're doing well with her. You and her often read books together before you left."

"Wait, I didn't leave. Future Cate left. And how long ago?"

"Three months. Laura has fretted the entire time."

"Maybe that's all that's bothering her," Cate answered as they reached the stairs and descended them. "Maybe it'll all clear up with me here."

"I would like to believe that, Catherine, but I do not think that is the case. Something else is happening here. We must determine what it is."

Cate bobbed her head as Marcus led her to the library. She pushed open the doors, finding Celine, Damien, and Michael inside. Her features twisted into a smile as Damien grinned at her.

"Cate." He opened his arms as he came toward her, scooping her into an embrace. "Hey, it's good to see you."

"It's good to see you, too. And to see you're not shot."

"Yeah, I'm totally fine, though," Damien said. "Not even a scar. Being immortal is great."

"Seems so," she said with a grin as she reached to pull Celine in for a hug, then Michael.

"Thank you all for coming," Cate said with a nod.

"No problem. So, there's something going on with my goddaughter?"

Cate's eyebrows shot up as she glanced at Marcus.

"Damien and Celine are Laura's godparents," he answered.

"Oh, wow," Cate said with a smile. "I made a good choice, didn't I?"

"I think so," Damien said with a raise of his chin.

"She has not yet confided in Catherine about what it may be."

"Maybe one of us. Someone...not her parent," Celine answered with a shrug. "Maybe it's something she doesn't want to share with Mom and Dad."

Marcus groaned. "Oh, heavens," he murmured.

Cate crossed to him, looping her arm through his. "We don't know if it's anything worrisome."

"I could try—"

"What is she doing here?" Laura asked from the doorway.

Cate twisted to find her daughter, her features pinched, staring at Celine.

"Hey, sweetie," Celine said with a grin.

Laura's gaze hardened the moment her eyes met Celine's, a storm of unspoken words swirling between them. Cate noticed the tension, the way Laura's hands formed into fists at her sides, her breath quickening. "You shouldn't be here," Laura said, each word dropping like a stone into the silence of the room.

"Laura!" Cate exclaimed.

"She shouldn't," Laura said with a shake of her head. "Go away and leave us alone."

Laura stormed from the room, her fingers curled into fists as Cate stared after her. She glanced at Marcus. "I'm going to assume that was not normal behavior."

"No," Marcus said with a shake of his head. "I will—"

"No, I will go after her," Cate said. "Celine, I'm so sorry."

"Don't worry about it. Teen girls are tough. I know. I was one of them." She offered Cate a warm smile as Cate hurried to the doors.

She spun as she faced them. "What is her middle name. In case I need it?"

"Victoria," Marcus answered.

"Go all Mom on her, Cate," Damien joked with a lightness she couldn't feel. Inside, Cate flinched. The role of 'Mom' felt like a coat tailored for someone else—familiar in shape but strange in fit. How could she step into this role so suddenly, with all its expectations and nuances?

"I'll be right back." Cate rushed through the halls, climbing the stairs and hurrying to Laura's room. She found the girl inside, sniffing.

"Laura?" Cate questioned, her voice firm. "You need to go downstairs and apologize right now."

"No," Laura said with a pout.

"Laura!" Cate exclaimed. "What you did was exceptionally rude. Now, please go apologize."

Laura drew her knees to her chest, tears spilling to her cheeks. "No. She shouldn't be here."

Cate stared at her daughter, her features pinching. "Okay, tell me why."

Laura licked her lips, sniffing as she bit her lower lip. "I can't."

"Then I am not going to allow this behavior to continue. If you're not willing to tell me why you did what you did, I have to insist you go apologize."

Laura swallowed hard. “You don’t understand,” she sobbed. “You don’t understand what she’s done.”

The words hit Cate like a physical slap. The vision from the time passage of the Celine standing in Dunhaven Castle’s library, cold, unfeeling, passed through her mind. Had something happened that she hadn’t realized?

CHAPTER 6

Cate's stomach twisted as she stared at her daughter, tears streaming down her cheeks as she pleaded with Cate to understand. Had something happened in the last twenty years that caused a rift? But how would Laura know Cate wasn't aware of it? Did she suspect Cate wasn't really her mother?

Cate swallowed hard, wiping her sweaty palms against her leggings.

"O-okay, umm, Laura, you're right. I don't understand. Can you explain it to me?" Cate eased onto the window seat across from her daughter.

"No," Laura said with a shake of her head. "No, I can't. I don't want you to know."

Cate pressed her lips together, trying to think of a way to encourage her daughter to confide in her. "Laura, you can tell me anything. You know that right?"

Laura shook her head. "No. I can't tell you this. Mummy, I can't."

"Why not?" Cate prodded.

Laura wiped at her cheeks, sniffing. "Because...Mummy, I just can't. Please try to understand."

She leapt from her seat and stalked across the room, leaning her head back as she blinked in a desperate attempt to get her tears to recede. Cate rose, grabbed a handful of tissues, and crossed to her daughter.

She held them out in a silent offer of support.

Laura grabbed them, pressing them to her cheeks as she sniffed again.

Cate rubbed her daughter's shoulder, clicking her tongue. "Oh, Laura. I really wish you weren't taking this all on yourself."

Laura flung her arms around Cate's neck, collapsing against her as she started to sob again.

Cate pulled her closer, stroking her hair as she gently rocked her. "Shh, Laura, whatever it is, we can face it together, okay?"

"No, because it will ruin everything."

"No, it won't," Cate said as she guided Laura to the bed and eased her onto the edge. "Whatever it is that you think is so terrible, I'm certain I can handle it. And it would be a lot better if we both faced it than you dealing with something this upsetting alone."

Laura wiped at her nose with the tissue, shaking her head. "No, Mummy. I can't tell you."

Cate sucked in a breath, frustrated by her daughter's secrecy. As she vetted new ways to gain her trust and get her to open up, a knock sounded at the door.

Marcus poked his head inside. Laura turned toward the window, her silhouette framed against the pale light of the setting sun. The garden below was ablaze with the last golden rays, a stark contrast to the storm brewing in her eyes. She clasped and unclasped her hands, each movement a ripple of the turmoil inside.

Marcus raised his eyebrows, silently prodding Cate for information. She shook her head, indicating that she hadn't been able to gain any explanations.

Marcus sucked in a deep breath. "Laura, your behavior downstairs was incorrigible. You are to apologize to your Aunt Celine at once."

"Don't call her that. She's not my aunt."

Marcus heaved a sigh, crossing his arms. "Laura, I will not tolerate this childish behavior nor the rude comments you spewed at our guests."

"She shouldn't be here," Laura answered with a sullen pout.

"You keep saying that," Cate said as she rose from the bed, "but unless you tell us why, we can't understand your point of view, Laura."

"There is nothing she has done that would warrant what you said to her. Now, enough with this foolish behavior, go apologize," Marcus insisted.

Laura spun to face him, a tissue clutched tightly in her fist. "Of course, you'd defend her."

Marcus fluttered his eyelashes at his daughter. “Laura, my patience is growing very thin with this behavior. You have been taught better.”

“What’s your excuse?” she retorted.

His eyebrows raised toward his hairline at the words.

“Whoa!” Cate exclaimed. “Laura, you can’t speak to us that way. That is not okay.”

Laura’s features twisted into an angry pout, her lower lip trembling.

“Your mother is correct. If you will not apologize to Aunt Celine, then you will remain in your room until you choose to do so.”

Her eyes went wide. “You’re punishing me because I told the truth?”

“You aren’t telling us any truth,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “If you want us to understand your side, you have to tell us what it is you think you know.”

Laura shook her head. “I don’t think I know it. I know it.”

“All right,” Cate said, trying to keep her voice steady as her patience thinned, “what do you know?”

Laura’s lips pressed together as she flicked her gaze to Marcus before she focused on the floor with a shake of her head.

“Laura, please, whatever it is, just tell us,” Cate pleaded.

She curled her fingers into fists, her lower lip jutting out in a pout.

“There is no reason for that behavior whatsoever. Aunt Celine is your godmother—”

“Why?” Laura asked, heat in her voice.

“Because she is a very close friend of ours,” Marcus answered, “and a very powerful woman to whom you can look up to.”

“Ha!” Laura barked out. “More like she is a very close friend of yours.”

Cate pulled her head back, her eyes widening.

“Laura, I do not know what it is you are hinting at here, but I will not tolerate this.”

“No, you wouldn’t. You don’t want your secret coming out.”

Marcus’s jaw tightened as he eyed his daughter.

“Okay, okay,” Cate said, stepping between them. “Let’s all take it down a notch here. Laura, you can’t make veiled statements like that. You need to explain.”

“I think Daddy needs to explain,” she retorted.

“There is nothing I need to explain,” Marcus answered.

Laura bit into her lower lip, her forehead creasing. "Fine. Is it true that you were engaged to Aunt Celine. That you almost married her?"

Marcus narrowed his eyes. "Where did you hear that?"

"Is it true?" Laura's voice cracked a little as emotion burned through it.

Marcus shifted his weight, one eyebrow arching. "Yes. It is."

"And then you kept bringing her here even after your married Mummy," Laura said with a shake of her head. "Even now, after she's been away for so long."

"Laura—" Marcus began when she shook her head interrupting him.

Laura paced three short steps back and forth, her breath quickening. She stopped abruptly, turning to face Marcus with eyes glistening with unshed tears. "No, Daddy. I understand what's happening." Laura shifted her gaze to Cate. "Mummy, I didn't want to say because I don't want you to get a divorce. I just...want things to go back to the way they were."

Laura stood rigid, her body trembling. The room seemed to hold its breath. Slowly, with a hesitant step, she reached toward Cate before collapsing into her arms, her sobs echoing painfully in the quiet room.

Cate stumbled back a step before she wrapped her arms around her weeping daughter. "Oh, Laura. We are not getting a divorce."

"But now that you know—"

"There is nothing going on between your father and Aunt Celine," Cate said as she stroked Laura's hair.

"Really?" Laura shuddered as she sucked in a shaky breath.

"Of course, there is not," Marcus answered. "I would never do that to your mother."

"See?" Cate said as she eased Laura onto her bed, fluffing a pillow before she encouraged her to lean back into it. "It's all just a misunderstanding."

"But you were engaged to her," Laura said, her eyebrows furrowing. "You loved her."

"No," Marcus answered with a shake of his head. "We were engaged, but not because of love. Neither of us wanted to marry the other. Aunt Celine met Grayson Buckley and married him, and I met your mother."

Marcus rested his hand on Cate's shoulder, and she threaded her fingers through his as she smiled at Laura.

Laura stared at her lap, frowning as she thought through the situation.

“Laura, the first person you are in a relationship with may not be the person you marry,” Cate said.

Laura sniffled, swallowing hard. “But that’s not what she said. She said Daddy was having an affair with Aunt Celine.”

Cate’s features crinkled. “Who told you that?”

Laura glanced up, her features surprised. “N-No one. I...just assumed.”

“Laura, you heard the information about the engagement from somewhere,” Cate prodded. “Where?”

Her daughter shook her head. “No. I...overheard Grandmother talking about it once. I just assumed because she doesn’t like Aunt Celine at all.”

Cate’s mind whirled as she tried to piece the puzzle together. Something wasn’t right about this, but she couldn’t put her finger on it. She glanced at Marcus behind her. He shrugged, looking equally unconvinced.

“No matter where you heard it,” Cate said, “you need to apologize to Aunt Celine.”

Laura bit her lower lip, nodding as she refused to meet their gaze.

Cate rose and leaned forward to kiss Laura’s forehead. “I’ll send her in to see you.”

“Am I still grounded?” Laura asked as Cate and Marcus crossed to the door.

Marcus hesitated for a moment. “No, so long as you apologize and continue to behave in an acceptable manner, you are not grounded.”

Marcus wrapped an arm around Cate as he led her through the door and into the hall.

Cate heaved a sigh as she shot Marcus a glance. “I sort of wish the other Cate would have been here for the teenage years. This is rough.”

Marcus shook his head. “I have never seen her like that.”

Cate studied him for a moment. “She was pretty hard on you. Are you okay?”

“I am fine, Catherine,” he answered.

“Really?” she prodded.

He wrapped his hand around hers, pressing it to his chest. “Really. Although, I would like to know who told her this. Mother never mentions it around the children for this very reason.”

“Maybe she did overhear it, but that doesn’t seem like your mother. There would be no reason for her to bring it up after all this time.

Although, I can't imagine she was happy with our choice in godmother for Laura."

"She was not entirely enthused by it, no, but she did understand. Particularly after you championed her."

Cate inhaled a deep breath, her mind spinning. "Then I don't know who she could have heard it from. It's strange, though, because I think she's still somewhat convinced something is going on between you."

"There is not."

"I know...well, I do now." Cate's eyes widened. "Do you think she got that vibe from me?"

"No, you have known since before she was born," Marcus answered.

"Oh, right," Cate said with a bob of her head. "I forget. Time travel is really confusing sometimes."

Marcus grinned at her, pulling her closer to kiss her forehead. She smiled up at him as Celine rounded the corner.

"Hey," she said with a smile. "Any luck with her?"

Cate heaved a sigh, offering Celine an apologetic glance. "Yes. It seems someone has told Laura about your past with Marcus. And she somehow misconstrued it as you two having an affair."

Celine burst into laughter before she glanced at Marcus and winced. "Sorry, it's just ridiculous."

Marcus wrapped a protective arm around Cate. "I agree. My love for Catherine eclipses any emotion for any other woman."

"Uh, also, until recently, we couldn't even stand to be in the same room with each other. This person didn't let that one slip, huh?" Celine asked, shoving her hands into the pockets of her jeans.

Cate scrunched her features. "I'd like to know who this person is."

"Laura didn't say?" Celine asked.

"No," Cate answered with a shake of her head. "She claims she overheard it from Anna, but I don't believe that."

Celine flicked her gaze to Marcus. "Well, your mother isn't exactly my biggest fan."

"But she has never spoken about what happened between you two anywhere near the children for this exact reason."

Celine puffed out her cheeks. "Well, maybe she'll give you a little more soon. At least you got to the bottom of it."

“Oh, if you don’t mind, we told her we’d send you in. She owes you an apology,” Cate said.

Celine shrugged it off. “Nah, she’s an angsty teen.”

“She really needs to apologize,” Cate answered.

“All right, I’ll head in now,” Celine said as she skirted around them. “But first, I just want to say how glad I am that Gray and I don’t have kids because—wow. You two are way better at this than I would be.”

“You’d be a great mom, too, Celine. But it’s not easy,” Cate answered.

Celine smiled at her, her fingers lingering on the doorknob. “Don’t worry, Marcus, I’ll make sure she knows how ridiculous you and me together in any way is.” Celine chuckled again as she pushed into Laura’s bedroom.

Marcus heaved a sigh. “How did I ever pursue that woman?”

“Simple,” Cate said with a grin. “You didn’t know me.” She patted his chest. “And now I think I’ll go back to my room before dinner.”

Marcus pulled her closer, kissing her cheek. “All right, dear.”

They parted ways, and she threaded through the halls, pushing into her suite with a tired sigh.

She stopped dead as a man rose from the armchair there. His hair grayed a little at the temples, and his face had more lines than she remembered.

He grinned at her. His warm smile hadn’t changed.

“Lady Cate,” Jack said, spreading his arms to the side. “It’s good to see you.”

CHAPTER 7

A grin spread across Cate's face as tears welled in her eyes. She opened her arms wide and strode toward him. "Jack."

He wrapped her in a tight hug. "Oh, it's been too long."

"Not that long," Cate said with a chuckle as she pulled back. "You've seen the regular me recently, right?"

"Actually, our Cate left months ago, so it has been far too long for any version of Cate," he said with a chuckle.

She studied him, the gray at his temples, the lines that crinkled around his eyes when he smiled.

"And you look great. Of course, the Cate from this time does, too, thanks to Marcus's magic." He wiggled his fingers in the air with a grin.

"So, I've heard. The kids didn't even question what I thought would be a younger look."

He shook his head. "You look exactly the same. It's amazing really. I keep getting older and grayer. You just stay the same."

"That's sort of strange. And I'm not certain I like it." She frowned. Of course, she had immortal friends who would also be with them, but watching Jack and Molly grow old, pass away, all while she remained the same wouldn't be easy.

"Hey, before you go getting upset, you should know, it's my choice. Your spouse offered. I declined." He crossed his arms, shuddering. "There's something unappealing to me about the entire thing, but I do have a standing offer from the man himself. So, if I ever change my mind, I, too, can live forever.”

Cate smiled at the words. “Well, I am selfishly going to say I hope you change your mind, but I understand if you don’t. It’s...odd. It was odd to find out that I’d chosen it when I came here.”

“Oh, right. You haven’t even seen me and Molly get married or any of that.”

“At least I have something to look forward to.” She motioned to the pair of armchairs near them before collapsing into one. “And I can’t wait to meet your kids. Sorry, I haven’t been avoiding you or them. I just...”

“Am a little overwhelmed?” Jack asked as he settled into his seat.

“Yes, exactly,” Cate answered with a chuckle. “And a little is putting it mildly. I mean...when I left, I thought Marcus was in love with Celine. I thought we were going to divorce but had to put it off because his mother arrived.”

“And the nasty business with my former wife.”

“Right,” Cate said, her eyes widening.

“But you didn’t want a divorce, did you?”

Cate tugged a corner of her lips back into a half-smile as she shrugged. “He’s grown on me.”

“Uh-huh,” Jack said, cracking a smile. “Cate, I think he’s more than grown on you. I think you’ve been in love with him for quite a while.”

“Probably,” she said. “When we searched for you, he was so...attentive. I just kept ignoring my feelings because I thought he was interested in Celine.”

“Bah, she can’t hold a handle to you, Cate Kensie.”

Cate offered him an amused glance, raising a finger in the air. “Uh-uh, Cate Kensie—”

“Northcott,” they said at the same time.

Cate chuckled, pulling her legs up underneath her as she curled up in the chair. “Anyway, it seems I’m not the only one who thought Marcus was interested in Celine. We just came from Laura’s room where she accused him of having an affair with Celine.”

“No,” Jack said, his eyes going wide.

“Yes,” Cate said, pressing a hand to her forehead. “I’ll tell you, I have been thrown into the deep end of motherhood, and I am not at all convinced I’m good at it.”

“Aww, Cate, you’re a fantastic mother. The way you’ve raised those kids to be kind, compassionate, and patient...why I think you’ve even rubbed off a little on Marcus himself.”

“He’s not that bad,” Cate answered with a shake of her head. “But I can’t figure out who is telling these tales to my kids. When I find them, though...” Cate cracked her fist against her open palm.

“I don’t doubt it. I’ve seen you go all mama bear on more than one person. Whoever is spreading these rumors is just wrecking Laura’s peace. She’s a child. She deserves to be a child.”

“Well, she’s a teen, not a child, and they’ll tell you the difference right away,” Jack said with a wag of his finger.

“Oh, right,” Cate said. “Fifteen going on forty, right?”

“That’s right. We’ve been there with Maggie, and we’re still there.” Jack shook his head. “I mostly leave it to Molly. Oh, by the way, she knows about the whole time travel thing. We told her.”

Cate wrinkled her nose. “How’d she take it?”

“Pretty well considering. In fact, better than when I leave Maggie’s teen temperament to her.”

“I bet she loves that.”

Jack held his hands up. “Pop doesn’t understand a thing, don’t you know?”

A chuckle rumbled in Cate’s chest as she licked her lips. “I’m not sure any parent understands anything. But on a serious note, if you or Molly know of anyone who has been hanging around and filling her head with this stuff, let me know. She claims she overheard it from Marcus’s mother, but I don’t buy it.”

“It’s no secret Anna doesn’t care for Celine at all,” Jack answered.

“No, I know that, but, according to Marcus, she doesn’t speak of it in front of the children, so they aren’t aware.”

“Maybe Damien, Michael?” Jack suggested.

“She said ‘she,’” Cate said, her features pinching.

“And she wouldn’t tell you who?”

Cate shook her head. “No. Marcus says she’s been secretive lately, uneasy. I just feel so out of my depth here because I don’t know what is normal for my own kids.”

“Maybe Maggie could talk to her? You know, they’re close. We could ask her and see if maybe Laura would confide in her.”

Cate pressed her lips together, sucking in a breath. "That's a very kind offer. I just...gosh, I feel terrible dragging your kids into my family troubles."

"Cate, we're pretty entwined in your family troubles. You and I have solved so many problems together already. Plus, like I said, the kids are close. They all go to school together...another thing I need to thank your spouse for. My kids go to the most exclusive schools in the world because of him."

"Aww, that's great that they go to school together." Cate beamed at him.

"They're getting an excellent education. And the old sourpuss insisted. You know, I really thought he'd be insufferable, but he's done quite a bit for us."

"Well, that's good. I know you weren't sold on him back in my time, so it's good to hear he's grown on you."

"He has, but I'll tell you this, if he hurts you, I'll still make my best effort to kill him. I don't expect success, but I'll try."

Cate giggled, shaking her head at him. "Your sense of humor hasn't changed, and your jokes haven't gotten any better."

"Ahh, come on, Cate, I haven't even tried out one of my puns on you yet."

"Well, I can't wait to hear them," she said with a grin as the clicking of the door drew her attention.

She glanced at it as it opened.

Marcus arched an eyebrow as he stepped inside. "Mr. Reid. I did not realize you were visiting."

"You see how far we've come. Mr. Reid now...not the gardener."

Marcus heaved a sigh, shaking his head at Jack as he crossed to Cate's armchair, placing a hand on her shoulder. "I came to see if you would prefer your meal here."

"The kids will be disappointed if I do that," Cate answered.

"Yes, they will be, although I can handle it," Marcus said.

"No, I'll come down for dinner. Jack and I were just discussing having Maggie talk to Laura. Maybe she can ferret out whoever made Laura think that you and Celine were a thing."

"I would like to get to the bottom of it, yes." Marcus nodded.

"Right, I'll talk to her."

“Why don’t you all join us for dinner,” Cate said as Jack rose.

“Oh, uh...” Jack’s eyes flicked from Cate to Marcus. It seemed in the twenty years they’d spent living under the same roof that they’d learned to communicate and become friends.

“That would very nice. It would help take some of the pressure off of Catherine, who is feeling quite like a fish out of water.”

“Well, then I’ll inform Molly who will inform the staff,” Jack said with a grin. “And we’ll see you for dinner.”

“Don’t forget we dress,” Marcus said. “Do not wear that flannel thing you call a shirt to the dining table.”

Well, maybe they’d become friends, Cate thought with a shake of her head.

“Right. I’ll put on my fancy red one just for you Marc.” He clicked his tongue as he winked at him before he disappeared into the hall.

Marcus heaved a sigh. “Sometimes that man tries my patience.”

“I’m sorry,” Cate said as she stood. “But—”

“You are close friends. And I will tolerate him because it will make things easier on you.” He slid a lock of hair behind her ear.

“I really hope Laura will confide in Maggie. We need to figure out who is putting these crazy ideas in her head.”

Marcus nodded. “I agree. Let us hope for the best.”

The door to her suite popped open again, and Andrea entered.

“Good evening, Your Graces,” she said with a nod. “Will you be dining with the family tonight or here?”

“With the family,” Cate said. “So I need to change before Marcus gets fussy about my sweater and leggings.”

“They are a far cry from the horrid attire Jack Reid considers appropriate,” Marcus answered, “but I will leave you to it.”

He kissed her cheek before he left her behind.

“So, dinners are a formal event, huh?” Cate said as Marcus left them alone.

“Yes, they are. His Grace insisted on keeping tradition. He says it’s important for the children.”

Cate plopped into the chair at her vanity. “Well, I suppose family dinners are important.”

“Oh, His Grace is very serious about them,” Andrea said as she brushed Cate’s hair. “And how are things going for you, Your Grace? Have you adjusted to the new environment?”

Cate sucked in a sharp breath. “I’m not sure. I feel like I’m not doing a very good job. I don’t even know my own children.”

“But you love them all the same.”

Cate tugged one corner of her lips back. “I’m not sure that’s going to be enough. Laura seems to be struggling quite a bit, and I have no idea what to do.”

“I am certain you will figure it out, Your Grace,” Andrea said as she swept Cate’s hair into a swept-up style.

“Gosh, I hope so. I feel terrible not being able to help my own kids.”

“You will help them. I know you will. You always find a way.”

Andrea finished with Cate’s hair before she preceded her into the bedroom to find a selection of dresses for her to choose from.

“How did I let Marcus talk me into formal dinners? I would much rather be in my leggings,” Cate said with a sigh.

Andrea laughed as Cate picked a burgundy dress. Within minutes, Andrea had her pulled together and ready for dinner.

“Enjoy your meal, Your Grace,” Andrea said. “I will see you afterward.”

With butterflies in her stomach, Cate left her room behind, uncertain she was ready for a family dinner. She wasn’t even certain the addition of Jack, Molly, and their two children would ease the tension.

So many things had changed.

Marcus met her at the top of the stairs, offering his arm to lead her down to the dining room. “Thanks for agreeing to have Jack and his family at the table. I think it may help.”

“Of course, dear,” he said as he led her into their formal dining room. Their children waited for them, and Logan raced to the chair at the head of the table, pulling it out.

“Mother, how wonderful that you could join us.”

“Thank you, Logan,” she said as he helped her into the chair.

The dining room glowed under the soft light of crystal chandeliers, each flicker reflecting off the polished silverware laid meticulously around fine china. The heavy curtains parted slightly, letting in the haunting whisper of the wind that roamed the castle grounds at night.

“And thanks for inviting us, Your Grace,” Molly said with a pat of Cate’s hand. “We haven’t had a dinner together in far too long.”

“It’s great to see you, Aunt Cate,” Maggie said with a grin.

“And it’s wonderful to see you again, Maggie, and you, Malcolm,” Cate said as their first course was served.

She spent the dinner marveling over how much life had changed, but how some things had remained the same.

She grinned as Jack recounted the story of them being in the nineteen forties. Laughter filled the air.

“And then your mother, no joke, shot down a German fighter. She grabbed the gun and shot down the plane on our tail.”

Her children’s jaws unhinged. “No,” Logan said, shooting Cate a glance. “Mother, really?”

“Really,” Cate said with a nod. “I couldn’t just do nothing.”

“Your mother is the bravest woman I know,” Marcus answered as he raised his wine glass to her.

The meal continued with more stories and laughter before they parted ways. Cate headed to her bedroom, exhausted but more comfortable than she’d been earlier. It seemed she and Marcus had built a wonderful life together with family and friends.

After Andrea helped her change into her pajamas, she crawled into bed, exhausted from the drama of the day.

When she woke, her features pinched. Something had pulled her from a restful sleep. What was it?

A shriek split the night air, and Cate flung back her covers, racing across her sitting room to fling open her doors. She sprinted down the hall, a sense of dread settling over her as she realized she’d done this dozens of times before. This was her vision. This was the terrifying thing that had been haunting her for months.

This was the start of the end.

CHAPTER 8

Cate raced down the hall, her heart hammering as she skidded around the corner. One more hall stood between her and determining why this moment was so pivotal, so dreadful.

Her features pinched with concern as she reached the door, the sounds of her daughter's sobs filling the air.

She burst into the room, and the scene matched her future memory exactly—only now, it all made sense. All the pieces of the puzzle had fallen into place except one. Why was this moment so important?

Cate hurried across the room, flicking on the antique brass lamp, casting a soft golden glow that battled the shadows creeping around the corners of Laura's room. Each familiar object seemed sinister in the half-light, transforming the room where Cate had once told bedtime stories into a stage for nightmares.

Laura sat on the bed, her small frame hunched over, sobs shaking her shoulders. The sight pierced Cate like a knife, her resolve hardening. She needed to fix this—now.

"Laura, what happened?"

"Laura?" Marcus asked as he rushed into the room. "Another nightmare?"

"Go away," Laura cried, burying her face in her knees.

Cate rubbed her daughter's shoulder, shooting Marcus a pained glance. "Sweet Pea, tell us what's wrong? What's upsetting you so much?"

"Oh, Mummy," Laura said with a sob as she reached for her.

Cate inched closer, wrapping her arms around her daughter and pulling her close. "Shhh, Laura, it's okay. Whatever it is, we'll fix it."

"I don't know if you can," Laura said, her voice breaking.

"Laura," Cate's voice was more pleading than she intended, her words echoing slightly in the high-ceilinged room. "Please, talk to me. Whatever it is, we can face it together. You don't have to carry this alone."

But Laura's response was to bury her face deeper into her knees, her voice muffled but fierce, "You can't help. You won't understand."

Frustration and fear twisted in Cate's gut as she sat beside her daughter, her hand reaching out to smooth back hair damp with tears. The physical connection seemed to thaw some of the ice between them, Laura's body no longer rigid, leaning into the comfort tentatively.

"Laura, love, I understand more than you know," Cate whispered, each word infused with all the warmth she could muster, trying to bridge the gap with a daughter she didn't know. "And I promise, no matter what it is, it won't change how much I love you. It won't break our family."

Her daughter clung to her as Cate stroked her hair, sniffing. Cate waited until Laura's crying had slowed to just a few shudders here and there before she slowly eased her back into her pillows.

"Mummy, don't leave yet."

"I'm not leaving, Laura," Cate said as she rose. "But I think maybe a nice warm cup of tea and some of Aunt Molly's cookies may make you feel better."

Laura licked her lips, nodding. "As long as you're staying here."

"I am," Cate assured her with a squeeze of her hand before she crossed to Marcus, lowering her voice. "Could you bring the tea and cookies?"

"We have servants for this sort of thing, Catherine."

"I understand that, but I think she may be more open without you here," Cate whispered. "Give me some time with her."

"All right. I will fetch the tea and biscuits. Good luck." He squeezed her arm before he kissed her cheek.

"Thanks," she said, squeezing his hand before he left. She twisted to face her daughter, skirting the bed before she grabbed the covers and slid underneath them, shimmying close to Laura.

She slid an arm around her daughter's shoulders and pulled her closer. Laura snuggled against her, and Cate kissed her hair before she laid her cheek against her daughter's head. "Feeling any better?"

“A little,” Laura murmured, her arms tightening around Cate.

“You know, Sweet Pea, it would be so much easier for you if you just told someone what was happening.”

Laura buried her head in Cate’s chest. “I don’t want to, Mummy.”

“Laura, it will only be painful for a minute, and then it’ll be so much better.”

“But it won’t be,” she said, her sobbing resuming. “Something is very wrong, Mummy, and I just have to figure it out on my own.”

“No, you don’t, Laura,” Cate said as she stroked her hair. “Whatever is wrong, we’ll figure it out together.”

Laura shifted next to Cate, wiping at her cheeks. “But it could change everything. I have this terrible feeling.”

“Well, then it’s all the more reason for you to tell me. Because I have a secret to tell you.”

Laura pushed away from Cate, her eyes wide and glassy. Her lower lip trembled as she studied Cate’s face. “Oh, Mummy, is it about you and Daddy? Were you lying earlier?”

“No,” Cate said, her voice incredulous. “No, Laura. There is nothing wrong between Daddy and me.”

“You’re not sleeping in the same bedroom. I heard Daddy ask to make up the other room.”

Cate heaved a sigh, shaking her head. “That has nothing to do with our marriage.”

“But...that’s not...” Laura shook her head, her features pinching.

“Who is telling you these things? I know it’s not Grandmother. Who is it?”

Laura bit into her lower lip, her eyes lowering to the soft sheets on the bed.

“Whoever it is, she is lying to you. She’s upsetting you for no reason. And I, for one, would like her to stop because you should be enjoying your time off from school instead of worrying about things that are never going to happen.”

“But she said...she said you and Daddy didn’t get married because you loved each other. And she said now you were getting divorced. She was right about Aunt Celine and Daddy’s engagement.”

“We explained all of that. And it was a very long time ago. And, in fact, you can thank your Aunt Celine because she is the reason I met your father.”

Laura’s eyebrows furrowed as she studied Cate. Cate grabbed the tissue box and held it out toward her. Laura grabbed a few tissues, wiping her cheeks.

“Did you know that I met your father right here in Dunhaven Castle?”

“Really?” Laura asked.

Cate offered her a soft smile, holding out her arms as she coaxed her closer. “Yes. In the sitting room downstairs, the one where we put the Christmas tree every year.”

“Was it Christmas?”

“No,” Cate answered as she recalled the moment she’d first set eyes on Marcus in person. “No, it was summer. 1792. Uncle Jack and I were visiting Douglas MacKenzie. And Aunt Celine and Uncle Gray were visiting. Daddy came unexpectedly to see Aunt Celine, but he ended up sitting next to me at dinner.”

Laura sniffled. “Did you fall in love with him at first sight?”

“No,” Cate said with a chuckle. “I wasn’t entirely certain I liked him, actually.”

Laura craned her neck to glance up at Cate, her eyes searching. “It was much later when Uncle Jack disappeared, and Daddy helped me find him that I fell in love with him. He was very brave and very selfless. He traded himself for Uncle Jack.”

“He did?” Laura asked, her voice a quiet squeak.

“Yes. Uncle Jack was being held by some very bad people, and he was very sick. Daddy traded himself for Uncle Jack.”

“How did Daddy get away?”

Cate stroked her daughter’s hair, a smile crossing her lips. “That’s a funny story.”

“Funny?” Laura asked, a bit more levity in her voice as she shifted in Cate’s arms, her muscles relaxing. “It doesn’t sound funny.”

“Well, Daddy had fully expected those people to keep him, but I had a different idea in mind. I woke up in the middle of the night at Rosenberg Palace, and I woke the poor stablehand and made him ready a carriage and take me to where your father was. And I went inside, got into a fight with someone to get the key to his cell, and rescue him.”

Laura pushed away from her, her head tilting. “You rescued Daddy?”

“I did. And I don’t let him forget it very often,” Cate said with a chuckle.

Laura offered her a wavering smile.

Cate pinched her chin. “There’s that smile I missed so much.”

Laura pressed her lips together, her amusement fading a little. “I’m sorry, Mummy, I just...”

“Are taking things on yourself that you shouldn’t. Someone is filling your head with stories that aren’t accurate. And I think you should tell me who it is because they need to stop doing this.”

Laura swallowed hard, her gaze falling to the hand that propped her up. “She said...she said she knew you very well. She said you didn’t like her, so I shouldn’t say anything.”

Cate furrowed her brow. “Laura, who? And where are you meeting her? Why do you keep meeting her?”

“I don’t go to her—she comes to me. She just...comes in my sleep.”

“She comes in your sleep? Maybe it’s just a dream.”

Laura shook her head, wadding the tissue into a tight ball in her fist. “It’s not a regular dream, it’s...different. One minute, I’m asleep. A normal, natural sleep. And then the next thing, I’m in a new place. And she’s there. And she says all these things to me. Terrible things. She told me you would leave, and you did. Then she told me about Aunt Celine, and she was right. And then she said you and Daddy would get a divorce, and now I’m so afraid that’s going to come true.” Her eyes squeezed shut as her voice broke again.

“It’s not,” Cate said, pulling her into a hug. “It’s not going to come true. Now, Laura, I really must insist that you tell me who is tormenting you like this? Because that’s all she’s doing.”

Laura sniffled. “You said you had a secret, though. And you never told me.”

Cate took her daughter’s hand in hers. “You know that I am a clairvoyant.”

Laura nodded as she wiped at her nose with the tissue again.

“Well, I have visions of various things. And your nightmares were one of my visions. That scream that sent me scrambling in here? I have been seeing that moment since before you were born.”

“Really?” Laura asked.

Cate nodded, squeezing her hand. "This is important, Laura. Very important, so please, tell me, because I need to do whatever it takes to protect you and this entire family."

Laura's features pinched before she raised her gaze to Cate. "Her name is...Gianna. Gianna Caruso. Do you know her?"

Cate stared at her daughter, heat washing over her as a shiver snaked down her spine. Gianna Caruso was terrorizing her daughter. The Agency had finally made this personal. They'd gone after her child.

"Mummy?" Laura asked, her face creasing with worry. "Mummy, is something wrong? Are you mad at me?"

"No, Sweat Pea, I'm not mad at you," Cate said, her voice trembling a little even as she tried to infuse strength into it.

Cate pulled her daughter closer to her, squeezing her tight to her chest. "I am so sorry you had to deal with that woman."

"You know her then?" Laura asked.

"Yes," Cate said, her voice laced with venom as memories of Gianna's actions toward her in the past rushed into her mind. She would take any one of them again and again for the rest of her life over that woman bullying her child. "She is a horrible woman, Laura. You cannot listen to anything she says."

"But she was right—"

"Laura, she isn't. She's not telling you everything."

"Like what?" Laura asked.

"Did she tell you she was one of the people who took Uncle Jack? Who kept your father in that cell?"

"No," Laura said, her muscles tensing again.

"Well, she is. She is part of an organization that wants to do very bad things in the world. And she's upsetting you just to upset your father and me." Cate rubbed Laura's arm. "And I am so sorry we didn't protect you from this, but now that we know, we're going to stop this."

"Thank you, Mummy," Laura said.

As Cate held her closer, Marcus entered, carrying a tray of tea. His eyes fell to Cate, his eyebrows raising in a silent question. She offered him a slight nod, indicating she had the answers they needed.

He set the tray on the bed and poured Laura a cup of tea. "Feeling better, darling?"

“Uh-huh,” she said with a nod as she pulled herself away from Cate to accept the tea, stirring in milk and sugar before she took a sip.

Cate pushed back the covers, but Laura grabbed her hand. “Mummy, no, don’t leave.”

“I’m not leaving. I just need to talk to Daddy for a minute. I’ll be right back.”

Laura offered her a panicked glance.

“I promise. I’ll be right back.” Cate kissed her forehead.

She climbed off the bed and wrapped her robe tighter around her as she grabbed Marcus’s arm and guided him into the hall.

“I assume you learned something from her?” Marcus asked.

“Yes,” Cate said, trying to stop herself from trembling as she ran a shaky hand through her hair.

“Catherine, what is it?” Marcus asked.

Cate pressed her lips together, shaking her head before she raised her gaze to his. “It’s Gianna. She’s after our daughter.”

CHAPTER 9

Cate's stomach twisted into a tight knot as she pressed the palm of her hand against her forehead. Heat washed over her. Gianna had done so many terrible things to them, but this was the worst thing she'd ever dealt with. Watching someone torment your child was like having someone rip your heart out.

"She is using a dream curse," Marcus answered with a deep sigh. "I should have seen this coming, but The Agency has become difficult to track."

Cate pressed her lips together as she groaned. "Why is this happening?"

"She said she would break you," Marcus answered. "This is what she meant. This is what your visions have been showing you."

"I know," Cate said, tears welling in her eyes. "Why couldn't I figure it out earlier? If only I had been able to, maybe this wouldn't have happened."

"You are not shown them to prevent them entirely, Catherine."

She slid her eyes closed, a tear falling to her cheek. "Then what's the point?"

"The point is, Catherine, that you are here, prepared, and ready to deal with it." Marcus rubbed her arms.

She shook her head, the gesture not comforting her at all. "I don't feel prepared or ready at all."

Her features pinched as the tears burning her eyes started to escape to her cheeks.

“Catherine,” Marcus soothed, pulling her closer as she started to sob, “need I remind you of the lecture you gave Laura not one hour ago?”

“Maybe,” Cate said as she pressed a damp cheek against his chest.

“We will face this together.”

Cate sniffled, pulling back from him. “She has done horrible things to both of us, not to mention Jack. And now she’s doing it to Laura. And we have never been able to outsmart her or stop her or even slow her down. We’re never a step ahead of her.”

“We know what she is doing now,” Marcus said, refusing to let her go. “We will stop her. We will find a way, and in the meantime, we will take care of Laura.”

“Is there anything we can do to protect her from this while we’re trying to ferret out the roots of The Agency? She’s terrified.”

“Yes, I believe there is something we can do. However, what she really needs is her mother. She is comforted by your presence alone.”

Cate licked her lips, blowing out a shaky breath as she tried to pull herself together. “I don’t feel very comforting right now.”

“She adores you. She opened up to you after months of not speaking about what is happening with her nightmares. Your presence alone is a comfort.”

Cate sniffled, bobbing her head. “I just need to pull myself together. I don’t think me sobbing is going to be very comforting to her.”

“But you need comforted, too.”

Cate threaded her fingers through Marcus’s, wiping away the last tear from her cheek. “I am.”

Marcus smiled at her, rubbing her cheek. “Well, I am pleased to hear that. You spent a lot of time refusing my comfort.”

Cate pressed her lips together, shooting him an unimpressed glance. “When I thought you were in love with Celine.”

“Oh, Catherine. If you could not tell I only had eyes for you...”

“Quiet,” she said with a wag of her finger. “My skills of perception are fantastic. You were just confusing.”

He chuckled at her. “I was not. I was very obvious about it. I merely did not wish to push myself onto you if you did not prefer it.”

Cate shook her head at him, a coy smile on her features. “If you couldn’t tell that I was in love with you—”

“Do not say it,” Marcus warned.

“You know who knew we were in love with each other? Your mother.”

“Yes, I know,” he answered. “Mother is very wise.”

“She is. Maybe we should consult with her over Laura.”

“I plan to now that we know what is happening.” Marcus rubbed her arms again. “Now, are you feeling up to returning to Laura?”

“I’d better before she wonders where I went. I’ll spend the night with her, and I think maybe we should stick closely to her for now.”

“Yes, I think she would benefit from that greatly, Catherine.”

“When will you talk to your mother?”

“I will visit with her now,” he answered. “Will you be all right for a short while?”

“We will be,” she said with a nod. “I’m anxious to hear what she has to say. And say hello to me for me, will you?”

“I will,” he answered with a smirk before he kissed her cheek. “I will come to you as soon as I return.”

She squeezed his arm, warmth spreading through her at the idea of them tackling the problem together. “And tell your mother hello, too.”

“I will.”

They parted ways, and Cate took a moment to prepare herself, hoping it didn’t look like she’d been crying. She pushed into Laura’s room, finding her perched on the edge of the bed. She snapped her gaze up to Cate, her features turning concerned. “Mummy? Is something wrong?”

“No, Sweet Pea,” Cate said as she hurried to her daughter’s side. “Now, what are you doing out of bed?”

“I was worried. I wanted to come find you, but I heard you and Daddy talking. I didn’t want to interrupt.”

Cate pulled back the covers and motioned for Laura to climb back into bed, but her daughter shook her head. “Laura, you need to go back to bed.”

“Mummy, I don’t want to go to sleep. I’m afraid I’ll see her again.”

“I’ll be right here if you do,” Cate said with a caress of her cheek.

Laura grabbed Cate’s hand. “You’re staying with me?”

“I will stay with you tonight and every night until we solve this.”

Laura grinned at her, climbing back into bed and patting the spot next to her. “Anna will be upset.”

Cate chuckled as she grabbed a cookie and skirted the bed to climb in next to Laura. “Well, you need me right now.”

She stroked her daughter's hair as she bit into the cookie. "Plus, I will take any excuse to have one of Aunt Molly's cookies."

"I know," Laura said as she snuggled against Cate with a giggle.

"Oh, do you?" Cate teased as she poked her daughter's side.

They laughed together before Cate polished off her cookie and wrapped her arms around her daughter, squeezing her tightly. "Do you think you can sleep?"

Laura stiffened against her, not answering.

"Laura?"

"Mummy, I don't want to. I'm afraid."

"I will be right here. And remember, she is lying to you, Laura. There is nothing to be upset about, okay?" Cate kissed the top of her daughter's head.

Laura tightened her grasp around Cate's waist.

"All right, why don't we watch a movie together?" Cate asked.

Laura nodded, her cheek still pressed against Cate's chest.

Cate reached for the remote on her nightstand, flipping on the television and selecting one of her favorites.

Laura twisted to lay her back against Cate. "You always remember my favorite, Mummy."

"Because it's one of my favorites, too," Cate said as she settled the covers over them a little higher.

They settled in together, and by the time the movie was half over, Laura was soundly asleep in Cate's arms. Cate switched off the television and the light, slouching down next to Laura.

She slid a lock of Laura's hair behind her ear, studying her features, soft from sleep. "My poor baby."

A mix of concern and anger roiled inside of her. She twisted the sheets over them in her fist as she imagined Gianna's smug face lording things over her poor daughter.

If Cate could find the woman right now, she wasn't certain she could be responsible for her own actions. She'd come to blows with the woman once before, and she'd do it again to protect her child. It seemed her motherly instincts had kicked in despite only having known Laura for a short period of time.

Cate gently rubbed her daughter's arm as she slept, her mind whirling despite her eyelids growing heavy.

Before she could fall asleep, though, the quiet click of Laura's door awoke her. She snapped her gaze toward it. Marcus strode inside, and she pressed a finger to her lips.

Marcus smiled at the scene as he rounded the bed and eased onto the edge, taking Cate's hand in his.

"Well?" she whispered.

"Mother and I are researching how to protect Laura from the dream curse. We hope to have an answer in a few hours. How is she?"

"Terrified to go to sleep," Cate answered, "but I managed to lull her there with a movie."

"The one about the mother and daughter who move to the seaside?"

Cate smiled and nodded. "Uh-huh. She fell asleep about halfway through, and she's been out ever since."

"This is the most peaceful I've seen her since all of this started," Marcus said, reaching out to shift a lock of Laura's hair behind her ear. "Even when I sat with her, she slept fitfully."

Cate shifted her gaze to her sleeping daughter, rubbing her shoulder. "Poor baby. She's probably exhausted."

"I am certain she will recover now that her mother is here to care for her."

"She said Anna will be upset."

"She will be. Anna is...difficult."

"Like her father," Cate said with a coy grin.

Marcus shifted to lean against the pillows, pulling Cate and Laura closer to him. "I have a feeling you are going to end up with both children in your bed until this is solved."

Cate settled against him. "That's okay. Although, poor Logan seems to be just as upset, but he just keeps pushing ahead."

"Logan is very much like that. It's nothing that a lovely afternoon game of chess with his mother won't fix."

Cate's lips parted before she winced. "No, not chess."

"I'm afraid so. He enjoys it far more with you than with me."

"Probably because he can easily win. I'm awful at chess."

"You are not, you simply lack the desire to engage in games that long."

"Like the game Gianna is playing," Cate said with a sigh.

"I am already working on a plan to fight back against her. I hope to have the cogs in place by morning, and then we will form a plan." He kissed her temple.

She gripped his forearm, leaning her forehead against his cheek. “Good. We need to solve this. I need to get back home to my real husband.”

“I hope you don’t tell him about the other dashing charmer who you claimed to be in love with during this trip.”

“Somehow, I think he’ll know since he often receives visits from the future.”

They chuckled together before Cate’s eyes started to close. She relaxed into him, her head lolling as she drifted off to sleep.

When she awoke the next morning, bright sunshine filtering through the curtains, she squinted against it, stretching. Laura still slept soundly next to her, curled into a ball on her side.

Cate lifted her arms over her head before she climbed out of bed, crossing to the windows to glance out over the back gardens with a yawn.

“Mummy?” Laura said, sleep in her voice.

“I’m right here, Sweet Pea,” Cate said, returning to the bed and sliding between the sheets. “How are you feeling?”

“Mm, better,” Laura said as she cuddled next to Cate. “That’s the first time I’ve slept that well in a while.”

“Aww,” Cate answered, rubbing her thumb against her daughter’s cheek. “I’m so glad you confided in me. We’re going to stop this from happening to you.”

Laura grabbed Cate’s hand, squeezing it. “Did you tell Daddy?”

“I did. And he asked Grandmother for help. With any luck, we’ll have this cleared up for you very soon.”

Laura sat up, reaching for her robe. “But you’ll stay with me until it does?”

“Of course. If you’re getting up, though, I’m going to get dressed and go see if Daddy made any progress on settling this.”

Laura nodded, and Cate kissed her forehead before she rose from the bed, threading through the halls to her bedroom suite to find Andrea waiting for her.

“Your Grace, good morning. His Grace said you had a difficult night, so I was just tidying up a little while I waited for you. How is Lady Laura?”

“Better after getting some peaceful sleep. I, on the other hand, am a wreck.”

“Perhaps you ought to lie down now and get some rest.”

Cate shook her head as she slumped into the seat at the vanity. “No. I couldn’t sleep if I tried. I’m more upset over the fact that this is Gianna doing this. She has given us so much trouble, but now she’s going after my kids.”

Cate’s lower lip trembled before she broke into tears.

“Oh, Your Grace,” Andrea said as she hurried to her and wrapped her in a warm embrace.

“I’m sorry,” Cate said, wiping at her cheeks as she pulled back.

“It’s all right, Your Grace. This is very stressful, and you are understandably upset.”

“I need to get it together,” Cate answered with a sniffle. “I need to be strong for Laura.”

“But you do not need to be strong for me. So, I am the place where you can cry, yell, scream, whatever makes you feel better.”

Cate sucked in a deep breath as she nodded. “Thank you. All right, well, actually, right now, I want to get dressed and get downstairs to see if Marcus or anyone else has an idea about getting rid of Laura’s nightmares or Gianna and The Agency.”

“Of course,” Andrea said, grabbing the hairbrush and gently brushing her hair.

Within the hour, Andrea had her pulled together in her usual chic style. With worry gnawing in the pit of her stomach, she descended the stairs and made her way to the library.

She pushed inside, finding Marcus, Celine, Damien, and Michael already inside. “Good morning,” Cate said, receiving greetings from the others.

“How is Laura?” Marcus asked as he poured her a cup of tea.

Cate accepted the cup with a sigh, sinking into her armchair. “Better. She says she finally had a good night’s sleep. I’m hoping that continues.”

“Cate, I’m so sorry,” Celine said. “Marcus told us what’s going on. This must be so difficult on you, too.”

“I never thought Gianna could do something this low, this vile. Laura is a child.”

Damien patted her on the shoulder, offering her a smile. “We’ll get through it, Cate.”

“Thanks,” she said as she lowered her teacup into the saucer. “Is there any news on that front, Marcus?”

“There is. My plan has come to fruition. With any luck, I hope to have Gianna on the run soon while we fix Laura’s dream curse.”

“What is the plan?” Cate asked.

Marcus flicked his eyebrows up, hesitating. “Gianna is quite contemptible. We need to fight fire with fire.”

“I’m not sure I could ever be as despicable as her,” Cate answered with a shake of her head.

“I know. And that is why I have enlisted help on that front.”

Cate raised her eyebrows before she creased her forehead. “Who is that vicious?”

The doors to the library burst open behind her. Cate twisted to stare at the woman who stepped inside, a grin on her pretty face. She stretched her arms to the sides, the leather of her jacket squeaking as she did. “Fam, what’s up?”

Cate’s jaw unhinged as she stared at her before she snapped her gaze to Marcus. The memory of being tormented by this woman, kidnapped, taunted, and more, flashed through Cate’s mind. “You must be joking. You brought Dominique?”

CHAPTER 10

Cate stood in stunned silence as she stared at the leather-clad woman hovering in the doorway to the library. After the debacle she'd lived through in Maine, Dominique had only added to it when she'd burst into the bedroom in the Buckley house and snatched her straight from her bed.

What was the woman doing standing in her home right now?

She twisted to search her husband's features for an answer, but as usual, he betrayed nothing.

"Seriously, Marcus, is this some kind of joke?" Celine asked with a click of her tongue.

Dominique smirked at her. "Aww, what's the matter, cousin? You aren't happy to see me?"

"In a word, no," Celine answered, crossing her arms. "How did you even get out of prison?"

Dominique grinned at her, wiggling her eyebrows as she set her gaze on Marcus. "Do you want to tell them or should I?"

Marcus heaved a sigh. "I have already explained that we need someone who is as ruthless and amoral as Gianna."

As Dominique strode into the room, a cold shiver ran down Cate's spine, unbidden and sharp. Memories flooded her—the tightness of ropes around her wrists, Dominique's mocking laughter echoing off cold walls, the despair. She forced a calm exterior, but inside, a storm of anxiety and old fears churned.

Dominique perched on the edge of Cate's armchair. "And here I am. Ruthless and amoral, as requested. And definitely way cooler than Gianna. I think we can all agree on that."

She leapt from her seat, stalking closer to Michael. "Hey, handsome, how's it hanging?"

"Still not interested, Dominique."

"Your loss, kid." She stalked closer to Damien, clapping him on the shoulder. "Damien, buddy."

"Really not interested," Damien said, shoving his hands in his pockets as he avoided her gaze.

She leaned closer, whispering in his ear. "Neither am I. Just wanted to say hello."

"Marcus, she shouldn't be here. How is she even here? You're supposed to be serving an eternal sentence."

"Yeah," Dominique said as she crossed to Marcus and patted his chest. "The big guy pulled some strings and here I am."

She grinned at them.

"You can't be serious," Celine said, cocking a hip as she stared at Marcus.

"We need someone who can fight as dirty as Gianna does," Marcus answered.

"And we all know I know how to fight dirty, am I right?"

"Why would you help us?" Cate asked. "Why would we trust you?"

Dominique frowned with a shrug. "You don't have to. I'll happily skip off into the sunset and let you let the little hellion run all over your family."

"No, you will not, Dominique," Marcus answered. "I had you released for this purpose, not to disappear."

"Your wife isn't appreciative. And I don't feel welcome. She hasn't even offered me tea."

"Tea? You want tea," Cate asked, her eyes wide. "Fine, I will pour you a cup of tea. My sincerest apologies, Dominique, the last time we spent time together, I was tied to a chair."

"Aww, and we're still sore over that, are we?" Dominique pouted, crossing her arms. "And here I thought we had a lovely time together."

Cate poured a cup of tea and thrust it toward her. "Here."

"Thank you, Cate. I really appreciate your hospitality so much. Now, maybe we can discuss the crux of the problem."

“The problem is that we don’t trust you, and we have no reason to,” Cate said.

“The reason is simple,” Dominique answered with grin after a sip of her tea. “I hate The Agency. Those poser wannabes running around all over the globe ferreting out magical power and pretending they know how to use it, that they could control the world. Please.” She rolled her eyes. “I would do this for free any day of the week just to see Gianna go down. But to get a favor owed from the big guy? Well, that’s just too good to pass up.”

Cate slid her eyes closed as she sank into her chair again. “I can’t believe this. Marcus, we can’t do this.”

“This is our best option. Dominique has abilities no one else has. And a burning desire to remove The Agency from existence.”

Dominique lifted a shoulder as she smirked at the group. “So, what do you say, fam? Are we all in?”

Cate let her head fall into her hands as she struggled to get on board with the plan of trusting this dangerous woman. She could provide them with an edge that no one else here could. Dominique had no scruples, no boundaries. She would do things the rest of them couldn’t even fathom to try to get ahead of Gianna and her Agency.

Before anyone could answer, the door to the library opened again. Cate twisted to find Laura in the doorway, her eyes scanning the room.

Cate leapt from her seat, her eyes widening.

“Wellll,” Dominique said, setting her teacup in her saucer and sliding it onto the coffee table before she strode across the room, “you must be the lovely Laura.”

Laura’s features pinched. “Do I know you?”

“We’ve never met before. I am your Auntie Dominique.”

“Laura—” Cate began but a wave of Dominique’s hand cut her off.

“Are you Aunt Celine’s sister?”

“Close. We’re cousins. But really, it’s your dad and I who go way back. We’re really close. So close that he and I almost—”

“That’s enough, Dominique,” Cate said with a shake of her head as she crossed to wrap an arm around her daughter. “Laura, you should go upstairs and—”

“No,” Dominique answered with a shake of her head. “No, no. Laura should not go anywhere without me. Really neither of you should.”

Silence met her words, and Cate flicked her gaze to Marcus. He pressed his lips into a thin line, his shoulders lifting into a shrug.

“Gianna is after you both. Am I not correct?”

“That is correct,” Marcus answered.

“So, then it looks like us girls will be spending some time together. Gosh, I can’t wait. Maybe we can braid each other’s hair and do our nails.” Dominique grinned at them.

“Mummy?” Laura asked, her features crinkled as she stared at Cate.

“It’ll be fine. Stay with Aunt Celine for a minute.”

“And me,” Damien said as he crossed to her and wrapped an arm around her. “How have you been, kiddo?”

“Hi, Uncle Damien,” she said as Cate crossed to Marcus.

“Marcus, you can’t be serious. You can’t actually want us to spend our time with Dominique as a solution to this problem.”

“Catherine, there is no one better at the moment. I am very sorry, but this solution is the only one possible. She is the best equipped to fight Gianna, or at the very least to get her somewhat frightened.”

Cate sucked in a deep breath, shaking her head. “I’ll do my be—”

An arm wrapped around her shoulders and Marcus’s. “Hi, kids, what are we talking about? Is this special spouse-to-spouse stuff or can anyone join in?”

“I’m really going to need you to back off, Dominique. And I don’t want you talking to Laura.”

“Well, that’s kind of an over-the-top request, Catie. I am going to be spending an awful lot of time with her. Being in the cone of silence...” Dominique tugged her lips back into a wince. “Total vibe killer.”

“I don’t want you vibing with my daughter, Dominique. You are here for one purpose, and one purpose only. To protect her from harm, not to vibe with her, not to talk to her—”

“Not to live at all.”

Cate pressed her lips into a thin line. “The last time we saw each other, I was tied to a chair.”

“Whoa, whoa, wait a minute...you’re not the Cate from now? You’re Cate from then?” She made a rumbling sound as her fingers stretched. “Mind blown. Wow. So, you’re not even her real mom.”

“She is in every way Laura’s mother,” Marcus answered.

“Except she’s not. Not yet. Come on, Marc, you know how this all works.”

Marcus’s jaw firmed, his eyes sliding closed. “Dominique, you are making me regret with a furious passion ever rescuing you from that prison.”

She turned the corners of her lips down. “Except you need me. I am literally the best person for this job. And I’m totally here for it, friends. The chance to take Gianna Caruso down is just too tantalizing.”

“Try to keep your running commentary to a minimum,” Marcus answered. “You are here for one purpose.”

“I understand my purpose here. And I plan on keeping my end of the bargain. You just make sure you keep yours. You’ve got a beautiful family, Marcus. I’d hate to see that ruined.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat as Dominique shot him a finger gun as she winked and backed away. “What was that supposed to mean?”

“Ignore her. It is Dominique and her usual threats. Again, Catherine, I am sorry, but while I work with Mother to find a solution to Laura’s dream curse, you need protection.”

“Are you sure Celine isn’t enough?”

Marcus’s eyes drifted to Celine, then to his daughter with Michael and Damien. “As powerful as Celine is, she is nowhere near as unscrupulous as Dominique.”

“It’s exactly those scruples I am concerned about,” Cate said with a rub of her temple.

“She should behave herself. She hates The Agency with a burning passion. Her antipathy toward them assures her loyalty to us.”

Cate let her gaze slid to the woman. “All right. Please try to find a solution fast. I fear her influence on this household, especially our kids.”

“I will,” he said as he kissed her on the cheek. “No one wants her gone from our lives more than me.”

“You’re leaving now?” Cate asked.

“I am. I will return for dinner regardless.”

Cate huffed out a sigh. “Maybe we should cancel dinners for now. I don’t know if I can handle dining with Dominique.”

“If it is any consolation, she has excellent table manners.”

“Very funny,” Cate answered, giving him a peck on the lips and a squeeze on his arm before they said a final goodbye.

“Daddy, are you leaving?” Laura asked as he strode to the door.

“Oh-ho,” Dominique said with a clap of her hands, “sorry, but it’s just wild to hear someone call you Daddy. Never thought I’d see the day.”

Laura wrinkled her nose at the woman.

Marcus ignored her, sighing before he answered. “Yes, darling, I will be back for dinner.”

She smiled and nodded at him before her eyes went to Cate who crossed to her. She slid an arm around her daughter. “I’m staying with you, Sweet Pea.”

“And me,” Dominique said with a devilish grin. “Now, why don’t you show me your room, kid?”

Laura glanced at Cate, her features questioning. “It’s fine. You should rest, anyway. You’ve barely been sleeping.”

“At your age, kiddo, you should be partying all night long. I know I was,” Dominique answered as they headed toward the door.

“Dominique,” Celine called. “Behave yourself. I’m still as powerful as you are.”

“Yeah, keep telling yourself that, cousin.” She winked before she strode into the hall. “Lead the way, Laura.”

“Mummy, I’m not sure I like her,” Laura whispered as she leaned closer to Cate. “Why did Daddy bring her here?”

“A long time ago before you were born, we knew Dominique. She is very powerful, just like Aunt Celine, but she is...a little more...crafty.”

Laura’s lips parted as she studied Cate.

“Just...take what she says with a grain of salt. She doesn’t always tell the truth either,” Cate said, kissing her daughter’s temple.

They snaked through the halls, pushing into Laura’s room. Dominique stalked around before she spun to face them. “So, I understand you’re supposed to be pretty powerful, huh, Laura?”

Laura eased onto her window seat, her lips tugging into a frown.

“You don’t need to answer that,” Cate said. “Dominique, you’re here to protect us, not probe for information.”

“Just making conversation, cherub cheeks.”

Cate slid her eyes closed, shaking her head at the woman’s crass demeanor.

“Besides, why wouldn’t she want to answer it. Oh, unless you’re not as powerful as Daddy Warlocks wants to claim you are.”

“My father doesn’t lie.”

Dominique crossed her arms, sucking in a sharp breath. “Ohhh, the kid doesn’t know her daddy used to play for the opposite team.”

“That’s enough, Dominique,” Cate retorted, fire in her eyes.

“I just never understand why you goody-goodies can’t just take ownership of your power and wield it in a way to take charge? I mean, honestly, what’s with this mopey attitude? ‘Gosh, I’m so powerful, but I hate it.’ Complete stupidity.” She whipped a fireball into existence. “Own your power.”

Cate bit her lower lip. It was going to be a long day with this woman.

They settled into a comfortable conversation about the next book they would read together while Dominique wandered around the room, eyeing various things. When Marcus returned before dinner, he had no new information, bringing a frustrating end to a frustrating day.

They made it through dinner before Cate changed into her pajamas and met Laura in her bedroom.

Dominique eased into the armchair across from the bed as Cate and Laura climbed into it.

Laura stared at her for a moment, her lips forming a pout. “Are you going to stare at us all night?”

“No, you’ll be even more boring asleep than you are awake,” Dominique retorted.

“Don’t you sleep?”

“I do. But I don’t need to. See what I mean about owning your power?” Dominique kicked her feet up on the side table.

“Just try to pretend she’s not here and go to sleep.” Cate fluffed her pillow and settled back, holding her arms out.

“Right. Plus, the light will be off anyway,” Laura said.

“I can see in the dark,” Dominique answered.

Laura’s lips parted. “No, you can’t.”

“Can so. Turn out the lights and hold up a few fingers and test me.”

Laura switched off the light and held up three fingers.

“Three. See, I told you.”

“It’s okay, Laura, just relax,” Cate said. “And try to get some sleep.”

They settled back in the bed, adjusting the covers. Just as they relaxed, a rogue breeze ruffled Cate’s hair. Her muscles stiffened as she tugged on the pull chain.

Light bloomed in the room, and her breath caught in her throat as she found Gianna standing at the end of the bed, a wicked grin on her face.

CHAPTER 11

Cate stared at the woman at the end of her daughter's bed, the cruel expression on her features as she flicked her gaze between mother and daughter. Her heart hammered hard against her ribs. She pulled Laura closer as her daughter gasped.

"Mummy?" Laura choked out.

Cate's heart ached as she held Laura closer. Every sob from her daughter tore at her, a vivid reminder of every danger she'd hoped to shield her children from. In that moment, her resolve hardened. No threat would go unanswered; no enemy would get past her unwavering guard.

"Gianna," Cate growled.

"Cate," she purred. "So lovely to see you again. And saddled with three children now." Gianna clicked her tongue. "How boring. I wonder if Marcus is still interested in you or if he's finally ready to move on."

The moonlight spilled through the open window, casting long shadows across the room that seemed to dance menacingly as Gianna spoke. The walls, once a protection, now felt like they were closing in, each of Gianna's words echoing off them with a sinister hiss.

"Gianna," Dominique's voice said from behind the woman.

Gianna's features pinched as the new voice entered the conversation. The smug smirk disappeared from her features as she realized they weren't alone.

Cate lifted her chin, feeling somewhat triumphant for the first time in a very long time. It was obvious that Gianna had not anticipated this.

She spun slowly until her eyes locked on Dominique. She licked her lips, her posture stiffening as she curled her fingers into fists.

“Dominique.” Gianna huffed out a sharp breath. “What are you doing here? I thought you were in prison.”

Dominique gave her a hearty laugh. “Well, guess what...I’m out.”

“And you came to Dunhaven Castle? I thought you and the illustrious Duke had parted ways long ago.”

“And then he came running right back when you started poking your nose where you shouldn’t have.” Dominique poked a finger at her.

Gianna scoffed. “Are you serious? The Queen of Mean is going to lecture me on poking my nose where it doesn’t belong?”

“Ohhh, Queen of Mean. I like that. But it’s a bit juvenile, don’t you think? Then again, what would I expect from a two-bit organization like The Agency.”

“The Agency is powerful. We can offer you things. We can—”

“Save the brochure, babe. The Agency is of no interest to me. I have no desire to join up with a bunch of self-important posers who can’t actually do magic.”

Gianna arched an eyebrow. “I didn’t think your previous organization wanted anything to do with you. I thought maybe you’d prefer to belong to something that could...get you closer to where you are supposed to be than where you are?”

“And, uh, where exactly is it that you think I am?” Dominique asked.

Gianna shrugged, her firsts unfurling a little. “A soldier without a country. You’re powerful, smart, and willing to do whatever it takes. Those are skills The Agency is very much in need of. And you could be rewarded handsomely. Very, very handsomely.”

Cate’s stomach twisted into a tight knot as she tightened her hold on Laura. Would Dominique betray them? Would they be left at the mercy of both of the women?

Dominique had no moral compass. She could easily defect. And Cate had no ability to do anything to protect her or her daughter.

She swallowed hard, wondering if they would end up in more trouble than they’d started with.

“Very handsomely,” Dominique said, bobbing her head. “Uh-huh.”

She crossed her arms, the leather of her jacket creaking. “That’s so interesting. Gosh, tell me more.”

Cate's heart skipped a beat. Dominique was about to sell them down the river.

Cate pushed back the covers, swinging her legs over the side of the bed. "Laura, get your robe, we are leaving."

"Sit down, sweetheart," Dominique said. "You're not going anywhere. Neither of you."

Gianna smirked at them. "Yes, Cate, sit down. This was a cute trick, but this was nothing more than a temporary delay. A tiny bump in the road. But The Agency can deal with all of that. You have nothing to offer than we can't top."

Dominique strode forward to the foot of the bed where Gianna stood, clicking her tongue. "See, that's not exactly true, Gigi. Do you mind if I call you Gigi?"

"I do," the woman answered.

Dominique wrinkled her nose. "Eh, well, tough luck. I want to do it."

"Respect is something The Agency insists upon, Dominique. We respect you, you respect us."

Dominique shrugged. "Yeah, well, I like to do what I want, Gigi. Like annoying you by calling you Gigi. Honestly, I thought cherub cheeks was uptight, but dang, you got it all over her."

Cate slid her eyes closed, shaking her head at Dominique's abrasive nature.

Gianna's jaw clenched, her nostrils flaring. "Let's get on with this, shall we? I, for one, would like to destroy Cate Kensie once and for all."

"Yeah, about that," Dominique said, clapping Gianna on the shoulder. "Thing is...I'm not interested in your stupid club."

"The Agency isn't exactly a 'stupid club,'" Gianna retorted. "We would welcome you with open arms, unlike the Order, who shunned you. Who do you have, Dominique? No one. Your family will not speak to you, no friends. Nothing. We could be your new family."

Cate shifted her gaze to Dominique. Judging from the look on her face, the speech may be working to join them. Were they about to lose their ally?

Dominique puckered her lips, her head bobbing. "Again, not entirely true. See, I have the little goody-goody there."

She poked a finger at Cate before she skirted the bed and patted her on the shoulder. "We're besties. We even had dinner together last night. Me, her, Marc, the kids. Can you believe Marcus Northcott with three kids? I mean, who saw that coming?”

“Cate Kensie is not going to give you anything like we can.”

Dominique sucked in a sharp breath. “I’m not interested in anything The Agency can offer me. Like literally nothing. I’m worth way more to The Agency than The Agency is worth to me.”

“You’re making a huge mistake siding with her.”

“We’ll see. I don’t think so, though. She serves a mean three-course dinner.”

“Joke all you want. You’ll find out when you are on the losing end... again.”

Dominique winced. “Me? The losing end. Babe, I always come out a winner.”

“You won’t this time. But you stay here and play family with Cate Kensie and her misfit crew. When she rejects you just like everyone else has, you’ll regret every choice you made, and this avenue will be closed to you.”

Dominique narrowed her eyes at the woman before she suddenly lunged at her, slamming her against the wall behind her. With one hand, she grasped Gianna around the throat and lifted her with superhuman strength.

“You’ve talked enough, Gianna. My turn. I will have no regrets. Because I am going to dismantle your little Agency piece by piece. And after I’m done, I’m going to destroy you.”

Gianna groaned and grunted against the attack, tugging at Dominique’s hands before she gave up. “Then do it,” she said through clenched teeth. “Do it. Destroy me if you dare.”

“Not yet. I still need you.”

“For?” Gianna grunted.

“I need you to deliver a message. Tell the powers that be at The Agency that we’re coming for them. And we’re going to destroy them. There will be no mercy, and no opportunity to surrender.”

She dropped Gianna in a heap on the floor before she took a few steps back. “Now, run along. You have an important message to deliver.”

Gianna scrambled to her feet, her chest heaving as she rubbed at her throat. “This isn’t over, Dominique. You don’t scare me.”

Dominique narrowed her eyes. “Then you’re more stupid than I thought.”

“We’ll see who has the last laugh,” Gianna growled before she disappeared from their sight.

Dominique spread her arms to the sides. “Seriously? She used a magic trick to do that. What an idiot.”

Cate huffed out a sigh of relief as she cupped Laura’s cheek in her hand. “Are you okay?”

“Uh-huh,” Laura said with a nod.

“I’m okay, too, Cate, thanks for asking.”

Cate pressed her lips together, shaking her head. “She hasn’t been terrifying you for months.”

“No, but she was pretty mean to me. All that stuff about having no family, no friends. That hurts, you know? I would have appreciated you two gals speaking up to tell her how I’m like a member of your family.”

Cate huffed out a breath as she climbed from the bed. “I had to spend most of that conversation wondering if we could trust you.”

“Ouch,” Dominique answered, pressing her hands against her heart. “That hurt, Catie. Of course you can trust me. I may not have the same moral compass you operate under, but I hate The Agency, and that’s almost the same.”

“Mummy, where are you going?”

“To find you father. He needs to know what happened.”

Dominique plopped onto the bed. “Don’t worry about us. We’ll be fine. We’re just going to gab about boys.”

“She’s coming with me.”

“Honestly, Cate, leave the poor kid here. She’s fine.”

“I don’t trust you,” Cate answered with a shake of her head.

Dominique wrapped an arm around Laura’s shoulders, pulling her closer. “Well, you’d better start. Because I don’t like working with people who treat me like this.”

“Mummy?” Laura asked, her features pinched with concern.

Cate slid her gaze between her daughter and Dominique. “I’ll only be a few minutes.”

“That’s the spirit,” Dominique said with a grin.

Cate kissed her daughter’s cheek. “I’ll be right back. You’ll be okay.”

She shot Dominique a warning glance before she hurried from the room. Her stomach turned over with each step she took away from her daughter's room. She raced through the halls to Marcus's bedroom and banged on the door, frantically.

He opened it a moment later. "Catherine? Has something happened? Where is Laura?"

"In her room with Dominique. Yes, something happened."

"What?"

"Come on," she said with a nod of her head, "we should get back there. I left her with Dominique."

Marcus bobbed his head as he tied his robe closed and followed her through the halls back to Laura's bedroom.

Cate rushed inside, finding Dominique with her feet kicked up on the window seat and Laura still in bed. She hurried to her side, giving her a tight hug. "You okay?"

"Yeah," Laura whispered.

"Marcus, good of you to drop by," Dominique said as she rose. "You just missed our good friend, Gianna."

He snapped his gaze to Cate. "Gianna was here?"

"Yes," Cate said with a nod.

"What happened?" he asked.

"I handled it. Just like I promised I would," Dominique answered.

"Catherine?" Marcus prodded.

"Uh, is my voice not working? Have I been sucked into a Shadowveil? I said I handled it." Dominique scoffed.

"Gianna offered Dominique a place in The Agency which she turned down," Cate answered.

Marcus arched an eyebrow. "She offered you a place in The Agency."

"The standard spiel," Dominique retorted. "I'm sure you've heard it, too. They want real magic instead of the little trinkets they like to collect."

"The trinkets seem pretty powerful," Cate said. "They give them lots of different abilities."

"None of which they have organically," Dominique answered. "You take away their toys, you take away their power."

Cate shifted her eyes from the woman to her husband.

"It is not as simple as that," Marcus said with a shake of his head.

"No, but it's a start. Imagine Gianna without the ability to disappear whenever she wants, hmm?" Dominique said.

“But we can’t possibly track all their resources and destroy them, right?” Cate asked.

“Well, we should. But we should also come up with a plan to counteract these little trinkets she’s so fond of.”

“Also, not easy,” Marcus answered.

Dominique chuckled, glancing sideways at him. “Wow, when did you get so soft?”

“I have not gone soft,” Marcus answered. “But this is not quite as cut and dried as you make it.”

“Was it when the first kid came or the second? Or maybe it was the last one. I haven’t met Anna yet, but I feel like we’re going to hit it off.”

“You do not need to meet any more of our children, Dominique, but if you have a plan to solve this, I’d like to hear it.”

“She has no plan,” Marcus answered. “She is merely spouting off like she so frequently likes to do.”

Cate held back a sigh. “We need to do something, Marcus.”

“I know that, Catherine. I am working on it. But this will take some time. Until then, we have all the necessary things in place to protect Laura. That is our primary concern.”

Cate pressed her lips together, nodding her head. “All right. I’ll try to be patient. But you know that’s not my virtue.”

“I know,” Marcus answered teasingly with a kiss on her cheek. “You always want to solve things quickly. I do not blame you.”

Cate squeezed his hand.

“Would you like me to stay?” Marcus asked.

“Nah, we’re all good. You should really go get some sleep. Gianna won’t be back tonight.” Dominique clapped him on the back.

He slid his eyes closed, shaking his head. “All right. We will all try to get some sleep.”

“Except me. I’m on watch,” Dominique answered.

“Good night, Catherine, I hope you sleep well. Laura, darling, get some rest.”

“Good night, Daddy,” she said with a soft smile.

Marcus left the room, and Cate sank onto the bed again. “Let’s try to get some sleep, okay?”

Laura slid down and leaned back into her pillows. Cate pulled the covers higher over her before she skirted the bed.

Dominique grabbed her by the arm as she passed, whispering, “We need to talk.”

Cate offered her a subtle nod before she climbed into bed with Laura. She flicked off the light and waited for Laura’s breathing to turn rhythmic. When it did, she crept from the bed, crossing to Dominique.

“Let’s step into the hall,” Dominique said.

“We shouldn’t leave her alone,” Cate hissed back.

“The kid’ll be fine.” Dominique grabbed Cate by the arm and dragged her to the door, opening it and shoving her into the hall.

“What do you want?” Cate asked.

“Marcus is wrong. I do have a plan. He just doesn’t want to execute it,” Dominique said. “But I think you might. What do you say, cherub cheeks? Are you ready to do what it takes to take down The Agency?”

Cate’s stomach clenched at the words. A plan Marcus didn’t agree with? Should she take the chance for her child? Or was this far too dangerous?

CHAPTER 12

Cate shifted her weight, her teeth digging into her lower lip as she stared at the woman in front of her. Dominique was not the most trustworthy person in the world, but if there was a chance to spare Laura further pain, she wanted to try it.

But could she get on board with a plan her husband didn't agree with in conjunction with a woman who had kidnapped her to make a statement?

Dominique leaned closer, her eyes going wider. "Hello?"

She snapped her fingers in front of Cate's face. "Are you in there? Is anyone alive?"

Cate smacked her hand away with a shake of her head. "Stop it. I'm thinking."

Dominique rolled her eyes at Cate. "What's to think about, precious? Afraid you may anger the hubs?"

"Afraid I can't trust you," Cate shot back. "You aren't exactly the most trustworthy person in the world, Dominique."

Dominique crossed her arms, shaking her head. "Are we still sore about the little incident all those years ago?"

"It wasn't years ago for me, Dominique, and it doesn't matter how much time has passed," Cate shot back. "What matters is you did it. You kidnapped me, you tortured Marcus, you tried to bring the world to its knees when you brought those Dracopires to earth."

"Have you never made a mistake in your entire life?"

“Of course I’ve made mistakes. Trying to destroy the world hasn’t been one of them.”

“It’s not my fault you’re boring,” Dominique retorted.

Cate heaved a sigh, sick of dealing with the woman already. She couldn’t possibly deal with her for much longer.

“Look, Catie, why don’t I tell you the plan here, and then you can decide. I just figured I’d give you the chance to save your kid ahead of schedule.”

“Why doesn’t Marcus agree with this plan?”

Dominique shrugged. “How should I know? The man is a shadow of his former self. The old Marcus, the one before he met you and turned into the wimp of the century, would have been all over this plan. I don’t know what you did to him.”

“I didn’t do anything to him. Marcus is usually cautious. You never are. You are always a hothead. So, forgive me if I am a little suspect of your little plan.”

Dominique offered her a devilish grin. “Oh-ho, my plan is not little, I can assure you of that.”

Cate shifted her weight, trying not to roll her eyes. “What is it? Bring some frightening creature to earth to terrorize Gianna and the rest of the world.”

“No, but I like the way you think, Cate.” Dominique poked a finger at her. “Now, you’re coming alive.”

“That was not a serious suggestion,” Cate answered with a sigh. “Okay, fine, just tell me your plan so I can shoot it down, and we can go back in with Laura. I don’t want her to wake up and think she’s alone.”

“The kid will be fine. She has to grow up sometime. Plus, having to fight back is what’ll teach her to embrace her powers.” Dominique wagged a finger at Cate. “Which she should be doing.”

“I haven’t stopped her.”

“You don’t know what you did, mama. You aren’t her real mom.”

Cate firmed her jaw, clenching her teeth. “Stop saying that.”

“I’m serious. Okay, so you saw the little squirt and got all warm and fuzzy inside. Technically, she is your kid. But you don’t know what the other Cate did to the poor kid. Obviously, she’s got a complex.”

Cate glanced at the carpet below their feet. “I don’t know how that happened.”

“It happened because somebody’s uptight about magic.”

Cate snapped her gaze up to Dominique. “I doubt that. Marcus clearly isn’t shy about his magic. I don’t think anyone taught the children to be. Logan isn’t and neither is Anna.”

Dominique narrowed her eyes. “Maybe it’s middle child syndrome. I don’t know, but clearly that kid has some issues with her identity.”

Cate pressed her lips together, the truth of the statement cutting her like a knife. “I don’t know how to fix that.”

“I do. Encourage her to let loose once in a while. I could help.”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “Definitely not. I don’t want her corrupted.”

“Corrupted, woooo,” Dominique said with a chuckle. “Okay, Mom, I won’t give her a nip of the scotch or tell her to kiss the redheaded kid that’s wandering around here.”

“I really wish you wouldn’t talk to her at all,” Cate answered.

“But I could teach her so much about owning her own power, accepting it, thriving with it.”

“Using it for evil.”

“I mean, I could definitely weigh in on that, but I figured we’d start small.”

Cate offered Dominique an unimpressed stare. “We do not need your help parenting our daughter, thank you.”

Dominique shrugged. “Okay, but it’s a bad move on your part. I mean, after all, you are the ones who came crawling to me to help you. Then, you’re tying my hands at every turn.”

“Marcus got you out of jail to help protect Laura, not to teach her the ways of The Order, not to influence her, and certainly not to mentor her.” Cate wagged a finger at Dominique with every item on the list.

“Wow, somehow, you’re even more uptight than you used to be. It’s like going all Insta-Mom made you way more boring.”

Cate’s nostrils flared as she huffed out a breath. “Look, let’s stop talking about how you want to play aunt of the year and go back to this supposed plan you have.”

“Oh, there’s no supposed about it. I have a plan. We need to find their cache of magical toys and burn it down...literally.”

Cate crossed her arms. “No kidding. Clearly, if it was as easy as that, we would be doing it.”

“It is as easy as that. I don’t know why you seem to think it’s not that easy. There are several known Agency locations, we just need to figure out which one has the biggest cache, then we sneak on in there, we blow it up, we laugh in Gianna’s face.”

“And how do you propose we do any of this?”

Dominique shoved her hands into her back pockets. “I have a few friends who owe me some favors. We can check with them, then we can map out a plan on getting inside.”

Cate’s stomach twisted into a tight knot. The plan made sense, but she couldn’t trust Dominique.

“Come on, Cate. Don’t you want to laugh in Gianna’s face the next time you see her? This would be a monumental blow to them.”

She leaned forward conspiratorially, a wicked grin on her features. “Imagine slipping past their wards, planting explosives right beneath their noses, and watching their cache of magical trinkets go up in smoke.”

"And if we're caught? We wouldn't just be facing retaliation; we'd be starting a war we might not win."

Cate fluttered her eyelashes. She desperately wanted to hand The Agency a blow after everything they’d done to her and her family and friends—especially the latest blow. But was this risky move worth the reward?

"Look, if we don't cripple them now, think about Laura. Next time, they might not just scare her in her dreams. They could come for her in reality."

Cate’s fingers curled into fists. "And what if your plan backfires? Laura could be in even greater danger. We need a foolproof method, not a reckless gamble."

“Okay, forget it. Clearly, you don’t want to put a quick end to this.”

“This is risky, Dominique. Obviously, Marcus thinks so or you’d be discussing this with him. And how do you think The Agency is going to react? They’re not just going to take this lying down.”

“No, they won’t.” A laugh bubbled up from Dominique. “But you know what...they won’t have much to fight back with, will they? Imagine Gianna Caruso completely powerless.”

“What if she ups her attacks on Laura? I don’t want things getting worse for my daughter.”

“The dream curse won’t be gone, but this is a step in the right direction. Taking away some of their power will severely limit them. Oh, forget it.

I'm not going to work this hard to convince you that removing The Agency's little toys severely deflates their ability to operate."

"I understand the general concept, and I don't disagree. I just..."

Cate shook her head, her eyes going to the ceiling.

"You're scared. I get it. If I wasn't so awesome, I would be scared, too. But I lost my fear a long time ago. You want to know how?"

"I suppose you're going to tell me whether I like it or not," Cate answered.

"No. If you don't want to hear my story, I won't tell it. I'm not going to overshare."

Guilt roiled through Cate at the words at dismissing the woman. "Fine, just tell me the story."

Dominique crossed her arms. "Nah. You don't want to hear it."

"I do. I...I want to hear your story," Cate said, her frustration at an all-time high with the woman.

"All right. Since you're so eager to hear it. When I was a little girl, about five years old, my father—he was a warlock—he told me I needed to stop being afraid of the dark. See, I used to light a fireball after he'd blow out the candles and leave it floating in my room while I dozed off."

"You were afraid of the dark? Interesting considering that you live on the dark side."

Dominique narrowed her eyes. "Are you going to listen or comment?"

"Sorry," Cate said with a shrug. "I'm listening."

Dominique offered her an unauthentic smile. "My father told me I had to stop being afraid. So he took me one night, and he put me in a cell. But I wasn't alone. There was a bear, one he'd starved for days."

Cate's stomach rolled at the words. "No, he—"

"Yes, he did. My father did not tolerate weakness. And I was too weak. He had to make me strong. And I became strong. I had to use everything I had to fight off that bear. I barely survived. When he found me the next morning, the bear was dead, and I almost was."

Cate's eyes soften momentarily, the harsh lines of judgment fading as she considers Dominique's brutal childhood. It doesn't excuse everything, but it adds a layer of tragic understanding to the woman's ruthlessness. But was any of it true? "Do you expect me to believe this?"

Dominique stared at her. "I don't care what you believe. But I really don't think we should sit on our hands and do nothing."

Cate licked her lips. “I don’t either, okay? I want to do something to. They hurt my child. I want to rip her limb from limb.”

Dominique clapped her hands together. “That’s the spirit, Cate. That’s the fire we need you to bring.”

Cate considered it. She wanted to stop The Agency, mostly from hurting her children, but she wanted to stop them from destroying the world, too. And she didn’t care how they did it. But it needed to end.

With a deep inhale, she lifted her gaze to Dominique, steeling her nerves. This risky move could save her family, but it could also lead to far more trouble. But she had to take the chance. She had to take the first step toward destroying The Agency, even if it scared her. “Tell me what I need to do.”

CHAPTER 13

Cate paced the floor of the library, gnawing on her lower lip. She'd lay awake the night before after agreeing to Dominique's plan second guessing everything.

She had been so desperate to stop the attacks on her family, especially her daughter, that she'd gone along with Dominique's crazy plan.

But hadn't that been what they'd brought Dominique here for? To sprinkle a little insanity into the mix and keep The Agency off guard?

She heaved a sigh, spinning on her heel as she ambled in the opposite direction. She curled a lock of hair around her finger as she flicked her gaze out the window.

Laura, Logan, Anna, and the Reid twins meandered across the property on horseback. Laura grinned at her brother as they set their horses to a gallop, racing to the folly on the property.

A slight smile curved the corners of Cate's lips as she watched her daughter who seemed to be much more at ease. She'd hesitated before she'd allowed her to go out with the others, worried that Gianna may appear while she wasn't being monitored.

"Mummy, I really want to ride. And Logan will be with me."

Logan nodded, wrapping a protective arm around his sister. "Yes, I will keep a careful eye on her. I won't let her out of my sight."

"Please, Mummy?" Laura pleaded with a wrinkled nose. "I love to ride. It clears my mind."

“Yeah, please, Mom?” Dominique said, clasping her hands together as she pretended to beg.

“All right. But if there is any sign of Gianna—”

“I will blast her, Mother.” Logan whipped up a fireball in his hand with a grin.

“Now, he is my kind of kid,” Dominique said, patting him on the back.

Cate waved the children away, shooting Dominique a warning glance.

“Great job getting rid of the kiddos, Mom. We need to talk.”

“Yes, we do,” Cate answered. “I’m—”

“I have a lead. I just need to check it out. While the kid’s out playing equestrian, I’ll hop over and see what we’re working with here.”

Before Cate could stop her, Dominique wiggled her eyebrows and disappeared from her sight, leaving her to pace the floor as she waited.

The doors to the library opened, and Cate’s heart rose into her throat.

Marcus slipped inside with a fleeting smile. “Good morning, darling.”

“Good morning,” she answered. “Did you get any sleep after what happened?”

“I managed some. I should be asking you that question. You are still human at the moment.”

Cate puffed out her cheeks as she glanced at Riley and Bailey, lounging near the cold hearth. “It’s just weird when you refer to me as human.”

He chuckled as he poured himself a cup of tea and sipped it. “So, did you sleep?”

“I can never distract you, can I?”

“No,” he answered as he closed the gap between them. “You cannot. Are you avoiding the question?”

“Maybe,” she answered. “I didn’t sleep that well after that visit.”

Marcus set his cup of tea down and pulled her closer. “Perhaps you should rest now.”

“I can’t,” she said with a shake of her head. “I can’t relax. Not until this is settled—at least for Laura. Are you going back to Rosenberg?”

“I am. Would you like to join me? Perhaps you could speak with yourself, gain some reassurance.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat at the words. “Uhh, maybe another time. I’m still not sure how I feel about talking to myself.”

He furrowed his brows. “Did it not help when you were trapped in the 1950s?”

“Yes, it did, but it’s still...weird. Maybe another time. I also feel like I should stick close. Laura is still fragile, and I feel like disappearing on her right now would be a bad thing.”

Marcus flicked his gaze outside to the children. “She is doing so much better than she has without you here.”

“Even though I’m not her real mom?” Cate asked with a roll of her eyes.

“I see Dominique has been at it with her running commentary,” Marcus said with a shake of his head.

“She never stops talking. Ever. Hey, do you know anything about her childhood?”

“Not much. Celine may know better about when she was a small child. They are the same age.”

“Did they spend a lot of time together?”

“Enough to make Celine unhappy with her even before their supernatural battles started.” Marcus picked up his teacup again. “Why do you ask?”

“Nothing. I just...wonder how she got to be the way she is.”

“Dominique likes power. She has always sought it in any way she can. Try not to let her bother you, darling.” Marcus finished his tea and kissed her on the cheek.

“Did you just guzzle down that tea?”

“I am in a hurry. I do want to find a solution to that problem.”

“Do you think it will still bother her now that Gianna is being more aggressive?”

“Yes, definitely,” Marcus said as he strode to the door. “It may even intensify.”

Cate’s stomach rolled at the words.

“I will be back by dinner,” he said as he stood in the doorway. “If you need me, call.”

“I will,” she said with a brief smile before he stepped from the library.

With a heavy sigh, she plopped into the leather armchair near the fireplace. Riley lifted his head, staring at her. “I don’t know, Riley. Life here is so different, but so much the same.”

The little dog flopped his tail before he laid his head back down.

She stared down at her wedding ring, her thumb rubbing the warm metal. She had to protect her family. And with nothing helping on the dream curse front, she had to take Dominique up on her offer to strike The Agency.

Behind her, the doors creaked open again. Cate glanced over her shoulder, the rows of ancient tomes casting long shadows in the dim light of dawn that spilled through the stained-glass windows, giving the library a somber, timeless feel. “What did you forget?”

“How comfortable these chairs were,” Jack answered as he strode in and collapsed into the same armchair he’d always sat in.

“Really? You haven’t been sitting in them for twenty years?”

“I have. At every chance I get. We always have to unwind here after solving our problems.”

Cate sucked in a deep breath, her gaze falling on the coffee table in front of them. “I wish we’d solve this problem.”

Jack pressed his lips together, leaning forward as he reached for her hand. “Oh, Cate, I’m so sorry this is happening. It was one thing when they were ruining our lives, but poor Laura.”

Cate’s eyes brimmed with tears. She raised her eyes to the ceiling, blinking. “Yeah, that’s exactly how I feel. I could redo everything we’ve been through multiple times if it saved Laura.”

“I would, too. I’d go back into that cell if I thought it would help.”

Cate squeezed his hand. “It won’t help.”

She shifted in her seat, wondering if she should confess her wild plan to him.

“Cate? Is there something else?”

She swallowed hard, flicking her eyes to Jack. “You know Celine’s cousin is here, right?”

“Dominique?” He shook his head, his eyes widening. “Wow, she’s a character, isn’t she?”

“She’s more than a character. She’s very dangerous. Do you remember when I went to Maine?”

“Which time?”

Cate tugged her lips into a wince, realizing he’d had twenty more years of time spent with her than she’d lived. “Uhh, twenty years ago, just after everyone found out I was married to Marcus.”

“When Gianna tried to take Dunhaven. Yes, you went to Maine afterward.”

Cate nodded. "Yes. Not to rest. I actually went there to remove Marcus from The Order. While I was there..." Cate swallowed hard as the memories flooded back to her. "Dominique kidnapped me."

Jack's lips formed an O as he blinked rapidly. "Are you joking?"

"No...she is definitely Dark Side," Cate said. "She's been in prison for almost twenty years after she killed an adjudicator."

"An adjudicator?" Jack asked, his brows furrowing.

"An adjudicator," Cate said before she waved her hands dismissively. "Never mind. You don't want to know."

"You still know me so well, Cate. I don't want to know what that is. Anyway, so, she's a murderess."

Cate nodded. "And an all-around bad apple. I know you've had some issues with Marcus in the past, but...she makes everything he's ever done look tame."

Jack settled back into his seat, rubbing his lips. "So, why is she here?"

"Marcus got her out of prison to help. She does have some pretty insane skills when it comes to magic. And she hates The Agency." Cate raised her eyebrows, the scene from last night unfolding in her mind. "You should have seen her with Gianna."

Jack snapped his gaze to Cate. "When did you see Gianna?"

"She was here last night."

"She was in this house last night?" Jack asked, his voice raising with panic.

"She was. Dominique got rid of her pretty easily. Apparently, she really hates her. Which is good for us."

"If we can trust her."

Cate pressed her lips together as the doubt bubbled to the surface again. "That's the question I have been asking myself all morning. Especially since...I...I may have done something really stupid."

Jack's features twisted with concern. "What did you do?"

"It's not..." Cate grimaced.

"Cate?"

"Ummm..." She pressed her lips together as she searched for the words.

"Caaaaate," Jack said, a warning in his voice.

"I just..."

“Cate! What’s going on? Come on, you can tell me. I’m not judgy like your husband.”

Cate shot him a glance. “He’s not judgy. He’s just...set in his ways. Anyway, I really want to end this war with The Agency. And I want the attacks against Laura to stop. So...I may have agreed to one of Dominique’s plans.”

“You agreed to a plan from a woman who is evil and kidnapped you once?”

“Marcus was evil and kidnapped me once and look how well that worked out. We’re in love, and we have three kids now.”

“Unless you’re planning on falling for Dominique, I don’t think it’s going to work out the same way, Cate.”

Cate shook her head, pressing her lips together at his bad joke. “You know what I’m saying. She promises we’ll deliver a decisive blow to The Agency. It was just too juicy of an opportunity to pass up.”

“What’s the play?” Jack asked.

She offered him a slight smile. “Thank you.”

“For what?”

“For accepting this so readily. Marcus would never have agreed.”

“I haven’t agreed yet either. I just want to know so I can object.”

She settled back in her chair, the leather squeaking as she pressed into it. “Still the same old Jack.”

“Just a few more gray hairs,” he said with a grin. “But seriously, Cate, if you’re going to go after The Agency, I want to help.”

“Jack,” she said with a shake of her head, “this is going to be dangerous. I can’t–“

“Don’t say you can’t ask because you’re not asking, I’m offering. After what they did to me, I want to deliver a decisive blow. I can’t pass up this opportunity either.”

Cate gave him a grateful smile. “All right. Well–”

The doors burst open, and Dominique strode inside. She stopped dead, her hands falling to her hip. “Who’s the lumberjack?”

Cate and Jack rose to their feet. “Dominique, this is Jack Reid, my estate manager here at Dunhaven. Jack, this is Celine’s cousin, Dominique.”

Dominique narrowed her eyes at Cate. “Please never introduce me as Celine’s cousin again. I’m Dominique Laurant. I don’t need to be anyone’s sidekick.”

“Right, sorry, well, anyway, Jack wants to help.”

Dominique’s lips parted as she leaned forward. “What now?”

“Jack wants to help deliver that decisive blow to The Agency. They did some pretty nasty things to him, and he’s on board to help us.”

Dominique crossed her arms. “I kind of thought this was going to be a girls’ thing, you know?”

Jack arched an eyebrow. “Why would you object to help? Unless there’s something you aren’t telling us.”

“No offense, but I usually work alone. And when I don’t, I only work with people I trust. I don’t trust men who wear plaid flannel shirts as a rule.”

Jack crossed his arms, shaking his head. “You’re going up against The Agency, and you don’t want help because of my wardrobe?”

“Was I unclear in some way?” Dominique asked.

“Yes, in the way that makes any semblance of sense. And whether you like it or not, I’m in on this. Or I’ll take my plaid shirt over to Marcus and tell him what you’re planning.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat at the threat, which she hoped was only for Dominique’s benefit.

“And this is why I don’t trust men who wear plaid flannel shirts. You little tattletale. Let’s see how well you talk once I whip this at you.” Dominique conjured a fireball in her hand.

Cate stepped between them, her eyes widening. “No. Stop it. We’re all on the same team here.”

With a flick of her wrist, Dominique extinguished the fireball, her expression amused as if the deadly flames were no more than a party trick. “The goody-goody is right. Anyway, we don’t have time to waste. We need to go meet my contact now. So, let’s get going. We’ll location hop.”

“No,” Cate said with a shake of her head as she backed away from Dominique. “We can’t leave now. I have to stay here for Laura.”

“Seriously?” Dominique glanced out the window. “The kid looks fine. We’ll make it quick.”

“No! If she finds out I’m gone...or Gianna comes after her...”

Jack wrapped an arm around Cate as her features pinched.

Dominique rolled her eyes. “Where is Marcus when you need him? Can’t he watch the kids? They’re his, too.”

“Marcus is in Germany with Anna...and the other me trying to find a solution to the dream curse.”

Dominique heaved a sigh. “I can’t believe this. We’re finally going to get The Agency on their heels, and you can’t go because you have to play Mom of the Year.”

“I’m not...” Cate pressed a hand against her forehead. “Okay, how long is this going to take?”

“Not long. We’ll be back in minutes. We just need to find the contact, get the location, pop back. Super simple.”

Cate shifted her weight, her eyes flicking out the window to her children. Something gnawed at her, but she knew they needed to do it if they wanted this information.

“Come on, Cate, time’s a-wastin’.” Dominique tapped an imaginary watch on her wrist.

“All right, fine.”

Dominique offered her a wicked grin. “Now, you’re talking.”

She stepped forward, eyeing Jack. “Do we have to take the Scot?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod.

Dominique rolled her eyes as she sighed. “Unbelievable. I don’t like Scots. All right, here we go.”

Dominique reached out, clamping a hand down on each of their forearms. The room around Cate disappeared, and a new location replaced it.

A dizzying rush enveloped Cate, the ground beneath her feet seemed to dissolve, and a sudden gust of heat choked her as they materialized in a starkly different landscape.

Cate glanced around, a sinking feeling in the pit of her stomach as oppressive heat wafted over her. She twisted to eye Dominique. “Where did you take us?”

“To meet my contact,” Dominique said, already walking away. “Oh, did I forget to mention he’s in Hell? Sorry.”

Cate’s stomach plummeted at the words. She’d been here once before, and she’d barely survived it. Was this a death sentence for both her and Jack?

CHAPTER 14

Jack's eyes went wide as sweat beaded on his brow after only seconds in the intense environment. Cate's stomach turned over, not recognizing the realm despite having been there once before. It had been a difficult journey, one that had been exceptionally dangerous. Between the heat, the head games, and the creatures, she'd nearly lost her life more than once. Had it not been for Celine, Damien, and Michael—all immortals—she wouldn't have made it through as a human.

This time, there were two humans and only one immortal—and a sketchy one at that. The odds were against them. And Cate would never forgive herself if something happened to Jack. She did not want to leave the twins fatherless.

"Dominique!" she shouted as she stormed after her.

"What?" Dominique called over her shoulder, her figure silhouetted against a skyline of jagged, molten cliffs that seemed to bleed into the crimson sky, utterly unfazed by the suffocating waves of heat that warped the air around her.

"How could you bring us here?" Cate's voice cracked, her eyes scanning the perilous terrain that had once nearly claimed her life, the weight of her responsibility for Jack pressing down on her."

Dominique glanced at her, her eyebrows furrowing. "With a location hop. I thought I was clear about that."

"That's not what I meant, and you know it."

“I didn’t,” Dominique retorted. “I almost never know what you mean. You and I are really not on the same wavelength.”

“I don’t mean the logistics of how we ended up in the Hellscape, which I still wonder about because I thought location hops were earthbound.”

“Not when you have skills like mine, cupcake,” she answered with a grin.

“Anyway, that wasn’t the genesis of the question. I meant how could you bring us to the Hellscape? We could die here.”

“We could?” Jack asked as he puffed with effort to breathe in the thick, hot air.

“Yes, we could. If not from the extreme elements, from the many, dangerous creatures that lurk here, or that crazy place where your own thoughts attack you.”

Jack’s jaw dropped open, a bead of sweat trailing down his temple as he gasped for air that felt like inhaling through an open oven door. “What? That’s... that’s not possible, right?” His voice was a mix of disbelief and rising panic.

“We’re not going to that part,” Dominique said with a sigh. “It’s not far from here. You’ll be fine.”

“I don’t believe you. Plus, a little warning would have been nice. I would never have agreed to bring Jack here.”

“Whoa, but you would have come?” Jack asked.

“Yes, I would have because I want to hear what this so-called contact has to say. Plus, I’ve been here once before.”

Dominique shot her a narrow-eyed glance. “That’s right. You’re the jerk who freed Marcus from his contract with The Order. Gosh, you were annoying back then.”

Cate shook her head at Dominique as they passed a burning bush. “You’re annoying right now. I can’t believe you brought us to Hell.”

“I really never wanted to come here, even for a visit,” Jack said. “It’s hot, right?”

“Yep, it’s hot, all right. It’s an oppressive heat, like breathing through a blanket soaked in scorching sand,” Cate explained, her throat parched as she spoke, the heat wrapping around her like a suffocating shroud. “And it’s only going to get worse. The last time, Damien had to carry me part of the way. I barely made it. And I definitely wouldn’t have made it past the Serpedes.”

“The what now?”

“Don’t ask,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “I still have nightmares. “

Dominique let her head fall back. “First of all, we’re not going near the Serpedes, and second, even if we were, I could easily get rid of them.” Dominique whipped a fireball into existence and pitched it away.

“That didn’t exactly work out the last time I was here.”

“Well, you came with idiots the last time, so that would explain it. I mean you’ve got Michael—he’s hot, but hardly powerful. Damien, powerful—he is a Laurent, after all, but he was a newbie, he didn’t know his fireballs from a hole in the ground.”

“We had Celine.”

“Pfft,” Dominique said with a roll of her eyes. “First of all, powerful, yes—again, Laurent blood runs through her veins, but she spent so much time not cultivating her power, that she’s hardly as strong as she could be. Second, she didn’t have the modifications I made. I magnified my power, don’t forget.”

“You are toying with our lives, Dominique,” Cate said with a wag of her finger. “You had no right to do this.”

Dominique sucked in a breath. “You’re really a total drag, Cate.”

“Sorry to rain on your parade, but this is serious. How much farther is your so-called contact?”

“Just above, hidden in those hills.”

“Great. This is close to the plain where those Hellwolves nearly killed us.” Cate shuddered despite the heat.

“Stick close to me, kids. We won’t run into any trouble.”

Cate’s heart thrummed painfully against her chest, echoing the thud of Dominique’s feet hitting the ground. Each heartbeat was a stark reminder of their peril.

Cate’s heart hammered against her ribs, sweat slicking her skin and making her clothes stick to her.

Next to her, Jack trudged along, his face beat red.

“How are you doing?” Cate asked.

“Oh, I’m just dandy. I’m following a crazy witch through Hell. This is...exactly what I’d thought about doing today when I woke up.”

Cate patted his shoulder. “You probably shouldn’t have worn the flannel if you’d planned on this.”

“You’re right. I’ve blundered my wardrobe choice for two different reasons today: the extreme heat and the fact that what’s-her-name apparently hates flannel plaid.”

“She’d be very disappointed in your closet,” Cate said. “If you get too tired, let me know so we can sit down, okay? But not for too long because you may never get back up.”

“Okay. I’m just hoping this place that’s so close is pretty close,” he said, wiping at his brow.

They strode across the field toward the rock face in the distance.

Cate instinctively pressed closer to Jack. “The last time I was in this field, we were attacked by horrid wolves.”

“I hope they’re asleep this time.”

Cate scanned the tall grass in search of any trouble. As they reached the midpoint of the field, her heart stopped. The grass parted in three separate places as creatures made their way toward them.

A pack of Hellwolves. She swallowed hard, worry consuming her. “Oh, no.”

“What is it?” Jack asked.

“Hellwolves.” She poked a finger in the direction of the shifting blades of grass.

She twisted to call out to Dominique, but before she could, Dominique flung her hand in the direction of the wolves. A reddish-purple bolt shot from her hand, snaking through the grass and blasting the spot directly in front of the wolves snaking toward them.

Dominique continued marching forward, undeterred.

“Dominique!” Cate called as the wolves hesitated only for a moment before they started toward them again.

She shot out another bolt, this time a longer barrage, driving them back. The trails of crushed grass now moved in the opposite direction.

Dominique twisted to grin at them. “See? I told you things would work out. I’m way cooler than my cousin.”

Cate licked her lips, threading her arm through Jack’s as she pulled him forward. “I don’t care what she says, I don’t want to be here a second longer than we have to be. Come on.”

“It’s just ahead. His cave is at the base of the mountain.” Dominique spun back around and continued toward the rock face.

The heat made Cate feel lightheaded as they neared the mountain, and she's worried that either her or Jack wouldn't be able to handle this place for much longer.

"Right up here," Dominique called, poking her finger at a dark hole yawning in the rock face.

Cate dragged Jack forward to the mouth of the cave, ducking into it. "Dominique?" she called, her voice echoing off the stone.

No one answered.

"Dominique!" she shouted again.

Her heart sank as no one answered. Had they entered the wrong cave, or had she ditched them here?

Had this been an elaborate trap designed to kill them both?

Cate licked her lips as she tried to think of a way out of the situation they'd found themselves in.

They inched their way forward, worry twisting Cate's stomach into a tight knot.

As they came to a cavern, Dominique popped out from behind a wall. "Boo!"

Cate screeched, throwing her arms in the air as Dominique doubled over in laughter.

She poked a finger at Cate as she snickered. "Oh-ho-ho, that was so awesome. Oh, I always wanted to do that to someone, but I never had anyone as naive as you two."

"This isn't the time for games," Cate scolded.

"Oh come on, Cate. Man, you were uptight before but now that you're in Mom mode, you're like annoyingly uptight. I'm just trying to lighten the mood."

Cate glared at her. "My mood will be lightened once we have this information in hand and are safely back in the library where we are in no danger of dying from excessive heat."

Dominique shook her head and twisted on her heel, scanning the cavern. "Tobther? Hey, Tobther? Are you here?"

"If we just walked through Hell for this guy to stand us up..." Jack wiped at his forehead as sweat ran down his face.

Across the room, a hunched over figure in a ragged robe crept into the space. "Dominique," he hissed, his voice barely above a whisper.

"Yep, it's me, pal. How you been?"

With his head still bowed, he spoke again. "Please, what is it that you require?"

"Information," she answered. "I hear you have some, and I want it."

"What information?" The strange man, his skin stretched over his bones in what looked like a painful manner, still refused to raise his gaze to her.

Dominique set her hands on her hips. "I need to know where The Agency keeps the bulk of their little toys."

This statement finally made him snap his gaze up to Dominique. With terror floating in his black eyes, he searched her face. "What?"

"I need to know where The Agency keeps the vast majority of their little magical trinket collection." Dominique spoke slowly, as though he couldn't understand her.

"I cannot disclose that information," he answered.

Dominique puckered her lips, wrinkling her nose. "Aw, shucks."

Cate's heart dropped. They'd risked their lives to get here and all for nothing. What would they do now?

"My apologies, Dominique. I cannot help you."

"Yeah, that really stinks, Tobther. Because my friends and I were counting on you."

"Sorry," the man answered with a bow of his head.

"Yep, you will be," Dominique said as she lunged forward, grasping the man by his scrawny neck.

Cate's stomach flip-flopped as the scene unfolded. Dominique slammed him against the stone as he wriggled in her grasp, trying to break free. "See, I need that information, and I will do whatever it takes to get it."

"I have a pact with them. I cannot betray it."

"Ohhh, I know all about the pact," Dominique hissed. "I know you helped them build that little magical menagerie. And now, I want to destroy it. So, I need to know where you worked as their curator."

He cried out, squirming. "I can't, I can't."

"Can't or won't?" Dominique asked.

"Can't," he choked, "can't. You know that."

"What I know is my hand is closing, fast...soon, I'll choke you until you pass out, and then I will dismember you limb from limb. And after that, I'll burn every piece of you until you're nothing but ash. And then your contract will be canceled, because you'll be gone."

"Please," he cried.

“You know me, Tobther. I have no mercy. Tell me or die, it’s as simple as that.” She narrowed her eyes at the creature in her grasp, her features unyielding.

Cate held her breath, wondering if they would find the information they needed or if this would all be for naught.

She grabbed onto Jack, her knees feeling weak as she waited for an answer.

Time seemed to stand still. But before the creature could speak, Jack fell against her. She snapped her gaze to him, her heart skipping a beat.

Jack plunged to the ground, his skin peppered with sweat as he passed out.

Cate dropped to her knees next to him, her eyes going wide as they welled with tears. Would Jack wake up or had the intense heat been enough to kill him?

CHAPTER 15

"*J*ack?!" Cate's voice cracked, sharp with panic. She swiveled to Dominique, her words tumbling out in a rapid, breathless stream. "Dominique! Jack's collapsed!"

Cate sank to her knees, rolling his bulky form over. As her own pulse raced, she pressed two fingers to his neck, feeling for a pulse.

A thready beat announced the beat of his heart, and she watched carefully for the rise and fall of his chest.

Dominique shot her a glance over her shoulder. "Uh, I'm a little busy right now, in case you hadn't noticed."

"We need to get him out of here!" Cate shouted as she patted at Jack's cheeks.

"Jack, come on, wake up," Cate urged, her voice echoing oddly in the thick, sulfurous air that reeked of brimstone and ash mingled with the oppressive heat.

Dominique screwed up her face as she dropped the creature on the ground and twisted toward Cate, her hands on her hips. "Seriously? I am in the middle of extracting information, and you want to leave now?"

"He's dying."

"He's overheated. Blow on him or fan or something. Think, Cate. Use your brain. I'm a little busy."

Cate's gaze fell on Tobther as he crawled away toward the yawning entrance of the cave he'd come from.

Dominique twisted to follow the line of her gaze, shaking her head. “Now, see what happened? He almost got away.”

She thrust a hand out, capturing the creature in some sort of invisible lasso and pulling him backward. “Uh-uh-uh, we weren’t done with our conversation yet.”

“Please, Dominique,” he cried as she lifted him in the air again, his feet dangling. “I can tell you nothing.”

“Except you know everything. Now, are you going to make this easy and just tell me, or do I need to do something you’re not going to like.”

Cate hauled Jack into her arms, trying to fan him with her hand, but it was a losing battle. She stared at the scene unfolding in front of her, terrified of what she may see happen next.

“I can’t tell you—” His voice cut off as a gurgling cry escaped him. “Please...” he whispered.

“Please what?” Dominique asked. “Can’t quite hear you over that painful rattle you’ve got going on.”

“Stop,” he choked out.

“Ohhh, okay. I will. The second you tell me what I want to know.”

“I can’t,” he answered again, his features twisting with a pathetic pleading stare.

“Gianna’s wrath and the punishment from The Agency will look like a walk in the park compared to what I’m about to do to you. I already explained the physical torture, but you know what else? I really need this information, so I may have to hop into your mind and do a little digging. And let me tell you...I won’t be gentle.”

Cate’s eyebrows raised at the threat. Was Dominique merely toying with the creature in an attempt to get him to confess, or could she really crawl into the man’s mind?

“You can’t!” he shouted.

“Can’t isn’t a word that exists in my vocabulary. I assure you, I can, in fact go into your mind. I’ll have to incapacitate you first, obviously, and that’s not going to be pleasant. For you, I mean. I’m looking forward to it.”

His lower lip trembled as she gave him a moment before she let him fall to the ground. “Okay, fine. We’ll do this the hard way. Do you have a preference on which leg I break first?”

“No, please, please. All right. Okay. They often move their artifacts around. But the bulk of them—at least when I was curator—were kept in a chalet in the Swiss Alps.”

“The Swiss Alps, huh?” Dominique questioned as she conjured a fireball and tossed it back and forth between her hands like a toy. “That shouldn’t be too hard to track down.”

The creature shook his head, a hand raised to protect him in case she tossed the weapon his way.

“I assume I’m going to need some sort of passcode or key to enter?”

The man licked his lips as he nodded. “Both.”

“Both. Well shucks, that stinks. Who has a key?”

“Only upper echelons, a handful of them.”

“Gianna?” Dominique asked.

The creature winced a little, but didn’t answer.

Dominique raised her eyebrows, prodding him until he nodded. “Yes. Gianna has a key.”

“Of course, she does. And how does the passcode work?”

“It’s unique for each key. You’d have to know Gianna’s passcode if you use her key. If you use someone else’s, you’d need theirs.”

“Do you know them?”

He didn’t answer.

She leaned closer, narrowing her eyes. “Tobther? Don’t hold out on me, buddy?”

“There is a listing of them kept in the London files.”

Dominique sucked in a breath. “Looks like we have our work cut out for us, don’t we? Well, gosh, it’s been a real pleasure working with you again, Tobther. I can’t tell you how nice this has been.”

The man-like creature lowered his hand a little, his eyes widening. “Now that I have given you the information, can you...help me?”

Dominique screwed up her face. “Do I look like the Sisters of Charity to you?”

The creature set his watery eyes on Cate. “Please.”

“What do you want?” Cate asked.

“Don’t listen to her. She can’t do anything for you. She’s still a human.”

“But...she is here.”

“Thanks to me. And look at her pathetic friend...still passed out like a total wimp. Anyway, I need to cut the chitchat short. We have to get going before this one bites it.” Dominique crossed to Jack and hauled him to his feet with superhuman strength. “Toodles, Tobther.”

She clamped a hand around Cate’s wrist, and the oppressive heat of the otherworldly realm faded away.

A shiver snaked down Cate’s spine as the normal temperature of the library surrounded them before the details of the space filled in.

Dominique dropped Jack as they arrived, and he crashed to the floor with a thud.

“Jack!” Cate exclaimed, bending to check on him.

Dominique crossed the room, grabbing the pitcher of water before she returned to them and dumped it on Jack’s head.

He coughed and sputtered as his eyes snapped open. “What happened?”

“You went down hard, pal. I told you not to wear that horrible shirt, but you just had to play lumberjack,” Dominique answered as she returned the empty pitcher to the drink cart.

“You passed out,” Cate told him, “but we got the information we needed.”

Jack pushed up to his elbows, wiping at his wet face. “Ugh. Good. Can we move on it.”

“We have some things to collect,” Dominique answered.

“The passcode and the key,” Cate said with a nod as she helped Jack to his feet, walking him to the armchair to sit down. “How do you propose we get them?”

“Well, we’re going to have to do some fancy footwork here, but I propose we break in and steal them.”

Cate offered Dominique an unimpressed glance. “Cute. I understand that. How are we going to get into this London office, then get Gianna’s key, and then find the Swiss chalet?”

“I know where the chalet is, that’s the least of our problems. The London office shouldn’t be too hard. A little after-hours recon should give us what we need there. Gianna’s key...well, that’ll take some doing. She doesn’t like to let things out of her sight.”

Cate bit into her lower lip, recalling the last time she had to retrieve a key from Gianna. It had led to a knock-down, drag-out fight between the two of them when she'd tried to steal it from around the woman's neck as she slept.

"But I trust we'll figure it out," Dominique answered. "Now, when do you want to leave for London? Oh, wait, are you still on babysitting duty?"

"I am not babysitting Laura. She is in grave danger from The Agency."

"Why isn't she hanging out with Grandma in Germany? It's the perfect place for her," Dominique asked as she glanced out the window at Laura outside with the others.

Cate crossed her arms with a sigh. "The other me is there recovering from some sort of supernatural problem. I guess we didn't want to tell the kids."

"Can't she go to Stratfordshire?"

"How does that help?" Cate stretched her arms to the side.

"She's not quite as accessible if Gianna doesn't know where to find her." Dominique screwed up her face. "You know, I really thought you were smarter than this. I don't understand why Marcus always brags about your brilliance. You're not that smart."

"Gianna will easily find her there if she is not at Dunhaven."

Dominique tilted her head. "What if we could stash her in a place where Gianna couldn't find her easily?"

Cate wagged a finger at Dominique, her features going taut. "You are not taking my daughter to the Hellscape and leaving her there."

"Calm down, Catie, no need to get your knickers in a twist. I have another idea." Dominique strode to the door and peered into the hall. "Never around when you need her. Be right back."

As she left the room, Jack scrubbed his face. "I'm not sure how much more I can take of that woman."

Cate collapsed into her chair, shaking her head. "Same. I cannot believe this was Marcus's solution. Although, at least we're moving forward somewhat."

Dominique returned a few minutes later with Celine. "I present my brilliant idea."

Cate wrinkled her nose. "It's Celine."

Dominique's features tugged into an unimpressed glare and her shoulders slumped. "Wait, I'll explain it like you're five. Celine and her intrepid little Slayers take her to the Buckley house in Maine. Celine casts a shroud spell over the entire place. Bada-bing, bada-boom, the kid's hidden."

Cate's eyes widened, and she flicked her gaze to Celine. "Can that happen? Is that a thing?"

"Yes, and no," Celine answered. "It can happen. It's not as clear-cut as it sounds, but if you don't need her shrouded for an extended period of time, we could probably create enough confusion for Gianna that she couldn't readily find her."

"Would it stop the dream curse, too?" Cate asked.

"No," Celine said with a shake of her head. "She could still enter her sleep, but she wouldn't be able to appear to her until she'd dismantled the shroud."

Cate rose to her feet, pacing the floor. "Wait, why didn't Marcus suggest this?"

"I don't think he wanted to take Laura away from you while you sorted this situation," Celine answered, "particularly since she wasn't being very forthcoming. And...there is some danger to it."

Cate's heart skipped a beat as she tried to weigh the odds. Her daughter was already in danger from The Agency. Would this be more or less danger? "What danger?"

"Shroud spells can...make her invisible even to those who want to see her. Basically, we run the risk of her turning into essentially a ghost."

Cate's jaw flopped open, her heart tearing in two as she tried to make the decision.

"That's not typical," Dominique answered.

Celine shook her head. "It's still a risk."

Cate slid her eyes closed, easing into the armchair. She bit into her lower lip, trying to determine what was worse: Gianna harming her children or them turning invisible.

"The invisibility may not be permanent. Besides, Celine wouldn't let that happen. There are signs you can watch for, you know."

"I know. And I would monitor her very closely, but I do want to make you aware of the risks, Cate."

Cate opened her eyes, her lips tugging into a grimace. "What would you do?"

Celine shoved her hands into her pockets with a shrug. "I think you need to work on solving this problem without Laura as a distraction."

Because this is what Gianna does—she distracts.”

Cate bobbed her head. “Can you take all the children, hide them all?”

Celine puffed out her cheeks but nodded. “I can. It’ll be trickier, but I can.”

Cate pressed her lips together, finalizing the decision in her mind before she fixed her gaze on Celine. “Then, let’s do this. I want you to take the kids to Maine and shroud them.”

CHAPTER 16

“No!” Laura shouted with a frown as she crossed her arms and plopped into the armchair in the library.

Her sharp voice broke through the quietness of the library. The gentle rustle of leaves outside created a soothing backdrop to the dramatic reaction as the soft afternoon light filtered through the curtains, casting long shadows across the rows of ancient books.

“Laura,” Cate said, her voice soft and soothing as she shook her head.

“Mummy, no! I don’t want to be sent away when I’ve only just gotten you back.” Her words were choked by a sob.

Cate crossed to her, rubbing her shoulder. “Laura, it’s just for a little while to keep you safe while we work on getting rid of this threat.”

“I don’t want to go away from you, Mummy,” Laura sobbed.

Cate’s features melted with concern, and she pulled her daughter closer.

“It will be fine, Laura,” Damien said. “We’ll have lots of fun. You’ll love Maine.”

Laura’s lower lip trembled as she unfurled a tissue and pressed it to her nose.

“Yeah, totally,” Michael said. “There’s plenty to explore. We’ll have an adventure a day.”

“But I want to stay here with Mummy. Why can’t she come with us?”

“Sweet Pea, I need to stay here and make sure that Gianna doesn’t bother you anymore.”

Laura licked her lips, frowning.

"Come on, sis," Logan said with a grin. "We have never traveled to Maine before. It will be fun."

Laura stared at him for a moment before she shook her head.

"Well, you have got to snap out of this because we are going," Logan answered. "And Anna will be cross with you if you ruin our vacation."

"It is not a vacation," Laura sniffled.

"It can be," Celine answered. "There's a huge house to explore, and Alexander's house, and all of the trails and caves. You'll love it."

"And one of the neighbors has horses. I'm sure he'd let you ride," Damien added.

Laura flicked her gaze up to Cate, her eyes still red and watery. "You will be here when we return?"

"Of course, I will be, Laura. I won't leave. But I need to know you are safe while I'm working to rid our family of this problem."

Laura chewed her bottom lip before she finally nodded. "All right. I will go."

Damien clapped his hands together, rubbing them. "Good. You're going to have so much fun, I promise. Maine is the best. I really enjoy being by the sea, too. I'll show you all my favorite spots."

"Thanks, Uncle Damien," Laura said with a weak smile.

Cate stroked her daughter's hair as she smiled down at her. "Now, go with Aunt Celine and pack a few things, okay? She'll know what's best to take."

Laura grabbed Cate's hand, squeezing it. "You won't go anywhere before we leave?"

"No, I won't. I'll be here."

She nodded. "All right. I will pack, and I will help Anna pack, too."

"Thank you," Cate said as Laura rose.

Celine wrapped an arm around her, leading her from the room as Laura glanced back at Cate over her shoulder. Cate smiled warmly at her, trying to hide the heartbreak she felt at sending her away.

"It's for the best, Cate," Jack said with a nod.

"I will take good care of them all, Mother," Logan added.

Cate took his hands in hers, smiling up at him. "I know you will. You are so much like your father that way."

Logan beamed at her, lifting his chin.

“Now, you’d better go back, too. Uncle Damien and Uncle Michael can help you and Malcolm.”

“Come on, pal,” Michael said, clapping Logan on the back. “Let’s go.”

“Thanks, guys,” Cate said to them as they left the room behind.

She flicked her gaze to Jack. “I’m so sorry you have to send the twins away, but I think it’s for the best.”

Jack offered her a reassuring smile. “Aw, Maggie and Malcolm are excited to go. Molly’s helping them pack. We’re just grateful the Buckleys are willing to take all five.”

“I think once they get there, they’ll have a nice time together.” Cate hoped saying the words aloud gave her more reassurance that she’d made the right call.

“I’m sure,” Jack answered. “Laura will be fine, Cate. She’s a sensitive kid, but once she’s in Maine, she’ll forget all about it and enjoy herself.”

Cate nodded, trying not to let her eyes well with tears.

“And you will be able to work here without worrying about the children and what’s happening to them at every second.”

Cate eased into the armchair, the leather squeaking underneath her as she puffed out a long breath. “Yes. That is a relief.”

The doors burst open behind her, and she twisted to find Dominique striding into the room. “Well? Did we ditch the kids or what?”

Cate rubbed her forehead, wondering if she should have spoken to Marcus before making the decision. But it was too late now. She had to act to protect them. “They are packing for Maine as we speak. They should be leaving in a few hours.”

Dominique grinned at them, spreading her arms to the sides. “Oh goody. While the kids are away, the adults will play. Now, are we ready for some London fun?”

“I think we need to have a serious conversation about this,” Jack answered as he crossed toward Dominique. “We cannot break into an Agency stronghold.”

Dominique set her hands on her hips, shrugging, her expression blank. “Why not?”

Jack shot Cate an incredulous glance. “Because it’s dangerous.”

She grinned at him. “And that’s what makes it fun, right? What’s life without a little danger?”

“Look, you may not care because you’re immortal, but the rest of us are human.”

She screwed up her face. “How is that my problem? I can’t help it you made poor life choices.”

Jack huffed out a sigh as he crossed his arms. “I haven’t made poor life choices. I’m not the one who was in prison for a quarter century.”

Dominique’s expression turned angry, her lips tugging into a frown. “Oh, we’re going to go there, huh? Cate, I would highly suggest we ditch the wet blanket and proceed on our own.”

“We’re not ditching Jack,” Cate answered as she rose to her feet, pacing the floor. “But we do need a plan. We can’t just show up and let ourselves in.”

“Well, I can,” Dominique said with another shrug. “I can unlock a door without a key.”

“There could be alarms, cameras. This is a nightmare,” Jack answered.

Dominique shifted her weight, shaking her head. “Fine, fine. I have another idea.”

“Unless it’s your doing this yourself and taking all the risks, I’m not sure I want to hear it,” Jack retorted.

Cate flicked her gaze to Dominique. “I’d like to hear the plan.”

“The Agency has been using these security measures for decades. We don’t need to go in now when there are all the bells and whistles. Why don’t we pay a visit to your favorite time period and have a little talk with your good friend, Ginger?”

Cate’s lips parted as she ran the scenario in her mind. “Ginger could get us into the office. Then, all I’d need to do is access the file, take a picture of the code or memorize it, and off we go.”

Dominique bobbed her head.

“Whoa, what’s the chances they’re using the same passwords all these years later?” Jack asked.

“Guess we’ll find out,” Dominique answered.

“It’s the best plan we have. And if worse came to worst, we could access the vault in the fifties, destroy it there, and then return.”

Dominique poked a finger at Cate. “I like the way you think, Cate. You’re making this plan work no matter what.”

“All right,” Cate said with a curt nod. “Then we’ll leave right after the kids, get that code, then work on getting the key.”

Dominique screwed up her face. “We can’t leave now?”

“No,” Cate said, her voice incredulous. “I promised Laura I would wait for her to pack and see her off.”

Dominique let out a groan as she let her head fall back between her shoulders. “Ugh, I’m so glad I’m just the fun aunt and not the mom.”

“We’ll leave as soon as they do,” Cate answered. “I’ll go check on them now.”

Cate left them, making her way upstairs as she clenched her fists. None of this felt like it was going to come together. There was still too much up in the air, too much that needed to be done.

Sending the children away still made her nervous, but she knew it needed to be done. She snaked her way through the halls to Laura’s room, finding Anna inside skipping back and forth at the foot of the bed.

“We’re going to Maine. We’re going to Maine. We’re going to Maine,” Anna chanted.

“Not if you don’t finish your packing,” Laura said with a shake of her head as she folded another sweater.

“Come on, Anna.” Celine held her hand out to the child. “Let’s go make the last selections for the trip.”

Cate smiled at them as they passed her before she slipped inside. “Almost ready?”

“Yes,” Laura said as she focused on folding her sweater. “Aunt Celine said the weather should still be nice, but I’m taking a few heavier things because mornings will be chilly.”

“Laura...”

“Mummy, please don’t,” she said, her voice breaking again.

Cate crossed to her and pulled her into her arms. “If there was another way, I would have taken it. But I want you to be safe.”

Laura buried her face in her mother’s shoulder as Cate stroked her hair. “I know, I just...”

“I know it’s been hard since I have been away, and you’re afraid that it will be a long time without me again, but Laura, that’s not true. We’re working to make sure The Agency can’t hurt us anymore. We’re going to start the moment you leave. Plus, you’ll be spending some time with Aunt Celine, Uncle Damien, Uncle Michael. They can help you with your magic.”

Laura pulled back, her features pinching.

“And I think you should.” Cate said, stroking Laura’s hair. “You should learn more about your skills and how to maximize them, Laura.”

“But...”

“No buts,” Cate said with a smile. “Dominique is correct about one thing. You are incredibly powerful, and you really should use all of your potential.”

“All right, Mummy. I’ll ask Aunt Celine about it when we get to Maine.”

“Good. But remember to have a good time, too. Not all work.”

Laura finally cracked a smile. “All right.”

“It won’t be that bad, Laura. I promise. And you can call and talk to me anytime.”

“Okay,” she said with a nod as she placed the last of her sweaters into her suitcase. “I guess I’m all packed.”

“Let’s see if everyone else is ready.”

With Laura’s suitcase in hand, they traversed through the halls to collect Anna, Logan and the twins before they gathered in the foyer. With a shaky breath, Laura said goodbye again to Cate before they all joined hands, and Celine pulled them away from Dunhaven to Maine.

Cate’s heart sank as they disappeared from her sight. Jack wrapped a comforting arm around her. “It’s all right, Cate. They’re safe now.”

She sucked in a shaky breath and nodded. “I know. And now our work begins.”

She shoved the grief from her mind, focusing on delivering the blow to The Agency.

Dominique strode down the hall to them, her heels thudding dully against the thick runner. With a grin, she raised her eyebrows. “Time to make the magic happen.”

Cate pressed her lips together, determination filling her as her heart thudded hard against her ribs. They were about to make their move against The Agency. Would they deliver a commanding blow, or would they be the ones on the defensive?

CHAPTER 17

“Wait, wait,” Jack said with a shake of his head as Dominique spread her hands in front of her. “We can’t open a time portal here.”

“Why not?” Dominique asked, her features pinching.

“He’s right. We have a certain place we use to travel so no one else is aware, and we don’t make a mess.” Cate motioned for Dominique to follow her. “Come on. We’ll leave from the mausoleum. We can discuss where we’ll appear on our way there.”

Dominique heaved a sigh as she followed them from the front door into the warm summer air. “Where we’ll appear? I’ll use the secret room in the London house.”

Jack raised his eyebrows. “You know about that?”

Dominique offered him an incredulous look. “Of course. I was on Marcus’s team for a long time. Do you think I don’t know most of his secrets?”

“You didn’t know he actually had a heart, so I wasn’t certain,” Jack said with a shrug.

“No, I didn’t know he’d go all soft on us when he met cherub cheeks here, and then he really sank low when the kiddos were born. This is why I don’t have children.”

“Oh?” Jack asked. “I thought there was another reason.”

Dominique narrowed her eyes at him. “Go ahead and say it out loud and see what it gets you.”

“Pass,” Jack answered as they reached the mausoleum.

The gate creaked open as Cate pulled on it. “Let’s just focus on getting to the London house, contacting Ginger, and getting our hands on this information. I still don’t know how we’re going to do that. We have no idea where they keep it.”

“You don’t think your good buddy, Ginger, has access to it?” Dominique asked.

“I’m sure she does, but I can’t just ask her where she keeps it.”

“Nope. You’re going to have to search the office while she’s busy doing something else like...fetching or something.”

“Fetching coffee? How do you expect me to pull this off?”

“Come on, Cate. Ginger loves you. And you’re pretty scrappy. You’ll figure something out.”

Cate heaved a sigh and motioned for Dominique to proceed. “All right, let’s get this show on the road.”

“That’s the spirit.” Dominique stretched her hands in front of her. “Oh, don’t forget, go straight through and—”

“Don’t stop until we’re in the 1950s, yeah, I know. Believe me, I’ve already been stuck in one of these things. I don’t want to do that again,” Cate said with a nod.

Dominique completed the process for opening the time portal. Wind whipped around them as Jack disappeared into it, followed by Cate. They arrived in the darkened, windowless room of the London house. Dominique appeared seconds after them, lighting a fireball to illuminate the space.

“Time for you to change and call Ginger,” she said as she tugged open the secret panel and exited in the hall.

Cate nodded as she climbed the stairs to what was quickly becoming as familiar a bedroom to her as her own at Dunhaven Castle. “I’ll be right back.”

“Nothing fancy, just any dress will do.”

“Speak for yourself. I am a duchess. I have a reputation to maintain,” Cate called as she took her first step down the hall.

She shut herself inside her bedroom, leaning against the door behind her as she slid her eyes closed. She had no idea how she would pull this off.

Despite Ginger being helpful in the past, she did not relish the idea of sneaking around the office while Ginger fetched her a cup of coffee. But she didn’t know what other choices she’d have.

She gnawed on her lower lip as she forced herself to the closet to find something more appropriate to wear than her leggings and tunic.

After switching outfits, she pulled her hair into a low ponytail, wish Andrea had been here to do something nicer. With her handbag in hand, she left the safety and security of her room behind and headed downstairs.

“Ready?” Dominique asked. “Time to call your friend.”

Cate nodded, setting her purse down on the foyer table and lifting the receiver. After a few minutes, she was connected with Ginger at the office where she worked.

“Ginger, hi, it’s Cate Northcott.”

“Cate!” Ginger exclaimed on the other end of the line. “In town again? The husband dragged you along while he completed his business, huh?”

Cate chuckled. “Actually, I’m here alone this time. Marcus has business in Germany, but I fancied a little shopping. Any chance you could get away from the office for a lunch or maybe a little trip to Selfridge’s?”

“Well, I haven’t got anything on my schedule this afternoon. The boss is out of the office today, but I happen to have his credit card at my disposal. Meet you there in half an hour?”

“Perfect,” Cate answered before she replaced the receiver.

“Well?”

“We’re meeting for shopping then lunch. Do you think you could get into the office and find the passcode while I have her distracted?”

Dominique raised her eyebrows. “Oh, sure, leave all the hard work to me.”

“You’re magic. This should be easy, right?”

“I’ve got it covered, cupcake. Just keep her out of the office for an hour or two. I’ll get that passcode.”

Cate bobbed her head. “I can do that.” She twisted to face Jack. “I think you should wait here.”

“Wait here?” Jack cried. “Cate!”

“Ouch. She thinks you’re not capable. I don’t blame her,” Dominique said.

“That’s not it at all. But there’s no reason for you to go to Selfridge’s with me. And there’s also no reason for you to go with Dominique. I don’t want to come back to find out she’s turned you into a toad.”

Dominique burst into laughter. “That’s funny, Cate. I should try it.”

“Don’t,” Jack warned with a wag of his finger.

Dominique clicked her tongue and sighed. "Fine."

Jack shifted his gaze back to Cate. "I don't like this. You shouldn't go alone."

"And I can't go with you. Jack, that would look...odd for me to show up with you while I'm in London alone."

"Oh, like Ginger should judge. Isn't she someone's mistress?"

"Maybe so, but the rules were different for men in this era. I'm not taking the chance. Just...wait here. We won't be that long."

Jack huffed out a breath, his nostrils flaring. "Fine. I'll pace the floors here, but don't holler at me if I wear His Grace's carpet thin."

"I promise not to tell him who did it," Cate said as she grabbed her purse and poked the corner at him. "See you soon."

She headed into the warm sunshine with Dominique following her. As they parted ways, with Cate heading to Selfridge's and Dominique going to Ginger's office, Cate said, "Don't screw this up."

"I'll do my best, princess," Dominique said with a roll of her eyes. "Have fun spending Marcus's money."

Annoyed, Cate stormed her way toward the store. Her aggravation waned, and a smile spread over her face as she spotted Ginger waiting out front.

"Cate, so good to see you. And you're looking so well."

"Thank you," Cate said as they hugged. "You look great, too. Is this a new hair color?"

"Just a little spruce up. The old man likes it brighter for the summer. So," she said as they entered the store, "are we spending in the name of revenge or just flexing our duchess muscles today?"

"Just a bit of fun," Cate answered with a shrug.

"Oh?" Ginger asked, her eyebrows raised high. "No juice tidbits to share? Come on, then, I won't judge."

"Sadly, there are none to entertain you. Marcus and I have a good relationship."

Ginger wiggled her eyebrows as they hit the women's section, and she pulled a burgundy dress from the rack. "I see. Well, I must admit, I have not heard any rumors about your duke around the usual places."

Cate offered her a smile, grabbing a navy-blue dress and holding it up. "Are you just telling me that so you don't upset me or is that true?"

“Course it’s true,” Ginger answered. “If I heard about him with another lady, I’d let you know if only so that you could score a new fur or a diamond necklace. But it seems he is quite devoted to you.”

Cate offered her a warm smile. “That’s nice to hear.”

“I’ll bet. A man like that, money, power, and loyal to boot? Tell me, Cate Northcott, how did you get so lucky?”

Cate chuckled a little. “I really don’t know. I wasn’t even certain I liked Marcus when we first met. He sort of grew on me.”

Ginger threw her head back with a laugh. “Grew on you. Oh, dear. I know so many ladies who would have snapped him up in a shot. But I suppose making him prove his love to you is what sets you apart.”

They spent another two hours trying on various dresses with Cate making a few purchases including one for Ginger.

With their haul, they headed out for lunch, enjoying a few cocktails complete with the local gossip from Ginger.

They parted ways with Cate promising to return soon for another shopping trip. As she carried her bags back to the house, her mind turned from the light-hearted chatter she’d shared with Ginger to the desperate plan to save her family. Had Dominique gotten the passcode?

She turned onto the quiet street leading to the townhouse when a rogue wind suddenly shot past her, sending a shiver down her spine.

She glanced behind her, her brows furrowing as she scanned the street, making certain no one was following her.

The street remained empty, the leaves rustling only a little in the gentle breeze.

She continued to the house, pushing inside and slamming the door closed behind her. “Jack?”

“We’re in here,” Jack called from the living room. She set her bags down on the floor and hurried inside, eager to know if Dominique had found what they needed.

The woman stared out the window with a brandy cradled against her collarbone.

“Well? Did you find it?”

Dominique heaved a sigh, shaking her head.

Cate’s stomach lurched. “Are you kidding?”

Dominique slumped her shoulders. “Yes. Of course, I found it. I’m not an idiot.” Dominique waved a paper in the air. “Even figured out how to make a photocopy. Look out, Ginger.”

Cate snatched the paper from her hand and scanned it. “We have everyone’s passcode. Good work.”

Dominique offered her a haughty grin. “Yep. Now, time to get the key from Gianna. That should be fun.”

“Can’t you just...hit her with a fireball and take it?”

“As much as I’d love to slam her into the ground with a continuous barrage from my ultra-powerful brand of weaponry, we want to be a little more discreet than that.”

“Dominique’s right,” Cate said. “We can’t let her know that we’re doing this. They’ll go back in time and remove all of the artifacts before we ever get a chance to destroy them.”

Dominique bobbed her head. “Yep, what cherub cheeks said.”

“So, we need to find a way to get that key from Gianna. And I have a sneaking suspicion, I’m the best one to do this.”

Jack’s eyes widened. “Cate, that’s a suicide mission.”

Cate swallowed hard. “Jack, there is no other choice. I’m going to have to do it. I just need a way to get close to her and steal it.”

“We can track her. It may be easier in this time,” Dominique answered.

“Fine. Find out where she is, and I’ll do my best to get that key.”

Dominique nodded.

“In the meantime, I need to put away the clothes I bought. I’ll be right back.” Cate disappeared from the room, grabbing the bags of purchases and mounting the stairs.

Her stomach twisted and turned as she tried to think of a way to safely steal the key from Gianna.

She pushed into her room, sucking in a breath. A faint scent of perfume lingered in the air—a perfume she didn’t wear.

Her heart skipped a beat, but she realized too late what was happening. As she twisted to tug the door open a female hand slammed against it, stopping her. She turned to find Gianna, a wicked grin on her features as she stared down at her. “Hello, Cate.”

CHAPTER 18

Cate pressed her back against the door, her heart pounded hard against her ribs as she eyed the woman. “Gianna, what are you doing here?”

“Thought I’d drop in and say hello. We really need to catch up.”

Cate frowned at her, her nose wrinkling. “We don’t. And one scream will have Dominique up here in an instant.”

“Ah, yes, your newfound little friend. I wonder how long it will take for her to turn on you.”

Cate arched an eyebrow. “She won’t turn on me until she’s destroyed you. I’d back off if I was you. Dominique doesn’t seem too stable.”

“No, she really doesn’t. I’m surprise you aligned yourself with someone so...dark, but then again...you married one of them.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at the woman. “And that just kills you, doesn’t it?”

“Not really. If Marcus Northcott is as weak-willed as he seems to be, you may have saved me.”

Cate let out a derisive laugh. “Marcus is hardly weak. And if you were so uninterested, why have you done nothing but attack my family for years?”

“I told you we wanted Dunhaven Castle, and we wouldn’t stop until we got it. And speaking of your family...where is little Laura? She seems to have...disappeared.”

“Somewhere you’ll never find her,” Cate shot back. “Good luck searching.”

Gianna raised her eyebrows. “We’re mighty confident, aren’t we? Who’s to say we haven’t found her already?”

“You wouldn’t be here if you had.” Cate pushed past Gianna, knocking into her shoulder as she crossed the room and dumped her packages on the bed.

“Wouldn’t I?” Gianna swung around to face her. “Not even to gloat? Poor little Laura, all alone in a magic keeper cell, crying for her mummy. But her mummy is too busy pretending to have the upper hand.”

As Gianna’s words sliced through the air, Cate felt a cold dread wash over her, a stark contrast to the warmth from the sunlight streaming through the window. Each heartbeat thudded loudly in her ears, a drumbeat of rising panic.

Cate bit into her lower lip as she pulled a dress from the bag and crossed to the closet to hang it. Worry twisted her stomach into a knot. What if Gianna had located Laura? If this wasn’t a bluff, her daughter could be suffering.

But if it was a lie, she could give away Laura’s location inadvertently.

She tried to keep her cool despite the turmoil roiling inside her. “I don’t believe you, Gianna.”

Gianna grinned at her. “Come and see for yourself.”

She held out a hand, flicking her eyebrows up.

Cate huffed out a laugh. “I wouldn’t go anywhere with you.”

“All right, then poor little Laura will have to suffer. I wonder how Marcus will take it when he finds out you left his precious child to the wolves.”

Cate crossed her arms, shaking her head as Gianna shifted closer to her. The warm sunlight glinted off a chain around her neck as she moved.

Cate’s heart skipped a beat. The thick gold chain that slipped below Gianna’s blouse likely contained the key they needed for the magical vault. Could she manage to get it from around the woman’s neck?

She’d need a distraction in order to pull it off.

“You know,” she said as she took a step closer to Gianna, closing the gap between them even more quickly, “I’m really getting sick of you.”

“Ohh, I’m scared,” Gianna answered with a laugh. “The little mouse roars.”

Cate smirked. “This little mouse was worth quite a bit to your Agency. Enough that I was treated like a queen the last time we were together. I wonder how interested they would be if I told them we'd join your little party if you were removed from it."

Gianna's nostrils flared though she tried to play it off nonchalantly. "You think you're so smart. Well, I don't think that would fly."

"I do," Cate answered. "I'm not sure you're as invaluable to The Agency as you think you are. Especially with this one-tracked focus on my daughter."

Gianna's jaw quivered as she stared at Cate. "You're so smug. But you will not be the one laughing when we destroy that sweet little girl."

Anger boiled inside of Cate as the woman threatened her daughter. She lunged forward and wrapped her hands around Gianna's throat, her features twisting with rage.

"Leave Laura alone!" she screamed as she drove her back into the dresser behind her.

The lamp on the top wobbled before it smashed to the ground, pieces of glass and ceramic scattering everywhere as Gianna grabbed Cate's shoulders and pushed back.

"I'll take great pleasure in destroying her myself," she growled.

Cate lost her balance as Gianna pushed against her, and they tumbled to the floor in a tangle of limbs. Gianna rolled on top of her, wrapping her fingers around Cate's throat.

"Cate?" Jack's voice called as footsteps pounded toward her.

As Gianna glanced at the door, Cate shifted her hand, wrapping a pinky around the necklace before she lifted a hip, shoving Gianna off of her to the side. The quick motion ripped the necklace from around the woman's neck.

Cate quickly flung it under the bed skirt as she pretended to scramble to her feet. Gianna barreled into her, grabbing her arm and twisting it behind her back.

The door burst open a second later.

"You!" Dominique shouted as she whipped a fireball at Gianna.

The woman dove to the side, releasing her hold on Cate as she fled from the magical assault.

Gianna climbed to her feet, her lips tugged into a deep frown. "We're not done with you yet."

After issuing the threat, she disappeared from their sight.

Dominique screeched in frustration, slamming her hands against the dresser. “I’m going to get her one of these days.”

Jack raced to Cate’s side, his features taut with worry. “Cate, are you okay?”

“Yeah,” she said. “More than okay, actually.”

“What?” He screwed up his face as he helped her to stand. “Are you hurt? Did she do any damage?”

“Not enough to bother about. But I did some.”

Dominique glanced at Cate, arching an eyebrow.

Cate grinned at them, crouching to lift the bed skirt and pull out the broken gold chain. “I picked a fight with her. And look what I managed to grab.”

She dangled the keys in the air, raising her eyebrows.

“Cate!” Jack exclaimed. “You did it.”

She nodded. “I did. I got the keys. And Dominique got the code. Now, all we need to do is get to that chalet...right after we check on Laura.”

“Check on Laura?” Dominique said, her features melting with upset. “Why do we need to do that?”

“Because Gianna said she had her, and I want to make sure she was lying. Please, we need to check on her.”

Dominique huffed, wrinkling her nose. “Ugh, are you kidding me? We finally have the keys to the kingdom to do some damage, and we’ve got a delay in game.”

“Dominique, if they have Laura—”

“They don’t. She was bluffing.” Dominique raised her arms in the air. “But fine, fine. We’ll hop over to Maine in the future and take a look.”

Cate bobbed her head. “Thank you.”

“But as soon as you see the kid’s fine, we’re out of there, got it? No Mommy and me time.”

“I don’t even need to talk to her. Just see her or confirm that she’s okay with Celine,” Cate answered with a bob of her head.

“Good. Because I don’t want to dally. We need to crush them. Send them scurrying to handle this.”

“I’m all for that,” Cate said with a nod.

“All right. Then, I’ll open the time portal.” Dominique stretched her hands out in front of her.

“Not here,” Cate said, batting them down.

With a roll of her eyes, she followed Cate and Jack to the secret room, and within minutes they were on the rocky coast of Maine almost one hundred years in the future. The salty sea air tossed Cate's hair wildly as the waves crashed on the shoreline below.

"Come on, we'll go to the house and see how she is," Dominique said with a wave as she trudged away from the cliff where they'd appeared.

Jack wrapped his arm around her as she strode through the thickly wooded area toward the rambling Buckley house on the hill.

Her stomach twisted into a tight knot, worried about what they would find when they arrived at the house.

"Beautiful here," Jack said as he glanced around.

"Yes, it is. Marcus has some lovely views, too."

"Oh, right, you've been here before. I always forget."

Cate nodded, trying to let the conversation ease her mind, but unable to stop thinking about Laura.

"Come on!" Dominique called over her shoulder as she backed her way through the woods.

"She's annoying," Jack said with a shake of his head. "I don't know how you can stand all of this."

"She is, but at the same time, she is being somewhat helpful. I just want to make sure Laura's okay." Cate's voice trembled a little as her daughter's name spilled from her lips.

"She'll be all right, Cate." Jack tightened his grip on her shoulder.

She offered him a tight-lipped smile, but her worry only intensified as the house came into view.

Dominique, far ahead of them, disappeared through the front door. As Cate and Jack crossed the lawn, she emerged with Damien in tow.

"Cate, is everything okay?" Damien asked as he spotted her.

"You tell me. Gianna says she has Laura." Cate tried to stop the tremble in her voice, but she couldn't.

Damien's brow furrowed. "No, Laura's fine. She's learning a little more about her powers. Alexander brought her a bunch of books to read."

Cate offered him a smile. "Okay, good."

"Did you want to see her?" Damien asked, thumbing toward the house.

Cate shook her head, trying to manage her emotions. She wanted to race into the house and ensure Laura was fine with her own two eyes, but she did not want to upset her daughter. “No, if she’s settled here, I don’t want to upset her.”

“Yeah, she’s doing great. We took them for a nice long walk down by the ocean, visited with Alexander, got some books. And now, she’s having a cup of hot chocolate and some cookies while she reads. Tomorrow, we’ve got a horse all lined up for her to ride. She’s doing great.”

Cate pressed her lips together, glancing at the house again.

“Come on, Mom, will you quit worrying? You heard it from the D-man himself. Damien wouldn’t lie. He’s too much of a goody-goody for that.” Dominique clapped her hand on Damien’s shoulder.

He shrugged it off, shaking his head. “I’m not lying. Cate, she’s really fine. Gianna is lying to you.”

“Okay,” Cate said, blowing out a shaky breath. “Then we’re good. Let’s go finish what we need to do.”

Dominique clapped her hands together, a grin spreading across her features. “Finally. I can’t wait to blow some stuff up.”

“You got the code and key?” Damien asked.

Cate nodded. “We did. And we’re ready to make our move.”

“Wow, good luck. I hope this really hurts them.”

Cate sucked in a sharp breath as his words echoed in her mind. She hoped this sent them reeling, too. But what if it only made things worse?

CHAPTER 19

Cate pressed her lips together, the knot in her stomach still tight despite ensuring Laura's safety. The thick canopy of trees loomed ominously above them, their branches intertwining to form a dark, oppressive tunnel that muffled the distant sound of the sea, infusing the air with an eerie silence as they trudged away from the house.

"This won't take long," Dominique said over her shoulder as she led them down a winding path.

"I hope we're not stopping at this house to fetch another leather jacket," Jack shot back.

"Very funny, lumberjack. We're not. I just want to grab a little surprise for The Agency. A token of my appreciation. I want them to know who did this." She grinned at them, and it sent a shiver down Cate's spine.

While she wanted to send a crushing blow to The Agency, she wasn't certain she'd be on board with Dominique's so-called surprise.

"What is it?" Cate asked.

Dominique raised her eyebrows, her amusement clear. "Just a little fun for whoever discovers that we've neutralized their entire magical collection. You're going to love it when you see it."

Cate shot Jack a sideways glance as another mansion came into view in a clearing.

"Come on in," Dominique said as she mounted the stairs and pushed open the front door.

Cate and Jack followed her, entering the quiet, cold house. Cate wrapped her arms around her midriff as Dominique climbed the stairs.

The last time she'd seen the inside of this house had been when Dominique had held her hostage here. While it was technically over twenty years ago, for her, it wasn't that long.

The memory sent a shiver racing down her spine. She never would have predicted that she would be working with the woman to save her family.

Cate chewed her lower lip as she shifted her weight from foot to foot.

"You okay, Cate?" Jack asked.

"Yeah, just...bad memories. The last time I was here...Dominique and I weren't exactly on the same side." She shook her head. "I know it was twenty years ago, but for me, it's like it happened yesterday. Every corner of this house reminds me of the days when trust was a luxury I couldn't afford, especially with Dominique."

"Right," Jack said. "You're the Cate that this just happened to."

She nodded, offering him a fleeting smile. "Yep. And it's just...weird being on the same side as her when we clearly were not the last time I saw her."

"I understand," Jack answered. "She's not exactly the person I would trust the most."

"Yet, here we are trusting her."

Jack narrowed his eyes at her. "You have second thoughts?"

"Maybe," she murmured before she shook her head. "Not really. I want this to end. We've been fighting The Agency through time for so long now, and it's taking its toll."

"I know. I can't imagine what it's like for you. Poor Laura is getting the worst of it now."

The idea of her daughter being tormented by Gianna and The Agency fueled the fire within Cate to continue forward with their plan. "You're right. And that alone makes me want to burn down every place they have."

"Well, if this works, I'd say we're well on our way to taking their power away. Outside of these artifacts, they've only got their wealth."

"And that won't allow them to manipulate time like they have been."

Jack bobbed his head. "Once they can't do that..."

"They won't be nearly as dangerous," Cate answered.

Jack poked a finger at her. "Exactly. So, I guess we trust Crazy."

Cate raised her eyebrows as her gaze drifted to the ceiling. “Yep. For better or worse.”

Her mind spun again with all the problems they could run into. “Still, I wonder if we should tell Marcus.”

“Do you think he’d go along with this plan?” Jack asked.

“I’m not certain, although, part of me says no.” Cate shrugged. “Which is exactly why I’m not telling anything.”

“Oh, Cate,” Jack said with a shake of his head. “I understand. I just hope we’re doing the right thing.”

“Do you think we’re not?” She turned to face him, her eyes searching his face for answers.

He puffed out his cheeks, his eyes widening. “I think we’re doing the only thing we can do. And I think if I was in your shoes, I’d do it, too. And after twenty years solving things together, I think I’ve learned to trust your judgment.”

A smile spread across her features as she stared up at him. “Twenty years of solving things, huh? Sounds like I have an interesting future ahead of me.”

“You do. But first, we’ve got to finish this with The Agency so you can go back to the past and live it.”

Dominique’s heels pounded toward them, drawing their attention away from their conversation. She appeared at the railing overlooking the foyer with an evil grin. “I got it. Let’s go.”

“So, you know where this place is?” Cate asked as Dominique bounced down the stairs.

“I do. Although, we can’t location hop there because it’s unsafe—”

“You?” Jack interrupted. “Concerned about safety?”

“I’m crazy, not stupid,” she retorted. “But don’t worry. We can hop over to The Order’s chalet, and then we’ll case the joint from there.”

“The Order has a place nearby?” Cate asked, her stomach twisting into a tight knot. Was this a setup?

“Yeah, they do. You know, I’m really surprised Marcus doesn’t have a house there. I mean, he has one everywhere else, but not in the Alps. Really disappointed by that. You should talk to him about getting a nice ski chalet.”

“I’ll get right on that,” Cate said with a flutter of her eyelashes. “Can we please focus on the task at hand.”

“Of course, Catie,” Dominique said with a roll of her eyes as she grabbed hold of both of their arms.

In an instant, the Maine mansion blinked out of existence, replaced by a brief moment of blackness before new details filled in around them.

Cate glanced around at the glamorous, log-cabin style chalet that replaced her view.

Dominique clapped her hands together, rubbing them. “Ah, here we are. Perfect. Now, we’ll just—”

“Wait,” Cate said with a shake of her head, “I think we need a plan on how we’re going to proceed.”

Dominique lifted a finger in the air as she removed something from her jacket.

Jack screwed up his face. “A top? You brought a child’s toy?”

“Not just any child’s toy. This top, once it stops spinning, will neutralize any magical artifact within a five-mile radius. All we need to do is get in, access the vault, spin the top, and we’re done.”

“It’s the getting in part that has me concerned.”

Dominique pressed her lips together, shaking her head. “That’s easy. We’ll just unlock the door with my magic trick, and we’re in.”

“What about alarms?” Jack asked. “Or other people there.”

“It’s summer. Who stays at a ski chalet in the summer?” Dominique asked. “And I can neutralize any alarm there. Now, come on, stop stalling. Let’s get this going.”

“Sorry, you just seem a little too eager and that makes me nervous,” Cate answered as she followed Dominique through the kitchen to an attached garage filled with luxury cars.

“Of course, I’m eager,” she answered as she grabbed the keys and pressed a button on the fob.

The lights on an SUV flashed. “I want to take these people down. You know, I really thought you’d be eager, too, Cate. Considering that they’ve terrorized your family for years, you’d think you’d really be interested.”

“I am interested,” Cate said, an edge to her tone, “I just also want to be alive when we’re done with this.”

“You’ll be fine,” Dominique answered as she climbed behind the wheel of the car, opened the garage door, and fired the engine.

Cate buckled into her seat in the back, her stomach twisting. What if they couldn’t access the vault? What if the top didn’t work?

Too many things shot through her mind, making it a battlefield of worry.

What would happen after this? Would The Agency retaliate? At least their reach should be severely limited, she figured.

Dominique pulled from the garage and down the winding drive toward a set of thick black gates that automatically opened as they approached. “Their place isn’t far.”

“You’re not just going to drive up to it, are you?” Jack’s voice was laced with incredulity, his brow furrowed in concern as he glanced at Dominique’s unfazed expression.

“Yeah,” Dominique answered, her grip tightening on the leather steering wheel. “I’m going to pull up and ask the guard if he minds if we destroy their magical collection.”

“There’s a guard?” Cate asked, snapping her gaze from the scenery outside to Dominique.

“Of course, there’s a guard.”

“How are we going to get past him?” Cate’s voice went an octave higher as panic shot through her.

“We’re going to have to sneak in, duh. We’ll park the car a little bit away from it and climb over the fence.”

Cate shifted on the supple leather of the seat, suddenly more unsure than she had been before.

Jack shot her a glance from the passenger seat, shrugging.

They’d come too far now to back down. They had to try to deliver some sort of setback. She only hoped they could do it and get away.

They drove for a few more minutes before Dominique eased the car to the side of the road and came to a stop. “That’s far enough. We walk the rest of the way.”

They climbed out of the SUV, and Cate rubbed her arms, a shiver shaking her despite the warm air.

“This way,” Dominique said, leading them through the grass. They’d snaked past manicured lawns that fronted prestigious looking cabins until they reached a more secluded area.

Trees shrouded whatever lay beyond the brick wall that surrounded the property.

Cate wrinkled her nose at it. “I thought you said there was a fence.”

Dominique shrugged. “Fence, wall, same thing.”

Jack shook his head, his tone annoyed. “Not exactly. We can’t scale a wall.”

“Speak for your yourself, human.” Dominique crouched, her gaze locked on the top of the wall. With a single leap, she landed gracefully atop the towering structure and spun to face them. “There, easy.”

“Oh, great. Sadly, I forgot my spring-loaded shoes, so—“ Jack’s words cut off as he started to rise off the ground.

His eyes widened, and he glanced around him as he rose in the air. “What’s happening?”

“I’m lifting you up,” Dominique said as she raised her hand higher and higher in the air. She deposited him on the opposite side of the wall before she repeated the process with Cate.

Cate bit into her lower lip as she hovered in the air before she descended on The Agency’s property.

Dominique leapt off the top of the wall. “Now, all we need to do is let ourselves in and find the vault.”

They followed her up the gentle hill toward the house that peeked from the trees.

Cate eyed the place as they approached, still shielded by the woods surrounding it. No lights shone from within. “Looks empty.”

“I told you it would be,” Dominique said. “Come on, this is the exciting part.”

She trudged toward the house with Cate and Jack following behind. They passed a large fire pit, hot tub, and patio furniture as they approached a set of French doors.

With a flick of her wrist, Dominique opened them easily.

An alarm blared as they stepped inside, but it silenced almost immediately with a wave of her hand. “Access to the vault should be in the library.”

Her heels pounded across the wooden floors as she led them through the living room and into an expansive two-story library.

Cate scanned the room in search of any signs of a secret panel or passage. “Tobther said it was behind the third bookshelf on the far wall,” Dominique said as she strode toward it.

After a few minutes of searching, she managed to pull open the bookcase, swinging it back toward them and revealing a secret passage. Stairs led down into blackness.

“We should have brought a—“ Jack began as Dominique whipped a fireball into existence and stepped inside. “Flashlight.”

Cate offered him an amused smile as she followed the woman.

At the foot of the stairs, they reached a thick door with a keyhole and several cylinders.

“Key?” Dominique asked as she spun the cylinders to input the code for the door.

Cate slid the key into the lock and twisted. It clanked, echoing through the space before the door creaked open.

The scent of musty air wafted past Cate’s nostrils as she peered inside, finding herself inside a large storage area filled with shelving units that housed various items.

“Ohhh, it’s so awesome,” Dominique said with a grin. “Look at all their little magical toys. All about to be broken.”

“I don’t think so,” a new voice said.

Cate’s heart skipped a beat, and she twisted to face the door. A figure hovered inside it. Gianna.

“Nice try, Cate. But you’re on the losing end again.”

Cate’s heart sank as she realized their brilliant plan had just come crashing down.

CHAPTER 20

With her heart hammering against her ribs, Cate stared at the woman darkening the doorstep to the vault of magical items. “Gianna.”

“Yes, of course it’s me. Did you really think that I hadn’t noticed what you stole from me in the fifties?”

“We were hoping you didn’t,” Dominique answered. “Not that it matters. I’m about to wipe out every capability you have in this vault.”

“Over my dead body,” Gianna growled, raising a small gun and pointing it at them.

Dominique’s features remained unfazed, and she shrugged nonchalantly. “I mean, sure, if you insist. That can be arranged.”

The magical woman whipped a fireball into existence. As Dominique conjured the fireball, its glow illuminated her determined features, Gianna’s reflexes snapped. The gun shifted, and a shot rang out, the bullet striking Dominique squarely in the abdomen, splattering blood against the cold stone floor.

Dominique screeched as she dropped the fireball, doubling over to clutch at the blood spreading across her blouse.

Cate’s heart thrummed painfully against her chest, echoing the thud of Dominique’s knees hitting the ground. Each heartbeat was a stark reminder of their peril.

With blood oozing between her fingers, Dominique thrust the top into Cate’s trembling hands. “Here,” she croaked. “Finish it.”

“I don’t think so,” Gianna shouted, shifting her gun again.

Cate clutched the top tightly and lunged for cover behind a towering shelf lined with ancient, dust-covered objects that held magical secrets.

“Spin it, Cate. Pump it six times, and let it go. Take away their power.”

“Don’t do it, Cate,” Gianna said. “I have my weapon trained on old Jackie boy, and I will not hesitate to kill him. Come out and hand over that top right now.”

Cate’s mind raced, torn between the immediate threat to Jack and the long-term consequences of her decision. Her hand on the top trembled, not just with fear but with the weight of their fate.

She stared down at the small item in her hand, its yellow paint chipping as she wondered if it could really do what Dominique claimed.

And if it could, would using it cost Jack his life?

She couldn’t let him get killed, she couldn’t leave his children fatherless or Molly without her husband. But if she didn’t take away The Agency’s power, this war would never stop.

“Ohh, this is no bluff, Cate. He dies in seconds unless that top is in my hands. Step out now or lose more than just this battle.”

“Spin it, Cate. She’s bluffing,” Dominique shouted.

“I’m not,” Gianna called back.

Cate’s lower lip trembled, heat washing over her as she tried to make her decision. With a shaky breath, she made a call, setting the top on the floor and depressing the plunger six times. It twirled on the floor in front of her, a blue aura emanating from it as she slowly rose to her feet, holding her hands in the air.

With every beat of her racing heart echoing in her ears, Cate emerged from her hiding place, her hands raised in surrender but her spirit unbroken, facing Gianna with defiance flashing in her eyes.

“Give me the top,” Gianna growled.

“After you let Jack go.”

“Don’t do it, Cate,” Jack said. “Go back between those shelves and use the thing.”

Cate shook her head. “I won’t risk your life. I won’t leave your children without a father.”

“Aww, it’s so sweet. You really give me a toothache, you know that?”

Dominique glanced at her, her features pinching.

Cate shook her head, her lips tugging into a frown. "I'm sorry, Dominique, I'm not like you."

"Obviously," the woman shot back. "You're a real disappointment, do you know that? Like on a scale of one to ten, it's like a fifty for me."

She rose to her feet, blood still staining her shirt, but clearly not wounded.

"Well, I'm sorry, but I won't risk Jack's life. Not while she's holding a gun on him."

"Cate," Jack tried but her plan had already been set in motion.

Dominique had understood her perfectly. The woman whipped a fireball into existence and lobbed it at Gianna.

It hit her directly, and she screeched in pain as it exploded, electricity running over her body before it dissipated. Cate used the diversion to lunge toward Jack and push him to safety, slipping between two shelves.

Dominique dove in behind them, peering around the shelf. A bullet whizzed past, smacking into the shelf behind them.

"Ooh," Dominique said with a giggle. "She's mad."

"Cate, you shouldn't have done that to save me. This needs to end," Jack said, his voice taut with worry.

"And it will. I already started the top. As soon as it spins down, all of this stuff will be just...useless junk." Cate poked a finger toward the shelf she'd hidden behind where the yellow top continued to spin, the blue magic swirling around it.

Jack cracked a smile at her, despite the tension. "Good work, Cate."

"Yeah. We just have to make sure she doesn't stop the top. And she's going to try. In fact—" Dominique's words cut off as another bullet whipped past, and closer this time.

Her features twisted with disgust. "Seriously? That's it."

Dominique conjured a fireball and hurled it in Gianna's direction.

"You missed me. And you can't keep holding me off with those things. They sting, but nothing worse than that," Gianna called.

"I'm not trying to kill you. If I was, you'd be dead," Dominique answered. "But I really want you to be here when all your toys are ruined."

"That's not going to happen. I'm going to kill Cate, Jack, and stop that top from spinning."

"Uh-huh," Dominique answered. "Sure, you are. Did you forget about me? The woman who cannot be killed?"

"I haven't. You see, you think you're healed, but you aren't," Gianna answered. "That bullet was—"

"Dipped in crymeline poison?" Dominique retorted. "Yeah, I know."

"Which means you only have a few more minutes to live," Gianna said. "And once you're dead, I'll easily pick the two humans off and stop that top. Looks like we win again, Cate."

Cate's heart stopped for a moment, her eyes widening. If Dominique died, they would never make it home. Not only would the twins be fatherless, but her own children would be motherless. Actually, her own children would cease to exist.

Tears filled her eyes as she glanced at Jack, clutching onto his arm as her knees went weak.

"Except, sadly," Dominique said as she lobbed another fireball blindly around the corner of the shelf, "I won't be dying anytime soon."

Gianna let out a sharp laugh. "Oh, you always love to play the big shot. But even your immortality is no match for crymeline."

Cate's lower lip trembled as she slid her glassy gaze to the top, still spinning but starting to wobble.

"That's where you're wrong, you dimwit. Most people's immortality isn't a match for crymeline. Mine, on the other hand, is. See, I'm part Dracopire and werepanther now. It didn't make me as powerful or untouchable as I'd hoped, but it helps me with immunity toward some of those pesky poisons. One of those is crymeline."

"You're lying," Gianna answered, but her voice quivered just slightly.

Cate's eyes went wide, and she glanced at Dominique. "Are you lying?"

"No," she said, her features incredulous. "Are you serious? You're the one who made the discovery about what I was doing, remember?"

"Yes, I remember, but I didn't know if the rest of it was a lie. The part about the poison immunity."

Dominique whipped another fireball around the corner. "It's not. I'm fine."

She grinned at them. "And soon, this little fault will turn into useless junk. Shelf upon shelf of it."

"Not if I can help it," Gianna shouted.

Cate's pulse quickened as the woman raced past them in a desperate attempt to get to the spinning top as it started to wobble, slowing as it threatened to stop entirely.

“Nope,” Dominique said, but before she could fire on the woman, Cate lunged at Gianna, tackling her to the ground.

Gianna let out a high-pitched squeal, wriggling under Cate as she tried to break free.

“I don’t think so,” Cate growled. “Not after what you’ve done to my daughter. I’m not letting you go until that top stops spinning.”

“Sorry, Cate, but I can’t let that happen.” Gianna tried to throw Cate off of her, but Dominique grabbed the woman’s ankle and dragged her back with superhuman power.

Cate tumbled off her, rolling across the floor as Gianna flew across the room, smacking into a wall and sliding to the floor in a crumpled heap.

She scrambled to her feet, searching the space for the gun she’d dropped earlier.

Cate’s heart stopped as she spotted it merely feet away from the woman. “No!”

She pushed up, trying to climb to her feet and reach the gun before Gianna. A well-timed fireball by Dominique drove Gianna back against the wall.

“You’re not going to win, babe. Give it up.”

“No,” Gianna growled, her features twisted with anger as Cate reached the gun.

Gianna kicked it from her hands, sending it flying across the room before she lunged at Cate, twisting her hair as she whipped her backward.

Cate clamped a hand over Gianna’s hand to stop her from yanking her around before she stomped on Gianna’s instep.

She released her hold on Cate, screeching as she grabbed hold of her foot, hopping around.

Cate spun to face her, ready to fight again, but Gianna grabbed hold of Cate’s neck, squeezing tightly.

“Get off of me!” Cate screamed.

“Fat chance, Cate,” Gianna shouted. “I’m going to remove you from the picture, then stop that top from destroying our collection.”

“Wouldn’t do that if I were you,” Dominique said from across the room.

Gianna spun Cate around, wrapping an arm around her neck. “I would. You can’t stop me. Throw a fireball, you’ll hit precious Cate. Do you want to do that?”

“Maybe,” Dominique said with a shrug. “She’s not my favorite person, you know? Sometimes, I really don’t like her. She’s just so...perfect. So...sweet. Just like you said.”

“But I still don’t think you’re going to cross her, are you? Sweet or not, she’s on your side, so I doubt you’ll—”

A fireball burst from Dominique’s hand before she fired it at them. It struck Cate square in the chest, taking her breath away.

Cate’s heart seized as pain shot through her, radiating from her chest to every extremity.

The pressure on her neck released as Gianna’s eyes went wide, and she backed away.

Cate flopped to the floor, the pain making her eyes water.

“I can’t believe you did that.” Gianna’s voice was barely above a whisper.

“Yeah, a real zinger, too, as you can tell. Pretty sure some of it transferred to you, but you felt only a touch of what she’s going through.” Dominique poked a finger at Cate who writhed on the floor.

“You’re crazy,” Gianna’s voice said, her tone shocked.

Dominique shrugged. “I know, right? My methods are offensive, but they work.”

Cate slowly began to recover, the pain ebbing away when a bright flash of blue light seared her eyes. She rolled onto her other side, curling into a ball as the arc reverberated over her, making her hair stand on end.

She squeezed her eyes closed, wondering if whatever this was would be the end of her...and her entire future.

CHAPTER 21

The blue wave shot over her like an electrical impulse, searing into her closed eyes with its brightness as it sent a wave of gooseflesh over her entire body.

As she recovered her senses after the blast both from Dominique's fireball and the blue arc, she rolled onto her back. A fireball sailed over top of her, slamming into Gianna again and sending her slamming into the wall behind her.

Jack raced forward and slid his hands under Cate's arms, dragging her backward as she kicked her feet to propel herself.

He pulled her to safety between two shelves. "Cate, are you okay?"

"I think so," she answered as she glanced down at her body to determine if there were any lasting effects from the hit she'd taken. "It just stunned me."

"Me too, and I didn't even get hit with it," Jack answered. "But I did get hit by that blue arc."

"Yes," Cate said with a nod, her features still pinched, "me too. What was that?"

Jack poked a finger across the space at the top. It lay on its side, having finally finished its rotations.

Cate sucked in a breath, her eyes widening. "Did it work?"

"I think so. That's what the blue arc was. I guess it removed all the magic from the items in this room."

Cate scrambled to her feet, her eyes fixed on the small yellow top. She reached for one of the dusty objects on the shelf, blowing away a thick layer of dirt as she lifted it. "I wonder what this did? I'd like to test it."

"No idea," Jack said as he eyed the silk fan she'd picked up.

Dominique flicked another dismissive fireball, her casual brutality a stark contrast to the tension constricting Cate's chest, before she joined them.

"We ready to scram, kids? I'm kind of done playing with what's-her-name. It's fun blasting her and all, but now, I'm bored."

"Wait, we have to make sure that top worked," Cate said.

"It did," Dominique answered as she backed her way toward it, tossing another fireball in the Gianna's direction. She scooped it off the floor and shoved it into her pocket. "All of this stuff is useless junk now."

She grinned before she froze mid-step on her way back to them. "Oh, I almost forgot my surprise."

She shoved her hand into her pocket, pulling out a small, round object that looked like a bomb. She pulled a pin out of the top and tossed it toward Gianna before she dove toward Cate and Jack. "Let's go. We don't want to be here when that goes off."

Dominique clamped her hands around their forearms, and the world melted away, replaced by the library at Dunhaven Castle. "Home again, home again, jiggety-jig."

Cate stood with her jaw agape; shock etched into her features. "Why did you do that? We needed to make sure that top really worked."

"It did." Dominique yanked the fan from Cate's hands and waved it in the air. "This is intended to manipulate the weather, form sudden storms, that sort of thing. See? Now, all it does is cool you down, and not even that well."

She tossed it to the side with a shake of her head. "It's over, Cate. We have dealt a crippling blow to them. We should sit back, have a drink, and pat each other on the back."

"Excuse me for not being ready to celebrate. We still have several more things to deal with before The Agency is truly dismantled, including Laura's dream curse."

Dominique rolled her eyes and shook her head. "You two are no fun."

"I, personally, would like some answers before we celebrate this so-called win," Jack demanded.

“Such as? It seemed pretty clear what happened there. We disabled a good number of their magical toys. That severely limits their ability to wreak havoc.”

“What was that thing you threw at Gianna at the end?” Jack asked. “Is she dead? Did you kill her?”

Dominique’s lips curled into a satisfied grin, a slight chuckle escaping her. “No. She doesn’t deserve to die before she sees The Agency crumble and all her power disappear. It was just a glitter bomb.”

Dominique’s laughter ramped up. “She’ll be trying to remove glitter for the next twenty years. That stuff never goes away.”

Jack screwed up his face. “A glitter bomb? What are you, ten?”

Her features twisted from amused to angry. “A gentleman never asks a lady’s age. Haven’t you ever learned that?”

Jack offered her an unimpressed stare.

Cate heaved a sigh as she stalked across the room to her armchair. “That was...whatever. It doesn’t bear discussing, but what does is our next steps.”

“Right,” Dominique said with a bob of her head. “Now’s the time to make another bold move and crush them into oblivion.”

She smashed a fist into her palm and ground it.

“But how?” Jack questioned. “We’ve taken away some of their power, but not all of their power. Should we be looking for more of their magical stashes and destroying them all?”

“We could, but they’ll be so limited and reeling right now, it’s the perfect time to strike with something a little bigger,” Dominique said. “Actually, we should do both—remove all of their power, but also, we need to destroy the big wigs. Bankrupt them, remove their power.”

“How in the world are we going to do that?”

Dominique sucked in a sharp breath, her lips curling into a grin. “Well, I would say since we’ve removed most of their ability to manipulate time, we go back to the very beginning and destroy The Agency at its inception. Oh, we should probably destroy the other magical caches, too, but maybe we can leave that to Marcus. After all, he’s kind of been doing nothing lately.”

“He is searching for a solution to Laura’s dream curse, which is vital.”

“Yeah, I know, but can’t the other you and Grandmommy dearest do that? Why does Marcus need to be there? I’m telling you, having kids really ruined that man.”

Cate sucked in a breath. “Laura is a priority. I do not want her suffering.”

Dominique plopped into an armchair, her leather coat squeaking against the chair’s material. “She’ll live. And we’ll fix it as soon as we’re finished. Why are we arguing about this? You brought me here to do a job, I’m doing it.”

“She has a point,” Cate said with a shrug, her gaze landing on Jack.

“I suppose she does, but do we even know the inception of The Agency?”

Dominique raised her eyebrows. “Lucky for you, I know. See, I’ve hated them for a really long time. And I’ve found it’s always good to know as much as you can about your enemy, so I did some extensive research. It’s one of the reasons Marcus brought me here.”

Cate’s ears perked up as she considered ending The Agency once and for all. Could they really do it?

“All right. Tell us what you know,” Jack demanded, crossing his arms as he stared at Dominique.

“All right, but now I’m thinking we hit those other caches first. Really cut off any ability they have to do anything.”

Cate rubbed her temples, wondering if she should run this past Marcus before they proceeded. “Won’t they just use all the items that we just destroyed the moment they find them to change all of this?”

“Wow,” Dominique said, raising her eyebrows, “look at the cupcake coming up with a relevant question instead of just whining.”

“She makes a good point,” Jack said. “They could be doing that as we speak.”

“They could be. Although much of what they acquired was later in the twentieth century. That’s when they really rose to power. If we’re able to remove them before they even start, though, they’ll never amass anything. This needs to be a two-pronged attack.”

“Fine,” Cate said. “I’ll call Marcus and see what he can do while we handle stopping their formation. How do we do that?”

“Simple. This all arose during the time of King Louis the fourteenth. Maybe you’ve heard of the three musketeers?”

Jack scoffed, pacing the floor in front of the fireplace. “You’re joking, right? The three musketeers were the start of The Agency? Weren’t they

the good guys?”

“I didn’t say they started it, but they allowed it to happen. We need to go back to Versailles, right around the end of the sixteen hundreds and stop this from forming.”

Jack let his head fall back between his shoulder blades. “Why is it never a time with comfortable clothing?”

“Do you always complain this much?” Dominique asked.

“Usually, yes,” Jack answered with a nod.

“All right,” Cate said. “We’ll do whatever it takes. I’ll call Marcus and see if I can get him on destroying the other magical caches.”

“Awesome,” Dominique said with a grin as she leapt from her seat. “I’ll find clothes for us. Wow, this going to be fun. I’ve spent some time in the sixteen hundreds, but going with you two...priceless. Be back soon.”

She strode from the room, leaving them behind in silence.

Jack collapsed into the armchair Dominique had just sat in, shaking his head. “I don’t know if I’m going to survive this. That woman is absolutely insane.”

“I know, but she’s actually making progress on this.” Cate let her head fall into her hands. “I can’t believe I just said that. Dominique is actually helping us.”

“I know. Well, I suppose at least we should be thankful for that.”

Cate nodded as her stomach tightened into a knot. “Now, I need to call Marcus, and I know he’s going to be unhappy with the bold moves she’s making, but at least we’re getting somewhere.”

She pulled her phone from her pocket and scrolled to his contact information, her trembling thumb hovering over the call button.

“Good luck,” Jack said as she pressed it, turning on the speakerphone as she balanced her elbows on her knees.

“Catherine,” he answered a moment later, “has something happened?”

“A few things, yes,” she said. “Can you come home? We need to talk.”

“I will be right there.”

The line clicked, and Marcus appeared in the library a second later.

Jack startled, pressing a hand against his chest. “Oh, that was...not what I was expecting.”

Marcus offered him an unimpressed frown. “What did you expect? Me to dally when my wife calls and asks to speak?”

“Maybe,” Jack said. “Look, I’ll let you two talk—”

“It’s okay, Jack, you can stay” Cate said, waving him back into his chair.

“Catherine, what has happened? Is it Laura? Is she worse?” His voice strained, his concern obvious.

She shook her head. “Laura is fine. We...sent her to Maine with Celine.”

“You did what? Why, Catherine?”

“To protect her,” Cate said. “Because Dominique has been...making some moves.”

Marcus stared at her with a blank expression. “What does that mean? What has she done?”

Cate licked her lips, wrinkling her nose. “We...found the largest cache of magical items The Agency owns and...destroyed them.”

Marcus’s eyebrows shot up. “You did what?”

Cate winced as she lifted a shoulder. “Took away some of their power?”

“Catherine!” Marcus shouted, his voice incredulous. “Do you know what kind of danger you put yourself in?”

“Yes,” she said with a nod, “but we took as many precautions as we could to protect the children. We sent all of them to Maine, and Celine is masking them.”

“Celine is—” Marcus pressed his lips together, his nostrils flaring. “That is not easy and sometimes dangerous.”

“I know,” Cate said. “But we had to do something. Marcus, this can’t go on. We need to put a stop to it.”

He sucked in a deep breath, shaking his head. “Yes, I know, but...we need to move quickly now that you have done this. They will retaliate.”

Cate’s stomach twisted into a tight knot at the words. He confirmed the urgency Dominique had spoken of. Would they be able to move fast enough to finish this without a severe retaliation?

CHAPTER 22

With a sharp breath, Cate shoved her fear aside, focusing on moving forward.

“I know,” Cate said with a nod. “That’s why we called you here. We have a plan, but we need your help to make sure it works.”

Marcus heaved a sigh as he poured himself a drink. “You have a plan or Dominique has a plan?”

“Both,” Cate answered.

He twisted to face her, narrowing his eyes. “Explain, Catherine. What does that mean?”

“Dominique has actually been incredibly useful,” Cate answered with a shrug.

“As I knew she could be given the proper motivation,” Marcus answered.

“What motivation did you give her?” Jack asked.

Marcus slid his eyes sideways to the man, over the rim of his glass as he sipped his brandy. “Not your concern.”

“I think it may be,” Jack retorted.

“Look, it doesn’t matter,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

Marcus strode to the fireplace, glancing into the cold hearth. “Catherine is correct. And it does not matter because she is going to return to prison after this. She just does not know that yet.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat. “What? You’re sending her back to prison?”

“She is a criminal, Catherine. I could only convince them to allow her out if I promised to return her.”

“What happens if she gets away?” Jack asked.

Marcus shrugged. “It poses no problem to us.”

Cate’s stomach clenched as she considered it. “And she doesn’t know this yet?”

“No,” Marcus answered as he refilled his brandy. “Now, what is it that she suggests?”

“Destroying their other caches while we return to The Agency’s Inception and destroy them once and for all.”

Marcus’s eyebrows knitted. “A bold plan.”

“One you disagree with?” Jack asked.

“Not entirely, no. And if we are certain the children are safe, we should move right away. Especially after what you’ve just managed.”

“All right, then you’ll destroy the other magical caches while we go back and handle stopping The Agency,” Cate said with a nod.

Marcus arched an eyebrow. “I do not care for this plan, but yes, that is what would work best.”

“What’s your objection?” Jack asked.

“Catherine’s involvement in the royal court of Louis the fourteenth.”

“I won’t change anything outside of The Agency’s formation,” Cate promised.

Marcus shook his head. “You misunderstand. I couldn’t care less if you change something. I merely object to you being faced with the people who formed this organization. Not to mention the king.”

“Oh, right,” Jack said with a chuckle. “Old King Louis outranks you. Cate could marry up.”

“Do not joke about it, Reid.”

Cate heaved a sigh, shaking her head at them. “I am not leaving you for the King of France.”

“I don’t know, Cate. He has a lot more money.”

“I don’t care.” Cate patted Marcus’s chest before she kissed his cheek. “I’m not falling for him. I just want to end this with The Agency.”

“I will make the arrangements to destroy the other magical caches,” Marcus said. “And your current counterpart and Mother have discovered a way to remove the dream curse. With any luck this will be wrapped up soon.”

Cate focused on the words, pressing her lips together as she tried to imagine a world without The Agency. Would they succeed in finally removing the threat?

“All right, kids, I—” Dominique burst through the doors, stopping short as she spotted Marcus. “Marcus, you’re here.”

“I am,” he answered, lifting his chin. “And I hear you have been making some major moves.”

Dominique recovered from her surprise quickly, thrusting her arms out to the sides. “You didn’t bring me here to stare at your kid. You didn’t actually think I’d just sit on my hands while Gianna Caruso ran all over you like a treadmill.”

“That is hardly an accurate description of what has been happening,” Marcus answered.

“Seemed accurate to me. Here she is twenty years after she started messing with poor cherub cheeks, making life miserable for child number two. But you’re right, you totally had this.”

Marcus’s jaw clenched as he shook his head. “Please do not make me wish I hadn’t rescued you from that horrid pit I found you in.”

Dominique scoffed. “I seriously have delivered everything promised on my end and then some. You can’t possibly be upset.”

“Your methods have risked my children’s lives and Catherine’s.”

“Also mine,” Jack said with a wave of his hand in the air.

“Yes, even Reid’s, whose life is the least of my concern, though still of some concern.”

“Aww, poor Marcus. He got married and had babies, and now he can’t take the pressure. Grow up, buddy. If you want big results, you gotta make big moves. I’m willing to do that. And surprisingly, so is little Catie. You know, she actually spun that top to remove the magic from all the elements in that archive while Gianna had a gun on the lumberjack.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow, his gaze sliding to Cate’s.

She nodded with a wince. “I’m sorry, Jack, but—”

“You did what you needed to do,” Jack said with a nod. “I understand.”

“And now we have to finish doing what we need to do to wipe these people from the face of the earth. To remove this threat once and for all. To turn the clock back and reset everything back to normal.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat. “Wait...if we do this...won’t everything change? “

Marcus slid a lock of hair behind her ear. “No, dear. Everything will still have played out as it should have as long as you return to the correct moment in time. And life will proceed from there.”

Cate stared up into his dark eyes, searching them for any sign of a lie. She knew she’d remember her family, and she couldn’t let it be ripped away from her.

“Don’t worry, babe, you’ll still be a duchess.” Dominique winked at her.

Cate heaved a sigh, shaking her head as the woman ruined the moment. “That was not my concern.”

Dominique rolled her eyes. “Oh, please. Tell me you’re concerned about the warm, fuzzy love you share with Marcus and making sure you still have those three brats.”

“Maybe you shouldn’t comment on our lives and just do what we brought you here to do,” Cate said.

“I agree,” Marcus answered. “By the way, how did you glean the location of the artifact chamber? My father searched for it until his death.”

“I asked a friend.” Dominique crossed her arms and shrugged.

“What friend?” Marcus pushed.

“Nobody you know.”

“It was a man-like creature named Tobther,” Cate said.

Dominique’s jaw fell open as she stared at Cate, her hands dropping to her hips. “Thanks a lot, tattletale.”

“You took Catherine to the Hellscape?” His eyes widened as his voice took on an incredulous tone.

“She’s fine, Marcus,” Dominique retorted, poking a finger at her. “Clearly.”

“And what about when you take her to the royal court, hmm? Can I trust that you will return her without a detour through Hell?”

“I can’t believe you are treating me like this. I have single-handedly taken down The Agency, and all you can do is lecture me because cherub cheeks may have gotten a little hot under the collar. Well, fine! If that’s the way you want to be then forget it. I’m not going to help you anymore.” Dominique twisted on her heel and stormed from the room, slamming the door behind her.

Cate stared after her, her lips parting and her stomach twisting into a tight knot as she glanced at Marcus. “Now what?”

“She is merely being overly dramatic. She will cool off. That gives me time to devise my own plan to remove all of the magical artifacts from The Agency’s existence.”

“I’m still a little nervous about this plan. What if they use an artifact from a previous time to go back and reinstate themselves?” Cate paced the floor. “And I still don’t see how things will work out to become the way they are now.”

“Catherine,” Marcus said, stopping her pacing by stepping in front of her, “you must trust me. Others may have a different remembrance of what happened, but you will not. You will still remember searching for Jack together, finding Gertrude, and visiting this time. You will still remember your children.”

Cate pressed her lips together as she stared up at him, her eyes turning misty. “Are you sure?”

“I am positive, dear. Believe me, I would not risk losing you or our family.”

She offered him a weak smile through her tears as she nodded.

Across the room, Jack cleared his throat. “Still here, so...you know, keep the affection to a minimum, if you could.”

Cate wiped at a tear that had fallen to her cheek as she chuckled. “Sorry.”

Jack waved a dismissive hand in the air. “Perfectly fine, just...in case.”

“All right, then I guess someone needs to go talk to Dominique and get her back on board with the plan.”

“I will do it,” Marcus said, setting his empty brandy glass on the drink cart.

Cate placed a hand against his chest. “No, you’ll just argue with her. I’ll talk to her. She’s actually...not that bad.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow. “You must be joking.”

“I’m not. She has protected us from Gianna multiple times. And I probably can play penitent a little better than you can.”

“You know me so well, Catherine,” he said with a coy smile.

She kissed his cheek. “I’ll be right back.”

With her stomach fluttering, she left the library behind, snaking her way through the halls to Dominique’s room upstairs—as far from anyone else’s room as they could make it.

With a quiet knock, Cate pressed her ear against the door. “Dominique?”

“I’m not here, so go away.”

With a gentle roll of her eyes, Cate pushed into the room, finding it dark with the shades drawn. She flicked the light on, and Dominique’s eyes flashed red for a moment before she squeezed them closed. “Turn that off.”

“Sorry,” Cate said as she turned off the lights and sauntered into the room. “Just would like to be able to see you while we talk.”

“There’s no reason for us to talk.” Dominique flicked her wrist, turning all the lights on in the room as she leapt from her seat. “I’ll be out of your hair in a jiffy. I just need to finish packing.”

“That’s not necessary,” Cate said.

“I think it is. Marcus clearly doesn’t trust me at all, so the plan is off.”

Cate pinched her eyebrows together. “That really bothers you, doesn’t it?”

Dominique tossed a dark-colored blouse into her bag. “Nope.”

“You know, I told him you have been very helpful.”

She shrugged. “Doesn’t matter.”

“It does to me,” Cate said. “You defended Laura, you got answers about The Agency, and now you’re about to help us eradicate them. Dominique, you’re a big part of this plan, and I’d really like to continue it.”

“Well, Marcus doesn’t think we should.”

“He does,” Cate answered. “He’s tracking down the other locations and making a plan. We should continue forward with our plan.”

Dominique tossed a pair of leather pants into her suitcase, twisting to face her. “Look, Cate, it’s over.”

“But it doesn’t have to be,” Cate said. “Please, Dominique. We need your help.”

She crossed her arms, puckering her lips. “I don’t know.”

“I’ll sweeten the deal a little.”

Dominique shifted her blue eyes to Cate, arching one eyebrow. “What’s that mean?”

“Once we finish this, you can stay at the castle as long as you’d like. You’re a welcome member of this family.”

Dominique drew her chin back to her chest. “Are you joking? That’s not...that’s...a stupid offer. Completely stupid. Why would I want to live here?”

Cate shrugged. "Because it's better than slinking away to be alone somewhere or worse...get hauled back to prison."

"Oh, and you think I'm lonely. That I want to stay here and play aunt of the year to the brats. Hang out with the lumberjack after hours and do puzzles in the library."

"Jack hates puzzles."

"Well, then hang out and do whatever it is he does. That's what you think I want?"

Cate lifted a shoulder. "I don't know what you want, I'm just telling you what you could do afterward if you wanted. That's all."

Dominique narrowed her eyes at Cate. "All right, fine. Maybe I will hang around after...just to get on the old man's nerves and corrupt your kids."

Cate offered her a slight smile. "Well, you are welcome. And if you want to leave, you're welcome to do that too. I just...really want to finish this. What do you say, Dominique? Are you game to finish this?"

CHAPTER 23

Cate's heart hammered against her ribs. Had she read the woman correctly, or had she just killed any chance they had of wiping out The Agency from the earth?

She held her breath, trying to portray confidence, but she felt anything but. Without Dominique's help, they may never finish this, but with her...

The entire nightmare could come to an end.

Dominique lifted a shoulder in a shrug, eyeing Cate. With an arch of her eyebrow, she tossed a scarf into her suitcase and shrugged. "I mean, I guess I already got the clothes and stuff. Would be a waste of my time if I just had to trash it all."

Cate offered her a subtle smile, pleased that she'd managed to convince the woman to help them. "You're right. It would be a huge waste if we didn't use those clothes."

"Yeah," Dominique said with a lift of her shoulder. "Plus...honestly, I was kind of bored. I mean, you can only throw a fireball at the wall so many times a day in that cell."

"Of course," Cate said with a warm smile.

Dominique wagged a finger at her. "Don't think for a second that this means that I actually...like you people or anything like that. I'm doing this purely to satisfy my own vengeance. Got it?"

Cate held her hands up, removing the grin from her features as she nodded. "Got it. Only because you hate Gianna. Nothing to do with us."

“Exactly. I just hate Gianna Caruso way more than I dislike you. That’s it.”

“Noted,” Cate said with a nod. “I’ll inform Jack. Marcus is working on his end. We should be able to leave as soon as we’ve changed.”

“Good,” Dominique said with a nod as she crossed the room. “I have your clothes right here.” She handed Cate a giant ball of fabric before she piled a second set of clothes on top. “Yours, then Jack’s...obviously. And don’t take forever to say goodbye to Marcus and get dressed. I want to get going on this. We need to find those founders and make sure they never form this organization.”

“Time is of the essence,” Cate answered. “And I, too, would like to finish this.”

“Yeah, well, I couldn’t care less about what you want. So...”

“Right,” Cate said, playing along with the woman’s game. “All right. I will see you soon.”

Dominique nodded as she pulled a blouse from her suitcase and shuttled it back to a drawer. With a slight smile, Cate left her behind, carrying the clothes to her bedroom and dropping off her set before she grabbed Jack’s and slipped into the hall.

As she made her way downstairs, she faced the task ahead of them. How difficult would it be to prevent history from progressing the way it had already? Would it leave any lasting ripples?

With a deep breath, she pushed into the library, Jack’s clothes in hand.

“Well?” Jack asked.

“Clothes for you for the trip,” she said, handing them over.

“Dominique has agreed?” Marcus asked.

Cate bobbed her head. “She has. And she has asked that we dress right away and meet her to leave. She said you should handle your end quickly, too.”

“Of course, she has,” Marcus said with a sigh. “She is awfully demanding, isn’t she?”

“Seems like she’s always like that. Oh, umm, also...” Cate winced a little as she wrinkled her nose. “She’s...probably going to stay with us after for a while.”

“What?” Marcus stared at Cate with widened eyes.

“I may or may not have offered that as incentive,” Cate said with a slight shrug.

“Why?” Marcus retorted, his voice incredulous.

“And why did it work? She can’t actually want to stay here.”

Cate shifted her weight from foot to foot. “Well, I think...I think she’s lonely.”

Marcus scoffed, shaking his head. Jack poked a finger at him. “I agree with Northcott on this one. This is the singular time we will agree on something.”

Cate pressed her lips together. “Come on. You can’t see this? She wants to be accepted.”

“She could have been,” Marcus answered. “She never wanted that.”

“I think she does...at least now she does. Look, maybe she doesn’t, but the offer is out there, just so you know.”

“Oh, heavens,” Marcus said, sliding his eyes closed with a deep sigh. “That woman will be a leech on us. And do you really want her influence on the children?”

Cate chewed her lower lip as she considered it. “She sort of helped Laura.”

With a disgusted sigh, Marcus stepped toward Cate and kissed her cheek. “We can argue about it later, dear, after everything has been taken care of.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod. “We all have to get going.”

“Yes,” Marcus agreed as he headed for the door.

Cate grabbed his arm, tugging him back. “Be careful.”

“You, too. Especially around Dominique. She takes far too many risks for my taste.”

“I’ll keep her in line,” Cate promised.

He pulled her into a kiss before he squeezed her hand. “I will see you soon.”

She nodded as she let her fingers slip from his, then turned to face Jack as Marcus left them behind. “Well, we should get dressed.”

Jack held up a lacy cravat with a wrinkled nose. “If we must.”

“Stop,” she said with a chuckle. “I can’t believe you still complain about the clothes for time traveling.”

“I can’t believe you still don’t,” he retorted with a teasing grin. “Meet you outside of Dominique’s room when we’re ready?”

“Sounds good,” she said.

They parted ways, and Cate made her way to her bedroom, ringing for Andrea. Within a few minutes, she had assistance for getting into the get-up she'd have to sport while trying to end The Agency.

With her puffy sleeves and large skirt, she struggled to make it through the halls, not used to the weight of the clothing.

When she reached the faraway hallway, she found Jack already pacing in his seventeenth century fashion. He grinned at her as she hobbled toward him.

"This dress is a little much. I don't know how I'll do anything in it, let alone stop The Agency from forming." Cate sighed as she knocked on Dominique's door.

She pulled it open a second later, still in her leather pants and jacket. "Ready?"

Cate scoffed. "You're not!"

Dominique glanced down at her outfit. "This is my signature look no matter what era I'm in."

"You can't wear that to Versailles in the sixteen hundreds. Come on, Dominique." Cate shook her head at the woman.

"It'll be fine," she said with a shrug.

"Just change," Cate answered, her voice firm.

Dominique rolled her eyes. "You're annoying."

"We need you to blend in so you can help us," Cate said with a shake of her head as she shuffled into the room with her skirt lifted up above her ankles. "Now, hurry up. You're holding everything up here."

"Wow," Dominique said with a scrunched nose. "Suddenly, you're so demanding. You wait outside, Jackie boy. No free peep shows today."

"I wasn't—" he started as she slammed the door in his face

"Come on," she said, grabbing the garments from the wardrobe, "let's get this over with."

With Cate's help, she was dressed and ready in less than a half hour. Cate tugged the door open for Jack with a heavy sigh. "We're finally ready. Let's go—"

"From right here. I'm not traipsing all over creation in this dress."

Cate wrinkled her nose. "Aren't you used to it? Didn't you grow up in these sorts of dresses?"

Dominique leaned forward, her lips tugging into a tight grimace. "And I hated them. Hated."

“All right, all right. It won’t be long. Let’s just do what we have to do and finish this.” Cate rubbed her forehead as Jack closed the door behind them. “Besides, it’s your room that’ll be a mess.”

“I don’t care,” Dominique said, stretching her hand out in front of her. “It’s worth it.”

As the wind picked up, the light twinkling in front of her turned into a wide black hole until it yawned in front of them. As the portal opened, Cate swallowed hard and stepped inside.

Her heart thundered against her ribs as she emerged on the opposite side in an elaborate garden. For a second, she stood alone, her pulse racing. Why was no one else here?

Her mind raced. Would she need to find help? Where?

Before she could answer those questions, Jack appeared.

She reached for him, leaning against him as she breathed as high of relief. “Thank goodness. I thought no one else was coming.”

“Dominique should be right behind me,” he answered before he flicked his gaze to the palace ahead of them. “Wow.”

“Yeah,” Cate said with a nod. “Impressive. I’ve never been here before.”

“Me either,” Jack answered as Dominique stepped through the portal next to them.

“Took you long enough,” Cate said.

“Sorry, princess, don’t get your knickers in a bunch. These dresses aren’t the easiest to move around in.” She raised her eyes to the palace in front of them, clapping her hands together and rubbing them. “All right. Who’s ready to infiltrate the palace and stop the formation of The Agency?”

She grinned at them both before her expression faded. “Why is no one excited?”

“I’m excited,” Cate said with a shrug, “I’m just...also very nervous.”

Dominique pressed her lips together and shook her head. “Humans.”

She pushed between Cate and Jack, storming her way to the palace. With a glance over her shoulder, she called, “You coming?”

Cate sucked in a breath, glancing at Jack. “We better go.”

He bobbed his head, offering his arm as they strode toward the sprawling palace. “How are we supposed to find these people and make sure they don’t start The Agency?”

“Dominique must know them—or of them. Making certain they don’t start The Agency...” Cate shrugged. “Maybe...make sure the people who start it never come together?”

“Ah, good idea. That could work. How long until we can do that, I wonder?”

“Can’t be that long,” Cate answered. “Dominique wants to get out of here.”

They came closer to the palace, and Cate’s heart hammered harder against her ribs. Would they stand out like a sore thumb the moment they walked in?

She hurried to close the distance between them and Dominique.

They slipped inside the palace, and Cate’s eyes rose to the ceiling, taking in the opulence. “Wow,” she whispered, her voice echoing.

“Where is everyone?” Jack murmured.

“Probably with the king,” Dominique said. “He’s hosting a large party tonight. The one where the founders of The Agency meet. We need to get to that party.”

“And make sure the founders don’t speak?” Cate asked.

Dominique lifted her skirt and hurried toward an unknown destination. “Something like that.”

Cate and Jack exchanged a glance before they followed her. They approached a set of open double doors. Laughter and chatter floated from inside.

As they entered, the grandeur of Versailles unfolded before them. Golden chandeliers hung from high ceilings painted with celestial scenes, casting a soft glow over nobles adorned in silks and satins. Laughter and the delicate clink of crystal filled the air as masked attendees flirted in the shadows of ornate columns.

How would they find The Agency’s founders in this sea of people?

Cate glanced at Dominique, her eyes wide with panic.

“Mingle,” Dominique said. “Look for a man wearing a purple flower on his lapel. He’s one of them. I’ll search for the other.”

“Wait, what do we do when we find him?” Cate asked, grabbing hold of Dominique’s arm.

“Watch him, duh,” Dominique said with a frown before she yanked her arm away and left.

“We should stick together,” Jack murmured as he scanned the crowd.

“Right,” Cate said with a nod, her stomach twisting into a tight knot. “And I guess we should...mingle.”

“I’m not mingling. I’m going to keep to the fringes and search for this flowered fellow.” He offered his arm, and Cate slid her hand through the crook of his elbow, allowing him to guide her along the edge of the room.

As they scanned the crowd, she searched for any hints of purple. “I don’t see anything.”

“Me either,” Jack said with a shake of his head. “Where is this guy?”

“Wait!” Cate’s heart skipped a beat as she spotted a single flash of purple. “I thought I saw something purple, but now he’s turned.”

“Wait here,” Jack said, pushing her into a corner. “I’ll check it out and report back.”

“Wait, maybe we shouldn’t—” she began, but he was already making his way toward the group of men.

Cate chewed her lower lip, a gnawing sense of unease growing inside of her. She rose to her tiptoes, trying to see Jack as he disappeared into the crowd, but she lost sight of him.

“Well, you seem to be searching for something,” a man said to her left.

“Oh, not really, I’m just—” Cate froze as she twisted to find the King of France eyeing her.

CHAPTER 24

“Your Majesty,” Cate said, her heart thudding hard as her knees wobbled and the room spun a little. She curtsied, hoping she didn’t fall over from the effort given her shock.

He tugged one corner of his lips back in an amused smirk. “Were you then?”

She stared at him with wide eyes. “Was I what?”

“Searching for something—or someone?”

Cate swallowed hard as he stepped closer to her, his eyes fixed on her lips.

“I do not believe I have ever seen you in my court before. Who are you?”

Heat washed over her as she tried to come up with an answer that made some semblance of sense. “Uh, I...this is my first time here. I came with a...cousin.”

“A cousin. And who is this cousin who has kept you from my court for so long?”

“Dominique Laurent?” Cate’s tone turned questioning as he continued to study her, and she struggled not to fidget under his gaze.

“Dominique, what a beautiful name, yet not as beautiful as yours is, I’m sure.”

Cate offered him a fleeting smile. “You are too kind, Your Majesty.”

“She blushes. So becoming. And what is your name, my dear?”

“Catherine,” she answered. “Catherine Northcott.”

She hoped he'd recognize the name, but she wasn't certain how far back Marcus's notoriety went.

The king fluttered his eyelashes, his brows pinching slightly. "The last name sounds familiar, but...it escapes me. Perhaps I am acquainted with your father?"

"Or my husband," Cate answered, lifting her left hand. "Marcus Northcott."

"Marcus Northcott. Hmm, the name is not familiar to me. Is he here tonight?"

Cate licked her lips as she tried to decide whether or not she would lie. "Uh—"

Behind the King, Jack cleared his throat. The man turned, his features unimpressed to study him from head to toe. With a weak, wrinkled-nose smile, he flicked his gaze back to Cate. "Is this your husband?"

"Marcus Northcott, at your service," Jack answered with a bow.

"Marcus, this is His Majesty, the king."

Jack's face paled, his eyes widening in a silent panic. He bowed stiffly, his voice barely a whisper as he managed to choke out, "Your Majesty, of course." Cate's heart pounded louder, her mind racing for ways to defuse the ticking bomb of their fabricated identities.

The king twisted to eye Jack again, wagging a finger at him. "You know, the name Marcus Northcott rings a sinister bell. Weren't you the mastermind behind that dreadful plot against my crown last summer?" The king's voice was light, almost playful, but the threat beneath it was obvious.

"What?" Jack asked, his eyes going wide.

"Yes, I am quite sure. Guards!"

Cate's heart skipped a beat as he waved his sentries closer. "This man has been involved in a plot against my life. Arrest him immediately."

"Whoa, just a second, I have not—" Jack began as the men grabbed hold of him, ready to haul him away."

"Wait," Cate exclaimed. "There has been some mistake."

"There has been none, madam. Never fear, I understand a husband's crimes do not reflect upon his lovely wife. Now, take him away. There is no need to be upset, my dear. I shall see that you are well taken care of."

Another man approached her, gently pulling her away from Jack as they dragged him from the room. "Come with me, madam, and we will be certain you are comfortable."

“Comfortable?” Cate’s mind spun as she searched for a way out of this as the man led her from the room. She glanced back, her features pained, in search of Dominique, but she did not find the woman.

“There is nothing to fear. I shall see that you are placed in a lovely room, and I am certain His Majesty will visit you tonight to ensure you are...well taken care of.”

Cate’s eyes widened as she realized Jack had just been hauled away so she could become the king’s latest conquest. “Really, that’s not necessary, I’m most—”

“Now, madam,” the man said, tightening his grip on her arm, “there is no need for you to fear anything. You have found favor with His Majesty and will be well taken care of. Come along.”

A slight groan escaped her as she allowed herself to be led through the palace halls to an opulent bedroom. The man tossed her inside. The distinct sound of the lock clicking closed twisted her stomach into a tight knot.

She glanced around the room in search of a way out or a weapon. “What is it with the French?” she murmured as she lifted her skirt to cross to the bedroom. “First, Napoleon, and now the King.”

With a shake of her head, she grabbed hold of the fireplace poker, her fingers tightening around it. As she stared at the pointed tip, not wanting to have to use it on the King of France, the door clicked.

Her heart sped up as she twisted, expecting to find the King paying her a visit.

Instead, Dominique slipped into the room. “What are you doing?”

Cate breathed out a sigh of relief as she hurried to the woman. “Thank goodness you’re here.”

Dominique scoffed. “Yeah, no kidding. I’ve really got to keep an eye on you to keep you on track, don’t I. Cate, this is no time to be snuggling up with the king.”

“I’m not,” Cate huffed.

“Not yet. But here you sit in a bedroom waiting for him. We don’t have time for a roll in the hay, babe.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped. “I’m not...I didn’t invite this. I don’t want to be his mistress. They locked me in here.”

Dominique crossed her arms. “Just randomly? You just had to go make eyes at him, didn’t you?”

“I did nothing of the sort,” Cate said with a wrinkle of her nose. “I tried to use Marcus’s name to let him know I was married, but then Jack pretended to be Marcus, and the King had him arrested.”

Dominique stared at her, incredulous. “Are you serious? Jack stole Marcus’s identity? Well, good for him for getting arrested.”

“That’s not the point.” Cate shook her head, her fingers curling into fists. “Dominique, this is serious. Jack is in prison. And we still haven’t found the people from The Agency.”

“Speak for yourself. I did my job. I found them. Then, I had to stop what I was doing to come and find you.”

“And now we have to rescue Jack,” Cate said, pressing a hand against her forehead as a tiny measure of relief coursed through her. She moved toward the door, but Dominique grabbed her arm, tugging her back.

“Uh-uh-uh. We are not going after Jack until this Agency mess is sorted out.”

“But—”

“No buts,” Dominique answered. “Let the lumberjack cool his heels in the cell downstairs. That’s what he gets for stealing identities. Identity theft is not a joke, Cate. We’ll get him when we’re done.”

Cate pressed her lips together, frustration building inside of her. Anything could happen to Jack in the time it took them to track down the men who would form The Agency and...

Her brows furrowed. “Wait...how do we know the men won’t just meet tomorrow or in two weeks or two months?”

Dominique tilted her head, her expression turning annoyed. “Are you serious?”

Cate’s jaw dropped open as she realized what Dominique was implying. “No.”

“What did you think we were going to do? We have to stop this from happening. And there’s one sure-fire way to do that.”

“I’m not killing someone,” Cate said with a shake of her head.

Dominique screwed up her face. “What? Who said anything about killing someone?”

Cate shifted her weight, trying to follow the conversation. “Isn’t that what you meant when you said there’s one sure-fire way to stop this?”

“Yeah. Armand Giroux has already started to amass and illegally use magical artifacts. I’m summoning an adjudicator to take him to prison in another realm. Problem solved.” Dominique shrugged as though the answer was obvious.

Cate stared at her for a minute. “Oh. Well, okay, that’s...that’s way better than murdering him.”

“I’m not a barbarian, Cate. Geez.”

“Well, you were,” Cate said as she followed Dominique to the door. “You kidnapped me because you were mad that I freed Marcus from The Order.”

“That was different. Plus, we bonded. I kind of liked you.”

Cate raised her eyebrows as they threaded through the halls. “No, you didn’t. You tied me to a chair and tormented me.”

“I was nice. I gave you cookies. We drank tea together. And...I’m helping you right now. I don’t say this often, Cate, but I admire you.”

Cate stared at the woman, her features twisted with disbelief. “I don’t buy it.”

“What? I do. I mean, there you were, a human, and you literally walked through Hell to free Marcus. That takes guts. If you had a dark side...wow. We could have been an unstoppable team. We would have definitely taken over the world.”

“I don’t...know what to say,” Cate murmured. “Thanks, I think.”

Dominique clapped her on the shoulder. “Don’t get too excited. I don’t really like you that much. Like I said, I admire your gumption to save Marcus, but that’s where it ends. Outside of that, you’re pretty much a wet blanket. You never want to do anything fun.”

Before Cate could answer, Dominique pushed through a set of double doors and motioned for Cate to follow.

Cate trailed behind her, entering the room, and stopping dead as she crossed the threshold. A man sat tied to a chair and gagged. His eyes were wide with fear as he silently pleaded with Cate to help him.

“Well, don’t just stand there,” Dominique said, “close the door.”

Cate’s heart hammered again as she quickly shut it behind her, spinning back to face the man.

“Hey, buddy,” Dominique said as she pulled the gag from his mouth, “still doing okay?”

“Let me go,” he answered. “You have made a grave mistake.”

“I don’t think so. You are Armand Giroux, aren’t you?” Dominique asked.

He bobbed his head, sweat beading on his brow.

“The same Armand Giroux who has been acquiring magical objects. And the same one who is about to meet Robert Laudlam.”

“I...I have only come across a few...curious items. As for Lord Laudlam, he has some interested in them.”

“Uh-huh,” Dominique said with nod. “I’m sure he does. He wants to form a secret organization with you. One that will try to grow its power with these objects. And I just can’t let that happen.”

“No, please. I do not know what you are speaking of.”

“Sure you do, you just don’t want to admit it. Now, because you have been doing some illegal things with those magical artifacts, I’m going to call what we in the supernatural world refer to as an adjudicator. And this adjudicator is going to take you away for a very long time.”

“But—” Armand started.

Before he could say anything else, the door burst open. Cate gasped as she tried to hurry away from the man who burst inside, but he grabbed hold of her, yanking her back toward him.

“I don’t think so,” he growled. As he smashed her against his chest, she spotted the purple flower on his lapel. This must be Lord Laudlam.

Cate struggled against him, but he held her firmly.

“Well, well, well,” Gianna said as she strode into the room. “If it isn’t Cate Northcott and her band of misfits.”

Cate’s heart plummeted at the sight of the woman. Now, they would never be able to stop The Agency from forming.

CHAPTER 25

Cate's breath caught in her throat as heat washed over her. She backed away from Gianna, her knees wobbling. She clearly had figured out their plan and managed to travel back in time to stop Cate from completing the task she needed to complete.

If they didn't stop the formation of The Agency, she'd never get her life back or be able to protect her children.

"Misfits?" Dominique said as she cracked her neck and summoned a fireball. "I don't think so, babe. More like Dominique and her merry band of butt kickers. I mean, first of all, the assumption that Cate is the leader is seriously flawed."

Gianna's laugh was cold, mocking. "We could waste time arguing over trivial details, but I prefer to focus on the inevitable. You're too late. The Agency's formation is already set in motion, and I'm here to see it through."

Dominique let out a harsh laugh. "I'm pretty certain I can."

"No, you cannot. I'm here to make sure you do not, in fact. After your little...game with the archives, I secured the other magical objects—at least the ones that would allow me to ensure a positive result for The Agency." Gianna crossed her arms, lifting her chin.

Dominique arched an eyebrow. "Was that before or after you cleaned off all the glitter from the glitter bomb?"

Gianna's voice dripped with scorn. "You're bound to fail, entrusting your hopes to a lunatic. Cate, it's lamentable that you didn't tackle this on your own.”

“Hey!” Dominique answered, finally whipping a fireball at the woman. “I’m not insane. I’m just...bold.”

Cate’s gasp echoed in the suddenly tense air as Dominique’s fireball collided with an unseen shield surrounding Gianna, disintegrating into harmless sparks that illuminated Gianna’s smug smile.

Gianna had taken steps to protect herself from the supernatural attacks. They’d never win over her now.

“Surprised, Cate?” Gianna tutted. “It really is a pity that it will all come down to this. I cannot wait until I find Laura so I can break her. Once we do that, we’ll move to the next child. Hmmm, Anna or Logan. Which one will make mommy and daddy hand over Dunhaven Castle?”

“Neither,” Cate shot back. “You’ll never find them or hurt them again.”

“Bold words from someone on the losing end.” Gianna lifted a shoulder, offering Cate a smirk.

“We’re really not on the losing end,” Dominique answered as she pulled a switchblade from her pocket and grabbed hold of Armand’s hair. She pressed the sharply knife to his neck. “I can end this right now.”

Gianna heaved a sigh. “While I assume you can, I am not certain Cate will let you outright kill a man. And on top of that, I can simply form The Agency with Lord Laudlam myself. In fact, I may prefer that. Given my knowledge of what happens, I can guide us to new heights as a founding member.”

“I really don’t think Cate’s going to object. She’s put up with your crap for far too long. It’s time to end this.”

Cate retreated step by step, her heart pounding as the reality of their grim choice weighed heavily on her. Each step felt like wading through thick mud, her mind racing as she considered the severe implications of their actions.

She couldn’t order a man to be killed or even go along with this plan. It wasn’t in her nature. But how could they stop this?

She couldn’t risk her children’s lives either.

“That’s right. Tell her, Cate. Tell her she can’t kill him. Tell her you object.”

“Give us a second, huh?” Dominique answered, yanking the man’s head over as she leaned closer to Cate. “You’ve got to get whatever magical objects she’s using away from her.”

Cate licked her lips as her heart thundered against her ribs. How could she do that? She needed to get closer to Gianna, to try to wrangle away whatever she was using to time travel and protect herself against Dominique's attacks.

Sweat beaded on her brow as she searched for a way. With a raise of her eyebrows, she fought to steady her voice as she spoke. "Actually...I don't object entirely."

She took a step closer to Gianna, raising her chin as she tried to look sure of herself. "This has to end."

"You're willing to allow her to murder a man right in front of you? My, my. Where have your morals gone? You are just as bad as The Agency you fight against, aren't you? Or maybe you're closer to the values of The Order. Tell me, Cate...have they corrupted you?" Gianna cocked her head as she searched Cate's face.

Cate's nostrils flared at the insinuation, and she used the opening to plow into her plan. She lunged forward, wrapping her hands around Gianna's throat as they tumbled to the floor. "No, you have corrupted me. You and your constant power plays. You opened the wrong can of worms when you attacked my child."

"Come off it, Cate," Gianna growled as she grabbed hold of Cate's wrists, trying to pry her hands from her neck. "I broke you when I did that. And now I'm going to take everything I want from you and more."

"I don't think so," Cate said, allowing the woman to pull her hands away and roll on top of her.

She fought to search for the magical items that she may be using, sliding her trembling hands into Gianna's pockets.

"Looking for something?" Gianna asked as she lifted Cate by her neck before she slammed her head against the floor.

Cate struggled to remain focused when she caught sight of a bracelet dangling from Gianna's wrist. She grabbed hold of it and broke the chain, tossing it across the room.

"Sorry, that's not it," Gianna answered.

"The ring, Cate. It's the ring on her thumb," Dominique shouted.

Cate grabbed hold of Gianna's hands as she felt for the metal band.

"You're not going to get that off me," Gianna said with a chuckle.

"Watch me." Cate's face twisted with determination as she let go of Gianna's hands, her own searching for something to be used as a weapon.

She found nothing, so she improvised, bringing the heel of her hand smashing up into Gianna's jaw.

Gianna grunted, temporarily stunned, and released the pressure on Cate's neck.

Cate used the opportunity to yank the ring from Gianna's thumb and toss it across the room. "Got it."

Redness rose into Gianna's cheeks as she stared down at Cate, ready to place her hands around Cate's neck again when a fireball slammed into the back of her.

It propelled her forward, head over heels, and she landed in a heap against the wall.

Cate scrambled to her feet, her eyes trained on Gianna who also rose, her chest heaving.

"That was a very stupid move." She reached into her boot and withdrew a gun, aiming it at Cate.

"Look out!" Dominique shouted.

Time seemed to slow as Gianna's features twisted with hatred. She pulled the trigger, and the gun fired, its sound loud and echoing.

Cate's heart skipped a beat as she stared helplessly at the bullet emerging from the chamber.

She sucked in a breath, bracing herself for the impact, the pain. But it never came.

Instead, Dominique slammed into her, knocking them both to the floor. They skidded to a halt a few feet away from where Cate had been standing.

A gurgling noise sounded behind her, and Gianna's eyes went wide.

"No!" She dropped the gun and raced forward, her gaze flitting around the room in search of something.

She grabbed a pillow and pressed it against a quickly forming blood split on Armand's belly. "No, no, no."

"Oops," Dominique said with a chuckle. "Looks like I didn't have to kill old Armand. You did that for me. There goes The Agency."

"No!" Gianna shouted as Armand's head lolled forward, his chin touching his chest as he expired.

Gianna straightened, tossing the pillow to the side, her hands bloody from her desperate attempt to save the man. "No," she said, her voice shaky. “No, we don’t need Armand. I can be Armand. I will form The Agency with Lord Laudlam.”

Gianna took a step toward the door. For the first time ever, Cate spotted fear flashing in the woman’s eyes.

Dominique stopped her from moving, firing a fireball at her. “I don’t think so. Laudlam is perfectly fine as he is. He has no interest in magic whatsoever. Let’s keep it that way, shall we?”

“No, he only needs to be—”

Another fireball smacked her square in the chest, stopping her from speaking as she doubled over in pain.

“Hey, Cate, mind waiting for me while I deal with this...person? I won’t be long. Oh, why don’t you find Jack while I do my work?” Dominique cracked her knuckles as she moved forward toward Gianna.

“No,” Gianna said, holding a hand up in front of her to stop Dominique from approaching. “No!”

Dominique offered her an evil grin. “Yeah. And you’re not going to like where you’re going very much at all.”

Dominique clamped a hand around Gianna’s wrist and disappeared from Cate’s sight.

Cate stared at the spot where they’d been before her eyes shifted to the dead man across the room. Killed by Gianna’s own hand, she had been both the reason The Agency thrived in Cate’s time, and its destruction.

She stood frozen for another moment before her senses returned. She needed to find Jack—and get away from the dead body.

With a rapid pulse, she lifted her skirts and hurried to the door, peering into the hallway. It was deserted, so she let herself out, closing the door behind her before she snaked through the halls in search of a way toward the underground cells.

She crept down a set of backstairs, passing a few servants who paid no attention to her before she began her search of the main level, careful to stay away from the party that continued inside of the ballroom.

The last thing she needed was another talk with the King or anyone else from his court. She needed to find Jack and get out of here to make certain things in the future were the way they should be.

Her stomach twisted into a tight knot as she worried about the ripples that would stretch from this murder.

Would this really be over?

As her mind spun, she rounded a corner without checking the hall. Her heart skipped a beat as she ran straight into King Louis.

She swallowed hard, her eyes widening as he arched an eyebrow at her. “Going somewhere, Catherine?”

CHAPTER 26

Cate's lips parted as her chest constricted. The last thing she needed was to be sidetracked by the King, and likely returned to the bedroom to be locked in again.

"Yes, I was...coming to find you," she lied.

His lips curled at the corners. "So very eager...how inviting."

"Actually," Cate said with a shake of her head, "I came to tell you that I do not wish to stay."

His eyebrows hiked high on his head.

"I am returning home at once."

"I'm afraid I could not allow that to happen. Sending a woman into the night alone is not something I am comfortable with. I would suggest you return to your bedroom and rethink your plan."

Cate bit into her lower lip as she struggled to hold her temper. After the night she'd had, she didn't want anything else standing in her way of returning home to determine whether or not things had truly been fixed.

"I'm afraid I cannot—"

The king grabbed hold of her arm, pressing her against the wall as he pushed closer. "I do not think you understand, my dear."

She tried to yank her arm free, but he kept a firm hold on it. "I understand perfectly. You think everything is yours for the taking, but that is not true. I am not."

He frowned at her, his nostrils flaring. "You may think differently about that once your husband is disposed of. I can offer you everything."

He leaned closer, the alcohol on his breath turning her stomach as he pressed his body against hers. She struggled to free herself, but she couldn't.

His hand traveled down her waist toward her skirt.

She squeezed her eyes closed as his lips pressed against her neck.

A second later, the weight of his body lifted.

She snapped her eyes open to see him flying backward, an expression of utter shock on his features before he smacked into the wall and slid down it, landing in a crumpled heap at the bottom.

Cate's jaw unhinged as she stared at him. What had happened?

She glanced down the hall, finding Dominique striding toward her. "Seriously? I'm gone for like two minutes, and you're making eyes at the king again?"

"I wasn't. I was trying to find my way to the dungeon when he appeared and practically assaulted me."

Dominique rolled her eyes as she met Cate. "Yeah, right, sure. I'm telling Marcus when we get back."

Cate clicked her tongue, shaking her head. "Let's just find Jack."

"I'm not the one dragging my feet while I play footsie with King Louis. And he's not even a good kisser. I know from experience."

"Are you serious?" Cate asked as Dominique grabbed hold of her arm and dragged her down the hall.

"Yeah, we had a thing. It didn't last long. Like I said, he's really not that great. Come on, the dungeon is this way. I know that from experience, too."

Cate's eyebrows raised as she stared at Dominique while they marched along.

Dominique slid her gaze sideways and shrugged. "What?"

"Nothing," Cate said with a shake of her head. "I just...hey, where did you take Gianna?"

"Don't ask," Dominique answered as they found a stone set of stairs leading down.

Cate froze, refusing to move as she tugged against Dominique. "I'm serious. Where did you take her? I want to know if there's any chance that she's going to pop back into our lives to ruin them."

"No chance." Dominique lifted the ring Gianna had worn before. "I took this, and I'll destroy it later. And then I delivered Gianna to a nice place. She's kicking it with my good buddy Bazios right now. She won't be back."

Cate arched an eyebrow as she recalled the snake-like Hellbeast who had once owned Marcus's soul. "Like...the snake guy?"

"One and the same. He'll eat her for lunch. She's never getting out of that situation."

"Gianna can be pretty persuasive," Cate said, a sinking feeling forming in the pit of her stomach.

"Nah. Bazios doesn't like fakers. He only likes the real deal. Witches, warlocks, that sort of thing. Not people who play with magical objects like children. Trust me, Cate, she's not getting out of Hell. Now, can we please go get Jack?"

Cate swallowed hard as she nodded, and they started down the stairs. "What do we have to do to destroy the ring?"

"Take it to Mordor and throw it in the lava," Dominique answered. "It's an arduous journey, but I know a few people who can help out."

Cate slowed her steps, staring at Dominique for a moment. "You're joking, right?"

"Yes, Cate," Dominique answered, her tone exasperated. "Are you really that thick?"

"Sometimes, I can't tell between you and Marcus when you're being serious and when you're joking. You're both so deadpan about it. And also, I'm not sure what's real and what isn't in magic."

"Mordor is not a real place. Just in case you were wondering. And sadly, Legolas is very much not real." Dominique sighed as they reached the bottom of the stairs, finding two guards manning the dungeon entrance.

"Party's upstairs," one of them said gruffly. "This place is off limits."

"We won't be long. We just need to pick up a friend," Dominique said.

The guard rose. "I said you can't come in here."

"And I said we needed to pick up a friend." She lifted her arms in the air, and both guards floated upward, their feet leaving the ground.

Their eyes went wide until she shifted her arms to come together, smashing the two guards against each other. They both passed out as their heads smacked into one another, and she let them drop to the floor in a heap.

She casually stepped over their crumpled bodies, glancing over her shoulder at a stunned Cate. "Are you coming?"

Cate hurried after her, hiking her skirt as she climbed over the unconscious guards. Dampness surrounded her, sending a chill down her spine as she entered the dungeon. Unkempt-looking men with gaunt faces peered back at them as they hurried past the cells.

Dominique shifted her gaze back and forth until she finally stopped. Cate's heart skipped a beat as she spotted Jack.

She raced to the bars, wrapping her fingers around them. "Jack!"

"Cate. Thank goodness you're okay. He didn't hurt you, did he?"

"No," she said as she shifted aside to allow Dominique to use her magic to open the cell.

Jack raced out and pulled Cate into a bear hug. "I'm so glad you're okay. Now, we need to find—"

"No," Cate interrupted. "It's done. It's over."

The words, so simple, but so profound, marked the end of an era.

Jack screwed up his face, his eyes silently questioning her. "Over?"

"Gianna accidentally killed one of the founders of The Agency. And then Dominique took her to...well, not a very nice place, but a place she won't get out of. It's over, Jack. It's finally over."

Jack shifted his gaze to Dominique before he focused on Cate again. "You're sure?"

She shrugged. "There's only one way to find out."

He nodded. "We need to go back to our time and make sure everything is okay."

She bobbed her head. "Yes."

They both shifted their gaze to Dominique who stretched her arms to the sides, her features annoyed. "I've been waiting to leave, but you two had to have your moment there."

Jack rolled his eyes at her. "Just open the portal."

Dominique clicked her tongue, indicating her displeasure before she raised her arms. Wind swirled around them before the black portal opened.

Cate entered first, walking through the blackness until she squinted against bright sunshine. As her eyes adjusted, she stared at Dunhaven Castle in the distance.

Her stomach somersaulted. What would she find once she arrived there?

Jack emerged from the portal a moment later, followed by Dominique.

“Ready?” Jack asked after a glance at the castle.

“As I’ll ever be,” Cate answered.

Jack offered his arm, and she slid her hand around the crook of his elbow. Every step they took toward Dunhaven Castle made her muscles tenser. Would The Agency truly be gone? What would this new world look like?

They entered through a side door, slinking through the halls to their respective rooms to change clothes before they sought out anyone else.

As Cate slipped into her normal clothes, a knock sounded at the door.

“Coming!” she called as she zipped up her riding boot.

She hurried across the room, tugging open the door. Her heart stopped as she stared at the person on the other side.

Her eyebrows pinched, her mouth hanging open as she tried to form words. “Hi,” was all she could manage to get out.

The other woman smiled warmly at her. “Hello, Cate,” she said.

“Umm, hello,” Cate answered as she stared at the future version of herself. “I’d ask you to come in, but technically, this is your room.”

Future Cate grinned at her as she stepped inside and eased the door closed. “It’s yours, too. I’ve been expecting you.”

“You have?”

Future Cate nodded. “Yes, I have. I know you’d be back from your trip to rid us of The Agency around now. I remember it all too well.”

“So, we did it?” Cate asked, her heart beating hard as she waited for the answer.

Future Cate smiled at her. “Yes, you did. It’s over. The Agency never formed. Everything is as it should be. Dunhaven Castle is safe, the children are safe.”

Cate stood frozen for a moment before she collapsed onto the chaise, a hand pressed to her belly. “Then it really is over.”

Future Cate eased onto the chaise with her, rubbing her back. “Yes, it is. You did excellent work.”

Another knock sounded at the door, and both Cates shouted for the person to come in.

“Sorry,” Cate said with a wince as Marcus slipped inside the room.

“Have you told her?”

Future Cate smiled at him and nodded. “I just did.”

She rose, and he wrapped his arm around her, kissing her cheek. “It is finally over, Catherine.”

“I can’t believe it,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “I just...can’t believe it’s finally over.”

She glanced up at her future self with her husband. “Can I see the kids?”

“Of course,” Future Cate said with a smile.

“I don’t have to talk to them, I just want to see that they’re okay.”

“You can do whatever you’d like, Cate,” Future Cate said with a smile. “But if you just want to observe, they’re outside playing croquet on the back lawn.”

“I’ll just...take a peek. I just need to see it for myself so this can all sink in.”

Future Cate nodded as she offered Cate her hand. Cate rose, her stomach still fluttering from the excitement.

Hand-in-hand with her future self, she threaded through the halls of Dunhaven Castle to the windows overlooking the back lawn.

Five children laughed and chattered as they played the game. Cate smiled down at them. “They look so happy.”

“They are,” Future Cate said as she stroked Cate’s hair. “And so are you.”

Cate smiled at her as Jack approached, back in his normal attire.

“Well, it seems to have worked,” he answered.

“Of course, it worked,” Dominique said. “Did you doubt me?”

Marcus heaved a sigh at her. “Why did you allow her to stay?”

“Stop,” Future Cate said with a soft smile at him.

“Really, Marc,” Dominique said as she clapped him on the shoulder. “You’re indebted to me. “I’m going to hang out here for a while because of that. Just to really get on your nerves.”

Marcus slid his eyes closed, shaking his head.

Cate let her gaze slide from her future self to Jack. “Well, I guess it’s finally over. I can go home.”

“Yes, you can,” Marcus answered with a nod. “Are you ready?”

Tears formed in her eyes as she glanced at Jack. “Yes, I think so.”

“We’ll see each other soon, Cate. And I’ll be younger, so it’ll be even better. And I can’t wait to solve all those mysteries with you.”

She nodded before she flicked her gaze to Dominique. “Thank you for your help.”

The woman shrugged, refusing to meet her gaze. “No big deal. I really couldn’t stand Gianna, so I would have done it anyway.”

Cate chuckled a little at her response before she turned to her future self.

“Goodbye, Cate. I can’t wait for you to discover everything that’s yet to come.”

Cate squeezed her future self’s hand before she turned to Marcus. “I’m ready.”

“Then, let’s get you back to your life, shall we?”

She nodded as he flicked his gaze to her future self. She smiled at him. “Just this once, you can open the time portal in the house.”

Cate laughed as he spread his arms out in front of him. The winds swirled, and the portal yawned in front of her. With a deep breath, she stepped toward it, toward an unknown future, but a more stable past.

She stepped toward her destiny.

CHAPTER 27

The image of Dunhaven Castle filled in as the portal faded away behind her, snapping shut with a finality that made her heart skip a beat.

She twisted to face the structure, her mind racing as she studied it.

What would she find when she went inside? Would she find the quiet castle she'd experienced when she'd first seen it?

The moment echoed in her mind. The corners of her lips turned up as she recalled stepping from the back of William Smythe's rental car with Riley in her arms. She'd felt an overwhelming sense of home when she'd first seen the gray bricks that made up the facade, and she still did. But the secrets that castle had kept had been beyond what she'd ever imagined possible.

And the other discoveries they'd made had been even more mind-boggling.

She glanced down at her wedding ring, her thumb rubbing it as she started up the hill to the sprawling structure.

As Cate approached the familiar gray facade of Dunhaven Castle, a surge of emotions welled up inside her. Each stone seemed to whisper a welcome, every window flickered with the warm glow of home. The castle had stood as a silent sentinel during her tumultuous journey, and now, it embraced her return, enveloping her in a blanket of security she hadn't realized she'd missed so desperately.

She pushed inside through the front door, finding the castle quiet.

Cate hesitated at the threshold, her heart pounding with a mix of anticipation and fear. What if her actions hadn't changed anything? What if the shadows of The Agency still lingered? She took a deep breath, steadying herself before stepping inside, her eyes scanning for any sign of discord.

Her eyebrow arched as she peered into the living room, then down the hall toward the library. Where was everyone?

With her hands shoved in her pockets, she took a step toward the library when Anna appeared at the top of the staircase. Cate slid her eyes closed as relief washed over her.

"Catherine," she said with a broad smile, "you're back."

"I am," Cate said, her voice trembling with trepidation.

Anna descended the stairs toward Cate, drawing her into a warm embrace as she reached the foyer. "Damien is fine, as is everyone else. And...how did you find the future?"

Anna arched an eyebrow as she pulled back to glance at Cate.

"Illuminating," Cate answered.

Anna offered her a tight-lipped smile. "And do you understand now?"

Cate nodded. "I do."

"All of it? Even the reason I kept it from you?"

Cate squeezed her hand. "I assume it was because I wouldn't have believed it without seeing it for myself. Even then, I was a little stunned."

Anna shifted a lock of Cate's hair over her shoulder as she chuckled. "Yes, that's quite right. Had I simply told you Laura was your daughter, you would have had questions. Questions that I could have answered, but you would have staunchly rejected those answers."

"I almost did that anyway," Cate said with a laugh as Anna guided her down the hall toward the library. "Three kids later, I still didn't think Marcus loved me."

"Oh, darling, how could you believe anything else? It's quite obvious how very enamored with you he is. I could see it the moment I saw you both together."

"But you knew our marriage was fake."

"You can lead a horse to water, Catherine, but you cannot make it drink. You two thought your marriage was fake. I knew the truth all along. You needed to come to it on your own...with a little encouragement." She grinned.

Cate pressed her lips together as she nodded, the corners of her mouth curling. “I appreciate that encouragement, Anna. And all of the help you’ve given me so far—and in the future.”

“That is what mother-in-laws are for, darling.”

Cate pulled the woman into a tight hug as Marcus appeared in the doorway. She smiled at him as she pulled back from the embrace.

Anna kissed her on the cheek. “I will leave you two to talk.”

“Thanks,” Cate said with a squeeze of the woman’s hand.

Marcus kissed his mother’s cheek as she passed him in the doorway.

“We’ll talk soon, darling,” she said.

He stepped inside the room and closed the doors behind him.

Cate studied him as she sucked in a deep breath. “So, do you know what your future self knows or not.”

“I do. I know that we have three beautiful children, and that I happen to be married to quite the heroine.” He narrowed his eyes at her. “And I am fairly certain that the lady in question loves me.”

A smile spread across her face. “She does. And she had no idea how you felt until you told her.”

He clicked his tongue. “Oh, Catherine, how could you not have known how much I loved you?”

“You kind of play things close to the vest,” she said with a slight shrug of her shoulder.

“As do you. You gave me divorce papers,” he answered.

“Yeah, sorry,” she said as he pulled her closer to him. “I thought you wanted out and were just being polite.”

“There is nothing I want less.” He slid a lock of hair behind her ear before he pulled her into a kiss.

She savored the moment, just as she had in the future with the memory that could always comfort her. When they parted, she flicked her gaze up to him. “So, everything here is fine, right? No Agency? No one trying to steal Dunhaven Castle?”

“Not a single disturbance. Life may become downright boring, Catherine.”

“Somehow with you around, I doubt it. Besides, Future Jack told me we solved a lot of things, so it looks like I still have a very interesting life to lead.”

“With your visions, I would say yes. You have a talent. And I’m certain you will use it to help others.”

She smiled at him. “I will.”

He kissed her forehead as a knock sounded at the door before it burst open. Molly, pink in the cheeks and grinning from ear to ear, flitted into the room, tugging Jack along with her.

“Oh, oops, sorry to interrupt.”

“You didn’t,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “We have a lifetime to spend together.”

She slid her hand into Marcus’s and squeezed it as she stared expectantly at Molly. “And it looks like you have something you’d like to share.”

Molly raised her left hand, a sparkling diamond on her ring finger. “I do. We’re engaged!”

“Aww, Molly,” Cate said as she crossed to her friend and pulled her into a hug. “I’m so happy for you.”

She pulled back and shifted to Jack. “And you.”

“Thanks, honey,” Molly said as Marcus offered her his best wishes. “I had to tell you first. None of this would have happened if it hadn’t been for you offering me a new life here. I can never thank you enough for that.”

“There’s no need to thank me, Molly. I’m just glad you found happiness here, just like I did.”

Marcus wrapped his arm around her and pulled her closer. Cate smiled at him before she shifted her gaze to Molly. “Well, it looks like we’ll be busy in the next few months.”

“We will be?” Molly questioned.

Cate bobbed her head. “Uh-huh. We have to plan. We’ll be having a wedding at Dunhaven Castle.”

* * *

THE END

WEDDING AT DUNHAVEN CASTLE

A CATE KENSIE MYSTERY

CHAPTER 1

Cate ducked past the waving arm of Mrs. Campbell as she directed the workers who delivered the wedding arch to be set up outside of the ballroom in the castle's back garden. The late afternoon sun cast long shadows as they worked.

"Oh, Lady Ca—" Mrs. Campbell winced and shook her head. "I am so sorry, it's going to take a bit of getting used to remembering to call you Your Grace."

"Really, Mrs. Campbell, I don't need any titles."

Mrs. Campbell's eyes went wide as she stared at Cate as though she'd asked her to cut her arm off. "But, Your Grace—"

"I know, I know," Cate said with a chuckle as she held her hand up. "It's not proper."

"I quite agree with that," Mrs. Fraser answered as she wrapped a sweater around her shoulders and stepped from the ballroom. "Your Grace is the appropriate term. And you don't hear Miss Andrea calling you anything different. She knows having come from His Grace's household."

Cate offered them both a warm smile. "And she also has been told that I am not partial to titles. I never have been."

"His Grace feels differently," Mrs. Fraser said with a lift of her chin.

"His Grace is not me," Cate said, shaking her head. "But anyway, I'm not here to debate the proper form of address with either of you. I just wanted to check on the preparations. I know Molly wants an update, but she's trying so hard not to ask."

“Why not snap a few pictures for her,” Mrs. Fraser suggested. “Oh, that wedding arch is just lovely, Isla.”

Mrs. Campbell lifted her chin, raising her eyebrows in triumph. “Thank you. I’ve outdone myself, if I do say so. I’ve had this in mind for just such an occasion...although, I must admit...”

Mrs. Campbell hesitated, a nervous chuckle escaping her. “I always thought the wedding we hosted at Dunhaven Castle would be Her Grace’s. Your marriage came as quite a surprise, though.”

Cate smiled at her as the same thought went through her own mind. Her marriage to Marcus had been nothing but surprises. “Well, we are not the most traditional couple. But I think it’s lovely that Molly’s getting married here. She loves it so much, and so does Jack.”

“Yes, but...the housekeeper and estate manager just aren’t quite the same as the mistress of the castle herself. Perhaps one day you and His Grace would consider renewing your vows in a large ceremony?” Mrs. Campbell raised her eyebrows in anticipation of another party to plan.

“If we do, you will be the first call I make.”

Mrs. Campbell opened her mouth to object, but it snapped shut as Mrs. Fraser’s eyebrows raised. She jabbed a finger toward the arch. “Isla, you’d better get over there. That arch does not look centered with the aisle.”

Mrs. Campbell gasped, her eyes going wide. With her clipboard clutched tightly to her chest, she hurried down the aisle created by the tulle-decorated chairs, waving a hand in the air. “No, no, no! You’ve got it wrong!”

“That took care of that,” Mrs. Fraser said to Cate with a smile.

“Thank you for the save, Mrs. Fraser. And how are things going on your end for the wedding preparations?”

“Excellent. The cake that Miss Molly and young Jack will cut for their pictures will be picture-perfect.”

Cate patted Mrs. Fraser’s arm. “It was so nice of you to bake her cake.”

“Miss Molly means quite a bit to me. It’s my pleasure. It was also my pleasure to get rid of that uncouth woman trying to push you and His Grace into a public ceremony.”

Cate chuckled at her. “Thank you again, although I’m certain I could have handled declining. Public ceremonies are not really my thing.”

Mrs. Fraser offered her a knowing smile. “And I have everything all ready for Molly’s uncle. I was surprised when she told me he was the only one staying at the castle.”

Cate wrapped her arms around her midriff as she watched Mrs. Campbell directing the men to move the arch mere inches to the left without disturbing the flowers woven through the rungs. “I don’t think she gets along well with her sister.”

“Still, you’d think she’d want her to see her new home. Speaking of, Your Grace, it was terribly kind of you to offer them the East Wing.”

“Well,” Cate said with a shrug, “Molly and Jack will need more space than Molly’s room can provide, and it’ll be nice to have Jack on hand for all those leaky pipes and other problems.”

“Of which there are many,” Mrs. Fraser said with a chortle. “Young Jack may prefer his cottage to castle living.”

“I wouldn’t be surprised,” Cate answered. “Anyway, just Roger will be here for the weekend, so it should be an easy party to manage. Molly said he’s not picky.”

“I’ve already learned all of his favorite dishes from her so I could prepare something welcoming. And I’ve got his bedroom made up. It will also be nice to have Ms. Pearson and Mr. Smythe back in the castle again.”

Cate bobbed her head. “Yes. I’m looking forward to their arrival, too.”

She glanced at her watch before she clapped her hands, calling the dogs back to the castle. “Speaking of, I’d better go wait for them. Roger should be arriving at any minute.”

“Aye,” Mrs. Fraser said with a nod. “I will go prepare the snack plate for his arrival. Mr. Smythe and Ms. Pearson won’t be here until later, but don’t worry, I’ve got a snack plate for them, too.”

Cate squeezed Mrs. Fraser’s arm. “I can always count on you, Mrs. Fraser.”

She stepped into the ballroom, her eyes adjusting to the dimmer light. As she took a step to cross it, Molly burst into the room.

“Is there a problem with the arch?” she asked, her eyes wide.

“No,” Cate said with a wince. “No problem. Mrs. Fraser was just trying to distract Mrs. Campbell with something so she’d stop asking if she could plan my second wedding to Marcus.”

Molly’s eyebrows raised before a giggle escaped her. “Are you serious?”

“Yes,” Cate said with a curt nod. “Apparently, Mrs. Campbell always dreamed of planning a wedding for the mistress of Dunhaven Castle. She’s like a dog with a bone about these things, and I am positive I do not want to remarry Marcus in front of a crowd of people.”.

Molly tilted her head. “Are you sure? You two seem like you’re still smitten with each other.”

“We are,” Cate said, color rising into her cheeks. “But I don’t need to tell all of Dunhaven that.”

“Aww, I certainly understand wanting to keep things private. Although, I don’t want to. I can’t wait to marry Jack in front of everyone in Dunhaven and my family, too.”

“Speaking of, are you sure you don’t want more of them to stay with us? It’s perfectly fine, Molly. They’re welcome here.”

Molly lifted her chin, shaking her head. “No. My sister and her family are perfectly fine stuck in that town’s sole bed and breakfast. She is not staying here. When I was getting divorced, she wouldn’t help me out at all. No castle for her.”

“As long as you’re sure,” Cate said with a chuckle.

“I am,” Molly said before her shoulders slumped and her nose wrinkled. “You think I’m being way too mean, don’t you? You’re so nice, Cate. You’d never do this.”

“Ohhh, I might,” Cate said. “I’m nice up until a certain point. Then the gloves come off. And anyway, it’s your decision. If only Uncle Roger is invited, then that’s who gets to stay here.”

Molly slid her arm through the crook of Cate’s as they made their way toward the foyer. “Uncle Roger is so nice. You’ll like him. I can’t wait for him to get here. He’s just going to love staying in a Scottish castle, even if it isn’t from our clan.”

“That’s right,” Cate said with a nod. “You’re Campbells too. I wonder if—”

“Don’t say it,” Molly warned with a wag of her finger. “We are not related to Mrs. Campbell. She’s from another branch.”

Cate pressed her lips together to suppress a laugh as they snaked their way to the front of the house.

“Why don’t you wait in the library? I’ll bring Uncle Roger down once he arrives.”

“Okay,” Cate said with a nod.

She left Molly behind, patting her thigh to call the dogs with her. They trotted down the hall after her to the library. As she pushed inside, both of them ran for their usual spots near the fireplace where Jack poked at the wood already burning.

“Figured I’d make it cozy in here for Uncle Roger’s arrival,” Jack said as he rose, dusting his hands.

“And it adds to the ambiance,” Cate said with a grin.

“That, too. I’m so glad we finally have a warm ambiance in this place instead of The Agency hanging over our heads.”

“And a wedding to celebrate.” Cate slid into the leather armchair with a satisfied sigh.

“Aye, that too.” Jack checked his watch as he shifted his weight from foot to foot. “I suppose Uncle Roger will be here any minute. I should get out there and wait with Molly before I don’t have a fiancée left.”

Cate tittered at the comment as Jack strode to the door. Left alone, she heaved a sigh, staring into the flames that danced inside the fireplace. So much had changed since she’d first arrived at Dunhaven Castle. While much of it had been difficult, most had ultimately been for the better.

She had two dogs now instead of one, she had a husband, and Molly and Jack had found each other.

Cate leaned her head back against the plush pillow and let her eyes slide closed.

A second later she startled awake as someone whispered in her ear. “You look rather comfortable, dear.”

She pressed a hand against her heart, beating hard from the surprise. “Will you stop sneaking up on me like that?”

Marcus smirked at her as he strode across the room to pour a brandy. “Stop napping in the library.”

“I wasn’t napping,” she answered, rising and crossing over to him. “I wasn’t napping just relaxing.”

“Are you certain you do not wish to be whisked away to Rosenberg Palace whilst the wedding plays out?”

“Yes, I’m certain. Jack and Molly are my best friends. I want to be here for them.”

Marcus arched an eyebrow at her.

“Oh, you may want to avoid Mrs. Campbell. She’s on the prowl trying to get us to renew our vows in a massive ceremony.”

“That woman is really intolerable,” Marcus answered.

“I know. I’ve told her no several times, but you know Mrs. Campbell.”

"I'd prefer I didn't. Are you certain—"

"Yes, you have to come, too. You can't skip out on this wedding."

He heaved a sigh as he stared into his brandy. "Fine."

Cate cocked her head at him, and he kissed her cheek.

"Anything for you, dear."

"Thank you," she answered as Molly's excited voice carried down the hall.

"...and wait until you see the library, Uncle Roger. You're going to love it here."

"I probably won't want to go home," a man's voice answered before the doors burst open.

Molly stood with her arm threaded through an older man's. He glanced around before his eyes settled on Cate.

"And this is Her Grace, Duchess of—"

"Never mind that," Cate said with a wave of her hand in the air. "I'm Cate. You must be Roger."

She crossed to him and thrust her hand out to shake his.

"Yes, I am. And also, very pleased to be invited to stay in your lovely castle."

"Well, we hope you feel as much at home here as we do, so please treat it like your own house." Cate grinned at him before she motioned toward Marcus. "This is my husband, Marcus."

"Duke of Stratfordshire, in case you are so inclined to use the proper title," Marcus said to the man.

"Right, Marcus," Roger said with a smile, and Cate stifled the chuckle at the frown on her husband's features.

"Well, please come in, and sit down. If I know Mrs. Fraser—" Cate began just as the woman entered the room.

"I've got a snack for you, Mr. Campbell," Mrs. Fraser said as she flitted into the room with a tray of meat, cheese, and crackers. "Traveling will leave you famished."

"Aw, thank you so much. You must be Mrs. Fraser. Molly's told me so much about you."

"Aye," Mrs. Fraser said with a nod. "I've heard nothing but wonderful things about you, too."

Everyone settled into seats, except Marcus who remained standing with his brandy.

“So, Uncle Roger, did you bring it?” Molly asked as she loaded a cracker with a piece of beef log and a slice of cheddar cheese.

He chuckled as he sipped at the brandy Jack offered him. “I did, I did.”

He raised a finger in the air as he dug into his pocket. “I carried it on me. I didn’t want the airline to lose it.”

Roger pulled a velvet bag from inside his pocket and worked to loosen the drawstring. Molly inched forward, an eager smile on her face.

As he dumped the contents into his palm, an icy wind whipped through the room.

The fire in the fireplace extinguished, the lights went out, and a dark cloud blotted the sun from the sky. Thunder rumbled in the distance, and the delicate scent of lilac floated in the air.

Roger gasped as the doors to the library blew shut, pointing a shaky finger toward them. “A ghost!”

CHAPTER 2

Cate's heart skipped a beat as she twisted to follow the direction of Roger's trembling finger. Had he seen a time-traveler? The castle's reputation for being haunted was a well-known, but the ghosts weren't actually spirits trapped. They were time travelers who popped in at unexpected moments. But Cate had never seen one randomly appear in the library before.

The room's shadows deepened as the storm outside thrashed against the windows, the flickering of lightning casting eerie, dancing silhouettes that transformed the mundane into specters. In the dim, uncertain light, the line between reality and apparition blurred.

As Cate turned, her eyes locked on a ghostly figure, translucent and shimmering against the dark wood of the library. The apparition, dressed in an ethereal gown that fluttered like mist, slowly faded until only the echo of its presence lingered.

A cold shiver raced down Cate's spine, her breath catching as she stared at the empty air where the ghostly figure had stood. Her heart pounded in her ears, a mix of fear and fascination rooting her to the spot.

As she rose from her seat to investigate, the lights flickered then hummed back to life. She shared a glance with Jack, who furrowed his brow, offering her a silent confirmation that he had seen it too.

Molly grabbed hold of her uncle's hand. "Uncle Roger, this might sound odd, but I'm not exactly shocked. I glimpsed something... or someone... in that hallway once. A woman in old-fashioned clothing. I haven't seen her since, but I'm still not convinced that this place isn't haunted."

"I'm not sure that's true," Cate said with a nervous chuckle as she eased back into the chair, trying to play it off as nothing. "What exactly did you see?"

"A woman," Roger said with a nod. "In old-fashioned clothing. Red hair, pale skin. She reminded me of Molly."

Molly tugged her chin back to her chest. "Oh, that's not what I saw. The woman I saw didn't have red hair. Maybe there are two ghosts."

Roger's forehead creased as he stared at Cate. "Did you catch sight of her?"

"I didn't, I'm afraid," Cate said with a smile that she hoped conveyed confidence.

Roger glanced around the room at the others. "No one? Jack? Marcus?"

"I saw nothing," Marcus answered. "And I am very sorry to depart from this...interesting gathering, but there is something I need to attend to. Catherine, may I have a word before I go?"

"Of course," Cate said as she rose. "Excuse me for just a minute, then we'll get to the bottom of this, I promise."

With a smile plastered on her features, she followed Marcus from the room into the hall. "Where are you going? You can't skip this wedding, you know."

"I will be here for all the events, Catherine. I don't mind Molly. She is a lovely addition to the staff. Her husband of choice is questionable, but still..."

Cate pressed her lips together in a silent warning.

"I will be here," he promised. "However, I do think you may wish to look into the uncle's claim. He may not just be seeing things."

Cate lowered her voice, her eyes going wide. "You think there was a ghost?"

"I think he saw something. And the mysterious power outage seems to be connected to it."

"Can't you...banish it or something?" she asked with a shrug.

"I am afraid it is not that simple. I will do some digging on my end, but more details from the man would be useful." After kissing her cheek, he stepped past her down the hall.

"Are you seriously leaving?"

“I can’t very well go back inside after I said I had business to attend to. I will visit with Mother. Let me know what the man says.”

Cate let her shoulders slump as he strode away, hesitating a moment before she slipped back into the library. “I’m sorry about that. Now, you were saying you saw a red-haired woman?”

“Yes. Resembled Molly,” Roger answered.

“Hmm, I’m not sure if any of my ancestors had red hair,” Cate answered, “but I’ll certainly look into it.”

The room fell into silence for a moment before Molly rubbed her uncle’s arm. “Well, anyway, let’s not let some ghosts spoil our fun. You said you brought the ring, right?”

Roger nodded as he produced the velvet bag again. “I did, yes.”

He slid a sapphire ring from inside, displaying it in the palm of his hand. Molly’s jaw dropped open as she grabbed it and held it up. The gemstone in the middle sparkled in the light.

As Molly studied it, another icy gust rushed past Cate. She twisted instinctively to glance at the spot Roger had pointed at before but found nothing.

“Oh, it’s even more beautiful in person. Thank you, Uncle Roger.”

“Of course,” he said with a smile. “As soon as I heard you were getting married here, I knew you had to have it. The ring is a family heirloom.”

“Oh, how nice. Has it been passed down through generations to new brides?”

Roger bobbed his head. “Yes, and the legend is, if the new bride doesn’t wear it on her wedding day, she’ll be cursed.”

“Cursed?” Cate exclaimed. “Are you joking?”

“I’m not.” Roger shook his head.

“I didn’t wear it when I married Tom,” Molly said with a wince. “And look what happened.”

“Molly,” Cate chided gently, “you can’t blame that on a curse. That was Tom’s fault.”

“Well,” Molly said, sliding the ring onto her right-hand ring finger, “I’m not taking any chances with this one.”

Cate squeezed Molly’s hand. “It’s really beautiful. So, how did this curse come about?”

“One of our ancestors, Eliza Campbell, was set to wed her beau,” Roger pointed at the ring on Molly’s finger. “That was her engagement ring. She never married the man, and it's said she cursed all the women in the family. The only way to break it is to pay her homage by wearing her engagement ring."

"Why did she never marry?" Cate asked.

"No one knows." Roger shrugged. "She disappeared, leaving the ring and a note behind. There are all sorts of rumors about what happened—that she ran off with another man, she was jilted, she caught her fiancé cheating, but no one knows what truly happened to Eliza Campbell."

Cate flicked her eyebrows up as he finished the story. "Well, I certainly hope the ring brings you luck, Molly. You deserve it. But then again... marrying this guy, you never know."

Laughter erupted from the group before conversation turned to wedding plans. With Cate promising a tour of the castle before dinner, Roger and Molly excused themselves to get him settled in his room.

As the doors swung shut behind them, Cate twisted to face Jack. "So, did you catch sight of the ghost?"

Jack shook his head, his features pinching. "No, not really. But I felt a coldness. I wonder if someone was time traveling nearby."

"That's not what Marcus thinks," Cate said, her features turning pensive.

"Really?" Jack slouched in the leather chair. "The old warlock believes in ghosts?"

"Apparently," Cate said. "He asked that we find out more from Roger and look into this."

"Did he see something?"

"He says he didn't," Cate answered with a shrug, "but he thought we should look into it."

Jack screwed up his face. "Seriously? I feel like this can be chalked up to the time travel stuff."

"I'm not so sure about that. We've never had a time-traveler in this area. Just the one Molly saw in the hall, but never in the library. And coupled with the power outage, I'm starting to wonder if there may not be something more to this."

"So, you think there may actually be a ghost?"

Cate wrinkled her nose as she shot him a questioning glance. "Well, there is time travel, witches, warlocks, vampires...why not ghosts?"

Jack let his head fall back against the cushion behind him with a deep sigh. “Ugh. Just what I need. Another supernatural creature roaming about. Well, what did the old man say to do about it?”

“Investigate,” Cate said. “He says he can’t magic it away, so I guess we need to look into this presence.”

“If there is a presence,” Jack said as he rose from his seat with a heavy sigh.

“Oh,” Cate exclaimed, her eyes falling to the table in front of her, “Molly left her ring. I should return it to—”

As she picked up the sapphire gemstone ring, the lights flickered again before going off. With the sun now below the horizon, they were plunged into darkness.

“Jack?” Cate called as an icy breeze swept past her. Her breath started to cloud in front of her as the room turned cold.

She shivered, glance in Jack’s direction.

“Cate?” Jack answered.

She rose and shifted closer to him as the doors blew open. Her eyes snapped to the doorway, going round as she stared at the ethereal presence hovering there.

“Uhhh, Jack, are you seeing what I’m seeing?”

“If you’re seeing a red-haired woman in tartan who looks a tad like Molly, then yes,” he answered.

“Yep. That’s what I’m seeing,” she said, her stomach turning over. “And she seems to be calling to us.”

“I wish she wasn’t,” Jack answered, his voice just above a whisper.

“She wants us to follow her. Come on,” Cate said as she grabbed his hand, pulling him along with her.

She closed her fingers tighter around the ring still in her other palm as they ventured into the dark hallway.

The lights went out one by one as the ghost approached them, floating down the middle of the hall toward an unknown destination.

Cate and Jack followed behind her, winding through the halls as the ghost led them.

They rounded a corner, approaching the west wing. She disappeared through the double doors closing the wing off from the rest of the castle.

Jack fumbled in his pocket for the keys, but when Cate twisted the doorknob, the door swung open. She shared a glance with Jack, shrugging before she continued in, finding the red-haired woman waiting for them.

“Where is she taking us?” Jack asked.

Cate shrugged as they ascended a staircase. She swatted at cobwebs that stretched from ceiling to wall as they crept through the darkened halls until they found the ghost waiting outside of a bedroom door.

After the ghost disappeared through the wooden barrier, Cate pushed inside. The spirit of the woman floated near a corner before she motioned for them to follow and disappeared through a wall.

“Well, that’s the end of the line. We can’t walk through walls,” Jack said with a shake of his head.

“I’m not sure we’ll have to,” Cate answered.

She crossed the room and rubbed a hand against the aging blue wallpaper. A breeze seemed to tickle her skin as she stood in front of the wall. Her eyebrows pinched as her fingers searched for a release to open the way.

Her eyes centered on a silver scone hanging on the wall. With an arched eyebrow, Cate pulled on it. A boom resounded, and the wall fell away, revealing a secret passage.

Cate and Jack shared a glance before returning their gazes to the opening yawning in front of them.

“Well,” Cate said with a shrug of one shoulder, “it looks like we can follow her.”

CHAPTER 3

Cate shivered, the cold clawing at her skin as she peered into the dense, oppressive blackness that seemed to swallow the narrow passage ahead. An icy chill wafted past her, tousling her hair and forcing her arms to wrap around her midriff in an attempt to stay warm.

Jack grimaced as he dug his cell phone from his pocket, toggling on the flashlight. “I was kind of hoping this was a dead end but leave it to Cate Kensie to find a way forward.”

“Sorry,” Cate said with a shrug. “But this is...new, and I wanted to follow up on it.”

“I’ll say. Of all the things that have happened within this castle’s walls over all of the centuries, I never expected a ghost.”

“Jack!” Cate exclaimed with a chuckle as they took their first steps into the passage. “Are you kidding? When I first came here, we didn’t know anything about the time travel. Everyone said the castle was haunted.”

“I know what everyone said. But I never believed any of it. I thought they were all making up stories. Ghosts, warlocks, all nonsense.”

“And then I married one.”

Jack wrinkled his nose as they crept forward, shaking his head at her. “I know. I’m still not okay with it.”

“My sincerest apologies,” she said, “but it turns out...I love him.”

Jack heaved a sigh. “We can’t choose who we love, I suppose. Did you always, though, or did something happen in the future?”

Cate ran her fingers along the unfinished walls, squinting into the darkness ahead in search of the ghost. "I loved him before I went to the future. I just didn't know he felt the same way."

"But he told you that in the future? Or was it just the fact that you were still married. At least, I'm assuming that's what you experienced."

She slowed her steps, twisting to face her friend. "I saw a lot in the future. So many things. But yes, he told me, though it was obvious we'd stayed married because of how we both felt."

Jack slid his gaze to Cate, his eyebrows raising. "I shouldn't ask this, but...Molly and I...are we happy?"

Cate bobbed her head, the corners of her lips curling. "I didn't want to give anything away, but yes. You are both happy."

"Whew," Jack said, wiping at his brow. "That's good. I'm glad to know that. I probably shouldn't know any more than that, but at least I know that."

"It's...a whole new world there, Jack. But I'll do my best not to spoil it for you."

Jack swallowed hard, his features pinching as he stared at Cate. "That just sounds...awful. Why does it sound so bad when you say it like that?"

"It's not. I was just a little...shocked, was all."

Jack's lips parted as he stared at her, his forehead creased. "Ohhhh, Cate. That sounds...terrible."

Cate chuckled, covering her lips as she tried to stop. "It's not. I'm sorry. It's not. I just...I learned a lot about my visions. My assumptions about what was happening were so far off base..."

She shook her head as her expression sobered.

"We never did get to talk about those. I thought it may be crossing the line to ask."

She reached out to squeeze his arm. "No, of course not. I did live through the moment I'd been seeing."

"And was it with your mother? Was she in the future?" Jack asked.

"No," Cate said with a soft smile, recalling meeting her children there. "No, the Laura from my vision wasn't my mother. She was...is...will be my daughter."

Jack's features softened, a slight smile crossing his face. "Oh, Cate... that's...wow. I see what you mean now. That must have been...a surprise, but I hope a pleasant one, meeting your own child that you haven't even had yet."

"Yes. It was quite a surprise to meet all three of them."

"Three?!" Jack exclaimed as they continued down the passage. "Okay, that would have been...mind-blowing. I hope someone broke it to you gently, at least."

"Nope. I went into the library after Marcus tried to warn me and ran straight into my son. I nearly fainted when he called me 'Mother.'"

"I would have fainted dead away if I walked into my son," Jack said.

Cate suppressed another giggle as he recalled meeting Jack's twins. That was a detail she should not let slip.

"Well, we'll make sure you never have to travel to the future. So, sadly, it looks like you'll always be traveling to the past with my uncomfortable clothing."

"Or at the very least, tell me now if I have a son."

Cate drew her chin back to her chest, her eyebrows shooting up. "Really? Do you want me to tell you?"

Jack slowed to a stop, twisting to stare at her. "Wait...you would know, wouldn't you? Molly and I...we're still at Dunhaven. You knew we were happy..."

"I talked to Future Jack. Future Jack and I worked together to get rid of The Agency," Cate answered.

"And Future Jack has to worry about saving for college or Future Jack has boundless money from living a child-free life?"

"Ummm," Cate said, biting into her lower lip. "Future Jack doesn't need to worry about college costs."

Jack huffed out a breath, a slight smile on his lips. "So, we don't have any children. Ah, well, maybe that's for the best."

Cate shook her head. "I didn't say that."

He snapped his gaze to her, his features questioning. "You said—"

"I said you didn't have to worry about tuition. Marcus handled that. Your kids were going to Eton with mine."

Jack staggered back a step, falling into the wall behind him, his features a mask of shock. "Kids? Multiple?"

"Twins," Cate said.

"Ohhhh," Jack answered as he pressed a hand to his forehead. "Twins. That's..."

“They’re lovely children. A boy and a girl,” Cate said. “Molly has them between my oldest and middle child. They all grew up closely.”

Jack peeled himself from the wall, sucking in a sharp breath. “Well, I suppose that’s a good thing. After all the MacKenzies and the Reids need to protect time travel.”

“Yes, they do,” Cate said. “And it looks like our kids will be primed to do that. They’ve grown up friends.”

Jack focused his light further down the passage, and they continued along it. “That’s good. And I suppose I ought to be grateful that your illustrious husband was kind enough to further their educations.”

“You two actually kind of get along in the future,” Cate said with a chuckle.

“Wonders never cease, I suppose,” Jack said as the passage opened into a small room. “What is this place?”

Cate glanced around the space, finding a small writing desk shoved in the corner. A burnt-down candle had melted onto the top of it. She approached it, running her finger over a thick layer of dust that covered the top. “Whatever it is, it looks like it hasn’t been used in a very long time.”

Jack shined his light on the desk. “Or ever. Maybe this was just a storage space.”

“Then why would the ghost have led us here?”

Jack winced, glancing over his shoulder at the passage behind them. “Uh-oh. I hope she didn’t trap us inside here.”

“She seemed like she wanted us to find something, not to trap us.”

“How could you tell that? She could have been beckoning us so she could lock us in here,” Jack retorted, letting the light slide around the room as he searched it.

“Wait!” Cate exclaimed, grabbing his wrist and tilting it. The flashlight’s beam reflected off of something under the desk. She leaned closer, crouching down to study it.

“What is it?”

“Looks like a book or a journal,” Cate answered as she reached for it. She grabbed hold of the dusty tome, thumbing through it.

Dust plumed into the air as the hand-written pages flew by. She landed on the first page, her heart skipping a beat as she read the words.

With wide eyes, she snapped her gaze to Jack. “Jack, this is Molly’s ancestor’s journal. She was here at Dunhaven Castle.”

“Aye,” Jack said with a nod. “It certainly appears she was. And now her spirit is here instead. And that can’t be a good thing.”

Cate pressed her lips together as she stared at the yellowed pages in the journal. “We need to read this and see if it tells us why she’s suddenly appeared.”

“Maybe even ask Roger. I’m sure he’d love to take a look at this.”

“Yes, you’re right. Let’s find him,” Cate said with a nod.

With the journal in hand, they retraced their steps down the passage and into the bedroom. After closing the panel, they made their way back to the main castle, climbing the stairs and snaking through the halls to the Green Room.

Cate’s mind whirled, wondering what stories they may learn from within the aged pages as she knocked on Roger’s door.

Molly pulled it open a few minutes later. “Your Grace, hello. Uncle Roger’s all settled. And he loves the room.”

She kissed Jack on the cheek as both of them entered the large space, finding Roger with a plate of cookies and hot chocolate near a glowing fire in the sitting area.

He rose as they approached. “I do love the room. I didn’t expect it to be this large.”

“Mine’s even bigger,” Molly said with a chuckle, “and wait until you see what I’ve done with the East Wing where Jack and I will be living.”

“And it looks like you also love Mrs. Fraser’s hot chocolate,” Cate said. “I do, too.”

“It’s very good,” Roger answered.

Cate smiled at him before she raised the journal in her hand. “Well, I not only wanted to check on you to see how the room suited, but also, Jack and I made a bit of a discovery. After you spotted your ghost, we went on a fact-finding mission. We think we encountered the same woman you saw in the library.”

Roger’s features pinched as he set down his mug. “You mean...you saw it again, too.”

Molly’s face turned pale as she clutched her uncle’s arm.

“Yes,” Cate said with a nod. “When I picked up the ring you brought, that icy cold came back along with what looked like a woman.”

Cate held up the ring before she passed it back to Roger. “We followed her to a room in the West Wing and found a secret passage.”

“Are you kidding?!” Roger exclaimed. “Oh, I’ve always wanted to explore a secret passage in a castle.”

“I’m sorry to say, we’ve already done the exploring, but we’d be happy to show it to you,” Jack said. “You’re not missing much, though.”

“We brought you the best part,” Cate added. “We found this journal.”

She flipped open to the first page. “And look...it belonged to Eliza Campbell. I think your ghost may be your ancestor. I think Eliza may have been here at Dunhaven Castle.”

Roger’s eyes widened as he peered at the hand-written words in the journal. “I can’t believe it. I didn’t know she was ever here.”

“It appears she was. We thought we could dive into this together,” Jack said. “Give it a read and see why her spirit may be showing up now.”

Roger eased into the armchair, pressing his mouth into a thin line. “I don’t know how you can take this all in stride. I’m a little nervous as to why she’d be here.”

“Oh, well,” Jack said with a shrug, “it’s an old castle. It’s got lots of ghosts.”

Roger glanced up at them, his gaze bouncing between Cate and Jack. “I think we need to read that journal.”

CHAPTER 4

With fresh hot chocolates and a new tray of cookies, Cate, Jack, Roger, and Molly settled into the seats in the living room with the journal in front of them.

“I still don’t understand why this would be here,” Molly said after a sip of her hot chocolate. “I had no idea the Campbells were ever at Dunhaven Castle.”

“Neither did I,” Roger answered. “It’s news to me, too. But Jack and I took a look at the journal while you ladies were gathering the snacks. I hope no one minds.”

“Not at all. Were you able to learn anything useful?” Cate asked, curling her legs under her on the couch.

“Well, yes,” Roger said as he patted the journal. “Much of it is disjointed or unclear, but it seems Eliza had come here to wed one of the Reids.”

Cate pulled her chin back to her chest, her eyebrows raising. “Really? How interesting. And now Molly is about to wed a Reid, too. It’s like history repeating itself.”

Roger wrinkled his nose at the words. “I hope not.”

“Why, Uncle Roger?” Molly asked.

“And which Reid was she marrying?” Cate chuckled as he waved a finger between the two of them. “I hope you’re not related.”

“We aren’t,” Jack answered sharply as Molly’s eyes widened. “I texted Pap the name we found in the journal. Jonathan Reid. He was a great-great-great uncle or something, not direct in my line.”

“Yes, and more than that,” Roger added, his eyebrows raising, “Jonathan and Eliza never married.”

Molly’s features pinched. “Why?”

Jack shifted uncomfortably on the loveseat next to her. “I’m afraid the tale is rather scandalous.”

Molly arched an eyebrow. “How scandalous?”

“It seems, according to what we could piece together from Eliza’s journal, that Jonathan was quite a rogue. He had been carrying on with one of the maids here at Dunhaven Castle, a place he frequented quite a bit with his brother.”

“Oh, no,” Cate said with a frown. “How awful. I’ll bet Eliza was devastated.”

Roger nodded, paging through the book to a specific entry. He tapped the hand-written words with a finger. “Yes, she says here she is heartbroken. Apparently, Jonathan had stolen her heart.”

Jack nodded, leaning forward to grab another cookie. “And he was set to steal her money, too.”

“Eliza overheard him planning with the maid. He would marry her, then have her declared insane. That would leave him with all of her money. He could then quietly divorce her over the matter and wed the maid.” Roger shook his head at the woeful tale.

“At least, that’s what he claimed he would do,” Jack said with a heavy sigh. “I wonder if he would have simply taken the money and ran.”

Cate’s fingers tightened around her mug, the warmth a stark contrast to the chill of the tale. “What a shame. What happened to them? Did she leave Dunhaven Castle heartbroken?”

“That’s where the story takes a darker turn,” Roger answered. “It seems Eliza Campbell never left Dunhaven Castle at all.”

“What?” Molly cried, her features twisted with confusion.

“Aye,” Jack answered in a low, gravelly tone. “She committed suicide here.”

A shiver snaked down Cate’s spine as he said the words. Thunder rumbled again in the distance as a storm pushed along the ridge.

“How awful,” Cate murmured.

Roger bobbed his head again. “A terrible shame. But there’s more.”

“More?”

Roger flipped to another entry in the book. "According to this journal, she didn't curse the women in her line—she cursed any man carrying the Reid name. If any of them dared to marry at Dunhaven Castle, they were doomed to a short, miserable married life."

Cate's lips parted as she widened her eyes. "Cursed?"

"Oh no!" Molly exclaimed.

Jack patted her knee. "Now, Molly, curses aren't real."

She tugged her lips into a deep frown. "I don't want to take any chances, though. I've already had one bad break. I don't want to tempt fate for another."

"I'm sure Jack's right. They're probably just angry words written by a jilted woman," Cate assured Molly, though in the back of her mind, she was already forming a plan to look into the curse. After everything she'd seen while living at Dunhaven Castle, she didn't want to take the chance either.

Molly groaned as she set her hot chocolate down, her features tightly pinched. She let her head fall into her hands. "I don't know."

"Molly, we're getting married in two days. There's not much we can do about this."

"But we have to," Molly said. "Jack, if this curse is real, we can't get married here. Maybe not at all."

A sob escaped Molly, and she leapt from her seat, racing from the room as tears began to fall.

"Oh, no," Cate said, setting her mug on the tray. "I'd better go see if she's okay."

"I'll go," Roger offered. "Maybe I can give her some hope that this curse is just an old wives' tale."

Cate smiled as the man laid the journal on the table and pushed out of his chair, leaving them behind to search for Molly.

As the door closed behind him, Cate shifted her gaze to Jack. "So, what do you really think?"

Jack shrugged, his lips pressed into a thin line. "I'm not sure what to think. With everything we've seen in the past few years, I wish I could be more definite."

"Same here," Cate said with a wrinkled nose. "I said what I said to Molly because I didn't want her to worry, but...I'm afraid the curse may be real."

Jack sucked in a sharp breath as he nodded. "So am I. Which means in two days...I'll be doomed."

"Not if we can break this thing," Cate said, a glimmer of mischief in her eye as she leaned closer to Jack.

"And how to propose we do that? No, wait, I know exactly how you propose we do it. You want us to time travel."

Cate nodded, the corners of her lips curling as lightning lit the sky in the distance.

"Cate, we can't do that. There's too much—" Jack's words cut off, and he shook his head. "You know what, you're right. This is exactly what we need to do."

Cate pulled the journal closer. "This is dated. We can head back to just days before their wedding and see what's happening. Maybe we can stop her from cursing the Reids entirely."

"Maybe we can. Which would mean the journal would change, and then neither Roger nor Molly would know about the curse, right?" Jack leapt from his seat, pacing as he rubbed his chin.

"Right," Cate said. "We can reset everything so you have a happy wedding day."

Jack stared at the door where Molly had disappeared moments earlier. "All right. I think we need to do this."

"She was here in the 1820s. There are trunks of clothes in the tower room. I'll find what we need. Let's head back tonight."

"All right. After dinner, we'll do our first reconnaissance mission. Just leave my clothes in my usual bedroom."

Cate nodded as she rose. "I will. And we'll meet on the backstairs. With a house full of people, we'll need to be careful not to get caught."

"Thank heavens the universal portal is in the secret passage."

Cate grinned at him, raising her eyebrows. "We can do this."

"For my sake, I hope so," Jack answered.

They parted ways with Jack heading off to find Molly and Roger while Cate greeted Mr. Smythe and Gayle.

"Oh, Cate, it's so lovely to be back at Dunhaven, and for a wedding no less," Gayle said with a warm smile as she stepped into the foyer.

"We're all very excited about it," Cate said. "Although, Molly is having some pre-wedding jitters."

"Oh, no," Gayle said with a concerned frown. "A case of cold feet?"

“Not quite,” Cate answered. “We stumbled upon a journal from one of Molly’s ancestors. Apparently, she’d been here at Dunhaven in the 1820s. She was set to marry an ancestor of Jack’s, but there was an affair, and Eliza took her life.”

“Oh, dear,” Gayle said, shaking her head.

“And, of course, there is the tale that she cursed any Reid who marries on the property.”

“Oh, heavens.” Gayle puckered her lips.

“If there isn’t a problem just before a wedding, is it really a wedding?” Mr. Smythe said with a slight grin. “I do hope the problems work themselves out.”

“I’m sure they will,” Cate answered, “but we may be dining with a slightly smaller party tonight after that revelation.”

Gayle squeezed Cate’s arm. “Well, I do hope Molly and Jack are feeling up to joining us, but even if they are not, the company will be perfectly fine.”

“Will His Grace be joining us?” Mr. Smythe asked as Cate led them upstairs to their bedrooms.

“He had better be,” Cate said with a chuckle.

Mr. Smythe grinned at her as they reached his room. “Oh, excellent. I had hoped for another chess match with him. He is a fantastic opponent.”

“I’m certain he would be glad to oblige you,” Cate answered.

After she left both of them in their rooms to freshen up before dinner, Cate climbed the spiraling stairs to the tower room. After shoving a few trunks aside, she located the appropriate clothing for the period, gathering what she needed for herself and Jack.

She dropped his things off in his bedroom, wondering how the conversation was progressing with Molly, before she returned to her own bedroom.

Andrea met her there to ready her for dinner. Her ladies’ maid arched an eyebrow as she stared at the clothes. “Going somewhere, Your Grace?”

Cate plopped into her chair at the vanity. “Yes. Jack and I discovered a journal earlier written by Molly’s ancestor. She was set to marry a Reid here at the castle, but it didn’t work out. She supposedly cursed any Reid that dared to marry on the property. With Jack set to marry here in two days, we thought it may be prudent to do our best to break that curse.”

Andrea brushed through Cate's hair as she nodded. "I quite agree. Poor Mr. Reid."

"Yes," Cate said with a nod. "I'm really hoping traveling back in time to when this happens will help in some way."

She wrinkled her nose as thoughts of what may happen if they weren't able to solve this problem danced in her mind. "Because if we don't, I'm not sure this wedding should go on."

CHAPTER 5

Cate's nerves tingled as she shifted from foot to foot at the top of the backstairs, the fabric of her period dress rustling softly in the quiet of the corridor. Each rustle echoed the gravity of their mission—breaking a centuries-old curse that threatened to seep into her present.

She fussed with a lace detail on her dress, her fingers trembling slightly. They'd endured plenty at the hands of The Agency, but this struck too close to home. Solving a mystery was one thing—breaking a curse that directly affected those closest to her was something else entirely.

She gnawed on her lower lip as she wondered what they would find when they appeared in 1823. Before she could delve too deep into it, Jack rounded the corner, tugging at his collar.

“Unhappy with the clothing?” Cate asked.

“Yes,” he answered, “although, I’m not going to the future, so I guess I have to get used to it, don’t I?”

She giggled as they crept down the stairs, hoping to avoid the rest of the household who should have retired to their rooms already. “The future was much more comfortable, except for the formal dinners I somehow managed to allow Marcus to talk me into.”

“Formal dinners?” Jack questioned. “Like every night?”

“Sadly, yes. He thinks it’s important for the children.” Cate shrugged. “I would be happy in leggings, but I guess marriage is about compromise.”

“I hope Molly is fond of my flannel shirts because that is a compromise I’m not willing to make,” Jack said with a shake of his head.

Cate chuckled as she patted his arm. "Molly's perfectly fond of them. It's Marcus who dislikes them."

"Well, that's not a surprise," Jack said as they reached the bottom of the stairs. He leaned around the corner, peering up and down the hall. "Clear."

They hurried out of the stairway, their footsteps echoing softly on the stone floor, passing walls hung with oil portraits of stern-faced ancestors and flickering torches that cast ghostly shadows.

Cate crossed to the sconce and tugged on it. The secret panel in the wall slid open, and they disappeared into the blackness.

Jack clicked on the flashlight that he'd brought, and they crept forward in the passage. Cate tugged the timepiece from under her dress, holding it in the palm of her hand.

"It's been a while since we've done this, huh?"

"Aye," Jack said with a nod. "A long while. We really got spoiled with Marcus's magical time portals."

Cate chuckled as the cool metal pressed against her skin while she set the date into the pocket watch. "We did. But they are kind of a pain with all the wind."

"Right. My hair was always a wreck. At least this way, I'll appear in 1823 in pristine condition."

"Good thing. We're showing up just before a wedding. We need to look our best. Ready?" Cate glanced up at him, her eyes questioning.

"As I'll ever be." Jack set the flashlight down and wrapped his hand around Cate's, placing his thumb against the face of the timepiece.

With a rub, they both transported to another time at Dunhaven Castle.

"Well," Jack said as he glanced around, "the flashlight is gone, so I guess we're here."

Cate nodded as she waited for her eyes to adjust to the darkness. "I really wish I had night vision."

"You and me both. I should have brought the blasted flashlight with me and left it in the passage."

"Someone could have discovered it," Cate said with a shake of her head.

"Maybe they'll invent it sooner, then, so we don't have to creep around in the dark," Jack answered.

Cate chuckled at him as she used her fingers to guide her along through the passage. "Soon, we'll be sneaking into the castle and desperately trying not to get caught while we get the lay of the land.”

“I don’t love this plan, but I also don’t love introducing ourselves to Finlay and Camdyn,” Jack said with a shake of his head. “Family politics isn’t something we can afford to get involved with right now.”

“Maybe another time when we don’t have a curse to break,” Cate said.

Jack poked a finger at her as they approached the panel. “Right. So, for now, we’ll lay low and try to glean any details we can about what happened with Eliza and Jonathan.”

“Yes,” Cate said as she eased the panel back and peered into the hall. “Maybe we can find some detail that will help us break the curse.”

Candlelight lit the hallway beyond the secret passage. “Everyone should be at the pre-wedding ball, so we should be able to sneak through the castle easily.”

“The hall looks clear,” Jack whispered.

Cate nodded and pulled the panel open wider, slipping from the passage with Jack following her.

“According to the journal, Eliza and Jonathan had a row this evening that led to her taking her own life. We should find a good hiding spot outside of the ballroom and see if we can catch sight of them,” Cate suggested.

Jack nodded. “Right. Although, I’m not certain we’re going to be able to break this curse without inserting ourselves into the situation.”

Cate pressed her lips together. She’d already come to that conclusion. Merely observing wouldn’t change anything, and the curse would continue into their time. Unless there was some mechanism that could be used to break it. But would they be able to determine that from merely observing the events in this time?

“I’ve already considered that. But for now, let’s just tackle seeing the events up close. It may give us some idea on how to proceed next,” Cate answered.

They rounded the corner and headed to the ballroom. The sounds of laughter, chatter and music filled the air. The party seemed to be in full swing, except it was missing two key members.

Cate’s eyes went wide as a red-headed woman resembling the spirit they’d followed in their time appeared in the hall.

Cate darted toward a set of double doors that lead to a private sitting room and pushed inside them.

Jack slipped in behind her. “Whew, that was close.”

“Yeah, and—” Cate’s words caught in her throat as her eyes fixed on the doorknob as it started to twist.

She grabbed hold of Jack and dragged him toward the sofa across the space, ducking behind it.

The doors burst open, and Eliza stormed inside, followed by a tall man. She whipped around to face him, her cheeks burning red.

“How dare you, Jonathan!”

Cate’s eyebrows rose toward her hairline. That had to be Jonathan Reid, Eliza’s fiancé.

“How dare I?” He wagged a finger in her face. “No, how dare you embarrass me like this.”

“Embarrass you? Embarrass you? Do you not think I was embarrassed when Moira warned me about what was happening under my very nose? When your mistress came to me to tell me she owned your heart?”

Cate sucked in a sharp breath, tapping Jack’s arm. “Moira, my ancestor, and the mistress of the house.”

Jack bobbed his head, recognizing the name.

“That is untrue. Moira is merely making trouble.”

“No,” Eliza answered with a shake of her head, her features taut. “No, Elsa confirmed it when I confronted her. And she took great pleasure in informing me that she held the key to your happiness. And if that is the case, fine. I release you of any obligation to me.”

Eliza tore the sapphire ring off of her finger and tossed it at him. “Take your ring.”

Jonathan’s features twisted with surprise as the ring smacked him in the chest before clattering across the floor. His expression shifted quickly, his nostrils flaring, and his lips tugging into a tight frown. “Pick that up.”

“No,” she shot back. “You pick it up. We are finished, Jonathan.”

“We are not, Eliza. You are my fiancée, and tomorrow, you will be my wife. Now, pick up that ring and compose yourself. We have a ball to finish and guests to entertain.”

“I will not.” Her green eyes dared him to argue. “We are finished. Perhaps you can attend the ball with Elsa. She seems most interested in having your attention tonight.”

“I will have no more of this,” Jonathan growled as he stopped to pick up the ring. “Put this on, and let us return to the ballroom.”

“I said no,” she answered, lifting her ball gown and skirting around him.

He grabbed hold of her arm, yanking her backward. “And I told you I will not tolerate this behavior anymore. You are angry. I concede that my behavior has been intolerable, but it is something you will grow accustomed to.”

“I will never,” Eliza answered, her voice a defiant shout. She tried to pull her arm from his grasp, but he tightened his fingers around her.

She cried out in pain as he forced her to her knees. “Jonathan, you’re hurting me.”

“And I will do worse than that if you break this engagement. We are engaged, and we will be married tomorrow. You will accept that this is your life. If you do not...I will ensure that you wish you had.”

He grabbed hold of her left hand and roughly shoved the ring onto her finger. “Do not test my patience, Eliza. You will surely end up regretting it.”

Tears rolled down Eliza’s cheeks as she trembled.

The doors across the room eased open and another red-headed woman glanced inside.

“Moira,” Cate whispered to Jack.

Jonathan quickly tugged Eliza to her feet as Moira entered the room. “Is everything all right?”

Eliza spun to face away from Moira, stalking a few steps away as she composed herself.

“Yes,” Jonathan answered with a wide grin, “we merely had to steal away for a few private moments together.”

“Well, you should really get back. Guests are asking about you.”

“I just said the same to Eliza,” Jonathan answered. “Darling, are you ready?”

“I need a moment to compose myself,” Eliza said with a sniffle. “I wouldn’t want people to think anything untoward had happened.”

Moira offered Jonathan a polite smile. “I’ll bring her along. You should go back now. Finlay is looking for you.”

Jonathan cleared his throat as he glanced over his shoulder at Eliza. “I could—”

“Now, Jonathan,” Moira said, leaving no room for argument in her tone.

Jonathan bobbed his head as he strode toward the doors, slipping through them.

“Tell me what happened,” Moira said when they were alone.

Eliza's features twisted with upset. "I broke off the engagement, but he wouldn't allow it."

"Wouldn't allow it?" Moira asked, her voice an octave higher. "What does that mean? He does not own you. You are not his property."

"I am to be his wife, and he seems to consider it the same thing."

"Eliza, there is no reason you cannot break off this engagement. If you—"

Eliza whipped around to face Moira, her features twisted with fear. "Yes, there is. I fear that if I leave him...it will be the last thing I do. Moira, I fear he will kill me."

Cate's heart skipped a beat, her eyes going wide. What if Eliza's death hadn't been a suicide? Could it have been murder?

CHAPTER 6

Cate rose from her crouch behind the sofa, her heart still hammering. She grabbed Jack's arm, her eyes still round. "Did you hear that?"

"Aye," Jack said with a nod. "I heard it. Sounds like Jonathan is a real...well, you know what."

Cate's heart pounded, her stomach tightening into knots as she whispered, her voice tinged with disbelief and fear, "And he could be a murderer, Jack. What if we're standing right in the middle of a story more horrific than we imagined?"

Jack shook his head. "Now, we know Eliza killed herself. So, we can't pin that on him."

"Or can we," Cate answered. "We have no idea what actually happened, Jack. What if she didn't kill herself? What if he killed her?"

Jack pressed his lips together, staring at the door the others had disappeared through moments ago. "But she wrote in her journal—"

"Did she?" Cate asked. "Or did someone else add that to her journal? We have no idea. But I think we need to find out."

"I was afraid you would say that," Jack answered with a shake of his head. "But, sadly, I think you're right. If we want to have any chance at breaking this curse, we need to know exactly what happened."

Cate gnawed on her lower lip, her fingers curling into fists as determination filled her. "Yes. We'll need to find her room—which I am guessing is the one she led us to in the west wing."

"And then what? We can't very well hide under the bed?"

“No, but we can hide in the secret passage.”

Jack’s eyes widened. “What? Somehow, her journal got put in that passage. What if someone catches us there?”

“I don’t know, but we have to do something, Jack. We still have no idea how to break this curse—or even if we can.”

Jack heaved a sigh, nodding as he skirted around the couch. “You’re right. I hate that you’re always right, but you are.”

“I know you hate time travel and risking changing the course of history, but—”

“But according to your husband, it doesn’t really matter,” Jack answered as they approached the door.

“I’m not sure if doesn’t matter is actually correct, but we’d changed history more than once, and so far, everything is okay. And The Agency changed it multiple times.”

“And we’re all still alive,” Jack said with a sigh. “You’re right.”

“Maybe that’s what we need to do here,” Cate said. “Maybe that’s the only way to break the curse.”

“Let’s take it one step at a time. We’ll use this to just gather information,” Jack proposed.

Cate nodded before she inched the door open and peered into the hall. “Sounds like there is some sort of speech being made. Now is a good time to go.”

She flung the door open, and they hurried from the room, snaking through the hall. At every corner, they paused, peering into the next hall to make sure they avoided being seen by any members of the household or staff.

“So odd to see these doors open,” Jack said with a shake of his head as they entered the west wing and climbed the stairs to the bedrooms.

In the quieter wing, they made their way to the room Eliza’s ghost had led them to in their time. Cate pushed inside, scanning the room before she closed the door behind them.

“Looks like someone is staying in this room,” Jack said as he poked a finger at the melted candles and the fire burning in the room’s fireplace.

Cate bobbed her head, crossing to the room’s desk and shuffling the papers around on it. Her heart skipped a beat as she picked up a leather journal. “Jack, look. It’s Eliza’s journal.”

“I assume the fateful entry isn’t in it?” Jack asked as he approached her and peered over her shoulder.

Cate flipped through the pages, finding the last entry dated several days before. “No.”

“So, she hasn’t decided anything yet. I wonder if they have another fight.”

Cate replaced the journal on the desk where she’d found it. “I don’t know, but we’re about to find out. Come on, we’d better get into the secret passage.”

Jack bobbed his head, and they headed for the corner. Cate pulled the unlit sconce on the wall, opening the panel.

Voices sounded in the hall, and Jack’s eyes went wide. “Hurry! I think someone’s coming.”

Cate lifted her skirt and scurried into the passage, followed by Jack. He pushed the panel closed just as the door open.

Through the pinhole of light that appeared in the panel, they were able to view the room.

“Who is it?” Jack whispered. “Is it Eliza?”

Cate shook her head. “It’s Jonathan and another woman. She’s wearing a maid’s uniform. I’d guess it’s Elsa.

“What are we going to do, Jonathan?” the blonde asked, her features pinched with confusion. “If she does not marry you—”

“She will,” Jonathan answered. “She has little to no choice in the matter. What will become of her if she does not?”

“Surely, she can find another,” the woman answered. “But without her money—”

“Yes, I know, Elsa,” Jonathan growled. “I understand the stakes here. Perhaps if you had not opened your mouth to her, she would be none the wiser. You could not even wait for two more days.”

Elsa pouted as she shifted her gaze to the floor. “I could not help it. Jonathan, my feelings for you are so strong that I could not say nothing.”

“You foolish girl.” Jonathan raised a hand and slapped her across the cheek. “If the marriage does not come off, it is your fault.”

“Perhaps we should not try for it,” Elsa cried, her voice raw with emotion. “Perhaps we should run away together. Just us. We can make a new life somewhere else.”

Jonathan arched an eyebrow. "On what money? This was the one chance I had. My family is not wealthy. And I am the black sheep of it."

"Please, Jonathan. I have a terrible feeling if we stay. Please, let us leave from here." Elsa grabbed his hand, tugging on his arm, her features desperate.

"I said no," Jonathan shouted as the door creaked open again. "Now, we need to stick to the plan. We must put something in her journal that will suggest she is insane. Or at least give question to her mindset."

Elsa frowned, and Jonathan arched an eyebrow at her. "I said now."

"But Jonathan—"

He raised a hand and slapped her again, the force of the blow knocking her to the floor.

She sobbed as she pressed a hand to her cheek. Jonathan dragged her to her feet roughly, forcing her across the room to the desk and into the chair. "Write."

"No," she answered, tears shining in her eyes. "No, I won't do it. I don't want this, Jonathan. I only want us."

She grabbed hold of his hand again, her eyes pleading as she begged him silently to abandon his plan.

Jonathan's features twisted with anger as he ripped his hand away. "You are such a foolish woman. I do not know how I ever was interested in you."

"No, Jonathan, please—"

The rest of her statement was never spoken. Jonathan wrapped his hands around Elsa's neck, squeezing as his lips curled back into a terrifying grimace.

She choked, her eyes wide as she clutched at his hands, trying to pull them away from her neck.

Cate grasped hold of Jack, her stomach churning as she watched the horrible scene play out.

Elsa's features finally twisted with anger, and in her dying words, she cursed him and all the male descendants in the Reid line. "I curse you Jonathan Reid, and all the men who follow in your line. Anyone who marries at Dunhaven Castle is cursed to a life of misery. Only the one who finds the hidden locket and returns it to my grave will escape."

Her lower lip trembled as she took her final breaths, her eyes rolling back into her head before she slumped to the floor.

Cate clapped a hand over her lips to stop a cry from escaping her.

In the bedroom beyond their hiding spot, Jonathan loomed over Elsa's dead body, his nose wrinkling. "Foolish woman. Now, I must do everything myself."

He grabbed her arms and pulled her toward the door, but before they reached it, the door burst open.

Eliza stepped inside, her jaw dropping at the sight.

Jonathan's eyes widened as he let go of Elsa, hurrying to Eliza's side.

"Eliza, darling, thank heavens you are here. Elsa...she went mad. She came here to await you, to harm you. It was then that I realized how very wrong I have been. She has no love for me, and I none for her. Please, darling, you must help me."

"Help you?" Eliza asked, her eyes going wide as she stared, stunned, at the body on the floor.

"Yes, Eliza, please, now there is no one between us. And there never will be again. But I need your help."

Eliza stared at him for a moment, and Cate held her breath. Would this be what made the woman take her own life?

Finally, Eliza shifted her gaze back to Jonathan and nodded. "Yes, I will help you. But you must go now. You cannot be here. I will handle everything."

Cate's jaw flopped open. How could Eliza do this?

"Thank you, darling. I knew I could count on you." Jonathan kissed her cheek before he grinned at her. "I will be in my room. You will find me later, won't you?"

Eliza offered him a soft smile, a silent promise as he backed from the room. The moment he left, she whipped around and dropped to her knees, lifting one of Elsa's limp hands into the air, her smile fading.

With a shake of her head, she disappeared from the room.

"Jack!" Cate hissed as she ripped her eyes away from the dead body. "What should we do?"

"Leave?" He shook his head. "This is not at all what we expected. And I cannot believe she is going to help him. Maybe this is what leads her to suicide."

Before they could discuss things any further, the doors burst open again. Eliza hurried in with Moira. The woman gasped as she entered the room. "Poor Elsa."

“Yes,” Eliza answered. “The poor girl trusted that vile man and paid the ultimate price. You must see that she is buried properly.”

“But...”

“There is no proof that he killed her,” Eliza said as she took a seat at her desk. “I must disappear. I will leave a note that says I cannot marry Jonathan and disappear. You will tell the tale that I took my own life.”

“Eliza, you cannot run!”

“It is the only thing I can do. I have enough money. I can make a comfortable life on my own. Away from him in a place he will never find me.”

Moira offered her friend a pitying glance but nodded. “I understand. And of course, I will help you.”

“I will leave you a sum. See that Elsa is buried properly in the village.”

Moira bobbed her head. “I will handle it all discreetly.”

Cate and Jack waited in the secret passage until Moira fetched two footmen. They wrapped the body and carried her out as Eliza finished what would become the final passage in her journal—a passage that would lead others to believe she had cursed Jonathan.

When she’d finished, she gathered a few things, then fled from the room, never to be seen again.

Cate blew out a long breath as silence enveloped them.

“I guess we should go back. Now, we know what happened, and we know how to solve it,” Jack said after a few moments.

Cate nodded, searching for the trigger to release the panel. They knew the origins of the curse. They knew how to break it. But without the lost locket, none of it would matter.

CHAPTER 7

Cate paced the floor of her bedroom, chewing her thumbnail as her mind whirled. What they'd witnessed in the past had left her numb.

They'd witnessed a murder, but now they had more clues to work with to break the curse.

But how could they find the lost locket Elsa had mentioned?

After returning from their excursion to the 1820s, she'd done nothing but vet ideas for finding the locket.

A knock at her door pulled her from her rumination. "Coming," she called, hurrying across the room to pull it open.

Jack greeted her in his normal clothes. "Well, I'm all comfortable again so now I can think."

Cate motioned for him to enter. "I've done nothing but think since we've been back. We need to find that locket, but how?"

Jack shook his head. "I'm not sure. But I wonder if there could be any clues in Eliza's journal."

"How? She didn't know anything about the curse. That rumor must have started from somewhere else." Cate spread her arms to the sides with a shrug.

"No, but Elsa did have access to the journal. It looks like she almost started to write in it before she argued with Jonathan." Jack paced the floor, rubbing his chin.

"You think she put a clue in there?" Cate asked, her voice turning hopeful.

“I sure hope so. Otherwise, I’m not certain we can find this.”

Cate’s eyebrows pinched together. “All right, then we need to get that journal back from Roger.”

Jack winced as he stepped in front of Cate to stop her progress toward the door. “Cate, there’s something I wanted to talk to you about.

A knot formed in Cate’s stomach, a mix of anticipation and dread, as she took in the deep lines of worry etched across Jack’s face. “Sure. Sit down.”

“Thanks,” he said as he eased into one of the armchairs, rubbing his palms against his jeans. “Uh, I want to start out by saying that if you don’t agree, I totally understand. I really do. I just...want to throw this out there because I think it’s important, and it’s been bothering me.”

Cate drew her chin back to her chest as she perched on the edge of her chaise. “Whatever it is, Jack, you can tell me. I’m sure we’ll work it out.”

He bobbed his head, scrubbing his face with his hands before he puffed out a long breath. “With our...time traveling...” He cleared his throat. “I don’t want...it may seem...I’m afraid Molly is going to think there’s something strange going on with all the leaks and whatnot in the castle. I don’t want...”

“Her to think we’re having an affair?” Cate said with a chuckle.

Jack raised his eyebrows, bobbing his head. “Yeah, that.”

“I don’t either.”

“But I can’t see a way around it. In the past, it’s usually been two men who have protected the secret. And so—”

“It would look like they were discussing estate business or handling something professional,” Cate answered with a nod. “Yeah, I get it. With the exception of your grandfather and Mary, and your grandfather and Gertrude, there have been no other male-female pairings.”

“No, and Pap didn’t have a wife around during part of that time.”

“Also, Gertrude didn’t time travel.” Cate poked a finger at him. “Well, I see your point, and I also see your problem. But I think there is a way around it.”

Jack snapped his gaze to her, his eyes going wide. “What way? Cate, if you say you’re going to time travel alone—”

“I wouldn’t dream of it.”

Jack wrinkled his nose, his lips tugging into a frown. “I don’t like the idea of me being replaced by Marcus either, but I suppose that’s our only choice.”

Cate giggled as she shook her head. "I'm not replacing you with Marcus. He has enough of his own magical problems to deal with. Plus, I'm not sure he's really into amateur sleuthing like we are. We make a good team. And we're supposed to be the ones who protect this castle."

"So, what are you saying?"

Cate shrugged. "I think we should tell Molly."

Jack huffed out a shocked breath. "Tell Molly?!"

"Yes. Spoiler alert, I've been to the future."

Jack let his head fall back against the armchair's back. "Ohhh, she knew."

"She did. You told me we told her. And I wholeheartedly agreed with that decision. She should know. And who knows, maybe she'll even want to help sometimes."

"A trio?"

"Well, we could invite Marcus and make it a double date."

"Somehow that doesn't sound appealing, although I'm thinking about that steak we had at the club." Jack rubbed his belly.

Cate rose from her seat. "You and your stomach. Come on, let's go get this over with."

Jack froze, staring at her. "Now?"

"Well, when else?"

"I don't know. Some random date in the future, I thought. You know, to give me time to prepare and panic."

Cate grabbed his hand and pulled him to stand. "Come on, Jack. Let's get it over with. And with this out of the way, it'll be easier to tell Molly what really happened with the curse, so we have another person helping us solve it."

He rose with a sigh. "All right, all right. I guess now's as good a time as any. And I guess she won't leave me. You saw proof of us married, right?"

"I did. And you're even turning a little gray, so...we must be able to break the curse."

Jack bobbed his head. "You know, I'm kind of enjoying this fortune teller version of Cate. It's right handy."

Cate started to chuckle as they entered the hall when a blinding pain shot across her forehead. She dropped to her knees.

"Cate?" Jack's voice sounded far away as he called to her.

Her vision clouded, a new image replacing the familiar hall. Her eyebrows pinched together as she stared at what looked like a secret passage, the space lit only by a flashlight.

“Cate,” Roger said with a grin in front of her, “I think I found it.”

Cate sucked in a sharp breath as the vision disappeared. She flicked her gaze to Jack, reaching for him with a trembling hand.

“Cate, what happened?”

“A vision.”

His eyes widened as he helped her up. “I’ll get you back to bed.”

“No, no,” she said with a shake of her head. “No, I’m okay. I’m getting better at navigating them.”

“Should I ask what the vision was about?”

“I think we were finding the locket. Roger said he found it. We were in a secret passage.”

“Well, that narrows it down,” Jack answered with a shake of his head. “There are only two hundred of them in this sprawling place.”

“Better than the dozens of rooms we’d have to tear apart,” Cate said as he wrapped his arm around her to steady her.

“Who’s tearing rooms apart?” Molly’s chipper voice asked as she approached them, her smile fading as she spotted Cate clinging to Jack. “What happened? Are you okay?”

“I’m fine. I just...Molly, there’s something we need to discuss.”

Molly’s gaze flicked between Cate and Jack before she nodded. “All right. Uh—”

Cate motioned to her bedroom. “Come in.”

They retreated into the quiet space, and Cate closed the doors behind them before she crossed to her chaise and eased onto it. Molly and Jack sat in the armchairs with Molly fidgeting as her gaze darted between them.

“Well, don’t keep me in suspense,” she said with a chuckle.

Cate swallowed hard as Jack took Molly’s hand in his. “Molly...there’s something...about this castle that’s...unique.”

“Unique? You mean, the ghost?”

“No,” Cate answered. “No, not the ghost. But it has to do with the ghost you thought you saw.”

“I’m pretty sure I did see her,” Molly said. “And now that Uncle Roger saw another, it’s possible right?”

“Yes and no,” Cate said. “The thing is, we know you didn’t see a ghost. What you saw was entirely different.”

Molly’s features turned frightened. “Was it something darker? Like a demon or something?”

“No, no,” Cate said with a quick shake of her head. “No, but...there’s no easy way to say this, Molly. This castle contains a magical portal that allows us to time travel when combined with my pocket watch.”

Molly stared at her for a moment before she burst into laughter. “Aw, Cate. If you two are trying to cheer me up after this whole curse thing, really, I’m okay. But thank you.”

“We’re not,” Jack answered. “All those ‘leaks’ and ‘estate problems’ Cate always needs help with. We weren’t discussing that. We were time traveling so we could solve mysteries.”

Molly sat quietly for a moment before her features wrinkled. “What like...Jessica Fletcher in the TARDIS?”

“Umm, yes, sort of like Murder, She Wrote mixed with Doctor Who, yeah,” Cate said with a slight grin.

After a second, Molly shook her head. “No. I can’t—”

“We can show you,” Cate answered, rising and holding her hand out.

Molly stared at her. “What? Like now?”

“No time like the present,” Jack declared as he stood. “Or the past. Or whatever.”

Molly rose, her features questioning as Cate locked arms with her and led her from the room. “If this is a prank, it’s a really good one. I’m almost starting to believe you two.”

“We’re not pranking you,” Jack assured her. “And this is going to blow your mind.”

“I’ll bet. If we end up in another time...”

“We will,” Jack assured her. “And not only that, but there’s a lot more you don’t know.”

“Such as?” Molly asked as they descended the stairs, her features pinching with surprise.

“Cate’s husband is a warlock. So, are most of her friends. They’re immortals who live forever. And Cate is a psychic,” Jack answered.

Cate shot him a glance over her shoulder as they reached the secret passage in the hall. “After not being able to tell her about time travel, you managed to get all that out in one breath?”

Jack shrugged. "Seemed easier when it didn't involve me."

As the panel slid open in front of them, Molly's features turned confused. "Are you two being serious or joking?"

"Serious," they both said at the same time.

"Molly, I'm sorry to dump this on you all at once," Cate answered as they stepped into the secret passage, "but the reason we did is because... well, Jack and I time traveled back to when Eliza was at Dunhaven Castle. We know what happened that night and how to break the curse. But we're going to need some help finding the missing piece. We thought it best that you know because of that, and the amount of time Jack and I spend together because of this secret."

Molly's lips tugged into a slight smile. "Aww, Cate. I appreciate that so much. But, honey, I would never have thought there was something between you and Jack. I trust you...both of you. And besides, the way you look at that husband of yours...and the way he looks at you."

Jack grumbled a little. "Hey, I look at you that way."

"Sure you do," Molly said with a pat on his arm. "But His Grace...those smoldering dark eyes, that whole bad boy vibe..."

"Hey!" Jack cried as they used Cate's cell phone flashlight to navigate the passage, "I don't like what I'm hearing."

"Sorry," Molly said with a shrug. "I'm not in love with him, but I see the appeal."

Jack clicked his tongue as Cate came to a stop. Her heart hammered against her ribs as she turned to face Molly. "All right. Now, I'm going to set the watch back to a time period. We'll go to—"

"Go back to the night of the wedding ball," Jack said.

"No, we'll be there."

"Oh right."

"There would be two of you?" Molly exclaimed.

"Yes," Cate said. "I'll go to 1800."

Cate set the time piece. "Now, we all need to touch it and rub the face, and we'll activate the portal to send us back in time."

Molly swallowed hard, her expression dubious. "A-all right."

Cate doused her flashlight, placing her cell phone in her pocket. They placed their thumbs on the watch and rubbed.

"Well, I guess we're here," Jack said a moment later.

“Go ahead and peek out of the panel. But don’t go too far in these modern clothes,” Cate said.

“Right,” Molly answered with a chuckle. “Someone may see us in pants and lose their minds.”

Cate trailed behind Jack and Molly as they made their way back up the passage in the darkness. Jack found the trigger and eased it open a slit.

Molly’s eyes went wide as she stared at the candles lighting the hallway instead of electric lights. A maid in a long uniform wandered down the hall with a bucket before she was called by a woman in an ankle-length dress.

Molly gasped, twisting to eye Jack and Cate.

“See, I told you,” Cate whispered with a grin.

It faded quickly as Molly’s eyes rolled back in her head, and she slumped to the floor.

CHAPTER 8

Cate pressed a cool cloth to Molly's forehead as she lay still unconscious. Jack hovered over Cate's shoulder, worry etched into every line of his face.

"That didn't go as well as I hoped," Jack admitted with a wince.

"No," Cate said, "but hopefully when she wakes up, we'll be able to assuage any fears she has about what just happened."

"I really didn't expect her to faint."

"I don't think she believed us," Cate said, glancing over her shoulder at him. "Especially when you told her about Marcus, my visions, and all the rest of it."

"Well, she seemed to be taking it well," Jack said with a shrug. "I thought it would be okay."

"Until she saw the people from another time." Cate wrinkled her nose.

Molly's head thrashed as she moaned, her features pinching.

Cate rose to lean over her. "She's coming to."

"Molly," Jack said, his voice soft as he clutched her hand.

Molly's eyes fluttered open, and she glanced up at them, her features showing confusion. "Jack? Cate?"

"We're right here, Molly," Cate said as she patted her arm.

"W-where are we?"

"In my bedroom at the castle. You're okay."

Molly pressed a hand against her forehead. "I had the strangest dream. I dreamt that we time traveled..."

Her voice trailed off as her eyes widened. “We didn’t, right?”

“Actually, Molly, we did,” Cate said, her voice soft. “We time traveled to show you that we were not lying.”

Molly’s lips parted as she stared up at Cate. “W-what?”

“I know it sounds strange—”

“Sounds strange?!” Molly exclaimed. “We went to another time. People from another century were walking around. Jack said you were married to a warlock and were a psychic. None of that was a dream.”

“Sadly not,” Cate answered with a consoling smile. “But the good news is because of that time travel, we managed to find a way to break the curse, and I have an idea of where to look of the item we need.”

Molly pushed herself higher, her lips tugged into a tight frown. “I don’t know how I feel about this.”

“I didn’t either at first,” Jack said, perching on the edge of the bed next to her. “Actually, I hated it. But now, I’ve gotten used to it. Cate and I have helped a lot of people.”

Molly’s knuckles turned white as she held tightly to his hand. “It sort of explains a lot.”

“Like?” Cate asked.

“Well, like no one knowing you were married. Were you married or was that a trick of time travel?” Molly asked.

Cate grinned at her friend. “Good catch. No, I was not married. Marcus and I went back in time to make sure I was married when The Agency attacked us.”

“Agency?” Molly asked.

Cate bobbed her head. “A group of people that has now been disbanded, but who were creating chaos all through time. They were responsible for Jack’s disappearance, everything.”

“Jack’s disappearance...” Molly’s eyebrows pinched.

“You don’t remember it because we changed it. Only Cate and I can remember,” Jack answered.

“Wow, that’s unfair,” Molly said with a wrinkled nose.

“It is, and it’s very strange to live with, but you’ll get used to it,” Cate promised as a knock sounded at her door. “Excuse me.”

She hurried out of the bedroom and across her sitting room to pull open the double doors.

“Hi,” Roger said with a smile as she opened them. “Sorry to disturb you, but I can’t find Molly.”

“Oh, she’s inside,” Cate said, motioning for him to come in. “She wasn’t feeling well, and we had her lie down.”

“Oh, no,” Roger answered with a frown. “I hope this doesn’t have to do with that curse.”

“I’m afraid it does.” Cate trailed behind him into the bedroom.

“Oh, Molly,” Roger said as he approached the bed to take her hand, “we’ll figure it out.”

“I know, Uncle Roger.” Molly smiled up at him, patting his hand. “I just got overwhelmed.”

“And she should rest a little more, but in the meantime, Roger, I was wondering if you’d like to check out a lead with me. We recently learned that perhaps it wasn’t Eliza who cursed the Reids, but Jonathan’s mistress. Elsa was a maid in the house, and she died under mysterious circumstances the night before the wedding was set. Based on what Jack and I...read...she may have been the one to curse the Reid family.”

“Aye,” Jack added with a nod, “and it’s her locket that we’re searching for. A comment in a journal we found suggested that it’s hidden somewhere in the castle.”

Jack shot Cate a dubious glance, his eyebrows raising. She lifted one shoulder in a slight shrug. They couldn’t tell Roger the truth, but she thought they’d covered it pretty well.

“While Molly rests, I wonder if you’re up for searching the castle’s secret passages for any sign of this locket.”

Roger’s eyes lit up as he nodded. “I’d love to search some secret passages. Any idea where they may be located?”

“I have an idea where a few of them are, but I think we should start with a few that weren’t frequently used by the castle’s other occupants. They’d be the most likely place.”

“Whatever you think is best.” Roger held a finger in the air. “Let me grab my cell phone so we’ll have a flashlight. And I can snap a few pictures of our adventure.”

“Of course,” Cate said. “Just meet me back here when you’re ready.”

“I’ll just be a minute.” Roger offered a nod before he hurried from the room.

“Wow, that was a really good cover,” Molly said as he left. “You two are good at this.”

“Practice,” Jack answered with a coy smile.

Cate bobbed her head. “We’ve lied about a lot of leaks in the past.”

“I really bought every one of those stories,” Molly said with a rueful shake of her head.

“Sorry.” Cate wrinkled her nose as she frowned. “Necessary.”

Molly shifted in the bed, shrugging. “I guess. And I’m not mad. And is His Grace really a warlock?”

“Oh, yes,” Cate said with a chuckle and a nod. “He most definitely is a warlock. Jack’s still getting used to that idea. He can tell you all about it while I search the secret passages with your uncle.”

“Speaking of, do you have any idea which one it could be?” Jack asked.

“I keep going over the vision I had, and something tells me it’s the one that leads into the east wing. We’ll start there and hope for the best.”

“I hope you find it soon,” Jack answered.

“Yeah, before our wedding is doomed,” Molly said.

“We’ll find it,” Cate promised. “I’ve...been to the future. Everything was fine.”

Molly stared at her, a confused expression frozen onto her features. “You’ve...seen the future?”

“I have. Everything is fine.” Cate gave her a reassuring smile as Roger reentered the room, his cell phone in his hand. Molly wrinkled her nose at the words, remaining quiet.

“I’m all ready,” he said.

“Good, I was just telling Molly that everything is okay, and I have a good idea of where to look for this locket.”

“Oh, good,” Roger said as he followed Cate from the room.

“Good luck!” Jack called after them.

“All my life, I’ve wanted to explore a castle’s secret passages. And now I’ll get to break a curse, too. I feel like a kid at Christmas.”

Cate grinned at him as they walked down the hall toward the portrait gallery with the secret passage. They turned a corner and found Marcus coming toward them.

“Ah, Catherine, there you are. I’ve come to check on your progress.”

“Hi,” she said as he kissed her cheek. “We’ve made good progress. We have a lead on finding a locket to break the curse.”

“Curse?”

“Ah, there have been some more developments. Turns out Jack is cursed, and if we don’t find the locket before tomorrow, and put it on the woman’s grave who cursed him, this marriage may be in trouble. So, Roger and I are off to search the secret passages.”

Marcus narrowed his eyes at her. “I am not surprised that Reid is cursed.”

Roger wrinkled his nose. “Why?”

Marcus raised his eyebrows. “You have met the man. I should think that answer is obvious. Anyway, carry on, dear, and let me know if there is anything I can do to help.”

“I will. Thanks. We’ll talk later.” Cate squeezed his arm before she and Roger set off down the hall.

“I’m not entirely sure I like him,” Roger murmured.

“He grows on you.”

“Hmm,” Roger said, glancing over his shoulder with a frown. “I don’t know about that.”

“Marcus can surprise you.” Cate offered him a grin as they turned the corner toward the portrait gallery.

“Wow,” Roger said as they entered, “this is some room. And I assume these are all your ancestors?”

“Uh-huh,” Cate said with a nod as she smiled up at the portraits of those who had gone before her. She’d met some of them. Maybe one day she’d get to meet more.

Roger studied several of the paintings as he made his way around the room. “And you say there’s a secret passage in here?”

Cate bobbed her head. “I was curious to see if you could figure out where after you’d looked around.”

Roger spun to study the room, his eyebrows pinching. After a few moments, he poked his finger at a space between two portraits. “Here?”

“Very good,” Cate said. “That’s the opening.”

Roger reached over his shoulder to pat himself on the back. “I’m sure opening it is a little trickier.”

Cate chuckled as she crossed to a piece of gold filagree on the chair rail and used it to trigger the panel opening. “Voila!”

Roger raised his camera to snap a quick picture. “I can’t wait to post these on my social media. A real castle with a real secret passage.”

“And let’s hope a locket that can end a curse.” Cate toggled on her cell phone’s flashlight, motioning for Roger to enter the passage in front of her.

“My fingers are crossed, Cate,” Roger said as he stepped into the blackness.

Cate followed behind him, her stomach churning. She hoped this was the passage from her vision, otherwise they may never find the locket.

CHAPTER 9

The narrow beam of Cate's flashlight danced across the walls, casting long shadows as they crept through the musty passage.

She searched for anything that looked like the locket or a container to hold it. Next to her, Roger studied the walls on his side, his eyebrows pinched tightly.

His voice echoed slightly in the cramped space, his tone tinged with curiosity and a hint of unease. "And where did you say this passage leads?"

"To the east wing," Cate said, "a light blue bedroom."

"Maybe the locket is in the bedroom there," he suggested.

Cate slid her eyes closed for a moment, drawing back her memory of the vision. It was fuzzy, but it did not look like the bedroom, but a secret passage.

The details were so few and far between, though, that she couldn't tell which passage it was or any identifying details.

She snapped her eyes open, disappointed by the lack of clarity in the vision. But then again, almost all visions were like this.

With a quiet sigh, she continued forward, snaking around behind the walls until they arrived at the panel.

Roger's voice fell flat as they reached a dead end, his flashlight flickering over the blank walls. "End of the road," he murmured, disappointment heavy in his sigh. "And nothing to show for it."

"We can take a look around the bedroom, but I distinctly saw...er, read that it was in a secret passage and based on the scant details, I really thought this would be the one.” Cate wrinkled her nose as she released the panel, and they stepped into the bedroom.

Cate smiled at it, knowing it would become Jack and Molly’s daughter’s room years in the future. She’d love the princess-style decorations.

The room remained shrouded in shadows until Cate flipped the switch, flooding the space with warm light that chased away the chill of the secret passage.

“Ah, that’s better for my eyes,” Roger said, toggling off his flashlight. “So, I understand Molly and Jack will be living in this wing.”

“Yes,” Cate said with a smile as she poked around in the few furniture items around the room. “I’m so glad they’ll be staying close.”

“Well, Molly really loves living in the castle, although I can see the appeal. This place is amazing.”

“Aw, thank you,” Cate said with a soft smile. “I love it, too, but I’m biased.”

Roger chuckled, tugging on a scone across the room in an attempt to find another hiding spot. “I’m not biased, and I think it’s fantastic. You’re very lucky this is your home.”

“I agree. And it’s also Molly’s, so you’re welcome anytime.”

“That’s an incredibly generous offer, Cate, thank you. Although...I’m not sure your husband would agree with that statement.”

Cate chuckled, lifting a shoulder into a slight shrug. “Oh, Marcus’s bark is worse than his bite, I promise. I think it’s just that stuffy British thing.”

“Hmm,” Roger answered as he wiggled another scone. “Well, either way, I may just take you up on that offer.”

“Oh, good. Molly would love to have you over, I’m sure. And the castle is big enough that you don’t even have to see Marcus when you’re here.” She grinned at him.

“Good point. He and I may both prefer that.”

“Maybe we’ll plan for Christmas,” Cate answered. “The castle is really lovely with all the decorations, and we have a holiday ball. It’s fun.”

“I may just need to book my ticket the moment I get home.”

“Well, it will give you something to look forward to after your wedding slump.” Cate heaved a sigh as she spread her arms to the side. “Sadly, we’ve found nothing to look forward to in this room.”

“No, but...” Roger’s eyebrows pinched again as he rubbed his chin.

“What is it?” Cate asked.

“Well, I...I don’t want to presume to tell you what to do but—”

“Oh, don’t worry about that,” Cate said with a casual wave. “We’re in crisis mode. Any and all suggestions are welcome before this wedding starts off on the wrong foot.”

Roger bobbed his head, his lips pressed into a thin line. “I don’t generally give in to these types of things, but...I don’t want to see Molly upset on her wedding day.”

“Me either. So, what’s your idea?”

“Well, I thought I saw something in the passage that may look like it could open to another passage or a hiding spot.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat. Could it be? Her vision flashed in her mind again, a smile curling her lips. Maybe Roger had stumbled upon a secret hiding place in her vision. She bobbed her head, toggling on the flashlight again. “Lead me to it.”

“Now, don’t go getting your hopes up,” Roger said, holding a hand in the air. “I may be way off base.”

Cate couldn’t help but smile. “I’m pretty sure your idea is sound. Let’s just hope once we open whatever you’ve found, we find a locket.”

Roger raised his crossed fingers in the air before he toggled on his own flashlight and motioned for Cate to follow him. She hurried behind him to a spot out halfway through the passage.

Roger shined his light on the wall, pointing a finger at a metal clasp. “This caught my eye earlier. It almost looks like a painting hanger, but what would that be doing in a secret passage.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at the object attached to the wall. “Hmm, yes, I wouldn’t expect they hung a painting in here, but you never know.”

“Well, I’m not sure if it will lead to anything or not. It’s not much to go on now that I see it again.”

Cate stepped closer, her fingernail prying at the edge of the metal. “No, I think you make a good point about this being suspicious.”

With a grunt, she tried to dig underneath it, but it remained firmly attached to the wall. She rubbed her finger over the metal clasp. If only she had seen a vision of how to use this to open whatever it opened—assuming it opened anything.

She puckered her lips, her eyebrows pinching. “Any ideas on how to open this?”

Roger lifted his chin, shining his light on it as he leaned closer. "With your permission, I'd like to tug on it to see if it will open anything."

"Go ahead," Cate said with a nod.

Roger hooked his finger around it, pulling it down. Nothing happened. He frowned.

"Well, I really thought that would work. It always does in the movies."

Cate laughed as she shook her head. "Sadly, this isn't the movies, but I do have another idea."

"It's all yours." Roger stepped back to allow her access to the metal hook.

Cate sucked in a deep breath, wrapping her fingers around it and shifting them diagonally. A loud pop resounded in the passage. Her heart skipped a beat as she waved her flashlight around in search of what had made the noise.

"Here!" Roger called from a few steps ahead of her. "Another panel opened."

Cate's heart hammered a frenetic rhythm against her ribs as she hurried down to him, shining her light into the small space revealed with the panel slid aside. "A room."

"Let's hope it holds a locket inside."

She smiled at him, nodding. "After you. It was your find."

"Oh, no," Roger began, but Cate gave her head a vehement shake. "I insist. Go."

His smile beamed off his face at her before he slipped into the room in front of her. He waved his flashlight around the small space. The light glinted off of something in the corner, and Roger rushed toward it.

"There's a small box here," he reported, his fingers trembling as he reached to open it.

Cate peered over his shoulder as the lid swung open.

Roger spun to face her. Her heart lifted as she recognized the moment from her vision.

"Cate," Roger said with a grin, "I think I found it."

She pressed her lips together, hoping this was the moment he lifted a locket into the air. A second later, her flashlight's beam glinted off of a silver chain. She followed it down to a pendant dangling from it. "It looks promising. Let's see if it opens."

“I hope it’s a locket,” Roger answered, his voice shaky as he handed it over to Cate. “I’ll let you do the honors.”

She carefully laid the pendant in her hands and used her thumbnail to press against the delicate clasp. A second later, it popped open. She grinned up at Roger. “It is a locket. The inside is engraved with Elsa’s name. This is the lost locket needed to break the curse. Roger, you did it!”

He beamed at her again. “I’m so glad I could help. Now, what do we need to do to lift this curse?”

“We need to take this to her grave. She was buried in the family cemetery by one of my ancestors when she died on the property. Come on, let’s go finish this and save the wedding.”

Roger bobbed his head, and together they left the secret room behind, returning to the portrait gallery. With the locket in hand, they retrieved Jack and Molly from her bedroom.

“We found it!” Cate exclaimed. “Well, your Uncle Roger did. Now, Jack will need to place it on Elsa’s grave to release the curse.”

“Thank heavens she’s buried close,” Jack answered as they made their way through the halls and out into the sunny day.

Cate led them across the manicured lawn to the family cemetery. They threaded through the tombstones and monuments, searching for Elsa’s grave.

They found a simple tombstone in the corner of the cemetery marked with her name. Jack raised the locket in the air. “Well, I suppose I should say a few words. Maybe something like I’m sorry. I know Jonathan Reid didn’t do right by you, but...”

He snaked an arm around Molly. “I plan to do right by Molly, so... please lift this curse so that we can move forward with our lives together.”

With a lick of his lips, Jack set the locket carefully on the corner of the gravestone.

As he did, mist rose from the ground. The image of a woman formed, her features blurry.

Cate sucked in a sharp breath, wondering if they’d be dealing with an angry ghost.

The image solidified a little more before the ghost reached for the locket. Her wispy, ethereal fingers brushed it, a slight smile forming on her features. “The lost locket.” Her voice, a whisper, made the hairs on the back of Cate’s neck stand up.

The ghost twisted, eyeing Jack and Molly. “Thank you. You are free. The curse is lifted.”

With the locket clutched in her ghostly fingers, she shot skyward, disappearing from their sights.

Cate breathed a sigh of relief, wrapping her arm around Molly’s shoulders. “It’s over.”

Molly wiped a tear from her eye. “And now we can get married in peace.”

CHAPTER 10

Cate stared at her own sparkling blue eyes, made even more prominent by the matching dress color until Molly emerged from behind the screen. In her puffy princess-style wedding dress, she looked like a cake-topper, and very ready to be married at a castle.

“Oh, Molly! You look beautiful!” Cate exclaimed.

“Aww, thank you,” Molly answered with a warm smile as she checked her reflection in the mirror. “And thank you for letting me get married at your castle, and for being my matron of honor.”

“You’re welcome,” Cate answered as Andrea tucked one strand of wayward hair into Molly’s veil. “Are you ready?”

“I think so,” Molly said with a broad smile.

Cate retrieved the bouquets, giving Molly hers before they left the bedroom behind. With Andrea’s help, they led Molly down to the waiting horse-drawn carriage.

After climbing inside, they were whisked away to the chapel across the property.

Music floated on the air from within as they arrived. Cate climbed from the carriage with the help of the attendants.

With Andrea left behind to put the finishing touches on Molly’s ensemble, Cate readied herself to walk down the aisle.

As the doors opened and camera flashes blinded her, she plastered on a nervous smile and walked down the aisle toward Jack and Stanley who waited at the front.

Jack grinned at her as she took her spot to wait for Molly. She offered him a warm smile before her gaze flicked to Marcus. They hadn't had a wedding quite like this, but it didn't matter to her.

She'd found an unexpected happiness after the unbelievable course of events that had brought them together.

The music changed, calling her attention to the doors in the back. Molly appeared in her white dress with Roger leading her down the aisle.

After a short ceremony, the Reids shared their first kiss as a married couple before they proceeded out of the chapel and into the bright sunshine beyond for pictures while the others made their way back to the castle for the reception.

Cate posed for several pictures with the couple before they returned to the castle.

The meal gave way to dancing. Marcus led Cate to the dance floor, pulling her closer to him.

"I would have been just fine sitting," Cate answered.

"I wanted to be otherwise engaged before Mrs. Campbell troubled us about a second wedding," he answered.

She grinned at him. "Good idea."

He glanced around the room. "Do you wish we would have had a real wedding?"

"We did," she said as she swayed with him. "It was in 1810, but we did. Remember?"

He chuckled, his thumb rubbing the back of her hand. "But no one you knew was there."

"And that's perfectly fine. It certainly didn't affect our happiness, did it?"

"It has not affected mine, but if you prefer a lavish soiree...that can be arranged."

"I prefer a quiet life, although, after visiting the future...I don't think we'll have a quiet anything."

He offered her a soft smile. "Does it bother you?"

Cate heaved a sigh, her gaze scanning the crowd. "No. No, it doesn't. We have special abilities to help others. And we should do that."

"Hmm," Marcus murmured. "I wouldn't go that far, but if it makes you happy, dear."

She focused on him, a smile playing on her lips. “Oh, stop. You just like to pretend you’re this mean. You’re really not.”

“Not to you, no. Celine may disagree with you.”

“You are Celine’s ally, and she knows that.”

“Let’s not let those details slip too widely.”

She pressed her lips together, hiding her smile. “Okay. I’ll let everyone think you’re as mean as you like to pretend you are.”

“Very good, dear,” he said with a kiss on her cheek as Jack approached them.

“Hate to interrupt, but I’d love to steal your wife for a dance.”

“Well,” Marcus said as he passed Cate’s hand to Jack, “I suppose I will find yours for one.”

Cate settled into a rhythm with Jack. “Happy?”

“Very. And thanks to you, not cursed.”

She grinned at him. “I’m a full-service employer.”

“And a very interesting one.” He scanned the others in the ballroom. “Did you ever think this is how our lives would have turned out when you came here?”

“I did not,” Cate answered. “I never imagined when I got on that plane with Riley and left my life behind in the US that I’d end up a time-traveling duchess who is married to a warlock.”

Jack screwed up his face. “Really? I would have thought you’d guess that right away.”

Cate playfully smacked his arm with a shake of her head. “Funny.”

“But seriously, you’re happy, right?”

She offered him a warm smile and a nod, her eyes finding Marcus as he danced with Molly. “Very.”

“Good. Because I don’t think our lives are going to ever be normal, Cate.”

Cate clicked her tongue. “Me either. In fact, I’m pretty certain this is as normal as they’re going to get. According to Future Jack...he and I solved a lot of mysteries.”

Jack bobbed his head. “Well, I suppose we’d better settle in for it then. Between the time-traveling and your psychic visions, we have our work cut out for us.”

“I think so,” Cate answered. “And I’m kind of looking forward to it. Bring on the mysteries. I’m ready to solve them.”

"You know," Jack said, "this feels more like a beginning than an end."

"It does," Cate agreed, her mind buzzing with the possibilities of every tomorrow yet to come. "There are so many mysteries left unsolved, so many times we haven't visited."

"And so many wrongs we may right," Jack added, his eyes alight with the thrill of their shared secret.

"Yes, and maybe next time, we won't have to worry about curses," she laughed, but her eyes were serious. "Are you ready for whatever comes next?"

"Always," Jack said, clinking his glass against hers. "Especially if it means more adventures with you, Cate Kensie, time-traveling duchess."

The reception continued until the sun hung low on the horizon. As the newlyweds stepped out into the sunshine, Cate lingered behind, her gaze sweeping over the ancient stones of the castle that had become her home. Each corner held a memory, each shadow a ghost of the past adventures—both thrilling and terrifying. She thought about the first time she'd walked these grounds, naive and unaware of the magic that seeped through its walls. How far she'd come, not just in miles from her old life in the US but in every beat of her heart that had learned to find home in the impossible. "Here's to the future," she whispered to herself, a promise that no matter how unconventional, this castle was where she belonged.

* * *

Look for more Cate Kensie Mysteries coming in 2026! Until then, try another cozy mystery series! Start with Ghosts, Lore & a House by the Shore.

* * *

Claim your five free books now! Join my newsletter!

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Award-winning author Nellie H. Steele writes in as many genres as she reads, ranging from mystery to fantasy and allowing readers to escape reality and enter enchanting worlds filled with unique, lovable characters.

Addicted to books since she could read, Nellie escaped to fictional worlds like the ones created by Carolyn Keene or Victoria Holt long before she decided to put pen to paper and create her own realities.

When she's not spinning a cozy mystery tale, building a new realm in a contemporary fantasy, or writing another action-adventure car chase, you can find her shuffling through her Noah's Ark of rescue animals or enjoying a hot cuppa (that's tea for most Americans.)

Join her Facebook Readers' Group here!

SERIES BY NELLIE H. STEELE

Cate Kensie Mysteries

Shadow Slayers Stories

Lily & Cassie by the Sea Mysteries

Great Maine Mysteries

Pearl Party Mysteries

Middle Age is Murder Cozy Mysteries

Duchess of Blackmoore Mysteries

Shadow Lake Ranch Murders

Maggie Edwards Adventures

Clif & Ri on the Sea Adventures

Shelving Magic

Affair with Hair Cozy Mysteries