MacKenzie Family Tree

CHAPTER 1

The white envelope Dr. Catherine Kensie held in her hand had the power to change her life. She ran her fingers across the smooth surface as her heart skipped a beat. She considered tearing it open to discover if the contents would save her or sink her.

The department secretary's cheery voice interrupted her rumination. "Hey, honey."

She sidled next to Cate and shoved a few pieces of mail into various professors' boxes. Her gaze lowered to the envelope in Cate's hands. "I saw that come in earlier. I was hoping you'd pick it up before you left today."

Cate stared at it again, wondering about the contents. She waved it in the air before stuffing it into the front pocket of her tote bag. She took a step toward the door. "Got it."

"You're not going to open it?" Molly asked, spinning to face her.

"Later. With Riley," she said with a tentative smile. "Right now, I've got to get to my class."

Molly waved her hand in the air. "They'll wait."

Cate chuckled as she spun and backed through the door. "On a Friday afternoon? Doubt it."

"You're right. You'd better get there before they all sneak out. Have a great weekend!"

"You too," Cate called over her shoulder as she darted toward the stairs and descended to the first floor and pushed into the waning warmth of the spring day.

The dark clouds gave way to bright sun and she squinted against it as she fumbled in her bag for her sunglasses and slid them on.

A rogue breeze rustled the newly grown leaves on the trees, splattering the remnants of the rain from them onto the sidewalks below and blowing her long brown hair across her porcelain skin. She whipped it into a makeshift bun, securing it with a hair tie from her wrist.

She shoved her hands into the back pockets of her jeans as she strolled past the neatly manicured lawn and tan buildings surrounding it.

The contents of the envelope peeking from her bag's pocket flitted through her mind followed by the dwindling funds in her bank account. With any luck, it held the answers to all her problems.

She'd find out after her class. Until then, she had a lecture that demanded her attention. She pushed through the doors into the half-empty stadium-style lecture hall and trotted down the stairs.

"Who's ready to learn about Paul Revere?"

Met with less than enthusiastic responses, Cate plowed through her lecture, ending in the fun tidbit that Paul Revere never shouted "The British are coming" during his famous ride. The students remained less than thrilled until she announced they'd stop there. The melee of twenty-somethings shoving notebooks into backpacks and scrambling for the exit drowned out any further announcements.

She sucked in a breath and shook her head as she packed her notes in her bag and left the lecture hall and campus behind for the week.

As she pulled from the parking lot with her muffler rattling, she wondered if she'd soon be leaving the campus behind forever or making Aberdeen her home.

The white envelope poking from the black bag caught her attention. Her heart pounded again and her palms turned sweaty as she considered opening it.

Thunder rumbled overhead, and she tore her eyes away from it, ducking to stare up at the black clouds gathering on the horizon as the next storm pushed into town.

She stomped on the accelerator, speeding down the tree-lined street past the picturesque homes to the nondescript block of a building she called home. "I'd better hurry so I have time to walk Riley."

She slid the car into a parking space, grabbed her bag and hurried into the building past the out-of-order elevator to the stairway to hike to her third-floor apartment.

Her ten-pound teddy bear dog, Riley, met her as she pushed into the apartment. His feather-like tail waved in the air. She dropped her bag and scooped him into her arms, giving him a kiss on the top of his head. “I missed you too, buddy. We’d better hurry, it’s getting pretty dark out there.”

The little dog offered her a lick on the cheek as she retrieved his harness and leash from the hook near the door. She slid his gear on, grabbed her keys, and stepped into the hall.

The angry rumble of thunder overhead quickened her steps down to the tiny patch of grass outside. Wind gusted past her, ripping her hair from the awkward bun and blowing Riley’s floppy ears inside out.

She tugged her blazer around her, shivering against the sudden chill in the air. She hoped the sudden turn in weather wasn’t a harbinger of bad things to come. The letter burning a hole through her bag upstairs snuck into her mind.

She slicked a wayward lock of hair behind her ear and crossed her arms against the cold. “I got a letter from the dean, bud. Hurry up so we can read it.”

Riley glanced at her before he returned to sniffing the grass.

“Come on, Riley, there’s not much more to sniff,” she said as lightning lit the ever-darkening sky and thunder boomed again. Riley let out a grumble as he eyed the clouds before he trotted back to Cate and planted his front feet against her leg.

She lifted him up and carried him to the building. “If we get good news, I’ll buy you a house with a yard, okay?”

The dog’s dark, almond-shaped eyes sparkled up at her as she climbed the stairs again. A deserted hallway met her when she pulled open the metal door to the third floor. Her rumbling stomach pushed her to hurry despite her exhaustion from the day.

The clicking of an unlocking door echoed in the hall and before she could reach her apartment, the door diagonal from her place popped open.

Cate smiled at the gray-haired woman as she passed, hoping to escape a conversation. She couldn’t.

“Katie, oh, Katie, just the person I wanted to run into!” the woman said with a wave of her hand. Her eyes lowered to the dog in Cate’s arms and the fake smile she’d plastered on faded. “Oh, and Wiley.”

“Riley,” Cate corrected, resisting the urge to also correct her on her own name. “How are you, Mrs. Kline?”

“Oh, fine, fine. Better than him.” She poked a finger at Riley. “He barked all day long. I nearly called the police.”

Cate bit her tongue as she offered a silent prayer that she’d soon be able to move. “Sometimes he likes to bark at his toys.”

“Oh, no, dear, no. This isn’t playful barking. He’s upset. Probably frustrated being left alone all day long. You leave so early and get back so late.”

Cate kept the smile glued on her face. “Unfortunately, I don’t have much say over my schedule.”

Mrs. Kline wagged a finger at her. “Oh, now, I’m very good friends with Dr. Longmire, and he never had a schedule like yours.”

“Well, he was a tenured professor, so he had his selection of courses.”

“Oh, that’s right,” the woman answered with a dismissive wave of her hand, “I always forget that you’re not a real professor.”

Cate huffed out a laugh as her irritation built. “Not tenured.”

“Or tenure-tracked,” Mrs. Kline added with a derisive smile.

“That’s right.” Cate’s mind flitted to the letter in her bag. Not yet, anyway. “Well, I’d better be going.”

Mrs. Kline clamped a hand onto Cate’s arm. “Oh, before you go, dear...”

Cate held back a sigh.

Mrs. Kline pressed her lips together in a polite smile. “I was wondering if I could trouble you for twenty dollars. It’s just until my daughter can get to the ATM for me. I’ve run out of cash. I’ll get it back to you just as soon as she can replenish my slush fund.”

“Ah,” Cate murmured as she considered it, “I’m not...” She flicked her gaze to the woman’s face. She’d never see the money again if she gave it to her. But the woman’s daughter rarely visited her.

Cate pressed her lips together in a thin line before she nodded. “I’m not carrying cash on me, but if you’ll give me a second, I’ll grab my purse.”

She tugged her arm from the woman’s grip and stepped toward her apartment. Mrs. Kline followed her across the hall, lingering at the door as Cate unlocked it and stepped inside.

She rummaged through her bag for her wallet and pulled it open, studying the few bills inside. She grabbed two out and passed them over to the woman.

“Here you go, Mrs. Kline. Why don’t you take forty dollars just in case your daughter doesn’t come by soon?”

“Oh, oh no, dear. I wouldn’t want to short you, but... well, I mean if you are offering.” She pulled both bills from Cate’s hand, then added, “You know I’m good for it.”

“Of course, I know you are.”

“Well, I’d better let you go. Have a good night.” Mrs. Kline disappeared into her apartment before Cate could answer.

Cate swung the door shut and flicked the lock. As she stooped to return her wallet to her bag, she spotted the envelope. Her heart skipped a beat again. Maybe soon she could escape her tiny apartment and settle into a real home.

Home. She frowned, wondering if anywhere would feel like home again. The vision of two headstones stormed across her mind. She worked to shove it away, replacing it with the image of a cute cottage with a white picket fence surrounding a spacious yard.

Riley’s cold, wet nose nudging her cheek pulled her from her daydream. “You’re right. We’ll read this after we eat.”

Cate dropped the envelope onto the entry table and stepped into her kitchen. After settling a bowl of kibble in front of her tiny pal, she pulled open the refrigerator door. Her lips puckered as she stared at the almost empty wire racks inside.

She straightened and pushed the door closed. “I should have gone to the store. Although, my bank account disagrees.”

Rising to her tiptoes, she grabbed a bowl from the cupboard and fished a box of cereal from her corner cupboard. After adding a splash of milk, she settled at the table with her meager meal.

Riley planted his feet against her leg as she chased the last few marshmallows around with her spoon.

She traced the white strip of fur stretching from his nose to the top of his head. “Okay, buddy, let’s find out if we’re moving or not.”

After washing the bowl, she forced herself to grab the letter and settle on the couch with Riley next to her. Her pulse quickened as she stared at the simple, white envelope. Her stomach leapt into her throat. Until she opened it, her fate remained a mystery. Hope remained. Once she read the words, though, the outcome was fixed.

She had to know. With a deep inhale, she flipped the envelope over and slid her finger under the flap until it popped open. Her hands shook as she pulled the letter out, unfolded it, and scanned it.

Her shoulders slumped, as did her heart, as she spotted the words “unfortunately,” “sorry,” and “regret.” She let the letter fall onto the coffee table as she sank her head into her hands. After a moment, she retrieved the letter and gave it a thorough read.

Dr. Kensie,

The dean’s office has received your request to change your current position of instructor to a tenure-tracked position along with the positive result of the department vote to retain you as permanent faculty. Unfortunately, we regret to inform you that this is not possible at this time.

We are sorry that we cannot accommodate your request and acknowledge and appreciate your work for Aberdeen College. We encourage you to continue your hard work and apply at a later date.

It was signed by the dean of the college—or rather, as she took a closer look, the signature had been stamped by her secretary.

Cate exhaled again, tears welling in her eyes. She tossed the letter down on the coffee table and reached over to stroke Riley’s fur. He gazed at her quizzically with dark eyes.

“Sorry, buddy. No house just yet.”

She fell backward into the flat couch cushions with a disgusted sigh and rubbed at the ache building in her temples. If her temporary contract wasn’t renewed soon, she’d need to find another way to earn money and fast. Despite what her department chair told her, obviously a tenure-track position was not in the cards for her at Aberdeen. She hoped at least a few summer courses were or she’d soon not have an apartment in which she could escape from the world.

Needing a distraction, she flipped on the television, settling on reruns of a sitcom.

She absentmindedly stroked the fur down Riley’s back. It soothed her as much as it soothed him. “We’ll figure something out, Riley.”

Her tired eyes started to close after a few episodes. She snapped her head up and glanced at the clock. "Close enough to bedtime for me. Let's call it a night, Riley."

The little dog roused next to her, stretching his chin up before he kicked his back legs out and opened his mouth in a wide yawn.

"Tired, buddy? Me too. And a little depressed. Maybe the fresh air will help. Come on, one last walk before bed."

Riley followed her to the front door where she slid on his harness before pulling the door open. A tall man loomed in the hall, his shadow darkening her doorstep.

Cate bounced back a step, stifling a scream.

CHAPTER 2

Riley issued a sharp bark at the stranger as Cate stumbled back a step. Her heart hammered against her ribs and her pulse raced.

She sucked in a steadying breath, swallowed hard, and forced out an apology after hushing Riley. “Oh my gosh. I’m so sorry, I didn’t see you there!”

“Not a problem.” The tall man’s posture straightened, if that was possible, and he lifted his chin, his thin lips forming a frown that didn’t match the words coming from his mouth. He stared down his aquiline nose at Cate and Riley as he smoothed out his well-tailored, black suit. “Dr. Catherine Kensie, I presume?”

Cate’s brow furrowed as she noted his British accent, and she nodded at his question. “Yeah, I’m Cate, eh, Catherine. Yes, I’m Dr. Kensie.” She scooped Riley from the floor where he continued to bark, shushing him again.

The wrinkles around the man’s mouth deepened as he studied the small pup, waiting for him to cease his yipping before he spoke. “Please allow me to introduce myself. My name is William H. Smythe, Esquire. I am an attorney with Smythe, Smith, and Smithton, LLC in London. As I stated in the letter I sent announcing my arrival, I represent the estate of Lady Gertrude MacKenzie.” He removed a business card from a well-polished silver card holder he’d dug from his pocket and passed it to Cate.

She accepted the proffered card, giving it a cursory glance as her mind attempted to piece together the situation.

“London? You’re a little far from home, aren’t you?” She chuckled, grinning at him. Her smile quickly faded as the expression on his face never changed. She licked her lips before continuing. “I’m sorry to say, I never received a letter from you.”

That statement garnered a reaction, albeit slight. The man’s eyebrows flicked upward before settling to their normal position, and his jaw clenched ever so slightly.

“My apologies if you did not receive the letter. We sent it to your business address as your personal address took a bit longer to track down. But since Lady MacKenzie insisted the matter be dealt with in a timely fashion, I took every step possible to contact you.

“I apologize for the lateness of the hour, but my flight was delayed. Given my plans to depart early tomorrow morning, I had little choice but to come to your residence.”

Cate stared blankly at the man, still unable to fathom the purpose of his visit. He returned her gaze, adding more when she failed to answer him. “As I said, I am here representing the estate of Lady Gertrude MacKenzie. May I come in to speak with you about the details in a more private setting?” He motioned to the interior of the apartment as his eyes darted around the hall.

Cate scratched her head and glanced at his card again, still clutching it in the hand that held Riley. “I’m really sorry, Mr. Smythe, but I don’t know anyone named Gertrude MacKenzie—or anyone from London, for that matter. I can’t imagine what this has to do with me.”

Riley offered another protective growl, baring his tiny teeth at the man.

“Actually, Lady MacKenzie was from Scotland. I am from London. As I’ve already stated, Dr. Kensie, this concerns Lady MacKenzie’s last will and testament. I would prefer to discuss any additional details in private.” He offered another suspicious stare around the hallway.

Down the hall, a door clicked closed quietly. Cate shot a glance toward Mrs. Kline’s apartment, recalling her “chance” encounter with the woman earlier. She narrowed her eyes at the door, imagining the woman with a glass pressed against the wood.

“Oh, umm, sure, though I don’t know of any Lady MacKenzie’s from Scotland, either. I’m still not certain what this has to do with me. Oh, or did you have a history-related question? I’ve done some consulting in the past and am happy to help with that, if that's the nature of your question." Cate slicked a lock of hair behind her ear as she babbled nervously.

The man tapped his foot impatiently on the tattered hall rug. "Dr. Kensie, please, if you wouldn't mind, I would prefer that we discuss the business in private." He motioned again into the apartment as he glanced around the hallway.

Cate shook her head, tucking another strand of hair behind her ear and stepped aside from the door. "Oh right, yes, come in, please. Sorry, I didn't mean to keep you waiting in the hall."

She waved him inside before glancing into the hallway as she shut her door to any prying eyes. She expected Mrs. Kline would now create a fantastic tale about why Cate invited a strange man into her apartment on a Friday evening. Riley gave another protective growl as the man crossed the threshold, and Cate shushed him again.

She tilted her head toward the living room to their right. "We can head in here."

She led him into the cramped space, motioning to the couch and armchair. "Please make yourself comfortable."

Mr. Smythe lowered himself onto the worn cushion, teetering on the edge as though he hated to touch it.

Cate sank into the adjacent armchair and placed Riley on her lap. "Can you tell me what this is about now, Mr. Smythe?"

He removed several folders and a small plastic bag from his well-polished briefcase and set them on the marred coffee table.

"As I said earlier, my firm and I represent the interests of Lady Gertrude MacKenzie of Dunhaven, Scotland. Specifically, I am the executor of the late Lady MacKenzie's will."

"Yes, you mentioned that, and I still have no context for your visit. I'm not acquainted with anyone by that name. Unless you'd like a consult, I have no idea why you are here."

Mr. Smythe shuffled through the folders, tugging one from the pile. "Immediately following the death of Lady MacKenzie, I was to track down her closest living relative in order to execute the instructions within her last will and testament."

Cate's eyes darted around the room in search of more information. "O-Okay."

The man fluttered his eyelashes as though annoyed with her. “You are Lady MacKenzie’s closest living relative and, therefore, her heir.”

An amused grin crossed Cate’s lips, and she sputtered a chuckle. “What? You must be joking. No, I think you may have made a mistake. I don’t... I don’t think I have any relatives, or at least none in Scotland.”

Cate’s mind whirled at the so-called revelation. It couldn’t be real.

Mr. Smythe’s face settled into his perpetual scowl. “I’m quite certain no mistake has been made, Dr. Kensie. We will, of course, verify your identity with a DNA sample, but I am confident that will be a mere formality.

“Subject to the DNA verification, you will inherit the bulk of Lady MacKenzie’s estate, which includes her title, Dunhaven Castle, the grounds on which it resides, its contents, a sizable sum of money to maintain the estate, and one gold timepiece. One of the stipulations of the inheritance is that you must live at the estate on a permanent basis, and it is not to be sold.”

Cate’s lower lip bobbed up and down, but no sound emerged. She tried to make sense of it, but her head spun. This must be a mistake. She had no aunts or uncles, cousins, or grandparents. She didn’t have any relatives, and certainly none in Scotland.

“Uh, um, uh,” she stammered. “Castle? Is this a joke? Am I on camera?” She glanced around the room, half expecting to see someone filming this for a reality television show.

“I can assure you this is no joke,” Mr. Smythe replied, his face straight.

Cate eyed him. He didn’t look like he was joking. In fact, the man didn’t seem capable of humor.

She swallowed hard, trying to collect her thoughts. “O-okay, so, this Lady MacKenzie. She was a relative—my relative—and she left me everything she owns?”

“Outside of a few odds and ends, yes. She was a distant relative, an only child, and she never married nor had any children. You were identified as her closest living relative, to whom the bulk of the estate along with her title was left—pending a DNA verification, as I’ve already said.

“The details,” he continued matter-of-factly, “are all here in this folder, along with information about the estate and pictures for you to review.”

He flicked open the folder and produced a few photographs. “As you can see, the property is in excellent condition and has been quite well maintained.”

He shuffled through to grab another piece of paper. “Additionally, the current estimated sum is large enough to continue to maintain the estate with ease for several generations.” He pointed discreetly to a large number marked near the bottom of the page.

Cate’s eyes widened and her chin dropped to her chest.

“Is that dollars?” she said, shock lacing her voice. The number of zeroes on the estimated amount seemed sufficient to support more than a few generations in Cate’s estimation.

“No,” he said stiffly. “It’s in pounds.”

Cate winced at her own stupidity and she slid her eyes closed as her cheeks blazed with embarrassment. “Oh, right.”

Mr. Smythe rambled on with more details. “Along with the property, you’ll inherit the title carried with the estate, Countess of Dunhavenshire. And, lastly, the gold timepiece, which can only be imparted to you directly from me once your DNA has been verified. If you wouldn’t mind, I would like to collect the sample and leave you to enjoy the remainder of your evening.”

He fished a sealed cotton swab from within the plastic bag.

Cate’s forehead crinkled again, and she waved her hand in the air to stop him. “Wait, wait, wait just a second. How do I know you are legitimate and not going to use my DNA for, well, something else?”

He set his jaw, his eyebrows raising at her in an unimpressed stare. “I’m not in the habit of collecting DNA samples from nearly unemployed history professors.”

“How did you—” she began before being cut off by Mr. Smythe.

He motioned to the letter on the table. “The letter. My apologies your request didn’t work out the way you hoped, but if you wouldn’t mind, I would like to finish my job and retire for the evening.”

Thoughts spilled directly from Cate’s brain to her lips, coming out in a jumble. “Oh, sorry. I don’t mean to make this harder than it needs to be, but I just don’t... I can’t... Well, to be quite honest, Mr. Smythe, I’m in shock. I’ve never even heard of Dunhaven. No one has ever mentioned relatives in Scotland, certainly not relatives with a castle. I’m stunned that this woman left her entire estate to me.”

“While I can understand your surprise,” he said, sounding as though he’d never been surprised in his life, “I can assure you my only intention is to execute the last will and testament as specified by Lady MacKenzie. That execution has led me to you after a lead from Lady MacKenzie herself and an extensive investigation into the MacKenzie lineage. Of course, a DNA test will confirm easily that which we already believe to be true. If you will allow me to collect the sample, I can be on my way.”

Cate pursed her lips as she parsed through his statement. A lead from Lady MacKenzie herself? How did the woman know about Cate’s existence when Cate had never known of hers? She flicked her gaze up, meeting the impatient stare of Mr. Smythe.

“Oh, right, sure, yes, of course. Gee, you must be working overtime on triple rate to collect this on a Friday night as it is.” She offered a nervous chuckle, hoping the humor eased the tension.

He ignored it again, tearing open the package containing the swab, handing it to her, and instructing her to swab the inside of her cheek. Cate handed it back, and he deposited it into a plastic vial before slipping the vial into the plastic bag. He stowed it in his briefcase and snapped it shut.

“So, I can’t get the watch of all things before my DNA is verified. That’s funny.” She chuckled at her own joke.

He gave her a stern look. “It was quite an important item to Lady MacKenzie and comes with careful stipulations to be given only to her closest living relative. So, no, you cannot.”

She pinched her lips together. This guy really had no sense of humor at all. “Of course, sorry,” she answered, feeling heat rising in her cheeks again.

She rose to her feet as he stood, setting Riley on the chair behind her.

“The DNA results should be returned within two weeks. Once verified, I will contact you again to discuss the details and finalize paperwork. Should you need to contact me, I am staying at the Marriott in Rosemont tonight and will be back in the office on Monday. You have my card with all my numbers and my email.” He thrust out his hand.

She slid her hand around his, shaking it slowly. “Okay, well, thank you, I think. And you’ll let me know either way?”

“Yes, good day.”

“Right, good day—or night, or whatever.”

She walked him to the door and closed it behind him. In a daze, she returned to the living room and sank onto the couch. Riley stared at her, cocking his head with curiosity from his perch on the armchair.

She blew out a long breath as she stared at the splay of folders still on her coffee table. “Riley, what in the world is this about? How could we possibly be inheriting a castle? It looks like we may have a bit of a mystery on our hands.”

The image of the sprawling gothic castle stared back at her from the top of the stack in the manila folder. Cate shuffled through the papers a second time, still unable to solve the mystery of her late night visitor.

She didn't have leads. With no family to contact, tracking down information about relatives would prove difficult.

A small body moved next to her, stretching and climbing onto her shoulder to lick her cheek as she lay on her side.

"Good morning, buddy," she said with a chuckle, flicking the folder closed before she ruffled the fur on his head and kissed him.

With a yawn and a stretch, Cate rose from her bed as the sun glinted through the window.

As she tugged on her clothes after her morning shower, the conversation from the previous evening snaked through her mind.

After pulling her still damp hair into a bun, she stepped into her small closet. Light burst in the square space as she pulled the chain dangling from the bare bulb.

Cate stared at the shelf above her, shoving shoe boxes aside until a plain cardboard box appeared. She teetered on her tiptoes, inching it toward her until it nearly toppled off the shelf.

She held it at bay, but a few items toppled over to the floor. With her fingers stretched to the max and her muscles straining, she pulled the box down and set it on the floor next to the wayward contents.

She stared down at one of them, tears welling in her eyes. The grief hit her like a brick as she stared at the three smiling faces in the picture. Unwanted visions flickered in her mind, and she dropped to her knees as sadness swept through her.

A tear spilled to her cheek, and she flicked it away before it marred the photo she retrieved from the floor.

Riley wandered into the small space and climbed up to offer her a lick on the cheek. Cate shoved the emotions aside as she dumped the photo back into the box along with the other two items that had toppled to the floor.

"I'm ready to go to the park, too, buddy." She hefted the box into her arms and dumped it in the living room before she grabbed Riley's leash and harness and his favorite blue ball. With the small pup in her arms, she headed down to her car and aimed for the park by the pond.

Cate pulled into a space in the parking lot, glancing at the fiery ball rising higher into the sky. The bright sun, not obscured by clouds, promised to provide pleasant weather for this visit.

Riley leapt to the window, his tail waving back and forth as he spotted the familiar sight.

"Excited for another Saturday at the park, buddy?" Cate asked as she slipped off her seat belt.

Riley's dark almond-shaped eyes darted around, eyeing people, birds, and other dogs, and a small whine rose from his throat.

Cate scooped him up and slid from behind the wheel, carrying him to the gravel pathway leading to the large pond in the center of the park and setting him down.

With his nose glued to the ground, Riley led her down the path at a steady clip. Cate smiled down at the small dog's enthusiasm for exploring before she flicked her eyes to the scenery around her.

In the distance, the picturesque campus of Aberdeen College rose tall on the hill, augmenting the beauty of the pond and its landscaping. Today, though, it brought Cate consternation as she studied the neoclassical buildings.

The letter she received yesterday danced across her mind, and she flicked her gaze away from the campus. Her thoughts turned to the box she'd fished from the top of her closet this morning. It dampened her mood even more.

Riley's tiny feet on her leg interrupted her thoughts. He stared up at her expectantly. Despite the tears in her eyes, her lips curled into an amused grin. "Yes, I brought it."

She pulled the small blue ball from her pocket and waved it in the air. Riley danced on his hind legs, daring her to throw it.

"Ready?"

Riley responded with a small yip, and she tossed the ball into the distance. The dog bounded after it as Cate sniffled and tried to force the terrible memory of her parents' death from her mind.

As he dropped the ball at her feet and nudged it toward her, a tear escaped from the corner of her eye. She licked her lips and retrieved the ball before giving it another toss.

Memories of the phone call that had interrupted her sleep shoved into her consciousness, the shrill jangling cutting into a pleasant dream about her first day as an adjunct professor at Aberdeen College.

She'd groggily answered it, struggling to force herself awake as an unfamiliar female voice asked for Catherine Kensie.

"I'm Cate," she'd answered, her brow furrowing as she clutched at her covers. Her heart had dropped as the woman explained her affiliation with a local hospital. Her parents had been involved in a car accident. Another vehicle had smashed into theirs. It was bad. She should come right away.

She'd hastily dressed and driven to the hospital where she'd sat alone in the waiting room, wringing her hands until they were red and raw. The doctor, still in his surgical scrubs, pressed his lips together in a thin line as he sank into the chair across from her. He didn't need to speak, she'd known in an instant.

What she hadn't expected was to lose them both at the same time. Neither had made it through the life-saving surgeries they'd attempted. Both had died on the table, despite the doctors' best efforts.

She barely recalled most of the whirlwind of events that followed when she'd buried them both. She only remembered she'd hated Aberdeen from that moment forward.

Her gaze floated up to buildings of Aberdeen College rising across the pond. And now she had another reason to dislike it.

Her mind returned to the negative news she'd received yesterday as Riley collapsed in a heap at her feet. Cate settled onto the lawn next to him, giving his head a pat.

The small dog settled his chin on his front paws with a big sigh.

"That's how I feel, too," she said. "I wonder if I'll inherit that castle. If not, I don't know how much longer I can pay the bills here."

Riley glanced up at her, rolling onto his back so she could scratch his belly.

"Although, I'm sure they'll give me at least one class. Right?"

Her chirping phone pulled her attention from her rumination. She tugged it from the pocket of her leggings and toggled on the display.

A new message from her department chair, Dr. Jeffrey Goldstone, awaited her. Hey Cate. We need to talk. It's not good.

Cate's heart sank at the words. Maybe he was only referring to her tenure-track denial, but she had a bad feeling the news was worse.

Her thumbs hovered over the virtual keyboard before she switched off the display and shoved the phone in her pocket, deciding to answer the message later. With her mood soured, she climbed to her feet and snapped the leash onto Riley's harness.

"Come on, buddy, let's finish our walk."

They completed their loop around the pond and stopped at a roadside stand for lunch. She lingered at the shaded picnic table while Riley polished off his doggie ice cream, avoiding any obligations.

As much as she wanted to know about any connection to Dunhaven Castle, she did not want to paw through her parents' things. Nor did she want to deal with Jeff.

But she had to, she surmised as she wiped her fingers on the thin paper napkin and shoved it into her nacho tray. After collecting the trash and tossing it, she gathered Riley and returned to her car for the short trip home.

With a tuckered out Riley nestled in his favorite blanket on the couch, Cate settled in next to him. She stared at the text message from Jeff as she typed and erased a dozen different messages, finally settling on: Sure thing. Did you need to speak with me right away? I'm available anytime this evening or tomorrow.

She set the phone aside and pulled the box on the table closer. Did her parents know about Dunhaven Castle?

If she was truly related to someone who owned a castle, why had it never been mentioned? Perhaps it would have been had they lived longer. She dug into the box, checking her mother's jewelry box and her father's wallet. No links to Scotland or Scottish relatives were present in either.

She tugged a thick photo album from the bottom and slouched further down on the couch cushions to page through it. She scoured the images for people she couldn't identify or foreign locations. Nothing gave her any insight. Perhaps there was nothing to find, and the entire incident had been a mistake.

She tossed the items back into the cardboard container and returned it to its position on her shelf.

As she settled on the couch with a bowl of cereal, the indicator light on her phone blinked. She grabbed it, balancing the bowl on one knee as she swiped the phone open. A message from Jeff awaited her: Nah, it can wait 'til Monday, kiddo. Enjoy your weekend!

Annoyance crept through her and she tossed the phone unceremoniously onto the couch beside her before returning to her now-soggy cereal. Had he only intended to ruin her weekend? Or was the news worse than he was willing to share via text?

She hemmed and hawed for another five minutes over a response before she finally sent a message back: Okay, see you Monday. Can you give me a hint at least?

She pulled her laptop onto her lap, intent on searching for jobs as her mind filled in the blanks about Jeff's message. Budget cuts, declining enrollment, not enough classes, or some new excuse would be used for why she wasn't getting another contract.

The reason didn't matter, though, only that she'd be out of a job. And she'd have to figure out what to do about that sooner rather than later.

When her alarm screamed through the still-dark morning on Monday, she met the day with little enthusiasm. The morning rain shower didn't help her mood. She slogged through her early morning lecture on the Elizabethan era before heading to her office. A quick check of the still-empty department office confirmed that Jeff wasn't in yet for the day.

She climbed up the stairs and pushed into her small office. After plopping into the uncomfortable desk chair, she tapped at her mouse to awaken the desktop. With a glance at the reports from her U.S. History course, she turned her attention to the bright screen and clicked in the browser's search bar.

She typed "Dunhaven Castle" and sent the web crawler off on its mission. The results page populated, and she clicked on the first result. A quick scan of the few paragraphs gave her little more information than she already possessed. The castle sat on the hill overlooking the small Highlands town of Dunhaven. Built in the late 1700s, it dominated the town's landscape ever since, remaining the largest estate in the county.

Cate stared at the now familiar picture of the estate for a moment, imagining herself roaming the halls. Could she live there? Would she move if she turned out to be the heir?

She glanced around the tiny office at the crammed bookshelves and the overflowing file cabinet, recalling the three times she'd applied to be a permanent member of the department. She'd been denied every time despite being an active faculty member.

She flicked her gaze back to the image on her screen. Maybe a move would be worth it.

She clicked back to the search results and scrolled through the page. She stopped, the pointer hovering over another result as her brow furrowed. She leaned closer to the screen before she clicked on the link.

Her browser redirected her to the sales page for a book entitled The Mysteries of Scotland: Hauntings and Specters.

She clicked to scan the table of contents. Her heart skipped a beat as she spotted the fifth entry. Dunhaven Castle.

Was the castle she may inherit haunted?

Cate scrolled through the book's preview, finding it cut off halfway through an entry about Blackmoore Castle. She wrinkled her nose as she opened a new tab and started to type another search.

A knock at her door interrupted her. She continued to type as she shouted, "Come in!"

"Got a minute?" a voice asked in a slow, southern drawl.

Heat prickled through her as she recognized Jeff's voice. Her mind snapped to the ominous weekend text message. She glanced over to find him leaning against the doorjamb in his rumpled tan suit. His dark brown eyes bore into her.

"Jeff, oh, yeah, sure, I was just entering some grades. Come on in. I didn't know you were in the office yet, or I'd have come down."

He strolled into the office, his hands shoved into his pants pockets and took a seat across from her desk. "No problem, I could use the exercise. How have you been?"

Cate minimized her search bar before she set her clasped hands on the desk. "A little on edge after your message Saturday and my letter Friday."

“Sorry if I alarmed you. Administration isn’t being very cooperative about getting you on the schedule for summer.”

Cate sucked in a breath and nodded her head. “That’s what I thought.”

“Here’s the thing, I don’t have a definite answer on anything yet. But as of right now, I don’t have you on the schedule either. I feel like I have to tell you that since we’re two weeks away from the summer semester starting.”

“Thanks, Jeff, I appreciate the heads up. Are there any classes that aren’t covered so far?”

“Oh, yeah, we have a few. They’re still making final decisions.”

Hope rose in Cate’s heart. Perhaps they’d at least have one or two to tide her over during the summer. No word on the fall semester yet, but she’d cross that bridge later.

Jeff set his ankle on his knee, wiggling his foot in the air. “Hey, I have a question for you.”

Cate flicked her gaze up to him, sliding her tightly clasped hands under the desk. “Sure.”

“We have an event coming up Saturday after next, and I need someone to cover it. There is nobody better than you, Cate. You’re a great representative for the department. You up for it?”

Cate’s forehead crinkled as she considered the request. Was there no one better than her, or hadn’t anyone else volunteered? The department considered her a great representative, yet they couldn’t offer her classes to teach or a permanent position.

Indignation bubbled in her as she wondered who would cover these events if she no longer worked there. Her dwindling bank account stopped her from declining on principle alone.

She forced a smile on her face and said, “Let me look at my calendar and get back to you.”

Jeff toyed with the tassel on his shoe, flicking his eyebrows up. “Sure. Just let me know. Like I said, we’d love to have you represent us. And I know it would go a long way in administration’s eyes with those final negotiations I’m making.”

Cate bit in the inside of her lower lip as she forced her expression to remain neutral. Would it really? She’d covered three of these earlier this semester, and they didn’t make a difference when it came to her recent tenure-track position denial.

Cate's eyebrows danced up and down for a moment as she sighed, struggling to keep her composure. "Will it? I assume you saw the letter from the dean about my tenure-tracked position request?"

"Yeah, I saw that. Tough break, kiddo. I was behind you all the way. I don't know what they were thinking. Anyway, I hope to get you something in the summer and then the fall, and you can put your request in again."

"Yeah, thanks, Jeff. I appreciate that."

He offered her a smarmy smile as he rose from the chair, flattening his tie against his tan shirt. "Hey, no problem. Let me know about this Saturday as soon as you can, okay?" He rapped his knuckles on her door jamb before he disappeared down the hall.

The polite smile faded from Cate's features, replaced by a frown. She gritted her teeth as she rose and stalked to her door, slamming it shut. She let her head fall back against it and balled her hands into fists.

She slogged back to her desk and slumped into the chair. Frustration filled her as she drummed her fingers against her thigh, pondering what to do about Jeff's most recent request.

A chime drew her attention back to her computer. She stared at the red notification indicating a new email before she clicked to open it.

Her heart sank as she read the message, welcoming a new faculty member to the campus. The message extolled the virtues of long-time adjunct, Dr. Mark Pendleton, lauding him for his contributions of teaching two courses per semester for two years and hosting a "meet the mummy" night in which he screened the movie, The Mummy, for undergraduates following a lecture about the film. While he remained unpublished in his field, the administration was enthusiastic that he'd publish his first scholarly article while serving at Aberdeen College.

The final line noted he joined an "already full-staffed department," but that administration would be announcing newly created classes to fill his schedule.

Cate's features settled into an unimpressed stare as she realized she'd been passed over for another faculty member with less experience in a department with less need for faculty. Her denial had nothing to do with budget cuts.

She pounded a fist onto the desk, arriving in an instant at her decision not to participate in Saturday's event. The stubborn decision may mean she'd lose her job, but she didn't care.

She opened an email, intent on sending her decision to Jeff. She pounded against the keyboard before she held down the delete key and rephrased the email. After multiple attempts, she gave up and closed the window.

Though she avoided him for the rest of the week, her irritation failed to dissipate. As she drummed her fingers against her desk the following Monday, staring once again at an empty email shell, her phone rang. She eyed the unknown number before she swiped to accept the call.

“Hello?”

“Dr. Kensie,” a voice answered her in a crisp British accent. “This is William Smythe. We spoke ten days ago regarding the estate of the late Lady Gertrude MacKenzie.”

Cate’s stomach flip-flopped. How could she forget the odd meeting? Was this phone call about to make her employment woes a thing of the past and change her entire life?

Cate gripped the phone tighter. “Mr. Smythe. Yes, I remember.”

“The results of the DNA test are available and have been confirmed by a second party. I am back in the States. Would it be possible to meet for lunch today? I can come to you.”

Caught up in the tension of her employment situation, she’d almost forgotten the other mystery. The request dumbfounded her for a moment. “Uh, sure. Today around noon is fine. I’m at work at Aberdeen College. We can meet in the Terrier Café’s faculty lounge. It should be quiet there, and we’ll be able to talk.”

“Perfect, I will see you at noon, Dr. Kensie.”

“Great. I’ll see you then. And, oh, please, call me Cate.”

“Goodbye, Cate.” The phone clicked.

Cate ended the call and set her cell phone down on the desk as she stared blankly at it. The DNA results were in and confirmed. She assumed they confirmed that she was the heir to the MacKenzie estate. But how could that be? It made little sense.

But maybe it was the break she needed. But why was this never mentioned within the family? Did her parents not know?

It didn’t seem real. If it was, what was she going to do? The reference to the castle being haunted rattled in her mind.

She distractedly pushed through grading a few papers before she decided she could wait no longer. Her impatience drove her early to the buffet-style cafeteria, where she paid for two meals and asked the clerk to send her guest to the faculty lounge.

She pushed into the empty space with her salad in hand and selected a table in the back corner. She picked through the leafy greens for a few moments before the doors to the area swung open.

William Smythe stood, dressed in another crisp black suit, looking out of place against a backdrop of sweatpants-clad students. His impeccably polished briefcase dangled from his slim fingers as he scanned the room, catching sight of Cate at the back. Cate waved, as though he might not see her.

He strode across the room, taking the seat across from her.

“Dr. Kensie—” he began as he settled into his chair.

“Cate, please,” Cate interrupted him. “You can help yourself to some lunch, the food here is rather good.”

“Thank you,” he said, glancing over his shoulder at the doors leading to the cafeteria. “Perhaps I’ll make a salad, if you don’t mind my doing so before we conduct our business.”

“No, not at all. Please help yourself.” Cate raised an eyebrow as he pushed through the doors into the din of the eatery, reflecting on his formal behavior. He returned a few moments later, unfurled his napkin across his lap, and took a bite of food before setting his fork down.

“Let’s get down to business,” he said flatly. “As I mentioned during our phone conversation, we have confirmed your identity through two separate DNA tests. You are the heir to the MacKenzie estate, as I expected.”

Cate straightened in her seat, still struggling to believe the news. “Mr. Smythe, I have to tell you I’m really surprised by this. No one told me anything about any Scottish relatives before.”

“I can assure you, whether or not you heard about it before, you are Lady Gertrude MacKenzie’s closest living relative and her rightful heir. As you may imagine, there are stacks of paperwork to complete. My firm will handle everything. I assume you’ll need some time to get your affairs stateside in order. Do you have an estimate on when you expect you’ll be able to move? I assume you have a valid passport, and my firm will complete any paperwork needed for you to live in Scotland.”

Cate blinked hard, her eyes widening as she considered the answer to his question. Butterflies wriggled in her stomach as she considered the huge prospect of moving to another country.

Across the table, the man stared at her, waiting for her reply as he poked at his food.

“Um,” Cate mumbled. “Y-yes, I have all of that. I just—I hadn’t considered moving. I’ll need some time to work out the details.”

The man’s features softened. “Please take all the time you need. Though I would like to confirm that you will take up residence at Dunhaven Castle as required by the terms of the will.”

The odd condition niggled at her, but she blurted out, “Of course.”

“Excellent. I would like to begin the paperwork on my end, if you wouldn’t mind signing the forms I have for you today.”

“Sure, absolutely. I’ll need a day or so to get my plans in order regarding the move.”

“Of course, Cate. I plan on traveling back to London this evening, but you have my contact information and my assistant will be reaching out to you. Please let us know when you have an idea so we can prepare for your arrival.”

They finished their salads while discussing a few minor details about the will before Mr. Smythe collected her signature on a number of documents.

“Did the test indicate how we are related?” Cate asked as he squared the papers and placed them into a folder before sliding it into his briefcase.

“Distant cousins. The specific details aren’t at my disposal at the moment, but rest assured Lady MacKenzie’s information about your relationship proved correct.”

So, Lady MacKenzie had known about her existence.

“Well,” he continued as he rose, “that will conclude our business for today. My assistant, Gayle, will be contacting you if she hasn’t already and she can assist with arranging details once you have dates in mind.”

“Thank you. I hope to have them for her soon.”

“I look forward to hearing from you. Good day, Cate.” He crossed the room and disappeared through the door. It closed behind him, slowly shutting out the din of the cafeteria.

Cate sat for a moment, trying to process what had just happened. It felt surreal. If the documents had not been sitting in front of her, she would have wondered whether she had dreamt the whole thing.

She remained lost in thought as she meandered across campus. The chiming of her phone barely pulled her back to reality. She checked the display as she climbed the stairs to her office, making a mental list of things that needed to be done.

A warm email from Gayle Pearson with the subject MacKenzie Estate introduced Mr. Smythe's assistant and offered help to make any and all arrangements for her upcoming move.

The email cemented the reality she struggled to grasp. She collapsed into her desk chair and stared again at the packed shelves.

She blew out a long breath. "I'm going to need some boxes."

The next morning, she began the arduous task of packing her office. She'd cleared half the shelves when a knock sounded at the door.

"Come in!" she yelled as she stretched the packing tape over the flaps of the box.

Jeff shuffled through the door, his hands on his hips and a confused expression on his tan features. "Hey, when I said not to count on summer, kiddo, I didn't mean you had to start packing yet."

Cate rose to stand, dusting off her jeans and giving him a small laugh. "About the summer, Jeff—" she began when he interrupted her.

"Yeah, I've got great news. I managed to get you a few classes." He grinned at her.

Cate sucked in a deep breath, her gaze floating to the boxes as she opened and closed the cap on the Sharpie clutched in her hands. "Thanks, Jeff. I appreciate what you've done, but I need to decline."

Jeff screwed up his face, rubbing his neck. "Decline? Are you serious?"

Cate's popping of the marker's cap intensified as her hands turned sweaty. "Yes, I am serious. I need to decline. I've had some... developments on my end."

She found herself unable to form the words to describe her situation. I inherited a castle and I'm moving to Scotland sounded crazy in her head, she couldn't imagine how it would sound in spoken form.

"Developments?" he murmured, almost to himself, his finger rubbing his chin. "Were you offered another position?"

The corners of Cate's lips curled into a slight smile. "Yes, in a way, I was. Anyway, what it boils down to is I don't need the summer classes or a contract for the next academic year. I'm sorry about the late notice, Jeff. If I had known, I would have told you sooner, but I only just found out myself."

“Well, ah—” Jeff paused, at a loss for words. “Ah, I guess congratulations are in order.”

“Thank you,” Cate answered with a grin.

He slowly extended his hand to shake hers, as if trying to grasp the reality of the situation at the same time.

Jeff glanced around at the boxes on the floor, then slid his gaze up to the empty shelf. “Well, ah, it looks like you’ve got moving under control. And there’s nothing I can do to change your mind?” He flicked his gaze back to her.

“Nope, sorry. It’s too good an opportunity to pass up.” Not a lie, she mused.

“Well, ah, okay, I guess I’ll leave you to it. Good luck with... ah, well, everything.” He threw his hand out to the side before letting it slap his thigh.

“Thanks, again, Jeff.”

He shuffled to the door, grabbing the jamb and twisting to give her office one last glance. His brow furrowed as he took another look at the boxes. “You’re sure there’s nothing I can do to change your mind? The dean may reconsider—”

“Sorry, Jeff, there’s nothing.”

“Well, okay—can’t blame a guy for trying.” He rapped his fingers against the jamb before he disappeared down the hall.

A smile crept across Cate’s face, lingering there as she cleared another shelf.

By the end of the day, she had an empty office. One last final exam the following day stood between her and the Scottish countryside, plus the packing of her home. But she’d leave that until after her semester ended.

On her last day with Aberdeen College, she proctored and graded her exam before she did a final check of her space and typed up a brief resignation letter.

She signed off for the final time and glanced around. Barren shelves and an empty desk met her gaze, just as they had the day she came. After one last check of her drawers, one last glance at her shelves, and a crouch to glance under her desk, she stowed her laptop in her tote bag and pulled her office keys from her key ring.

She took the stairs down a flight to the department office. As expected, she found the door open and Molly, the department’s secretary, behind her desk.

“Hey, Cate.”

“Hi, Molly. have my keys to return to you.” Cate set them down on the desk in front of Molly.

Molly stared at them, brow furrowed. “Keys? Are you moving to a new office? Jeff didn’t say anything.”

“No, sorry. I thought maybe you had heard from Jeff, or saw the email I sent a few minutes ago. I’ve resigned my position. I won’t be returning to Aberdeen after today.”

“What?” Molly lowered her voice and leaned toward Cate. “Is this because of the tenure situation? To be honest, I think Jeff could have done more, but I’d try to hang in there and keep pushing, honey.”

“Oh, thanks, Molly, but that’s not it entirely. I’m actually moving.”

Molly cradled her coffee cup in her hands. “Moving? To where?”

“Scotland.”

Molly choked on the sip of coffee she’d taken. “Scotland? Are you kidding me? What prompted this, if you don’t mind my asking? Did you get a job offer there?”

Cate twisted the truth a bit, still unwilling to say the words aloud. “Oh, I just found out I have family there.”

Molly’s eyebrows shot up, and she gave a knowing nod. “Oh, that’s great, honey. I can understand you wanting to move for your family.”

Happy with being able to dodge any further explanations, Cate offered her a pleasant smile. “So, I guess this is goodbye. I left all the current student paperwork in my office with dates marked showing when they are no longer current and can be disposed of. And again, here are my keys, so that’s it.”

“Just like you, Cate—always so organized.” She paused for a moment, waving a hand in front of her face as tears welled in her eyes. “And now, just a minute, this can’t be goodbye just yet. Let me take you to lunch.”

“Oh, you don’t have to do that, Molly.”

“Nonsense, come on. Then you can tell me all about this move to Scotland.”

“Okay, but only if it’s my treat.”

“Now, Cate—” Molly began.

“I insist, or the lunch is off.” Cate lifted her chin with a coy grin.

“Okay, okay, I give in,” Molly said, holding both hands up to admit defeat before she reached under the desk for her purse.

“Should we head up to the cafe?”

“Blah, no. Let’s go off campus for a change. How about that new Italian place that just opened on Third Street? You can try it before you leave, at least.”

“Sounds good. Do you mind if I run home and grab Riley?”

“Not at all! See you there,” Molly answered.

Cate waved a goodbye before she left Aberdeen’s campus behind for the last time. She went through her to-do list as she drove home. She’d have to donate all of her furniture, her car, and most of her household items. She’d only take her personal things, and she’d start packing those after her lunch with Molly.

After collecting Riley from her apartment, she strolled to the restaurant, securing an outdoor table near the front corner. Riley settled onto the cobblestone patio at her feet under the shade of the table. Molly appeared a few moments later, swinging her car into a parking space. She gave Cate a big wave as she climbed from behind the wheel, the sun glinting off her strawberry blonde hair.

Molly plopped into the seat across from Cate and glanced down at the small dog who wagged his tail at her. “Hi, Riley. How are you, little guy? Ready for your big move?”

The small dog cocked his head at her as she spoke.

Cate tousled his ears. “I’ve still got to pack up the apartment, including his stuff.”

Molly flipped open her menu and shot Cate a grin. “He’s too cute, Cate.”

“Thanks. I’m glad you didn’t mind me bringing him along.”

Molly waved her hand in the air as she perused the menu. “Not at all. I’m cooped up in the office all day just looking at the sunshine through the window. It’s nice to bask in it. So, what looks good to you, Cate?”

After they placed their order, Molly grabbed a slice of bread from the recently delivered basket. “So, tell me about Scotland. How did this happen? When? Where? Give me all the juicy details.”

“It was quite sudden and unexpected,” Cate said, also diving into the breadbasket. She relayed the strange tale of Mr. Smythe’s sudden arrival and unexpected news.

Molly munched on her bread slice, dipping it into the olive oil and herb blend as Cate spilled the story. Her eyebrows rose higher and higher with every statement. “Oh my gosh, I have so many questions, I don’t know where to begin. So, this guy just shows up and what? Tells you you’re inheriting some property in Scotland but only if you move there?”

Molly blinked as she attempted to formulate a response, but none came.

Cate continued to fill the silence. “I had to have a DNA test to make sure I was Lady MacKenzie’s relative. I just found out a few days ago that the test showed that I was. No one ever told me about any relatives, even distant ones.”

“Yes, that is what I’m inheriting.”

Molly slapped the table with her hand as her jaw dropped open and her eyes bulged. “Cate, are you serious?”

“Yes.” Cate pulled one of the pictures she’d grabbed earlier and slid it across the table.

Molly snatched the picture from the metal tabletop just as their food arrived. She flicked her gaze to Cate, biting her lower lip and appearing ready to burst as she waited for the waitress to depart. “Oh, Cate, please tell me you’ll let me visit.”

Cate chuckled as she pushed her gnocchi around in the pool of butter. “Of course. I’d love to have you visit.”

Molly waved her hand in the air as she sipped her soda. “I will hold you to that. I’d love to see Scotland, and I’d love it even more to stay in a castle while I’m there. Well, at least I think I would.”

Cate wrinkled her forehead, scrunching her eyebrows together as she flicked her gaze up to Molly. “You think?”

“Yeah, I’ll let you try it out first and make sure it’s not haunted.”

Cate stared at Molly for a breath, unable to form any words. The book title listed when she'd searched Dunhaven Castle danced through her mind. "Haunted?"

Molly nodded, grabbing another piece of bread and dipping it into her pasta dish. "Yeah, haunted. You know, like in all the movies, those castles are always haunted. All those generations living there. Some of them dying there. You go make sure it's not haunted before I visit."

Cate forced a smile onto her face, dismissing the ridiculous idea of ghosts roaming the castle. "Okay, deal. Once I can verify that there are no ghosts, I'll send your invitation."

"Deal. So now it all makes sense why you are moving all of a sudden. I'd have moved too. Once I made sure it wasn't haunted, of course." Molly winked as she bit into her bread.

Cate shrugged, chasing a slippery buttered gnocchi around her dish. "I didn't ask about it being haunted. But since I didn't have any offers here, I really thought it was a blessing. It's a beautiful property. I've not made it very far with my career here. I had nothing holding me back."

Molly waved her explanation away with a shake of her head. "You don't have to explain it to me. You'd be crazy not to move regardless of your career, although, they gave you a raw deal again. Don't even get me started on that tenure-track denial."

Cate smiled at her in silent gratitude for her support. Molly continued, despite Cate not prompting her, "Jeff did nothing to help you. It serves him right to be scrambling this late for the summer. I hope you left a big, fat hole in his summer schedule pulling out of your contract.”

Cate froze, crinkling her brow. She shook her head. “I didn’t have a contract.”

Molly narrowed her eyes, cocking her head as she stared at Cate. “Those contracts went out three weeks ago. You were listed for three classes.”

Cate’s jaw dropped open as she reached for her lemonade. “Three weeks ago?”

Molly’s shoulders slumped, and she let her fork clatter onto her plate. “Oh, don’t tell me. He didn’t offer you anything until late.”

“He told me he had a few classes for me a few days ago. That’s when I told him I was resigning.”

Molly set her jaw and rolled her eyes before she leaned forward and patted Cate’s hand. “Well, that’s divine providence if you ask me, Cate. You were meant to go to Scotland, and Jeff was meant to get stuck for playing his games. It serves him right. His games finally caught up to him.”

Cate squeezed her hand, the smile returning to her face as she glanced at the picture of the castle laying on the table. “Well, I can’t say that I’m complaining about the outcome, that’s for sure. Maybe it worked out just the way it was supposed to.”

Cate and Molly finished their lunch, chatting about Cate’s move and plans once she reached Scotland. Molly offered to help Cate with any last-minute details, but Cate declined, figuring she had things under control given her timeline.

“Well, I guess this is goodbye then,” Cate said as they stood up from the table.

“I promise,” Cate said. Another bittersweet moment. Cate held back the tear that threatened to escape from her eye.

“And you, Riley, have fun playing in that huge yard.”

Riley looked curiously at Molly.

Cate laughed as she scooped the small dog up. “I’m sure he will. Well, back to packing for me! Next time you hear from me, I’ll be in Scotland.”

“Thank you for lunch, Cate, and I can’t wait to hear that you’re settled.”

After another few moments of chitchat, the women parted ways.

Cate waddled back into her apartment, stuffed from the heavy lunch. She wrinkled her nose as she stared into her closet. “How about you pack this up, Riley?”

He tilted his head at her before he loped across the room and leapt onto the bed, settling down with his feet splayed out behind him for a nap.

“I guess I have my answer.” She followed him to the bed and plopped onto it. “Let’s start fresh in the morning.” She grabbed the remote from her night table and flicked on the television across the room on her dresser. After searching for the movie Molly had suggested about a woman living in a haunted castle, she snuggled into the covers to watch the frightening film.

After two weeks of packing, Cate stood in an empty apartment. No more items remained on her to-do list. She would start her journey to Scotland in just a few hours.

Riley sat at her feet, starting up at her. “We made a lot of good memories here, Riley. But let’s go make some new ones.”

She grabbed her packed suitcase, tucked Riley into his carrier, and left her apartment behind for the last time. The wheels of the suitcase banged their way down the stairs as she dragged it behind her to the main floor and out to the waiting taxi.

Within hours, she boarded her plane, booked in first-class by Gayle. Butterflies flitted in her stomach as she buckled her seat belt. They intensified as the plane pushed back from the gate. Her new life awaited her. She leaned over to Riley, still stuffed in his carrier and grinned. “Here we go, buddy. Next stop: London, England.”

After a layover in New York, they landed in London. The chauffeur Gayle had arranged met her outside and shuttled her to the hotel with the promise to return for her in the morning. Within the hour, she was settled in her room.

She retired early after the long flight, settling back into the pillows with Riley curled next to her.

Cate flicked off the light as she stroked his fur. “Before you know it, we’ll be home. At least, I hope so.”

She settled back into the pillows, unused to the sounds of the city streets beyond her window. The entire situation overwhelmed her, and she slept fitfully in the strange city. Her alarm screamed through a nightmare about Riley becoming lost in the halls of the castle. She awoke with a start, cuddling the small dog closer to her before she rose from her bed and dressed for the day.

The nervous butterflies kicked up again as she gathered her purse and pup and headed down to the waiting chauffeured car. Buildings and people sped by the window as they drove. London seemed enormous compared to her former small town of Aberdeen. She mentally thanked Gayle for arranging transportation so she did not have to navigate it alone.

Within forty minutes, she sat inside the luxuriously appointed offices of Smythe, Smith, and Smithton, awaiting her appointment with Mr. Smythe.

Cate waited less than a minute before a petite blonde woman hurried down the hall toward the reception area. A few tendrils of hair framed her face, with the rest pulled neatly into a French twist. Her navy-blue skirt suit featured a hemline falling just below the knee, and pumps with a fashionable but sensible heel finished off the ensemble. A pair of glasses dangled on a chain around her neck. Her clothes were as crisp as Mr. Smythe’s had been. She offered Cate a warm smile with the ability to set her at ease immediately.

She widened her smile and extended her hand as she approached. “Cate, so nice to finally meet you. I’m Gayle Pearson. And this must be little Riley.”

Cate shook her hand. “Nice to meet you, Gayle. Yes, this is Riley.”

Gayle extended her hand to allow Riley to sniff it and then gave him a gentle scratch on his head.

“Riley, can you shake hands?” Cate asked.

Riley extended his small white paw toward Gayle, who accepted it for a shake.

Gayle motioned for Cate to follow her down the hall. “What a clever little pup you are, Riley. If you’ll follow me, I’ll get you situated for your meeting with Mr. Smythe.”

Cate trailed behind her, taking the opportunity to thank her in person for making all her travel arrangements.

“Oh, it was nothing, Cate, my pleasure. I hope you are finding your stay pleasant. Everything is satisfactory with your room, I trust?”

“Oh, yes, everything is great,” Cate said as they entered a small conference room. “And thank you for the snack—it hit the spot after the long flight.”

“Wonderful to hear. May I take your coat?”

Cate set Riley on one of the thickly padded leather chairs and peeled off her jacket, handing it over. “Thank you.”

Gayle tossed it over her arm, clasping her hands together. “And can I interest you in a cup of tea?”

Cate collected Riley and eased into the high-backed chair. “Oh, no, thank you. I don’t want to put you to any trouble.”

“No trouble at all, Cate.”

“Well, then yes, if you don’t mind, I would love a cup of tea. Thank you. Something warm would be great. It’s much cooler than I’m used to here.”

“Coming right up,” Gayle said as she bustled out of the room.

Gayle returned moments later with a tray of tea, cookies, and a few dog bones. She set the tea and cookies down near Cate. “Here, this will take the chill out of you! Do you take sugar and milk, Cate?”

“Just sugar, no milk.”

“How very American of you,” Gayle replied, passing the sugar to Cate. “And, Riley, I have a special treat for you if your mummy will allow you.” She produced a bone-shaped dog biscuit.

Riley’s tail wagged furiously.

“Yes, he’s allowed, thank you,” Cate said.

Gayle fed the biscuit to Riley, who wolfed it down in a few chomps.

“And now, I will spoil you and give you a second one, whether or not your mummy likes it,” Gayle teased, handing Riley another, which he ate as quickly as the first.

Cate chuckled as Riley stared expectantly at Gayle, waiting for another. “I think you’ve made a friend for life.”

“And what a cute friend to have. If you need anything, just give me a holler. I’m just outside. Mr. Smythe will be in shortly.”

“Thank you.”

Gayle slipped out the door, pulling it slightly closed behind her.

Warmth coursed through Cate as she sipped the sweet tea. She set the cup down on its saucer when William Smythe entered the room with Gayle trailing behind him, her arms laden with folders.

He approached the table and tugged back the chair at the head of it. Gayle spread the folders out for him before leaving the room and pulling the door slightly shut again.

Mr. Smythe unbuttoned his suit jacket as he settled into the chair. “Hello, Cate, good to see you again. I hope your trip was pleasant and your accommodations agreeable.”

“Oh, yes, everything is excellent, thank you.”

With a nod, he opened the first folder. “There are several things that we need to go over and some paperwork that needs to be taken care of over the next few days. We’ll finish everything that we need to here before traveling to Scotland on Wednesday. I’ll stay on with you until Friday to finish all the details there.”

“Okay, that sounds like a plan.”

Paperwork, signatures, and legalese filled their day. The ever efficient Gayle flitted in and out, collecting forms to process immediately.

After a light lunch in the office, arranged by Gayle, they traveled to the bank housing Lady MacKenzie’s accounts to complete more paperwork. After signing the forms, they were led to a room filled with safe-deposit boxes. As the bank clerk left them alone in a private room, Mr. Smythe opened the box given to them and removed an item.

“Ah, the infamous gold timepiece,” Cate exclaimed.

“Yes,” he answered. “This is the timepiece I spoke of when we met. This was to be imparted directly to you, along with the following note stipulating specific terms that Lady MacKenzie insisted her heir follow.”

He handed her the timepiece along with a note.

Cate accepted both, turning the timepiece over in her hands as she received it. The bright lights glinted off the warm antique gold. Once a man’s pocket watch, it now hung from a long gold chain, making it a pendant. She traced the outline of two small crosses extending from the top of the piece.

Cate pressed the button to open the watch. An off-white face with black Roman numerals stared back at her. She squinted at the markings on the cover, finding a faint inscription: ALWAYS KEEP AN EYE ON YOUR TIME.

Cate furrowed her brow at the odd engraving. With the timepiece clutched in her hands, she read the note.

To my heir,

This timepiece has been passed from generation to generation in the MacKenzie family. It came through my ancestors from father to child for centuries, eventually being passed from my grandfather to my father and from my father to me. I now pass it to you. You MUST adhere to the following stipulations I set forth:

Wear the timepiece on your person at all times, and NEVER leave it unattended.

Take care to keep the timepiece in working order and always wound.

Always keep an eye on your time.

Good luck. Stay safe.

Lady Gertrude MacKenzie

Cate wrinkled her brow at the note, a shiver darting up her spine. She ran her fingers over the odd statement about keeping an eye on her time engraved on the watch's faceplate as she stared at the same words in the note. Her gaze hovered over the last two lines again. Stay safe, the note said. But stay safe from what?

With a shake of her head, she hung the timepiece around her neck as instructed and continued on with the remaining business.

Drained and overwhelmed, she slogged back to her hotel room and collapsed into bed. The next day contained more of the same, and she retired at the end of it for an early evening in, preparing for a wake-up call before the sun rose to catch an early morning train to Edinburgh.

Her alarm screamed Wednesday's arrival at an hour well before she was ready, and she met Mr. Smythe and Gayle at the train station for the first leg of the trip to Dunhaven.

With Gayle staying on to help her unpack over her first weekend in the house, her nerves settled a little. At least if there were ghosts roaming the halls, she wouldn't be alone. The truly terrifying moment would come when she spent her first night on her own in the castle.

They boarded the train and Cate settled back in her seat with Riley on her lap. The passing scenery captivated her, being so very different from the midwest where she'd grown up and stayed for most of her adult life.

Gayle smiled at her as she studied the passing landscape. "So, Cate, I understand Mr. Smythe's visit was a surprise to you."

A grin spread across Cate's face as she bobbed her head up and down. "Yes, a very big one. And not just his visit, but his news. I never knew I had a relative in Scotland."

"Really? No one ever mentioned a relative with a castle?"

Cate stroked Riley's fur as she answered. "No, no one dropped that bombshell on me until Mr. Smythe did. To be honest, I didn't know I had any relatives anywhere. After my parents passed away, I assumed I was alone in the world."

Gayle's face pinched with compassion. "I'm so sorry for your loss, Cate. And at such a young age."

Cate offered her a tight-lipped smile. "Thank you. Though it's been several years now, so I've grown accustomed to being alone."

"And all this time, you had a relative living in Scotland."

"Well, a distant relative."

"Yes, but still, it is a shame that you never got to meet Lady MacKenzie. She was an interesting woman. I'm certain you would have liked her. You remind me a lot of her. We tried to find you before she passed but were unable to locate you in time."

Cate flicked her gaze to the passing scenery again. "Yes, that is unfortunate. I would have liked to have met her. I hope it's not too much to ask, but how did she pass away?"

Gayle crossed her legs, tugging her knee toward her with her clasped hands. "She took ill suddenly and was diagnosed with an aggressive form of cancer which went undetected until it was too late. She suffered a stroke soon after finding out and passed shortly after."

"Oh, that's terrible. How sad." Cate reflected for a moment, before rekindling the conversation on a brighter topic. "Speaking of my distant relative, do you have any more information on how closely we are related from the DNA test?"

Mr. Smythe chimed in to answer this, setting his paperwork aside. "No, the analysis only confirms the relationship, but doesn't tell us any familial relationship information beyond the general. Your relationship was in the third cousin arena. Lady MacKenzie had an address for your parents. We used it to track you down. I'm certain you can find more information at the castle about your relationship."

Gayle waved a finger in the air. "Cate, I'm thinking that your name, Kensie, is a variation of the original family name MacKenzie."

"Yes, I wondered that. I have to admit, for being a history professor, I have little to no idea of my family's history. I've been meaning to look into it, but with everything going on, I haven't yet. I plan on doing that once I get settled."

"Well, it sounds like an interesting project for a history professor," Gayle answered. "Please let me know if I can help."

"Thank you so much, Gayle. I agree it will be an interesting project."

They spent the rest of the trip making small talk until they pulled into the station. Cate's stomach rumbled as they walked to the restaurant for a quick lunch.

With full bellies, they picked up their rental car to begin the drive to Dunhaven. The town sat a few hours northwest of Edinburgh. Cate and Riley spread out in the backseat as Mr. Smythe slipped behind the wheel to make the familiar drive with Gayle serving as his navigator in the front passenger seat.

The city turned to the countryside and eventually to the Highlands as they drove north. The drive cemented the reality of the remoteness of her new home as they proceeded farther and farther away from what she was used to in terms of civilization. As the world slipped away, the possibility of ghosts became more real to her.

"Almost there," Gayle announced. Cate checked the timepiece she was wearing with a surge of pride that she had remembered to wind it this morning. They should arrive in about twenty to twenty-five minutes, according to Mr. Smythe's calculations. A surge of anticipation swept through Cate.

Within fifteen minutes, a small village appeared in the distance. Behind it, Dunhaven Castle rose high on the hill. They passed through the small town of Dunhaven moments later as Gayle detailed some of the town's local businesses.

The village receded behind them as they drove on toward the castle. The rambling structure sprawled on the high hill overlooking the town. It grew larger and larger as they approached. Rolling green lawns with perfect landscaping surrounded it.

Gravel crunched under the tires as Mr. Smythe turned onto the driveway. Cate slid closer to the window to study her new home as they approached. Riley, sensing Cate's excitement, darted from window to window to peer out, wagging his tail and eyeing Cate as if to confirm that his reaction was appropriate.

Three people milled around the castle's entrance.

"Ah, good," Mr. Smythe said as he spotted them. "I asked the staff to meet us. They've timed it well."

"Probably got the warning call from the village," Gayle joked.

"Staff?" Cate mumbled to herself, her brow furrowing.

"Yes," Mr. Smythe replied, overhearing her comment. "Charlie and Emily Fraser. Mr. Fraser oversees most of the handiwork, landscaping, and manages the external landscaping company. Mrs. Fraser provides light cooking and house cleaning. A hired company does most of the other cleaning. Finally, Jack Reid, the estate manager is a newer addition who will take over most of the handiwork and landscaping from Mr. Fraser soon. Lady MacKenzie hired him just before passing away."

She hadn't given much thought to the castle's upkeep. It was good to know someone else had. What would it be like to have a staff?

Mr. Smythe interrupted her thoughts. He glanced at her through the rearview mirror. "May I assume that you will keep the staff on?"

Cate clamped her gaping jaw shut for a moment before answering. "Ah, yes, assuming they would like to stay on."

Gayle twisted to face her and nodded. "I think they very much would, Cate. They have been on edge that the new owner would do a clean sweep and bring in her own people. They will be relieved to find out that you are keeping them on."

"Oh, yes, no—I mean to say, I'd never do that to anyone."

As the conversation came to a close, Mr. Smythe eased the car parallel to the front entrance. The youngest of the three staff, Jack, approached the car to open the doors and begin unloading luggage. Cate scooped Riley into her arms and stepped into the crisp Scottish air.

Her gaze rose to the rambling structure in front of her. Goosebumps pocked her flesh as she swallowed hard, wondering what secrets the gothic structure held. The words in Gertrude MacKenzie's note rattled through her mind. What was it that she needed to stay safe from?

CHAPTER 6

Eate stared up at the castle rising in front of her. She fought back a shiver as she struggled to stop dwelling on why Gertrude MacKenzie had wished her good luck and told her to stay safe.

She sucked in a deep breath and kissed the top of Riley's head as he studied her, shaking in her arms, sensing her apprehension.

"We're home, Riley. We're home," she said, a smile spreading on her face.

Generations of MacKenzies had lived here before her. Generations of her family. A sense of belonging washed over her as she imagined her relatives walking the halls of the sprawling structure.

She studied the gray-brown stone making up the castle's exterior. It spread on either side of the entrance, extending in wings jutting at various angles. Towers and turrets rose into the sky. For a moment, she wondered if she may end up lost inside its vast expanse. Perhaps that was what the warning meant.

Voices pulled her from her daydreaming. Mrs. Fraser clasped her hands stiffly in front of her as she addressed Gayle. "Yes, I had Lady MacKenzie's room made up for Dr. Kensie as Mr. Smythe directed, the nearby bedroom suite is made up for you, Ms. Pearson, and I had the blue room made up for you, as usual, Mr. Smythe."

"Perfect, thank you," Mr. Smythe answered as Jack pulled luggage from the trunk—or, as they called it here, the boot of the car.

“And I had all them boxes you sent put in the library. Lady Gertrude didn’t use that room much. I cannae understand what you meant by ‘obvious but unobtrusive space,’ so I did the best I could,” she said, her Scottish dialect on full display.

Gayle patted the woman’s arm with a warm smile. “Let’s not discuss that now. I’m sure Cate would prefer to settle in a bit before dealing with all that.”

“Oh, thank you,” Cate said, stepping forward and extending her hand. “Hi, I’m Cate, and this is Riley.” Cate motioned with her head toward the small dog in her arms.

Mr. Fraser was the first to take her hand, giving it a light shake. Next, Mrs. Fraser, with a furrowed brow and slack jaw, shook it. Jack, who had finished unloading the luggage, approached.

“Good to meet ya, Cate,” he said with a broad smile and a hard handshake that extended to her entire arm. “And a big hello to you too, Sir Riley.” He tickled the pup under his chin. Mrs. Fraser gasped at his greeting, but Riley seemed to approve, extending his neck for a full scratch.

“Well, uh, Dr. Kensie—” Mrs. Fraser began.

Cate waved her hand in the air with a smile. “Oh, please, call me Cate.”

Mrs. Fraser’s eyes widened. “Well, I’ll certainly not! You might not have the title—”

“She will inherit the title along with the estate,” Mr. Smythe said.

“Well, I shan’t be referring to you by your first name, Lady Kensie! That wouldn’t be proper, not proper at all.”

She glanced at Mr. Smythe, then Gayle. She raised her chin and rolled her shoulders back before continuing. “Now, Lady Kensie, I’d be happy to show you to your room if you’d like to freshen up after your trip. I prepared a light meal for everyone. If you’ll let me know when you’d like it served, I will have it set out for you.”

All eyes turned to Cate, and she swallowed hard, unfamiliar with the sensation of ordering a staff around. “Oh, uh, that would be great. I’d say maybe around five-thirty to eat, if that’s okay with everyone?” She phrased it as a question, shrugging her shoulders as though she wasn’t at all sure.

“That would do perfectly,” Gayle said with a nod.

“If you would point out your bags to me, I’d be ever so happy to bring them up to you,” Jack chimed in.

“Oh, the two with the luggage straps are mine. Here, I can take one with me.” Cate reached for one suitcase, triggering another gasp from Mrs. Fraser.

“Nay, lassie, I’d not have the lady of the house carrying her own bags to her room! I’d be put out on the street for it.”

Cate burst into a giggle at the statement. “The lady of the house can manage a bit of luggage, but I won’t fight you on it. It is heavy.”

They shared a laugh together as he grabbed her suitcase and tugged it behind him.

With Mrs. Fraser leading the way, they entered the castle through thick wooden doors. Cate’s eyes slid upward to take in the enormous foyer. Wooden double doors on either side of the wide space led into other rooms. Hallways jutted off in every direction. A massive, curved stairway with thick brass railings led up to a gallery-style hallway overlooking the shiny marble floor. Thick red carpeting lined the center of the white marble stairs. The scent of wood polish hung heavy in the air.

“Mr. Smythe, I trust you can find your way while I take the ladies on to their rooms.” Mrs. Fraser started toward the staircase with Cate and Gayle in tow. As they ascended it, she continued, “I had the bed you sent for the pup put into your room, Lady Kensie. I hope that was acceptable.”

Cate hurried to keep up with her. “Oh, yes, that’s great. Thank you so much. That was very thoughtful of you, Mrs. Fraser. And Riley thanks you, too.”

Cate raised Riley’s paw to wave at Mrs. Fraser in a show of approval. “You hear that, buddy? Mrs. Fraser has got you all fixed up.”

Mrs. Fraser pursed her lips together and continued down the hall, hands clasped together at her waist in front of her. Mr. Smythe disappeared from their group somewhere along the way, though Cate couldn’t say where. The maze of halls made the blue room seem extremely far from wherever hers would be.

“Ms. Pearson, here is your room,” Mrs. Fraser said, stopping outside of a doorway and motioning with her hand.

“Thank you,” Gayle said. She squeezed Cate’s forearm. “I’ll see you in a bit for some dinner.” She disappeared into the room, leaving Cate and Riley alone with Mrs. Fraser.

“The late Lady MacKenzie’s room is this way,” Mrs. Fraser said, continuing down the hall. “Mr. Smythe told me to give you that room.

Rather presumptuous of him, but I do what I'm told. If you'd like another, please let me know once you've perused the castle."

"Oh, I'm sure it's fine, Mrs. Fraser. I'm sure I'll be very happy there."

"Lady MacKenzie was, there's a fact. I suppose since it was good enough for her ladyship, Mr. Smythe reckoned it would be good enough for you, too. Here we are."

She stopped in front of a set of double doors, opening them both in one smooth motion.

Cate followed her into the room. She spun, trying to take it all in.

The sheer size of the bedroom suite made her apartment seem tiny. She stood in a sitting room. A fireplace yawned in the nearby wall. She ran her hand over the velvety fabric of the chaise lounge facing it. Ornate chairs stood against another wall. To the left and through another set of double doors, a bedroom with a large canopy bed stood. Carved wood trimmed the space. Heavy draperies adorned the large windows overlooking the rolling green landscape.

Mrs. Fraser fussed with a pillow on the settee nearest the chaise lounge. Cate swallowed and tried to pull herself back into reality, realizing Mrs. Fraser was waiting for the all-clear signal from her before leaving her alone.

"Thank you, Mrs. Fraser."

"Of course," she spat out before she spun on her heel and departed.

Cate spun to take in the entire room again. The sheer size of her bedroom suite alone proved overwhelming. She no longer wondered if she would become lost wandering the halls—she was certain of it. Absentmindedly, her hand found the timepiece around her neck. She glanced down at it.

"Who were you, Lady MacKenzie?" she muttered. "Here I am, about to live in your space, sleeping where you slept, eating where you ate, and I have no idea who you even were."

A knock at the door pulled her from her musings.

"Come in," she shouted.

"Your luggage," Jack said, dragging the two bags in through the door. "Where would you like them?"

"Oh, there's fine," Cate said, motioning toward the door. "Thanks."

"Easy enough." He wheeled them farther into the room. He hesitated a moment, shifting his weight from foot to foot. "Say, I hope I didn't offend you earlier. I tend to be a bit off-the-cuff. I put many people off. You seemed rather laid back. I took you at your word when you introduced yourself as Cate that I could call you that.”

Cate shook her head and waved her hand as she sank onto the chaise. “Oh, no, not at all. You didn’t offend me. I prefer it if everyone calls me Cate. Maybe it’s an American thing.”

He gave her a lopsided grin. “Ah, well that’s good before I’m out on my arse.”

“I need all the help I can get, especially from getting lost. I won’t fire you because you didn’t call me Dr. Kensie. I really prefer Cate.”

“Mrs. Fraser will be horrified. The lady of the house having everyone call her Cate.” He shivered as though it was terrifying.

The dramatic display elicited a giggle from Cate. “Yeah, I noticed that. I guess Lady MacKenzie was much more formal.”

“Quite. She would have fired me on the spot if I called her lassie or even Gertrude.”

“Good thing I’m easier going, huh?”

“Quite a good thing. Well, I’ll leave you to freshen up then. M’lady,” Jack said, adding an extravagant bow.

Another chuckle escaped her. Riley sniffed at the air as she stood after he’d closed the doors behind him.

The little dog cocked his head, looking at her curiously.

“Here, why don’t you have a proper smell around?” Cate said, setting him down on the floor. He wandered around the room, sniffing everything. Cate checked her timepiece, finding it was nearly 5 p.m. Dinner would be set out soon.

She glanced down at her outfit of leggings and a tunic, imagining the shocked expression on Mrs. Fraser’s face if she turned up to her first dinner in this ensemble. Not wanting to send the woman to an early grave, she decided to change.

She wheeled her luggage through the double doorway and into the bedroom. The bedroom rivaled the sitting room in size. She brushed the lace curtain aside, peeking out one window. Her room overlooked a side area of the well-manicured lawn.

Outside, a gravel path wound past a gazebo, ending at a small loch.

“Riley, you’re going to love this,” she said. She hoped to explore the grounds tomorrow or Friday with him.

For now, her stomach had other plans. She opened her luggage and retrieved Riley's bowl and kibble. Riley heard the morsels spilling into the bowl and raced from the sitting room for his dish. She'd find a new spot to feed him after they settled in. She left Riley eating as she pulled on a change of clothes.

She stepped into the hall after she finished with Riley in her arms, hoping she could find her way to the front door for a jaunt outside. She would rely on luck to find her way to the dining room from there.

As she wandered down the hall, studying the thick carved wood trim and passing door after endless door, Gayle popped out of her room.

"What luck," Cate exclaimed. "I was afraid I would lose my way to the front door and would die of starvation trying to find the dining room."

"No worries, Lady Cate," Gayle said, patting her arm. "I can make sure you get there. Are you taking Riley for a short walk first?"

"Yes, for a moment to stretch his legs. I planned on taking him into the dining room with us after. I'm a little reluctant to leave him alone since we just got here. You don't think it will upset Mrs. Fraser if I bring Riley, do you?" Cate winced as she glanced at Gayle.

Gayle patted her arm again. "Cate, you're a dear, but you need to remember that this is your home now. You will set the rules. Mrs. Fraser will deal with Riley joining us in the dining room."

Cate gave her a resolute nod as they reached the main staircase. As they descended the thickly carpeted steps, Gayle continued, "I think Mrs. Fraser is a little on edge because of her employment status."

"Her employment status?"

"Yes, it's a bit complex, but the long and short of it is that she was planning on finishing a few years with Mr. Fraser, then retiring. It was to allow Lady MacKenzie time to find a replacement. Mr. Fraser has already begun training his replacement, Jack. I think she's wondering if you'll keep her on."

"Oh, well, of course, I would, yes. I don't plan on upsetting the balance of things here."

They reached the front door and stepped outside. Gayle lowered her voice. "There is one other thing."

Cate raised an eyebrow, wrapping up in her sweater against the chill in the air. "Oh?"

Gayle trained her eyes on Riley as he sniffed around the lawn. “I shouldn’t discuss it, but there was talk with Lady MacKenzie about changing her will. There is a cottage on the estate where Mr. and Mrs. Fraser live. She had planned to bequeath it to them as a retirement gift for their years of service. She passed away before we could draw up the final papers.”

Cate let the information settle in her brain. How terrible for the older couple, she ruminated. No wonder Mrs. Fraser had been on edge. “That would be very upsetting. I would be happy to honor that agreement. Perhaps I should speak with Mr. Smythe about it?”

“Well, the decision is yours, Cate, but I’m certain the Frasers would appreciate it.”

“Thank you, Gayle, for the heads up. I want to fit in here. I don’t want to make anyone’s life worse.”

“With an attitude like that, you won’t.”

Cate scooped Riley into her arms, and they pushed through the front door into the castle. “Lead the way to the dining room, and I will try to memorize this route.”

Gayle veered to the left, entering a wide hall. Landscape paintings hung on the green wallpaper above the mahogany chair rail. She pushed through a set of wooden doors halfway down the hall.

Cate circled the massive table, capable of seating more people than she knew. Serving dishes sat on the sideboard. She set Riley down near the head of the table, sliding into one of the heavy wooden chairs.

Bright red strawberries and shredded chicken topped fresh leafy greens. Cashews halves dotted the lettuce. A light drizzle of a red wine vinaigrette coated the top.

The meal provided an acute change to Cate’s normal diet of sandwiches and cereal. With cooking like this, she’d be sad to see Mrs. Fraser retire.

As they were leaving the dining room, Mrs. Fraser appeared in the hall. “Ahem, excuse me, Lady Kensie?”

Cate stopped short, spinning to face her. “Yes, Mrs. Fraser?”

“I have a few things to go over with you before morning, if it’s a good time?”

“Ah, sure.”

“I wasn’t sure what you preferred for breakfast and when you would like it served.”

“Oh, um,” Cate hesitated, glancing at Gayle. Gayle gave Cate an encouraging nod. “Well, if it works for everyone’s schedule, I think at 7 a.m. would be appropriate for breakfast, and whatever you usually make is just fine.”

Gayle offered an encouraging nod.

Mrs. Fraser clasped her hands in front of her, standing rail straight. “I make oatmeal most mornings. I will have it ready at 7 a.m., if that’s acceptable.”

“Yes, that would be perfect. Thank you so much, Mrs. Fraser. And thank you for dinner, it was delicious.”

“You’re very welcome, Lady Kensie. Sleep well.”

The long day of travel left everyone drained. After Cate retired to her suite, however, she found the excitement of her new surroundings too stimulating to allow her to relax. She sat with Riley on the chaise, contemplating the events of the day. She planned her next few days, hoping to finish her unpacking and explore the castle. After settling in, she promised herself she’d track down the exact nature of her relationship with Lady MacKenzie.

As her mind settled, she collected Riley in favor of stretching out in bed. She eyed the bed before getting into it. It gave new meaning to the term “climb into bed.” She nestled in, pulling the covers up to her shoulders.

With a sigh, she closed her eyes and sucked in a deep breath. Her eyes popped open moments later. Despite the long trip, she found herself wide awake.

A small whine emanated from the floor next to her. She flicked on the light and leaned over. Riley lay in his fluffy bed near her nightstand.

“Can’t sleep either, huh, buddy?”

Riley squinted back at her in the bright light, offering another whine.

“Okay, okay, how about we share the bed tonight? That may help both of us.”

Cate slipped out from under the sheets and scooped up the little dog, bed and all, and set him on top of her bed. She nestled close to him after climbing under the sheets again. She stroked the fur on his head. He gave another big sigh and laid his head down, content to be closer to Cate.

“I wish this helped me fall right to sleep,” Cate mused.

Cate continued to lie awake for another forty-five minutes, her mind too stimulated by her surroundings to relax into sleep. After almost an hour, she began to doze off. She startled awake, gasping in a breath as she stared at a shifting shadow in the corner. Cate squinted into the darkness, wondering if her first ghost was making an appearance.

Cate narrowed her eyes at the shifting form. A white wisp floated in the corner, twisting and turning, changing shape as it moved. She sucked in a deep breath, her eyes wide. Blood rushed into her ears, and her limbs turned to jelly.

Was this the thing she needed to “stay safe” from? Was this the reason behind Gertrude MacKenzie’s warnings?

Cate stiffened her muscles to stop her trembling as her eyes adjusted. She crawled to the edge of the bed, clutching the bedpost as she studied the motion.

After a moment, she sat back on her heels, breathing out a sigh of relief as the ghost turned out to be a lace curtain fluttering from a partially open window.

She slid from her bed, tiptoeing across the cold hardwood to the window. She tugged it shut, securing it before she hurried back to bed and pulled the covers over her.

Despite the benign cause of the so-called ghost, she lay in her bed with the silk duvet pulled to her chin, eyeing the corner suspiciously.

She drifted off to sleep, tossing and turning restlessly for the remainder of the night.

As the alarm sounded the next morning, announcing her first full day in Scotland, she yawned and stretched. In a half sleepwalk, she got herself dressed and took Riley out in the fresh Scottish air for a quick walk before heading in for breakfast.

Today, Cate was determined to learn how to navigate within the castle. As a history professor, she possessed a working knowledge of homes built in this period and how they had been modified to modernize.

With a new confidence, she wound through the halls to the dining room. From there, she scoured for the passage to the kitchen.

“Let’s see if we can lend a hand in the kitchen, Riley.” she said, carrying the small dog with her.

She descended a narrow set of service stairs, finding a long hallway at the bottom. Faint voices floated from the large room at the end of the hall, which she figured must be the kitchen. By the sounds of the voices, Jack and Mr. Fraser were keeping Mrs. Fraser company as she prepared breakfast.

As Cate ambled down the hallway, the voices became less faint. She was soon able to make out their conversation.

Jack’s voice answered her. “Oh, I think she’s a bit of all right.”

“Call me Cate,” Mrs. Fraser mimicked. “Now we’ve got a typical crass American running Dunhaven Castle. I say if Lady MacKenzie knew, she’d be turning in her grave.”

“Ah, come on now, Mrs. Fraser,” Jack answered again. “She’s not that bad—and a bonnie lass if I ever saw one.”

Mrs. Fraser harrumphed. “She wouldn’t know the first thing about being a lady, I can tell you that.”

Cate bit her lower lip. Apparently, the old adage about eavesdropping was true. Her lips formed a frown as she realized this transition would not be as easy as she anticipated.

She spun on her heel, retreating to the stairway and up to the dining room. The room remained empty when she arrived. As she settled into her chair, Mr. Smythe arrived, followed by Gayle moments later.

Mrs. Fraser entered as if on cue, carrying a coffee pot. She poured Mr. Smythe and Gayle steaming cups of the aromatic liquid after offering one to Cate.

“Oh, I’m sorry, Lady Kensie, can I bring you something else?” Mrs. Fraser asked.

“No, thank you, just water.”

After delivering the beverage, Mrs. Fraser set breakfast on the sideboard, leaving them to enjoy their meal.

The morning would be filled with more paperwork for Mr. Smythe, as he filed any forms required locally. As he stood to leave, Cate joined him, requesting a moment of his time.

Mr. Smythe led her to the library, a room Cate hadn't explored yet. She found it just as grand as the other parts of the castle. Bookshelves extended two stories above her head, with a gallery-style hallway around the top for access. A spiral staircase in the corner of the room provided access to the second level.

Cate stepped to the oversized leather chairs grouped near the fireplace, rubbing a hand against the supple leather. She glanced at the wall of floor-to-ceiling windows and past the thick tartan draperies framing each window at the garden full of blooms.

"Thanks for all your work so far. I was hoping to request one additional thing," she said as Mr. Smythe pushed the doors closed behind him.

"Of course."

"It's come to my attention that Lady MacKenzie, before her death, had intended to bequeath the cottage that Mr. and Mrs. Fraser are living in to them for their retirement, but that she did not have the changes to her will completed prior to her passing away."

Mr. Smythe shoved one hand into his pocket. "Yes, that is all correct, Cate."

"I'd like to follow through on her wishes and transfer the property to Mr. and Mrs. Fraser. My arrival is already upending lives. And I have no intention to renege on something promised."

Mr. Smythe offered a curt nod. "Yes, that's very considerate. I can take care of the paperwork when I return to London. I'll send it on to you here for signatures."

A smile spread across Cate's face. "That would be perfect. Thank you so much."

"My pleasure. Was there anything else?"

"No, that's all, thanks."

"Then I will be on my way," Mr. Smythe said. He strode from the room, pulling the doors shut behind him again.

Cate took another glance around the library, eyeing the large desk overlooking the garden. It would be the perfect place for her to work.

Stacks of boxes stood in the back corner. She approached them, recognizing her own handwriting.

"I guess I know where to start," she murmured to herself.

While she would have preferred to roam around her new home exploring, she'd rather have Gayle's help to unpack than tackle it alone after the woman left.

She returned to the dining room to collect Gayle, finding her cuddling Riley as though he were her grandbaby in her arms. She rubbed his belly as she cooed over him. Riley lapped it up.

Cate laughed as she eyed the scene. "I see you've discovered the way to Riley's heart. Treats and belly rubs."

"Yes, I have," Gayle said, concentrating on Riley. "And telling him how cute he is."

Riley cocked his head as she said the "c" word.

"Oh, he loves to be fussed over," Cate answered.

After a few more strokes, Gayle said, "Well, little one, it's time for your mummy and me to begin work. Would you like to explore the castle with us?"

"He'd like to explore the castle, yard, and anywhere else he's allowed." Cate waved a finger toward the library she'd just come from. "Mrs. Fraser put the boxes I sent in the library. We can begin there by sorting through where they need to be in the castle."

"Would you like to take a tour of the lived-in part of the castle so you have a better idea of where your things may best fit?"

The plan allowed her to avoid unpacking and explore some of the castle, so she agreed in a heartbeat. As Gayle stood, Mrs. Fraser pushed into the dining room to collect dishes.

"I beg your pardon, Lady Kensie, I was hoping to have another word with you before you set off for the day."

"Of course," Cate said.

Gayle gathered Riley into her arms, whispering that she would meet Cate in the library before leaving the two women alone to speak.

Mrs. Fraser stiffened as the doors closed behind Gayle and sniffed. "Yes, ma'am, I hope you dinnae see this as out of line, but I was always one to talk straight. I wanted to speak with you about our employment status. Mine and Mr. Fraser's. I'm not sure what Mr. Smythe may have explained to you, but we intended on retiring soon after finding suitable replacements.

Mr. Fraser has found his in young Jack. I wasn't sure if you were keeping us on, though."

"Of course, Mrs. Fraser. I don't mind at all. I would be most grateful to you both if you'd stay on as you had intended."

Mrs. Fraser drew her lips into a thin line and gave Cate a curt nod.

"Thank you, Lady Kensie." She turned her attention to clearing dishes.

Apprehension still hung heavy between them. Cate guessed it had to do with the status of the couple's home. Perhaps now was the best moment to tackle the situation.

Cate swallowed hard and found her voice to speak up. "Oh, Mrs. Fraser?"

The woman dropped the dishes back to the table and stood at attention. "Yes?"

"It came to my attention that Lady MacKenzie intended to transfer ownership of the cottage that you and Mr. Fraser live in to you. I spoke with Mr. Smythe this morning about making sure those wishes are still carried out."

"Oh!" The woman's jaw gaped open, her lower lip bobbing up and down as she sought more words. A faint smile crossed her face, fleeting but still there. "I-I..." She stammered as she searched for words. "Well, I don't know what to say. Thank you, it is very much appreciated."

"You don't have to say anything. Those were Lady MacKenzie's wishes, and I intend to respect them."

"Well, if you say so. It's no small thing. No small thing at all and means very much to Mr. Fraser and me."

Cate gave her a nod and a warm smile.

"Well, Lady—" she paused. "Lady Cate, I suppose I should let you get on with your business. If you need any help with your boxes, let me know, and I'll get Jack after it to help." With that, the woman began clearing dishes, her air of duty settling back in.

Cate smiled as she departed from the dining room. It seemed she had turned a corner with the woman. At least she hoped the use of her first name indicated a new understanding.

As she pushed into the library, she found Gayle eyeing the boxes.

Gayle shot her a glance before returning her gaze to the stack. "Well, it doesn't look like there are too many boxes here. You travel light. We can finish this before I leave! It appears this stack is all marked clothing. We may want to enlist the help of that strapping young man, Jack, to carry these to the bedroom.”

“Yes, I agree. I lugged those all by myself to the post office. I don’t have any desire to heft them around this place.”

“Well, why don’t we take the grand tour first before we dive into that? On our way, if we come across Jack, we can ask him to move the boxes.”

“Let’s start on the first floor, then move to the second?”

Cate and Gayle spent the next hour going from room to room of the used portion of the castle with Riley trailing behind. The little guy started to tire as they explored the second floor, so Cate carried him, setting him down occasionally when he wanted to get a good smell. The castle proved to be magnificent, with each room more beautiful than the next.

Several wings were closed off, and Cate peeked into them, deciding to explore them later.

“I feel like someone should pinch me and wake me from this dream,” Cate said as they pushed back into the library.

“All you’d end up with is a bruise if you did that, Cate,” Gayle quipped.

“I’d half expect to end up back in my apartment, to be honest with you. This is quite a change for me.”

“I can imagine, but I’m sure you will take it in stride. You’re a MacKenzie woman, Cate. They’re a tough breed.”

Cate pondered for a moment. “Wow. That is the first time I’ve thought about that. I guess, in some small way, I am a MacKenzie. It is nice to have a sense of belonging again. You know, it’s funny, but I have such a homey feeling here. I never had that in Aberdeen.”

Gayle smiled, then sighed. “Well, I’ll bet what will really give you a sense of belonging would be to have your things put in their places. As much as I hate to stop admiring your new home, it might be time to roll up our sleeves and do some work.”

They entered the library and Cate eyed the stack of boxes, her shoulders slumping. “Ugh, you may be right. Let me see if I can find Jack and have him carry the clothes to the bedroom, then we can unpack the other boxes.”

“Okay, I’ll meet you in the library. I can take Riley if you’d like.”

“Okay, thanks.” Cate handed the little pup to Gayle, and they went their separate ways.

With a little help from Mrs. Fraser, Cate found Jack working outside and enlisted his help in moving her things. Jack began hauling boxes to the bedroom as Gayle and Cate unpacked the others.

“These are books,” Cate said. “We won’t have to go far to find a spot for them.”

“You have a lot of shelf space to work with, so this should be an easy task.”

Cate and Gayle spent the next several hours unpacking boxes from the library and finding places for the items. They took a brief break to eat the sandwiches that Mrs. Fraser provided them for lunch. She had delivered them on a tray complete with a side of potato chips and a pickle.

“Wow, you got on her good side, Cate,” Gayle said, raising her eyebrows at the meal.

“Oh, yes, I spoke with her this morning about staying on and about giving her the cottage as Lady MacKenzie wanted. I think it eased her mind.”

“I’ll say—and it went a long way to ease my rumbling stomach thanks to her lunch delivery. I am famished.”

“Me too. I’m starving after all this work.”

They chatted as they lunched, but dove right back into the unpacking after Gayle jested that if she sat much longer, she’d never go back to work. Around half-past four, they finished all the boxes in the library.

“Well,” Cate said, checking the timepiece that hung around her neck, “no sense in starting anything else now. Let’s break for the day and start tomorrow.”

Gayle agreed, and they both returned to their rooms to freshen up before dinner.

Cate slogged through the doors and collapsed onto the chaise. Exhaustion coursed through every muscle, and her eyes threatened to close. She hoped to sleep better tonight.

After a few minutes, she forced herself from the chaise to change for dinner. A glimpse into the mirror startled her.

Cate gaped at the ghastly sight in the mirror. She stared with wide eyes at the gruesome display, wincing.

“What a sight,” she exclaimed to Riley.

Her disheveled ponytail escaped from its hair tie at every angle. A black smudge decorated her cheek. Her mascara smeared below her eyes when she had wiped away a bead of sweat.

She worked on making herself presentable before she headed downstairs to the dining room. There she found Mr. Smythe waiting for her. Gayle arrived a few moments later.

“The execution of Lady MacKenzie’s will has been completed,” he began as they found their seats. “You are officially the new Countess of Dunhavenshire and the new owner of Dunhaven Castle, its grounds, and its contents.”

As he finished his statement, Mrs. Fraser entered the room carrying three full champagne flutes and a bottle of what remained of the bubbly liquid.

“I thought we could have a toast to celebrate the occasion,” Mr. Smythe said with a smile.

Cate marveled at the sight. It was the first smile she’d ever seen from him.

“Oh, how lovely.” Gayle said.

Mrs. Fraser made her way around the table as everyone selected a flute.

“Oh, before we toast,” Cate said, “Mrs. Fraser, won’t you get a glass and join us? Also, Mr. Fraser and Jack if they are close?”

Mrs. Fraser’s eyebrows raised, but she answered in stride, “I would be honored, Lady Cate.” The woman disappeared and returned with Mr. Fraser and Jack in tow and three additional glasses. She poured a small amount into each.

When everyone had a glass in hand, Mr. Smythe stood, raised his, and said, “To the new Countess of Dunhavenshire and mistress of Dunhaven Castle. May you enjoy many happy years here.”

Tears pricked Cate’s eyes. She wondered if the sleepless night was making her more emotional than she usually was or if the change in location had that profound of an effect on her.

She smiled and blinked away the tears. “Thank you.”

Everyone raised their glass to Cate before taking a sip. Mr. Smythe regained his seat and thanked Mrs. Fraser for the well-timed delivery.

Mrs. Fraser disappeared with her tray to retrieve the meal. Mr. Fraser finished his glass of champagne and headed after her—as did Jack, after congratulating Cate on her new ownership.

After dinner, Mrs. Fraser served a Scottish Berry Brulee, a special dessert she’d made for the occasion. Following the lovely treat, Mr. Smythe excused himself to pack for his early morning departure.

Cate and Gayle opted to spend a bit more time chatting in the main sitting room before retiring. After about an hour of conversation, Cate yawned.

“Sorry,” she said, “it’s not you. I didn’t sleep well last night. Too much excitement, I think.”

“Oh no, I hope you sleep better tonight. Perhaps we should both retire. I’m getting tired myself from all that work we did,” Gayle said.

“I hope so, too. Well, why don’t we call it a night? I just need to take Riley out one more time. That is, if I can wake him.”

Riley lounged in Cate’s lap where he had curled up after dinner. Light snoring announced his relaxation.

Gayle laughed. “Tuckered out, buddy? You did some hard work today watching us unpack.”

Riley’s eyes opened to slits and he slid them sideways to peek at Gayle. With a sigh, he closed them as though he was too tired to even respond.

“Come on, lazy bones,” Cate said, poking him gently to rouse him from his slumber. It earned her nothing but another weary sigh.

“I bet you’d get up for a treat,” Cate said.

Riley’s eyes opened wide, and he bounded to his feet.

Gayle chuckled. “Wow, that got him up. Well, I’ll leave you two to it. I’m heading up. See you in the morning. I hope you sleep well tonight.”

“Thanks, Gayle. Good night.”

The sun rose over the moors as Cate stretched and yawned. No ghosts had kept her awake the night before.

The dining table was lonelier without Mr. Smythe, who had departed before breakfast. Before his departure, he’d left a note for Cate stating he would send the paperwork for the cottage by the end of next week. The man ran entirely on efficiency.

Given Gayle’s unpacking plan, Cate started to wonder if maybe his work ethic was contagious. Gayle aimed to finish all the unpacking today; she ushered Cate straight from breakfast to her bedroom to tackle the stack of boxes.

“I may have too many clothes,” Cate said as she pulled open another box of cardigans.

“Impossible,” Gayle answered, stacking another box of riding boots in the closet.

Gayle happened upon Riley’s toys, using the box as a diversion from work. She played tug-of-war with the pup, fighting with him over a stuffed moose which he loved.

“He’s so cute, Cate,” she said as Riley tugged his moose away from her grip, prancing to the fireplace to gnaw on it.

Cate smiled after the little dog. “He’s my whole world. I adopted him after my parents died when I needed a friend the most.”

Gayle pushed herself to stand, emptying a few more toys into Riley’s toy bin. “And you bonded right away, I’m sure.”

Cate pulled another rumpled sweater from the box and refolded it. “I saw him through the window of the pet shelter I always walked past on my way to the store. He hadn’t been there the day before. I adopted him on the spot. Of course, I then had to move into a pet friendly apartment, but the trade-off was worth it.”

“I can imagine. I don’t have any pets myself, but I’m always tempted to get a dog.”

After a lunch delivered by Mrs. Fraser, Gayle marveled that Cate had packed all this herself and had it all delivered to the post office on her own.

“Oh, believe me, I paid for it the next day.”

“I’ll bet. That’s a lot of work for one person. I’m glad I can be here to help you on this end at least.”

“Oh, it’s nothing. It’s not every day I get to stay in a castle, so it’s my pleasure,” Gayle said. She pulled open another box, hesitating a moment as she stared at the contents. She lifted a photo from inside. “Oh, Cate, is this picture of you and your parents?”

Cate peered over her shoulder. “Yes, that’s us at my college graduation.” She pulled the picture from Gayle’s fingers and stared at it for a moment before placing it back into the box. Tears threatened to appear as the familiar wave of sadness swept over her, more pronounced today than before. She stood in a Scottish castle. She’d never have the opportunity to share this with her parents. Had they been aware of its existence?

“Cate, I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to open it. I thought it was clothes.”

“It’s okay,” Cate said, shaking the memory from her mind. “I’m used to it. It just struck me how crazy the situation is. I’m here in a castle of a family somehow related to mine. I was wondering if my parents knew about this place. If they did, they never mentioned it to me.”

Gayle gave her a consoling smile.

Cate stuffed the lid back on the box. “Anyway, you can just put this box in the back of the closet. It’s just a few of my parents’ things that I kept after they died. If you want to see something more interesting related to my parents, check out that box there.” Cate pointed to the box that had been underneath the one she was carrying to the closet.

Gayle opened it and pulled out a few items. Her brow furrowed as she stared at the odd collection.

“This is a collection of items that my dad brought back for me from his trips to the museum. Wherever he traveled, he’d bring back some unique trinket. I kept every one of them. My mom would help me put together fact cards for them after he brought them back. See this one here, it's an Egyptian cartouche. And," Cate said, digging in the box, "here is my little fact card that I wrote when I was about nine."

Gayle studied the object and the card, written in blue ink and decorated in colored pencil and marker with Egyptian hieroglyphs. "Oh, how cute, Cate. You really had quite the unique childhood, didn't you?"

"Yes, I did. And I loved every minute of it. While most of my schoolmates were playing hopscotch, I was pretending to find artifacts in the museum's storeroom."

"So, you didn't mind the long hours at the museum? Didn't long to play dolls with your friends?"

"No, I have always been an introvert, so I enjoyed the time alone with my artifacts. I learned a lot there, too. I would spend lots of time with the other museum workers learning about what they did or helping them with small jobs."

"Who knew you'd grow up to live in a museum, right?"

"I know. This place kind of reminds me of my childhood. I think that's why I immediately felt so at home."

"And soon we'll have you unpacked, so you can enjoy it as your new home."

Cate smiled in agreement. They finished the rest of the boxes, ending about an hour before dinner as they had the day before.

After freshening up, a less taxing affair than it had been the day before, Cate and Gayle met for dinner. Both ladies missed Mr. Smythe's quiet demeanor.

With all the work done, they discussed their plans for the weekend. They explored the estate's grounds on Saturday. Riley frolicked through the massive grassy areas and played fetch with Gayle. It was like living in a park with a museum on the grounds, Cate thought.

As Sunday came to a close, Cate, Riley, and Gayle enjoyed one final walk around the grounds together. Cate dreaded Gayle's departure with every passing moment. While she was used to living alone, she had been enjoying the company of having other people with her. She also wasn't certain how she'd feel staying in the castle alone.

Dinner, at least for Cate, was dampened a little because it was Gayle's last dinner at the castle.

Jack had been enlisted to drive Gayle to Edinburgh to catch the train. Since it would be a long day, Gayle retired early. Cate opted to stay up a little longer, lounging on the chaise with Riley. She occupied her thoughts with all the things she wanted to begin tomorrow on her first day alone in the castle.

When she finally retired, she stared up at the ceiling, unable to fall asleep. She drummed her fingers against the pale blue silk duvet. After an hour, she climbed from her bed and wandered into the sitting room.

Shadowy blobs filled the space, and she flicked on the light to banish any lurking shadows. She plopped onto the chaise, lying back against the velvet material. As she lounged, the light next to her flickered.

Cate sat straighter, staring at it for a moment. It glowed steadily, and she eased back into the cushion.

But then the light flickered again, and her muscles tensed. Her breathing sped up and her pulse quickened. She stared up at the shade until the flickering ceased. She eyed the lamp warily as she eased back again.

As she settled onto the chaise, kicking her feet up, the room plunged into darkness.

Cate stiffened, sitting up straight and waiting for her eyes to adjust. She blindly felt her way to the lamp and clicked the switch. It did not light. She fiddled with the bulb and tried again. Nothing.

She forced herself to remain calm, shuffling to the door and peeking into the hallway beyond. She swallowed hard as she stared down the long, dark hall.

“Gayle?” she called into the darkness.

She tied her robe tighter around her and raised her chin as she stepped into the hall. She inched down it, her eyes wide, searching all the dark corners. With her fingers tracing the wall, she made her way around a corner and into a new hall.

“Gayle?” she tried again.

No answer. Perhaps she was soundly asleep.

Closed doors lined the dark space, lit only by the moonlight streaming through the window at the end. Cate wandered down the hall, turning another corner and finding a set of stairs leading down.

She descended to a back hallway, spotting the closed off wing at the end of the long hall she spilled into.

“I should have brought a flashlight,” she lamented to herself as she crept past the shadowy blobs filling the walls.

She wound around, finding the foyer and retracing her earlier steps to the library. She used the moonlight to make her way to the heavy desk and searched the drawers for a flashlight. She found nothing but matches. She shoved them into her robe’s pocket.

“Okay, half the battle,” she murmured as she spun to scan the room. “Now, can I find a candle?”

With her hands outstretched, she wandered across the room, bumping into the leather chair near the fireplace and stubbing her toe. She hopped around on one foot as she cursed the darkness.

With her fingers guiding her along the form of the supple leather chair, she felt her way toward the bookcases. She touched wood and dropped to her knees, searching for the handle of the cubby at the bottom of the bookshelf.

She found the round wooden pull and tugged on it. In the dim light, she felt around inside the small cupboard. Her hand struck cold metal. She wrapped her fingers around it and pulled it out.

The smell of wax wafted past her nostrils and a smile tugged at the corner of her lips. With a shaky hand, she pulled the matches from her pocket and struck one.

The flame flared to life, providing temporary light. She held it to the wick of one of the partially burned candles in the candelabra, lighting it. Quickly, she lit the other two before waving the flame out. A wisp of smoke rose in the air as Cate laid the burnt match on the fireplace bricks and stood with the candelabra raised high in the air.

She crept out of the library and toward the foyer, glancing up the large staircase. “Gayle?”

With no response received, she continued through the halls, wandering in search of her guest or a fuse box.

She descended the stairs to the servants’ area, roaming down the hall toward the kitchen.

A figure darted out from the pantry. Cate froze, her candles flickering in a slight breeze. She stared wide-eyed at the fuzzy form clad in white. She held her breath as her heart pounded against her ribs, and her legs wobbled under her as she stared at the specter.

Cate's muscles tensed and she struggled to stop the candelabra from wobbling in her hands. The flames flickered as her hands trembled.

Her breathing turned ragged as she squinted at the white form in the distance.

A voice called to her, but she barely heard it over the blood rushing through her ears.

"Cate," the voice said again. A bright light shone into her eyes. She squinted against it, shielding her face with her hand.

"Cate," the voice said again. She recognized it as Gayle's warm, pleasant tone.

"Gayle," she said, breathing a sigh of relief and pressing a hand to her chest.

The woman's white robe swished around her as she strode down the hall, lowering the flashlight she held. "The power went out."

"Yes, I know," Cate answered. "I tried calling for you, but I thought maybe you'd slept through it, and I didn't want to wake you."

"No," Gayle answered, "I was down here helping myself to a cup of tea when it went off. I was just retrieving a flashlight from the pantry and heading for the panel."

She grabbed Cate's arm and tugged her forward. "Come on, I'll show you where it is in case you ever need it."

Cate blew out the flames on the candelabra and set it in the pantry before they continued down the hall. "Does this happen often?"

“Not really,” Gayle said. “Though often enough that you may like to know where the panel is. Gertrude complained about it happening every so often, but it wasn’t a weekly occurrence.”

“That’s good to know.”

Gayle guided her to the fuse box. “This one services the main castle. There are others in each wing, though since no one uses those, you won’t have to worry about that unless you plan to reopen them.”

“Good to know,” Cate said with a nod as Gayle swung the metal door open. It creaked on its hinges, revealing a massive grid of fuses and switches.

“Looks like it’s the main that clicked off. Silly thing.” Gayle swung a large handle to the opposite side. The hum of electricity filled the air, and lights popped on in the nearby kitchen. She closed the creaky panel door and dusted her hands. “There we are.”

“Lucky you were here when that happened,” Cate said. “I’m not too proud to admit I would have probably been afraid.”

Gayle offered her a warm smile and a pat on the arm. “I think that’s natural in a new house. Especially one of this size.”

Cate offered an appreciative smile at her easy manner.

“Now, how about joining me for that tea before you head back to bed? With all the excitement, it may help.” Gayle wrapped her arm around Cate’s and led her toward the kitchen.

They chatted over a hot cup of tea, laughing about Cate’s assumption that Gayle was a ghost before returning to bed. Riley still snored when Cate returned, never having budged from the nest in which he’d buried himself earlier.

Despite the late night, Cate arose early to see Gayle off. As Jack loaded her luggage into the boot, they said their goodbyes.

Gayle pulled her into a warm embrace. “I’m just an email away if you need anything.”

“Thanks, Gayle. I really appreciate all your help.”

Gayle gave her a wave as she slid into the passenger’s seat. The car disappeared down the drive in a cloud of dust. When it was no longer visible, Cate twisted to study the castle’s exterior.

The castle loomed over Cate as she stared up at its bricks, painted yellow by the early morning sun. Her tour with Gayle had been far from extensive, and she'd cataloged a list of rooms she'd like to explore in more detail. In particular, she hoped to find resources to map out her family tree.

"Well, Riley, it's just you and me now, kid. Let's do some exploring."

She stepped into the expansive foyer, glancing around as she selected her starting point.

"Where shall we start?" Cate asked Riley.

She scanned the many halls leading off the marble entryway floor. Two wings had been added to the castle at a later date. Perhaps she'd explore one of those. Despite the lengths taken to match the finishes in the original castle, the subtle differences in the craftsmanship betrayed the different completion years.

Disappointment filled Cate as she wandered through the first-floor rooms. She regretted never having had the chance to meet her predecessor. The woman seemed to have possessed an exceptional aptitude to maintain the estate, its contents, and keep the castle up to date while maintaining its centuries-old charm. She hoped she could fill her shoes.

Riley, his nose to the ground, led her toward the sitting room that they had used the past several evenings. The generously sized room centered around a massive fireplace. A grouping of furniture, including a burgundy velvet couch detailed with carved wooden trim, a coffee table, and a few matching armchairs huddled around the fireplace.

Cate ran her fingers along the heavy burgundy draperies that garlanded the windows. Thick enough to block out any light when drawn, Cate assumed they were also used to keep out cold drafts in the winter weather. Paintings adorned the walls—some of people, others of landscape scenes. An avid fan of this style of art, Cate imagined spending hours enjoying the artwork in the castle alone.

Riley sniffed around the room for a few more moments before curling up on the large area rug near the fireplace.

"Tired already?" Cate joked. "You have a rest while I explore the rest of the room."

She ran her hands along the cherrywood writing desk against the wall, imagining centuries of MacKenzies finishing correspondence at it. She sank into the burgundy upholstered chair, rubbing her hands along the intricately carved arms, a smile curling the corners of her mouth upward. Her eyes floated up to the painting of a tranquil landscape.

She wrapped her fingers around the chair's arms, afraid if she let go, she'd find out it wasn't real. What a change from her cramped apartment.

She recalled the threadbare armchair there. The one she'd sat in when she'd received the news of her inheritance. It wouldn't fit in this space, she thought, as she scanned the room's other pieces.

She pulled her cell phone from her pocket and snapped a few pictures, intending to send them to Molly.

She spent an hour exploring the room, then another three hours exploring the other rooms on the main floor, including the smaller study, the large library, the dining room, a solarium, a tea room, and a portrait hall.

The portrait hall's many paintings captivated her interest and spawned a new project. As she studied the portrait of one Randolph MacKenzie, Cate decided to write a book about the castle's history.

After a thorough tour of the first floor, Cate headed downstairs to explore the servants' area. She stepped into the pantry Gayle had been in the night before, spotting the flashlight she'd used near the entryway on the shelf.

She crossed the hall, marveling at the size of the storage area for the dishes and silver. The large square room, with three walls covered in wooden shelves, made her kitchen look small.

She wandered down the hall and into the kitchen. Mrs. Fraser bustled around the space with a dish towel slung over her shoulder. She cracked the oven door open and peered inside before giving whatever baked inside a satisfied nod and closing the door. She spun to continue her work when she caught sight of Cate.

She grabbed her chest, her eyes wide. "Oh, Lady Cate. You startled me. Whatever are you and little Riley doing below decks?"

Riley wandered to the butcher block prep area, balancing on his hind legs as his nose sniffed in the air at the juicy piece of uncooked meat lying on the surface.

Cate winced as she scooped Riley from the floor. "Oh, sorry, Mrs. Fraser, I didn't mean to. I was just exploring a little."

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands on the dish towel as she screwed up her face. "Exploring? Down here? There's not much down here, Lady Cate. Is there something that I can help you with?"

"No, not at all. The servants' area is just as impressive as the upstairs from a historian's perspective. It's fascinating how they built these homes and how they were run.”

Mrs. Fraser glanced around her workspace, her eyes settling on the beef slab on the prep counter. “I dinnae see what would be of interest in the kitchen other than the food. And speaking of food, I’ve nearly got lunch prepared if you’d like to head to the dining room, or perhaps take it in the sitting room or library?”

Cate bit her lower lip and lifted a shoulder. “Actually, if you wouldn’t mind, I had hoped to eat lunch down here with you. I’d like to get to know everyone.”

Mrs. Fraser’s jaw flapped open as she drew her chin back. She wiggled a finger at the kitchen floor. “You want to eat here? At the servant’s table? In the kitchen?”

Cate shrugged again and gave her another tentative smile. “Yes. Well, if you don’t mind. If you’d prefer to eat alone, I would understand.”

“Well—” Mrs. Fraser glanced around the room as if she was searching for a reason to decline the request. After recovering, she answered, “I don’t mind. I doubt Mr. Fraser or Jack would mind, so please make yourself at home.”

Cate took a seat, balancing Riley on her lap while Mrs. Fraser set the table. Mr. Fraser and Jack pushed through the door minutes later.

“Joining us for lunch today, m’lady?” Jack asked.

Riley leapt from Cate’s lap and raced toward the tall Scot. He patted him on the head before washing his hands at the sink.

“Yes, I’d like to get to know everyone—if no one minds, that is.”

With no objections, Cate kept her seat, using the meal to inquire about each of her staff members. The daughter of one of the maids, Mrs. Fraser had grown up on the estate, living at Dunhaven Castle her entire life and staying on to work there. Mr. Fraser had grown up in the town of Dunhaven too, and he had worked on the estate since he was a young. Jack also hailed from Dunhaven. After doing some traveling as a younger man, he settled back in his hometown. With Jack as estate manager, Mr. Fraser was finishing out the last few years of his career before he retired.

After thanking them for their hospitality and Mrs. Fraser for the lunch, she climbed up the stairs to explore the bedrooms and suites.

On the second floor, she found several potential sources of information for her research and ancestor search. At the very least, her findings would provide her with several hours of entertainment. Several trunks littered a storage area of a bedroom containing journals, old letters, and clothing.

She spent the entire afternoon going through the upstairs, leaving herself just enough time to freshen up before dinner. With a tray in the library, Cate lounged in a leather armchair with her meal and a book.

As she slouched in the generous seat, she scanned the room. She imagined rain pattering against the massive windows and a roaring fire in the fireplace. She pulled her legs up onto the chair, her socks slipping on the soft leather. This would provide an excellent space for her research and for relaxation.

After a bit of reading, Cate carried Riley up to her suite. She set him on the bed as she pulled on her pajamas. She stared at the bed, suddenly feeling wide awake. She recognized the reason. This would mark her first night alone in the castle.

With a wrinkled nose, she climbed into bed and slipped under the covers, settling in next to Riley. She lay in bed, listening to the silence of the massive castle and cursing Molly for sending her that list of haunted castle movies, all of which she'd watched. Despite the sense of belonging that she felt immediately when she arrived, she couldn't deny the spooky atmosphere of the moonlit halls.

She squeezed the gold timepiece in her palm as her eyes flitted around the room, using it to check the time occasionally, watching as the night passed slowly. As her eyes slid shut, she rubbed the smooth, cool metal surface with her thumb like a serenity stone.

The motion soothed her, and she began to nod off as the time crept past midnight.

A loud ticking noise startled her awake shortly after she nodded off. Cate snapped her eyes open, searching for the source of the noise.

She glanced down at the timepiece still clutched in her hand. The ticking seemed to emanate from it. It quieted as she opened the face and stared at the second hand, which crept ever so slowly around the face.

Cate shook the device. The second hand continued to crawl around the circle. She tried winding the watch, but it had no effect.

She stared at the long shadows cast across the floor by the moonlight streaming through the lace curtain. "Great. Not even a week with the family heirloom before I've broken it."

She collapsed back into her pillows, wondering if anyone in the area serviced watches. As her head hit the pillow, another noise broke the silence. She bolted upright, her ears straining to listen.

Light tinkling music filled the air. She swallowed hard as one thought permeated her mind. Who was playing music in an empty castle?

CHAPTER 10

The music continued to fill the air as Cate gripped the covers tightly. Too afraid to move, she sat in her bed, stunned for another moment, her jaw gaping open and her brow furrowed. She must be imagining it. No one else was in the castle outside of her and Riley. And she hadn't left any music playing.

The sound continued. Cate bit her lower lip, steeling her nerves as she dangled her feet over the bed's edge. After slipping her feet into her slippers, she tiptoed across the room. She squinted back at the bed, searching for Riley. The soft noise didn't seem to be bothering him. He hadn't moved from wherever he'd buried himself, nestled deep in the covers.

She crept into her sitting room, inching her way across the dimly lit space to the doors. The music increased in volume, ending in a crescendo.

Cate raced the final few feet to the doors and flung them open. She stepped into the hall, straining to listen. Nothing.

She stood there, eyes darting around the darkness for any sign of life. She considered searching the castle, but the incident had unnerved her, and she hurried back to the safety of her suite.

Molly's words rattled around in her mind as she climbed back into her bed. Was her castle haunted? How else could she explain the music she'd heard playing?

After thirty minutes of tossing and turning, she wondered if she'd dreamt the incident. Her thumb caressed the timepiece around her neck as she concluded she must have dozed off and conjured the incident in her mind.

A lazy Riley wandered up the bed and collapsed in the crook of her arm as she dozed off, her dreams filled with the ghosts of those she had encountered in the portrait gallery.

A drowsy Cate pulled herself from bed the next morning, regretting her midnight romp and subsequent obsessing over it. She rolled her eyes at her silly behavior—creeping through the castle halls in search of phantom music. She'd dreamt the entire thing. She must have.

As she pulled on her boots, she recalled still hearing the music when she'd risen from her bed. Had she imagined that, too? It hadn't disturbed Riley, and she knew the little pup had to have more sensitive ears than she did.

Maybe she couldn't write the incident off.

The timepiece provided an even more perplexing conundrum. Last night, it slowed almost to a stop. She thought she had broken it. This morning, it was keeping time just fine. Ticking away as though nothing happened. At least she didn't need to call a repairman, so she could cross that off her list.

She dragged herself for a morning walk with Riley, a plan he approved of with a kiss on her cheek.

Wrapped in his new tartan coat, Riley ventured into the morning air. Heavy fog surrounded the castle, and Cate snuggled deeper into her jacket. There was something romantic about the way the mist clung to the moors surrounding the castle. She enjoyed the muted scenery around her before the sun began to burn off the morning fog.

Riley frolicked through the grassy knolls. He pranced around the estate as though he was the lord of the manor. She smiled at his happy wandering. Riley had warmed to their new surroundings as quickly as she had. And he seemed to be less disturbed by the strange goings-on.

She spent most of the morning exploring the outdoors. Her property seemed endless. She settled onto the still-wet grass near the loch, enjoying the summer sun as Riley collapsed in a heap after his big morning. The leaves on the large tree rustled in the slight breeze as she leaned against the rough bark, gazing out over the rippling pond.

After lunch, she settled into one of the big leather armchairs in the library with a mystery novel she'd found on the shelves. The engaging plot couldn't hold her interest, though, and after an hour of reading, Cate's mind began to wander to the events of the previous night.

She stared down at the timepiece hanging around her neck. Its warm gold contrasted against her dark blue tunic. She lifted it from the fabric and stared at it before popping the face open. It ticked away in perfect time.

In the middle of the night, she swore it had been slow. Her nose wrinkled as she stared into space. She also swore she'd heard music coming from somewhere in the castle.

She ruled out her theory that she had dreamt it all. She had been fully awake. The music lasted several minutes, enough time for her to climb out of bed and walk around searching for the source.

She stared down at the book in her lap. A dark-haired heroine in a flowing gown ran from a rambling castle, her hair blowing and her face a mask of fear. Perhaps she'd read too many gothic novels. Or her subconscious was reacting to Molly's teasing about haunted Scottish castles.

She glanced down at the timepiece again. It still ticked the time away perfectly.

After a few more moments of pondering, she rose from her chair, intent on searching downstairs for anything that could have produced the mysterious music. She needed a break from reading. Her lack of sleep threatened to make her doze off in the chair. If that happened, she would never sleep again tonight.

Lounging on the floor nearby, Riley lifted his head.

"Want to explore, Riley?" she asked. In response, Riley let his head sink back onto the carpet, too tired from his morning excursion to explore anything. "All right, all right, I'll carry you."

She lifted the small pup into her arms. He let his head drop over her arm, his floppy ears dangling in the air. Cate chuckled at his position. "You're so lazy."

The little dog didn't react, letting his eyes slide shut as she carried him around the house. "The truth is, Riley, I'm afraid to go alone. You don't seem to be bothered by the ghosts, but I am."

Apart from her bedroom suite, the most familiar room to her was the library. Nothing existed there to produce the music. She wandered through the halls, searching the other rooms on this floor. She found nothing. In the tea room, she found an old gramophone, but it was only decorative. After a thorough investigation of it, she failed to produce any music from the device. The likelihood that it had sprung to life in the middle of the night and played music was low.

She found a Victrola in the small study, but the plug, lying across the burgundy carpet feet from a wall plug meant it couldn't have produced the noise. She shoved the plug into the wall and switched on the unit. Nothing but a clicking sounded as no record sat on the turntable.

She returned to the library and laid Riley on the rug to resume his nap. Even the dog knew the search was a fool's errand. She sighed as she eased back into her chair, now ready to chalk the experience up to being overtired and overstimulated by her surroundings.

All homes had their own set of sounds and idiosyncrasies that one must get used to. She must have heard some noise, the wind or bells outside, which sounded like music. The explanation far from satisfied her, but it would have to do for now.

She flipped her book open to where she'd left off, just as Mrs. Fraser arrived with her dinner.

"Any good?" the woman inquired, flicking a finger toward the book.

"I'm really not certain," Cate answered as she slid it onto the coffee table. "I haven't read more than a few pages."

"Well, I'm certain you'll have some time this evening."

Cate smiled as she tugged the tray onto her lap. The aroma of tomato basil soup wafted to her nostrils and made her stomach rumble. "This looks delicious."

"I hope you enjoy it. If you have any meal preferences, just let me know. I aim to please."

Cate shook her head as she stirred the croutons around in the reddish liquid. "I'm not very picky. At home, I'd eat cereal for dinner."

Mrs. Fraser's face blanched at the idea. "Well, you'll not eat cereal here. Not if I have anything to say about it."

"I'd venture to say given the meals I've had in the last week, my diet has vastly improved."

Mrs. Fraser raised her chin, a satisfied smile crossing her lips. "And I'll be sure to leave you a dinner for your Sunday meal. I'll not have you eating cereal, even on my day off."

"Oh, Mrs. Fraser, no. You don't have to do extra work. Your day off is your day off."

“Nonsense. I’ll always leave a meal made up for you in the refrigerator. You’ll just have to heat it.”

“I—”

Mrs. Fraser wagged a finger at her. “I’ll not be told no. I’ll leave it there, and if you dinnae eat it, that’s up to you.”

“Don’t worry, I’ll eat it.”

Mrs. Fraser gave her a curt nod. “Now, is there anything else I can get you?”

Cate glanced down at the meal. The soup paired with a perfectly browned grilled cheese sandwich and a sliced pickle looked complete. “No, I don’t think so.”

Cate raised her hand before the woman strode from the room. “Oh, actually, I did have a question for you.”

Mrs. Fraser raised her eyebrows to prompt her to continue.

“Did Lady MacKenzie ever mention hearing music at night? Or bells or anything?”

Mrs. Fraser’s brow furrowed as her eyes darted around. “Music? Nay. Why?”

Cate shook her head and waved the question away. “Oh, I thought I heard something last night. I figured maybe something was left on or maybe a local church sounded their bells or something.”

“Nay, the church wouldn’t sound the bells in the middle of the night.”

Cate shrugged and returned to stirring her soup. “Must have been my imagination.”

“Likely just the groanings of an old house.”

Mrs. Fraser smiled and nodded at her before she strode from the room, pulling the doors partially shut behind her.

Cate retrieved the novel from the coffee table, setting it on the large square arm to read while she ate dinner. She hoped to push the incident from her mind and let the book consume her thoughts. Instead, the damsel, a governess at an English country home with a frightening reputation, encountered strange event after strange event.

Cate found herself suspiciously eyeing the dark corners of the room as she tugged her cardigan tighter around her. As the woman slinked through the castle halls in search of the source of phantom music, Cate snapped the book closed.

“No good?” Mrs. Fraser asked as she strode into the room.

Cate jumped in the chair, the silverware in the empty bowl rattling around as it bobbed against her thighs.

“Sorry, I didn’t mean to frighten you.”

Cate steadied the tray and passed it off to the woman. “It’s okay. I’m used to living alone, that’s all.”

Mrs. Fraser slid the tray onto her arm and glanced at the book again. “I dare say you’ll be too afraid to sleep after reading that book.”

Cate chuckled at her assessment and nodded. “Yes, I just read a scary passage and decided to take a break.”

Silence fell over the castle again as the Frasers and Jack departed for their respective homes, leaving Cate alone for the night.

With a wary glance around the room, she slouched lower into her chair and returned to her book.

“Just fiction,” she reminded herself.

An eerie pall hung over her. Her conversation with Molly sprang into her thoughts again. She pushed it aside, trying not to give in to her building panic. Mrs. Fraser didn’t believe in ghosts. She didn’t believe in ghosts. At least, that’s what she told herself.

Her eyes grew heavy as she read. She let her head collapse back into the soft leather behind her. Her head lolled to the side. As it dropped, she jerked herself awake. Drowsy, it took her a moment to wake up.

She sucked in a deep breath as movement caught her attention. She whipped her head toward it. One of the heavy draperies swayed back and forth.

Cate forced herself to relax.

“Probably just a draft,” she murmured to herself. The windows were old. They probably leaked. Though no cool air wafted across her skin, Cate sighed and ignored it. The last thing she needed was another unnerving incident right before bed.

The drape continued to move, shifting direction in a larger motion. If this large of a movement was coming from a drafty window, Cate was sure she would feel a draft.

She would need to investigate. There had to be an explanation.

Cate rose from the chair, swallowing hard and steeling her nerves. With a deep breath, she inched toward the moving curtain. It stopped moving as soon as she took a step. Whatever unseen force had been at work suddenly halted. Had it felt her presence? Was it now gone?

Her heart beat hard in her chest, and her pulse quickened as she stared at the curtain. It hung motionless. After several tense moments, her pulse slowed. She narrowed her eyes as she eased back toward the chair's supple leather seat.

Before she sat down, the drape whipped wildly again. Cate bolted upright, her heart rising into her throat. She stumbled backward, smacking into the chair as she tried to skirt around it.

There was no gust of wind. And no drafty window could produce this.

With another hard swallow, Cate squared her shoulders and raised her chin. She had to learn what force caused this. She pushed herself to take one step forward—then another, and another, and another.

She steadied herself a safe distance from the curtain and reached for it. As her fingers grazed the fabric, Cate's eyes widened as the source of the movement revealed itself.

CHAPTER 11

Cate stared with her jaw agape at the flailing curtain before a black and white face peeked from under the tartan fabric. Cate's shoulder slumped, and she clutched her chest in relief.

"RILEY!" she exclaimed. "You scared me half to death."

In her dazed state after dozing off, she'd failed to notice Riley wasn't still asleep in his spot on the rug. She raced over to the little dog and scooped him up, ruffling the fur on his head. He gave her an appreciative kiss on the cheek.

"I think I've been watching too many spooky movies and reading too many gothic novels. That's enough excitement for one night, buddy. Let's head to bed before I scare myself again. Or you do."

As Cate slid between the sheets, she glanced around the room. What odd experience would disturb her sleep tonight? She'd not had a restful night's sleep since she arrived. She slouched down and switched off the light.

Despite the unexpected incident with Riley, exhaustion set in and she slept soundly through the night. The next several days passed without incident. She began to settle into life, chalking up her odd experiences to her own nerves.

She started to fall into a routine, and castle life became normal. Her sense of belonging grew with each passing day as she became more familiar with her familial home.

The paperwork arrived from Mr. Smythe to transfer the cottage from her ownership to the Fraser's, along with instructions on signing them and sending them back. They celebrated with a small cake after Jack delivered them to the courier in town.

At the end of the week, she received an email from Gayle asking how her first week in her new home went. She responded that she was getting along well, omitting her two scares, fearing it may paint her as a foolish girl giving in to ghost stories. Already fading from her memory, she chalked them up to being overstimulated.

Cate filled her new free time with novels and research into her family and the castle's history. She started with the resources at the castle. During her exploration, she's stumbled upon several journals and photo albums. Even if they explained nothing about her family or the castle's history, they could provide an afternoon of entertainment that didn't involve a governess lurking around a creepy castle.

Alone in the castle on Sunday, she spent the day inside. Gray clouds darkened the skies. A chilly wind gusted from the north, and rain pelted the windows. The weather added to the haunted ambiance of the castle.

Cate busied herself exploring some of the materials she had found. With several photo albums tucked under her arm, she carried a warm cup of tea to her sitting room. After nestling under a heavy blanket with Riley on her chaise, she pulled one of the large photo albums onto her lap. The album contained pictures from the early twentieth century. While she learned little from them, she stared at each of them, wondering what life was like in the bygone era.

She picked up a second album and paged through it. With photos from the more recent past, this album contained some pictures of Lady Gertrude MacKenzie. The images of her benefactor fascinated her as she slowly paged through the book. Pictures of Gertrude as a small child filled the early pages. Halfway through, the images showed Gertrude as a young woman. With the labels below each photograph, Cate identified Gertrude's mother, Mary, and her father, Oliver.

She grabbed a sheet of paper and jotted them down, drawing a tiny family tree. As she stared at the three names, she wrote her own, drawing a line between her and Gertrude and punctuating it with a question mark.

"Cousins, but how?" she murmured.

When Cate turned the page again, a new face stared out at her. A child who looked to be about six years old stood outside the castle with Gertrude. She focused on the caption at the bottom. A gasp escaped her as she read it. Riley popped his head up at Cate's expression of surprise, trying to determine the reason behind it.

The small boy's name caught her eye. Logan MacKenzie. Logan was her father's name, though his last name was Kensie. What were the chances Gertrude had another relative named Logan? She tried to recall Mr. Smythe's statement about Gertrude having her parents' address. Had they known each other?

"Logan MacKenzie?" she said aloud. "Riley, maybe this is my dad."

She stared for another minute at the picture. Could this boy, standing outside of the castle with Gertrude, have been her father as a child? If it was, had he forgotten this visit because of his young age? Coming to a castle didn't seem like something you would forget, even at the tender age of six, but it may have happened.

With renewed interest, Cate examined the album further, finding more pictures of the boy in various rooms of the castle. On another page, Cate found a picture of the boy with his parents. She read their names: Charles and Sophie MacKenzie. Her grandparents' names were Charles and Sophie Kensie. It couldn't be a coincidence.

Had her grandparents changed their last name, or had there been some miscommunication on their paperwork when they moved to the U.S.? If it was the latter, why was the story never told? And if it was the former, what prompted them to change their name?

Cate had more questions than answers. She thought her parents had never mentioned family because there was no family to mention. All she was told was that her grandparents moved to the United States when her father had been a small boy. Her grandparents passed away before her birth, so she didn't have much information about them. Her parents didn't have any photos of them, so she couldn't tell if the people in the picture were younger versions of her grandparents or not.

She hoped to find more information, confused yet intrigued by this turn of events. She paged through the rest of the album, but she found no other clues. No other pictures of Logan MacKenzie or her grandparents were included in the album.

Cate set the book aside, intending to keep it in her sitting room to study again. She went through the others she brought up with her, but found no further traces of family visits from the people she suspected may be the Kensies.

As interesting as she found the other pictures, Cate's mind dwelled on the image of the small boy that she presumed was her father. She hoped to find more information in some other journals or photo albums in the castle.

The following morning, she dug through the other photo albums she'd found. Riley nudged her as she spread out on the floor of her sitting room with the photos.

"Sorry, buddy, I promise we'll go later, but you know how I am when I get my mind on something. I'm like you with a bone." Cate winked at him.

Cate spent hours poring over the photo albums but found no additional information. Frustrated, Cate took a break and went for her walk with Riley to clear her head. When she returned to the castle, she paged through the photo album with the pictures of Logan MacKenzie. She studied the images, but it was impossible to tell if this was her father. There seemed to be a resemblance, but that could be said for many pictures of children.

Cate closed the album with a sigh. Staring at the same photos again gave her no new information. Her questions continued to be left unanswered. But she was convinced this must be her father. The chances of another Logan with parents named Charles and Sophie related to the MacKenzies had to be small.

"What do you think, Riley? Is this Grandpa Kensie in his younger years?"

The dog gave her no definitive answer.

Cate gave up for the evening.

Over the next few days, she attempted to track down more information. She called the local church to inquire about birth records. They had none for her father or grandfather. On the off-chance that the relationship existed on her mother's side, she inquired about her mother, her mother's parents, or her grandmother on her father's side. They had no information on any of them.

She jabbed at her phone's display to end the call, tossing it on the desk as she bit her lower lip. With no information locally, she'd have to search elsewhere.

She wandered to the portrait gallery to study the names on the brass plaques under each portrait. Heavy wooden frames housed the likenesses of the MacKenzies that preceded her, limned behind by the red walls and gold trim. She stared up at the portrait of Douglas MacKenzie, the castle's builder. His blue eyes, much like her own, stared back. At least she knew they had one ancestor in common, even if went as far back as the 1700s.

She moved down the line to the next portrait, wondering if she was related to Finlay MacKenzie. She wandered around the room, eyeing each portrait, finding resemblances between herself and the subject. Her eyebrow arched as she stared up at the portrait of Gertrude.

In the corner, a large wooden stand housed a closed bible. Cate flicked it open, wondering when it had been printed. A family tree spread across the inside cover.

She found Gertrude and her parents, Oliver and Mary. She traced her finger up to their parents and across to find any relatives that could have led to her side of the family. A large ink stain obliterated any additional information about Oliver's generation.

Cate tried to glean any small details from underneath the ink by holding the book in every possible position, but she was unable to see what was under the inkblot. Someone's carelessness had obscured any information.

With a sigh, she snapped the book shut, concluding she'd need to change strategies. With no information in the castle or locally, she'd need to expand her search. Perhaps finding out when the name change occurred would be a prudent first step.

She returned to the library and pulled her laptop closer to her as she sank onto the desk chair. A quick search of all the major ancestry sites showed scans of immigration paperwork detailing her grandparents' move from England to the United States. The paperwork showed the surname Kensie.

Cate slumped in the chair and stared out over the roses blooming beyond the window. They'd been the Kensies when they'd moved, at least.

She leaned forward again and tapped at the keyboard, searching for birth records for her father and grandparents. She found nothing accessible in the UK databases. She slouched in the chair again, tapping the desk with her pencil as she considered her next move.

Perhaps Gayle could help. She pulled the laptop closer and typed an email asking about how they'd tracked her down.

Mrs. Fraser tottered into the room with a lunch tray as Cate closed her laptop. "Well, have you found anything out about yourself?"

"Afraid not," Cate answered. "I hope to have better news soon."

"I almost forgot to tell you, Lady Cate—I packed all Lady MacKenzie's personal belongings away and put them in the tower room. That was the best place so that they wouldn't be in your way, but you could access them. Well, what wasn't donated according to her wishes. I dinnae think you've been through those boxes yet, and I dinnae know if anything there would help you, but I thought I'd mention it. Even if it doesn't help, most of her personal items were there. I just packed everything up for you to go over whenever you have the chance."

"Oh, thank you, Mrs. Fraser. I'll take a look this afternoon."

Cate ate her lunch quickly, determined to spend her afternoon with the new stash of potential clues. After she finished lunch, she checked her email. Gayle, efficient as ever, had already responded to her enquiry.

Dear Cate,

Lady MacKenzie had given us information about a branch of the family in the United States. She knew your father's name and had an old address of his we used to track down his current status and, eventually, to find you. I'm sorry we don't have more information than that. Lady MacKenzie assured us you were the closest relative to her. Good luck with your search, and please let me know if I can be of any further assistance.

On another note, it sounds like you are settling in well. Castle life suits you.

Best, Gayle

As Mr. Smythe had mentioned, Lady MacKenzie was aware of the other branch of the family. She even had an address for Cate's father. But was her father aware of his family in Scotland? With a sigh, she realized she may never have an answer to that question.

But she had a new treasure trove to search through in the tower.

"Let's explore something new," she said, as she gathered Riley into her arms. Cate grabbed the bone Mrs. Fraser had provided Riley with earlier and began the climb to the tower.

She circled around the many stairs leading upward to the room perched at the top.

With Riley settled in the corner happily gnawing on the bone, Cate eyed the stack of boxes. Lady MacKenzie had accumulated many things during her life at Dunhaven. She had her work cut out for her. With this number of cardboard containers, it may take her more than the afternoon to finish.

“No time like the present,” she mumbled to herself. She picked a stack and dove into the first box.

Cate sifted through the possessions, finding nothing helpful to her heritage mystery. What she did find were many interesting items that told her a bit about who Gertrude MacKenzie was; there were a few decorative items that had adorned her dressing space, some perfumes, lotions, and other personal things.

One box remained in the first stack. She pulled it open, finding a large wooden jewelry box inside. Music filled the air as she flipped it open. Notes and letters spilled from the inside. Cate scanned several of these, finding typical keepsakes: a note from Gertrude’s mother on her twentieth birthday and a card she received from her mother prior to the woman’s death. Cate carefully set them aside and reached into the box for the next item. As she opened the folded note, several pictures fell out.

Cate shuffled through the photos. Lady Gertrude stood in front of the Statue of Liberty in the first. The date on the photo read 1975. In the second, Times Square created the backdrop for a smiling Gertrude. The White House was featured in the third. As Cate flipped to the fourth photo, she froze.

This time, there was no mistaking her father, now appearing close to his thirties. He stood in the middle of the picture between two women, a grin on his face. Cate’s mother stood on one side of him, and on the other side was none other than Lady Gertrude MacKenzie. The caption read Visiting Cousin Logan and his new wife.

Cate sat in stunned silence for several minutes. Lady Gertrude MacKenzie visited her father as an adult. And her father certainly met and mingled with Lady MacKenzie. But he had never mentioned her. Cate could not figure out why.

From the time she was a child, her parents told her she had no living relatives. Both her parents had been only children, so there was no close family, nor any other relatives. Her father never mentioned a visit from a Scottish cousin who lived in a castle, nor that she was still alive and was Cate’s closest living family.

Cate climbed to her feet as she contemplated the find. The timepiece swung around her neck and she grasped it. Her thumb rubbed against the cool metal as she paced the floor.

A loud ticking echoed. She glanced down at the timepiece in her hands and snapped it open, finding the second hand crawling along the face. This time she wasn't half-asleep, and she wasn't imagining things. Something was wrong with the watch. She would need to have it serviced. Judging by the time, Gayle would be out of the office. She'd ask her tomorrow for a recommendation for a repairman.

Cate returned her attention to the picture still clutched in her hand. The discovery that her father knew Lady MacKenzie, had met her as an adult, and was very much aware of their relationship surprised her. Why would her father keep something like this from her? Was there some family feud? It would explain the inkblot in the family bible.

Perhaps it wasn't just carelessness; perhaps it was a deliberate blotting out of a branch of the family that was no longer welcome at the castle. But then why bequeath the castle to her? Lady MacKenzie was aware that Cate's side of the family was her closest relatives. If there had been a rift in the family, why not pass the property to someone else?

Cate wandered to the window across the room as thoughts paraded through her mind. A steady rain fell from the sky. Her eyebrow arched as she studied the wet window, recalling the forecast had predicted steady sunshine.

She spun away from the window, stopping abruptly as she turned. Across the room, the door, which she had left open, was now closed.

Cate squashed her eyebrows together as she strode to it and twisted the knob. The door did not budge. She spun the knob again, jimmying the door in the jamb. It held fast.

Her pulse quickened as she tried a third time, ramming her shoulder into the wood in an attempt to shove the door open. It did not move.

Cate backed a few steps away from the door and stared at it. She was trapped. Someone had locked her in the tower room.

CHAPTER 12

Cate stared at the closed door for another moment before she tried it again. It would not budge. She pounded against the wood, calling for help. No one answered.

She didn't expect them to. No one knew where she was, and no one would be looking for her until dinnertime. Perhaps then someone would figure it out and come searching for her.

She spun on her heel and paced across the room. The timepiece bounced against her sweater. She grabbed the chain to steady it, sliding her hand down to hold the gold watch.

The broken gold watch, she reminded herself. Her heart sank as she realized it had broken. On top of the notion that her family had been blotted out of the family bible, she'd now inherited the castle and destroyed a precious heirloom.

Her thumb rubbed the face, and she stared down at it.

Her jaw dropped open as she found it ticking away at normal speed. She screwed up her face, certain it had just been malfunctioning. She'd have to have it looked at. Something must be wrong with it.

She'd email Gayle about a repairman. If she ever escaped from the tower room. She turned back toward the door and froze again. It hung open, the stone stairs beyond it in full view.

Cate raced to the doorway and stared down the spiral steps. No footsteps sounded on them. Had someone unlocked the door?

"Hello?" she called, her voice echoing off the stone walls.

No one answered. She frowned as she stood dumbfounded in the room. The door had been stuck fast moments ago. She twisted and stared at the belongings scattered on the floor. She had no desire to remain in this room any longer, even to clean them up.

Perhaps she'd try again tomorrow.

She collected Riley, napping in the corner next to his discarded bone, and hurried from the room. As she spiraled down the stairs, she glanced out the tall tower window. Bright sunshine lit the rolling hills. The storm, it seemed, had passed rather quickly.

She descended to the lowest level of the castle, making her way to the kitchen. Mrs. Fraser bustled around the room, putting the final touches on her dinner tray. Cate knocked against the jamb.

"Oh, Lady Cate, I was just about to bring this up to you."

Cate smiled at her. "Thanks, I can take it up. I just was wondering if you were near the tower a few minutes ago. The one you put Lady MacKenzie's things in."

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands on her apron after settling a slice of pie onto a plate and loading it onto the tray. "Nay, I wasn't."

Cate set Riley on the floor and grabbed the tray's handles. "Oh, okay."

"Is everything all right, Lady Cate?"

"Yes, I was in the tower going through some of Lady MacKenzie's things and the door got shut and I couldn't get it open."

Mrs. Fraser arched an eyebrow. "Ah, well, such is the way in these old places. Likely swelled and got stuck."

"You're probably right."

"You may want to prop it open next time, just in case."

Cate nodded at her as she lifted the laden tray. "Good idea. Thanks, Mrs. Fraser."

"Just a moment, Lady Cate. I'll take the tray."

Cate lifted the tray a bit higher. "I've got it."

"Maybe so, but you shouldn't be carrying your own tray about." Mrs. Fraser waved at her in a signal to pass the tray over.

"Nonsense, Mrs. Fraser. I'm perfectly capable. Enjoy your dinner." Cate spun, calling Riley with her.

She climbed the stairs and settled in the library. Questions filled her mind as she ate. The more she searched, the less answers she found. She needed a break, and soon.

She hoped to start solving her problems by fixing the timepiece. Gayle would be out of the office for the evening, so she'd send her an email the following morning.

As planned, Cate started her day by sending an email to Gayle, explaining the odd behavior the timepiece displayed and asking for a recommendation of a repairman.

After sending the email, Cate made her way to the kitchen before breakfast. Mrs. Fraser bustled around the space, preparing the meal. "Good morning, Mrs. Fraser."

"Good morning, Lady Cate. How was your night?"

Cate wandered to the oatmeal cooking on the stove and gave it a stir. "Good, thanks."

"I can do that, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser said, eyeing her nervously.

"I've got it," Cate said with a smile, twirling the wooden spoon around in the pot.

Mrs. Fraser gave her a tight-lipped smile, her eyebrow arching as she busied herself sliding a tray of cookies into the oven. "Did you find anything of interest in those boxes yesterday?"

"Yes. I found a picture of my father with Lady MacKenzie. She had visited him shortly after he married my mother. I had never known."

Mrs. Fraser adjusted the oven temperature before reaching into a cupboard for bowls. "Really? Well, I'm glad you found something to help you."

Cate let the spoon rest against the side of the pot. "Mrs. Fraser, you grew up here, right?"

"Been here since my birth, yes."

"Do you remember anything being discussed about my family? Or my grandparents visiting?"

Mrs. Fraser paused for a moment as she shook raisins into a serving dish. "Nay, I cannae say I've heard anything about your family. When Lady MacKenzie was ill, Mr. Fraser and I wondered what would become of the place since there didn't seem to be a relative in sight to take it over. We didn't even know if there was a relative out there."

Cate frowned at the response. Another dead end. "I see. I thought you may have heard something being here all your life."

Mrs. Fraser shook a generous helping of brown sugar into a serving bowl before setting it on Cate's tray. "Nay, I've not heard a whisper of anything about your side. Never met your grandparents or your parents and never heard of you, Lady Cate, until Mr. Smythe told us he'd located the new owner."

Cate cocked a hip and stuck her hand on it. "Well, it was worth a shot. I may have questions I will never have answers to."

Mrs. Fraser sidled next to her and gave the oatmeal a final stir before ladling a hearty helping into a bowl. "You mean your father never told you about any of this?"

"Not a word. I never knew I had a relative. I wish I did. I would have liked to have met her. She seemed like a very interesting person—someone I would have liked."

Mrs. Fraser nodded as she set the bowl on Cate's tray. "Aye, Lady Cate, she was—and very kind, too; the picture of grace. You're not much different from her, to be honest. Well, that's your breakfast ready. Anything else I can do for you?"

"No, no, that's all. I'll carry it up myself, thanks, Mrs. Fraser. Come on, Riley," Cate called the little dog to follow her.

She settled in the library with her tray. As she stirred the brown sugar into the oatmeal, she decided to move her focus to her writing project. The inquiries about her heritage had stalled, and while she wasn't giving up, she needed a break from the constant dead ends.

After polishing off the warm meal, she opted to postpone work in favor of spending a summer morning with Riley outside. As they rounded the corner, they ran into Jack. With a ladder propped against a large birch tree, he hacked at a few wayward branches.

"Well, if it isn't Lady Cate and Sir Riley. Good morning to you!" he yelled from his perch as he climbed down.

"Good morning, Jack. How are you today?"

"Ah, I cannae complain, lassie. I'm alive and breathing this beautiful Scottish air," he said, giving Riley a scratch under his chin. "And how are you and the good Sir Riley this morning?"

Cate buried her hands in the pockets of her jacket. "Good, thanks. Although, this beautiful Scottish air is just a bit on the chilly side for me."

Jack collected a few of the cut branches and tossed them into a pile. "Chilly? Ahhhh, lassie, this is nice, warm weather. If you think this is chilly, you've not seen anything yet."

Cate grabbed a few of the fallen limbs, tossing them on top of Jack's pile. "Ha! Well, I'm not freezing, but Aberdeen was a lot warmer than this at this time of the year."

"Not considering moving back for all that warmth, are you?"

She dusted her hands off. "Never! I'm made of tougher stuff than that, you know."

"There's the spirit, lassie, there's the spirit. Well, I better get on with this before Mr. Fraser catches me idling my time away talking about the weather, but if there's anything I can help you with, you let me know."

"Thanks," Cate said. She took a step away before she turned back. "Actually, I could use your help with something."

Jack stepped back off the ladder. "Name it, Cate."

"Well, I'd like to go into town, and I was wondering if you had a morning to spare this week to drive me in. I'm not sure that I trust myself to drive on the right side of the road yet."

"Ah, well, good thing you're asking me because we drive on the left side of the road," Jack said, with a wink.

Cate rolled her eyes and shook her head. "Very funny. I mean that I don't know if I'll drive on the correct side of the road."

"Well, I can definitely help you with that, lassie. I'd be happy to take you into town any morning that you want, just name it."

"How's tomorrow morning?" Cate asked. "The cleaning service is coming in so it's a nice day to be out of the castle."

"Tomorrow morning is fine with me. Shall we leave around nine? I dare say you'll not find much open before then."

"Nine sounds great. I'll see you then."

After a quick morning walk to the loch the following morning, Cate left Riley with his favorite ball, tucked away in her bedroom suite, and met Jack at the front of the castle to head into town.

Jack opened the car door for her. "I hope we have enough time to tour the entire town. We may need a second day."

"I'll bet. I heard there's a grocery store and everything."

“Well, you heard right, lassie. There’s a small grocer and a pub,” Jack answered as he slid in behind the wheel. He aimed the car toward Dunhaven, the gravel crunching under the tires as they pulled away from the castle.

“Ah, but my real interest is in the town’s library.”

Jack pulled his lips back in a wince as he pulled onto the road. “The library? Ack, you’re kidding me? All this fuss for the library?”

“You’ve got a whole library here in the castle. But you want to go to Dunhaven’s library?”

“I was hoping they might have some information on the castle that we don’t.”

Jack turned onto the street leading through town. “New research project, eh? Well, right-o, then, let’s get you to the library. If you want to get wild and crazy, we can visit the bookstore and even a church.”

“Very funny. I’ve already called the church, and they had no information. Maybe we could check out the pub after, though?”

Jack jabbed a finger in her direction before slapping his hand against the wheel. “Now, you’re talking, lassie, now you’re talking. At least we’ve got something to look forward to!”

Buildings filled in on either side of them as they entered the town. While smaller than Aberdeen, Jack exaggerated about its tiny size. It had much more to offer than just a library, a pub, and a few churches. Cate found it to be the perfect small town.

Jack dropped Cate off in front of the library, telling her he planned to run to the hardware store and would meet her at the library afterward.

Cate pushed through the doors into the small library. The scent of aging books filled the air in the quiet space. A young woman behind the circulation desk greeted her. Cate smiled and whispered a hello to the girl as she approached the desk.

“Hello, ma’am, something I can help you with?” the girl asked.

“Yes, hello, I’m Dr. Cate Kensie. I’m the new owner of Dunhaven Castle. I was wondering if you had any information on it, perhaps old building plans or anything they might have filed with the municipality? Maybe any articles or texts written about it by locals?”

“Oh, hello, Dr. Kensie. Let me see if the librarian can help you. I’m not sure what we have.”

The young woman disappeared into a small office behind the circulation desk. After a moment, an older woman appeared through the doorway.

“Hello, Dr. Kensie. A pleasure to meet you,” she began, in a deep Scottish brogue. “I’m Mrs. Isla Campbell, the librarian. Within our private archives, we have some things that may interest you. I also know that we have the book The Mysteries of Scotland, in which the castle is mentioned, if you’d like to see that?”

Cate recalled the title of the book from her search in Aberdeen College’s library. She’d finally be able to read the reason it had been included. “That sounds great. Thank you so much.”

The woman led Cate to a back room, which appeared to double as a storage room. Cate set her tote bag down on the floor near a small carrel while the librarian pulled several materials from the shelves.

She left Cate to study the materials while she went in search of the book she’d mentioned earlier. They included a copy of the plans for the castle when it had been modernized and plans for the added wings, along with a few other historical records involving the castle’s building and operation. One of the reports noted the castle served as a recovery space for officers after the First World War.

As Cate perused the documents, the librarian slid a book onto the desk before disappearing again. She picked up the thick tome. In gold letters, the title gleamed on top of an image of a crumbling castle. She flipped the book over, scanning the blurb. It indicated that the book contained ghost stories from various areas, homes, and castles across Scotland. Cate checked the index for a reference to Dunhaven Castle, then thumbed to the indicated page. She found a short entry detailing the reason for including Dunhaven Castle in the book.

Dunhaven Castle, located just outside of the town of Dunhaven in northwestern Scotland, has long been the site of mysterious occurrences. During its construction, one worker died on the site in a freak accident with falling bricks, while another disappeared without a trace. Following the construction, those working at the castle insisted that the ghosts of those who met their demise on the property or who had never been seen or heard from again haunted its halls. Many of those working in the castle often left, some of them in the middle of the night, unable to continue working in the home after experiencing random sights and sounds at various times of the day or night. The castle's owners, the MacKenzie family, were often left without servants at short notice.

Stories of these phantom occurrences were not confined to only those who worked at the castle after its construction. Visitors to the home and other workers have continued to tell tales of occurrences, all bearing a resemblance to the original tales from early servants: phantom sights and sounds presenting at all hours of the day and night. Visitors and workers at the castle tell tales of being woken from their sleep to hear music coming from nowhere or to hear conversations from people that were never to be found. They tell stories of seeing people roaming the halls that disappeared when followed. All those that experienced some form of manifestation at the castle, when asked, have indicated that they believe it to be haunted by the ghosts of those that gave their lives in her construction.

Throughout the history of the castle, the MacKenzie family has refused to comment on the stories about the castle. The current occupant was contacted for comment during the writing of this book; no response was received.

Cate bit her lower lip as she read the entry. Others had reported phantom music in the castle. When Cate had explored the place in the middle of the night, it was because she had heard music. Had she experienced the same phenomenon as the others? Maybe Molly was right and her new home was haunted.

Cate's limbs turned to jelly, and her pulse raced as a moment of panic washed over her. She scanned the words on the page again. They detailed similar experiences to the ones she'd had. Was her new home haunted?

She shook her head, refusing to give in to the notion. The castle was not haunted. What a ridiculous idea. Molly had been joking when she had said that. Ghosts were not real.

The book was sensationalizing a few strange occurrences—probably to drive tourism, Cate mused. And it was easy to sell the tale of a haunted castle. There was no shortage of stories about the topic.

Cate snapped the book closed and set it aside, focusing on the other materials that the librarian had provided her. She glanced at the time. Jack would be here shortly, she wouldn't have time to take any notes.

She glanced at the collection before gathering them into her arms, leaving behind the book. She wanted to study them in depth at home. She would ask the librarian if she could borrow them. As she ambled to the circulation desk, her arms laden with documents, Jack pushed through the library doors.

The girl behind the desk smiled at Cate. "Did you find everything you were looking for?"

Cate splayed the materials on the counter. "Yes, the librarian helped me to find everything that I needed. I'd like to take a more thorough look at these materials. Is it possible for me to take them home?"

“Ah, those are in the private collection, I’m not sure—” the assistant began.

“Oh, I’ll be very careful with them.”

The girl bit her lower lip, shooting a glance at the librarian’s closed door. “Um, well, I’m just not sure. I don’t think we’re supposed to allow these to leave, and the librarian has stepped out, so I’m not sure I can help.”

Jack leaned over the desk toward the assistant and chimed into the conversation. “Why, don’t you know who you’re talking to, lassie? This is the world-renowned Dr. Cate Kensie. Are you going to be the reason she can’t complete her research? Why, she might make our little hamlet famous one day. Of course, if we’re not famous we can all blame you, I suppose.”

Her face turned a bright shade of red. The assistant seemed flustered. Cate couldn’t blame her. Jack was a rather good-looking man. He reminded her of a younger version of a certain Scottish actor whose name was escaping her at the moment.

“Well,” she stammered, grinning at Jack then turning to Cate, “I suppose if you’re a historian, it won’t hurt. Let me just mark down what you’re taking and you can be on your way.”

“Thank you, it’s much appreciated. And like I said, I’ll be careful and have them back before anyone misses them.”

The assistant made a short list of what Cate was taking, smiled, and wished her a good day. Cate gathered the materials and followed Jack out the door. After storing her treasures in the car, they made their way to the pub for lunch.

With their order placed, Jack began their conversation by asking, “So, it’s a bit warmer where you came from, eh?”

Cate sipped at her ale. “Yes, it’s been no-coat weather for weeks where I came from.”

“So, were you prepared for our weather? Have you been here before?”

“No, I’ve never been to Scotland. But I searched it on a weather app before coming, so I guess I was as prepared as I could be.”

Jack lifted his beer to his lips. “Never been, eh? Well, at least you’ve done things right for your first trip.”

“I have?”

He set the stein down on the table, licking the foam from his lips. “Sure. The right way to do things is to come to Scotland for the first time after you’ve inherited a castle.”

“Oh, right. That’s what I thought everyone did, so I just followed suit.”

Jack leaned toward her, clasping his hands on the table. “What do you think of your new home? Do you like it here?”

Cate sucked in a breath as she considered her answer. “Well, I’ve only been here two weeks, so it’s early to judge, but on the whole, I do like it. I already feel much more at home here than I ever did in Aberdeen. And I went from living in an apartment with three rooms, to living in a castle, so I can’t complain. I assume you like it here since you came back?”

Jack nodded as the waitress slid his bangers and mash in front of him before delivering the fish and chips to Cate. “Sure, I mean, it’s home. I traveled a bit, worked on a fishing boat for a while, but when my father passed away, I came back and continued the Reid tradition: taking over his job on the estate. He died of a heart attack, and I decided it was time to come home and fulfill my duties here. You know, keep an eye on my grandfather and so on.”

Cate picked up a piping hot fry. “Oh, I’m sorry to hear that, Jack. Your dad worked at Dunhaven, too?”

Jack cut into one of the sausages on his plate. “Aye, that he did, lassie. There’s always been a Reid as the estate manager for as long as any of us can remember. My grandfather before my father, and his father before him, and on and on back through the line.”

“Oh, wow, I hadn’t realized that. I’m sure you know more about that place than I do.”

“I don’t know about that, Cate the historian, but I spent a lot of time there while growing up.” He jabbed a finger at the timepiece dangling from Cate’s neck. “I remember that watch you’ve got on always being around Lady MacKenzie’s neck. Funny how you remember things like that, eh?”

“Oh,” Cate said, grabbing the watch, “yes, apparently, it was important to her. She left me a handwritten note as part of the inheritance, telling me I needed to wear it at all times. I thought it was odd, but I guess it was just really important to her.”

“Must have been.”

Cate sighed as she bit into another fry. “Which makes me feel even worse.”

Jack scooped gravy-laden mashed potatoes onto his fork. “You lost me, Lady Cate, feel worse about what?”

Cate stared down at the gold timepiece. “Oh, I think I may have broken the watch.”

Jack feigned shock. “Oh, broken it? You Americans, riding roughshod over everything. How did you do that, drop it from the turret?”

Cate shrugged as she pushed a piece of fish around on her plate. “No idea. But it keeps slowing down, sometimes it seems almost to stop. Then it starts up again as if nothing was wrong. I need to have it looked at.”

“My grandfather could take a look if you’d like. He’s not a genuine watchmaker, but he’s good with those kinds of things. He might have some experience with it from when he worked there.”

“Oh, that would be great. I asked Gayle about someone, but I haven’t checked to see if she recommended anyone or not.”

Jack shoved a forkful of mashed potatoes into his mouth. “I’m sure he could peek at it after lunch if you don’t mind an extra stop?”

“Not at all. I’d like to make sure it works properly. I’d feel terrible if anything happened to it on my watch, no pun intended. It has been in the family for so long.”

They spent the remainder of the meal discussing places each of them had traveled.

After lunch, they made the short trip to Jack’s grandfather’s house, a charming cottage on the outskirts of town. After thanking the man for agreeing to look at the watch, Cate handed it over.

The elderly man carefully held it in his hands and studied it. “I can remember this watch from when I was a young man on the estate.”

“Jack mentioned that you worked there. And his father, too.”

Stanley wagged a finger at her as he showed her into the living room. “Aye, lassie, there’s always been a Reid on that estate. It’s tradition. Wouldn’t seem right without us.”

“Well, I’m glad to have Jack there.”

“Now let me see to this watch. Think you may have broken it, do you, lassie? Let me take a look.” The man collapsed into a desk chair across the space. A large magnifying glass was clamped onto the desk’s edge. A jeweler’s toolkit lay open in front of him.

He carefully opened the timepiece with jeweler’s pliers. Holding it with reverence, he eyed the inside.

Cate shoved her hands into the pocket of her cardigan. “I was telling Jack, it seems to slow suddenly, almost to a stop, and it ticks very loudly when it does that. Then, it will just start back up again as if nothing was wrong with it.”

Stanley peered over his reading glasses and nodded at her. “You hit the nail on the head with that last one, lassie.”

Cate furrowed her brow, cocking her head to the side. “I’m sorry, I don’t understand. What did I do?”

Stanley climbed to his feet and handed the timepiece back to her. “You were right—nothing is wrong with it.”

Cate stared at it for a moment before sliding the chain over her head. “Are you sure? It seems to slow almost to a stop. It’s done it a few times now. That can’t be normal.”

“I assure you, it’s right as rain, this watch.”

Cate furrowed her brow. “I trust your experience, Mr. Reid, but would it still be prudent to have a watchmaker look at it, just to make sure it’s in tip-top shape?”

She winced, hoping she didn’t offend him.

“Nay, I’d not recommend that, lassie. Not at all.”

“Really? May I ask why?” Whether he felt it was needed or not, what would be the problem with having a second pair of eyes look at it?

“It’s quite an expensive piece. An antique, in fact. I’d not let it out of my sight. Lady MacKenzie was never without it. I’m sure that’s why.”

“Did she ever have it serviced, I mean, that you know of?”

Stanley shook his head, tugging at his white beard with his fingers. “Nay, she never did. If anything needed fixing, I took care of it. She would have trusted no one outside of the estate to care for the watch.”

“Hmm. That’s interesting. Well, thanks so much for looking. I’m glad to know I haven’t broken it at least.”

A broad grin spread across his face. “You’re welcome, lassie. I’m happy to help.”

“Well, we’ll be on our way, then,” Cate said.

Jack said his goodbyes to his grandfather, giving the elderly man a clap on the back and half a hug. Cate thanked the elderly man again before leaving and making her way to the car with Jack.

“Well,” Jack said as they climbed into the car, “at least you’ve got the official word that you haven’t broken it.”

Cate remained quiet for the short trip back to the castle. Her mind dwelled on the conversation with Stanley Reid. She wondered if he was certain of his diagnosis. Her thoughts centered on how adamant he was about not having the watch serviced. It seemed strange. Did he not want his lack of experience to show if there was something wrong with the watch? Or was he worried about the piece being stolen or damaged? Either way, it seemed odd. Surely there were professional jewelers who could be trusted. Perhaps Gayle would have an answer.

When they arrived back on the estate, Cate thanked Jack for taking her into town. He helped her carry her bounty from the town’s library into the castle’s library.

She decided to look at the files later, preferring a walk with Riley before dinner. Before heading out, she checked her email to see if there was a response from Gayle, and found one waiting for her.

Dear Cate,

To our knowledge, Lady MacKenzie never had the watch serviced at any outside locations. I don’t believe either of us (meaning myself and Mr. Smythe) ever knew of any issues that she had with the timepiece. Mr. Smythe did indicate that she usually trusted Mr. Stanley Reid (Jack Reid’s grandfather) with mechanical work and suggested that you check with him if you believe the timepiece may be malfunctioning.

I hope you continue to adapt to your new surroundings with ease and find Scottish country life charming. If you need anything else, please do not hesitate to reach out.

Best,

Gayle

Cate frowned at her computer. So, Lady MacKenzie had never had trouble with the watch. And she trusted Jack’s grandfather to maintain it. It was another vote of confidence in Jack’s grandfather as a watch repairman. And no suggestions to take it to an experienced jeweler. It seemed rather odd, but she guessed they had much more experience than she in these matters. Perhaps the watch was so valuable that even they did not trust it to leave Cate's care. Vowing to be extra careful with the piece from now on, Cate went in search of Riley for his pre-dinner walk of the estate with her.

Cate and Riley enjoyed a quiet and uneventful evening after their walk and dinner. Cate curled up with some old photo albums. When her chin hit her chest, she decided to head to bed.

As she crawled under the covers, though, a sense of unease filled her. The words from the library book's entry danced through her mind. Music that came from nowhere. Voices floating in the halls with no source. Specters. Ghosts.

Cate swallowed hard as she pulled the covers up to her chin and stared into the moonlit room. Molly's words rattled through her head. What she'd intended to be a joke, may turn out to be a warning.

CHAPTER 14

Cate shivered as the clock turned midnight. She'd not managed to fall asleep yet, unable to close her eyes without popping them open in seconds. The words of the book rang in her mind.

She shoved back the covers and climbed from her bed, tiptoeing to the doors of her suite and peering into the hall. Did ghosts roam up and down them? Would ghostly music play again?

With a sigh, she closed the door, her fingers hovering on the key in the keyhole. Perhaps she should lock it. Would that matter? Could ghosts go through doors?

Cate rolled her eyes at herself and hurried back to her bed, crawling under the covers again. She stared up at the ceiling, still too afraid to close her eyes.

"Cate," she said aloud, "you're being ridiculous. There are no such things as ghosts."

Her affirmation, even when voiced aloud, did little to settle her nerves. She sat up, her eyes scanning the dark corners for movement.

She climbed out of bed again and paced the room, checking the corners for spirits. Expanding her pacing area, she made her way around the sitting room. There was nothing there either, as she well knew, despite her paranoia. Still unable to sleep, she made her way around the castle. Perhaps the walk would tire her out enough to sleep.

She wandered through the massive hallways. Moonlight drenched everything in an eerie glow. It did little to ease her fear. Cate forced her mind to appreciate the beauty in what she saw. She wandered in and out of rooms, trying to take in details, forcing her mind to focus on mundane things rather than allowing it to go at lightning speed to ghost stories.

In one bedroom closet, Cate found a box of personal belongings. Cate sifted through the items. Among the personal effects, she found several journals. With her inner historian triggered, she gathered them up with a giddy smile. Ghost stories were shoved to the far corners of her mind as excitement over personal journals from an occupant of the castle rose to the forefront.

She settled on her chaise and paged through, her heart leaping at the handwritten pages. Stifling a yawn, she pulled one onto her lap to read. As she settled back on the chaise, her eyelids grew heavy.

She preferred to savor the experience and enjoy each entry, so she set the journal aside and returned to her bedroom. As she crawled into bed, Riley lifted his head to acknowledge her return, settling back into the covers with a big sigh.

She fell asleep in minutes, her concern about ghosts finally relieved by her new discovery.

As her alarm woke her the following morning, a smile filled her face as she stretched, excitement over the journals still coursing through her. She jumped out of bed and dressed for the day. As she passed through her sitting room, she admired her new discovery.

She filled her morning hours taking notes on the library materials she'd borrowed, saving the journals for her evening reading. She hoped they would be a far better choice than the gothic haunted castle novels.

In the afternoon, a quick investigation of the closet where she'd found the journals led her to a few framed photographs. She eyed the pictures, recognizing the face in them as Mary MacKenzie, Gertrude's mother.

Mary may have known her grandparents. She wondered if she'd find a reference to them in the journals. As she checked her email before dinner, her cell phone jangled, buzzing across the desk.

She swiped to answer the unknown number.

"Lady Cate?" the Scottish voice asked.

"Yes, this is Cate."

"Oh, I'm so glad I got a hold of you. This is Isla Campbell, the librarian."

Cate leaned back in her chair, twirling her pen in her hand. “Hi, Mrs. Campbell, what can I do for you?”

“I’m calling because there’s been a terrible mistake made.”

“Oh?”

The woman continued, breathless. “Yes, you see, Amy, our assistant, allowed you to take those materials I shared with you from the library yesterday. I’m so sorry, but those are not to leave the library.”

Cate stared at the stack of documents on the desk. “I’ve been very careful with them.”

Mrs. Campbell chuckled, though Cate detected a hint of derision. “I’m certain you have been, though, really they shouldn’t have been taken from the library. I really must ask that you bring them back as soon as possible.”

Cate raised her eyebrows as she stared at the heap of records she’d yet to dive into. “I can bring them back tomorrow morning if that works.”

“That would be most appreciated. Thank you, Lady Cate.”

“You’re welcome, and I’m very sorry about the mix up.”

“As long as they’re returned tomorrow, it will be right as rain. Have a good night, Lady Cate.”

The line clicked and Cate pulled the phone away from her ear, staring at the pile of documents ruefully. She’d need to take any notes on them tonight.

She arose early and finished her last-minute notes on the library’s collection before she loaded the materials into the car, deciding to be adventurous and drive herself into town.

She loaded Riley into the car and made the short trip to town, easing into a parking space near the center of town. She returned the materials to the library, thanking the librarian again for the information.

“I appreciate the opportunity to study the documents. I’ve got stacks of notes on them.”

“I’m glad you found them helpful,” Mrs. Campbell said, studying them as though they’d been ruined.

“I think you’ll find everything in the same shape it was when I took it. I was very careful.”

Mrs. Campbell arched an eyebrow as she sifted through the documents. “Document preservation is best left to librarians.”

Cate puckered her lips at the statement, resisting the urge to roll her eyes. “Well, in any case, thank you.” She tapped the desk before she left the library.

She collected Riley from the car to explore the town. The new smells entertained Riley, and he enjoyed the attention he received from the local townspeople. Cate found many charming shops that she was sure she would enjoy exploring over and over. Most shop owners were dog-friendly, so she took her time browsing.

The vast majority were curious to meet her since she was the new owner of the largest property in town and American.

She ducked into a shop selling postcards with pictures of Dunhaven Castle. An older man, his hair graying, stood behind a counter near the register. He nodded and smiled as she entered with Riley.

“Well, hello, little fellow,” the man said.

Riley glanced up at him, his nose sniffing. “I’ve got a wee bone here for you if you’d like.”

“I think he’d like it very much,” Cate answered.

The man skirted around the counter and fed a bone to Riley. He chomped on it, downing it in seconds.

Cate stuck her hand out. “Hi, I’m Cate.”

The man grabbed her hand and shook it. “Harry MacArthur. Are you visiting?”

“You don’t say. Especially when you own a castle. Everyone’s curious.”

Cate shrugged as Harry fed Riley another bone. “There’s not much to know, I’m afraid.”

“Oh, I doubt that. So, how are you finding Scottish life? Have you explored the castle?”

Cate nodded as she lifted Riley into her arms. “Yes, I have. It’s a big change from my life in the States, but I’m enjoying it.”

“I’ll bet,” Harry said with a grin. “I hope you’re settling in well. And the stories don’t bother you much. Everyone’s got a tale about that place. But don’t listen to them. You just go by your own experiences.”

Cate licked her lips as the odd experiences she’d had flitted across her mind. She forced a smile onto her lips and nodded. They chatted for a few more minutes before Cate purchased three postcards and a porcelain dog figurine.

As she slid back into the car, she dug a pen from her purse and pulled the postcards from the bag. On the first, she wrote a thank you to Gayle for helping her unpack and settle in. She referenced the porcelain dog figurine, stating it was a thank you gift. On the second, she penned a short note to her former neighbor, Mrs. Kline, fulfilling her promise to write and passing along her best wishes. On the final postcard, she jotted a note to Molly, telling her the move had gone well and extending an invitation to visit.

After a trip to the post office to mail the postcards and package the dog for mailing, she returned to the castle in time for dinner.

After her full day, she drifted to sleep quickly. She awoke early the following day as thunder rumbled overhead. Lightning tore through the sky, and a soaking rain pelted the ground and windows.

Cate sipped her hot chocolate as she stared out at the gray sky. The shop owner's words rang in her mind as she shuffled through the darkened halls. Scenes from haunted castle movies flashed through her mind. There was always a storm right before someone spotted a ghost.

Cate wrinkled her nose, glad she wasn't alone in the castle. She retrieved the family bible from the portrait gallery and returned to her sitting room, curling on the chaise in front of a roaring fire built by Mr. Fraser. The flames leapt in the large fireplace, keeping the chill of the rainy day at bay.

Riley curled on the rug in front of the warm fire. Cate smiled at him before turning her attention to the journals she'd found.

She pulled the journal on the top of the stack onto her lap. A quick glance through it showed no markings or dates. She hoped to read the journals in order, if possible.

She paged through them, hoping to find dates or numbers. Her brow furrowed as she flipped through the first one. Several pages appeared to be missing from each journal, torn from the books.

Cate wrinkled her nose at the marred book. With any luck, the main ideas were intact and she could find some details about her family.

Cate observed the handwriting in some books was messier than in others. Was the person aging or writing hurriedly? She tried to use this to piece together an order but wasn't able to. Giving up on creating an order, she closed them all except the first one she picked up and set them aside. She began to read the first page.

... heard the soft music as if it were floating on the air up the stairs. It was nice to hear the sounds of life in the castle again, no matter how strange. I stood at the top of the stairs with my eyes closed, enjoying the sounds of the music. I imagined all the people below in elegant gowns of their time period, dancing impeccably, laughing, drinking, enjoying. I thought of sneaking down to have a peek, but I still have not brought myself to explore during these events.

Cate set the book aside in favor of a sip of hot chocolate, as she mulled over the entry. The entry seemed to describe a party being held at the castle. Strangely, the lady of the house did not attend.

Perhaps these journals were not Mary MacKenzie's, or maybe she wrote them at a young age and wasn't talking about Dunhaven at all, but rather her family home. She didn't know much about any of her predecessors, so it was possible that Mary MacKenzie also came from a wealthy family who would have hosted such parties. As a young child, she wouldn't have been in attendance.

Cate imagined Mary as a small child longing to go to her parents' ball, standing at the top of a grand staircase, listening to the music play, watching for a glimpse of the ladies in their elegant gowns as they passed by.

Perhaps these journals were older than she realized, coming from a childhood version of Mary. She studied the first entry. It didn't look like a child's handwriting, although Cate couldn't be sure. Penmanship was a different matter in the era when Mary was a child, so it was comprehensible that this could have been the writing of someone around the age of ten. If these were her childhood journals, not only would it be interesting to see things from a child's perspective in a different era, but that may also explain the torn-out pages. Perhaps they were failed attempts at making an entry or those that showed poor penmanship, inkblots, or something else careless that a child may have done. Maybe an older Mary reread her journals and tore out things she didn't want to remember—childish thoughts that she regretted later.

Cate caressed the leather on the outside of the journal, fascinated by reading someone's innermost thoughts. Even if they didn't provide her with information about her own family, they would be interesting from a historical perspective.

Cate set the journal aside, intending to collect more information on Mary before continuing. She grabbed her laptop, a pen, and a notepad. The appeal of another sip of hot chocolate was too strong for her, and she lay back on the chaise for an extra moment, enjoying the snack. The fire gave the room a warm coziness despite its size.

Rain still fell steadily from the gray sky outside her window. She watched it fall as she took another bite of one of the cookies Mrs. Fraser had left her. She spent another few moments enjoying the snack and the dreary weather, her thoughts slipping to the great ball Mary spoke of in her journal.

She bit her lower lip as she imagined women in fancy gowns swirling around the room, laughing, enjoying each other's company. What a different life they must have led, Cate thought, both because of the time period and their upper-class lifestyle. Things had changed quite a bit in the almost one hundred-odd years since Mary was a child.

Cate tried to imagine a world without computers—lacking instant access to information and other people—where the written word was the most common form of communication and of recording thoughts. How different life must have been—perhaps simpler in some ways, despite the absence of modern conveniences.

Cate finished her cookie and the rest of her hot chocolate, then forced herself off the chaise to get her materials. She began by noting the dates of birth years and death years for Mary from the family bible, and her maiden name, Campbell, to give some context to when she may have written the journals. Using her laptop, Cate navigated to one of the online ancestry records sites and began searching for any information she could find on Mary MacKenzie née Campbell. She pieced together that Mary had two sisters and one brother. The third of four children, she had been born into an affluent family, but one that did not have any titles associated with their family legacy. She was twenty-four years old when she married Oliver, who was ten years her senior.

She reread the first partial entry. It could, indeed, discuss a party held by Mary's parents. She closed her laptop, preparing to read more of the journals when Mrs. Fraser appeared, carrying her lunch tray.

“I hope you don’t mind, but I took it upon myself to bring your lunch up to you. Figured you were all nice and cozy here, so why move yourself just for lunch?”

Cate stretched her feet under her blanket. “Thanks, Mrs. Fraser, I appreciate that. I am cozy. Although, I think you may spoil me.”

“Well, there isn’t a lady in the world that doesn’t deserve some spoiling now and again.”

Cate smiled at her as she finished clearing the dishes from her morning’s snack and bustled out of the room. She finished her lunch and roused Riley from a nap for a quick trip outside.

The rain continued to pour from the skies. His little tartan raincoat spared him the drenching he’d have received from the soaking rain, but despite remaining mostly dry, Riley offered the sky a suspicious glance as thunder rumbled overhead.

Even in the poor weather, though, Cate admired the beauty of the Scottish countryside. Mist clung to the hillsides, shrouding them as if with fluffy blankets. The surroundings made it obvious why stories of hauntings were bandied about; the setting couldn’t be more perfect for it, Cate thought as the thunder grumbled overhead and the fog surrounded the neighboring countryside. It even shrouded part of the castle.

After hanging their wet things in the servants’ entrance, Cate made her way to the bedroom closet where she’d discovered the journals. She searched the box for additional pages, hoping the torn-out paper would be inside. She found nothing and slogged back to her room, disappointed but hopeful the pages that remained would reveal some information.

She settled onto her chaise in front of the roaring fire, cuddled under a blanket. Riley climbed onto the chaise, curling himself in the crook of her legs for a nap. Cate patted his head as he used her calf for a pillow.

She picked up the journal again, giving the first entry a quick reread. Something about it seemed odd to her, but she couldn’t put her finger on it.

The next entry detailed a similar experience. Mary wrote about the buzz of having guests in the house. Again, Mary noted that she tried to “stay out of sight” and “take everything in.” Not uncommon for a child in a large estate during the era of “children should be seen and not heard.” Still, it appeared Mary was on the verge of adulthood or a very mature child. She wrote as though she were much older than a youngster who would have been unwelcome at parties and other household events.

Cate began to wonder if perhaps this was why the writing seemed so odd to her. She read the next entry to see if it gave her impression more credence.

... stood in front of me, staring. I can still recall my heart pounding against my ribs as I stared back. I now understand full well why the haunting rumors persist. I, myself, have now experienced...

Her eyes widened at the statement, and her heart skipped a beat. What did the partial entry hint at? It sounded as though Mary had experienced a ghost sighting. She swallowed hard, becoming more convinced that her new home was filled with the ghosts of the past.

CHAPTER 15

A shiver ran up Cate's spine as she reread the entry that seemed to detail Mary's encounter with a ghost. She said she understood the haunting rumors.

Cate lifted her eyes from the page and stared at the dancing flames in the fireplace. Could she live here if the house was haunted? If she couldn't, she had nowhere else to go. Maybe the ghosts wouldn't be difficult to share the castle with, she ruminated.

She sucked in a deep breath, reminding herself that the entries were likely made by a childhood version of Mary. Perhaps her parents' home had been rumored to be haunted. Perhaps it was a fantastical tale from an impressionable child.

She turned the page to read the next entry, hoping to glean more details about the encounter.

... strange to think I could meet my husband as a young man or child or at least see him once again. The very thought gives me goose pimples and the feeling as though someone has walked over my grave. As inviting as it seems, it is terribly dangerous. I can see why my husband

The page ended. Cate turned to the next page, but the entry did not continue. It appeared several pages were torn out, and then another entry appeared, which seemed to be unrelated to this one. Cate set the book down, confused by what she just read. Mary MacKenzie had referenced her husband. There was no mention of encounters with ghosts.

“Well, that’s odd, Riley,” Cate said aloud to the dog. “Looks like this entry was made by Mary as an adult after her marriage. So, the encounter she had was here. Why is she not attending events in her own home?” The pup didn’t offer any answers.

Granted, entries were missing, but there weren’t even close to enough pages removed to have grown from a childhood Mary to an adult one, so the entire journal had to be from Mary as an adult, Cate surmised.

Her uneasiness returned as she realized Mary’s “encounter” occurred within the halls of Dunhaven Castle. Something was odd, though. She couldn’t understand why if Mary was an adult, married or otherwise, she wasn’t attending parties within either her parents’ home or her husband’s.

If the parties had been in her husband’s home, Mary would have played an integral role in hosting the event, even if the couple did not live at the castle yet. If it were the former, her parents would have paraded Mary among the guests with her primary goal having been to secure a suitable suitor and a successful match for marriage. Why would Mary have been hiding upstairs, not able to bring herself to sneak even a glance at the event?

Perhaps Mary was ill, Cate ruminated. However, if she was physically ill, most likely the party would have been postponed. If it hadn’t been, she would have attended it, ill or not. Women of that era were informed that they should not take ill often, as it may displease their husbands.

If she was mentally ill, that was quite a different story—but there didn’t seem to be any signs of mental instability in the writings. Outside of the ghost sighting, anyway. Perhaps that was why several pages were missing, though, Cate thought. Perhaps Mary was unstable and had ripped pages from the diary—or someone else had—and only left the ones that sounded sane.

She stared at the stack of leather journals. Maybe she would know more when she read all the journals. Perhaps there would be a clue in one of them to point her toward what may have happened to either the journals or Mary.

Cate checked her watch. About an hour and a half remained before dinner. She read a few more brief entries, finishing the first journal over the course of the hour. As interesting as it was, it gave her no more clues about what was happening. It covered more of the same experiences, or rather snippets of experiences.

Mary discussed a few parties she attended, and a little about raising her daughter after her husband's death. It gave Cate a little more context knowing that Mary was writing after her husband's death, but the mystery of why she avoided social events in the castle deepened. As did the "encounter" that led her to understand the rumors about the castle.

Cate dumped the journal on the stack, stood, and stretched. The rain had slowed to a drizzle. She gathered Riley to take him for a walk before dinner. Her mind went over and over the words she'd read but came to no new conclusions. She hoped that the remaining journals would shed more light on the matter and planned to read another during her dinner.

After heading back inside, she found both Mr. and Mrs. Fraser in her sitting room when she arrived. Mr. Fraser was tending to the fire again while Mrs. Fraser arranged the blanket on the chaise, her tray of food placed on the edge.

"How are you enjoying this beautiful Scottish weather we're having?" Mr. Fraser said, adding some logs to the fire.

"It's a nice day to stay in," Cate answered.

"That it is," Mrs. Fraser agreed. "Is there anything else you'll be needing?"

"No, that's all, thanks. Why don't you two go home early and get settled in? This weather is terrible, and I don't want anyone out in it on my account."

Mr. and Mrs. Fraser exchanged glances.

"Well," Mrs. Fraser hedged. "I'd like to finish the dishes from dinner, and I'm sure Mr. Fraser would like to add some logs to the fire before we leave for the night."

Cate waved away the concern as she pulled the blanket over her. "Oh, don't worry about that, Mrs. Fraser. I'm capable of washing a dish or two, and I can add some logs if we get cold enough. Please go home and get out of this dreary weather."

"Well, I guess if you insist, Lady Cate. Then we'll see you tomorrow morning."

"I do insist," Cate said. "See you tomorrow."

With that, they left Cate to her dinner. She settled in with the second journal from the stack, hoping to find some answers. After reading about half, Cate was no closer to learning the truth about anything. Again, the entries were vague and brief. Several pages were missing, leaving nothing more than snippets or fragments.

Cate glanced through the other three journals again. All had pages removed. She sighed, realizing they likely contained more of the same. She considered diving into the third journal but remembered her promise to Mrs. Fraser. With a glance at her empty dish, she figured she better take care of the dishes before she did anything else.

With her tray in hand, she headed downstairs to the kitchen, expecting to find a few dishes from the dinner preparation waiting in the sink to be washed. Instead, a sparkling clean sink met her gaze as she entered the room. All dishes were cleaned, dried, and put away. Cate shook her head. Mrs. Fraser had cleaned everything, leaving Cate with only her own dishes and utensils to wash.

It was quick work since she had so little to do. She washed, dried, and returned everything to its appropriate place. She tidied up the kitchen a bit, so it looked as though she had never been there, hoping Mrs. Fraser would appreciate that, then wound through the halls back to her sitting room.

With the fire dying out, she threw a few small logs on top and poked them around with the poker before plopping back onto the chaise and cuddling under a blanket with Riley. She picked up the third journal and began to read. About halfway through the journal, frustration set in. She'd learned nothing and only become more concerned about the supposed haunting in the castle. She spent a restless night worried about ghosts again.

A foggy mist enveloped the castle the next morning. Looking out the windows was like looking through a veil of fabric that had been stretched from the sky to the horizon. The cool and damp weather kept Cate inside for most of the day, only venturing out to take Riley for brief walks.

With no desire to dive back into the journals, she spent some time exploring other bedrooms. In a closet, she found trunks filled with clothes. A glance through the other items revealed a few handwritten letters. She pulled them from the trunk and settled on the floor to read them.

Her thumb found the timepiece and rubbed it as she scanned the words on the page. Soon, the familiar loud, slow ticking filled the closet. Cate huffed in annoyance as she popped open the face.

The second hand barely moved. She grabbed her phone to record a video of the strange behavior. Perhaps seeing the odd behavior would help

Mr. Reid diagnose the problem. As she swiped to unlock the phone, Cate noticed the large letters on the lock screen: NO SERVICE.

She crinkled her brow. What was wrong with her cell service? Even with the spotty signal she had been getting in the Scottish countryside, she had not experienced much of an issue anywhere in the castle or on the property.

“As you can see,” she said as the video recorded, “the seconds are ticking by on the video but not on the watch. It’s definitely slower than it should be. And no matter what I do—” Cate balanced the phone and began to shimmy the watch a bit, then wind it again. “—it doesn’t help. See?” She aimed the camera back on the watch after bobbling the phone to wind it. “Still slow. Then, sooner or later, it’s back to normal like nothing was wrong.”

She swiped the watch face to clear the fingerprints and continued to film when, abruptly, the watch started to tick faster and faster until it began to keep perfect time again.

“See what I mean?” Cate narrated. “Now it’s back to normal. I don’t get it.”

She let the video run a few more seconds so they could see that the watch was now keeping perfect time, then shut it off.

She’d send the video to Jack once she had a signal. She climbed to her feet, ready to wander the castle in search of a signal. As she stood, she spotted the three bars on the top of her phone’s display. Odd. Cate had never moved, yet the signal, not there moments ago, was now extremely strong.

The crinkle on her brow deepened. Were the two incidents related? Was there some kind of electromagnetic disturbance that affected both the watch and her cell phone? Or maybe the signal was just intermittent within the closet.

With a shake of her head, she attached the video to a text with a note describing it and asking him to show it to his grandfather whenever he got a chance. Perhaps he would have some answers that would explain this.

Cate switched off her phone’s display, returning to her exploration of the trunks.

She tugged open another trunk and pulled out the first dress. Satiny, ruby-red fabric swirled around her feet as she held it up to her and glanced down at it.

“These must have been quite the feat to get into,” she said to herself.

She tugged a blue dress from the trunk. Plainer than the red dress, it must have been worn during the day. She set it aside and tugged a pink and white dress from the bottom.

“What do you think, Riley?” she asked the small dog, holding up the pink and white dress against her body.

Riley cocked his head to the side as she spun around the room, holding the fabric against her.

“Do I look pretty?”

Riley’s dark almond-shaped eyes sparkled at her.

“Should I try it on so you can see?”

Cate giggled a bit while she slipped her clothes off and the dress on, feeling like a child trying on her mother’s clothes. She did her best to fasten the dress in the back, appreciating why most women needed a lady’s maid to assist them with dressing.

The weight of the fabric hung heavy around her ankles. She tried to swirl in it, finding it more awkward than she expected.

A sheet hid a full-length mirror in the back of the closet. Cate tugged the white cover off, sending a plume of dust into the air. She stepped toward the glass, eyeing her reflection. With both hands, she pulled her hair up to complete her centuries-old look. She gazed at herself for another minute, wondering what her life would have been like in this era.

She caught sight of the pocket watch dangling around her neck and grabbed it. Her thumb rubbed the smooth surface as she wondered who walked the castle halls in the 1850s and who may have worn this dress.

After a moment of daydreaming, her mind snapped back to reality.

“Well, Riley,” she said, swinging around in the dress, “what do you think of the full effect?”

She focused on the spot Riley had lain in moments ago, finding it empty. The smile disappeared from her face.

“Riley! Riley!” Cate called out a few times but saw no sign of the small pup. She checked around the trunks and other items in the closet. She searched the small space. She found no sign of him.

“RILEY!” she called louder. “RILEY, COME!”

Still nothing. It was unusual for Riley not to listen when she called him. Cate bit her lower lip, wondering if he may have wandered off.

She widened her search to the bedroom. Again, she saw no sign of Riley. She called out a few more times as she scanned the room, but he didn't respond. Her concern for the small dog grew. She feared he might have gotten himself lost or trapped. Living in a place this size, it could take them days to find him, if not longer. Panic set in. He was her entire life; she would be heartbroken if something happened to him.

She bit her lower lip as her knees began to wobble. Tears welled in her eyes. She fought to calm herself and think logically. He couldn't have disappeared. He had to be somewhere. She double-checked the closet again, then the bedroom. She stepped into the hall, glancing up and down, trying to decide which way to go first. She spotted no signs of the little dog.

The heaviness of the dress made it difficult for her to move around, but her worry over Riley stopped her from changing first. Cate called down the hall in both directions. She saw nothing. Most of the doors were closed, so he couldn't have gotten into those rooms.

Cate wondered if he'd made his way back to their bedroom. She tried to run, finding it awkward in the piles of fabric that surrounded her. Picking up her skirts to the best of her abilities, she hurried down the hall, making her way to her suite. She glanced inside, finding it empty.

She raced through the sitting room and scanned the bedroom. She found it empty. Panic made her limbs turn rubbery. She sucked in a shaky breath, her stomach turning over with worry.

Cate sank onto the bed, a tear falling from to her cheek. "Riley," she croaked. "Where are you?"

CHAPTER 16

Cate clutched at her midriff as she sniffled, panic turning her stomach as worry over Riley coursed through her. She flicked away a tear that fell to her cheek as she glanced around the room.

Riley was missing. So was his bed, she noticed. She hadn't moved it, but it was not there. Perhaps Mrs. Fraser moved it while cleaning.

She shook her head as she forced herself to stand, the weight of the heavy fabric from the dress weighing her down as she walked. She had to find the little pup. She had to keep searching.

Cate retraced her steps to the other bedroom. This time, she traipsed down the hall in the opposite direction, making her way to the main staircase. She would check there, and then perhaps enlist help.

Mrs. Fraser crossed the marble floor of the entryway as Cate arrived at the top of the stairs.

Cate raced toward the railing, her breathing heavy from the effort and the upset. "Oh, Mrs. Fraser! Mrs. Fraser!"

The woman glanced over her shoulder. Cate's brow scrunched, and she pulled her chin back to her chest. It wasn't Mrs. Fraser. Instead, a younger woman returned Cate's gaze.

Cate shook her head, pressing a hand against her chest as she recovered, bypassing any pleasantries in her panic to find Riley. "Oh, I'm sorry, I thought you were Mrs. Fraser. I'm looking for my dog, Riley. Have you seen him?"

Receiving no response, she continued, “Could you find Mrs. Fraser and ask her to help me look?”

At the bottom of the stairs, the girl’s eyes widened, and the color drained from her face. Her mouth gaped open, and she trembled all over. Abruptly, the girl spun and fled from the room.

Cate wrinkled her forehead. Was she running to tell Mrs. Fraser? She had made it sound urgent, but not that urgent.

Her eyes fell to the centuries-old dress she still wore. No wonder the girl had reacted that way. The poor girl assumed she had seen a ghost.

With a shake of her head, Cate turned to make her way back down the hall to the bedroom he’d disappeared from, intent on finding the little dog. As she walked, she wondered who the woman was and why she was in the castle. Perhaps Mrs. Fraser found her replacement and was training her—but she had mentioned nothing to Cate, which seemed odd.

She pushed the thought aside, entering the closet. She’d deal with that mystery later. Right now, she had to find Riley. She checked the timepiece to determine how long he had been missing.

She slowed to a stop, her face pinching with exasperation. “Seriously? Again?”

The timepiece had almost stopped again.

“Useless. I have no idea how long he’s been gone.” She shook the watch in frustration before she squeezed her eyes closed.

She snapped them open and gave the watch a rub in apology. “It’s not your fault.”

As if on cue, the watch started to tick faster and faster, until it returned to normal.

She breathed a sigh of relief. “At least one thing is sorted. Okay, Cate, think. He’s a little dog. Just calm down, he couldn’t have gotten far.”

She spun to face the closet door, intent on retracing her steps. Her jaw dropped and relief washed over her. Riley sat on the floor behind a large trunk.

“RILEY!” Cate cried, rushing over to scoop up the small dog. “I thought I had lost you! Where have you been?”

Cate hugged him close, kissing the top of his little head. A few tears of relief escaped from her eyes and rolled down her cheeks. Riley gave her an appreciative lap on her face for all the attention, not understanding Cate’s exasperation.

Cate collapsed onto the floor with the dog in her arms and blew out a sigh of relief. She took an extra moment to hold him close, still wondering where he could have gone. It appeared he had been in the closet the entire time.

“We better go tell Mrs. Fraser that we found you, Riley.” Cate stood up, feeling the weight of the dress. “Oh, I better change my clothes first, though.”

As she unfastened the dress, she caught sight of herself in the mirror. Her makeup was smudged from shedding a few tears. She’d better clean up before visiting Mrs. Fraser. She finished changing and gathered Riley into her arms, hurrying to her bedroom.

She stopped dead as she entered, spotting Riley’s bed in its normal spot. It hadn’t been there moments ago when she’d searched for him. Then again, she had been certain Riley had been missing, when he had been in the closet the entire time.

She fixed her smeared makeup and headed downstairs, Riley in tow, to speak with Mrs. Fraser. She found the woman preparing lunch. The younger woman she’d ran into in the foyer was nowhere in sight.

“You can call off the emergency, Mrs. Fraser. I found Riley.”

Mrs. Fraser glanced up from her work, a confused expression on her face. “Emergency?”

“Yes, didn’t the other girl tell you? I thought I lost Riley, but I found him, thankfully.” She waved the little pup’s paw in the air.

“Other girl?” Mrs. Fraser asked.

“The other girl. I saw her in the entry hall. I told her to come and get you to help find Riley. She ran down the hall. Did she not tell you?”

“I’m the only one in the place, Lady Cate. No cleaning service here today, and both men are outside.”

Cate’s heart skipped a bit as she stood speechless. She struggled to get the word “what” out to Mrs. Fraser.

“I thought—” she stammered, “I thought maybe you hired your replacement and were training her?”

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands on her apron and shook her head. “Nay, I haven’t hired a replacement to train, Lady Cate. As far as I know, we’re the only ones here.”

Cate firmed her jaw. “Mrs. Fraser, I saw a woman standing right at the bottom of the stairs. She was wearing a long black dress and a white apron.”

Mrs. Fraser stared at her with a furrowed brow. “Long black dress and white apron?”

“Yes. I saw her, no mistaking it. She stood right there in front of me, and I spoke to her.”

“Did she speak to you?”

Cate considered it for a moment. “Well, no, but I didn’t imagine her.”

Mrs. Fraser went back to her work without a word, folding a napkin and placing it on Cate’s tray.

Cate pursed her lips, her knees feeling wobbly again. “I can’t believe I’m actually going to say this but... do you think she could have been a... a ghost?”

Cate stood speechless as her mind whirled from the question she’d just posed. Had she seen a ghost? What else could explain the oddly dressed woman in the foyer.

Mrs. Fraser snapped her gaze up to Cate, a sharp laugh escaping her lips. “A ghost? Lady Cate, you don’t believe that nonsense, do you?”

Cate wandered to the table and sank into a chair. “Well, no. I mean, I didn’t, but I read in a book from the library that many people have claimed this castle is haunted. I never believed in that stuff either, but how else can I explain the woman who was standing there—dressed oddly, now that I think about it? But she was there, plain as day.”

Mrs. Fraser continued to chuckle. “She didn’t disappear in a puff of smoke or float down the hall, did she?”

Cate’s shoulders slumped, and she rubbed Riley’s back. “No, no she didn’t do any of that. I don’t mean a storybook ghost. What if she was a spirit trapped in this castle? How else do you explain what I saw?”

Mrs. Fraser covered her still amused grin with a hand. “I’m sorry to poke fun, Lady Cate, but I dare say it was your imagination running wild after having those silly tales planted in your head.”

Cate lowered her eyes to the floor, considering the woman’s words. “So, Lady MacKenzie never mentioned anything strange happening? No ‘hauntings’ when she lived here?”

The woman shook her head as she spread a leaf of lettuce on top of a slice of turkey. “Nay, Lady Cate, no hauntings—and Lady MacKenzie would have driven you right out of the castle with that talk. She hated those nasty rumors that the castle was haunted by people who died building it. I remember they contacted her before they wrote that bloody book. She wouldn't even return that man's call. She was so furious about that rumor."

Cate pondered that information. Why would Lady MacKenzie be so adamant against any rumors of hauntings? Perhaps it was just one of those things that stuck in her craw.

Either way, Cate couldn't deny what she saw. Then again, perhaps it was her overactive imagination. She was half-panicked from having lost Riley, who ended up not being lost at all.

Maybe her mind was playing tricks on her. She wasn't sure of anything anymore. Riley was there the entire time, but she had been sure he was gone. Was she sure the maid was there? Maybe she was letting her imagination run wild.

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands on her apron again. "Time for your lunch, Lady Cate. Did you want it in the dining room or the library?"

The announcement pulled Cate from her ruminating. "Um, I think I'll take it in the library, thank you. Here, I can carry it up there." Cate set Riley down on the floor to take the tray.

"If you'd like. Thanks."

Cate turned to leave the kitchen, calling Riley to follow behind her.

"Oh, ah, Lady Cate?" Mrs. Fraser called.

Cate spun back to face her. "Yes?"

Mrs. Fraser offered her a reassuring smile. "I'm sure it was just your imagination earlier. I'll bet you were just tired and worried about Riley. I'm sure there's nothing to it."

"You're probably right, Mrs. Fraser. Thanks."

Cate carried her lunch to the library. She gathered her notes and notepad to create a plan for her book.

Despite her best intentions, she couldn't keep her mind focused on research after the odd occurrence. The encounter with her "ghost" ran through her mind again and again. She picked the encounter apart, detail by detail. The girl never spoke, to her memory. However, she did act as though she saw Cate. Her dress seemed strange, old-fashioned, as if it were from another era. Cate wondered if she imagined it, but she couldn't believe her mind could create something so lifelike.

After lunch, Cate returned her tray to the kitchen. On her way back, she explored the area where the girl had been standing. She scanned the entryway for any sign of the maid. She didn't know what she expected to find, but she looked for anything to lend credibility to what she witnessed. Nothing gave her any sign that anyone had been there earlier.

She climbed the main staircase. She surveyed where she had spotted the woman. She closed her eyes, trying to recall all the details. It couldn't have been her imagination, she decided. So, what was it she had experienced? She didn't believe in hauntings, but she had no other explanation for it.

As she pondered it, her phone chirped. She found a new text message from Jack. He had shown the video to his grandfather while running some errands in town. His grandfather said the watch, despite the behavior in the video, was functioning as it should and everything on the inside appeared to be shipshape. He didn't think it was anything to worry about and suggested keeping it wound daily but nothing beyond that. He called the anomaly a tic of the mechanism—pun intended.

Cate puckered her lips at the frustrating response. The watch couldn't be working properly. Yet she had no reason to distrust Jack's grandfather's opinion. Perhaps it was, as he called it, a tic the watch had developed. It never seemed to last long. Cate would continue to monitor it or see if she could reproduce it, but decided not to have it looked at further, as suggested by both Gayle and Mr. Reid.

She texted a thank you to Jack and returned to staring at nothing in an attempt to determine if she was going crazy or if she had really seen a ghost. Was this what Mary had mentioned in her journal entry? Had she seen a phantom maid roaming the halls?

Perhaps it even explained the missing pages in the journals. It sounded as though Lady MacKenzie didn't care for that talk. Perhaps the entire family was sensitive to it, and thus never mentioned it. Or perhaps Gertrude MacKenzie tried to remove all references her mother made to it by tearing out the journal pages that cited it.

After a few more minutes of pondering, Cate gave up. She'd solve nothing this way. She returned to the library to continue her work. Before resuming to study her notes, she took out her laptop and hunted down anything she could find on the web that discussed hauntings at the castle. Other than some conjecture on discussion boards and a few random posts on the author of The Mysteries of Scotland's page, nothing existed.

She toyed with the idea of emailing Molly and telling her she may have been right about the castle being haunted. She decided against it; she was afraid Molly might think she was becoming a mad eccentric after only a few weeks in the castle.

She bit her lower lip as she forced herself to return to her work, making a copy of the family tree to annotate. She also noted her discovery of Mary's journals and a few love letters from another era, addressed to someone named Victoria.

Cate searched the family tree, discovering a Victoria living in the 1800s, married to Randolph MacKenzie.

As she continued her work, her mind returned to the mystery of the slowing timepiece and the lost cell phone service. Could she reproduce the issue?

She slouched in her chair, her pen tapping her lips. Could she reproduce the ghost? Perhaps she could hold a séance. She watched enough of the campy 1960s soap opera, Dark Shadows, to know the basic tenets.

A chuckle erupted from her lips as she imagined her, Mr. and Mrs. Fraser, and Jack sitting around a table, hands touching in a circle, calling out to the ghosts of the past to hear and answer them.

She shook her head at the silly idea. But it did little to take away the fact that she'd seen a girl dressed in clothes from another era in her foyer.

The ideas lingered in her mind as she readied for bed. She slipped between the sheets, pulling the covers up to her chin as she stared into the corners, awaiting the appearance of a ghostly maid.

As the time ticked by, Cate rose from her bed to stare out over the moonlit landscape. It did little to ease her nerves. She wandered to the sitting room and slouched into her chaise.

She couldn't shake the encounter she'd experienced. She grabbed Mary's journal and reread the short snippet detailing Mary's encounter. She bit her lower lip, wondering if any ghosts roamed the halls at this very moment.

With a hard swallow, Cate grabbed her cell phone, toggled on the flashlight, and wandered through the halls. She ended up in the closet where she'd lost Riley.

Dresses still lay haphazardly where she'd left them when she'd panicked earlier. She shoved her phone into her robe pocket and carefully folded the dresses, placing them into the trunk again.

When she finished, she turned and scanned the dark space, lit by moonlight from the bedroom beyond. Where had Riley been hiding when she'd lost him? Had he crawled under one of the dresses? Why hadn't he come out when she'd called?

Her thumb rubbed the timepiece around her neck as she struggled to understand where he may have hidden and why he didn't respond.

She gave up on solving the mystery and wandered into the moonlit bedroom. She strode into the hall beyond, hesitating as she glanced toward the foyer. Her legs turned to jelly as she wondered if a ghost roamed the halls.

She bit her lower lip, turning away from her bedroom and heading toward the main staircase. As she approached the hall leading to the castle's front, voices floated from around the corner.

Cate swallowed hard, freezing in place, her flesh pocked with goosebumps. Her shaky breathing made it hard for her to hear the words, which sounded like whispers.

She stood motionless, quaking in her fluffy slippers as the whispers grew louder, approaching her location. Her eyes went wide as she realized she wasn't alone in the castle. Someone, living or dead, shared the space with her.

CHAPTER 17

Eate stood frozen in the hall as the hushed whispers came closer. She licked her trembling lower lip as she sucked in shaky breaths. A chill ran up her spine, and her stomach turned over.

Who was in the castle? She considered calling out. Perhaps Jack or one of the Frasers had returned. But her fear rendered her mute. Instead, she spun and raced through the halls away from the whispers, her heart pounding hard against her ribs.

She pressed herself into a dark corner near the windows overlooking the moonlit back rose gardens. Her ears strained for any sounds of voices. She wrapped her fingers around the timepiece swinging from her sprint and held it tight, her thumb rubbing it.

Only silence met her ears as she pressed against the cold stone walls, her limbs still shaking. After several minutes, her breathing slowed, and her heart rate returned to normal.

She inched her way along the wall and peered into the hall she'd sprinted down moments ago. She spotted nothing. No people. No ghosts. Not even a wisp of smoke.

She crept down the hall toward the foyer, straining her ears. She paused at the corner, peeking around it into an empty hall. With a lick of her lips, she stepped into the corridor and tiptoed toward the foyer.

She arrived at the top of the stairs, glancing at the moonlit marble floor below her. No sounds.

What had she heard moments ago? Had someone been here? A gust of wind whipped past, whistling as it bent the trees outside. Perhaps that had been the source. Had the wind sounded like whispers?

She swallowed hard, wondering if she'd encountered a ghost as she shuffled back to her bedroom suite. Her fingers lingered on the key again, wondering if she should lock the door. She hadn't seen a soul on her way back and hadn't heard any voices. Perhaps she'd imagined it.

She wandered to her bed, choosing to leave the door unlocked, and climbed in next to Riley. The little dog lifted his head and stared at her for a moment before he settled back into the covers.

Whatever she'd heard hadn't disturbed Riley. Perhaps it was just her imagination running wild.

She awoke the next morning convinced she'd imagined the voices. She climbed from her bed, determined to make some progress on one of the many lingering mysteries.

She settled at the library desk after breakfast and grabbed a blank sheet of paper. She titled columns across the top, listing each thread that she was exploring: MacKenzie Family History/Dunhaven Castle History; My connection to MacKenzies; Temperamental Watch; Possible Haunting.

She wrinkled her nose at the last one, but if she could determine the source of the odd phenomena she'd been experiencing, it would go a long way to settling her nerves. In each column, she jotted down any information she already had about the subject.

With building plans, a family tree, and a variety of firsthand sources, she had a wealth of information listed in her first column.

She couldn't add as much information to the second. Dead ends had met her every attempt to find information about her heritage. Perhaps her grandfather, Charles Kensie, had been born Charles MacKenzie. Maybe Gayle could help her track down birth certificates.

In the third column, Cate jotted down all the instances in which she'd witnessed the watch slowing down. She also noted the lack of cell phone service in the last incident.

She stared at the last column with a frown, loathe to detail any information in it. With a sigh, she put pen to paper, jotting down the book's entry, Mary's journal snippet, the phantom maid, and the voices she'd heard.

She tapped her pen against the paper as she eyed the weak evidence about the hauntings. There could be many explanations for each, none of which were ghosts.

She shoved the paper aside and pulled her laptop toward her, sending a quick email to Gayle.

Hi Gayle, I hope you are doing well. I dropped something in the post for you earlier this week. I hope you receive it soon and like it.

I had another question for you. As I try to trace my ancestry back to the MacKenzies, I found that I need more information about my great-grandparents. Do you know the best way to find birth records? Specifically, I'm looking for the birth records of my grandfather so I can identify his parents. I'm not sure where my grandfather was born, but his name was Charles Kensie or perhaps Charles MacKenzie. I'm not sure, but I'm working off the premise that our last name was changed from MacKenzie to Kensie sometime before they immigrated to the US.

Any help that you can provide would be much appreciated.

Thank you, Cate

Cate closed her laptop and stared at the note sheet, deciding to dive into more information on the castle's history. She stared at the stack of books she'd amassed over the last few days before pulling one from the stack and flipping it open.

In the course of a few morning hours, Cate read several entries about Scottish culture throughout some major periods of history. Mrs. Fraser arrived with a tray of lunch just as Cate finished a book discussing the culture surrounding the building of Scottish castles.

"Thank you so much, Mrs. Fraser. Perfect timing."

"Learning a lot, Lady Cate?"

Cate dropped the book onto the pile and rose to her feet, stretching. "I think so. It's a new area of study for me. My focus was American History in graduate school. There's a lot I have to learn."

Mrs. Fraser eyed the stack as she slid the tray onto the coffee table. "With all these books, it almost looks like you're back in school."

“Yes, it does.”

“Well, I’ll leave you to your work.”

Cate eased into the leather chair with a tentative glance at the woman. “Oh, before you go, did Lady MacKenzie ever mention the wind making strange noises in the castle?”

Mrs. Fraser clasped her hands in front of her as she furrowed her brow. “Wind?” She turned her lips down in a frown as she shook her head. “Nay, not that I recall, though the winds kick up something terrible in these moors. So, I dare say you’ll hear it howling on occasion.”

Cate nodded, tugging her napkin onto her lap. “I think I heard it last night.”

Mrs. Fraser waved a hand at her, a smile spreading across her face. “Oh, yes, the bean-nighe were howling last night.”

“The Washing Woman.”

Cate wrinkled her brow.

“A banshee. A ghost.”

Cate’s jaw dropped open. Had it been a ghost?

Mrs. Fraser waved a hand in the air as she chuckled. “Oh, Lady Cate, I’m only joking. It was just the wind howling. It was whipping around terribly last night. Mr. Fraser and young Jack had a bit of cleaning up to do this morning with the limbs.”

Cate smiled and nodded. “Right, yes, the wind. I’ll bet that’s what I heard then. Thanks again, Mrs. Fraser.”

As the woman slipped from the room, Cate stared at the growing pile of notes she had created. She spent her lunch rereading and organizing them. After a walk with Riley, she left him napping in the library, closing the door firmly behind her to avoid any incidents of him wandering off. She made her way to the bedroom closet to retrieve the handwritten letters she’d found.

She pulled the letters from the trunk and settled on the floor with her back pressed against the wall as she scanned them.

The familiar sound of slow ticking filled the air. She opened the face of the watch. Again, the second hand crept around in a circle.

With the timepiece in one hand, she grabbed her cell phone with the other. It read NO SERVICE in large white letters on the lock screen.

“Ah-ha!” Cate exclaimed. “No signal and a slow watch. Now, if I move around, can I get my signal back?”

She climbed to her feet and made her way to her bedroom where she had a regular signal. She hurried along, hoping to make it before the watch returned to normal. For the duration of her walk, the phone read NO SERVICE.

As she entered the bedroom, the phone still read NO SERVICE. She walked around a bit, focusing on the phone and watch, but still never recovered service. The watch still ticked slowly.

Cate sat on the chaise, trying to figure it out. She opened her phone and thumbed through a few apps, nothing would connect. Turning her attention to the watch, she stared at its slowly ticking hands. She was no closer to the truth despite having made a tenuous connection between these two events.

With a sigh, she retraced her steps back to the bedroom closet. Her cell phone never regained its signal. She set the phone aside and stared into space as she pondered the incident. Her thumb rhythmically rubbed the watch.

The ticking accelerated. The second hand returned to its normal speed. She grabbed her phone and checked the signal. Within seconds of the second hand returning to normal speed, the phone’s signal returned.

The incidents had to be connected, she concluded. But she had no clue how or why. Perhaps Jack would have an idea. She’d mention it to him the next time she spoke to him. In the meantime, she thought she should add this event to her note sheet to keep track of everything.

Cate left the letters behind, hurrying to the library to jot down the event. Riley lifted his head to acknowledge her return.

“Another weird watch event, buddy,” she told him.

After adding it to her note sheet, she texted Jack, telling him that the watch had slowed down again, and she noticed it happened at the same time as her cell phone lost service. She asked if he had any thoughts about it, questioning if there could be some interference affecting both the watch and her phone.

After sending the text, she checked her email, finding a new message from Gayle.

Dear Cate, I so look forward to receiving your package. I am positive that I will like whatever you have sent, and thank you so much for thinking of me (although you didn't need to send anything, I was happy to help).

Regarding the information about your grandfather's birth, let me see what I can track down for you and get back to you. Please give me about a week and I'll give you an update.

*Best,
Gayle*

Cate smiled at the email, appreciative of Gayle's help. As she finished reading the email, her cell phone chirped. An incoming message from Jack appeared: Some kind of EMP? I can run it past my grandfather. Let's talk tmw?

Cate considered the idea that it could be an electromagnetic pulse, or EMP, causing the watch to malfunction, texting back: No idea, maybe something like that, although nothing else seems to be affected. Talk tmw.

After sending the text, Cate did a quick Internet search on things that affect cell phone services. She ruled out a few obvious items, like a jamming device, but many discussions of what affected service were over her head. She gave up and closed her laptop. She would have to wait to discuss it further with Jack. Maybe once the two of them put their heads together, they would figure it out.

A small pair of feet massaged her leg. She glanced down, finding Riley's dark almond-shaped eyes staring up at her.

"Okay, buddy, you've been cooped up for most of the day. Let's go for a long walk before dinner, okay?"

Riley responded by wagging his tail at her in approval. Cate gathered the little dog into her arms and headed toward the door.

They ran into Jack gathering fallen limbs from the windstorm near the edge of the property.

"Lady Cate, coatless today, eh? Adjusting to the weather?"

Cate stared up at the bright sunshine, shielding her eyes. "It's a bright sunny day, so I left the coat inside."

"I sent a text to my grandfather about your watch problem. We couldn't come up with anything. The watch is old. He didn't think there would be any parts in common with a cell phone."

“I tried to look around on the Internet earlier, but I saw nothing that made sense.”

“Maybe it was a coincidence?”

“Possibly, but that’s the second time it’s happened, and when I walked around, I had no cell service, even where I usually have it. That’s the strange thing. As soon as the watch started keeping normal time again, my service came back almost immediately.”

Jack rubbed his chin after tossing branches into a cart attached to a small tractor. “That is strange, but still possibly a coincidence. I can’t figure out anything that would affect both. Sorry I don’t have a better answer.”

“No, it’s okay. I don’t either. Nothing makes sense, so maybe it is just a coincidence. Maybe I’m reading more into it than there is.”

Jack grabbed a few more wayward branches as he spoke. “It does seem odd, but nothing’s clicking for me on how they’re related.”

“Well, I’ll let you know if it happens again, or if there’s anything else I notice that can shed more light on what’s going on. I know your grandfather said everything was functioning properly, but there’s something strange going on—or that watch has a strange tic, no pun intended.”

“Yeah, let me know. My grandfather took care of a lot on the estate, so if he says nothing is wrong, I’d believe him. But I agree it is a strange tic. Pun intended.” He gave her a belly laugh as he tossed the sticks into his cart.

“Okay, will do.”

“Oh, before you go, let me toss a branch here for Riley. I’ve barely spoken to the lad. I think he’s insulted.”

Riley eyed Jack, his eyes gleaming as Jack brandished a stick.

“Yes, you’d better. He’ll be highly insulted if you don’t.”

“Can’t insult the master of the house. I might lose my job.”

Cate laughed as Jack tossed the branch away and Riley chased after it. “Okay, see you later.”

“Good day, Cate.”

After finishing their walk, filled with more stick tosses, Cate returned to the library to continue her notes toward a first chapter in her book about the castle. She turned her attention to Mary’s fourth journal as the afternoon hours waned. Missing pages like all the others, it provided a frustrating read.

She polished it off in one sitting, finding no more information about ghosts or her father or grandparents.

With an annoyed sigh, she tossed the journal away and stared at the last remaining book. She pulled it onto her lap and settled in to read more partial stories about house parties and grand balls.

Halfway through the read, Cate stumbled upon a page thicker than the others. After a careful examination, it seemed two pages were stuck together. She squinted at the edge, just able to make out the thin line of two separate pages. It appeared as though they may have been wet, and dried stuck together.

She rubbed the corners, trying to see if the pages would loosen, but they did not. She tried to get the edge of her fingernail between them but made little progress. Concerned that she would tear the sheets and ruin the pages, she decided against pushing harder than this.

She leaned back, pondering the problem. She had studied document preservation and restoration, and she had even done some as a child with one of her mother's coworkers. Most times these situations were lost causes, but there were some tricks that one could try if the document was not too important to risk damage.

She recalled a similar situation at the museum. An industrious worker told her that steam could sometimes do the trick, then demonstrated on a few stuck onion paper pages. She grabbed the book and headed to the kitchen. If she was lucky, a little steam could solve her issue and loosen the pages without destroying their contents.

Mrs. Fraser bustled around the kitchen, readying for dinner as Cate strode into the room.

The woman jumped, her eyes wide as she spotted Cate. "Lady Cate, did you need something?"

"I do, but not what you might think. Could you point me toward a pot to boil some water?"

"Aye, but may I ask what you plan on boiling?"

"Just water. I need some steam. I've got this journal—" Cate waved the journal in her hand. "And there are a few stuck pages. I'd like to see if I can get them unstuck with a little steam."

Mrs. Fraser tugged a pot from a cupboard and began filling it with water before putting it on the stove to heat. "Do you suppose it will work?"

“I don’t know, but I hope so. I’ve never tried this before myself, but I have seen it work in the past. I’m hoping it works on this since the pages are not glossy or thick.”

The water began to boil, creating plumes of steam floating up. Cate carefully held the journal to allow the steam to hit the pages, but not close enough to be splashed by the boiling water. She moved the book around in an almost circular motion, trying to coat the pages with the steam while allowing no part to become too damp.

After a bit of work, Cate removed the book from the steam and tried the pages.

Mrs. Fraser peered over her shoulder with her eyebrows raised. “Any luck?”

With a frown, Cate answered, “Nope, not yet, still stuck. I’ve got to be careful not to tear it, too. I’ll try more steam.”

Cate moved the book over the steam again, wondering if she’d ever get to read the words hidden between the two stuck pages. She couldn’t help but feel they may be telling given the amount redacted from the journal.

They may even help solve one of her mysteries. Would she ever have the chance to read the contents?

CHAPTER 18

Mrs. Fraser peered over Cate's shoulder as she waved the book over the steam, testing the pages every few seconds. After her fifth attempt, her muscles stiffened. An edge of one page curled away from the other.

"HA!" Cate shouted.

Mrs. Fraser craned her neck to stare at the source of Cate's enthusiasm. "Did it work?"

"Yes, I think so. I've just got the edge, but if I'm careful, I think I can get it," Cate said between clenched teeth, as though admitting any success may jinx her efforts. Inch by inch, Cate slowly peeled the pages back. Finally, she pulled them apart.

"There." She breathed a sigh of relief. "Got it."

Mrs. Fraser clapped her hands after turning the stove off. "Hey, good work, Lady Cate. I have to admit, I cannae believe that worked."

A smile spread across Cate's face. "Thanks, I'm glad it worked. It's always a gamble. Now, I just need to let these pages dry, and I should be able to read them."

"Will you be having your dinner in your sitting room to continue reading?"

"Yes, I will, thank you. I'll try to dry this off now with my hairdryer."

Mrs. Fraser nodded as she emptied the pot into the sink. "Okay, Lady Cate, I'll bring your tray to you when it's ready."

"Thanks. Oh, here, let me dry that before I go."

Mrs. Fraser whipped a towel from her shoulder and waved Cate from the kitchen. "No need, don't fuss with that, Lady Cate. I've got it."

Excited that her trick worked, Cate hurried back to her room to dry the pages. A few minutes on low heat with the blow dryer and the pages were soon dry enough to read. She returned to her sitting room as Mrs. Fraser brought in her tray with her dinner.

"Did you get it dry?"

"I did. I was just about to read it. Perfect timing with dinner."

"Happy reading, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser said as she left the room, pulling the double doors slightly closed.

Cate sat down, taking a few bites of dinner before diving into the exposed entry, finally able to read an entry that was longer than a page. Refreshing herself on the previous page's entry she read.

As I continue these excursions, I cannot help but feel the...

The unveiled page continued the sentence.

... tremendous responsibility to pass along to Gertrude. I can scarcely wrap my head around it sometimes, yet I cannot deny the proof right in front of my eyes. Since my husband has passed the timepiece to me, a mere caretaker of the awesome object, I have struggled to comprehend the enormity of the responsibility that has been given to me and that I will pass to Gertrude.

I have documented what I have learned so far and plan to keep a complete record, which Gertrude will surely need to destroy after gleaning any information that she can from my writings. It is the only way I can pass a complete record to her. While this task was thrust upon me because of the direst of circumstances, I vow to do all I can to make it easier...

The page ended. The remaining pages were torn away, leaving another incomplete record. What little remained on those pages still left Cate stunned. Mary created the journals to establish a record for Gertrude. What it was a record of, Cate did not know. All that she read seemed to have been meaningless descriptions of parties, get-togethers, and other castle happenings. It didn't seem to be earth-shattering information. Yet Mary seemed to think it was significant enough to be documented. Phrases and words like "tremendous responsibility," "enormity," "awesome object," and "direst of circumstances" lent gravity and importance to the writing. Yet what Cate had read did not seem important in the least. Maybe the torn out pages included the important information.

She scanned the entry again. Mary also specifically mentioned the timepiece that now hung around Cate's neck. This object seemed to be of immense importance to Gertrude and Mary. The words about Gertrude destroying the journals echoed in Cate's head, too. Could this explain the missing pages? Perhaps Gertrude destroyed the journals or the relevant parts that tied the entries together in any meaningful way. Had these pages been left because they were stuck together?

Cate turned to Riley and said, "What in the world is this about, buddy? Rather mysterious way to refer to this old timepiece, huh?"

Cate wondered what in the world was so special about it, and what enormous truth Gertrude was protecting by destroying the journal pages? She eyed the timepiece, willing it to share its secrets. Sighing, she realized she could learn nothing from it.

Were the journal entries somehow connected to the slowing of the timepiece? Was there some meaning behind that? Or was Mary just mentally unstable and took to writing fanciful stories in her journals? If that was the case, why did Gertrude destroy so much of the books?

Cate finished her meal, reading the rest of the journal. She gleaned no more relevant or useful information.

The words from the journal rang in her mind as she attempted to sleep. Mary considered whatever she was referring to in the journal to be a huge responsibility. And someone, perhaps Gertrude, as suggested in the hidden entry, thought it important enough to conceal. Cate stared at the timepiece she held in her hands. Apparently, this was a vital piece of the puzzle, but how did it fit? What was its importance?

With a deep inhale, she let her hand holding the timepiece fall to her chest, rubbing it as thoughts raced through her mind. It wasn't long after she let it rest against her that she heard the now-familiar loud ticking and slowing of the watch. She bolted upright in bed, opening the timepiece. The second hand crawled again. As Cate stared at it, an idea struck her. She rubbed the watch again. The second hand sped up until the timepiece kept perfect time.

Cate's brow furrowed. Was it possible she was causing the watch to malfunction? Could friction from the rubbing cause it to slow? That didn't explain the loss of cell phone signal, but it could explain the malfunctioning timepiece. Perhaps no one else in the family had trouble with it because no one else in the family had developed the habit of rubbing the watch like Cate had.

Cate pondered it for a moment. She wanted to try again to see if her theory was correct, but she was afraid she might damage the watch. Perhaps it was best left untried until she ran her theory past Jack and his grandfather. She would text him in the morning. Cate relaxed back into her bed, determined to go to sleep. After a bit of a struggle, she drifted off to sleep, dreaming again about the past occupants of the castle.

She sent Jack a text early the next morning: I may have a theory about the watch, meet for lunch to talk?

As she waited for a response, she scanned her notes, deciding the next logical step would be to gather information from locals. She opened her laptop and searched for the local historical society's information, finding the town's librarian, Mrs. Isla Campbell, listed as president.

She navigated to the library's website and dialed the number listed, asking for Mrs. Campbell.

"Isla Campbell," the woman answered after the call was transferred to her.

"Mrs. Campbell, hi, Cate Kensie here."

"Oh, Lady Cate, how are you? Settling in well, I trust?"

Cate tapped her pen on the desk. "Yes, I am. I'm actually doing a bit of research into the castle, as you know, and I hoped to meet with you about it."

"With me?"

"Yes. I saw that you were listed as the town's historical society president, and I thought you'd be a fantastic resource. Do you have some time to spare?”

“You’ve come to the right place, Lady Cate. I have loads of information. And, of course, I’d make the time.”

“Great. When’s the next opening in your schedule?”

“Could you come down today? Say, in about thirty minutes?”

“Absolutely, that would be perfect. Thank you.”

“Of course, Lady Cate. I’ll see you soon.”

Cate jabbed at the phone to end the call before gathering her notes, a pen, and a blank notebook. She gathered Riley and stepped into the cool, cloudy weather.

As she slid in behind the wheel of her car, her phone chirped with a message from Jack: In town on errands, won’t be back for lunch. Later?

Cate texted back: Heading to town for a meeting, meet at pub for lunch?

Before she fired the engine, her phone chimed again. Jack responded: Deal! Noon?

She answered with an affirmative and fired the engine, easing off the brake and heading for town.

After cracking a few windows, she left the car behind in a space near the library and headed inside. The assistant behind the desk glared at her as she approached. Cate offered her a penitent smile. The librarian emerged from her office, allowing Cate to bypass the circulation desk and avoid the angry assistant.

She waved her around the desk. “Lady Cate, a pleasure to see you again. Please, come into my office.”

“Hello, Mrs. Campbell, nice to see you again, too. Thank you for meeting with me so quickly.”

Cate followed to a small and dimly lit space filled with boxes of books and other library paraphernalia. The librarian motioned to a chair opposite the desk. Cate eased into it and tugged a notebook and pen from her bag.

Mrs. Campbell settled in behind the wooden desk, folding her hands on the top and leaning forward. “Well, Lady Cate, I’m very excited to be of some assistance to you. I understand from your call that you’re doing research into the castle’s history?”

Cate dug a recorder from her tote and waved it in the air. “Yes, that’s right. Do you mind if I record our conversation?”

“Oh, no, not at all.”

“Thanks.” Cate clicked the button to record. “I have been doing some research into Dunhaven Castle. It’s of great interest to me as a historian and the new owner. I’d like to get a better sense of its history from anyone who may have lived in the area and who knows of any information or sources of information. I believed you would be a great starting point since, as the town’s librarian, you’re the historical society president.”

“Oh,” Mrs. Campbell began, coyly, “well, I’m not sure I’d call myself a historian per se, but yes, I’m the historical society president, so I’ve got a lot of information.”

“Then you’ll be a great starting place. So,” Cate said, turning to her notes, “I’ve got the basics of who, what, where, when, and why with the castle. I was hoping you would share some less objective details about the castle. For example, local stories that have been passed along about why particular things were done or anything else that might be connected?”

Mrs. Campbell leaned back, her chair squeaking, and raised an eyebrow. “Oh, you mean the, ah, legends?”

“Yes, if there are legends, I’d love to hear them. They are exactly what would be a perfect addition to my book.”

“Well,” Mrs. Campbell began, settling into her chair with a cat-who-caught-the-canary look, “you have heard about the hauntings, haven’t you?”

“I read a short blurb about it in the book you provided on my last visit, yes.”

“Of course, I didn’t say anything when we first met. I didn’t want to ruin your experience in your new home. I don’t believe in such things, but —” She paused. “There have been, eh, stories.”

She paused again, narrowing her eyes at Cate. The woman appeared to be enjoying the suspense. Cate fed into her excitement. “Stories? Please go on.”

“Yes, stories, tales, legends. Of spirits, ghosts, terrors in the night, phantom sounds, shrieks, and screams of the dead but not gone.” She waved her hands dramatically. “Some say they were ghosts of the builders. Someone was murdered during construction, you know. Others say various spirits of staff who died on the estate come back to haunt their employers long after they were put in their graves.”

“Any description of those spirits? What they looked like? Where they appeared?” Cate glanced up from her note-taking to study the woman.

Mrs. Campbell raised her eyebrow at Cate again. “Any particular form you’d like more information about? You haven’t had a run-in with any of the dearly departed, have you, Lady Cate?”

She offered her a devilish grin. Cate swallowed hard, her odd experiences flitting through her mind. Perhaps those legends were true. Perhaps there were ghosts at Dunhaven Castle.

Cate forced a smile on her face as she considered her response. Should she tell her about the phantom maid she’d spotted in the foyer?

CHAPTER 19

Cate stared at the woman as she considered her question.

“No,” she answered flatly. Cate wasn’t sure what “run-in” she’d had when she encountered the maid in the entryway, but she wasn’t going to admit it to Mrs. Campbell. At least, not yet.

Mrs. Campbell leaned back and shrugged. “Well, there is the tale of the young man who disappeared during the construction. He is rumored to roam the halls, with various sightings across the estate from the gardens to the castle’s interior. He’s described as a tall, dark-haired figure in tattered clothes with a menacing expression. Then there are tales of phantom maids appearing all over the place, endlessly bustling around, continuing their household chores long after their deaths.”

Cate stiffened, her pen freezing in place as she discussed the phantom maid.

The woman continued, ignoring Cate’s reaction, “And of course, there’re the tales of those who have lived there. Those who have been sent screaming into the night when they are awoken by ghastly howls, screams, and shrieks that seem to come from all directions at once.”

“Interesting,” Cate commented as she jotted down notes. “Do you think there’s any truth in these tales?”

Mrs. Campbell frowned and shook her head. “Oh, not me. I don’t believe in such rubbish, but that doesn’t stop the tales from circulating, of course.”

“Or from being printed in books,” Cate quipped. “Speaking of, I noticed in that book that Lady MacKenzie chose not to comment when contacted by the author. Do you know the reason for that?”

“Lady MacKenzie despised the talk of the ghosts and goblins haunting the castle. My guess is primarily because it was her family home. She took a lot of pride in the place, as she should have, and it bothered her to hear people talk negatively about her family home.”

“Was that common for all the MacKenzies or just Lady Gertrude?”

Mrs. Campbell offered another shrug. “I’m not sure. I think Lady Gertrude was more of a recluse, particularly toward the end of her life, than her father was, for example. Those who knew him described Lord MacKenzie as a very personable and outgoing sort.”

“Did she take after her mother?”

“Again, without personal knowledge, my understanding is no. The previous Lady MacKenzie was known as gracious and friendly.”

“Hmm, very interesting. Any interesting tales about any of the residents?”

A smirk crossed the woman’s face, and she leaned forward, placing her clasped hands on the desk. “Well, there is a tale about Lord Randolph MacKenzie. I think he was the third proprietor of the castle.”

“Yes?”

“Well, he traveled extensively. The rumor was, he brought back a girl from one of his travels. He kept her locked in the tower room and used her to fulfill some of his more base desires.” With another wiggle of her eyebrows, she offered Cate a coy smile.

Cate summarized the story in her notes, doubting any of it would prove true. “Another interesting tidbit.”

“So,” Mrs. Campbell said, lifting her chin to peer over Cate’s notepad, “will you be able to use anything I’ve said in your book?”

Cate scribbled a few more notes before flipping the book shut. “Oh, yes, you’ve been very helpful.”

“Oh, excellent. I’m so glad I’ve been of help. And how exciting that some small part of what I’ve said may end up in a book one day. Is there anything else I can help with?”

She shoved the notebook and pen into her tote bag. “Not right now. If I think of anything, though, I’ll contact you to follow up as I begin writing.”

“Oh, please, feel free. I’m happy to provide you with anything else that might help fill in gaps.”

“Well, thank you so much for your time, Mrs. Campbell. I’m sure I’ll be in touch,” Cate said as she stood.

Mrs. Campbell rose with her. “Of course, of course. I’m happy to help, and please don’t hesitate to contact me if you need more.”

Cate extended her hand to shake Mrs. Campbell’s and told her that she would find her own way out. Exiting the office, Cate skirted around the circulation desk, with the library assistant still giving her the evil eye, and headed for the door.

She had about thirty minutes before she planned to meet Jack for lunch, so she collected Riley from the car for a short walk around town. He enjoyed visiting some of his favorite shop owners, and he appreciated getting treats from them even more. Before heading to the pub for lunch, Cate settled him back in the car for an early afternoon nap.

“You wait for me here, buddy. I’m going to meet our pal, Jack, for lunch.” Riley acknowledged the mention of Jack’s name with a wag of his tail. “I’ll tell him you said hello.”

She found Jack already waiting in a booth at the pub. He waved her over.

“Thanks for meeting me,” she said as she sat down. “Riley says hi.”

“No problem. I’m dying to hear your theory about the watch. Oh, and tell the little laddie that I say hello, too, and I look forward to another game of fetch very soon.”

Before they could discuss anything further, the waitress arrived at the table to take their order.

Jack stared at her, his face wrinkled with confusion. “Fish and chips again? Really?”

This generated a hearty laugh from Jack. “Oh, right, this coming from the lassie who moved to a new country and castle sight unseen.”

Cate shook her head as she unfurled her napkin. “Not true. Mr. Smythe showed me pictures so I saw it.” She punctuated her statement by sticking her tongue out at him.

“Ah, you’re right, not very adventurous moving to a new country when you saw pictures.” He laughed again. “Okay, down to business. What’s your theory on the watch?”

Cate leaned forward across the table and grinned. "One word: friction."

"Friction? Care to elaborate?"

"Yes, friction. I've developed this kind of habit of rubbing the watch in my hand. I think the friction from my fingers may affect it. It happened again last night just after I was rubbing the watch. When I think back, I believe every time it's happened it has been when I've been handling the watch like that. Here, let me show you."

Cate grabbed the watch and began rubbing it. Nothing happened. She frowned and tried again. Again, nothing.

She gave a disgusted sigh. "This is what I was doing last night, and when I rubbed it again, the watch sped up and went back to perfect time."

"Are you sure it wasn't just a coincidence?"

"I thought of that but, from what I remember, it's typically happened when I've been rubbing the watch."

Jack flicked his gaze to the working timepiece. "Except now."

"Except now, yes," she said, trying again. "Except now."

Jack leaned back, slouching in his seat. "I'll run it past my grandfather and see what he says. Assuming, though, that you've got something here—maybe it worked last night because it built up all day with friction—how does that explain the mobile signal loss?"

Cate bit her lower lip as her forehead crinkled in thought. "That's the only piece that doesn't fit into this scenario. I don't know. But maybe I'm on to something, even if this isn't exactly it. You could be right. Maybe it's a build-up. Although, it's happened earlier in the day, too, so that wouldn't fit well there."

"Well," Jack said as the waitress returned with their food, "perhaps we're moving in the right direction. Keep tabs on it. For now, though, let's enjoy our meal."

After lunch, Cate returned to the castle with Riley, planning on taking him for a long walk after he had been cooped up in the car for most of the morning. While she walked, she pondered the situation with the watch. She thought she had been on to something with the friction idea, and she had been disappointed when she wasn't able to reproduce the phenomenon at lunch. She frowned down at the watch. She wasn't doing very well on any of her mysteries since moving to the castle.

At least she had gotten some good information for her book. She focused her thoughts on her conversation with Mrs. Campbell. Much of what she told her would add a good deal to the book. It was interesting to interweave historical facts with accounts from people who had grown up with legends and lore.

Cate started piecing together how she would pepper in the quotes from Mrs. Campbell with the topics in her book. She could gather quotes from a few other people too, like Mrs. Fraser and Jack's grandfather. Both had a lifetime of experience with the estate and would be excellent sources to interview. She was sure there would be others from the town who would be interested in giving her some information—perhaps members of the historical society.

She resolved to ask Jack if his grandfather would mind doing an interview for the book. As she walked, another idea formed, and she decided to email the author of The Mysteries of Scotland to see what details he could provide about Dunhaven Castle.

As the path turned her back toward the castle, Cate contemplated some other sources that she planned to use in her text. It reminded her that she still needed to finish reading through the letters she had found in one of the bedroom closets and to continue to look through the castle for additional personal sources that could augment the facts she had gathered already.

Upon returning to the castle, she opened her laptop and searched for information on how to contact the author of the book that mentioned Dunhaven Castle. It didn't take long to find the author's webpage and information on contacting him. Cate opened a blank email and typed a brief message, introducing herself and requesting from him any information about sources he used in putting together the entry on Dunhaven Castle in his book. She stated that she was requesting the information since she was researching the estate. She did not mention that she was the new owner, not wishing to be asked to provide a quote for his next book or blog post.

After sending the email, Cate scanned the list of new emails that appeared in her inbox. Most of them were junk, but there was an email from Gayle with the subject: THANK YOU!

She opened it and read.

Dear Cate, THANK YOU so much for the thoughtful gift. I love the little porcelain dog figure. I have him (I assume it's a him) set on my desk. He reminded me of Riley, so I named him Wiley after the funny story you told me about your neighbor's insistence on calling him by the incorrect name. Each day, I will look at him and think of you and Riley. I hope you are doing well and enjoying castle life.

By the way, I hope to have some information for you soon about the birth records for your grandfather.

*Best,
Gayle*

Cate smiled at the email, glad that Gayle enjoyed receiving the small figurine and finding it amusing that she had named it Wiley. Her mind wandered to the other two postcards she'd sent, wondering how those from her old life were fairing.

She glanced back at the screen, spotting the email from Gayle. In the few minutes that she had before dinner, she typed a quick answer back telling Gayle that she was glad she liked the figurine and that she loved the name.

She just finished the email when Mrs. Fraser appeared with a tray of dinner.

"Thank you so much, Mrs. Fraser," Cate said as she stood and strode to the armchair near the fireplace. "Oh, before you go, I hoped to ask a favor of you."

"Ask away, Lady Cate."

Cate eased into the chair and pulled her napkin onto her lap. "I was wondering if you'd let me interview you sometime for my book on Dunhaven Castle. Since you've been here all your life, I suspect you have some great insight into the castle and how it's changed over the years. I'd love to have some personal accounts and a few quotes for the book I'm working on from someone with as much knowledge as you."

Mrs. Fraser pointed a finger at her chest, her eyebrows raising. "Me? Well, I don't know how much use I'll end up being for you, but I would be happy to help if I can."

"Oh, great. Thank you. Would you have some time tomorrow morning after breakfast?"

"Well, I can make the time whenever you'd like to do it."

"I don't want to inconvenience you, if that's not the best time."

"Nay, that's a fine time."

“Okay, great. We’ll plan to do it then, Mrs. Fraser. Thanks again.”

Cate admired the sunrise from her bedroom window, eager to complete her interview with Mrs. Fraser. After breakfast, she took her tray to the kitchen and assisted Mrs. Fraser with cleanup, as much as the woman would allow.

As they sat down with steaming cups of tea, Cate brandished her recorder, asking if she could record the conversation, and after receiving an affirmative from Mrs. Fraser, she clicked the recorder on.

Cate flipped open her notebook and uncapped her pen. “So, Mrs. Fraser, you’ve been on the estate your whole life, correct?”

“Yes, I was born here, daughter of a maid and groundskeeper. Lived my whole life on this estate.”

“You must have a great deal of knowledge of the place and its inhabitants, I assume?”

Mrs. Fraser lifted her chin with pride. “I know the castle inside and out. Know every hallway and backstair, every nook and cranny. Now, I didn’t have much contact with the people, being a child. But when I got older and took on a position here, I got to know their habits and preferences. I started here when Lady Mary was still overseeing the household, and of course, I was here for Lady Gertrude’s entire time as mistress of Dunhaven Castle.”

Cate asked some specific questions about each, asking Mrs. Fraser to provide some details on their habits and preferences, how the two women differed, and how the estate changed in the years that Mrs. Fraser had been there.

Emily Fraser provided a wealth of knowledge on the inner workings of the castle and how it had changed over the years. Her interview took almost two hours, with Cate getting several pages of excellent information to add to her book. At the close of the interview, she thanked Mrs. Fraser again, telling her she provided so much information she was certain to have enough for an entire chapter. The news stunned the woman, and she admitted she was happy to provide enough information to be quoted in a book.

Cate gathered her things, discussing a potential interview with Mr. Fraser on a rainy day. She departed from the kitchen and headed upstairs to retrieve the old letters of Victoria MacKenzie for her next piece of research.

Along the way, she checked on Riley, finding him contentedly napping on the chaise lounge in her sitting room. She eased the door closed and headed for the bedroom closet. She settled in amongst the boxes and trunks, grabbing the handful of letters to read.

She read through the love letters from Randolph MacKenzie to his future wife, Victoria. The difference in discourse between men and women during courtship in the distant past as compared to today was fascinating. Apparently, the young suitor had been quite taken by the young woman's beauty and wrote her several poems about it, sending them along with his official wishes to court her. It was like reading a real-life romance novel, and Cate found she couldn't tear herself away.

Given the language in the letter, she found it hard to believe the man had kept a woman locked in the tower. He seemed thoroughly in love with his wife.

About a third of the way through her reading, the familiar loud tick of the timepiece resounded, and Cate found the second hand creeping around the face. She tried to remember if she had been rubbing it and concluded that she likely had been.

This time, she hoped to show Jack exactly what the watch was doing, and they could both test her theory that friction was responsible for slowing down and speeding up the watch. Cate picked up her phone as she left the closet, intent on texting Jack to find his location. She hoped that she could locate him quickly. She pressed the button to toggle the display on only to be greeted with white lettering that read NO SERVICE.

Cate groaned. Not only was it impossible to text Jack, but if the cell signal was in any way related to the slowing of the watch, her friction idea just went up in smoke. She gave up on piecing it together and concentrated on finding Jack, hurrying from the room and down the hall. She peered out the windows in search of the groundskeeper.

Window after window passed, but Cate caught no glimpse of Jack. With a frustrated sigh, she hurried around the corner, peering through windows which overlooked the back garden. She spotted a tall figure working and stepped to the window, knocking rapidly on the glass.

Attracted by the noise, the man spun to glance up at the windows. Cate swallowed hard, stumbling back a step. It wasn't Jack. It was a man she had never seen before.

She swallowed hard and approached the window again as the man returned to his work. Cate studied him. He was dressed curiously, and the equipment he used looked like a peculiar choice, considering the tools she had seen Mr. Fraser and Jack using.

She glanced at the watch again. It still ran slow and a check of her phone showed no service. Her goal had been to find Jack and show him the watch in its slowed state. If she found him, she could also ask him about the man in the back garden.

She continued down the hall, not spotting Jack anywhere. She clutched at the watch bouncing against her chest as she retraced her steps and peered again through a few windows, finding him nowhere.

With a sigh, she popped open the face of the timepiece. To her amazement, the watch ticked away at normal speed. She had just rubbed it, she realized. It couldn't be coincidence. Too bad she couldn't have demonstrated it for Jack.

She glanced at her cell phone, finding it now had a signal. The two occurrences must be related. But then her theory made little sense.

Frustrated, she shoved the phone in her pocket and took a step down the hall. She glanced out the window overlooking the rose bushes and stopped dead.

Jack trimmed a rose bush just outside the glass. Tools and clippers were spread around him. It looked as though he had been there quite a while.

Cate wondered if she could have missed him when she hurried past the windows. She couldn't see how she had.

She knocked at the window and pushed it open. Jack twisted, spotting her at the window.

"M'lady!" he shouted. "Why doth though beckon from the window?"

Cate shook her head, but his extravagant bow elicited a chuckle. "Very funny. I beckon from the window because I've been looking for you."

"That sounds ominous."

"Did you just get here? I went past just a few minutes earlier and didn't see you. That thing happened with the watch again. I wanted to show you."

"I've been here for over two hours. And I can tell you it's true: every rose really does have its thorn. Maybe even two or three of them."

Cate's brow furrowed in confusion. She couldn't have missed him. But where had he been when she walked past moments ago?

"Everything okay, Cate?" he hollered when she didn't respond for a moment.

“Ah, yes, I think so. It’s just that, well, I just came past, and I could have sworn you were not here.”

Jack looked equally confused. “I promise I’ve been here for about two hours. Haven’t left.”

“No, I believe you, but I’m surprised I could have missed you. Hey, speaking of working, did Mr. Fraser hire some extra help for the garden trimming?”

“Yes, I saw a man a few yards down working outside the garden. I was wondering who he was.”

“Ah.” He glanced around, rubbing the back of his neck. “There’s no one else working with us today that I know of. If he hired someone, he didn’t mention it to me, and I haven’t seen anyone all day.”

A chill ran up Cate’s spine. Had she just spotted yet another ghost roaming the estate?

CHAPTER 20

Cate stood frozen at the window as she processed the information. Her knees wobbled underneath her. No one else was on the estate. So, who had she just spotted moments ago working in her garden?

She licked her lips and forced a smile onto her face. “Yes, I’m okay. I’ll let you get back to your roses.”

“I believe they’re your roses, Lady Cate.” He gave a salute to her as he returned to his trimming.

Cate shut the window, hovering a moment more as she stared out of it. How had she missed Jack moments ago? She shifted angles, studying another view. There was no way she wouldn’t have spotted him. But he hadn’t been there.

What had been there was another man. She lingered another moment before heading back to her room. Was she losing her mind?

Riley bounded off the chaise as she pushed into the room, prancing over to her with his tail wagging. She scooped him up, shoving aside the unexplainable events. “Did you have a nice nap, Riley? Ready for a little walk before lunch?”

Riley’s tail wagged furiously, and he lapped Cate’s face appreciatively when she mentioned a walk.

Despite the outing and the online shopping she did afterward, tension mounted as the evening hours approached. Cate lounged in the library’s armchair, trying to focus her attention on a mystery novel.

She rubbed at the back of her neck as she let the book drop into her lap for the umpteenth time. Her unease grew with every moment. She suspiciously eyed every dark corner, expecting a ghost to come popping out at any second. With the recent ongoingings at the castle, she began to question her own sanity.

She crawled into bed at one in the morning, hoping a few hours of sleep would settle her mind.

The rest did little to ease her tension. She swung her legs over the side of the bed as the sun peeked over the horizon with heavy eyelids. She still eyed the dark corners suspiciously as she tugged on her robe, deciding to spend the day in town away from the castle.

After breakfast and a long walk, Cate loaded Riley into the car and headed for town. Warm sunshine shone on the buildings as they wandered along the streets. She ducked into the shop she'd bought the postcards from on her last trip.

"Good morning, Harry."

A broad smile crossed the man's face, and he waved from behind the counter. "Well, good morning, Lady Cate. And little Riley, too."

Riley stared expectantly, waiting for a treat that Harry quickly produced. "I'm glad to see you. How are you today?"

"I'm good, thanks. How are you?"

"Cannae complain. I've got my wife helping me today, just a minute. I want you to meet her." He held up a finger, twisting his head to the back storage area. "Helen! HELEN!"

"Yeah? What is it?" a voice answered.

"Come out here and meet Lady Cate," he called back.

Helen appeared in the doorway, dusting her hands off.

"Cate?" she asked, then spotted Cate standing near the counter.

Harry waved a hand at Cate. "Aye, Lady Cate—the newest MacKenzie, our new castle owner."

"Oh, Lady Cate," Helen said, making her way over with a smile.

Cate stuck her hand out to the woman. "Hi Helen, I'm Cate, and this is Riley."

"Hello, nice to meet you. I've heard about you from Harry and Isla. I'm a member of the historical club, too."

"Oh, great. I was hoping to stop by one of your meetings to discuss the castle with the group. I'm writing a book on its history, and it would be great to get some stories about it from the folks here.”

Helen swept a lock of her auburn hair from her forehead. “I’m sure you’d be welcome at a meeting. You should speak with Isla about when the best time might be. There are definitely stories about that place, that’s for certain.”

“Yes, Mrs. Campbell was telling me some of those stories. About the hauntings and so on.”

Helen nodded at her as she shoved her hands into her apron pockets. “Those tales have been told around this town long as I can remember. After listening to some of them, I’d venture to say you’re quite a brave girl, Lady Cate.”

Cate furrowed her brow. “Brave?”

“You’d not catch me in that castle all alone at night, there’s a fact.”

Cate lifted Riley into her arms, stroking his fur. “So, you think there’s something to the stories?”

Helen crossed her arms, giving a shrug. “Well, I cannae say if they’re true or not, but I can say I dinnae think they just came from nothing. Something happened up there at that castle to cause such a stir of tales in the village.”

“I’d guess much of the stories are embellished upon.”

“Even still, you’d not get me alone up there.” Helen gave an emphatic shake of her head.

Harry waved his hands in the air. “Now, Helen, stop filling that poor girl’s head with tales.”

“Nothing she hasn’t heard before, sounds like,” Helen retorted.

“No sense in stirring her up more. The poor child doesn’t want to hear about how she’s sharing her new home with ghosts. She’ll barely be able to walk around without checking every shadow after you’re done.”

Helen waved her hand at him as though she didn’t agree, but changed the subject. “How are you settling into your new home?”

“Very well, thank you. It was quite a change for both of us,” she said, motioning to Riley.

“You’re from the States, right?”

“Yep, born and raised. I’d never even traveled outside of the country before I moved here, so it was quite a change. I’m still getting used to it.”

Helen looped her arm around her husband’s. “Well, welcome to you. I hope you find Scotland as charming as we do.”

“Thank you. I am finding it very charming. Everyone has been extremely welcoming to me. I’m very grateful. Well, I’ll let you get back to your day. I just wanted to stop in and say hello.”

Cate waved a goodbye from the door. “Nice seeing you again, Harry, and it was nice meeting you, Helen. I hope to see you soon at a historical club meeting.”

“Nice meeting you too, Lady Cate.”

Cate left the shop, wondering if she would ever get used to being called Lady Cate, and continued down the sidewalk, stopping to visit several other shops and returning to the castle just before lunch. After lunch, she spent the day outside, enjoying the warm sunshine, walking and playing with Riley, or lounging on the lawn by the loch and reading a book while Riley napped in the sunshine. Anything to avoid the castle halls.

On her way back to the castle in the late afternoon, Cate caught sight of Jack frowning at one of the rose bushes. She called a hello from across the lawn.

“Hello, Cate,” Jack answered as she reached him. “And hello to you, too, Sir Riley.” He patted the dog on the head as Riley stood with his front legs planted on Jack’s leg.

“You don’t look happy.”

“I’m not. This little lad isn’t doing so well.” Jack showed her the shriveled leaves on the plant. “I was trying to determine what might be wrong with it. I might have to call in reinforcements. My grandfather might have a better idea than I.”

“Oh, speaking of,” Cate answered. “I was hoping to interview him for my book. Since he’s lived here and worked on the estate, I think he would have a great wealth of knowledge about it. If he’s coming to look at the rose bush, would you mind asking him for me?”

“I’m sure he’d be happy to talk for as long as you’d like about the castle. Maybe even longer than you’d like,” he said with a laugh. “He’s probably got loads of information to share. He’s out of town, so I’ll ask as soon as he’s back.”

“I’ll bet, that’s why he’s a perfect source for my book.”

Jack pointed a finger at Cate. “Say, speaking of people at the castle, did you track down that extra helper you saw yesterday?”

Cate frowned, studying the sick rose bush instead of Jack. "Uh, no."

"Now you don't look happy, Cate."

Cate hesitated, unsure if she wanted to discuss her experience. It was the second time she had seen a person on the estate that no one else had seen. She avoided eye contact, afraid she'd sound crazy.

Jack leaned forward to catch her eye. "Cate, is everything okay?"

"I think so."

Riley leapt onto his hind legs, scratching at Jack's leg.

He leaned over to tousle the little dog's fur. "You think so? You don't sound so sure."

Cate watched Jack absentmindedly petting Riley as they spoke. The little dog seemed attached to him. Riley trusted him, so Cate decided she would, too.

"It's just that this is the second person I've seen on this estate that no one else has seen, and no one else but the Frasers, you, and I have been on the estate."

"The second time?"

"Yes, I saw a woman in the entry hall. I spoke to her, but Mrs. Fraser said there was no one else in the castle when I asked her about it."

"Hmm," Jack said.

Cate stared at him with pleading eyes. "I'm not crazy. And I didn't think I believed in ghosts, but I'm wondering about those tales floating around town about this place."

"I don't think you're crazy, Cate. And I certainly don't believe those tales from town. Those people like to talk, that's all. It's Scotland. Everyone's got a haunted something or other in their back pocket around here. It's just idle chatter. Don't let it get into your head."

"But then how do you explain what I saw? If they're not ghosts, am I really going crazy? What other explanation is there?"

He put his hands on her shoulders, staring into her eyes. "Cate, you've just moved from another country into a giant castle. I'm sure your nerves are on edge and your imagination is just playing tricks on you. You're primed to see something."

Cate bit her lower lip, unconvinced, but willing to accept the explanation for now. "You're right, it's probably an overactive imagination combined with the unfamiliar setting. Plus, it can be kind of spooky here at night."

“Yeah, I’ll bet, but I wouldn’t know for sure. I’m too afraid to be here at night.” Jack shivered as he shot a glance at the castle.

Cate offered him an unimpressed stare. “Funny. You should be afraid during the day, that’s when I see all my ghosts.”

She scooped Riley into her arms. “Well, time to get Riley his dinner. I’ll leave you to your sick rose. I hope it’s okay.”

Cate waved and strolled back to the castle, pondering Jack’s statements. He was right. It was her overactive imagination, coupled with some sleepless nights. It had to be. She probably just imagined she saw someone. At least, that was what she would keep telling herself.

The first rays of morning light painted the night sky with bright streaks of orange as Cate awoke. As she admired the sunrise through her bedroom window, she glanced down at the watch. Another mystery that had her questioning everything.

“What is your secret?” she asked it.

Impulsively, she rubbed the face. The timepiece ticked loudly, the second hand slowing to a near stop. The rubbing must be doing it somehow. What else could affect it?

She stared at the second hand as it ticked ever so slowly. She counted the seconds between its movement. Fifteen seconds between every tick.

A woman’s voice echoed in the hallway. Cate bolted upright. It was only 5:30 a.m., and Mrs. Fraser never arrived before six. She swung her legs over the side of the bed, wondering if something was wrong. She glanced down at the slowly ticking watch dangling around her neck. She swiped at the face, and it picked up speed. After a moment, it returned to its normal time keeping.

She pulled on her slippers and tugged on her robe, hurrying to the doors of her suite. She pulled the door open and scanned the empty hall. She wandered out a few steps, peering around.

“Mrs. Fraser?” she called. She received no response.

“MRS. FRASER?” she yelled again, straining her ears. Nothing.

With a shrug, she returned to her room and dressed for the day before gathering Riley for his morning walk.

She pushed into the kitchen through the back door. “Good morning, Mrs. Fraser, how are you?” Cate asked.

Mrs. Fraser shoved a tray of cookies into the oven. “Good morning, Lady Cate. I’m doing well, how are you?”

“I’m good, thanks. I can’t wait to eat one of those cookies. Is everything okay?”

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands on her apron before she gave the oatmeal a stir. “Okay? What would be amiss?”

“I don’t know, but you were here so early this morning, I thought something might be wrong.”

Mrs. Fraser glanced up from pouring the raisins into a bowl, confusion on her face. “Early? I was here just after six—my usual time.”

Cate sealed the package shut as she set it on the counter. “You weren’t here around five-thirty this morning?”

“Nay, I wasn’t here that early.”

Cate’s stomach flip-flopped as she realized she hadn’t heard Mrs. Fraser’s voice in the hall earlier.

CHAPTER 21

Cate collapsed onto a chair, her face blanching as Mrs. Fraser answered her. Blood rushed into her ears, and her stomach somersaulted.

She'd clearly heard a woman's voice in the hall this morning. If it hadn't been Mrs. Fraser's voice, whose was it?

Mrs. Fraser stirred the oatmeal, frowning at Cate's reaction. "Is everything okay, Lady Cate?"

Cate closed her gaping jaw and swallowed hard, forcing herself to stand and smile. "Yes, I must have been hearing things."

Mrs. Fraser tugged open a drawer and set a ladle on the counter. "Oh, I don't doubt that. I'll bet the castle has a whole host of noises you'll discover. Well, I'll have your breakfast ready soon."

"Thanks, Mrs. Fraser." Cate scooped Riley into her arms and wandered from the kitchen, remaining unconvinced that the sound she heard was the random groaning of the castle.

It was a woman's voice. While Mrs. Fraser's explanation was far more logical, it didn't fit with what she'd heard.

After breakfast, Cate took Riley for a long morning walk around the grounds. As they toured the gardens, Riley suddenly bolted around a set of bushes, disappearing from sight. Cate rushed to keep up with him, rounding the row of shrubs to discover the reason for Riley's sudden excitement.

She found Riley, his tail wagging furiously, enjoying a game of tug-of-war with Jack and a stick. With his keen sense of smell, he must have sniffed out Jack and raced over to say hello.

Jack waved at her as he tugged against the branch. “Ah, good morning, Cate. I thought Sir Riley had let himself out for a walk.”

Cate closed the distance between them. “No, but he’s faster at dodging bushes than I am.”

“I’ll bet he is, and he’s not too shabby at tug-of-war either. He’s got quite the grip, this little one has.” Jack gave a hard tug against Riley’s grip.

Riley adjusted his bite and yanked on the stick, backing farther away from Jack. With a mighty tug, he wrangled it from Jack’s grip. He pranced back to Cate, the stick extending from both sides of his mouth.

Jack climbed to his feet. “You win, big guy, you win.” He faced Cate. “And how are you today?”

Cate shrugged and forced a smile as she stared out over the scenery. “I’m fine.”

“Haven’t seen any ghosts today, have you?”

She rolled her eyes and shot him a glance. “No, I haven’t seen any ghosts today, thank you. But I made the watch slow down again and speed up. It has to have something to do with friction.”

Jack rubbed at his chin. “Rubbing it? But that didn’t work last time.”

“No, but it did this morning. It reacted both times I rubbed it. It can’t be a coincidence.”

Jack wagged a finger at the pendant. “Try it again now.”

Jack arched an eyebrow and grinned. “Talking to watches? Now I think you’re crazy, Cate.”

Cate’s shoulder slumped as she tried twice more. “It just worked. It wasn’t more than two hours ago. This is so frustrating.” She flung her arms in the air.

“Maybe it doesn’t like me. Maybe it’s shy. Did you lose your mobile signal again when it happened?”

Cate sighed as she let the timepiece flop against her tunic. “I don’t know. I didn’t check. I thought I heard Mrs. Fraser talking in the hall, so I got the watch back up to speed and went to see what she wanted.”

“What did she want?”

“Nothing—she wasn’t there. When I asked her about it this morning, she said she wasn’t in the castle.”

Jack pursed his lips, his hands on his hips and a concerned expression on his features.

Cate shot him a glance and shook her head. “I’m not crazy.”

“I didn’t say you were, but I’m a little concerned that someone might have been in the castle.”

Cate’s stomach flip-flopped and warmth rushed over her. “Who would have been there, and why?”

Jack pointed a finger at her. “That’s the million-pound question. Whoever it may have been, I can’t imagine they were up to anything good at 5:30 a.m. in someone else’s home.”

A chill shot up Cate’s spine. In all her preoccupation with haunted castles and ghosts, she had failed to consider that she may be seeing and hearing real, living people wandering the estate. The rambling castle provided the perfect hiding place. Another person could live inside and she’d never know it.

She bit her lower lip as she held back a shiver. “Okay, that’s creepy on a different level, but that would make sense with some things I’ve been experiencing. But again, why?”

Jack crossed his arms, waving a hand in the air as he ticked off reasons. “I can come up with a million reasons: a free place to live, hiding out from someone, trying to scare the new owner—who knows? But I’m getting concerned that maybe it’s not your overactive imagination and your big move.”

“Do you think I should call the police?”

Jack shook his head. “We don’t have proof of anything. Do you mind if I look around?”

“Not at all. I’d feel better if you did, in fact. And I’d like to help. I want to see with my own eyes that no one is here.”

“Okay, let’s check it out, top to bottom. If your ghost is in there and alive, we’ll find them.”

They headed for the castle with Riley in tow. Jack suggested starting at the bottom floor and working their way up.

They wandered down to the servants’ area for a thorough search. With no evidence of anyone having been in the castle there, they moved to the main level.

“Where did you see that woman?” Jack inquired as they climbed the stairs.

Cate led him to the foyer, heading to the spot at the bottom of the stairs. “She was right here. She came from that way and was walking toward the library.” Cate pointed toward the sitting room across the space.

Jack rubbed his chin as he studied the marble floor. “Okay, let’s take a look, particularly in the closed off wing. Though, I always keep it locked, so I’d be surprised if we find anything.”

They searched through each room on the floor, looking for anything disturbed or evidence of anyone’s presence in the castle, but they found none.

“Not sure if I feel better or worse that we haven’t found anything yet,” Cate said as they finished looking in the last room.

They climbed the stairs to the next floor. “Hopefully we’ll find something definitive by the time we’re done searching so that you can rest easier.”

“I’m sure we can rule out my bedroom, unless they are living under my bed and I don’t know it.”

Jack wiggled his eyebrows with a laugh as they reached the landing. “I certainly hope they aren’t.”

They searched every corner and closet upstairs for signs of an intruder. They climbed to the towers, unlocking the doors and making a sweep of each space. The search turned up nothing.

With one bedroom left, Cate assumed they’d wasted hours and come to no new conclusions.

“One bedroom left,” Jack said as he thumbed toward the door.

Cate shambled next to him, tired and frustrated. “Yes, and I doubt anyone is in there. I’ve been in and out of that room dozens of times. I would have seen something.”

“Let’s check it out just to be sure.”

With a shrug and a sigh, Cate agreed. “Okay, sure.”

Jack pushed into the bedroom, scanning the space.

Cate crossed the room and pulled open the door to the walk-in closet, stepping inside. “I’ll check in here.”

She glanced around. Everything was as she had left it. No signs of anyone.

“I don’t see anything,” she called, “but this is one place this watch loves to do its trick. Maybe it’ll work here and you can finally see it!”

She rubbed the watch, and this time, it worked as she expected, slowing down to a crawl.

“HA!” she exclaimed, “I was right. Come and see.”

She grinned at the watch, then glanced at the door, waiting for Jack. He didn’t come in.

“Jack!” she called.

There was no answer.

“JACK!” she yelled louder. She received no response.

She strode to the door and popped her head into the bedroom.

“Jack?” she repeated as she scanned the room. It was empty. No Jack. No Riley.

Where could he have gone? Cate frowned as she wondered what had happened to her search companions.

She stepped back inside the closet, scanning the space. Had she missed him and the little dog? She’d done it before.

She scanned the area, checking behind trunks and the mirror. She found nothing. With a sigh, she stared down at the slowly ticking watch, rubbing its face. It ticked faster, speeding up to normal speed.

She scoffed at its behavior, wondering if Jack may be correct about it being shy. She spun and took a step toward the door when she collided with Jack. He caught her just as she stumbled backward, almost falling over a trunk.

He stared at her wide-eyed. “Cate, where have you been?”

Cate drew her chin to her chest, an incredulous look on her face. “Where have I been? Where have you been?” She poked a finger in his direction.

His jaw dropped and he pointed at himself, his face scrunched in bewilderment. “I’ve been right here the whole time. I called and called you, but you didn’t answer. I looked in the closet and you weren’t here.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at his statement. “I heard nothing. I called and called you and you didn’t answer. I looked in the bedroom and back in here, and both you and Riley were gone.”

The two stood for a moment in stunned silence, trying to make sense of what had just happened.

Cate fluttered her eyelashes as an idea flitted across her mind. “Do me a favor. I’d like to test something. Go out and close the door, wait about ten seconds, then open it and see if I'm here. Then close the door and wait another few seconds before opening it again."

Jack's expression betrayed his confusion. "Cate, what are you talking about?"

"Just trust me. Try it."

He cocked his head and shrugged. "You're the boss."

He wandered to the bedroom and closed the door behind him, leaving Cate alone in the closet. She began counting in her head to ten as she rubbed the watch. It slowed down to a crawl. She waited for the door to open as she got to the ten-second mark. Nothing happened.

Before she could start her second count, voices interrupted her. She raced to the door and flung it open. She found no one there. Heat washed over her as she stared at the empty room.

The bedroom door stood open. She wrinkled her brow at it. It had been closed before. Did Jack leave? He must have. Why?

She crossed to the open door, peering into the empty hallway.

"Jack?" she called down the hall. She got no answer. She listened for any sounds. She had heard voices only moments ago. Had Jack taken Riley outside? Was the little pup ill?

She wandered down the hall, peering out the windows. She spotted no one.

A stairway led down. She hovered at the top and called down it, her voice echoing off the stone walls. "Jack?"

Again, no answer. Where could they be?

She shook her head as she wandered back to the bedroom, checking for signs of Jack and Riley. Faced with an empty room, she trudged to the closet and searched inside. Empty. She pulled the door shut, checking behind it. Nothing.

She grabbed the watch dangling around her neck and rubbed it. It returned to normal speed, as expected. She turned to continue her search for Riley and Jack when the door popped open.

She stumbled back a step as Jack stepped through into the closet. "Please tell me this is the first time you've opened that door."

Jack furrowed his brow, glancing around the closet. "This is the second time I've opened the door. The first time you weren't here. Cate, where did you go? Is there a secret passage in here?"

Cate swallowed hard. The words made no sense as they came out of her mouth, even to her. “I don’t know where I went, but I think it has something to do with this watch.”

“You don’t know where you went? What could it possibly have to do with the watch?”

“I was standing here in the closet, but the door never opened. I heard voices. I assumed it was you and opened the door myself, but no one was there. I walked all over searching for you and Riley, but I couldn’t find you.”

“What?” Jack laughed, his brow furrowed. “Cate, are you playing a prank on me? Come on, where is the secret passage or secret panel?” He peered around the room.

Cate’s face blanched as she stared at him. “I’m not joking. I wish there was a secret passage, but there isn’t—or, if there is, I don’t know about it. You two were not here.”

Jack put his hands on his hips, shaking his head. “Cate, I can’t believe that.”

“I’m not sure I want to believe it either, but it’s the truth. I didn’t see you, and the only thing that changed was this watch’s speed.”

Jack stood speechless, his lower lip bobbing up and down as he searched for an answer. “I don’t know what to say. I can’t think of a relevant question to ask. I don’t understand any of this.”

Cate ran her fingers through her hair. “Me either—but I can think of one question to ask.”

“What’s that?”

She looked him dead in the eye, a worried expression on her features. “If you didn’t see me here, where was I?”

CHAPTER 22

Cate sank to sit on a trunk as a wave of nausea passed over her. Jack hadn't seen her moments ago when she'd been standing in the closet, then wandering through the bedroom and hall. And she hadn't seen Jack. Where had she been?

Jack rubbed his neck, shaking his head. "None of this makes any sense to me, Cate. If you never left, where were you? You weren't here."

"None of it makes any sense, you're right. Are you sure you didn't miss me?" Cate glanced up at him, hope filling her eyes.

Jack gave her a look. "Cate, there's no missing you. You're standing here plain as day in front of me. I didn't miss you."

"Is it possible that there is some mechanism that moves this closet? Perhaps there is a secret passage or panel that we aren't aware of that interacts with the watch."

Jack glanced around the room, studying the walls. "Okay, but the closet looked the same just minus you. So, an identical space must be replacing it. And if we're moving, what mechanism is so quiet that no one would hear it? And how could the watch control it?"

"I don't know, but something strange is going on."

Jack rubbed his chin. "That's the only thing we know for sure: something strange is going on. Damn. A fine time for my grandfather to be traveling. He'd be the perfect person to ask."

Cate let out a shaky breath, drawing Jack's attention back to her. "Cate, are you okay? You're white as a sheet."

“Yeah, well, I mean other than me disappearing with no explanation, I’m okay. I just don’t know what to think anymore.”

“Well, until we know what to think, it might be best that you’re not fiddling with this watch. We don’t want you disappearing for good.”

A wave of panic swept over Cate. “Maybe you’re right. We do not understand what it’s doing or where I’m going. Maybe I shouldn’t mess with it.”

“I’m not even sure you should keep coming to this closet. It may be something similar to what you suggested earlier being triggered by something we don’t know of.”

“Good point.” Cate stood up to leave but sank right back down onto the trunk when her wobbly knees gave way.

Jack thrust out his hands to steady her. “Whoa, you okay, Cate?”

“Yes, just a little woozy. I think I’m letting my fear of the unknown get to me a little too much. I’m sure there’s a reasonable explanation for this.”

“Maybe you should lie down.”

Cate considered declining, but her rolling stomach said otherwise. An eerie pall hung over her and she couldn’t shake it. With her breakfast threatening to rise up in her throat, she nodded her head in agreement. “Maybe you’re right.”

Jack wrapped an arm around her shoulders. “Here, let me help you to your room.”

She struggled to her feet, unsteady at first, then, with Jack’s aid, made her way to her room. Riley trailed behind, his tail lowered as he sensed Cate’s anxiety.

Jack placed the little dog on the bed as Cate slid under the covers. Riley raced to her side, curling tightly against her.

“I’ll tell Mrs. Fraser that you’re not feeling well and to bring your lunch here.”

Cate traced the outline of the silk comforter. “Thanks.”

Cate forced herself to make eye contact with him and nodded, a weak smile on her face. As he disappeared, she let her head sink back into the pillows, her hand stroking the fur down Riley’s back to relax them both.

She sucked in a few deep breaths, trying to clear her mind, but she found it impossible to push the thoughts of what happened from her mind.

Jack's words echoed in her head. You weren't there, Cate, you weren't there.

The terrifying experience still disconcerted her. Where had she been? Wherever she was, Jack and Riley weren't. Had she crossed over to some spirit realm? Nothing made sense.

Riley stared up at her, still unsettled by her strange behavior.

"It's okay, Riley. I'm fine. At least, I think I'm fine. I don't know which way is up anymore."

She thought of her "disappearance," of little Riley left behind, searching and not being able to find her. Dizziness swept over her again at the notion.

Footsteps sounded in her sitting room. She bolted upright, startled by the noise. She held her breath until she heard Mrs. Fraser call out, "Just me coming in, Lady Cate. I've got your lunch."

Cate silently scolded herself for being so silly. Of course, it was Mrs. Fraser. "Come in, Mrs. Fraser," she called back.

Mrs. Fraser pushed the door to the bedroom open, carrying a tray. "Well, what's this about you being sick?"

Cate waved it away. "Oh, it's nothing serious. I just felt a bit woozy—probably too little sleep or something."

Mrs. Fraser set the tray down on Cate's lap. "Well, lucky for you, I was making some of my famous chicken soup. It's just what you need for whatever ails you. And I brought a bone up for Riley, too, to keep him occupied while you rest. Now here, lean forward and let me straighten your pillows."

"Oh, that's unnecessary, Mrs. Fraser. Thank you so much for the soup and the bone for Riley."

Mrs. Fraser waved her forward. "Come on, don't make me ask twice."

Cate shimmied forward, allowing her to fluff and straighten the pillows. "Leave it to a man to just dump you off in bed and not bother to get you settled. There we are, that should do. Now you just sit back and enjoy your soup. I'll be back to check on you later."

Before leaving, Mrs. Fraser set the bone down on the floor and settled Riley with it.

Cate pushed the noodles, chicken, and carrots around in the bowl as she stared at it. The delicious scent of chicken noodle soup wafted past her nose. She forced a little broth down, understanding why people referred to the soup as famous.

She glanced over the bed at Riley gnawing on his bone. It seemed he was enjoying Mrs. Fraser's lunch, too.

She managed to finish the entire bowl of soup. Her stomach settled as she set the tray aside. Her mind settled, too. She couldn't have disappeared. People didn't just disappear and reappear. A plausible explanation existed. She just needed to find it.

Mrs. Fraser returned just as Cate was climbing out of bed. "What's this? Up already?"

Cate straightened the covers on her bed. "Yes, I feel much better. Your chicken soup does work for whatever ails you. I was going to bring the tray down on my way to the library."

Mrs. Fraser pulled them down as Cate finished and waved her back into bed. "Nay, I won't have it—back to bed with you."

"But I feel fine," Cate whined.

Mrs. Fraser wagged her finger at her and pointed to the bed. "You need rest. Young Jack says you were white as a sheet—could barely keep to your feet when he brought you in here. I'd say you still look a mite too pale for my taste. Now back to bed."

Cate glanced across the room into the full-length mirror, arching an eyebrow at her pale skin. "I always look too pale for my taste. Besides, I can't just sit here, I need something to do, at least. I'll get my laptop and my notes and then I'll get back into bed, I promise."

"I'll have none of that. You'll not be running around the place ill on my watch. I'll send young Jack with it or fetch it myself."

Cate sighed, realizing she wouldn't win the battle, and climbed back into bed.

Mrs. Fraser pulled the covers up over her, turning them back to rest on her lap. "There we are. Now I'll send up a plate of cookies for you. Got to keep your strength up."

As Mrs. Fraser bustled from the room, Cate had to admit the treatment wasn't too bad. She hadn't had anyone worry over her strength for a long while, and she had been dying to try the cookies.

"Thanks, Mrs. Fraser," she called.

She drummed her fingers against the duvet as she waited in bed for her laptop and other research materials. Jack appeared in the doorway a few minutes later, his arms laden with materials.

He slid a plate of cookies onto the bedside table. “I’ve got cookies, a laptop, and a folder marked ‘Castle research.’ Did I get everything?”

Cate accepted the proffered materials with a smile. “Yep, you got everything. Sorry, but Mrs. Fraser wouldn’t permit me to get out of bed to get it myself.”

“I heard. The old toughie has forbidden you to leave your bed. Sorry, that’s my fault. I’ll admit I was worried, and I told her you were awfully pale. You look better now, though.”

“I feel better. I think I just panicked. There must be a reasonable explanation.”

“Well, we don’t have to solve it today. I’m with Mrs. Fraser on this one. Take the day to rest.”

“With everyone fussing over me, I’ll be back to normal in no time.”

Jack glanced at the materials spread across the bed. “There’s the spirit. Is there anything else you need?”

“No, I think this is everything, thank you.”

“You’re welcome, Cate. If you need anything, just call.” He tousled the fur on Riley’s head before he strode from the room.

Left alone, Cate opened her laptop first to check her email. She found three emails waiting for her amidst the junk mail: one from Gayle, one from Molly, and one from the author of The Mysteries of Scotland. She opened Molly’s first.

Cate—OMG!!! I just got your postcard. I’m glad to hear that you’re doing so well. Is the joint haunted or not? I posted your postcard in the department office for everyone to see. Don’t be surprised if you get a few emails from people asking to visit. I’ll be the first, can I visit yet? LOL

Enjoy your new adventure!

Molly

Cate chuckled at the exuberant email, pressing the reply button and sending a brief answer telling her she could visit anytime she’d like. She side-stepped the haunting question, now not sure if she could send an honest and dismissive answer.

Cate moved on to the email from Preston Scott, the author of The Mysteries of Scotland.

Good day, Cate. Lovely to hear from one of my esteemed readers, and thank you for your inquiry. I gathered the information for my stories from visiting the local towns themselves and speaking with residents. Many castles have tales to tell, and many of those living near them love to tell those tales. I find this a most effective way to gather information (and fun, too!).

Good luck with your research project. I wish you all the best with your book. If you need a critique, I would be happy to provide one for you.

*My highest regards,
P. Scott*

Cate rolled her eyes at the non-answer and moved on to Gayle's email.

Hello Cate, I hope you are doing well. I have the information that you requested about your grandfather. We searched the records to find the birth certificate for both your grandfather, Charles, and your father, Logan. I had digital scans sent, and I attached them to this email.

As you can see, your grandfather was born in Scotland as Charles MacKenzie to Lucas and Amelia MacKenzie (additional information including dates are in the attachment). Your father was born in Dublin, Ireland to Charles and Sophie MacKenzie.

Your grandparents' name changed (deliberately or not) from MacKenzie to Kensie when they emigrated to the States.

I hope this information helps you in your search, and if I can be of any further assistance, again, please reach out.

*Best,
Gayle*

Cate bit her lower lip as she grinned at the information. She dug through her folder for her family tree. She scanned the tree for the names listed in Gayle's email. Lucas MacKenzie, Cate's great-grandfather was the brother of Rory MacKenzie, Gertrude's grandfather. Her grandfather and Gertrude's father were cousins. This made Cate and Gertrude second cousins-once removed.

Cate filled in the remaining piece of the family tree that had been covered by the inkblot. The stain had obliterated her grandparents and anyone in their line.

With one mystery solved, Cate eased back into the pillows. She'd established her relationship to Gertrude.

She crossed the question off her summary sheet with a smile. The only questions that remained in this column revolved around why she had never known about these relatives and why the family's surname had changed. She may never know those answers, she realized, but she took satisfaction in gaining some information.

She pulled her laptop onto her lap and sent Gayle a reply.

Dear Gayle, Thank you so much for providing the information. It helped immensely with my research. Using the information that you sent, I filled in the family tree that I have been working on and determined my relationship with Gertrude (second cousins once removed).

I now have a sense of how we fit into the family puzzle, although I don't know why the surname was changed and this side of the family was never mentioned.

Again, thank you for your help. I hope you are doing well. Please send my regards to Mr. Smythe. I hope you can find some time to visit in the summer so I can thank you in person. Riley and I would love to have you back with us at the castle.

Cate

P.S. Riley and I are doing great. He has made a new friend in Jack. He loves to play fetch with him.

She shoved the laptop to the side and studied her summary sheet. Her mind snapped back to the mystery unraveling around the timepiece and the events of this morning. She frowned as she recalled the unnerving experience.

She nibbled on the corner of a cookie, finding even its rich, buttery flavor could not distract her from the eerie sensation hanging over her.

She tossed the note sheet aside and pulled her research notes from within the folder, spreading them across the bed. She started a proposed table of contents for her book but found herself unable to get past the third chapter.

She tapped her pencil against the almost-blank page as her mind whirled from her disappearance to the odd encounters she'd experienced. She forced herself to continue working until Mrs. Fraser bustled through the door with her dinner tray.

Cate shoved her materials aside to clear a spot for the tray.

Mrs. Fraser slid it onto her lap. "I hope you're managing to rest amid all that work."

Cate tidied her papers and stuffed them into the folder. "I'm trying to distract myself."

"Well, put that distraction aside and eat your dinner. And you, Riley, come with me, I will take you out to do your business." Mrs. Fraser gathered the little pup into her arms.

"Oh, no, Mrs. Fraser, that's too much. I can take him."

"I'll not have you roaming around the estate in your condition when you could take ill at any moment."

"I'm not that ill. I'm not even sick. Honest."

Mrs. Fraser jostled the little dog in her arms. "You just concentrate on eating your dinner and saving your strength."

She spun to leave the room, Riley in tow. "Now, little pup, I will not take you on any long and luxurious walk like your mum, but at least you'll get some fresh air and the chance to do your duties. Come along, little fellow, let's let Lady Cate have her dinner in peace, and I'll give you a nice dinner downstairs."

Cate smiled at the conversation, pleased that Riley was in good hands. She glanced down at the tray on her lap, finding another cup of chicken soup, a soft-boiled egg, and a bowl of tapioca.

Mrs. Fraser returned with Riley as she polished off the bowl of warm tapioca. "Here he is, all walked and fed and happy."

She eyed Cate's dishes. "Glad to see you got everything down. Protein is what you need."

Cate handed the tray off to her. "Thank you, it was delicious as always. And thank you again for taking care of Riley, I appreciate it."

"My pleasure. Now, we'll stay overnight. That way, we'll be here if you need anything."

Cate shook her head adamantly. "Oh, no, now, Mrs. Fraser, that's where I draw the line. I will not have you staying overnight here and putting yourself out. I'm fine."

Mrs. Fraser propped the tray on her hip. "Suppose you get ill again and need something?"

"If I'm that sick, I can call you. I've got your number right here on my phone. I'll keep it right here by my bed all night and call if I need anything."

"Now, I'll not have this. Mr. Fraser and I and young Jack are all staying here. Between your being sick and Jack wondering if there's someone roaming around this place, we're not about to leave you here alone."

Relief coursed through her at the idea of not being alone in the castle, and she gave in. "Thank you, Mrs. Fraser, I appreciate that."

Cate smiled at her as she disappeared from the room. Her smile faded as she went over the events she'd experienced since she'd arrived. She'd found herself locked in the tower room. Mrs. Fraser had known she was there.

She'd seen a woman in the foyer. Mrs. Fraser insisted they were alone. She'd seen a man in the garden, but Jack said no one was on the estate. She'd heard voices and Mrs. Fraser assured her it was only the wind. She'd disappeared, according to Jack.

A ghastly notion danced across Cate's tired mind. Were her new staff members gaslighting her?

CHAPTER 23

The idea floated around in Cate's mind as she worried she'd made a huge mistake allowing them to stay at the castle. She didn't know the Frasers or Jack that well. Were they setting her up?

Cate shook her head. How could they make the timepiece react to her touch? And besides, why would they do it? What would they gain? Even if they shipped her off to a mental institution, they wouldn't inherit any money or the castle.

She tugged her laptop onto her lap as she chided herself for her paranoia. They had no motive. She tugged Riley from the floor onto the bed. He settled next to her as she browsed through a few movies, selecting a comedy to stream, hoping it lifted her spirits.

Doors opened and closed in the hall as Jack and the Frasers retired for the evening. She settled back in the pillows, happy not to be alone in the castle. If her staff wasn't doing this to her, it meant something else was going on. And whatever it was, she preferred not to face it alone.

Despite the distraction the movie provided, as soon as Cate put away her laptop and attempted to sleep, she found her mind preoccupied with the mystery of the timepiece. She tossed and turned as one question burned in her mind: where was she when Jack opened that closet door?

Cate palmed the timepiece, staring at it as she lay in bed. She kicked off the covers and paced the floor, settling on the windowsill to stare out at the moonlit grounds cast in a white blanket.

She rose from her perch and paced around her sitting room, settling on her chaise for a bit before rising to her feet again and peeking into the hallway. Nothing moved. The Frasers and Jack were likely asleep.

She tiptoed down the hall, winding around to the bedroom where she'd disappeared. She scrutinized every inch of the walls, doorways, doors, and woodwork—any surface that may conceal a mechanism for moving the room or opening a passage. She considered the dimensions of the room. Did it conceal a secret passage? Though difficult to detect, the room dimensions would reveal the fact that a passage existed to a trained eye.

She found no evidence of that. The dimensions of the room and its closet didn't seem to suggest that there were any hidden spaces.

Cate sank onto the bed, narrowing her eyes at the closet. Her mind wandered through question after question. If she slowed the watch again, would she disappear from existence? Would she find her staff asleep in their beds in her altered state? Was she losing her mind?

She stared at the watch in her hands, pondering if she should try to slow it again. Jack's warning echoed in her mind. Until we know what to think, it might be best that you're not fiddling with this watch. We don't want you disappearing for good.

He had a point. She didn't know what was happening, and it could be dangerous. What if she ended up stuck in the netherworld or wherever she was going? She quit for the night, shuffling back to her room. It was almost 2 a.m. when she crawled into bed and drifted off to a restless sleep.

She woke up a few hours later in a cold sweat having dreamt of disappearing into a spirit realm, where no one could see or hear her. She screamed to people who continued about their daily business as though she wasn't there. But no one could help her.

After the nightmare, she had little interest in going back to sleep. Despite not being real, it struck terror into her heart. She cuddled Riley closer to her, as though contact with him would tether her to this world.

She crawled from her bed just after five in the morning and headed to her chaise, waiting for the sun to rise and banish her fears.

Her mind wandered to the timepiece repeatedly. She flipped on the lamp next to the chaise, squinting in the blinding light. As her eyes adjusted, she caught sight of Mary's journals. She grabbed the top book and paged through to the longest entry she'd read from the stuck pages.

She reread it piece by piece, trying to glean any information. As I continue these excursions, I cannot help but feel the tremendous responsibility to pass along to Gertrude, the entry began.

Was Mary's reference to the "excursions" a reference to wherever Cate was going when the watch slowed? She referred to the timepiece, calling it an "awesome object" for which she was a mere caretaker, then she discussed an enormous responsibility that she must pass along to Gertrude. None of this pointed to what was happening when Cate disappeared earlier, but they all had to be connected.

Cate snapped the journal shut and tossed it on the table. She was missing something, but she couldn't put her finger on what. She wandered to her bedroom, finding Riley still sleeping. She slid her research folder off the nightstand and crept back to the sitting room, freeing a page to jot down a few notes.

She wrote, to her best recollection, when and where the watch had slowed, including details such as what she had been doing when it slowed, what happened between the watch slowing and speeding up, and anything else relevant that she could remember.

She also noted the times she tried to slow the watch and it had not slowed. With only a few data points, she wasn't sure it would help, but it did appear that the timepiece only slowed inside the castle. Perhaps she should try the watch again outside and see what happened.

She noted that, according to Jack, she had "disappeared" the last time she slowed the watch, despite her never having moved—at least not to her knowledge. She also noted that twice before when the watch had been slow, she had seen what she thought to be "people" on the estate. She used the term loosely, since she had no evidence that anyone else had been on the estate. And it seemed that these people, or whatever they were, could see and hear her since both of them reacted to either the sight of her or a noise she had made.

Odd, they could see and hear her, but Jack couldn't.

As she reflected on the information, a quiet knock sounded at her door.

"Yes?" she called out.

The door creaked open a slit, and Mrs. Fraser peeked in. "Out of bed already, Lady Cate? Did you sleep? How are you feeling?"

Cate set the notes aside. "I feel much better. Although, I'm afraid I didn't sleep much. Did you and Mr. Fraser sleep well?"

“Aye, we both slept well. Too bad you didn’t sleep. I’ll have your breakfast up to you soon. You stay here and rest.”

“If you don’t mind, I’d like to have breakfast with everyone this morning. I’m tired of my own company.”

“We’d be glad to have you, Lady Cate.”

“Great, I’ll be down soon.”

Cate rose from her chaise to dress for the day and walk Riley.

She met everyone in the kitchen for breakfast just as Mrs. Fraser was setting the table. “Well, good morning again, Lady Cate.” Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate sank into a chair at the table. “Good morning, everyone. I hope you slept well. Thank you all for staying last night.”

“Good morning, Lady Cate,” Mr. Fraser said.

Jack rocked on his chair as he shot her a grin. “Good morning, Lady Cate. I hear you’ll be gracing us with your presence this fine morning. Did you sleep well?”

“I didn’t sleep very well, but I was glad everyone was here when I couldn’t sleep.”

The foursome made light conversation over breakfast, providing a nice, but fleeting distraction for Cate.

She lingered in the kitchen as Mr. Fraser and Jack pushed through the door into the summer day to work.

Cate pulled a few dishes from the sink to dry them.

“You don’t need to help, Lady Cate, I can do it.”

She swiped a dish towel inside a pot. “I’d like to if you don’t mind. I’d like the company.”

“Well, if it’s company you’re after, you don’t have to do dishes to get it. Why don’t I make you a nice cuppa you can sip on, and we can chitchat? Oh—” Mrs. Fraser paused. “That would be a cup of tea to you, Lady Cate.”

“Oh, I’d appreciate some tea, but I can make it while you take care of those dishes.” Cate started to fill the kettle Mrs. Fraser kept on the stove. “Would you like a cup as well?”

“Yes, please,” Mrs. Fraser answered, already readying two cups with tea bags and setting out sugar and milk. Mrs. Fraser finished the breakfast cleanup just as the kettle boiled.

“You timed that well,” Cate said, pouring the steaming water into each cup.

Mrs. Fraser untied her apron and tossed it over the back of a chair. “Usually do. I never miss my morning cuppa. Couldn’t get through a day without it.”

Cate smiled at her as she carried the steaming cups over to the table, surprised Mrs. Fraser let her do that much. Mrs. Fraser arranged a plate of cookies from a tin.

“Are these the cookies you sent up for me yesterday? Those were excellent.”

Mrs. Fraser dunked a shortbread into her tea after stirring in milk. “Indeed they are, Lady Cate. Perfect cookie with tea if you want my opinion.”

Cate tapped her cup with her fingertips. “Do you bake often?”

Cate chuckled at the joke. “Well, you are good at it, Mrs. Fraser.”

“Thank you, Lady Cate.”

“I don’t bake much myself. I’m not good in the kitchen. Once in home ec class, I burned—”

“Lady Cate, sorry to interrupt, but I know the reason you want a distraction is that you’ve been experiencing some strange things on the estate. As much as I’d like to talk about baking, I’d like to find out why young Jack was so concerned about someone being on the estate.”

Cate chewed her lower lip, her mind also dwelling on the subject despite her babbling. “Oh, yes, well, I mentioned to him I’ve seen a few people around the estate, and I think he became concerned that it was more than my mind playing tricks on me.”

“People around the estate? You mean that maid?”

“Yes, her and the man working in the back garden. And the other morning, I heard a woman’s voice in the hallway before anyone was here.”

“I understand you both searched but found nothing yesterday?”

Cate nodded as she sipped her tea. “Yes, we checked everywhere but found no evidence of anyone in the castle.”

Mrs. Fraser pulled another cookie onto her saucer. “The cleaning company has mentioned nothing to me about seeing anything unusual. But you just experienced a major life change. Every place has its own quirks, and the castle is quite large and full of them. Give yourself some time to adjust, Lady Cate.”

Cate nodded, then tried to change the subject. “Mrs. Fraser, do you know why this timepiece was so important to Lady MacKenzie? Or if it has any special significance?”

“None that I know of. I recall that she wore it around her neck all the time—never saw her without it. Beyond that, I don’t know. I assumed it was just an heirloom.”

“Hmm, I found a passage in Mary MacKenzie’s journal—the one I had to steam to read—and it mentioned the timepiece. She called it an ‘awesome object,’ so I was wondering what was so special about it.”

Mrs. Fraser nibbled on the corner of her cookie for a moment before answering. “Maybe on account of it being so old? It’s my understanding that it’s been a family heirloom for generations, almost dating back to the building of the castle, I think.”

“Maybe,” Cate said as she finished her tea. “I think I’ll take Riley for a nice long walk. Thank you for the tea and conversation, Mrs. Fraser.”

“You’re most welcome, Lady Cate. Oh, and Lady Cate?”

“Yes?” Cate said, turning back toward her after collecting Riley.

“Try not to worry too much about it. I’m sure it’s nothing.”

Cate smiled at the woman’s kind attempt to be reassuring. But deep down, she knew it wasn’t nothing. The thought that her staff may be involved flitted across her mind again.

Cate spent the morning outside, playing ball with Riley and visiting the loch. But it did little to distract her thoughts from the mystery. She stared at the ripples in the pond, wondering what dark secret the beautiful landscape hid.

She grasped the timepiece in her hands, studying it. She rubbed the face. Nothing happened. She tried a second time with the same result.

More evidence that it only happened inside the castle.

She collapsed back in the grass and gazed at the fluffy white clouds as they rolled by against the blue sky. She’d established the timepiece did not slow outside. She needed to test it inside again.

Was that wise? Jack would say no, but her curiosity overcame most of her fear. With her confidence bolstered by her own nosiness, she gathered a yawning Riley into her arms to return to the castle.

The little dog stretched in her arms and relaxed. “Oh boy, Riley, you are getting lazy. Castle life suits you.”

She started back on the path toward the castle, passing through the back gardens where Jack trimmed another row of bushes.

“Good morning, again,” she said as she approached.

“Good morning, again. And what do we have here? Sir Riley too tired to walk?” Jack gave him a scratch under the chin as the little dog opened his eyes to slits.

“I’m afraid I tired him out playing ball this morning.”

“I’d have thought he’d have you tired out after your sleepless night. For what it’s worth, I heard nothing last night.”

“Neither did I,” Cate began. “I’m not surprised, though. I think all those incidents are connected to the watch. I made some notes this morning, and if I’m correct, I encountered people on the property when the watch was slow. I tried it again this morning out here by the loch, but it didn’t react. So that’s the third time that I’ve tried the watch outside of the castle and it didn’t slow. I’d say that means that it only works in the castle itself. What it’s doing I don’t know, but—”

Jack interrupted her. “You tried it again this morning? I thought we agreed that you wouldn’t mess around with that until we learned more about it.”

Cate wrinkled her nose, pulling her lips into a frown. “How are we going to learn anything about it unless we test it?”

“Cate, this is not a good idea until we determine what’s going on, which may never happen. But yesterday you disappeared. You were not there. It’s not wise to keep fooling around with something so strange. What if you get trapped somewhere and we can’t find you?”

Cate puckered her lips, irritated by Jack’s lecture. “Well, I hope we have some answers soon.”

“Me too,” Jack agreed. “Until then, do nothing.”

Cate forced a smile on her face and waved a goodbye. “Well, I better be heading back. I’ll talk to you later.”

Cate strolled toward the castle, glad to leave the conversation behind. Jack’s scolding had not convinced her that doing nothing was the right approach. The watch didn’t seem to cause any ill effects on anyone else who had worn it through all these generations. Lady MacKenzie wore it last and lived to a ripe old age, dying of an aggressive cancer and stroke—not from disappearing.

As she stepped onto the marble floor of the foyer, she convinced herself to experiment with the timepiece after her lunch, hoping it would not be her undoing.

She sped through her meal in nervous anticipation of her experiment. She waffled between calling it off and pressing on. As she polished off her salad, she decided to risk it.

She thanked Mrs. Fraser for lunch when she came to collect the tray, then headed back to her sitting room to leave a note, just in case. She left Riley in the library. She hated to do it, but she didn't want the worry of losing him again or having him become trapped. She took a deep breath as she looked at him sleeping before closing the doors to the library.

In her sitting room, she took out a sheet of paper and, with a shaky hand, scrawled a note explaining that she had tried to recreate the phenomenon that she and Jack had experienced yesterday. She also told the reader where to find Riley, just in case. She propped the note against the lamp on the table and stood, steeling her nerves. She swiped her sweaty palms down her leggings as she strode to the bedroom and entered the closet. With a pounding heart, she picked up the pendant, pausing a moment before continuing.

"Here goes nothing," she said, rubbing the watch until she heard the familiar loud ticking and witnessed the second hand slow.

She waited until it slowed to a crawl, then she unlatched the closet door, peering into the room. This time, she had a plan. She would observe as much as she could to make a record to study later.

At first glance, nothing stood out as different. She pushed her mind to remember every detail of the room. The furniture sat in the same places. Was that the same bedspread? Maybe. Was there a lamp missing? She wasn't sure.

She wondered if Jack or either of the Frasers could see her if they had been in the room. She strode to the mirror and gazed at her own reflection. She still looked the same. She waved to herself in the mirror. At least she still existed somewhere.

Her experiment had worked, for better or worse. She considered ending it, but instead, she ambled to the bedroom door and cracked it open, peeking into the hall.

It didn't look much different. She took a few tentative steps out into it.

She crept down the length, her ears straining for any noise. She approached the intersection with another hall of bedrooms. Voices sounded from around the corner. She pressed against the wall and peered around the edge.

Two women approached her. Cate ducked back for a moment, then risked another glance.

The women appeared to be in old-fashioned maid uniforms: black long-sleeved, floor-length dresses covered by a white apron. Each of them had their hair pulled into a bun.

Cate held her breath, afraid of giving herself away. What was she witnessing? The women laughed as they approached her.

One said, "I dare say we better not be late again with her ladyship's tea. She was so cross I thought that the vein in her neck would pop."

"I wish all I had to worry about was me teatime," the other woman answered.

"If we're not on time, she might have to spend another second with her own child, lest Nanny not take him away fast enough."

The two women giggled.

Cate retreated down the hall, sneaking back into the bedroom. She eased the door closed and pressed her ear against it. Her heart rose to her throat. The two women chattered away as they passed the door. She breathed a sigh of relief as they continued without stopping. She was about to retreat to the closet and return the watch to its normal speed, when a new voice bellowed down the hall.

"EDNA! LORNA! Are we to idle our day away with chitchat and giggling like two schoolgirls? Have we no work to be done?"

Cate heard no response after a short pause. The woman's voice boomed again. "Then we had better get to it, hadn't we?"

Another moment passed, but no other voices spoke. She figured she had pressed her luck far enough. She rubbed the watch, intending to return home from wherever she was.

Nothing happened.

CHAPTER 24

Cate's heart skipped a beat and panic washed over her as the second hand crept around the watch face. Her pulse raced, and her breathing turned ragged. Her knees wobbled, threatening to give out as she tried again, rubbing the timepiece's face.

Nothing happened.

Panic built inside her, and she gnawed her lower lip as tears welled in her eyes. She'd been warned, and she still chose to do something reckless. How could she have been so irresponsible?

Her thoughts turned to the note she left. She imagined Mrs. Fraser finding it, asking Jack about it. She pictured Jack's reaction and all of them trying to find her; but she was gone, perhaps forever.

She pictured poor little Riley, roaming the castle in search of Cate, never able to find her. Mrs. Fraser doing her best to console the poor little pup, but not succeeding.

Cate wandered to the bed and sank onto it. She'd pushed her luck one too many times. The watch had never slowed when Jack was around. Why couldn't it have failed again before she became stuck?

Her brow crinkled as she recalled previous failed attempts. Then it struck her. Some of her previous tests of the watch had not worked on other parts of the estate. Perhaps it didn't work in this area either. Maybe she needed to be in a specific spot. She knew at least one spot where it had always worked in the past.

Hope filled her as she hurried to the closet. She pushed the door shut behind her, closed her eyes, and with a silent prayer, rubbed the watch. She opened her eyes to slits and glanced at the watch's face. Her heart leapt as the second hand sped up. She placed a hand over her clenched stomach, enjoying a measure of relief. Within moments, the second hand ticked normally.

Cate yanked open the closet door and raced into the hall, down the main stairs, and into the library. She ripped open the doors and scanned the room. Riley lay sprawled in the same spot she had left him. She rushed over and scooped him up. A startled Riley wriggled before giving Cate a big lick on her cheek.

"I'm happy to see you too, buddy," she said as she ambled down the hall toward the stairs leading to the kitchen. She peered in. Mrs. Fraser stood at the sink, washing the lunch dishes.

"Mrs. Fraser?" she murmured.

"Oh!" The woman jumped, grabbing her chest, and spun to face her. "Dear Lady Cate, I wish you wouldn't go about startling me so. You creep up so silently, I never realize you're there. Did you need something?"

Relief washed over her. Mrs. Fraser could still see her. She hadn't disappeared. Everything appeared to be back to normal. She resisted her urge to fling her arms around the woman in a giant hug.

"Lady Cate? Everything all right? What do you need?" Mrs. Fraser said when Cate did not answer.

"Oh, um, yes." Cate's mind shot forward, searching for a reason for her visit. She only wanted to make sure that everything had returned to normal; she didn't need anything. Cate tried to call to mind something she could ask for. "Um, do you have any more cookies? My sweet tooth is bugging me for an after-lunch snack."

"Of course," Mrs. Fraser said, taking the tin down from a shelf. "You should have told me you wanted them when you finished lunch, and I could have brought them up to you."

"Oh, well, I just got the craving now," Cate fibbed. "I wasn't thinking about it after lunch."

"Well, that's rather fast. You just finished your lunch a few minutes ago."

Cate cocked her head. It'd been at least twenty minutes since her lunch. "What?"

“I say I just saw you not five minutes ago. Your cravings come fast.”

“Really? Has it only been a few minutes?” Cate’s forehead wrinkled as she considered the statement. It must have been longer than that. She calculated the timeline in her head. Between checking on Riley, writing the note, traveling to the bedroom closet, spending at least fifteen to twenty minutes wherever she went—it must have been over five minutes. She checked her watch. It read a few minutes past the time it had been when she slowed the watch.

“Yes, girl, it’s only been a few minutes. Do you want some milk or tea with them?” Mrs. Fraser handed her a plate with four cookies on it.

“No, thanks. Just these, thank you, again.”

Confused, Cate took the cookies and Riley back up to her sitting room. There the note sat, undisturbed. She picked it up, recalling writing it with a shaky hand, and crumpled it up into a ball. Cate picked up her note sheet and began adding to the information already there. She tried to be as detailed as possible, writing everything she witnessed.

She wrote a few tentative conclusions and additional questions. Thus far, the watch always worked in the closet. It also worked in a few other places in the castle. Did other places exist where it always worked? Those she encountered did not look like they lived in this era.

The new information that she collected from her daring experiment satisfied her. She figured that was enough excitement for one day, though, so she didn’t plan to do it again, despite the remaining unanswered questions. She marked today as a win.

Her watch read a few minutes past two. She still had plenty of time before dinner to work on her book research.

Retrieving all her materials and her laptop, she spread everything around her in the sitting room, pushing a coffee table aside and planting herself cross-legged on the area rug. Riley ventured over, excited to spot Cate on his level, and climbed into the space between her legs to curl up for another nap.

Cate picked up where she had left off before dinner the day before, continuing to fill in information on potential chapters, raise new questions, and pinpoint where she needed to fill in additional material. She concluded that she had accomplished enough after working for two hours and took a now restless Riley out for another walk before dinner.

She returned to the kitchen, cookie plate in hand, and thanked Mrs. Fraser again for the delicious cookies.

“Have fun, Riley. And you too, Lady Cate. Oh, Lady Cate, before you go—would you like us to stay the night again? It seems like you’re feeling better, but if you don’t feel quite at home yet and want someone around at night, we’re happy to stay. I just want to make the arrangements.”

Cate no longer felt afraid of disappearing, and she didn’t believe any grifters were hiding on the estate. Although she couldn’t be certain about what was going on, she didn’t feel as though it would bring her any harm. Perhaps she was viewing a window into a spirit realm, and if this were the case, she didn’t believe spirits could hurt her. They didn’t seem to have harmed any of her ancestors. No matter what the explanation was, after her post-lunch adventure, she sensed she was likely safe unless she used the watch again.

“I’ll be fine, Mrs. Fraser, but thank you so much for offering.”

“My pleasure, Lady Cate.”

She hovered in the doorway, extending an open invitation. “Oh, if it’s ever easier for you to stay the night, Mrs. Fraser, please do so. You are welcome anytime. You don’t need to ask, just let me know you’ll be staying so no one is startled in the middle of the night.”

“Thank you, Lady Cate. I shall do that if we find it easier to stay, perhaps in bad weather or the like.”

Cate smiled at her as she pushed the door open. “Great.”

Riley bounded out into the yard, racing over to greet Jack and Mr. Fraser. She wanted to share her afternoon adventure with Jack, but with Mr. Fraser nearby, she preferred not to. She also didn’t want to hear any lectures about experimenting with the timepiece. She waved and continued to the loch with Riley.

During her dinner, which she took in the library while watching a few episodes of a favorite program on her laptop, she got a text from Jack: u ok? Mrs. F said you didn’t need us to stay, r u sure?

Cate answered: I’m sure. I don’t think anyone is on the property, I should be fine. Thanks.

Jack returned the text: Ok, if you’re sure. Text if you need anything.

Cate answered a simple “will do” and continued eating her meal. As night approached, though, she second-guessed her choice in sending everyone home. The castle could be spooky at night, and the idea of disappearing into a spirit realm proved frightening.

She retired to her sitting room, content to settle there with Riley before bed and watch a movie. As she relaxed on the chaise, her mind focused on the day’s events and on the watch. Despite the movie playing on her laptop, she couldn’t help but wonder about the scene she had witnessed after it slowed. What did it all mean?

She wondered if she should try the watch again. She had presumed once was enough for the day, but now, alone in the castle, with her mind wandering from notion to notion, she considered another experiment.

Impulsively, she rubbed it. Nothing happened. Cate sighed. It didn’t appear to work in her sitting room either. The closet was the only place she was certain it worked.

She drummed her fingers on her laptop before she fished her note sheet from under her pen. It had worked a few times in her bedroom. Would it work again?

With the movie still playing next to a sleeping Riley, she tiptoed to her bedroom. Perched on the edge of the bed, Cate considered what she was about to do. She wondered if she should leave another note just in case or perhaps wait until daytime when others were on the estate.

She licked her lips, deciding not to wait. With a shaky hand, she rubbed the watch. The second hand slowed to a crawl. She sucked in a deep breath and glanced around. Nothing seemed different.

She considered bringing the watch back to normal speed since she had proved her point that it worked in the bedroom, but her inquisitive nature pushed her to take at least a brief look around.

She strode to the sitting room. Two major differences struck her. Both Riley and her laptop were missing. Wherever she was, Riley was not. A momentary pang of panic settled on her. Losing Riley was upsetting, but she remembered she had “lost” Riley once before. She had found him in the same spot she’d left him after the watch returned to normal speed.

She considered returning, wanting to be sure she was right about Riley, but instead, she pressed on to do more investigating.

She crept out of her bedroom and down the hall, trying to note any differences, but she failed to notice any. Wary of who or what she might encounter, she snuck around the castle, reluctant to run into anyone.

The halls seemed deserted. She crept down the main staircase, worried she may not hear someone approaching over the pounding of her own heart. She reached the marble floor. Voices came from the nearby sitting room. She crept toward the doors and peered in through the small crack between the doors.

Inside, several people milled around—some sitting, some standing near the massive fireplace. They all wore some form of evening wear and chatted over drinks. Their clothing looked out of place, seeming to come from another era. Cate shifted around, trying for a better view. With the limited field of vision, she identified them as fashions popular in the 1920s. Odd, Cate reflected. This didn't match at all what she had seen earlier.

The scene intrigued her, but her nervousness drove her to retreat. She spun on her heel and inched back toward the stairs.

She stepped onto the first stair, twisting back toward the sitting room doors.

Why were these people dressed so differently from the ones she had seen this afternoon? Who were they, and where was she?

She climbed up the stairs, lost in thought. Halfway up the staircase, a loud voice interrupted her musings. "Oi, what do you think you're doing there, miss? Who are you?"

Cate froze, her knees going weak and her pulse racing. She swallowed hard as she spun to face the voice. A man, a butler or footman by his dress, stared at her with a stern look, his hands on his hips. In an instant, she learned the answer to one of her questions. Wherever she was, the people could see her.

He approached from the far side of the entryway, striding toward the stairs with wide steps. Cate hesitated as she wavered between two choices. She could stay and explain or make a run for it. While he was still at a distance, Cate chose the latter, leaping up the stairs two at a time rather than face him. She cursed her impulsiveness as she ran down the hallway toward her room. Heavy footfalls raced behind her. The man shouted for help from anyone within earshot.

Cate barreled down the hall, skidding into her sitting room and pushing the doors shut, locking them behind her. Out of breath, she went to the bedroom, not bothering to shut the doors this time. She hoped that the first set of doors bought her enough time to get home. She rubbed the watch, and the second hand started to pick up speed. Men shouted in the hallway. The sound of doors opening and closing reached her ears. They approached her bedroom.

She closed her eyes and held tight to the pendant.

Shouting voices approached, closer and closer to her location. She wondered if she could hide somewhere. She vetted explanations she could use if they caught her. With her eyes still closed, she strained to listen to the noises of the nearby rooms being searched.

In an instant, the voices changed. They no longer shouted. No doors opened and closed. The new voices emanated from somewhere much closer than the hallway. Cate snapped her eyes open, searching for a hiding spot.

Something seemed familiar about these voices, Cate realized as her eyes darted around the room in search of a place to hide. Finding nowhere obvious, Cate opted for under the bed. She crouched on the floor, lifting the bed skirt when she realized to whom the voices belonged.

Relief washed over her, and she sunk her head into her hands as she knelt on the floor.

“Cate, you silly girl.”

The voices belonged to two famous actors arguing on-screen about who would do the dishes. In her panic, she had forgotten the romantic comedy still playing on her laptop.

Confident that she was safe and alone in the castle, Cate ambled to the sitting room doors. Her laptop sat on the chaise where she’d left it, and little Riley lay next to it, curled in a ball, fast asleep. She stared at the pup for a few moments as her heart rate slowed and her limbs stopped feeling like jelly.

She sucked in a few deep breaths as she recovered and shuffled to the chaise, cuddling Riley into her arms and letting him settle back to sleep on her lap.

She left the movie playing, finding it a comforting background noise as she annotated her note sheet regarding her latest adventure. She noted that this time the people wore clothing from a different era than in her previous experiences. Also, one of them interacted with her, reprimanding her, and eventually following her when she did not respond.

After jotting down everything that she remembered, exhaustion set in. The burst of adrenaline after being caught and the run through the castle had left her spent.

She closed her laptop and gathered Riley into her arms, carrying him to her bedroom. She crawled into bed next to him, dozing off within moments.

When she awoke the next morning, she wondered if she dreamt it all. She tried to recall all the details from her evening experience. In her first waking moments, they had been hazy, and she almost concluded it never happened. But upon climbing out of bed and gathering her notes from the side table of the chaise lounge, she found the experience detailed in them. She wasn't dreaming when she wrote the notes, nor was she detailing a dream.

She studied the information on the sheet. She'd encountered people that looked from their clothing to be from around 1850. The group she'd spotted last night appeared to be from the 1920s. Why did she encounter people from two different time periods?

She stared at the information, teasing it apart. Two differences existed: time of day and location of the room where she'd slowed the watch.

She cocked her head as she tried to make sense of the data. She tapped her pen against the notepad before she wrote two words in capital letters at the bottom of the paper: TIME TRAVEL???!!!

She set the sheet down and went about her morning routine, but the words rattled around in her mind. Was she experiencing time travel? Was that even possible? That would explain the people dressed in clothes from a different era. At first, she conjectured she was seeing a spirit realm where ghosts of the past still carried out their daily duties. But with the discovery of seeing several people from yet another time period, she no longer supposed that explanation made sense. Cate's thoughts on the subject ranged from a small measure of certainty to sheer disbelief that she was even considering this.

Even if she was correct, unanswered questions and unexplainable things abounded. She could barely count this as an explanation. Cate's mind was abuzz with so many queries and thoughts that she couldn't concentrate on anything.

As she slouched in her leather armchair in the library, she glanced down at her little dog. "What do you say, Riley? Is time travel even possible?"

The little dog cocked his head as though considering the inquiry.

"You aren't giving much feedback, are you?" Cate said. "I might have to enlist the help of someone else on this one. What do you say, little guy? Should I tell Jack or not? Do you think he'll have me committed?"

At the mention of Jack's name, Riley sprang to his feet and raced to Cate, tail wagging intensely.

She smiled at his enthusiasm. "I have my answer. You trust him, don't you, Riley? Well, that's good enough for me. I'll tell him and see what he says."

Cate opted for another long walk to the loch with Riley to gather her thoughts and with the hope of running into Jack. After only a few steps down the path, she found him.

"Got a minute?" she asked. She hoped she could find the words to tell him her theory.

"I always have a minute for Lady Cate and Sir Riley," Jack answered.

Cate shoved her shaking hands into her pockets. "Mind taking a walk with us?"

"Sure," Jack said, setting down his trimmers. "Everything okay, Cate?"

"Yes, everything is okay. I... Well..." Cate stammered, searching for the right words to begin.

Jack stopped walking. "Cate, what is it?"

"Well," Cate began again, kicking the gravel around as she studied the ground.

"Yeah, I got that part," Jack joked to lighten the mood.

"The thing is—" Cate danced around the subject, second-guessing sharing the information. After a pause, she said, "I used the watch again, twice. I have a theory. A crazy theory but still a theory. And I'm not positive, but—"

Jack's jaw dropped open, and he ran his fingers through his dark hair. "What? Twice? Cate, you promised."

"We won't get any information if we don't look for any."

"I can ask my grandfather when he gets back. He might have some information. He's worked here a long time."

"But if he can't help, we have nothing."

Jack rubbed the back of his neck before shooting a glance at Cate. "What if something happens to you while you're experimenting with this? Then we've really got nothing, and no Cate either."

Cate frowned at the last statement. "But that's just it. I think I know what the watch is doing."

He sighed, his displeasure apparent from the frown on his face, but he scrunched his eyebrows and waved a hand in the air. "Okay, I'll bite. What do you think it's doing?"

"Two words," Cate exclaimed. "Time travel."

Jack stared at her for a moment. "Time travel. Time travel? Cate, are you being serious?"

Cate wrinkled her nose at his reaction. "Yes, I'm being serious. It sounds crazy, but just listen to what happened when I tried it yesterday."

He slid his hands to his hips and puckered his lips as he considered it. "Okay, I'm not okay with you trying this out, but since you already did, I'd like to hear why you presume you are time traveling."

"Okay," Cate said, a smile forming on her lips. "Well, yesterday afternoon, after lunch, I decided that I would try the watch. I was responsible and left a note, just in case. I went to the closet—the one I disappeared from—I rubbed the watch, and it slowed down. I started by looking around the closet and bedroom, but nothing looked different to me. So, I ventured into the hallway. I made my way to where the hall branches off and spotted two women walking down the hall, talking. They were dressed like chambermaids, not present-day maids. From what I glimpsed of them, I'd put their clothes around the 1850s, give or take a little."

Cate continued rambling about her experience at lightning speed, "I didn't want them to see me, so I snuck back to the bedroom and waited 'til they passed by. Then I heard someone else talking to them, I caught their names, and I wrote them down in my notes. I figure I can check the records to see if they worked here in the past. Anyway, I didn't stick around after that. Well, I did, only because I forgot that the watch only works in certain areas. I tried to come back from the bedroom, and it didn't work. I panicked. But then I remembered it worked in the closet, so I went back there and voila. It worked, I was back, and only a few minutes had passed. Mrs. Fraser said she saw me only minutes before I tried it. When I tried it last night—"

Jack waved his hands in the air, his face pinching in confusion. "Whoa, whoa, Cate, slow down. I need a moment to process what you've told me. You think you saw maids from the 1850s walking around the castle, then you couldn't get 'back,' but then you did. My head is spinning."

"No," Cate said, "I don't think I saw them. I saw them, Jack—plain as I see you standing in front of me."

Jack frowned at the statement.

Cate crossed her arms. "You think I'm crazy."

"I don't know what to think, Cate," he said with a huff. "But, no, I don't think you're crazy."

Relief washed over Cate. "I did see them, and they weren't mists or vapors or random shapes. They were plain as day—people walking and talking."

"And when you tried again last night, did you see the same people?"

"No. That's where things get interesting. I remembered that the watch always slowed down for me in my bedroom. So, I tried it there. No one was in the bedroom or sitting room, but my laptop and Riley were both gone. I took a walk around the castle to investigate and—"

Jack scrubbed his face with his hands. "You took a walk around the castle to investigate? Cate. You do not know where or when or whatever you are, and you're gallivanting around like you're at the local fair."

She shrugged. "I was careful, for the most part."

"What's that mean?"

"I heard people in the sitting room. I peeked in, and several people were there. But they weren't dressed like they were from the 1850s, they were dressed like they were from the 1920s."

"Now you're in the 1920s? With different people?"

"Yes, they were different people, and yes, I'd put the year somewhere in the twenties based on the clothes they were wearing. Who says being a history professor never paid off, right?"

Jack cocked his head with a nod. "Funny, yes, seems right handy to identify the era you're time traveling to."

Cate dismissed his sarcasm with a wave of her hand. “Well, anyway, I didn’t stick around—you know, to be safe and all. I was heading back up to the bedroom, but someone spotted me, a footman, I think. I raced to the bedroom and set the watch back to normal speed, and there I was, back in my bedroom in this time.”

Jack’s jaw dropped. “You got caught?”

“No, I didn’t get caught—I ran away and escaped,” Cate corrected.

“Oh, right, my mistake... someone spotted you, somewhere in some time, but you ran away and escaped. Sorry. I’m just envisioning the next time when maybe you can’t run away.”

Cate scowled. “Well, let’s hope that doesn’t happen. Anyway—”

“So, there will be a next time?”

“Well—” Cate wasn’t sure how to answer the question. It was true they didn’t have solid information and were only working from theories. But theories needed testing. Even if it wasn’t only a theory, she’d still want to investigate. Immersing herself in the past would be an appealing proposition for any historian. What better way to discover the past? It would be akin to doing an immersion when mastering a new language.

Jack lifted his eyebrows at her as he awaited an answer.

She raised her gaze from the gravel below and shrugged. “Yes, I guess, is the long and short answer.”

Jack rubbed the back of his neck as he shuffled along the path. “Oh, Cate, I know I must sound like a broken record, but I don’t think you should mess around with this stuff until we know what’s going on—and maybe not even then. What if you get caught or stuck or whatever can happen when you play with that watch? You’re a nice lassie, Cate. I don’t want anything to happen to you.”

“I appreciate that. I do, but—”

“But you’ve no intention of listening?”

“If I’m really time traveling, how exciting is that? It’s an opportunity you can’t pass up, right?”

“That’s a big if, Cate. You’re talking as though you’re sure that’s what’s happening.”

“Okay, point taken, we’re not sure. But I strongly suspect I’m right. Nothing else makes sense. I mean, at first, I hypothesized seeing a spirit world or something. But two different spirit worlds? That theory doesn’t fit anymore.”

“Yeah, time travel makes way more sense than spirit worlds, although I missed the part where time travel made any sense.”

“Funny,” Cate groaned.

They reached the loch and settled on its banks. Cate stared out over the scenery. It seemed their conversation had ended. Neither of them were able to make any further conjecture, and both of them were at opposite ends about whether they should test the watch.

They sat for a few moments, each lost in their own thoughts.

Breaking the silence, Jack said, “My grandfather is coming back at the end of the week. Can you at least not experiment any more with that until we can talk to him?”

Cate considered it. It was only two days. While she was anxious to learn more, maybe she should wait. Her encounter with the footman last night was still unsettling; perhaps she shouldn’t be taking any more chances at the moment. Still, she knew herself well. If she promised she’d regret it.

“If you just saw how it worked, I think you’d—” she began.

Jack leaned back on his hands, stretching his legs out in front of him. “I’m not sure I want to see how it works. It’s bizarre, even if your explanation is correct. It’s downright scary if you ask me.”

“But, I think if you tried it you’d see that it’s—” she started again.

“Cate.”

“I just think—”

“Caaaate.”

She wrinkled her nose, crossing her arms. “This could be the greatest discovery of all mankind, and you don’t want to even discover how it works.”

“We don’t know what it is. Can’t you wait two short days?”

“Or he’ll have us fitted for straitjackets.”

“Just let me show you once how it works, and you can decide how dangerous it is for yourself.”

“I feel like if I don’t agree, you’re just going to do it on your own, anyway.”

Cate reflected for a moment. “Probably.”

Jack scoffed, picking up a fallen leaf and tossing it away. “As much as I don’t want to do this, I’d rather not have you do it alone.”

“So you’ll do it?” Cate clasped her hands together under her chin.

“Well, Lady Cate, since you’re twisting my arm, I suppose I will.”

Cate grinned. “Meet me in the library after lunch.”

The morning dragged by for Cate. After Jack returned to his landscaping, she spent a good bit of time with Riley, playing and enjoying the morning, before heading back to the castle. With two hours still left before lunch, Cate tried to fill her time with research, but she found her mind too distracted.

After what seemed an eternity, Mrs. Fraser appeared in the library with lunch. She had little appetite, but Cate forced most of her lunch down.

Mrs. Fraser came to collect her tray, and within a few minutes of her departure, a knock sounded at the library door.

“Come in!” Cate yelled.

Jack pushed the door open. “Reporting for duty,” he said as he came through the door, saluting.

“You will NOT be disappointed. Come on,” Cate exclaimed, hurrying out. “Well, at least, I hope not.”

“I hope I’m still around not to be.”

Cate shot him a glance over her shoulder as she hurried to the stairs.

“Sorry, bad joke,” he said. “Just making sure you really want to do this.”

She chuckled at his reluctance as they climbed the stairs. “Out of the two of us, I don’t expect it’s me who doesn’t want to do it.”

“Okay, I’ll admit this is not the greatest idea I’ve ever heard, but I’d rather you not mess around with this stuff alone.”

They arrived at the bedroom door, and Cate burst through. “Come on.”

She headed straight for the closet.

“Close the door,” she instructed. “Okay, here we go.”

She held the timepiece and rubbed it. Taking a deep breath, she waited for it to slow. Smiling, she glanced up at Jack, starting to speak to him. Before she could, he disappeared right in front of her eyes.

CHAPTER 26

Cate stood alone in the closet, her heart pounding. Where was Jack?
“Jack?”

No answer.

She glanced down at the timepiece in her hands. It had completed its circuit and was now scarcely ticking. She speculated that he must have stayed in their own time. She rubbed the pendant again. The second hand sped up.

When it approached its normal speed, Jack reappeared in front of her.

He grabbed hold of her, his eyes wide. “Cate!”

“Jack! Sorry, I’m not sure what I was thinking. I lost you when the watch slowed. I don’t know why I assumed we’d just both go. Perhaps we both need to touch the watch? Let’s try that.”

Jack’s face bordered on horrified. “Cate, you just disappeared in front of my eyes. One minute you were here, the next you were gone. Sorry, I need a minute. I mean, I realize you disappeared once before, but not right in front of my eyes. That was... weird.”

Undeterred, Cate responded, “Here, try holding on to the watch with me. Maybe then I won’t disappear.”

Jack placed a shaky hand on the timepiece with Cate’s, wrapping her hand in his.

“Okay, now rub it,” Cate instructed.

Their thumbs moved in unison, and the second hand began to slow. Within seconds, the timepiece was hardly ticking at all.

Both she and Jack stood in the closet. "You made it."

"I did, I guess," he said, pressing his hands on his body in a few places, as if checking to make sure it was still there.

Cate grinned and headed for the closet door. "Wanna look around?"

"Do I have a choice?"

"Nope, come on. We won't stay long, but see if you notice anything different." She inched open the closet door, peeking out to make sure no one was in the bedroom.

Spotting no one, she pushed the door all the way open. "I didn't recognize much difference in this room. Only that the lamps were missing, which makes sense if we are in the 1800s."

Jack nodded in agreement without vocalizing a response.

"Okay, let's check the hall." Cate pressed her ear to the door for a moment. Satisfied, she unlatched it and nudged it open, glancing up and down the hall. She spotted no one and tiptoed into the hallway, motioning Jack to follow her.

"Let's head toward the front stairs," she whispered.

Jack nodded, and they crept down the hallway. They rounded the corner. Cate whispered that she had seen the maids there the day before. She was about to take another step down the hall when Jack grabbed her arm, pulling her back around the corner. He pressed a finger to his lips, motioning her to be quiet.

His reasoning became apparent as voices floated down the hall. She peered around the corner. Three women strode down the hall. Two of them were the maids she came across yesterday. The third woman was not a maid. Cate guessed by her dress and keys dangling around her waist that she was the housekeeper.

She ducked back around the corner and signaled Jack to look. He glanced around the corner then nodded back to Cate to demonstrate that he saw them. He motioned to her to signal they should return to the bedroom. She nodded in agreement, and they crept down the hall and back into the bedroom. Jack eased the door shut as the voices continued to approach their location.

They froze, standing stock still inside the doorway as the group of women turned the corner and passed their door. The staff seemed to be discussing a cleaning schedule while the owners were away visiting relatives in London. They passed by the bedroom, continuing down the hall, with the housekeeper giving a long list of orders.

The voices faded down the hall. Jack breathed a sigh of relief, collapsing against the door.

“Should we head back?” Cate asked.

“Yes, please. That’s enough excitement for one day.”

Cate took a step toward the closet, then stopped without warning and turned toward him, saying, “This is where I was yesterday when I couldn’t get the watch to work—”

Jack waved her forward. “Let’s talk about this after we’re back.”

They stepped into the closet and closed the door behind them. She held the timepiece up, and Jack put his hand over hers, rubbing the face with their thumbs together. The second hand returned to normal ticking.

Cate grinned up at him. “Okay, that should be it. I told you. Those people are real. Do you believe me now?”

“I witnessed it with my own eyes, but I still can’t say I believe it.”

Cate’s smile broadened. “Amazing, isn’t it? Encountering people who shaped the history of this castle. It’s every historian’s dream.”

Jack swallowed hard, stalking around the room as he rubbed his neck. “I’m not sure I would call it a dream.”

“There isn’t an historian alive who wouldn’t give anything for five minutes in a room with some of the biggest influencers in history.”

Jack stopped his walking and put his hands on his hips. “There must be a reason no one knows about this, Cate. I don’t think we should use this thing or tell anyone about it. Maybe my grandfather will have some information.”

“Okay, okay, I promise not to use it. I feel better knowing someone else experienced this. Now I’m sure I’m not crazy.”

“Oh, I experienced it, all right. You’re not crazy. Or if you are, so am I.”

“Mass hysteria? I don’t think that’s the case here.”

“How are you so excited about this? That’s enough excitement for me for the day. Time for me to put my own shape on the castle starting with those bushes.”

“Okay, yes, you’re right. And I’ve got to document that experience.”

“Okay, Cate. And you promise, no more ‘trips,’ right?”

“This time I promise. Scouts honor,” she said, holding up three fingers.

Cate and Jack parted ways. Cate headed downstairs to an office filled with family records. She searched through book after book until she found one from the 1850s. After several tedious hours, she stumbled across two maids named Lorna and Edna. A smile spread across her face as the find added fuel to her theory.

Cate awoke to a rainy, miserable Saturday. The cool, damp weather kept her inside. She planned to spend the day wrapped in a blanket binge-watching a few movies. As she stretched out on her chaise, her phone chirped to life.

The lock screen showed a text from Jack: My grandfather is home, meet for dinner?

Cate's mind buzzed with excitement. Perhaps now she would get some answers. She texted back: Sure... where?

Jack answered: He said at the castle, if that's ok?

Cate considered it for a moment. Given the weather, she had given Mrs. Fraser the rest of the day off, figuring she could fend for herself. She regretted the choice now since she was having company for dinner. She was a horrible cook. But she wanted answers, and she was willing to cook dinner to get them if she had to. She answered: Yes, that will work. No promises on dinner... I'm a terrible cook :P

Jack answered: See you around 4? I can cook... you two can talk

She answered: Deal... I'd politely decline and cook myself but no one wants to eat my cooking

Jack answered with an emoticon of a tongue sticking out. Cate settled back in the chaise. She still had a few hours to kill before they met, so she played a few of the movies she had selected. The hope that she might have answers to her questions overwhelmed her mind, and she found herself a ball of nerves all day, checking the time every five minutes. A few times, Cate wondered if she had accidentally slowed the timepiece because time seemed to be standing still.

After what felt like an eternity, her clock read 3:30 p.m. Cate had enough time for a quick walk with Riley. She arrived back at the castle a few minutes before Jack and his grandfather arrived. She was still shaking off her soaked raincoat and removing Riley's sodden jacket when there was a knock on the heavy brass door knocker that hung on the front door.

Cate pulled the heavy door open. "Lady Cate." Jack bowed theatrically. He held a bag of groceries in his hands.

"Come in and get dry," Cate said. "Good to see you again, Mr. Reid, and thank you for coming."

"It sure is wet out there. How are you enjoying our lovely weather, Sir Riley?" Jack asked, bending over to give the small dog a scratch under his chin.

"He doesn't mind the rain so much—he's all boy. But he hates storms."

Jack jiggled the groceries in his arms. "Shall we head to the kitchen?"

Cate motioned for them to follow her. "Sure, and thank you again for offering to cook."

"I was worried you'd cook cereal for dinner."

"Oh, come on, I'm not that bad. I'd have opted for peanut butter and jelly at least!"

Jack shot a glance at his grandfather over his shoulder. "Oh boy, I wish I hadn't offered. We missed out, Pap."

Mr. Reid trailed behind them, offering Cate a grin. "I'd have taken anything this pretty lassie fed me. I'm not picky."

"Thank you. How was your trip?" she asked as they descended the stairs.

"Great. Nice to get away."

Cate asked where he had traveled and some general questions about his trip as they settled at the table. Jack bustled around the kitchen, gathering materials for his meal like a professional. Cate offered to help, but he refused, suggesting, instead, that she plow into her interview questions.

Cate glanced up at the elder Mr. Reid. "Well, thanks for coming. I'm not sure if Jack mentioned it, but I'm putting together materials to write a book about the castle's history, and I figured you might be a good source of information. So, I'd like to ask you a few questions if you don't mind."

Jack seasoned his pot of stew with salt before adjusting the temperature on the stove. "Aww, come on, Cate, skip to the juicy stuff. Ask him about the theory you have about that watch of yours."

Cate shot Jack a glance. "I wasn't going to lead with that, but okay. I guess the real reason I wanted to talk to you—not that the other reason isn't legit, it is—but, well, I mentioned to you before that the watch was slowing down. You looked at it and told me nothing was wrong with it, and I now agree because I deduced the watch should operate that way.” Cate stammered around, trying to find the words to make her theory sound less crazy.

Mr. Reid continued to stare at her as she spoke without offering much response, which made Cate more nervous.

She continued to babble, “Well, what I mean to say is, Jack mentioned to you that I hypothesized friction-induced it because I developed a habit, a tic... no pun intended—” She laughed nervously. “—of rubbing it, and I postulated that maybe somehow that messed with the internal workings. But now my theory is it’s not just some random event, but that it’s the watch’s purpose...”

“Oh, for heaven’s sake, Cate,” Jack interrupted her. “She thinks she’s time traveling by slowing the watch down, Pap. Ever heard of anything like that?”

Color rose in Cate’s cheeks as she shot a demure glance at the older man. “Yes, that’s what I concluded. That’s my theory. Nothing else made sense, but I kept seeing random people dressed in old-fashioned clothing when the watch was slow. Am I just going crazy?”

Mr. Reid chuckled, a wide grin on his bearded face. “So, you figured it out, young lassie? Good for you. Lady MacKenzie didn’t know if you’d be bright enough to catch on to it. She didn’t leave you with many clues—wondered if the secret might be best left to die with her since she couldn’t tell you herself. Said if you were clever, you’d figure out the secret. She had faith that if anyone could solve it, a MacKenzie could.”

Cate’s mouth dropped open. She wasn’t sure if she felt relieved or not. Her theory was correct, but hearing that was more of a shock than she had prepared for.

“Wait a minute,” Jack said, collapsing into a chair next to Cate, “she’s right?”

Cate snapped back to reality. “Hey. You saw it, too. You agreed with my theory.”

“Well, it’s a shock to hear that we were actually time traveling.”

“Yes,” Cate answered. “We tried it together. Well, after a total fail when I disappeared for a few seconds without him.”

“Like I said, you’re off to a good start. You figured out quite a lot, Lady Cate.” Mr. Reid nodded his head.

“I’m just shocked that I was right. I mean, I was convinced of my theory, but how has this been such a well-kept secret?”

“Ah, good question. The family never speaks of this secret to anyone outside of themselves. And whatever Reid is working on the estate.”

Jack’s grandfather continued, “Long ago when the castle was built, the new owners detected what they called anomalies. This led to the rumors of the castle being haunted. And the builder, Douglas MacKenzie—you’ve no doubt come across his name during your research—was the curious sort. He, along with his construction manager and later estate manager, Jamie Reid, my ancestor, spent countless hours studying these anomalies. Almost drove them crazy, but after some work, Douglas devised a mechanism that could interact with what he termed ‘rips’ in the ‘fabric of time.’ He, along with Jamie, built the watch with this mechanism and used their invention as an instrument to control these rips.

“The secret has been passed from generation to generation. Always passed verbally, never written. You understand, if the wrong person discovered it, it could lead to disaster. The preceding caretaker always passed the secret to their heir. This time was different since no one knew what you’d be like, and no one could find you before Lady MacKenzie passed. She tasked me with guarding the secret until we were sure you’d be able to take on the responsibility.”

“So,” Cate began. “Wow, I’m sorry, I need a minute. I have so many questions. I just... I can’t believe it. I mean I’ve done it—I’ve time traveled—but I still can’t believe it.”

Jack continued making dinner but chimed in from across the kitchen. “You and I both. It’s still surprising, even after experiencing the phenomenon for myself.”

“Lady MacKenzie knew. Did her mother, Mary, also know?”

“Aye, lassie. I worked on the estate when Lord MacKenzie passed and left the responsibility to Lady Mary since Lady Gertrude was too young.”

Cate nodded. That explained the journals. Mary’s adventures weren’t parties that she hosted—they were events at the castle in different eras. It also explained why pages were missing from the journals. Anything Mary wrote regarding the watch had to be destroyed so that the secret was not recorded anywhere.

“You mentioned not knowing if I’d be suitable to take on the responsibility? Then the secret could have died with Gertrude?”

“Aye, as I mentioned, it’s quite a responsibility, and Gertrude would have rather seen the secret die with her than fall into the wrong hands. Not that she doubted you, but never having met you, and not knowing anything about you, well, I guess she erred on the side of caution. You can imagine the repercussions if this fell into the hands of someone who would exploit it for their own gain.”

Cate reflected for a moment. “Yes, I can see your point. I found some journals Mary kept from when she had inherited the watch, and while they were redacted, she described the secret in the same way: as a responsibility. I see it as a gift. What historian wouldn’t love to immerse themselves in a different era? The learning potential is unlimited.”

“You’re eager, I see, but you must temper your eagerness with caution. You must be careful with this ‘gift,’ Cate. You don’t always understand the repercussions of changing too much in the past. You must follow the rules that have been passed through the generations. Striking a balance and following those rules are the responsibility that both Mary and Gertrude spoke of.”

“Aye, it can be exciting, but you have to be careful. Got to consider what you’re doing before you start changing things. Caution like that requires a cool head and a steady hand,” Mr. Reid warned her.

Silence fell over them for a moment while Cate collected her thoughts. “Do you know how many ‘rips’ exist?”

“I’m not sure if we ever had an exact count. The rips exist in different places throughout the castle. Different rips connect to different times. Lady Gertrude disliked traveling, unlike her mother. If I remember, Lady Mary identified at least four spots.”

“Do you remember where they are?”

“Aye, one of them in the bedroom Lady Gertrude stayed in, one of them in the bedroom down the hall, another in the downstairs office—that’s a tricky one since you never know who might be in there—and the fourth she found exists in another bedroom they call the Blue Room.”

Cate fell silent for a moment, mulling over her questions.

“There may be more, but those were the ones she identified. Her husband took ill and passed her the watch and the secret with little information. Oh, that reminds me there's a hallway that seems to work in any time to return. Handy to remember in case of an emergency. It's the one that looks out on the back garden."

"So my theory was correct. The watch only triggers in certain locations and each location leads to a different time."

"Aye, correct, lassie."

"And you said the secret is passed down in both the MacKenzie and Reid families?" Cate asked.

"Yes. The Reids' duty is always to protect this secret right along with the MacKenzies. It was a pact made between Douglas and Jamie."

"So, you helped Mary and Gertrude protect the secret?"

"Aye, lassie. Took many a trip with Lady Mary back in my younger days. As I said, Lady Gertrude was not a fan of traveling as much as her mother." He turned to Jack who was seasoning a pot of whatever steamed on the stove. "Now, I'm officially passing the mantle to you, lad. The secret is now yours and Cate's, and it's up to you to protect it—and Cate."

"Thanks, Pap, I have my work cut out with this one," he said, nodding toward her.

Cate twisted to face him. "Hey, I'm not that bad. He's been doing a good job so far. So, only the three of us know?"

"That's right, lassie."

"Mr. and Mrs. Fraser?"

"Charlie and Emily? Nay. I dare say she might faint dead away if she found out."

Cate laughed at this joke, although she agreed that might be the exact reaction from Mrs. Fraser.

"That reminds me," Cate said, "once I 'traveled' back, and when I came back, Mrs. Fraser said she'd just seen me. But I was gone for at least fifteen to twenty minutes. Does that make sense?"

"Aye, and a good observation on your part. When you travel, the time where you're from almost stands still. That's why the watch is slow. The watch keeps time from YOUR time. Now, I said almost. We calculated the ratio to be about fifteen minutes in the past to one minute here. Tempting as it may be to spend a lot of time in the past, you must remember that you can't go disappearing from your own time for too long. People will wonder."

“Always keep an eye on your time. It’s the inscription on the watch, and it was in Lady Gertrude’s note. Now it makes sense.”

Cate’s thoughts absorbed her for a few moments as she tried to piece together the puzzle, when another query struck her.

“On a different note, do you know why my family branch became estranged? I found a family bible with an inkblot over my branch of the family. As you mentioned, I wasn’t easy to find. I found evidence that Gertrude visited my parents before my birth, but then it seems like all contact was cut off.”

“I cannae help you there, lassie. Lady Gertrude never mentioned it—never discussed your side. She knew your family, but not exactly where to find you. Only had an old address for your father. I got the impression that your grandparents moved and changed their names around the time a spot of trouble cropped up. The castle’s secret was almost discovered. Perhaps they moved to protect your family from being sought by any undesirable people. My guess is Lady Gertrude stayed away after your birth just to keep your family safe.”

“That makes sense and seems reasonable. This is a lot to digest, but thank you for the information. This is incredible.”

“I’m sure you’re still reeling. No doubt you’ll have more questions. When you do, I’ll be here to help you as best I can,” Mr. Reid said, smiling at her.

Jack delivered full bowls of what he called his “famous stew.” Cate had to admit, the meal smelled delicious. “Well, there you have it, Lady Cate. Your theory was right, mystery solved! Now you can relax.”

“Relax? My mind is whirling with the possibilities. Do you like history, Jack?” Cate asked.

“Oh, boy,” Jack groaned. “You sure you don’t want your old job back, Pap?”

“Oh, come on, Jack. The adventures are just beginning,” she said, a gleam of mischief in her eye.

Murder. The word rattled around in Lady Catherine Kensie's mind as she sat on the banks of the loch with Riley, her beloved black and white dog. Dunhaven Castle reflected in the ripples of the pond. Cate studied it, still finding it hard to believe it was her home.

A home that held a life-changing secret. One she had never expected when she'd learned of her surprise inheritance: a small fortune and a Scottish castle. A haunted Scottish castle, according to the rumors.

She'd almost believed those rumors when she'd moved here, leaving behind her quiet life as a college professor teaching history at a local college. She chuckled as she recalled her first few encounters with the supposed specters.

What was presumed to be ghosts turned out to be an incredible discovery. The castle walls housed an anomaly, allowing the wearer of one particularly gold timepiece to slip into other eras.

Cate stared down at the watch dangling from the gold chain around her neck. It provided her with an incredible opportunity, as well as a few scares.

She glanced over her shoulder at the stone walls rising high above her. Her eyes focused on one of the tower rooms. Now she wondered if the castle held another secret. A murderous one.

"Ahoy there, Lady Cate!" a voice with a Scottish accent called from behind her.

Cate twisted to eye her estate manager and only member of her staff aware of the castle's secret, Jack Reid, strolling down the path toward her.

“Hello, Jack.”

Jack settled on the bank next to her, scratching Riley’s chin. “And hello to you too, good Sir Riley. Lost in thought over your research there, Cate?”

Cate stared at the ripples in the loch. “I was just thinking about my journey.”

“Your journey? You mean your time traveling journeys?”

Cate shot him a glance before returning her gaze to the rippling waters. “No. Reflecting on how different my life is now compared to the beginning of the year.”

“Ah, yes, from mild-mannered professor to Scottish Countess. You’ve really come up in the world, Lady Cate.”

“Yes, and not just any Scottish Countess, but a time-traveling one.”

Jack wrapped his arms around his knees as he leaned forward. “You are way fonder of the time-traveling stuff than I am, Cate. If it were all the same to me, I’d stay right here in my present time.”

Cate clapped a hand on his shoulder. “Yes, I realize that, but unfortunately, it’s your solemn duty to make sure I’m safe and so is this secret. And that includes not only wherever I go, but WHENever.”

“Don’t remind me. You’re too adventurous for your own good, m’lady.”

Cate forced her thought from the past to the future. “Speaking of adventurous, how are things looking for the costume ball?”

“Everything will be right as rain for the ball. Mr. Fraser and I will have the gardens closest to the house in tip-top shape for the guests to enjoy.”

Cate slicked a lock of hair behind her ear as the cool Scottish breeze blew it across her cheek. “Oh good! I can’t believe it’s only a month away!”

Jack wrinkled his nose, turning his gaze to the loch. “I can’t believe we have another month. Another month listening to Mrs. Fraser chew my ear off about her costume. I tell you I’ve never seen that woman so tickled about something as when she learned you wanted her to attend as your guest and not have to do all the cooking for it.”

Cate stood with a chuckle and dusted herself off. “I’m glad she is enjoying her new role. Sorry that you aren’t! Well, speaking of the ball, I better go attend to a few details for that. I have an appointment with Mrs. Campbell to go over some items.”

Jack climbed to his feet. “Okay, Cate. Enjoy the rest of your day.”

Cate scooped the small dog off the ground and nestled him in her arms for the return trip to the castle. “Thanks!”

As she pushed through the kitchen door, Mrs. Fraser, her housekeeper and cook, informed her Mrs. Campbell already awaited her in the sitting room.

Cate glanced at her timepiece. "Am I late?"

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands against her apron and shook her head, a frown on her lips. "Nay, Lady Cate. She's early, 'bout a half hour early, too. If you ask me, that woman is insufferable, always showing up and poking around as if she's welcome anytime. Dinnae she realize people have other things to do? Bless your soul for helping her with this ball, Lady Cate. Although, if I may say so, I am excited for it."

Cate smiled at her enthusiasm as a grin spread across her housekeeper's face. "I'm glad you are, Mrs. Fraser. Jack told me about your discussions with him regarding your costume."

Mrs. Fraser arched an eyebrow as she pulled a bowl of cookie dough from the refrigerator. "Giving away my secrets, is he?"

"He hasn't given away any secrets, just that you're excited over your costume, which you won't have the opportunity to wear if I don't finish these details with Mrs. Campbell."

"Best be off with you then! Oh, why dinnae you leave the little pup here while you meet with her? I've got a nice bone for him."

"Oh, he'll love that. Okay, Riley, you stay here. Mrs. Fraser has a nice bone for you, buddy. Be a good boy for her, okay?" Cate gave the pup a scratch on his head and left the kitchen, making her way up to the main floor's sitting room.

Cate pushed into the large space with its thick tartan draperies and heavy wooden furniture. Mrs. Campbell perched on the edge of the blue loveseat, materials spread around her.

She smiled at her as she crossed the room. "Mrs. Campbell, what a pleasure to see you again."

"Lady Cate," the woman said, rising from her seat and adjusting her smart skirt suit, "thank you for meeting with me. Pardon my early arrival, but I was concerned the details may take longer to work out than we expect."

"No problem. I was just settling Riley in after a long walk."

"Of course," Mrs. Campbell answered as Cate motioned for them to sit. "And how is the little pet? Adjusting all right to Scottish country life?"

"Oh, yes, he loves it here. And so do I."

“Well, we certainly enjoy having you here, Lady Cate. Everyone I’ve spoken to is thrilled to be attending. It will be a lovely way for everyone to get to know the newest owner.”

Cate forced a smile onto her face and swallowed hard. As an introvert, she was not as thrilled, but the “Ghosts of the Past”-themed Halloween ball seemed like a fun idea and would be a fantastic fundraiser for the local historical society.

“After your predecessor became a recluse,” Mrs. Campbell continued, “I all but gave up on the idea of hosting this type of event at our most prominent attraction, but with your arrival, I’m thrilled to pull it together.”

“Well, I think it sounds like a very fun evening you have planned.”

Mrs. Campbell giggled as she tugged a few papers from a folder. “I certainly think so. Shall we get down to business?”

They spent the next two hours discussing catering menus, entertainment and décor. The details seemed endless.

Cate stood and stretched after the tedious meeting as Mrs. Campbell shoved fabric samples into her tote.

“Of course, we’ll need to meet again in two weeks and then schedule several more as the day approaches, just to be sure we have everything nailed down,” Mrs. Campbell said as they strode to the front door.

“Yes, well, you have kept a very close eye on all the details, Mrs. Campbell. You’ve done an incredible job in putting this together.”

“Oh, oh, why thank you, Lady Cate. Well, this is quite an undertaking for our little historical society and I do want it to be a success. I’d love to make it an annual event, I trust you wouldn’t object to that if all goes well?”

Cate held back a groan at the idea, though she couldn’t fault her for wanting to capitalize on the town’s biggest asset. She found herself nodding and smiling as the woman continued to let her thoughts spill out.

“Or even a series of events. Oh!” She grabbed Cate’s arm, staring into space as though an idea just struck her on the head. “Christmas with Lady Cate. Oh yes, what a magical idea. Perhaps that’s a winner too!”

Cate patted her hand. “Let’s see how successful this event is and take it from there.”

Mrs. Campbell stepped into the bright sunshine, fiddling with her sunglasses. “Right, of course. Well, thank you for meeting with me. I’ll be in touch!”

“Bye!” Cate called after her.

She pushed the door closed and returned to the sitting room, dropping onto the couch with a sigh. The details of the meeting left her drained. She flung an arm over her eyes as she wondered what possessed her to agree to this.

“Is the ninny gone?” Mrs. Fraser said, breaking her from her daze.

Cate pulled her arm away, chuckling. “Yes, she’s gone.”

“Has she exhausted you or do you have a few minutes to go over a few details about your upcoming house party?”

Cate pushed off the sofa, giving her back another stretch. “I always have time for you, Mrs. Fraser. Let’s walk down to the kitchen, then I can retrieve Riley, too. I bet he enjoyed his bone.”

“Oh, he did, Lady Cate, he did. Chewed on it almost the whole time he was down there. Now,” Mrs. Fraser said as they walked, “I wanted to make sure I’ve got the timetable right so I can plan menus for everything and everyone. Ms. Williams is the first to arrive, and she’s coming in on the Saturday before the party and staying on until the second Monday. She’ll be here for dinner Saturday evening, staying the week and leaving after breakfast the following Monday, right?”

“Yes, that’s right. Molly will be visiting for just over a week,” Cate answered, confirming the arrival of Molly Williams, the department secretary from Cate’s old teaching department at Aberdeen College. Much like an older sister to her, Cate eagerly awaited Molly’s visit.

When invited, Molly replied with a “heck yeah” adding “when am I ever going to get the chance to go to a costume ball in a castle.” Now single following a surprise divorce, Molly said it was the perfect time for her to travel to “get her mind off of things.”

Mrs. Fraser continued her catalog of guests as they descended the stairs. “Then, Ms. Pearson is traveling in on Monday and will be here in time for dinner and staying on until the following Monday, same as Ms. Williams.”

“Right, Gayle is coming two days after Molly and leaving at the same time as Molly.”

“And last but certainly not least, Mr. Smythe will arrive on Wednesday, here for dinner in the evening and leaving with the ladies on Monday morning after breakfast.”

“You’ve got it!” Cate answered as they approached the kitchen.

“And the bedroom arrangements we already spoke about are suitable with you?”

Cate sank into a chair at the kitchen table, flicking a gaze to Riley who gnawed on his bone near the warmth generated from the ovens. "Yes, that sounds perfect, Mrs. Fraser, thank you. Also, I hoped you and Mr. Fraser would stay Friday evening after the ball so you don't have to return home late. I realize your cottage is close but staying may be more convenient. And on Saturday morning, we can help ourselves to a cold breakfast, so you won't need to prepare anything."

Mrs. Fraser offered a shrug before balling a tea towel. She pushed open the door and fluttered it outside to clean it of any crumbs. "Well, I'm happy to prepare food, but if you are certain that will suffice, I'll have some fruit and such prepared the day before and put into the fridge for everyone the next morning."

She straightened and frowned. "Funny, I never imagined Mr. Smythe enjoying a party, he doesn't seem the type. I realize he was a friend of Lady Gertrude's but they never did more than have a nightcap."

"I know what you mean," Cate said as she considered her good-hearted, but straight-laced attorney. "And that would be perfect, Mrs. Fraser, thank you, again."

She pushed her hands against her thighs as she rose from the table. "Well, Mr. Riley, how did you like your bone?" The smile disappeared from her face as she glanced around the kitchen, not spotting the little pup. "Riley?"

"Strange, he was here chewing on that bone when we came in."

"Riley! Come, Riley! Oh, he's here somewhere, Mrs. Fraser. Probably hiding away with his bone so we don't take it from him."

They searched the kitchen but did not find him.

Cate called down the hall leading from the room. "Perhaps he wandered into one of the other rooms."

They both moseyed down the hall, searching in each room. Neither of them found the little pup.

"I don't expect he could have gotten upstairs, the door at the top is closed," Mrs. Fraser said.

"No, we must have missed him somewhere."

They returned to the kitchen, glancing around the space again. A noise sounded from across the room.

Mrs. Fraser held a finger up. "Did you hear that?"

They strained their ears to listen.

Cate nodded. "Yes. Riley? Riley! Is that you? Where are you?"

The little dog issued a whine.

"That's him, all right. Riley?" Cate called as she wandered around the room.

Another whine.

She approached the door leading outside. "Sounds like it's coming from over here. Riley?"

Yet another whimper sounded and a scratching noise.

Cate cocked her head. "Is he outside?"

She pushed the door open. The small dog sat outside, his white fur smudged with dirt. He leapt to his feet and trotted into the kitchen.

Cate stuck her hand on her hip. "Where have you been, mister?"

Mrs. Fraser pressed a hand to her chest, her face wrinkled with worry. "Oh my word, Lady Cate, I'm so sorry, he must have gotten out of the door when I was shaking the crumbs off the towel.

She turned to the small pup, her hands on her hips. "Where were you? You had your Mum and me worried sick. And look at the mess you've gotten yourself into. Now come here and I'll clean you off."

Mrs. Fraser wet a rag and bent down to clean his fur.

"Oh, here I can do it. I'm sure he was fine, most likely ran out with his bone to show Jack. The little imp gets away from me, also. As soon as he gets a whiff of Jack, he runs off to see him."

"Nay, Lady Cate, he got dirty on my watch, and I'll clean him off," she said, wiping the smudges from his fur. "There we are, good as new. Now don't you go running off on me again!" She wagged her finger at him.

Cate lifted him into her arms and tousled the fur on his head. "You'd do well to listen to her, Riley. And look, you've lost your bone somewhere. Oh, Riley, what are we going to do with you?"

The little dog gave her a yip. "Yes, I know, feed you your dinner. I guess all your romping around made you hungry."

Cate shook some kibble into his bowl before diving in on her own meal, readied by Mrs. Fraser. After a long walk to enjoy the red, purple, and gold sunset painting the moors, she curled up in the library with a folder containing information about the castle's unique history from Mrs. Campbell.

She slid the first page from the stack of photocopied newspaper articles. Her mind wound back to the mystery she'd pondered over while sitting on the banks of the loch earlier as she studied the headline: MURDER AT DUNHAVEN CASTLE.

CHAPTER 2

With a shiver, Cate chewed her lower lip as lightning tore through the sky while she re-read the sordid tale of murder at a Halloween ball hosted over a century before. Thunder rumbled in the morning sky as Cate arched an eyebrow at the gory details in the article she'd perused the evening before. Gray clouds rushed overhead, bringing a gloomy day to the highlands. Rain pelted the thick glass windows, still audible despite the thick, blue tartan drapes.

She nestled further into her blanket, curling her legs to her chest as she lounged on her sitting room's chaise.

Riley laid on the cream and blue area rug in front of the roaring fire, gnawing on another bone courtesy of Mrs. Fraser, content to stay indoors as Cate researched the castle's past.

Mrs. Campbell had warned her before passing the article along about Randolph MacKenzie's roughish reputation, but she'd never imagined this. From her research into the castle's history, she learned that he'd been born in 1827, the son of Finlay and Moira MacKenzie, and had inherited the castle in 1854 upon his father's death.

He'd married Victoria Winston four years prior and the two had produced a male heir, Ethan, born in early 1856. Renowned for her beauty, Victoria had captured the hearts of many, but Randolph's dogged pursuance wooed her into marriage and a life at Dunhaven.

Cate recalled the love letters she'd read when she first arrived at the castle from Randolph to his future wife. The language included in them hinted at the strong feelings Randolph had for the woman.

Cate had been surprised by Mrs. Campbell's tale that he'd brought back a girl from his travels abroad and locked her in the tower to attend to his baser instincts. But given the articles included in the folder, perhaps she'd been wrong.

She grabbed a notepad and pen as she scanned the article for a third time. The subtitle below the scandalous headline read "Footman to MacKenzie family found dead on the estate."

The scant article provided few details beyond the headline. Written days after the grisly discovery, the investigation remained in its infancy.

The article explained that a guest at the estate's Halloween Ball discovered the body of a young footman named Andrew Forsythe at the foot of one of the turrets. He'd fallen from a window three stories above.

However, the fall had not been the cause of his death. Instead, his skull had been crushed with a blunt object. The man sustained several other injuries prior to his post-mortem fall including bruises and scratches. The murder occurred in 1856 on October 31, All Hallows' Eve.

Cate shivered at the last detail before shuffling to the next article in the packet. This one detailed a stunning break in the case. During their investigation, police arrived at the castle, intent on searching it for the murder weapon when then-proprietor, Randolph MacKenzie, confessed to the crime. When questioned about motive, he stated he'd killed the man in a fit of jealous, drunken rage over what he perceived to be too intimate a glance at his beloved Victoria on the footman's behalf.

Investigators were stunned by the sudden turn of events, particularly since Lord MacKenzie had provided a solid alibi on the night of the murder. It had been corroborated by others.

Despite thorough questioning about the inconsistency, Randolph maintained his guilt, stating his original story was a lie but his conscience could no longer bear the guilt.

Cate glanced through the remaining articles detailing the short trial that followed the confession, the sentencing and eventual fallout. The judge sentenced Randolph to the death penalty, an almost unheard-of ruling at the time for a man of his position.

Victoria was left to raise her infant son alone, becoming a recluse until her death.

Cate sat back, studying her notes from the articles. She bit her lower lip, considering the information. Something didn't add up.

The impression she'd formed from reading the intimate letters from Randolph to Victoria didn't fit the descriptions of the man as a raving murderer.

She gathered the folder into her arms and patted Riley on the head as she darted to the door. "Be right back, buddy. I need a second opinion."

She wandered through the halls, navigating downstairs to the ballroom.

Jack stood near a ladder, unboxing lightbulbs.

"Lady Cate!" he said, as she rounded the corner and approached him. "And how are you today?"

She hid the folder behind her back, offering him a demure smile. "I'm good, how are you?"

"Well, I was fine, but you've got that mischievous look in your eye so I'm betting I won't be in a few minutes."

Cate frowned at him. "I have no such look."

He arched an eyebrow at her as he tossed a box into the trash bag at his feet. "No? Then what's that behind your back? Just some random paperwork that you happen to be carrying about?"

"Just a few articles about a former castle owner. I just wanted to get your impression on it."

"My impression, huh?" he said, eyeing her as he accepted the folder from her. He flicked it open and scanned the articles.

"Well?" she questioned as he closed the folder.

"My impression is this Randolph fellow got in a jealous rage and killed someone. Then he couldn't live with the guilt, confessed and they sentenced him to death."

Cate frowned again. "Really? It doesn't strike you as odd?"

Jack shrugged his shoulders as he tugged another lightbulb from within the package. "No? Perhaps he was a hothead or maybe his wife was having an affair. I don't find it that strange."

Cate placed the folder down, her finger rubbing her chin. "It doesn't make sense. It's all too convenient. He has an alibi then out of the blue he confesses? He leaves his beloved wife to raise his infant son alone while he rots in prison awaiting the death penalty. Why would he do that? He would have gotten away with murder by just letting his alibi stand."

“Possibly someone threatened to tell, or he didn’t expect someone in his position would get that kind of sentence. Could be any number of things, who knows?”

Cate twisted to face him, jabbing a finger in the air. “Well, Randolph knows and perhaps a few others.”

“Cate...” Jack began.

“I’m just saying maybe something else was going on there and we should check into it.”

“Caaaaaaaate,” Jack chided.

“And we have the capability to check into it. The year in the article was one of the access points that your grandfather told us about.”

Jack let his head fall between his shoulders. “CATE! Are you kidding me?”

“Come on, Jack! My ancestor was accused of murder and was put to death. What if he was innocent?”

Jack counted his points off on his fingers. “First, he confessed, he wasn’t accused of it. And second, what if he wasn’t? You’re willing to risk our lives to find out if he’s innocent?”

Cate screwed up her face. “How are we risking our lives, Jack? All I’m suggesting is that we go back and take a peek around, perhaps prevent a murder, perhaps save an innocent man’s life.”

Jack wagged a finger at her. “Do you remember, Cate, the conversation we shared with my grandfather about not changing history when we first learned about this? Because I do. What if we change history so much that one or both of us disappear? We shouldn’t be messing around with this stuff.”

“I won’t do anything that will jeopardize our lives.”

“That’s the point, Cate. You don’t know what tiny thing you might do that would jeopardize our lives, there’s a butterfly effect.”

Cate flung her arms out. “Where is your sense of adventure?”

“My sense of adventure? My sense of adventure is ordering something other than the fish and chips at the pub. Not romping around in other time periods solving murders.”

She cocked her head at him. “So, you agree the murder needs to be solved.”

Jack rolled his eyes, a playful grin on his features. “Bah, Cate. I won’t win this argument, will I?”

“Probably not. Let’s just look around at least. We have a month before the murder. We’ll see who the players are and if anything seems amiss.”

“Only that, huh?”

“Hey, I’d go myself but it’s against the rules.”

Jack rolled his eyes as he stepped up on the ladder. “Wonderful, now you’re concerned with the rules. I guess that’s something at least, you’re obeying one rule. Okay, okay. So, when do you want to go?”

Cate studied the air as she considered it. “Hmm. Well, it’s September twenty-sixth, we have a little over one month before the murder. How about Sunday? Perhaps we can take a quick peek around while most everyone in the household is at church? Get the lay of the land before we move on to trying to figure out what happened?”

“Sunday it is, I guess.”

“Excellent! Glad you agree!”

“Oh, I far from agree, I’m a conscientious objector, but I’ll do it, if only to be sure I stop you from erasing some vital part of history by accident.”

Cate rolled her eyes at him as she laughed. As a former history professor, she’d not be so cavalier as to erase a vital part of history. “You’re so dramatic.”

“Says the person who suspects a centuries-old murder, that has been solved, I might add, has some dark secret lurking in it that still needs to be solved.”

“We shall see,” Cate said. “I’ll get everything ready for Sunday! I’ll let you get back to your work.”

This time Jack rolled his eyes at her. “Fantastic, on both counts.”

Cate pressed her folder to her chest, spun on her heel and wandered away, a smile on her lips. With any luck, they’d soon find out if her ancestor was a murderer.

She climbed the massive staircase across from the front door and wove through the halls to the portrait gallery. She tugged open the heavy gold-trimmed doors and slipped inside, flicking the switch limned against the red wallpaper.

Light bloomed overhead from a series of crystal chandeliers, brightening the large hall. The portraits of the former proprietors of Dunhaven Castle hung around the room.

Cate wandered to the painting of the castle’s builder, Douglas, staring up at his sapphire blue eyes. She shared that feature, as did most of the MacKenzies. When he built the castle, did he expect it to house a murderer? Did he imagine his own grandson would be convicted of the crime?

Cate stared up at his likeness for another moment before she wandered down the line, passing the portraits of Randolph's parents before arriving at his painting.

She read the brass nameplate emblazoned with his name before she flicked her gaze upward. With unruly, dark curls topping a chiseled face, he appeared roguishly handsome. His sapphire blue eyes stared from underneath thick, bushy eyebrows.

She glanced at the portrait next to his. Victoria MacKenzie, Randolph's beloved wife and the supposed reason for the murder, stared back with dark eyes. Poised and confident, her full lips curled into a friendly smile. Her delicate features in her heart-shaped face would still be considered a gold-standard for beauty today.

Had her beauty elicited attention, unwanted or otherwise, from one Andrew Forsythe?

Cate stared up at Randolph's portrait again. "What was your story, Randolph?" she asked him.

His unmoving blue eyes stared back, providing no answers. She considered the facts again, staring at the gold chair rail that rimmed the room. Randolph MacKenzie had an alibi. Several servants had spoken with him during the time of the murder. He couldn't have done it.

He'd claimed they'd lied on his behalf. Had they? Was her ancestor a murderer? Cate shook her head. No, she couldn't believe that. She couldn't believe she'd descended from a killer.

A frown settled on her lips as she flicked her gaze back to Randolph. But what if she was wrong? Were they making a huge mistake confronting a man with a murderous rage? Would this decision cost them their lives?

CHAPTER 3

Cate shambled back to her room, lost in thought. She second-guessed her decision to return to the turbulent time. If she was wrong, they could end up in grave danger.

Still, she had to know if Randolph committed the crime or not. Something didn't make sense in the story and she was determined to prove it.

She spent the next few days making plans for their trip to 1856. She dug period-appropriate clothing from within the trunks she'd found near Victoria's love letters. She also researched as much of the family and the household as she could, making as many notes as possible about who lived there, how they fit into the family and other basic background information. She hoped to get through at least their initial visit without running into anyone, but just in case, it was better to be prepared.

She texted Jack, suggesting it may be a good idea to go over her findings before they traveled back together. He responded with a straight face emoji but suggested they include his grandfather in case he could shed any light on the situation and suggested they meet over dinner the next evening.

Cate filled the rest of her day with checking items off her to-do list for the upcoming Halloween party, finding her mind flitting to another Halloween ball held over a century earlier. Would they find out what happened that night?

Using the ruse of discussing estate business, Cate, Jack and Stanley, Jack's grandfather, met Saturday evening over dinner provided by Mrs. Fraser. She even provided Riley with another bone to replace the one he had lost.

Jack handed it to him, playfully tugging at it until Riley pulled it from his hands. "She's all yours, Riley. You're one tough little mutt!"

"Perhaps in his mind you owe him one since he lost his last one running around the yard searching for you."

Jack flicked his eyebrows up "Oh?"

"Yes," Cate answered. "Mrs. Fraser gave him one while I met with Mrs. Campbell. He disappeared with it, and we found him outside the door without his bone. He must have run out looking for you and lost his bone during his search. Did he ever find you?"

"Thursday? No, I was inside that day. I never saw him."

"Hmm, that's right. Funny he didn't realize you were in here. Oh well, at least he's got his replacement, he's happy," Cate said as they watched Riley settle on the floor, chewing his bone.

She turned her attention to the older man in the room. "It's nice to see you again, Mr. Reid."

He grinned at her. "It's always a pleasure to see you too, lassie!"

"Has Jack brought you up to speed on my request?"

"Aye. I told him all about your insane plan," Jack answered before his grandfather.

Cate shook her head at him as she poked at her stew with her fork. "It's not insane!"

She turned back to the elder Mr. Reid. "We were hoping you might have some information for us about that time period. Did you and either Mary or Gertrude travel back to that time?"

Jack waved a hand in the air. "Now, wait a minute, lassie, I want to discuss some estate business with you before you dive into this discussion and lose all sense of reality."

Cate frowned, but gave in. Since their dinner was under the ruse of estate business, Jack reviewed some estate business first to ensure their ploy was grounded in truth.

"Okay, that's done," Cate said. "Now let's move on to the fun stuff."

Jack frowned at her as he stuffed papers into the folder. "That was the fun stuff."

“Only you consider bills and business ‘fun stuff’ and not time travel.”

Jack picked up his fork, stabbing a piece of beef. “Only you consider going back to a time when people died of typhoid in their mid-thirties and indoor plumbing was nonexistent ‘fun stuff.’”

Cate jabbed a finger at him. “Hey, consider this though, if you were estate manager back then you’d have one less thing to worry about!”

Stanley chuckled at their bickering. “You two make quite the pair, don’t you?”

“Speaking of estate managers, I guess besides your ancestors, we may run into some of ours, huh?” Jack inquired.

Cate flipped open a folder containing the information she had amassed on the topic. “Yes. I charted your family tree. Your great-great-great-grandfather, Malcolm Reid, was the estate manager under Randolph MacKenzie. It would be him we’d have the chance to meet. Malcolm and Randolph grew up together before Malcom became Randolph’s estate manager.”

She pulled out a small drawing of a family tree and placed it in front of him.

Jack perused the drawing. “Wow, look at you with our family tree! Take a look, Pap! She’s got us all mapped out.”

“Aye, she has,” Stanley answered. “And it looks about right to me. Well done, Lady Cate, well done!”

Cate beamed. “It took a little work, but I was able to track everything down through household documents and some information that you gave me, Mr. Reid. You are a wealth of information!”

“Yeah, he is,” Jack agreed. “If I’m lucky he’ll even have enough to stave off your crazy plan.”

“Crazy plan?” Jack’s grandfather questioned.

Mr. Reid glanced in the air, a smile on his face. “Ah, time traveling, what a rush that was.”

Jack waved a hand at him. “Bah, don’t feed into her, you’ll only make her worse.”

“So, tell me this crazy plan you’ve got, Lady Cate!” Mr. Reid said.

“Isla Campbell gave me a few articles from around the year 1856, one of the time periods that we can travel to, which makes them intriguing to begin with. But what makes them even more intriguing is the tale of murder that I read.”

He nodded at the statement as he sipped at his ale. “Oh, aye, you mean the murder of that servant by Lord MacKenzie.”

Cate pointed a finger at him. “Right. That’s the story I mean, but I’m not convinced Lord MacKenzie murdered that man. Hence my desire to time travel. I want to investigate.”

“You think he’s innocent?” Mr. Reid asked.

“That she does, Pap, and she’s dead set on proving it, too.”

“What makes you think that, lassie?”

Cate shrugged, pushing a carrot around in the stew juice. “A hunch. It doesn’t add up. He first says he’s innocent, he has a solid alibi, then out of the blue and in a complete reversal. He confesses to the murder and is sentenced to prison, leaving behind his infant son and beloved wife. It just doesn’t make sense.”

Jack’s grandfather considered the information.

“Well?” Jack prodded.

The older man shrugged. “Well, she’s got a point.”

Jack screwed up his face. “Hey, whose side are you on?”

He grinned at his grandson, poking at a carrot. “I’ve been the voice of reason long enough, laddie, I’m retired! Now I can voice my opinion. And the lassie has a point.”

“Isn’t it more probable that old Randolph’s guilt got to him, and he confessed rather than live with it?” Jack questioned.

“What about his alibi?”

“Someone lied to protect him?” Jack answered in the form of a question.

Cate raised her eyebrows as she wiped her hands on her napkin. “More than one someone, several people saw him.”

Cate rolled her eyes at him. “I guess we’ll find out.”

Jack shot his grandfather a pleading glance. The older man shrugged his shoulders at him. “It’s your show now, Jackie. Yours and Cate’s.”

Jack sighed, rolling his eyes. “Some help you are.”

“Do you know anything else about this story, Mr. Reid?” Cate queried.

Stanley Reid glanced into the air above him, as if searching for an answer. “Not much more than you summarized earlier. Lady Mary and I traveled to that time. They had many a great party on the estate before Randolph's trouble. Lady Victoria was quite the entertainer! I don't know any facts about this though, we didn't speak with Randolph about it, nor did we do any investigating of our own."

Cate wiggled her eyebrows at Jack. "Well, it looks like it's up to us to do some investigating!"

Jack shrugged his shoulders at her, shoving his tray to the side. "Guess I'm not talking you out of it, huh?"

"Nope."

He glanced at his grandfather, poking his fork in the man's direction. "And I guess you're not going to talk any sense into her?"

The older man burst into laughter. "To quote the lady, 'nope.'"

Jack held up his hands in defeat. "Ahhhh, well okay then, let's get on with the history lesson so I know the players. Malcolm was the estate manager for Randolph MacKenzie, you said?"

Cate pushed her tray aside, pulling her research materials closer. "Right, and Randolph was the son of Finlay and Moira MacKenzie, grandson of Douglas, who built the castle and discovered the time travel anomaly. The concept was probably still novel to them."

"Anything that we should know about Randolph except that he's a crazy murderer?"

Cate batted him playfully. "Hey! That's my ancestor you're slandering there! And, yes, Randolph had quite the reputation before the murder."

Jack sipped at his ale. "How so?"

"Womanizer," Mr. Reid chimed in.

"Yes, according to Mrs. Campbell, Randolph garnered quite the reputation. He spent a good bit of time overseas and the rumor was that he brought home a young woman with him. The rumor is he kept her in the tower room to satisfy his 'more base desires' in the words of Mrs. Campbell," Cate explained.

"Any record of the girl existing?" Jack asked.

Cate shook her head and lifted her shoulders in a shrug. "None that I've found so far."

"So possibly just some tall tales from the village."

"It could be, but there's usually some truth in a rumor, some reason that started it."

“Most likely an old big-mouthed biddy like Mrs. Campbell,” Jack quipped.

Cate scowled at him. “She isn’t that bad!”

“If you say so. Okay, so who else are we trying to avoid?”

Cate shot him an unimpressed glance and groaned. “Funny. Also in the household was Victoria, Randolph’s wife.”

“Anything of note about Victoria?”

“Victoria MacKenzie, née Winston, was from a well-known and powerful English family. She was also a countess, so she made a lateral move marrying Randolph, although some would have said she stepped down because she moved out of English aristocracy settling for a Scottish lord rather than an English one.”

Jack stared straight ahead, then let his head drop to his chest, feigning snoring.

“Okay, okay, I get it, here’s the juicy bit,” Cate said, rolling her eyes. “Victoria had no shortage of suitors. Her family was not only wealthy and powerful, but she was renowned for her beauty throughout England.”

Mr. Reid flicked his gaze between the two of them, a twinkle in his eye. “Aye, she was a real beauty, that one!”

“So, what made the beautiful Victoria leave the English high society for Scotland?” Jack asked.

“She moved to Scotland and married Randolph because he spent countless months wooing her. He wrote her letters, poems, sonnets. He visited daily when he was within her vicinity. Even if she refused to see him, he’d leave her a love note and come right back the next day.”

“It did,” Cate said with a nod, “she eventually succumbed to his considerable charm and married him. They had a son, Ethan, in the same year that the murder occurred. He was only nine months old.”

“So, when did he bring this supposed girl back?” Jack questioned.

“The rumor mill said he brought her back from his honeymoon,” Mr. Reid answered.

Jack threw his arms in the air. “What? Oh, come on, he was so in love with the beautiful Victoria that he brought back another woman from his honeymoon?”

“Yes, it seems rather quick that he tired of her when he was so persistent, right?” Cate said.

“Which makes me think that rumor is just that, a rumor.”

Cate raised her eyebrows, an innocent look on her features. “I guess we could find out tomorrow, take a swing by the old tower room and check.”

“Caaaaaaaate,” Jack admonished.

Cate held her hands up in defeat. “Okay, okay, we won’t go into the tower room tomorrow.”

Jack wrinkled his nose at her. “Anyone else?”

Cate tapped her family tree, indicating another name. “Yes, Randolph had a ne’er-do-well brother that hung around the house many times. His name was Lorne. He wasn’t a permanent resident at the castle. He would check in at times with a random woman.”

“Perhaps he brought the tower girl?”

“No, that rumor was definitely about Randolph. Lorne seemed like the type that wouldn’t bother hiding a girl in the tower room. He had numerous affairs none of which he kept secret. Other than those three, a random girl that Lorne brought home, and the staff, there shouldn’t have been anyone else at the castle in those days. Randolph and Lorne had a sister, but she died of influenza when she was only fifteen.”

“How did you find this information?”

“Various sources, some from the letters Victoria kept from Randolph, some from letters they wrote when he was in prison. Others from my book research, local legends, family histories, et cetera.”

“Good work, Cate. Now, I think we need a few ground rules and a backstory, in case we run into someone.”

Cate crinkled her nose. “Rules?”

“Yes, rules. Rule one: we’re only going to look around. YOUR words,” Jack said as Cate opened her mouth to protest. “IF, and this is an enormous IF, we discover anything amiss, we return. Upon our return, we will discuss how to proceed, if at all. Agreed?”

Cate heaved a sigh. “Okay, fine. I agreed to just get the lay of the land, so that’s what we’ll do tomorrow.”

“And if someone catches us, what’s the backstory?”

“Backstory?”

“Who are we? Why we’re there? You can’t very well say ‘Hello, I’m Cate Kensie, I’m a time-traveling history professor and this is my friend, Jack. Mind if we have a look-see?’”

Mr. Reid chuckled at the conversation.

Cate threw her hands in the air as she shrugged. “Wandered in by accident?”

Jack made a face. “I don’t think that will work.”

“We could say we’re some distant cousin. Families traveled all the time to stay with each other, often they arrived without notice because correspondence was delayed or lost.”

“Okay, so I’m some kind of distant cousin to the MacKenzies?” Jack asked.

“Well, both of us.”

“Both of us? That makes no sense.”

“Why not? We could be siblings.”

“I could try a Scottish accent, mate,” Cate said in her best imitation of Jack’s accent.

Jack glanced at his grandfather before both burst with laughter. “Do you want to get us caught?”

Cate crinkled her forehead, a dejected expression on her lips. “I thought that was passable.”

Jack continued to chuckle, wiping the tears that had fallen from his eyes. “Lassie, you couldn’t pass for Scottish with that accent if you dressed head to toe in tartan, carried bagpipes and had your clan crest tattooed on your forehead.”

Still laughing, too, Jack’s grandfather agreed. “Aye, lassie, that’s terrible.”

Cate rolled her eyes. “Okay, smarty pants, how do we explain me then.”

“Ah, my wife?”

Cate frowned.

“Hey,” Jack said, sipping at his ale, “I saw that. I’m quite a catch, I’ll have you know. Besides, it would make sense why you’re American then and why we are together.”

“Yes,” Cate agreed. “It wouldn’t be very proper if I was running around the Scottish countryside with a man.”

Jack let out another loud laugh. “Nay, they’d think you’re one of Lorne’s girls.”

“Okay, so there we are. We are the MacKenzies, distant cousins to Randolph in for a visit. Didn’t you get our letter?” Cate feigned a shocked look.

“And the Emmy goes to... Well, I guess we have everything then. Looks like we’re ready to travel to 1856, or at least as ready as we’ll ever be.”

“I suppose I’ll need to dig up a fake wedding ring, but other than that we’re ready!” Cate said, raising her glass in a toast.

“Good luck to you two. Can I get a copy of this family tree? You’ve got it so neatly written,” Mr. Reid asked, admiring the lineage.

“Sure! I’ll make a copy for you now.”

“All right, I will see you tomorrow then, bright and early,” Jack said once she passed the warm paper off to his grandfather.

“Great! Okay, let’s say good night to Jack, Riley!” Cate said, turning to scoop up the little dog. “Riley?” she said, not finding him.

She turned, making a concerned face to Jack. “RILEY!” she called again, as she climbed to her feet and began looking around the room. Both the little dog and his bone were gone.

CHAPTER 4

Cate glanced around the room, her heart skipping a beat. Where had the little dog gone? He'd just been with them moments ago. They'd gotten carried away with their discussion about their trip to the past and he'd disappeared.

Jack pointed to the open doors leading into the hallway. "Perhaps he went to thank Mrs. Fraser."

Cate cocked her head and shrugged. "Well, one way to find out, we'll take our plates down and see if he's there or if we can find him anywhere along the way."

Stanley shoved his hands in his pockets and plopped into the chair. "I'll wait here," Mr. Reid joked. "You won't get me to walk the length of this castle!"

The pair gathered up their dishes and made their way to the kitchen. No traces of Riley existed along the way. Cate hurried into the kitchen, finding Mrs. Fraser washing a pot.

"Have you seen Riley?" she asked as she slid her tray onto the counter.

"Nay, I haven't seen the little pup," Mrs. Fraser said, wiping her hands on her apron as she spun to face them.

Cate bit her lower lip, her shoulders slumping. "It's odd for him not to come when he's called though."

Jack dumped his dishes into the sink and stacked the trays on the shelf above the counter. "We'll look around the house. He couldn't have gotten far, and we know he wasn't along the way here. I'll grab some flashlights."

Jack ducked into the pantry, grabbing two flashlights and flicking them on to check the light.

A whine echoed throughout the kitchen.

Cate leapt from her seat at the table. "Wait, listen! I hear him crying. It sounds like..."

"He's outside the door again," Mrs. Fraser chimed in, finishing her sentence.

She ran to the door and pushed it open. "Ah, here he is, Lady Cate. How did you get outside, you little bugger?"

The small dog scampered inside, his tongue lolling.

"RILEY!" Cate exclaimed. "Why do you keep running outside?"

"Perhaps he's burying his bone?" Mr. Fraser suggested.

Cate cocked her head as she studied his fur. "Maybe. He is a little dirty."

"Ah, that must be it, mystery solved!" Jack said as he returned the flashlights. "I'm glad he's back."

"As am I," Mrs. Fraser said. "You need to stop worrying your mum! Well, is there anything else you need, Lady Cate?"

"No, nothing, sorry for the commotion. See everyone Monday! Enjoy your day off."

They all said their good nights and went their separate ways. Cate climbed the two levels to her bedroom, preparing for a sleepless night. She was sure she wouldn't be able to get any rest with the upcoming trip tomorrow.

She rose before the sun, pacing her bedroom floor in nervous anticipation of her time travel trip. The sun rose over the moors, painting them in a colorful display, as she wandered the paths outside with Riley.

After a hastily eaten breakfast, she returned to her suite to work on styling her hair in an acceptable fashion for the 1850s. After working her long, brown strands into an updo, she stared at the dress she'd set out.

With a wrinkled nose, she began tugging it on, contorting her body to fasten it to the best of her ability. When she finished, she smoothed out the skirt as she stared in the mirror.

After a few finishing touches, she spun to face the small dog lounging in his bed.

"Well, Riley, what do you think? Would I pass for a nineteenth-century lady?"

Riley cocked his head at the question as though considering it.

Cate sucked in a breath, glancing at the timepiece hanging around her neck. Jack should be arriving any moment. She locked the door to her suite with Riley inside so he couldn't wander the castle while she was gone.

She hurried through the halls, carrying her skirts awkwardly and waddled down the stairs. She hoped they didn't run into anyone in the past. She'd never be able to run from them in this getup.

Jack pushed through the front door as her feet hit the marbled entryway floor. "Thought I'd let myself in the front door since I'm a MacKenzie now," he said, dressed in his nineteenth century garb.

"Funny. The clothes worked well," she said, eyeing him up and down.

Jack fiddled with his collar. "I'm not so sure about that, although, I think you look nice in your dress."

Cate curtsied dramatically, bursting into a chuckle. "Why thank you, kind sir!"

"Boy, are these uncomfortable," Jack said, pulling on his sleeves. "I'm glad I live in this century."

Cate smiled, holding in a laugh as she pressed a hand against her corset. "Mine aren't much better. Okay, ready to go?"

"No, but I don't think I've got a choice."

Cate started up the stairs, toddling slowly in her dress. "You haven't, come on!"

Jack caught up to her quickly, eyeing her sideways as they climbed. "Wow, so there is something that can slow down the great Catherine Kensie."

Cate sucked in a few deep breaths as she lugged the extra fabric up the massive staircase. "Yes, this dress is not comfortable, let me tell you. It weighs a ton! I'll have no trouble sleeping tonight after all the exercise from lugging this weight around."

They reached the bedroom containing the time rip leading to 1856 and slipped into the closet.

Cate held out the timepiece and eyed Jack before breathing in a deep breath. "Okay, let's do this!"

Jack placed his hand over hers and together they rubbed the watch. The second hand began its characteristic slowing down, ticking slower and slower until its movement became imperceptible.

As the watch ticked the present-day time away on its slowed cycle, they glanced around.

“Guess we made it,” Cate said.

Jack tugged at his collar again and swiped at a bead of sweat on his brow. “Guess so.”

Cate started for the closet door, closed in this time period. “Okay, well, let’s go explore.”

Jack grabbed her elbow and tugged her back a step. “Wait a minute, Cate.”

“What?” she said, holding her hands up and shrugging her shoulders.

He shoved her behind him and crept to the door. “At least let me check everything out before we plow out into the house.”

“My hope is everyone will be at Sunday services for the morning, including the servants. That should make it easy to sneak around the house,” Cate said.

He cracked the door open a slit and glanced into the outer room. Spotting nothing, he pulled the door open and stepped out, scanning the room again. Cate followed behind him.

They crept to the door leading to the hallway. Jack inched it open, peering through the crack into the hallway.

Cate placed a hand on his shoulder, lowering her voice to a whisper. “Well?”

“Coast’s clear for the moment,” he whispered.

Cate skirted past him and pushed through the door into the hallway. “Okay, let’s go!”

With a roll of his eyes, he followed her. “What are we looking around for, Cate?”

“Anything that gives us some information about Randolph and company, like journals or handwritten notes. Anything that can shed some information on the stories that surrounded Randolph and the castle in Randolph’s time.”

Jack hurried down the hall to keep up with Cate’s pace. “And where do you propose we search for this?”

With her skirts lifted, Cate bustled down the back stairs. “I thought we’d start in the office. All his correspondence is likely there. We can rifle through the desk.”

They wound through the halls to the office, pushing inside. Cate hurried to the paper-covered desk. She scanned the disorganized mess, discovering nothing of interest.

“Jack,” Cate whispered.

Jack twisted from his post at the door. “Yeah?”

She pointed toward a pile of files on top of an old-fashioned filing cabinet. “Check in those files over there for anything that might be of interest.”

Jack strode over to peruse the files as Cate dug through the desk drawers.

After searching each drawer, Cate joined Jack at the file cabinet. “Anything?”

“Only employment records and investments and so on, nothing that would shed any light on your mystery. How about you?”

Cate held out her empty hands. “Nothing.”

Jack nodded and grabbed her hand. “Okay, let’s head back.”

She tugged away from him. “Wait a minute. There are more places to check.”

Jack screwed up his face and shook his head. “Such as? I don’t like gallivanting around here.”

“We still should have time. They should still be at Sunday services. Let’s check Victoria’s bedroom.”

Jack grumbled as he followed Cate upstairs into a hall of bedrooms. After checking a few bedrooms, they identified the one Victoria inhabited. Cate scanned her desk and wardrobe, coming up with no clues.

She flipped through the journal in the top of the woman’s desk drawer, but, since the birth of her son, she had written little.

Jack twisted from his post at the door. “Okay, Cate, fun’s over, let’s go.”

Cate plodded back toward the 1850s bedroom. She paused at the entrance to the winding staircase to the tower.

“Cate, let’s go!” Jack hissed as she hesitated.

She didn’t respond, staring up the curving stairway that stretched between the stone walls. She closed her eyes for a moment and pictured the door at the top, knowing it waited around the bend.

“Cate, no. No way!”

Cate stared up the stone steps, her jaw set. “But this is why we came!”

Jack curled his fingers into fists, thrusting it in the air to emphasize his point. “No, Cate. It’s too dangerous.”

Cate twisted to face him, lifting her shoulders to her ears. “How is it dangerous?”

Jack waved a hand up the stairs. “What if someone is in there? What do you propose we do, Cate? Open the door and introduce ourselves?”

Cate shook her head. “No, of course not, but we could listen at the door and determine if it sounds like someone is in there. If there’re any signs it’s inhabited.”

Jack squeezed his eyes shut and scratched his forehead. “Let’s go home.”

Cate set one foot on the stairs leading up. “Oh, come on, one little listen and we can go, I promise.” She charged up the stairs without waiting for a response.

Jack hesitated at the foot of the staircase. “Cate? Wait! Damn it!” He charged up the stairs after her.

She reached the top of the stairs and let her skirt cascade to the floor as she pressed her ear against the door.

Jack met her there moments later, puffing with exertion after his run up the steps. “Well? Do you hear any signs of life?”

Cate’s brow furrowed and she pressed harder against the wood surface, straining to listen. After a moment, she squeezed her lips together and pulled away, staring at the door with a scowl. “No.”

Jack raised his eyebrows, snapping his fingers together in a faux display of disappointment. “Really? Aw shucks. Okay, let’s go.”

Cate pouted at him, her lower lip jutting out as she shot another glance at the door.

Jack cocked his head at her, a stern expression on his features. “Come on, you promised.”

She slumped her shoulders and sighed. “Okay.”

They spun and began their return journey down the stairs. After a few steps, Jack stopped dead. His arm jutted out, blocking Cate’s forward motion.

She squashed her eyebrows together, shooting him a questioning glance. “What is it?”

He pressed a finger to his lips before miming that he heard footsteps. Within seconds, Cate heard them, too. They clicked off the stone steps below them, closing in on their location.

Cate’s heart thudded against her ribs and heat washed over her. Her pulse quickened as she gnawed her lower lip to stop it from trembling. Her knees wobbled underneath her as the footsteps closed in on them.

They were trapped and soon to be discovered.

CHAPTER 5

Cate's knees wobbled underneath her as the footsteps pounded toward them. With a shaky hand, she clutched Jack's arm, offering him a wide-eyed and panicked stare.

Jack poked a finger toward a door a few steps away. Cate nodded, pulling a skeleton key from within her dress pocket.

He snatched it from her hand and raced down the few steps, sliding it into the lock and shoving the door open.

Cate hurried behind him, and Jack pushed her inside before slipping into the darkened, windowless space. He eased the door shut moments before the footsteps rounded the bend and approached their hiding spot.

They held their breath, pressed against the door as the footsteps passed them, continuing up toward the tower room.

Cate tapped Jack's arm and balanced on her tiptoes, whispering in his ear. "Open the door."

Jack whispered back a vehement, "No!"

Cate patted his arm again. "Open it!" she hissed.

With a huff, he twisted the knob and eased the door open a crack.

The pair stared out the small opening, training their view on the tower room door.

The figure of a man hovered a step below the wooden barrier, fiddling with a set of keys as he balanced a tray in his hand. Cate shifted her gaze, squinting at the contents of the tray. A plate and teacup sat on top.

After selecting a key from the ring, the man twisted to glance down the stairs.

They shrank back as he glanced over his shoulder. Cate gasped, clamping a hand over her mouth to quiet any noise.

“Who is that?” Jack whispered, studying the man’s features. Thick, dark, unruly hair topped an angular, chiseled face. Thick eyebrows shrouded his dark, deep-set eyes as they studied the stone stairs.

“That,” Cate whispered back, one eyebrow arched, “is Randolph MacKenzie.”

The man twisted the key in the lock and pushed into the tower room.

As the door at the top clicked closed, Jack risked opening their door further. “We better make a run for it.”

Cate whisked past him, dashing down the stairs as quickly as her dress would allow her.

Jack followed her and the two raced back to the bedroom.

With their hearts pounding and gasping for breath, they pushed the door closed behind them.

Jack grabbed Cate’s hand and pulled her toward the closet. “Let’s go home.”

Without a word, Cate produced the timepiece, and the two grabbed hold of it, rubbing it until it started its cycle of speeding up. Within moments, the timepiece was back to normal speed.

Jack let out a long breath. “Oh, thank God,” he said, running his hands through his hair then doubling over to rest them on his thighs.

Cate blew out a sigh of relief. “Close call.”

Jack flicked his gaze up at her. “Too close.”

She raised her eyebrows at him as she bit her lower lip. “But well worth it.”

Jack straightened, his brow furrowed. “How do you figure that?”

She cocked her head at him, her hands on her hips. “We have the answer to one of our questions.”

Jack screwed up his face.

“Randolph MacKenzie is most definitely keeping someone in the tower room.”

Jack groaned and ran his fingers through his hair. “A fine time for him to be visiting that person too, when he’s supposed to be at church service.”

“He must have stayed home to visit her. What better time to do so? The entire household, including his wife, is away.”

Jack loosened his collar, shooting a glance at Cate. “Well, are you satisfied?” Jack said, loosening his collar.

She offered him an incredulous stare and shook her head. “Not in the slightest, the mystery deepens! So, we’ve established he’s got someone in that tower. Why? And who?”

“Most likely a girl like the town gossips said.”

Cate paced a few steps away, her finger tapping her lips.

“Caaaaaaaate,” Jack chided.

“I need to do more research before...” Cate began.

“Before you give up?” Jack asked, hope filling his voice.

She waved a hand in the air to dismiss his notion. “No, before we go back.”

Jack’s shoulders slumped. “I was afraid you’d say that.”

“Look on the bright side, Jack.”

“What’s that?”

“You get to put off going back until I’m done researching all I can about this mysterious tower room tenant.”

Jack rolled his eyes for the umpteenth time, hands on his hips.

Cate flashed a smile at him. “Well, I am going to change, I’ve got my work cut out for me today!”

“I’d say good luck, but I’m almost hoping you find nothing.”

Cate pushed through the door of the closet, calling over her shoulder, “You should know me better than that, I’ll keep digging until I do.”

Jack shook his head, but smiled in spite of himself. “Yeah. Yeah, I know you will. So, I’ll have to hope that you have to dig forever so I can stay in my favorite time period: my own. I’ll see you tomorrow, Cate.”

“See you tomorrow, Jack. Enjoy the rest of your day off.”

Jack stared down the hall toward the main staircase.

Cate called after him, “Oh, and Jack?”

“Yeah?” he said, twisting to face her.

She offered him a genuine smile. “Thanks, I appreciate your help.”

“No problem, lassie, no problem.”

She returned to her room, finding an impatient Riley on the opposite side. “Hey buddy, why the long face? I wasn’t that long!”

Riley issued a small whine in response to her question. “Okay, okay, I get it. You didn’t have a proper walk today. I’ll tell you what, as soon as I get changed, I’ll take you for a walk.” Riley gave another whine then a yip.

She tugged at the laces on her dress. “I’m going as fast as I can. I’m not walking you in this!”

She changed as quickly as the clothes allowed her, setting the dress aside and scooping Riley into her arms. She wandered through the halls to the kitchen, slipping on her boots and headed into the cool autumn air.

“Where do you want to explore today, Riley?” she asked, as she set him down on the grass.

Riley raced away from her, darting around the side of the castle.

“Whoa, buddy! Wait up!” Cate called as she dashed to keep up with him.

As she rounded the corner, she spotted the little pup dash into a clump of hedges in the side garden, disappearing from sight.

She followed him into the garden, trying but failing to keep up. As she emerged from the garden, she scanned the rolling hills but saw no Riley. She called him several times, but the little dog did not come.

Cate frowned at the dog’s disappearance. He typically stayed close during their walks, enjoying a game of fetch with his favorite ball. Today, he’d not even demanded one toss before he’d run off. Had he caught the scent of a small animal and run off to chase it?

Cate shielded her eyes against the autumn sun. “Riley! Riley!”

She called a few more times before a small yip sounded to her right. She snapped her head in the direction of the sound, calling his name again. She took a few steps forward, cresting a hill.

The small dog milled around near a folly on the property. Cate’s shoulders slumped as she breathed out a sigh of relief and hurried down the hill toward it.

“And what is so interesting about this folly today, Riley, that you didn’t come when I called you?” she asked in a stern voice, her hands on her hips.

Riley glanced up at her, his dark almond eyes considering her question. Within a moment, he returned to milling around the outside, sniffing the ground. He stopped a few times and glanced toward the interior of the folly, his nose wiggling, but never ventured in.

She tugged the ball from her pocket and waved it in the air. “All right, Riley, let’s move on. How about we play some fetch?”

At the last word, Riley's ears perked, and he stared up at her, catching sight of the little ball she held in her hands.

She laughed, her eyebrows wiggling at him. "I figured that might get your attention."

She tossed the ball down the path. Riley chased after it, scooping it up into his mouth and waited for her to close the gap between them before dropping the ball at her feet for another round.

They continued their game until they reached the loch. Cate settled onto the bank as Riley curled next to her, resting his chin on her leg.

Cate lay back on her elbows. The trees danced in the autumn breeze and the wind rippled the pond. She caught sight of the tower's reflection in the choppy water. Her mind regressed to over a century earlier.

It appeared Randolph had someone in the tower room, but who and for what purpose? Were the stories about him true?

Cate pursed her lips, refusing to believe that was the case. Jack would argue Randolph was the cad everyone imagined him to be, but she couldn't shake the notion that there was more to this story than met the eye.

She would need to search for more information. The tower room topped her list. She'd been in the room once before when she'd sorted through her predecessor's personal items. A shiver ran through her as she recalled being locked inside for a few moments. In reality, she'd merely time-traveled to an era when the door had been locked.

Was the time rip in the tower the source of Randolph's preoccupation with the room? It was a possibility. If he knew of the time rip in that location, perhaps he used it to time travel while alone in the house.

But why the food, her mind questioned. A quick snack after he returned? Perhaps time travel left him famished. Cate chuckled at the latest supposition. As her theories bordered on ridiculous, she gathered the pup into her arms for the return trip to the castle.

"What do you say, Riley? Shall we head back for some lunch and investigating?"

Riley let his eyes slide closed with a big sigh as she cradled him.

"You're a lazy boy."

The comment elicited a wriggle from him, his eyes popping open and his nose sniffing the air. She set him down, allowing him to investigate their path back.

“That should tire you out for a while,” she said as they pushed into the kitchen.

She checked her timepiece after making and eating her lunch. She considered climbing the tower room at the later-than-expected afternoon hour.

She recalled her earlier experience in the room and the sudden appearance of Randolph MacKenzie. Alone in the castle, she preferred not to wander to the room for any exploration.

She’d put off any investigations until tomorrow, camping out on her chaise with a movie instead.

As the sun crested the moors outside her bedroom window, Cate yawned and stretched. The warm glow of the bright sun painted the morning sky brilliant shades of orange, yellow and red, casting the scenery below in a rosy light.

“Another beautiful morning, Riley,” Cate said to the pup as she tugged on her riding boots.

After a quick trip outside, she headed to the kitchen for her weekly breakfast with her staff. Gathering together on Monday mornings, they’d share conversation about their weekends and upcoming week.

Cate looked forward to the get-together, despite it having shocked Mrs. Fraser the first time she’d requested it. Now, though, even Emily Fraser enjoyed the shared mealtime.

“Good morning, Mrs. Fraser,” Cate said as she entered the kitchen with Riley trailing behind her.

“Well, good morning, Lady Cate. And good morning little Riley! I hope you got lots of rest this weekend!” Mrs. Fraser said, patting the little dog’s head.

“He sure did,” Cate answered for him. “Lots of playtime and lots of naptime. Where are our intrepid groundskeepers this morning?”

“Getting a few tools ready for the day while they wait on breakfast. Wanted to get an early start on their work. My Charlie is fussing to no end about having these old grounds just so for your big party.”

Cate shook some kibble into Riley's bowl before she set it down in front of the little dog. "Oh, I appreciate that, but the grounds are always above par in my estimation."

"Well, I appreciate hearing that, Lady Cate, and I know Charlie will too, but," she said, holding up her hands, "when he gets something in his mind there's no stopping him."

Cate chuckled as she returned the bag of food to the pantry, grabbing a few dried fruits from the shelves. "I know that feeling well."

"Darn right she does," Jack said, catching the tail end of the conversation as he pushed through the kitchen door with Charlie Fraser. "Good morning, Lady Cate. And where, oh where is my good friend, Sir Riley?"

Riley dashed to him, standing on his hind legs and waving his paw at Jack.

Jack picked up the small dog and tousled the fur on his head. "Oh, there he is, and how are you today, little laddie?" He leaned his head closer to the dog's mouth. "Oh, what's that? Hungry, did you say?"

"Good morning, Jack and Mr. Fraser. He can't be. He just scarfed down an entire bowl of food!"

She pulled a bowl down from the cupboard and shook some raisins into it before returning the bag to the pantry and grabbing a few treats for Riley.

After tossing the dog his tiny bones, they sat down at the table to eat.

"So, Mr. Fraser, I hear you have quite the vision for the castle's exterior for the party," Cate said with a wink.

Mr. Fraser nodded at her as he stirred brown sugar into his oatmeal. "Aye, I do, Lady Cate. It's been a long while since we've had proper guests on the estate. She's got to be in tip-top shape."

"Speaking of, that reminds me, Cate," Jack chimed in. "I'll have a few additional jobs for the lawn service the week of the party. I want the grounds to be perfect for the party."

Cate scooped up a spoonful of oatmeal. "Sounds good. Whatever you think we need."

"Lady Cate?" Mr. Fraser asked.

"Yes?"

"I had a... a..." He stammered. "A vision I guess you might call it for the outside, I was hoping to get your approval on it."

A smile brightened Cate's face. "I'm all ears."

He set his spoon in his half-empty bowl and leaned forward. “Well, if I’m not mistaken, there are some old family banners hidden away in the old servant’s quarters. The kind that used to hang on the castle to announce the clan for miles around. I thought it would be just wonderful to hang them again.”

Cate’s eyes lit up at the idea. “Oh, that sounds great. I bet that would look nice, especially given the party’s theme.”

“And,” he continued, sitting straighter in his chair, encouraged by Cate’s acceptance of his ideas, “the garden that’s accessible from the ballroom, wouldn’t it be lovely to have lights strung all the way around? We could open the doors to the garden if it’s a nice enough evening to allow the guests to wander back and forth between the inside and outside. Adding a few tables could incorporate the garden into the event. My cousin owns a rental business with just such lights so we’d have no problem getting what we need, assuming you like the idea, Lady Cate.”

Cate nodded as he spoke. “I think it sounds marvelous. Incorporating the lighted garden into the party is enchanting. It’ll seem magical.”

Mr. Fraser dropped his eyes to the table with a smile, proud of his accomplishment. “Why, thank you, Lady Cate.”

“I didn’t realize you were such a party-planning pro, Mr. Fraser. I should have been inviting you to my meetings with Mrs. Campbell,” Cate said.

The man’s eyes went wide and he shook his head. “If it’s all the same to you, Lady Cate, I’ll let you do the talking to her.”

Cate smirked at his immediate response. Neither of the Frasers cared for Isla Campbell. She couldn’t blame them. The woman was an insatiable gossip. And she would be one of the first sources on her list for researching her tower mystery. If anyone wanted to spill any rumors, no matter how unsubstantiated, about what went on in the tower room in the 1850s, it would be the town crier herself, Mrs. Campbell.

“I will relay your plans at our next meeting on Wednesday. I’m sure she’ll be thrilled to hear what you’re planning,” Cate said.

Mrs. Fraser gave a huff, insinuating nothing that simple could ever thrill that woman. Cate held in a giggle. They finished their meal making other light conversation about the party preparation. After breakfast, Cate stayed for a quick cup of tea, or cuppa, as they referred to it here, with Mrs. Fraser before taking Riley for his long walk around the grounds.

After lunch, Cate left a tuckered-out Riley napping in the library and climbed the many stairs to the tower.

Her heart thudded as she hovered outside the door, recalling their escapade in 1856. On this trip, she shouldn't run across anyone. But would she find any clues as to Randolph's interest in the room?

She slid her key into the lock and pushed open the door. She swallowed hard as she pondered what had happened in the room over one hundred years ago.

Had her ancestor bludgeoned a man to death and then threw him from the tower? And would she find any evidence of the crime?

Her stomach turned over and her nose wrinkled as she considered the tale of the woman locked here.

Now, the elevated space contained boxes of her predecessor's personal things. Reluctant to discard them, Cate left them littering the space to deal with later.

She sighed as she stared at the mess. At least she knew where she didn't need to check. She eyed the large wardrobe standing against the far wall. Maybe it held a clue to the murder or the woman. She'd have to fight her way to it, shifting boxes away from its front to reach it.

Before she did that, she'd examine the walls. Perhaps she'd find a clue there. She ran her fingers over the rough stone, scanning it. Scraps and dings existed in various areas but not significant indicating an altercation.

With a sigh, she eyed the boxes again. Beyond finding the words "HELP ME" carved into the stone like in a gothic novel, she didn't know what she'd expected to find in her examination of the walls.

She stared at the large furniture piece behind the cardboard mountain. She spun sideways, trying to shimmy between the boxes to reach the wardrobe. With a wince, she tried to shove her hip past the tight space, finding it impossible.

Her shoulders slumped as she realized she'd have to move the boxes away from the wardrobe in order to search it.

She considered enlisting Jack's help, but decided to dig in, realizing six months ago when she didn't have staff she'd have moved the stack of boxes on her own without hesitation.

After thirty minutes of hard work, Cate wiped the sweat from her brow and patted herself on the back for a job well done. She stared at the now accessible wardrobe with a smile.

The hinges creaked as she pulled open the heavy wooden doors. She peered inside, her smile fading as she found it empty. She toggled on her cell phone's flashlight and swung it around the corners. Nothing but cobwebs graced the inside. She swiped her finger along the bottom, swiping away the dust that covered the wooden shelf.

As she traced the message "dust me," her fingertip hit a groove in the wood. She flicked on the cell phone's flashlight and studied it, spotting a faint line.

With a large breath, she blew away the dust, her fingernail tracing the small crack. She followed the edge, finding that it formed a small rectangle.

Could it be a compartment?

She pressed her fingers against the box and tried to slide the wood forward, backward, or side-to-side. It wouldn't budge.

She tugged the drawer open underneath it, peering up at the box from the underside. She stuck her hand inside, blindly feeling around, but could not detect anything.

With a sigh, she shoved the drawer shut and returned to trying to pry the wood open with her fingernail. She sat back on her haunches, blowing a lock of hair from her face as she stared at the potential compartment.

Perhaps a mechanism somewhere on the wardrobe triggered the secret compartment. She pushed against the box, hoping it was spring-loaded. She felt around the area near the box, pressing around. Nothing. She tried pushing and pulling the decorative elements on the wardrobe. Nothing triggered the little box.

With her jaw set, she vowed to get it open by brute force if necessary. She picked herself up off the floor and hurried through the halls to the library.

Riley entertained himself chewing on a stuffed moose. She stroked the fur on his head and left him gnawing on the toy before retrieving a letter opener from the desk.

With the sharp object in hand, she climbed back to the tower and settled in front of the wardrobe. If she had to, she'd pry the box open.

She slid the thin metal into the slit and carefully pried. After some effort, the block of wood lifted.

She spent another forty-five minutes delicately prying, pulling, teasing and tugging the tight-fitting block free. With a satisfied grin, she extracted it, and set it aside, toggling on her flashlight to peer inside the hole.

She leaned forward, her heart skipping a beat as she stared at the contents.

CHAPTER 6

Cate's pulse quickened as she stared into the small compartment. She expected to find an empty hole or more dust, but instead spotted a few pieces of paper at the bottom.

A giddy grin crossed her face and she reached in, fishing them from the bottom.

The first paper was blank. On the second, was a charcoal drawing of a man's face by a talented artist. She recognized the likeness in the unsigned sketch.

A third piece of paper contained writing. She set the sketch aside, scanning the written words. Her eyes grew wide and her heart thudded in her chest.

R –

I am sorry, but I must go. Your family has already paid too heavy a cost. I will never forget what you have done.

– S

Cate drew in a sharp breath. Addressed to “R” and accompanied by the sketch of him, it must have been intended for Randolph.

Someone must have lived in this tower. Part of the rumor about Randolph must be true. Cate's brow scrunched as she re-read the words.

The person writing it didn't seem to be a captive. The note sounded apologetic, hinting that Randolph bore some burden on the writer's behalf.

With her mind brewing, she gathered the papers and letter opener and returned to the library. She laid the notes on the desk and checked her timepiece.

"How about a walk, Riley?"

The little dog discarded his toy, bounding toward Cate to accept her offer. They stepped into the bright fall sunshine and circled around the house into the gardens. Riley nosed his way along the shrubs until he caught a whiff of Jack, watering a few flowering plants.

"Well, hello there, little Riley!" Jack said, petting his head. "My, my, Lady Cate, this is a new look for you."

Cate's brow furrowed as she approached Jack. She looked down at her clothes, they seemed standard, her usual leggings with a tunic sweater and an added cardigan for extra warmth. She finished the look with a pair of black riding boots.

"Huh?" she said, confused.

Jack swept a few cobwebs from her hair. "Are you trying out your 'Ghosts of the Past' look?"

"Oh," Cate said, swatting at her hair and laughing, "I got a little dirty on my latest research mission."

"And where were we researching, Indiana Jones? The depths of a tomb?"

"No, the depths of the tower room."

Jack tilted his head, eyeing her. "Find anything interesting? Maybe a signed confession from Randolph?"

"I did! But it wasn't a signed confession."

"Oh, no, let me guess. It's something that deepens the mystery and means you are hellbent on time traveling to find out more."

"It's like you're psychic, Jack."

He sprayed another plant with a light mist. "I think my sixth sense is about as strong as your comedy routine."

She offered him an unimpressed stare. "Okay, all joking aside, I found a note hidden in a secret compartment in the wardrobe accompanied by a drawing. The sketch is of Randolph and the note is addressed to 'R'. The writer apologizes to 'R', saying the family had endured too high a cost already and would never forget what he had done."

Jack shut off the hose and shot her a glance. “Who signed it?”

Cate shoved her hands into her cardigan pocket and shrugged. “I’m not sure, it just says ‘S.’”

“S? Like the letter?”

“Yes, just the letter ‘S.’ I’ll show you the note and sketch tomorrow after lunch if you have a quick second. It’s quite something.”

Jack dragged the hose back toward the castle. “I’ll reserve my judgement for after I see it.”

“Fair enough! Well, I think this is a great find, I’m encouraged. I’ll let you get back to your watering though and we can discuss it more after you’ve scrutinized it.”

“Okay, Cate. But don’t get too optimistic, you know I’m a killjoy for time travel.”

Cate laughed as she began walking away, calling Riley to come with her. “Oh, yes, I know.”

Cate re-read the note several times over her evening, trying to glean any additional details she could from it. She wondered what Jack’s take would be on it. With any luck, he’d agree. And if her luck held out, she could wheedle some additional tidbits from Mrs. Campbell when they met next.

With a mid-week meeting looming over her, Cate spend the better part of her Tuesday organizing her information for the ball. After a pre-lunch walk with Riley, she returned to find an email waiting from Molly. The title alone made her laugh out loud as she clicked on the subject line that read “SO EXCITED!!!!!!!!!!!!!!”

Cate! We’re less than three weeks away from my trip to SCOTLAND! I still can’t believe I get to stay in a castle either. I can’t tell you how excited I am! Oh, I’m also excited to see you and that cute little doggie of yours, too! ;) I started packing! And I have already gotten overwhelmed, so I was hoping to get your help with it before I end up dragging three suitcases across the pond. Are jeans and sweaters appropriate? Is it cold there? Do we dress up every night for dinner like Downton Abbey? HELP! I’m not sure what to pack now that I’ll be staying with and dining with an honest-to-goodness Countess!

Also, thank you so much for renting a costume for me over there so I don't have to pack one. The way I am going, I won't have room for souvenirs on the way home!

Okay, I'll let you go before you disinvite me. Looking forward to hearing from you AND to my trip!!!

Molly

Cate chuckled again as she read over Molly's email. Same old Molly, she thought. She typed a quick reply as Mrs. Fraser dropped off her lunch tray.

Hi Molly – We are looking forward to seeing you, too! It will be nice to hear another American accent around the house. It's definitely cooler here than it is in Aberdeen! Sweaters and jeans would be perfect. Also, I'd suggest some comfortable shoes for walking and a light fall jacket or raincoat. Riley and I love to take long walks and we'd be happy to have you join us and see the entire estate. It's beautiful here.

As I mentioned before, I have two other guests coming later in the week. So, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday, we'll have everyone for dinner and we wear smart casual for dinners. When we're here with just the girls, it will be casual dress. We might even dine in the library, no frills, if you'd like!

I'm just an email away if you have more questions!

Cate

Cate had just hit the send button when Jack appeared at the library door, knocking on it before entering. "M'lady," he said, bowing extravagantly.

Cate laughed, shaking her head. "Always so dramatic," she teased.

"Always," he said, grinning. "So where is this letter?"

Cate grabbed the papers from her folder, jumping up from her seat and thrusting the papers toward him. "It's more of a note than a letter."

He glanced first at the drawing, then read the note.

Cate waited with bated breath for his reaction. “Well?”

He shrugged as he shuffled through the papers again. “Well, nothing.”
“Nothing?”

He shrugged again. “Yeah, nothing. It looks like ‘S’ vanished and that was that. Seems like ‘R’ never found the note. He, assuming it’s a he, probably wondered what happened to her, assuming it’s a her.”

“Assuming? ‘R’ has got to be Randolph. ‘S’ drew his picture and put it with the note, so I think it’s a safe bet.”

“And ‘S’ must have not been a prisoner, it looks like he or she left of their own free will after apologizing. So, the rumors about a person held captive in the tower room must be false.”

“I think you’re jumping to conclusions, Cate.”

Cate scowled at him. “If I am it’s not that far of a leap.”

“We aren’t sure ‘S’ isn’t a prisoner. Look here, I’ll never forget what you’ve done? That sounds ominous to me.” He pointed to a particular phrase in the note.

“No, it’s like ‘you’re so great, I’ll never forget what you did for me!’”
Cate argued

“Or, ‘wow, you’re a jerk, I’ll never forget what you did TO me,’” Jack countered.

Cate flailed her arms in the air. “What about the apology? And the stuff about the high cost for the family?”

“Perhaps ‘S’ means the high cost because he’s a jerk. I’m not sure, but I don’t assume it means that Randolph isn’t a murderer.”

“Okay, point taken, perhaps he is a murderer, but who is ‘S’? And what happened between them? And why did ‘S’ leave? There are so many questions.”

Jack shrugged again, handing the papers back to Cate. “And I don’t have any answers.”

“No, I don’t expect that you do but...” Cate said, a gleam in her eye as she glanced up at him.

Jack shook his head as though he didn’t want to hear what she said next.

“We could find out the answers,” she finished.

He sighed, his hands on his hips. “I’m not going to argue with you.”

“Because you want answers, too!” Cate exclaimed with a grin.

“No, because I’ll lose again. So, what is your plan?”

Cate tapped her chin, unprepared for the development. "I'm not sure. I have to consider it more. Give me a couple of days to come up with a plan for you to hate."

Jack poked a finger at her. "Deal. You come up with the plan, I'll hate it."

Cate bit her lower lip as a smile spread across her face and nodded.

"For now, I'll hate the idea that you're coming up with the plan at all while I go find these banners with Mr. Fraser."

"Okay! Oh, is there anything that I need to discuss with Mrs. Campbell tomorrow from your end?"

"No, nothing other than what I've mentioned already. If anything comes up, I'll let you know."

"Okay, sounds good! Thanks, Jack."

She returned to her desk and dropped the papers among the stack of party details. She groaned at the amount of work she still needed to get through before getting to her other mystery.

With a groan, she retrieved her lunch tray and sat down to finish the mundane tasks.

The party planning and another long walk with Riley ate up the rest of her day. As she laid in the bed the next morning, watching the rising sun, she considered the exhausting task ahead of her: her hours-long meeting with Isla Campbell. Perhaps the woman would provide her with some information, though.

She climbed from her warm nest and started her day with an early morning walk with Riley. Cold and damp weather settled around the castle. She wrapped her cardigan tightly around her as they strolled through the foggy morning.

She pushed through the kitchen door, into the castle, greeting Mrs. Fraser.

"Good morning, Mrs. Fraser, it's chilly out there today. Do you mind if I leave Riley here with you while I meet with Mrs. Campbell?"

Mrs. Fraser pulled a hot tray of cookies from the oven. "Not at all, Lady Cate."

"Thanks. I don't think Isla cares for animals."

"I dinnae think that woman cares for much outside of gossip," Mrs. Fraser answered. "The little pup will be just fine with me."

“Oh, Jack and Mr. Fraser are working right outside in the back garden, so he might try to sneak out on you again. I’m sure he’ll go straight to them, though, so no worries if he gets out of your sight!”

“Aye, he’s very fond of young Jack. I dare say, young Jack is just as fond of him!”

“They do have fun together. I’d better head up and get my notes together. If I know Mrs. Campbell, she’ll be here early.”

Mrs. Fraser smirked at her, jabbing a finger at Cate. “You know it, Lady Cate.”

As Cate wandered down the hall, she overheard Mrs. Fraser chattering away to Riley about a bone. She smiled to herself as she mounted the stairs and climbed to the floor above.

She greeted Mrs. Campbell just as the woman was about to ring the bell fifteen minutes early as always, and ushered the woman inside from the cool, damp weather.

“Mrs. Campbell, I had a feeling you might be early!”

Mrs. Campbell offered her a sly grin. “Oh, Lady Cate! I hope it’s not a problem?”

Cate motioned to the sitting room on her right. “Not at all, I’m ready for you if you’d like to step into the sitting room.”

The two spent two hours poring over the details, updating progress and discussing the rest of what needed completed. Mrs. Campbell suggested they meet four more times, two for planning and two for what she called “action items.” Cate agreed, noting them in her daybook.

“Well, if there’s nothing else, I suppose I should be on my way,” Mrs. Campbell said, her hands wrapped around her knees as though she had no intention of moving.

“Actually,” Cate said, “I was hoping you might have a few more minutes. I’d like to pick your brain about something I’ve come across in my research.”

Mrs. Campbell made a show of squinting at her watch. “Oh, well, I suppose I could stay for a few more minutes. How can I help?”

“When I first interviewed you, you mentioned a rumor about Randolph MacKenzie, he would have inherited the castle around the 1850s. Concerning a person in the tower room?” Cate prodded.

Mrs. Campbell’s features twisted into a smirk. “You mean a woman in the tower room.”

“Yes, I recall you said the rumor mill claimed it was a woman. Do you have any more information? Perhaps how the rumor started, or what prompted it?”

Mrs. Campbell looked up to the ceiling as if trying to remember. “For as long as I’ve known, that’s been the story. Randolph was a cad and kept a woman locked in the tower room. I’m not sure why or how that rumor began way back when, but my best guess would have been a servant with loose lips. Most of the village rumors had similar starts, someone at the pub with a bit too much to drink or some pillow talk.”

“I see, that sounds likely, yes,” Cate agreed.

“Oh, there are many other lascivious rumors that have torn through the town from this castle. You read Randolph ended up in prison for the murder of a servant. Perhaps the one with the loose lips, you never know!” Mrs. Campbell said, rambling on about the dirty secrets of Cate’s ancestors.

“Yes, I was just reading that in the materials you sent me from the historical society. Interesting story, isn’t it? What’s your take on it?” Cate nudged.

“My take? Oh, well, most likely that’s the servant that let slip Randolph’s secret and he killed him over it. He tried to cover it up, claiming he had an alibi but when a man has a secret like that hidden in the tower room, there’s no doubt he’d be willing to kill over it. I am surprised the guilt ended up getting to him enough to confess, though.”

She arched an eyebrow high and cocked her head. “My take is that your ancestor was a cold-blooded killer.”

CHAPTER 7

Cate raised her eyebrows at the statement. Mrs. Campbell had just accused her ancestor of murder. Not only was it insulting, but it dashed any hopes she had of finding an ally in her belief that Randolph was innocent.

She puckered her lips and pushed herself to stand. “Well, I suppose the past should be left in the past. Thank you so much for your time, Mrs. Campbell. I don’t want to keep you any longer. I’m sure you are very busy.”

Mrs. Campbell rose to her feet, tugging her tote onto her shoulder. “Oh, not at all, it’s no imposition. I’ll see you next Friday?”

Cate confirmed the appointment with a nod. “Yes, next Friday, same time as today.”

“Wonderful. Oh, I can hardly believe the party will be only two weeks away the next time we meet!” Mrs. Campbell said, as they walked to the door.

Cate pulled the front door open. “Yes, it’s almost upon us!”

“Well, enjoy the rest of your day, Lady Cate. We’ll be in touch!” Mrs. Campbell waved over her head as she headed for her car.

“Thank you!” Cate called, waving as she pulled down the driveway.

With a long sigh of relief, Cate threaded through the halls for her usual Wednesday afternoon staff lunch.

“Well, I’m glad that’s over with,” Cate announced as she collapsed into a kitchen chair.

Mrs. Fraser shot her a glance and shuddered. "As am I. I cannae say why, but I dinnae like when that woman is in this house."

Cate glanced around the space, finding Riley lounging near the door. "And how was Riley? Any trouble?"

"None at all, the little fellow ventured out to visit Jack, but he came back, didn't even need to call him."

Cate clapped her hands at the little pup. "Well, good job, Riley! I'd say that deserves a treat!"

At the mention of a treat, Riley leapt to his feet, dancing around with excitement.

Cate slipped into the pantry and retrieved a few tasty snacks. "I'll have to order more treats, it looks like. I could have sworn we had two bags, but I only found one."

"He's been begging too much, he'll eat you out of house and home this one!" Mrs. Fraser said with a chuckle, as Jack and Mr. Fraser came through the door for lunch.

"Hello, everyone, especially little Sir Riley!" Jack said. "What have we done to deserve the royal treatment today?"

"He ran off to find you and came back without having to be called!" Cate answered.

"Oh, is that what you told them? Sorry to say, he didn't come to find me."

Mrs. Fraser set a stray of sandwiches alongside a plate of cookies on the table. "What? I had the door propped open for air and I heard a rustling. Like a streak of lightening, he bolted outside, then returned. I assume he visited you and you sent him back."

"He didn't visit me! He must have found a new friend." Jack knelt down to scratch Riley's ears. "Have I been replaced, laddie?"

Cate's face twisted into a mask of confusion. "That's odd, I was sure he went to you and back. Maybe he just made a potty trip. Anyway, shall we have lunch?"

"Yes, we shall, m'lady, I'm starving! And, I've been smelling these biscuits all day," Jack said, swiping a cookie and biting into it.

Mrs. Fraser harrumphed and placed a sandwich on Jack's plate. "You'll spoil your appetite! Now see that you get a sandwich next, not another biscuit."

Conversation of the lunch centered around the new details from the quickly approaching party. Mrs. Fraser inquired after Molly's eating habits, pleased she would not be expected to serve hot dogs and hamburgers all week for the American.

Cate spent the rest of her day embroiled in castle research, finding it all-consuming. Only Riley's tiny paws planted on her leg roused her from her study for a walk before dinner.

Despite all the day's activities, Cate found herself unable to sleep that night. The note from "S" raced through her thoughts as she tossed and turned. Questions bombarded from all directions.

How could she discover their identity? Was "S" related to the murder? Did Randolph kill the servant because he had loose lips about "S?"

After a restless two hours, she rose from her bed and wandered through the moonlit halls of the castle. She meandered up and down the hall containing her bedroom, then expanded her pacing to include other upstairs areas.

She wandered to the portrait gallery for another gander at her ancestors. She found herself pausing in front of the portrait of Randolph MacKenzie, willing him to share his secrets. His blue eyes stared back, offering her no answers.

She wound down the backstairs, wandering past the closed off wing and heading toward the foyer past the library. Light streamed from under the library door.

Cate's heart skipped a beat. Was someone in the house or had she simply left the light on earlier?

She thought she had turned it off, maybe she hadn't. She crept to the door and pressed her ear against it. No sounds came from within.

She bit her lower lip and steeled her nerves, flinging the door open. She found the room empty and crossed to the opposite side, switching off the lamp.

As she left the library, she pulled the door closed behind her, satisfied that no light spilled from inside. Her eyebrows arched as an idea struck her.

They could travel back to 1856 at night and determine if the tower room was occupied by checking for light under the door.

A smile spread across her face as she considered the low-risk plan, assuming Jack may not object to it. It would be a small step, but perhaps they'd learn something from it.

With a plan in place, she wandered back to her bedroom, finally able to sleep.

As the sun peeked through the lace curtains of her bedroom the following morning, Cate fluttered her eyes open, still excited about her plan.

After breakfast, Cate and Riley stepped into the cool autumn air for a meeting in the garden with Mr. Fraser and Jack. The little dog bounded in front of her, a goofy grin on his face as he frolicked.

After sniffing a few bushes, Cate ushered him toward the back garden, looking forward to a party planning meeting that didn't cause her anxiety.

The little dog bounded toward the two man, springing onto his hind legs to greet Jack.

"Well, good morning, Sir Riley!" Jack exclaimed, ruffling the fur on his head.

Cate caught up with him a moment later, beaming at the scene in front of her.

"Good morning, Lady Cate. He really loves that lad, doesn't he?" Mr. Fraser called.

"Good morning! Did you mean Riley loves Jack or Jack loves Riley?" Cate questioned.

Mr. Fraser glanced at the two of them again. "Well, you could go either way with that, I'd say, Lady Cate."

"Good morning, Lady Cate!" Jack said after picking up Riley to continue rubbing his chin. Riley's tongue lolled from the side of his mouth in a wide grin.

"Good morning! I'm glad the two of you could join us!"

"I was just checking with him to make sure he had his costume set for the party. Eh, what's that laddie?" he asked, holding the dog closer to his ear. "Oh, it's a secret, is it? Well, I won't tell a soul!"

Cate chuckled as Jack set Riley on the ground. "Oh, his costume is in order, it'll look like his bed and blanket. This little guy will most likely sleep through the party."

"Aw, am I going to lose my buddy for the night?"

Riley looked up at him as though agreeing that he would never lose him as a friend.

"Well, unless we get some details nailed down, we won't have a party for Riley to sleep through!" Cate answered.

Mr. Fraser pulled a set of folder papers from his pocket and unfurled them. “Well, Lady Cate, running with your theme ‘Ghosts of the Past’ and the ideas we discussed over lunch, here is what I was thinking.”

Cate stared down at the sketches on the paper, detailing the man’s design. Sketches illustrated the castle from all angles, annotated with details about how to enhance the back gardens, in particular.

Cate glanced up at him with a wide grin. “Mr. Fraser! These are great!”

Banners waved at the castle’s entrance, marking the first thing visitors would see as they approached. Lights illuminated the castle from all angles. Cate pictured the castle lit up against the backdrop of a purple and red dusky sky.

In the back garden, lights were strung overhead, creating lit pathways through the various foliage for guests to traverse. A temporary water feature sat at the center. Gourds and pumpkins, some carved, some not, decorated the perimeter and the pathways. Tall corn stalks stood in various spots around the garden and framed the entrances to the ballroom. Hay bales, adorned with the fruits of autumn bordered each of the doors. Banners hung above the entryways, providing the finishing touch.

The design transformed the garden into a magical fall wonderland sure to please the guests.

Cate bit her lower lip, delighted with the idea, but concerned about the work it thrust upon her staff. “I love this design, but I want to be sure you two are not taking on too much! Will you need some additional help to achieve all this?”

Mr. Fraser clasped his hands behind his back and offered a timid smile. “Well, Lady Cate, I think we’ll be okay. The Bailey farm will supply most of what we’ll need and help us set it up.”

“That’s wonderful! I can help, too!”

“A real hands-on lady, aren’t you, Lady Cate,” Jack teased.

Cate offered a slight curtsy to punctuate her answer. “Yes, I am. And, I have an idea if you don’t mind?”

“I’m happy to hear it, Lady Cate,” Mr. Fraser answered.

“Well, I noted that your plans show some carved pumpkins. Perhaps we could all pitch in and carve them. We could put a small sign designating who carved each pumpkin to show the guests we’re real people! I bet Molly and Gayle would love to help, maybe even Mr. Smythe. And with you, Mrs. Fraser and Jack, that would be seven of them.”

Mr. Fraser's eyes lit at the concept. "I think that's a fun idea, Lady Cate. We could even make it a contest. Let people vote for the best. I had better tell Emily now, she'll want to spend at least a week planning her pumpkin!"

"That sounds great!" Cate answered.

They spent another forty-five minutes discussing various aspects of the design and logistics. Cate's excitement grew by the minute and she couldn't wait to see the plan materialize. After they had gone over all the details, Cate asked to make a copy of the plans to share with Mrs. Campbell at her next meeting.

"By all means, Lady Cate," Mr. Fraser said, passing the papers to her. "Although I dare say she'll have something she wants changed once she sees it!"

Cate tapped the paper and shook her head. "But I have the final decision! And I love every detail of this!"

"Want to leave Riley with us while you run in to make a copy?" Jack asked.

"Riley, do you want to stay with Jack for a minute?" Cate asked the dog.

His dark, almond-shaped eyes gleamed as he glanced at Jack, who brandished a stick, promising to play a game of tug of war with him. The dog's tail wagged furiously.

"I think that's a yes! Okay, I'll be right back."

Cate entered the castle and made two copies of the plans, one for herself and one for Mrs. Campbell. She smiled as she placed them in her planning folder, taking one final glance at them before returning to the back garden.

She handed the papers back to Mr. Fraser as she searched for Riley. "Here are your papers back, Mr. Fraser. Okay, Riley, time to finish that walk!"

The small dog was notably missing.

"Riley?" she questioned, glancing at Jack.

"Ah, the little laddie is right over..." He paused. "Well, that's odd. He was right here. He was right by this bush just a moment ago."

Cate scanned the garden. The little dog was nowhere to be found. Her heart skipped a beat as she realized he'd run off again.

CHAPTER 8

Cate scanned the garden, a sinking feeling in her stomach as she failed to find Riley.

Mr. Fraser's features scrunched with concern. "Disappeared, has he?" Mr. Fraser asked, concern crossing his face.

Cate shrugged, forcing a smile onto her face. "Maybe he started the rest of the walk without me. I'm sure he's fine, he rarely goes far."

"Well, I'll help you look for him," Jack offered.

"Thanks, Jack. I expect he's on the path to the loch, or over near that folly. I'm not sure why but he has a sudden interest in that spot."

"If you don't find him soon, let me know, I'm happy to help you hunt for him," Mr. Fraser said.

Cate nodded at him as she stepped away on the path toward the loch. "Thanks, I will let you know if we don't find him and sorry for stealing Jack for the moment!"

The man tipped his hat and nodded at her. "Not to worry, Lady Cate, we're just getting some measurements today to make the final calculations on how much of everything we'll need to make these gardens shine! Plenty of time to do that once we've located little Riley."

They started down the path, leaving Mr. Fraser behind as he spread his tape measure out along a row of bushes.

"So, you figure the little laddie is on the path?"

Cate called to him a few times. "Most likely, he rarely goes far, like I said."

They continued down the path for a few minutes before they spotted Riley bounding down a small hill.

Cate waved a finger at him. "There he is!"

"You were right, coming from the direction of that folly."

"I told you. I'm not sure what it is about that spot he loves, but there's something. One day I'll have to investigate it and find out what is so enticing to him."

Cate called to the small dog, and he bounded toward them. She scooped him up as he leapt onto his hind legs when he reached her. "What were you thinking running off? Silly boy, come here."

Cate cuddled him in her arms, giving his head a kiss and ruffling the fur on his back.

Jack smiled at the scene, his hands on his hips. "Well, looks like you're all set then! I'll get back to those measurements."

Cate flicked her gaze to him. "Oh, I was hoping to have a few more moments of your time to discuss something."

"Did you have a question about the party?"

Cate pursed her lips and shook her head. "No."

Jack studied the clouds above them, his finger tapping his chin in faux concentration. "Did you want me to grab your hundredth order of the fish and chips from the pub for you?"

Cate snickered at the joke. "No."

He snapped his fingers, pointing at her. "Oh, I've got it, you wanted to ask me what my costume was!"

"Well, it does involve a costume of sorts, so you're getting warmer."

"Are you having a private costume party that you'd like to discuss?"

Cate lifted a shoulder as she nodded. "That's one way of putting it, yes."

"And when is this party occurring?"

"In 1856?" Cate said, phrasing it as a question.

Jack scrunched up his face. "I was afraid that would be your answer."

"I have a low-risk plan to get us more information. Not tons of information, but some! Not even you can object to this one, Jack!"

His hands landed on his hips again. "Try me, lassie."

Cate rolled her eyes at him. "It's simple. We travel back when the family is having dinner. We make sure ALL of them are accounted for then we check the tower room."

“Oh, that’s it, huh? Just go back at night, mosey to the tower room and check if someone is in there, doing what, sleeping?”

“We can check for a light shining under the door!”

Jack rubbed his chin, pulling his lips to the side. “Hmm, we can avoid everyone. This might be one of your better terrible plans, Cate.”

“See! I told you! So, when should we go!”

He flicked his gaze to the blue sky again. “Hmm.” He paused. “Let’s see. How about...” he paused again, “the fifteenth of never? Does that work for you?”

Cate groaned. “Funny, Jack. Now, seriously, we should go this coming week, before we get busy with the party. How about this Sunday again?”

“Oh, Cate.” He sighed, shaking his head. “You are a handful.”

“Is that a yes?”

He offered her a slow nod. “It’s a reluctant yes.”

Cate grinned at him. “Okay, it’s a plan! And now you can collect those measurements.”

“Yes, measurements, a nice, safe idea that won’t ruin the course of history, my favorite! M’lady,” he said giving her a bow before he returned to the garden as she continued on her way toward the loch.

Cate laughed, then turned her attention to Riley, ruffling the fur on his head. “And where did you get yourself off to, Mr. Riley?”

Riley’s eyes gleamed at her but didn’t provide any information. “Not talking, huh? Well, then, I guess I’ll have to investigate what’s got you so interested in that folly.”

She set him down on the ground, watching him scramble down the path in front of her toward the loch.

As they reached it, Cate called to him. He stopped, spinning to glance at her, then came galloping back as he saw his blue ball in her hand. His eyes twinkled with anticipation as she tossed it. He sprang into a run, chasing it. He snatched it up, bouncing around in a circle, before returning it to her to throw again.

They made their way to the loch, with Riley enjoying playing fetch all the way. Cate settled on the bank, Riley curled next to her, spent from playing ball. With a sigh, she stroked his back as she gazed at the castle. Her attention focused on the tower.

If she was correct, their Sunday evening visit would confirm the presence of someone living in the tower room. Her low-key plan depended on verifying the whereabouts of the rest of the family. That was a fact that she kept from Jack. She would never have convinced him if he knew they would be traipsing around the castle. She'd keep that one to herself for now.

She smiled down at Riley, who rolled onto his back to allow her to scratch his belly.

"Oh, Riley." She laughed, pulling him into her arms.

He snuggled into her, not appreciating the cooler weather.

She spent another half hour enjoying the loch and surrounding scenery before the cooler temperatures chased her in. A mountain of work awaited her between her research project and party planning. With no meeting about the party for another week, she shoved the materials aside after her lunch and opened her laptop to work on her book.

She stared at the blinking cursor for twenty minutes before she scowled at the laptop. She'd written a single word: the.

She sighed at lack of ability to focus and navigated to her email app instead, finding an email from Molly. Her subject line read TWO WEEKS!

Cate clicked open the email to read it.

Hi Cate! In TWO WEEKS, I will be on my way to SCOTLAND! Thank you so much for the packing tips! I think I have the packing under control now, although my shopping may not be. I'll confess, I felt I needed a few new sweaters for the trip. My Scotland sweaters should arrive any day now and I can't wait to put them in my suitcase! I'm giddy every time I cross a day off the calendar!

I keep reminding everyone in the department that I'll soon be seeing you and staying at your CASTLE. You know, in case they want to pass along their best wishes to you, but mostly because I'm just bragging that I'm staying at a castle.

I'm so excited, I can hardly sleep. Although, that might be because I've been watching a lot of haunted castle movies in anticipation of my trip. You promise that it's not haunted, right? Even if it is, I'm still coming!

Thank you so much again, Cate! I know I've said it 1000 times already, but I mean it. I really needed this. It's given me something to look forward to, so THANK YOU!

Molly

P.S. They haven't filled your position yet. Guess they couldn't find anyone willing to do all that work for none of the reward!

The email brought a smile to her face. Molly's enthusiasm for the trip bounced off the screen. She couldn't wait to see her old friend and she hoped some rest and relaxation in the quiet town of Dunhaven would be just what the proverbial doctor ordered after Molly's tough divorce. She pressed the reply button and typed an email back.

Hi Molly! Riley and I are counting the days on this side of the pond too! We're excited to see you. I'm glad you have the packing under control, and I don't blame you for the shopping! You definitely need a few new "Scotland sweaters." You'll get plenty of use out of them here, we are cool and damp, sorry to say!

I PROMISE the castle is not haunted, you can put your mind at rest. Keep watching those spooky movies, that's the only Scottish ghosts you'll see!

I'm so glad that you're looking forward to the visit. Enjoy crossing those days off, it'll be here before you know!

See you soon,

Cate

She returned to her word document. All traces of the smile from Molly's email disappeared as she stared at the almost-blank page.

As her fingers hovered over the keyboard, she decided to head into town the next day for a shopping trip. She'd shop for a welcome gift to cheer Molly upon her arrival to Dunhaven Castle.

It would also occupy most of her time and divert her attention as she waited for their time travel trip.

With her plans set, she flicked her gaze back to her laptop. As she typed her first few strokes, Mrs. Fraser knocked and peeked into the library.

Cate's eyebrows shot up as she checked her timepiece. "Oh, Mrs. Fraser! Is there something you needed? It's not dinner time yet, is it?"

The woman clasped her hands in front of her, a tentative expression on her features. "Oh, no, Lady Cate, not yet! But I was hoping you had a moment?"

Cate waved her inside and motioned to the chairs by the fireplace, which boasted a roaring fire. "Oh, of course, Mrs. Fraser, please come in."

She pushed back from the desk chair and joined her, sinking into the supple leather of the armchair.

"Please, sit, Mrs. Fraser. Riley is really enjoying the fire. I'm thinking of curling up here with a good book, too. I'm not making much progress on my research."

Mrs. Fraser perched on the edge of the leather chair opposite Cate. "It is nice and cozy here. I'll tell Mr. Fraser the little pup is enjoying it. He'll be pleased."

"So, what did you want to discuss?"

Mrs. Fraser clasped her hands tightly again, tapping them against her knees. "Right, well, Lady Cate, I was hoping to ask a favor of you."

"Of course, anything, ask away."

Mrs. Fraser pounded her hands against her knees again. "I've been thinking, it may be easier for Mr. Fraser and myself to stay at the castle while your guests are with us. We will be available if any needs arise. Also, we will be on hand for the busy days prior to the party."

Cate grinned at her request, happy to have her stay, though requesting permission was unnecessary. "It's not necessary for you to ask or explain, Mrs. Fraser. You're welcome to stay here anytime."

Mrs. Fraser returned her smile, her chin raising and her hands unclasping. "Thank you, Lady Cate. Well, I prefer to ask just the same. Well, with that settled..."

Cate waved a finger in the air. "Oh, just a moment, Mrs. Fraser. I have one request."

Mrs. Fraser's brow furrowed in confusion. "Request?"

"Yes. I want to be sure this makes things easier for you and I do not want you working yourself to death trying to attend to all of us!"

Mrs. Fraser chuckled and waved the request away. "Oh, Lady Cate, it will make it easier on me and you'll not worry yourself about overworking me. I'll be fine!"

She stood from the chair and smoothed down her skirt. “Well, with that settled, I’ll leave you to your work, or your book!”

“Thanks!” Cate smiled at her as she departed from the room. She spent a few minutes curled by the warm fire. Her gaze shot across the room to her laptop, and she wrinkled her nose. With no desire to return to her work, she cuddled up under a blanket with a novel, attempting not to dwell on her upcoming trip to the past.

The next morning, Cate bounded out of bed, excited for her shopping trip. She headed into the small town early, before the stores opened, enjoying a morning walk around the town with Riley.

The sleepy town came to life as mid-morning approached and store after store opened its doors. She began her excursion by visiting one of her favorite shops, owned by Harry Abernathy.

“Ah, good morning, Lady Cate! And good morning to you, Riley!” Harry said, producing a treat for the little pup.

“Good morning, Harry! How have you been?”

“Cannae complain, Lady Cate! Are you enjoying the change in weather?”

“I can’t say I’m enjoying the cooler temperatures, but I have always been fond of fall!”

Harry’s wife, Helen, appeared from the back storeroom.

“Good morning, Helen,” Cate called.

“Good morning, Lady Cate. Doing some shopping today?”

Cate nodded as she scooped Riley into her arms. “Yes, I have a friend from across the pond coming in soon and I wanted to get her something to welcome her.”

“Ah, that’s very thoughtful of you,” Helen answered. “Is she coming in for the party?”

“Yes. She’s coming early to visit and staying for the party.”

“How are plans coming along for it?” Harry chimed in.

“Very well, thanks. Mrs. Campbell seems to be a professional at event planning, so I am following her skillful lead. She has a fantastic handle on all the details. You both are planning to attend, aren’t you?”

An excited grin filled Helen’s face and she clasped her hands together. “Oh, yes, we wouldn’t miss it! Isla is billing it as the event of the decade!”

Harry chimed in with a laugh, crossing his arms over his chest. “I’m surprised she hasn’t run you ragged yet, Lady Cate.”

“There are so many details, it is exhausting keeping track of them, but I think she’d be the one run ragged before me. She has thrown herself into this headfirst!”

“Aye, that’d be our Isla!” Harry agreed. “If we can help in any way, please ask!”

“Thank you both,” Cate answered. “Have you decided on costumes yet?”

“We have. But we’re keeping them a secret until the big day!” Helen pressed a finger to her lips.

“Fair enough! I look forward to seeing you both at the party.”

“Have fun with your shopping, Lady Cate,” Helen said. “I hope you find something your friend will enjoy.”

“Thank you!” Cate said as she stepped further into the store to browse.

Cate spent the entire morning browsing stores in search of something she thought Molly might enjoy. By 1 p.m. she hadn’t decided on anything. She took a break for lunch at the pub after settling Riley in the car for a nap.

She ordered fish and chips for the umpteenth time and used the time to mull over the gift options she’d narrowed down for Molly. After lunch she completed her purchases, choosing a tartan blanket that she paired with a copy of the book The Mysteries of Scotland which featured a blurb about Dunhaven Castle’s supposed haunting. She also picked out a photo album featuring a picture of Dunhaven Castle on the front for Molly to fill with her memories.

Pleased with her purchases, she carried her packages to the car and headed back to the castle for dinner, enjoying a Friday evening meal with her staff as usual.

Cate climbed into bed, pleased to be one day closer to her time travel trip. “One day down, one more to go!”

She spent the next forty-eight hours on pins and needles, awaiting the journey. She used the time to search employment records for a clue to the elusive “S,” but with only one initial, she found nothing definitive.

As she searched through employment records, her brow furrowed at the staff’s days off. She expected them to occur on Sundays, however the dates listed did not match up with the current year. A quick search for an 1856 calendar reminded her the dates in 1856 occurred on different days of the week than they did in her year.

With an eyeroll at her own stupidity, she realized their first trip to 1856 hadn't been on a Sunday as she'd assumed after all. She'd tell Jack about the discovery when they met in a few hours for their second trip back.

Cate spend the remaining time pacing the floors in nervous anticipation. She enjoyed a fall evening walk, bundled in a thick cardigan with Riley wrapped in his tartan sweater. After the sun began to descend in the sky in a brilliant blaze of deep red, they returned to the castle.

Jack's car eased to a stop as they approached the entrance. He popped from inside. "Hello, Sir Riley!"

Riley bounded toward him, and Jack caught him mid-leap, pulling him close to his chest as he rubbed his belly.

"Perfect timing!" Cate called as she continued up the path.

"I'm not sure anything about this is perfect," Jack answered as she closed the gap.

"Stop being a stick in the mud! This'll be a quick one, just your style. Oh, by the way, I figured out why we may have run into Randolph."

"Oh?" Jack inquired as he set Riley on the ground.

"Yes, we traveled back on a Sunday in our time, but in 1856 the twenty-ninth of September was a Monday," she explained.

"Ohhhh," Jack said, realization dawning on him, "the days of the week are different! Good catch, Lady Cate."

Cate beamed at him. "Thanks. Ready to go?"

Jack shivered "I'm with Gertrude on this one, I'm not a fan."

Cate rolled her eyes at him. "Well, let's head in and get ready, it'll be dark soon."

"Clothes in the bedroom I normally use as usual?" he asked.

"Yep! And I'll meet you in the 1856 bedroom after I've changed and settled Riley."

They pushed into the castle's expansive foyer and headed their separate ways to change into period-appropriate clothing. Cate swept her hair into an updo, donned her dress, and hung the skeleton key around her neck next to the timepiece.

After nestling Riley in a blanket on her chaise, she kissed the top of his head and slipped from the room, closing and locking the door behind her.

The trip to the other bedroom was not as effortless as when she wore her usual leggings or jeans paired with a tunic. The weight of the fabric made moving more difficult than she was used to.

She found Jack already waiting for her, fussing with his collar. "I wish we could travel to an era with more comfortable clothing."

Cate shot him a glance as she whisked her skirts inside the room. "I'm sure I can make that happen."

Jack rolled his eyes at her. "Very funny, Cate."

She shot him a devilish grin. "Ready?"

"As I'll ever be."

They entered the closet and placed their thumbs on the watch face, rubbing it. Within moments, the timepiece's ticking decreased. The second hand slowed to a crawl, indicating the slowed passage of time in their own century.

"Looks like we made it," Cate whispered. "Let's go!"

"Agreed, let's get this over with. Straight to the tower room and back, right?"

"More or less."

"Caaaaaaaate," Jack began.

Cate cut him off with a wave of her hand. "Come on!"

She bounded to the closet door, cracking it open an inch to peer out. "All clear!"

She tugged the door fully open and hurried across the bedroom to the main door.

"Wait up," Jack mumbled, racing after her.

She eased the door open enough to peer out. "Coast is clear, let's make a run for the stairway."

"Okay, on three," Jack said, counting to three before they made their dash down the hallway to the stairs.

Cate's run was less dash and more hobble in her domed skirt with all its flounces, but they made it unseen. They climbed the circular stairs approaching the tower room.

As they rounded the bend, bringing the tower room door into full sight they both spotted the glow emanating from beneath the closed door. "Look!" Cate breathed.

Jack nodded, grabbing her elbow. "I see it. Point proven. Now, let's go."

Cate tugged back against her. "Just a second. We can't tell what's happening in there."

"Nope, and unless you brought your x-ray vision googles, we will never know."

“I didn’t but...”

Jack tugged on her arm again. “Cate, let’s just go.”

“Just listen! This stairwell goes to the ground level. We could take a quick peek from outside. See if we spot anything.”

With a vehement shake of his head, Jack disagreed. “No, no, absolutely not!”

“Okay, you stay here, I’ll go.”

“Cate, I can’t do that!”

Cate raised her eyebrows and grinned. “Looks like you’re going with me then. The longer we spend arguing about it the longer we’re here.”

He rolled his eyes at her as they began their descent of the stairs. “Oh, Cate, I hope you don’t come across any more mysteries. Let’s go.”

They hurried down the circular stone stairs and pushed through the door into the cool autumn evening.

Cate scrambled across the lawn to reach the area where the tower was visible. Jack hurried behind her. She spun to view the tower windows. Black nothingness met her gaze.

She furrowed her brow, changing positions as she studied the various windows. Only blackness stared back.

She shot Jack a puzzled glance. “We just saw lights in there.”

Jack waved his hand at the obviously dark windows. “Well, it’s dark now, Cate.”

Cate stared at the windows for several more moments. “Or are the windows blacked out? So, no one could see light?”

“Oh, come on,” Jack began, “how...”

Cate interrupted him. “Jack, look!” she exclaimed, pointing to the window.

Jack’s gaze followed her finger. He saw a flash of light from the tower window. Warm, yellow light gleamed from within the tower. A woman’s silhouette appeared limned in the light as she gazed out into the moonless sky.

CHAPTER 9

Cate stared up at the dark form of the woman at the window. A moment later, the woman let the drape slip from her hand as she stepped back, plunging the windows into darkness again.

“I knew it!” Cate exclaimed, clasping her hands together in delight. “Blackout curtains to make it appear that no one is there!”

Jack swallowed hard, glancing around as he rubbed the back of his neck. “We should go.”

Cate read the urgency in his voice and agreed. They crept back inside and picked their way through the halls to the bedroom, careful to avoid others.

Jack breathed a sigh of relief as they entered the closet and returned to their own time.

Cate stalked across the room, her fingers pressed against her forehead. “So, there is someone in the tower room. A woman, not just someone, a woman. And they are trying to hide her presence. That has to mean something. But who is it? Why is she there? She must be the mysterious ‘S’ from the note. Randolph was hiding her in the tower. But why? If he was madly in love with Victoria why did he bring her?”

Jack balanced his hands on his thighs as he doubled over, still recovering from the trip. “Cate, slow down, my heart is still returning to normal speed. I can’t keep up with all your questions.”

Cate continued her pacing. “They are definitely hiding her. But for what reason?”

Jack straightened and shook his head.

Cate pondered it for another moment before spinning to face him. "Are you thinking what I'm thinking?"

He raised his eyebrows at her. "Somehow I doubt it."

"We need more information. We need to go back."

Jack hung his head in his hands. "Definitely not what I was thinking."

Cate's jaw fell open. "Really? How are you not thinking that?"

"Go back? Nope, definitely wasn't thinking that, Cate. I hate going at all, let alone going back to a time when a man is about to commit murder to continue to hide a secret woman in the tower room."

Cate jabbed a finger at him. "So, you do think there's more to the story, and it somehow involves the mysterious 'S!'"

Jack screwed up his face and sighed, his hands falling to his hips. "Oh, Cate, you always know just how to twist what I say to support you."

After a moment, he chuckled. "You're one amusing lassie, when you're not dragging me back to a time when I have to wear a ruffled collar and almost get killed."

Cate rolled her eyes at him. "You're so dramatic. We weren't almost killed."

"I was almost killed!" he countered. "By my heart, when it almost attacked me."

Cate rolled her eyes again but couldn't stifle a giggle. "Oh stop. Be serious, we need a plan." She turned pensive again. "Hmm, when can we go again? We need a plan that allows us to investigate and perhaps talk to a few people. I realize the party is coming up and you'll be busy getting things ready, but I'd like to eke some time out this week."

"Whoa, whoa, Cate. Slow down." Jack held up his hands in front of him to signal for her to stop.

Cate's shoulders slumped. "Oh, please don't tell me you're not willing to investigate this! We learned way more than we knew when we first started! And even then, you thought it was worth looking into! Now we confirmed the existence of a mystery woman, and we suspect there may be more to the murder than the story from the articles, we need to press on!"

Jack heaved a sigh. "Oh, Cate."

Cate bit her lower lip, a frown forming. "It's my family, it's important to me. I realize I didn't know them, but I have no other family. The ghosts of my past are all I have."

He flicked his gaze in the air before returning it to her. “You’re lucky I like you, Cate.”

Cate clasped her hands together under her chin, a smile spreading across her face. “So, you’ll go with me?”

“Yes, you’ll just go without me if I don’t, and I don’t want that. But we only go with a plan I like. And we won’t just talk to random people. And we’re definitely not going to tell Randolph anything we know. We’re going to leave the past as intact as we can.”

Cate bobbed her head up and down, unable to conceal the grin spreading across her lips. “Deal. How’s Wednesday?”

“As good as any day I guess.”

“That gives us time to formulate a plan and make at least two trips before...”

“AT LEAST TWO?” Jack shouted before wagging a finger at her. “Wait a minute—”

“Possibly two,” Cate interrupted him, “if we find out something that needs followed up on. With the party coming up we won’t be doing much then and we’re running out of time!”

“Time is the one thing we have plenty of,” Jack joked.

“We don’t! The murder occurs on Halloween! And we’ll lose a whole week for the party if not more.”

“I’m now very excited for the party!”

Cate batted at his arm. “All right, funny guy. Well, I guess I’ll let you off the hook for now. I’ll come up with a plan and we can re-convene tomorrow to discuss it.”

Jack wiped his brow. “Whew, sounds good to me. I’m going home to enjoy my modern life.”

After changing, they said their goodbyes and Cate headed to her sitting room. She was too wired to sleep and used the time to come up with a plan for her next visit. With a notebook and pen in hand, she jotted notes about the trip. They could use the cover of distant cousins with some business of Jack’s bringing them to the area. It would allow them instant access to the family, but also explain any disappearances from the castle.

She smiled down at her plan before she tucked her notebook away in the drawer of the chaise’s side table and settled for the night.

After bounding through her morning routine driven by nervous energy, she and Riley made their way outside for a morning walk. Riley burst into a full run the moment his feet hit the gravel. Cate hurried behind him, sure he'd lead her straight to Jack.

The little dog did not disappoint, dodging around some hedges and straight to Jack. She found the two playing a game of tug-of-war as she caught up to him.

Jack waved and called a good morning as she approached.

"Good morning, Jack. Careful, he'll tear your arm off for that prize!" she said with a grin.

"Yes, I can see that. A mighty strong little rascal, this one!" Relinquishing the branch, Jack told the pup, "Okay, you win, big guy!" Riley, pleased with his new prize, carried the twig a safe distance from Jack and commenced gnawing on it.

Cate raised her eyebrows and offered Jack a tentative smile. "I have our plan all set!"

Jack groaned, letting his head fall between his shoulder blades. "I was hoping for twenty-four hours to recover, at least!"

"Time is of the essence! I spent last night planning, so we weren't delayed!"

"Okay, okay," Jack said, holding up his hands to admit defeat. "So, tell me this plan of yours."

"Well, I think you were right. We need to tell Randolph that we are distant cousins, part of the MacKenzie clan. That will give us access to the household and the family. We can use the ruse that we are in the area traveling while you are on business. That gives us an excuse to stay outside of the castle and come and go as we please. Our priority should be learning the lay of the land, having a brief discussion with Randolph and perhaps a few other household members. Just a casual conversation to see what he's like."

Jack stuck his hands on his hips. "I have so many objections."

"That's perfect," Cate interrupted. "I figured you could say that you are an attorney."

Jack let his eyes rise to the sky above. "Now I have even more."

Cate gave him an unimpressed stare. "I promise not to say anything to Randolph that would even give him a hint regarding what we're doing."

"Okay, okay. I must admit, it seems a reasonable plan and a good way to start pursuing this scheme."

Cate flashed a smile at him. "We should go back in the early afternoon, perhaps right after lunch. We don't want to interfere with a meal or preparation for a meal. Since we're seeing Randolph, it shouldn't be too much of an issue since he likely conducts business during this time."

"After lunch on Wednesday, I guess," Jack agreed. "If we must."

Cate cocked her head. "We must."

They chatted for a few more moments before Cate retrieved Riley and continued on their walk. All she needed to do was make it through Tuesday and they'd be off.

When the sun crested the moors on Wednesday morning, Cate sprang from her bed. Excited as a kid at Christmas, she went about her morning routine. She took Riley on a long walk so that he would be tired and ready for an afternoon nap. She busied herself with games of fetch and spent some time at the loch. Even with her full schedule, the morning dragged by.

After what seemed like an eternity, lunch arrived. Cate enjoyed spending the time in the castle's kitchen, having a lively discussion about pumpkin carving with the Frasers and Jack.

Afterward, Cate and Jack excused themselves, under the ruse of estate business. She settled Riley in her sitting room for a nap, then changed into her period clothing. When she was ready, she met Jack in the bedroom closet.

They both drew in a deep breath as they prepared to activate the timepiece and return to the 1850s. A nervous energy filled them both as they anticipated interacting with others in the time period for the first time.

Jack clasped his hand around Cate's and together they rubbed the timepiece until it began to slow.

Once the timepiece's second hand had slowed to a crawl, Jack whispered, "I forgot to ask, what's the plan for getting out of here to the front door?"

"Sneak down the back stairs?" Cate said with a shrug.

"As good a plan as any, I suppose," Jack agreed.

He cracked the closet door, peering into the bedroom. "It's clear, let's go."

Cate followed him for a repeat performance at the bedroom door. Finding the hallway clear, they made a dash down the hall and into the back stairway. They descended the steps, peering out of the door into the gardens. With no one in sight, they crept out of the door and, trying to remain hidden from anyone's sight, made their way to the front door.

"You sure you want to do this?" Jack asked one final time before announcing their arrival with the lion's head door knocker.

Cate nodded, unsure but unwilling to admit it. Jack lifted the knocker and let it thud against the door. Together, they waited for someone to answer the door. Within a few moments, an older gentleman opened the door to them.

"Yes?" he inquired.

Cate nodded to Jack who responded, "Jack MacKenzie and wife here to see my cousin, Lord Randolph MacKenzie."

"If you would be so kind as to follow me, sir, I will show you to where you may wait for Lord MacKenzie." The pair followed the man, whom Cate assumed was the household's butler, to the sitting room off of the foyer. "I shall announce your arrival to Lord MacKenzie at once, sir." He left the room, leaving the doors ajar behind him.

"Good job!" Cate whispered after he departed.

"Yes, good job me. I got us into your own house!"

Cate made a face at him but offered no further commentary. The two sat on pins and needles waiting for Randolph to arrive. Within a few moments, two men appeared in the doorway. Cate recognized Randolph from his painting in the gallery. The butler preceded him, introducing him upon entering.

Her ancestor studied the pair of them, his eyes narrowing as he flicked his gaze between them. Cate's pulse quickened as she stared at him. Was she looking at a murderer?

CHAPTER 10

Cate's heart thudded in her chest as she stared at her ancestor. Randolph dismissed the butler and approached Jack.

Jack extended his hand for a handshake tentatively. "Lord MacKenzie, it's a pleasure to meet you, sir. I'm a distant cousin of yours, Jack MacKenzie."

Randolph grabbed his hand firmly and pumped it. "Jack MacKenzie, I can't say I've heard of you, laddie, but family is always welcome at Dunhaven Castle."

"Ah, this, sir, is my wife, Catherine. I sent word ahead through the post of our arrival. It appears you haven't received my letter."

Cate hid a smile at Jack's quick thinking. He knew enough to fib that they had sent a letter announcing their arrival. The mail in this era was far from dependable.

"I haven't. The only thing you can count on with the post is that you can't count on it!" Randolph let out a hearty laugh as he approached Cate.

As was customary, Cate remained seated, extending her hand, palm facing down for him to take. He brushed her hand with his fingers as he bowed to her. "Mrs. MacKenzie, a pleasure."

"Likewise, Lord MacKenzie," she answered.

He cocked his head and narrowed his eyes. "Do I detect an American accent, lassie?"

A smile spread across her face as she answered. "You do, Lord MacKenzie, I hail from the other side of the pond."

“I see. Welcome to Scotland, then! And please, call me Randolph. We’re all family here.” He turned to Jack and motioned toward the couch. “Please, sit down. Can I offer you a scotch?”

Jack licked his lips, shooting a questioning gaze at Cate. She gave a slight nod, signaling that he should accept the offer.

“How kind of you,” Jack accepted.

Randolph poured two glasses of scotch. “Anything for the lady?”

“No, thank you,” Cate declined.

“Don’t tell me you’re a teetotaler, Mrs. MacKenzie,” Randolph said, laughing as he handed a glass off to Jack.

Cate smiled at him as he sat across from them. “No, but I typically only enjoy those beverages at a much later hour.”

He smiled at her then turned toward Jack. “What brings you to my fair land, cousin Jack?”

“Well, as I explained in my letter, I am in the area on some business. I hoped that I could meet some family while here. I apologize again for arriving unannounced.”

Randolph waved his hand in the air as he settled back in his seat. “Bah, nothing to worry about, cousin! And what is your business?”

“I am an attorney, mainly land dealings and holdings,” Jack lied, before downing a large gulp of scotch.

“I see. Interesting. And you’ll be staying on with us at Dunhaven Castle?” Randolph inquired, his head nodding.

Jack glanced at Cate. “Eh, no, sir,” he stammered.

“We’ve taken a place of our own, on the outskirts of town,” Cate explained. “With Jack’s extended business here, we considered it best to set up our own household.”

“Nonsense! You’re family! Cancel your contract and stay here. You’re an attorney, I’m sure you can find your way out of it.”

Jack offered a nervous chuckle. “While that may be, I am also a man of my word. I’d not cancel a contract out of turn.”

“Man of your word, eh? Good man. Honest and independent, just like a Mackenzie.” Randolph nodded to him in approval, his eyebrows raised. “Well, surely you’ll dine with us often while you’re here, I hope?”

Jack began to answer when Cate interrupted him. “How gracious of you, we are delighted to accept your invitation at a time that suits you and your wife, Victoria.”

“Perhaps Monday? Victoria is throwing together a little soiree, nothing fancy, I’m certain she’d love to have you attend.”

“We are happy to accept,” Cate answered him.

“Wonderful! I understand the festivities begin at six o’clock. Oh, I’m sure Lady MacKenzie would love to have you for tea, Mrs. MacKenzie. It will be nice for her to have a female friend. I do feel rather sorry for her, moving here to the fringes of civilization.” He puckered his lips as he frowned at his scotch.

“We shall plan to arrive at six,” Cate responded. “It’s such a lovely castle, I’m sure she is contented with such a home despite its remote location.”

Randolph smiled at her over the rim of his glass. “Such a gracious wife you have, cousin. While it’s true Lady MacKenzie wants for nothing, her happiness is still vital to me, as I’m sure yours is to my dear cousin.”

Cate smiled at him to acknowledge his compliment.

Jack took the final sip of his beverage. “It certainly is! Well, we won’t take up any more of your time this afternoon. Thank you for meeting with us and I look forward to dining with you and Lady MacKenzie soon.”

“Of course,” Randolph said, standing as Jack stood.

Cate also rose to her feet.

Randolph pulled the timepiece from within his pocket, flipping it open to the check the time. Cate’s pulse quickened as she stared at her ancestor holding the same timepiece that now hung around her neck, hidden under her dress.

He flicked the gold cover closed. “Anything for family.”

The statement sent a chill up her spine as the impact of the moment was staggering.

He shoved the watch into his pocket and thrust out his hand to shake Jack’s, then nodded to Cate. “I shall look forward to seeing you both again soon.”

He wandered to the wall and pulled a cord hanging from the ceiling to summon the butler. Within moments, the butler strode through the door. “Ah, Thomson, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie were just leaving, if you could show them out. And please collect their address so that Lady MacKenzie can correspond with Mrs. MacKenzie about an invitation to tea.”

“Very good, m’lord,” he answered with a nod of his head.

Randolph stalked from the room as Thomson motioned for Cate to approach the desk in the room. She picked up the quill, feeling as though she were in the stone age as she scratched it across the thick paper.

She folded the paper and handed it off to the butler. "Thank you, Thomson. And we can see ourselves out so we do not need to trouble you."

"It's no trouble at all, Mrs. MacKenzie," he responded, leading them into the foyer.

Cate's heart sank as she realized they'd have to sneak back into the castle in order to return to their time. Could they enter and navigate to the bedroom unscathed again?

Cate licked her lips as her heart pounded. She needed a diversion, and she needed one quickly. She bit her lower lip hard as Thomson swung the front door open.

With a deep inhale, she threw her hand across her forehead, swooning into Jack's arms. She grasped his jacket as she fell. "Oh, I feel so faint!"

Jack's eyes went wide at the scene, and he caught her before she fell, panic lacing his voice. "Cate!"

Thomson pushed the door closed, his thick eyebrows squashed together as he studied Cate. "Oh, dear. Is the lady quite all right, sir?"

Jack swallowed hard, his face whiter than normal and shot a panicked glance at the butler. "I don't know, perhaps she should lie down?"

Cate moaned as she fluttered her eyelashes, her head wagging and back forth. "Oh, yes, yes, if I could only lie down."

"Of course, madam. Sir, if you could help her up the stairs, I will see to finding her a bedroom to rest in until she has recovered." The butler motioned toward the massive staircase leading up.

Jack fought to get his arms around the fabric of Cate's dress and lifted her into his arms. She flung her arms around his neck as he mounted the stairs. With the butler in front of them, she risked a glance at Jack, giving him a wink.

He screwed up his face as she returned to playing unsteady before realization dawned on him.

The butler led them down the upstairs hall, taking them to a bedroom in the same hall as the one they needed to reach.

He pushed open the door and stood aside as Jack carried Cate through, placing her on the bed. "Shall I call a doctor, sir?"

Jack perched on the edge of the bed, clasping Cate's hand in his. "No, it's likely the journey has been too much for her. I'm sure she only needs a moment to rest and recover, then we will be on our way. Please, don't let us keep you."

"Thank you, sir. I will check back with you in the event that you should need anything, or the lady's condition worsens."

Jack offered him a nod before returning his attention to Cate. "Thank you, Thomson."

With the dismissal, the butler exited the room, leaving the door ajar.

Moments after he exited, Cate ceased her sick act, popping her eyes wide and sitting up. "Wow, I can't believe that worked! Hurry! We'll make a run for the bedroom!"

"Best idea I've heard all day," Jack agreed as he pulled her off the bed.

The pair crept to the door, checking for anyone in the hall. Finding it empty, they made a dash across and down the hall, entering the bedroom and racing to the closet.

Cate removed the timepiece from the folds of her dress. Both of them clutched it, rubbing it in unison. The second hand speeded up, soon returning to keeping normal time.

Even Cate breathed a sigh of relief this time.

"Oh," Jack said, putting a hand over his heart, "I always feel so much better once we're home."

"What an incredible experience though! My ancestor, Randolph, right there in front of me! And did you see the watch? He held the same watch that I inherited. It really is mind-blowing." Cate bit her lower lip as the excitement bubbled to the surface.

"That's one way of describing it, I suppose. Clever stunt, I was becoming concerned about navigating back to this closet without being caught."

She grinned at him and curtsied. "Thank you!"

Jack rubbed the back of his neck, raising his eyebrows. "And, I must admit, that was quite an experience. Randolph seems to be quite an interesting character. I rather liked him!"

Cate smiled again and nodded. "I did, too! And now, do you still find it believable that he killed a man because he gave a questionable glance at his wife at the table?"

Jack shrugged, tugging at his collar. "I suppose it's plausible. He was very family-oriented."

Cate's shoulders slumped at the words. "Oh, come on, Victoria's happiness is vital to him, anything for family, honest and independent, that's what a MacKenzie is! Does he sound like a man who kills someone over a glance, then lies about it?"

"Perhaps he snapped? And maybe guilt got to him?"

"He didn't seem like a hothead," Cate said.

Jack puckered his lips and shook his head. "No, he didn't. He seemed like a right fellow. I felt bad lying to him."

Cate nodded, her lips forming a momentary frown. "A necessary drawback. But consider how much better it will be when we prove his innocence, and he can live a happy life with his wife and child!"

Jack jabbed a finger in the air. "If we prove his innocence. Now, I better get back to work. I'll leave you to come up with a strategy for Monday, well Sunday for us. I will be on pins and needles all week."

Cate beamed at having a trip to the past she wouldn't need to convince Jack to take. "Don't worry, I'll have a plan locked down in no time!"

With a wink, she spun on her heel to leave the closet.

"Oh, Cate," Jack said, stopping her.

She twisted to face him. "

Before you leave, what did you write on the paper for our address?"

"I didn't," Cate admitted with a shrug. "I wrote a note stating to leave any correspondence with the postmaster until we had set up our household. I hope that works."

"Ah, good thinking," Jack said.

Cate smiled as she nodded before returning to her bedroom suite. Between the encounter with her ancestor and the promise of another trip to the past, she could barely contain her excitement.

Details raced through her mind about the trip they'd just taken and the upcoming travel. In only four short days, she'd have to have everything ready. She wrinkled her nose. Four short days? Four days too many, by her count.

After changing her clothes, she considered a trip before their dinner Monday. With correspondence expected from Lady MacKenzie, they probably should take a trip back to collect their mail. She'd mention it to Jack when she saw him next.

She gathered Riley in her arms for a pre-dinner walk. As they strolled along the path, she gazed up at the castle with new eyes. She pictured Randolph raising his family here, or rather, missing that opportunity due to the circumstances thrust upon him. She marveled at the castle, at how much different it was yet how unchanged. The castle in Randolph's time had not yet included the additional wing. Cate stared at the wing, recalling how the castle had looked without it.

Her gaze shifted to the tower. Cate's mind returned to the mystery she was trying to solve. Who was this mysterious woman Randolph kept in the tower? And for what purpose? Randolph seemed personable, friendly and in love with his wife, not like the type of man who kept a woman imprisoned against her will. But was he hiding a huge secret behind his friendly smile?

CHAPTER 11

Cate pondered Randolph's motives as she stared up at the tower. Staring at the tower room in the present time offered her no answers, though. She'd be forced to wait until Sunday to seek any further information.

Even if she convinced Jack to travel back before then, they wouldn't visit the castle. One uninvited trip this week would be enough.

Cate spent the rest of her day and evening attempting to read while daydreaming about her adventure in the past.

She sprang from her bed the next morning, searching out Jack on her morning walk with Riley.

"Good morning, Lady Cate."

Cate closed her cardigan tighter around her. "Good morning. Have you fully recovered from the time travel trip?"

Jack shot his gaze up to her as he dug at the base of a bush. "In a word, no. And I am quite glad that we have days to prepare for another."

"Actually, I was hoping to make a trip before our dinner party."

Jack froze, his shovel half-full of dirt. He flicked his gaze up to her, his jaw hanging open.

Cate stuck her hands in her pockets and shrugged. "We should check our mail."

Jack pressed his lips together in a thin line. "We shouldn't take any chances. We could be caught."

“We’ll have to be careful. Think of it as practice for our future trips. We’re going to have to do this several more times.”

Jack stood the shovel up and propped his hands on it. “I shudder to think.” After a moment, he sighed and nodded. “Okay, we’ll go Friday morning early. Minimize the chances of being caught.”

Cate grinned at him, pleased with the plan as nervous anticipation already filled her. She barely slept that night, but bounded out of bed the following morning to ready herself for the trip. They’d leave around 6:30 a.m., travel to town on foot and inquire about any correspondence. With the slow movement of time in the present, they should be able to return before breakfast and never be missed.

Cate met an already prepared Jack in the bedroom closet right on the dot of six thirty.

He sighed as she held the watch out for him to grasp. “You’d think I’d be getting used to this by now but I’m still a bundle of nerves.”

Cate lifted her eyebrows as she flicked a gaze up to him. “Just wait until we have to dine with them. This is an easy trip!”

Jack shuddered all over. “Don’t remind me. Okay, let’s go check our mail.”

They grasped the watch together, rubbing it in unison. Within seconds, the second hand slowed, and they slipped back into the past. They crept out of the castle, meeting no one at this hour of the morning.

The sun crested the moors as they set off toward town on a path obscured from most of the castle’s view. The lugging of her awkward period clothing made the walk more taxing on Cate, both of them pronouncing their newfound appreciation for modern clothing more than once during their trip. After a small struggle, they made it to town, heading straight to the postmaster.

Their efforts were rewarded. The postmaster had one letter from Lady MacKenzie for Cate. They thanked him then hurried back to the castle. By now, the household would be stirring but with careful timing they made their way back to the bedroom closet undetected. They returned to their own time with no issues. Jack breathed his customary sigh of relief after they were back.

Like a giddy child, she waved the letter in the air in front of her with a grin. “I can’t wait to read it!”

“Well, I can wait to hear about it, I’m going to change before breakfast and head down there. I’m starving.”

“Me too,” Cate admitted. “Time travel makes me hungry.”

Jack chuckled at her terrible joke as they parted ways to change before breakfast. Cate placed the letter from Victoria on her side table in her sitting room, giving it a forlorn glance as she exited the room for breakfast.

She ate her breakfast in the library, checking her email and completing a few other tasks as she ate. Her mind continued to return to the correspondence waiting for her upstairs. Before she could read it, she promised Riley his morning walk. Despite her obvious interest in the letter, she still enjoyed watching Riley romp around the grounds.

After returning to the castle, she curled up on her chaise with the letter in hand. With careful precision, she unsealed the wax seal. She marveled at the weight of the paper and the script writing even before unfolding it, running her hand over the name written on the outside: Mrs. Jack MacKenzie. Cate held back an eye roll at the salutation with no mention of her own name at all.

She unfolded the letter, appreciating the elaborate penmanship before reading the brief correspondence.

Dearest Cousin Catherine -

I learned from my dear husband, Lord Randolph MacKenzie, of your recent arrival in our little hamlet. I am most eager to make your acquaintance. My husband has informed me he has already invited you to our small party on Monday, 13 October and I am delighted that you have already accepted. Please arrive at Dunhaven Castle at five thirty in the evening, a time prior to other guests.

I look so forward to meeting you in person. I am sure we will become fast friends. As I expect our meeting will be a success, I would also invite you to do me the honor of paying a call for afternoon tea on Wednesday, 15 October. You may express your acceptance in person when we meet. I expect you have much to do in setting up your household and do not expect correspondence to be at the top of your list.

Yours in friendship,

Victoria

Excitement coursed through her as she read the letter. Dining with her ancestors was both thrilling and overwhelming. She glanced at the letter again, appreciating all the sentiment that a handwritten note from this era carried. It was a marked change from the correspondence of today, most often hastily typed and lacking any warm regard or personal sentiment.

A list of next steps filled Cate's mind. She would need to prepare Jack for the manners expected from a visiting couple for a dinner party, since they would not be seated near each other for dinner, as was the custom in 1856. Cate would also need to inform him they must travel back again on October fifteenth for Cate to attend tea with Victoria.

At least for that visit, Jack need only to find a spot to hide out and wait for Cate to finish her business. She imagined the news that they would be making two visits to the past in a matter of only a handful of days would go over like a lead balloon.

As she bit her lower lip as she pondered the best way to inform Jack of the latest developments, Mrs. Fraser knocked and entered with a tray of lunch.

"Didn't mean to be presumptuous, but I thought I'd bring your lunch early. Since you have a meeting with that woman this afternoon," she said, referring to Mrs. Campbell, "I figured you may want to eat early."

"Thank you, Mrs. Fraser, good idea!" Cate answered, folding the letter, and placing it on her side table.

The excitement of the correspondence from Victoria had almost made her forget about her meeting later. What a perfect way to spoil her fun, she mused. Either way, it was necessary. She would have to wait until tomorrow to discuss plans further with Jack.

After lunch, party planning details consumed Cate's afternoon. The meeting left her spent, but they accomplished a good deal. As she watched Mrs. Campbell's car pull away from the house, she found herself longing for her staff dinner. Despite the early hour, she made her way to the kitchen.

She had left Riley with Mrs. Fraser for the afternoon while she met with Mrs. Campbell.

Upon arriving at the kitchen, she found Mrs. Fraser wiping off a wet Riley. "What happened to you?"

"Went and got himself a mess again," Mrs. Fraser answered her. "I let him out earlier and the little monkey disappeared on me again and got caught in that rainstorm that passed through."

"Oh, Riley." Cate shook her head at him as Mrs. Fraser set him down on the floor. "What is with you and your disappearing acts anymore?"

The pup offered no answers beyond a mischievous gleam in his eye.

"And how did your meeting go today, Lady Cate?"

Cate sank into her chair and let her chin rest in her hands. "Very well, I believe. Although, I am exhausted. The details of this party seem endless!"

Mrs. Fraser shot her a coy grin as she removed cookies from a baking tray. "I would have thought the company was the most exhausting part of that meeting."

Cate returned her smile. "She does seem to make even the simplest task rather tedious, but she has a good handle on planning an event of this magnitude. For that, I am appreciative, I wouldn't know where to start."

Mrs. Fraser tossed the spatula into the soapy water in the sink. "Ah, I don't believe that, Lady Cate. As bright as you are, I expect you'd do just fine on your own!"

Cate pushed herself to stand, wandering to the sink to wash the dirty utensil. "Thank you for the vote of confidence, Mrs. Fraser! Speaking of planning, have you planned your pumpkin carving? We're only two weeks away from the party!"

Mrs. Fraser eyed her as she dried the spatula with a wrinkled nose, but allowed her to do a little work. "Oh, I have. I've got a special design in mind, but no one is getting any details before the contest!"

Cate laughed as she tossed the item back in the drawer. "Fair enough. I haven't even contemplated mine. I'm so pleased everyone liked the idea enough to chip in. Even Mr. Smythe and Gayle are excited to create their own pumpkin carving for the competition."

"I think it's a fun idea, Lady Cate. No doubt Isla didn't agree but I think it's splendid."

"Thank you. Yes, she was concerned about it not being what she called 'appropriate' but it's all in good fun."

Mrs. Fraser nodded in agreement. They chitchatted a few moments longer, with Cate pitching in here and there to help with dinner preparations as much as Mrs. Fraser would allow. They enjoyed a leisurely dinner filled with fun conversation about the upcoming event.

After dinner, Cate made a list of the fine points of dining in the 1800s she wanted to discuss with Jack before their dinner invitation. She reviewed it and, once she was satisfied, retired for the evening.

The following morning, Cate took a long walk with Riley before spending the rest of her day researching for her book. She tried to focus her energy even though she found herself distracted much of the time. The day dragged by with evening finally approaching. The sun hung low on the horizon as Jack met her in the library after dinner.

Cate pulled out her list to share with him. His eyes widened at the length of it, and he asked if she could provide a cheat sheet that he could hide in his hand. Cate laughed despite Jack's insistence that he wasn't joking. She assured him he would be fine. The quick thinking he'd displayed on their last visit made her confident he'd breeze through the dinner.

With the rules squared away, Cate let Jack head home for the evening. They planned on meeting tomorrow around four to dress. They would then travel back and leave enough time to sneak out of the castle and to the front door for their five thirty call. On his way out, Jack expressed his genuine hope that he would sleep tonight. Cate agreed, stating that she was far too excited to sleep. It wasn't excitement that threatened to keep Jack up, he confessed.

She spent most of her night tossing and turning with anxious anticipation. She frittered her morning away with various tasks, finding herself checking the timepiece frequently as she waited for the hours to tick away.

She met Jack at the front door at 4 p.m., ushering him inside to change. She nestled Riley into his bed near the fireplace in her sitting room before she began her transformation into Victorian lady.

With her hair pulled into a chignon and decorated with a ruby hair comb, she pulled on the ruby red gown, struggling to fasten it. When she'd finished, she smoothed the lace top before she fussed with the bustle and train in the back.

After finally completing her dressing, she made her way to the bedroom to meet Jack, who awaited her in his formal dinner wear.

“Wow, that’s quite a dress!” Jack said as she tried to make her way through the door in the hooped skirt.

“It is a bit unwieldy, I must admit,” Cate said, hoping she was able to sneak anywhere on the estate in this much fabric.

Jack eyed the massive skirt. “Please don’t fake faint again. I don’t think I could navigate holding you in that dress.”

“I’ll have to try another type of subterfuge,” Cate said, leading the way to the closet.

Jack followed her, taking a deep breath and wiping a bead of sweat from his brow. “I hope I don’t do anything wrong.”

“You’ll be fine, I’m sure! If you do anything that wrong, I’ll kick you under the table,” she said, grinning at him and holding the timepiece out.

They both grasped it and started the process to return to 1856. Within moments, they were standing in the bedroom closet in another century. If Cate’s calculations were correct, they should have a clear path for them as most servants would be preparing for dinner and the household occupants would be dressing.

They crept through the halls until they stepped into the cool October air, breathing a sigh of relief. With extra time before they needed to present themselves, they strolled to the loch. As the time approached five thirty, they made their way to the front entrance.

Jack used the door knocker, and Thomson greeted them. “Welcome back to Dunhaven Castle, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie. May I take your wrap, ma’am?”

Cate removed her capelet, handing it to Thomson.

“Lord and Lady MacKenzie are waiting in the east sitting room, if you’ll follow me.”

They followed the butler to the sitting room where he announced them as they entered.

“Ah, Cousin Jack,” Randolph said as they entered, “glad you could make it to our little party.”

He approached Cate, grasping her hand and bowing to her. “Mrs. MacKenzie, lovely to see you again.”

Cate acknowledged his greeting, peering over his shoulder to Victoria seated on the loveseat. With delicate features, beautiful dark, exotic eyes, and an exquisitely shaped mouth, Cate could understand why her beauty was renowned. Her dark hair was swept up, framing a delicate neck around which hung a beautiful emerald necklace.

Jack approached, delicately taking her hand, imitating Randolph and bowing to her. "Lady MacKenzie, a pleasure to make your acquaintance."

Cate gave a slight curtsy, conveying a similar sentiment.

Randolph made his way to the bar cart. "Drinks?"

"I'll have what you're having," Jack answered, sitting across from Victoria. Cate chose a seat next to her on the loveseat.

Cate eyed the sherry in Victoria's hand. "I'll have a small sherry."

"I hope you are feeling better, Mrs. MacKenzie," Victoria began.

"Yes, I am, thank you. And please thank Thomson for his hospitality when I took ill. After a few moments of rest, I felt strong enough to travel back home. We weren't able to locate him, so we took our leave causing no further disruptions."

Victoria sipped at the yellow liquid. "And I hope you didn't find it awkward to arrive earlier than our other guests, but I hoped to spend a small amount of time with family only."

Cate accepted the small glass handed to her by Randolph. "Not at all, and thank you so very much for extending the private invitation."

"Of course. I understand from my husband that you will not be staying with us. I hope the stories of our home haven't put you off."

Randolph huffed as he handed Jack a scotch. "Oh, Victoria, please, let's not start with that."

"The truth of the matter, Lady MacKenzie, is that we considered it best to establish our own household given that we were unsure how long we may be staying. We did not want to upset your household if our plans unexpectedly changed."

"It's no upset at all and I understand how important family is to my husband. But if you shan't be staying with us, I do hope you will accept my invitation for afternoon tea?"

Cate sipped at her sherry, a smile spreading across her face. "Of course, I accept your gracious invitation."

Victoria offered her a gracious grin. "Wonderful. I hope you will be a fixture on the property despite not taking up residence here."

“Yes, please consider our doors always open to you,” Randolph noted.

Cate glanced to him to nod, finding he held her gaze longer than she expected. Odd, Cate ruminated to herself, he seemed to be staring at her. She swallowed hard, her posture stiffening before she focused her attention on Victoria again.

The women made further conversation about how the move was going for the couple while Randolph and Jack discussed business and the prospect of an upcoming shooting party.

Soon after, other guests began arriving. Cate and Jack did their best to mingle amongst the others with Victoria and Randolph providing a good bit of the small amount of background information on their newly arrived family members.

At dinner, Cate and Jack found themselves seated across from each other as was the customary practice. Despite the trepidation they both experienced about trying to make conversation with people from centuries prior to theirs, they made it through dinner.

Cate watched each of the footmen present in the dining room. Which one, she wondered, was the servant who would be murdered? It was impossible to tell without knowing their names.

She scrutinized their movements as closely as possible, trying to glean any details she could about them. None of them seemed to pay particular attention to Victoria. She recalled the reported motive for the murder was too intimate a glance shared between Victoria and the victim.

No such glances occurred at this dinner party. She rejoined Jack at post-dinner drinks and they were briefly able to compare notes before beginning to socialize again.

With the plan to leave the party before the other guests so they could sneak to the bedroom while their hosts were engaged with the others, Cate gave Jack their pre-arranged signal.

He nodded at her and she excused herself to Victoria, stating they were leaving earlier as she remained tired from their journey north.

“Leaving?” Randolph asked, overhearing Cate’s conversation with Victoria.

“Yes, I’m afraid so,” Jack stepped in, “I’m afraid the journey has been taxing on Mrs. MacKenzie.”

“I understand,” Randolph said, “If it isn’t too much, I’d hoped to have a brief word with both of you before you left.”

Cate and Jack shared a glance. Cate gave him a slight nod, signaling he should accept the invitation. She wasn't sure they had much other choice.

"By all means," Jack said, nodding to Randolph.

"Wonderful, follow me, we can speak uninterrupted in my study. Victoria, please excuse me, I shan't be long."

The pair followed him from the room. Cate's heart raced as she trailed him down the hall to a set of double doors leading to an office. Randolph crossed to the bar cart, pouring himself a drink before he stood behind his desk.

Cate pressed her lips together as she stood in bewildered silence. Her pulse raced as she wondered what the purpose of the secret meeting may be.

Randolph sipped at his scotch and narrowed his eyes at them. "Well, now that we are alone, I was hoping you'd tell me who you really are."

CHAPTER 12

Cate's heart thudded against her ribs as Randolph stared at them, waiting for an answer. She bit her lower lip as it trembled, shooting a shocked glance at Jack.

Jack swallowed hard. "I'm sorry? I'm your cousin, Jack. We aren't closely related, I believe..."

Randolph waved his hand in the air, cutting off Jack's words. "Yes, yes, I know the cover story. Cousins, distant, a letter was sent but never arrived. You're staying on the outskirts of town, but I inquired after you and no one heard a thing. In a town this size, the arrival of a new MacKenzie would have been the talk of everyone, so I have my doubts that your story is true."

"Well, we..." Cate tried, also stammering. "We're not... we didn't..."

"Perhaps I'm asking the wrong question," Randolph interrupted her. "Rather than WHO are you, perhaps I should ask WHEN are you from?"

Cate froze, eyeing the timepiece sticking out of his pocket before glancing at Jack.

"I'll take that as an affirmation that my theory was correct," Randolph said. "You're time travelers. Future, I'd say, since neither of you are one of my parents or grandparents."

Cate swallowed hard and nodded. "Yes, you are correct."

He sipped at his drink, a slight smile on his lips. "I'd ask what you're doing here but I shouldn't know that. But now that I am aware of the circumstances surrounding your visits, that should make whatever you're here to do easier for you."

Jack winced and clasped his hands in front of him. "Sorry about lying to you, but you can imagine the position we're in, I'm sure."

"Absolutely," Randolph agreed.

"Thanks for your understanding. We'll take our leave now and return to our own time. Please enjoy the rest of your evening."

"Oh, before you leave, Catherine, you will still attend tea with my wife?"

Cate's forehead crinkled at the question and she nodded. "Yes."

"Oh good, I worry about her adjustment to country life. I'm certain it would make her happy."

Cate smiled at him again as she and Jack turned to leave.

"One more thing," Randolph said.

They turned back, and he eyed each of them, his eyes narrowed. "If you're time travelers, that means one of you is a MacKenzie and one of you is a Reid. I'm going to bet you're the MacKenzie." He pointed to Cate.

A grin swept over Cate's features. "I am, yes."

"Ah, I knew it, I knew it. She's got the MacKenzie spunk. But, by golly, you're a Yank!"

Jack tugged at his collar and grinned. "A little too much, in my opinion, sir."

"And you've all the practicality of a Reid," Randolph added.

Cate chuckled at the sentiment. "A little too much, in my opinion."

Randolph smiled at them. "Well, I won't hold you back any further, I'm sure you know the way to wherever will return you. I look forward to seeing you both again and good luck to you in whatever it is you're trying to do."

"Thank you," Cate said as they stepped from the room.

They hurried without a word to each other up the main staircase and to the bedroom closet. They returned to the present, where Jack breathed another sigh of relief.

"Wow," Cate said.

Jack tugged his collar open and wrinkled his forehead. "You aren't kidding! How did he figure it out? Are we the worst time travelers ever?"

Cate laughed as she tugged her train behind her, passing into the bedroom. "He strikes me as being intelligent. And we had some rather large gaps in our story in retrospect."

“Our second meeting only and he calls us right out. I didn’t think I was going to stay upright.”

“Silver lining, we don’t have to sneak around as much. Now he knows, I get the impression he also realizes we’re doing something back there and that if push came to shove, he’d cover for us.”

Jack put his hands on his hips. “Yeah, I’m not sure I want to push our luck on that.”

“Me either, I agree we should continue to be careful but at least some pressure is off.”

“I could use some of your optimism, Cate.”

“Or my spunk,” she said, pointing to him with a wink.

“You have that to spare, lassie. Oh, I can’t believe we have to do this again in two days.” Jack rubbed his forehead with his fingertips.

Cate sank onto the bed, the fabric of her dress falling to her ankles. “Hey, you’ve got it easy! You just have to stay hidden. I have all the hard work.”

“Speaking of hard work, did you notice anything out of the ordinary during the dinner?”

Cate shook her head and shrugged as she toyed with the lace on her sleeve. “I didn’t. If there is an affair, it’s well hidden. Although, I don’t believe that story. I’m not sure which servant it was from the men that were serving tonight, but I didn’t see anything suspicious.”

“Neither did I. It would be helpful if we could identify the servant.”

“I agree. It doesn’t help that there will be no pictures of him. We only have his name. Our best bet is to continue to travel back and spend time in the household and hope to identify him by his name.”

Jack scowled at the statement. “Not what I wanted to hear. But I agree.”

“We’re almost halfway through the month, leaving us only two-and-a-half weeks to get more information. It doesn’t help that in less than a week we’ll be tethered to our time for a week.” Cate flung her arms in the air.

“I can’t say that I’m upset being tethered here as you put it. But we’ll do what we can before your guests arrive and after.”

Cate rose to her feet, steadying herself as the dress shifted. “Thanks, Jack. I think it’s time we get out of these clothes.”

“I agree. And you’re welcome. I’m actually starting to find this interesting. Randolph seems like a good man. I hope we can help him. I hope you’re right about his innocence.”

Cate smiled at him and nodded as she tugged her train up. "I'm glad! Now, let's change out of these clothes."

Jack loosened his collar further with a grin. "I'll second that."

"Me too. I agree with you on the clothing perspective!"

He pressed his hand to his heart. "Oh, wow! You mean you agree with me on something? I'm flattered!"

She rolled her eyes at him, laughing as she stepped into the hall. "See you tomorrow, Jack."

"See you tomorrow, Cate. I'll let myself out when I've changed into normal clothes."

Cate toddled back to her room, gaining a new admiration for the women of this century. Wearing these dresses was not an easy feat. Neither was undressing alone, but she managed, feeling as though she was wearing nothing but air in her normal clothes compared to the weight of the evening dress.

She was exhausted after the evening, not only from traipsing about in the dress but also from the demanding social engagement. The tension she experienced most of the night hit her like a palette of bricks. After changing, she took Riley out for a short walk then cuddled under a blanket on her chaise with Riley curled on her lap. It didn't take long before she was nodding off. With that, she turned in early, sleeping well despite the day's excitement.

She awoke the next morning still riding the high of her Victorian-era dinner. Her trip the following day pushed to the forefront of her mind. She spent over an hour selecting the dress she wanted to wear for her tea with Victoria. After a long deliberation, she selected a pink and white striped gown.

After lunch, Cate spent the time doing some research. While on a break, she found an email waiting from Molly.

Cate! We're less than a week away! I'm so excited! I can't believe in four days I'll be on a plane to England and in five I'll be in Scotland staying at a castle with a Countess! I have been talking nonstop to anyone who will listen about my upcoming trip! I think Jeff is getting annoyed with me. Well, I can't tell if he's more annoyed that I keep reminding him about your turn of good luck or if he's annoyed by my lack of focus on the job. Either way, in four days, I won't have to think about him or work or Aberdeen for ten whole days! I am counting the days down!

FOUR TO GO!

Molly

Cate smiled at her computer screen. Molly's enthusiasm for her upcoming trip thrilled her. Putting her time traveling on hold would be a disappointment, but Molly's presence should more than make up for it.

Before Molly's arrival, though, she had a few trips to the past to make. They brought a smile to her face as she typed a reply to Molly, stating how eager she was for her arrival and that she, too, was counting down the days. After finishing her email, she went back to her work, concluding just before dinner.

After dinner, she discussed a plan with Jack for their trip the following day. He detailed an entire plan of traveling to town and putting in a few appearances to cover their tracks while Cate enjoyed tea with Lady MacKenzie. He hoped the plan would make up for the lack of scuttlebutt in the town over their arrival.

With a solid plan in place, Cate slipped between the sheets to count down the hours. She tossed and turned most of the night as excitement coursed through her. Regardless of her lack of sleep, she sprang from her bed the next morning.

As she lounged on the banks of the loch with Riley, she gazed at the reflection of the castle, imagining the tea set Victoria may use, the tea sandwiches, scones, and cookies. Would Victoria wear a blue dress? Or perhaps a rose one?

She smiled at the vision of the tea she'd concocted in her head. Soon enough she would find out firsthand what the tea set looked like and what fashions Victoria would wear.

She returned to the castle and, after her lunch, she began her preparations for the trip. She fussed with her hair, trying several styles before settling on one and starting the process of dressing.

She worked through the complicated fastening, biting her lower lip as she stretched her arms behind her. After completing her efforts, she tottered down the hall, meeting Jack in the 1850s bedroom.

The two entered the closet and used the timepiece to travel back to 1856. They slipped through the halls unnoticed, circling around the castle and parting ways in the gravel driveway. With a wave to Cate, Jack made his way toward town as she turned back toward the castle.

As she approached the castle's main entrance, she smoothed her skirts and fussed with a lock of hair. Thomson answered the door seconds after she knocked.

"Please come in, Mrs. MacKenzie. Lady MacKenzie is awaiting you." Thomson motioned for her to follow him, leading him down the hall toward the tearoom.

Victoria sat at the table in the middle of the large white marble floor with a baby balanced on her lap. She glanced up with a gracious grin. "Mrs. MacKenzie, welcome. I am so grateful that you could join me for tea."

As Cate entered the room, Victoria nodded to the woman standing nearby. The woman rushed to relieve Victoria of the child, exiting the room in an instant.

"Please sit down, Mrs. MacKenzie."

Cate approached the table, taking a seat next to Victoria, and removing her gloves. Victoria poured tea into two porcelain cups with red roses.

"Thank you for the invitation, Lady MacKenzie. I appreciate how welcoming you have been in my first few days in Dunhaven."

Victoria smiled at her, offering her a tea sandwich. "Please, call me Victoria, we're family. And how have you been finding our little hamlet?"

Cate selected one and nibbled on it before sipping her tea. "Quite charming, Victoria."

"I detect an American accent. Where in America are you from?" Victoria inquired.

"The midwestern United States. You may know of Chicago? It is the closest large city to where I was raised."

Victoria nodded her head. "And how did you meet my dear husband's cousin, Jack?"

Cate stuck to the backstory that she and Jack had prepared. "I was visiting my aunt in New York. Jack was traveling on business. We were seated next to each other at a dinner party hosted by one of my aunt's close friends."

"How charming," Victoria said before sipping at her tea.

"And how did you meet Lord MacKenzie?" Cate asked.

“Randolph was in London, as was I, staying with relatives. We attended a ball together. After the ball, he sent me a sonnet and asked to court me. I declined but his enthusiasm proved too much for me. He sent notes and flowers almost daily until I agreed to be courted.”

“How romantic,” Cate answered as she recalled the sonnets she’d found while exploring the castle. Randolph had been quite the paramour, expressing his heartfelt emotion many times to woo the beautiful Victoria into a courtship and marriage.

“Yes,” Victoria reflected with a smile. “How are you settling into your new home? I am disappointed you are not staying with us. It would have been lovely to have family stay in the castle.”

Cate sidestepped the question, sipping her tea before answering. “We are settling in nicely, thank you for asking. Are you and Randolph the only family in the castle?”

“Primarily. Randolph’s younger brother, Lorne, stays with us now and then. He offers little companionship to either of us. Other than our staff and Ethan, our infant son, we are alone.”

Cate narrowed her eyes as she noted Victoria did not mention the occupant in the tower. So, the secret was either kept by her or she didn’t know. “It must be quite a change from your London life.”

“Yes,” Victoria said with a wistful gaze out the window. “Quite a change for me.”

“How do you find Scottish country life?”

“Peaceful,” Victoria answered tactfully. “How long do you and Mr. MacKenzie plan to stay in our little hamlet?”

Cate nibbled at her sandwich again. “We are uncertain, but at least through the end of the month. Perhaps through part of November.”

“Oh!” Victoria exclaimed, her eyes lighting up and a grin spreading over her features. “Then you’ll attend our Halloween Ball on All Hallows’ Eve! Please say you will!”

Cate froze at the request, staring into the woman’s dark eyes. Should she accept the invitation to attend the ball where a murder would occur?

CHAPTER 13

Cate swallowed hard as she considered the invitation. At that ball, a murder would occur. Would she find her ancestor the guilty party or could they piece together the crime and spare his life?

She forced a grin on her face. "It sounds delightful, thank you for the invitation."

Victoria clapped her hands. "What a fortunate turn of events. I am so pleased to have family attending. You should dine with us again before the party."

"We would love to dine with you again."

Victoria clasped her hand and squeezed. "Oh, you shall do so more than once, I hope."

"Thank you for your gracious hospitality."

"Will you be able to join us for a private dinner party two days hence?" Victoria asked before sipping her tea.

Cate contemplated a moment as the invitations continued to roll. "I must check with Mr. MacKenzie, but I believe our schedule would accommodate it, yes."

"Wonderful. I am so pleased."

"Well, have you ladies solved all the world's problems?" Randolph asked, entering the tearoom. Jack trailed behind him.

Victoria chuckled and grinned at him. "Oh, Randolph! We have not but we have decided that Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie shall dine with us two days hence and that they shall attend our ball on All Hallows' Eve!"

Randolph eased into a chair at the table. "Divine! I am so pleased. I do hope you'll join us often for dinner at the castle. It's splendid having family nearby."

"As much as our schedule permits and without us wearing out our welcome!" Jack answered as he joined them.

"Magnificent!" Randolph answered as he rapped his knuckles on the table.

Jack shot the man a sideways glance. "I had one request, if it's not too much to ask."

"Ask away, cousin!" Randolph said.

"I hope you don't view this as ill-mannered, but would it be possible to tour the castle? I would like to see it all."

"Well, certainly, old chap. Shall we do it at the upcoming dinner party?" Randolph clapped him on the back.

"That sounds perfect, yes," Jack answered with a nod.

"Then we shall see you in two days forth and shall give you the grand tour of our family's home!"

"Well," Jack began, rising to stand, "I suppose Catherine and I should be on our way."

Cate stood and thanked Victoria for her hospitality.

Randolph rose with them. "I'll walk you out."

He led them to the main stairs. "I shall leave you here, dear friends. I know not the reason you are here but if I may say, I hope it keeps you returning to us. I haven't seen such a pleasant and cheerful look on my wife's face in months."

Cate smiled at him. "We plan on it. We'll see you in two days!"

"I bid you both a fond farewell until then," Randolph said before he turned and strode down the hall, not glancing back.

Cate and Jack made their way to the bedroom, returning to their own time. Jack breathed his usual sigh of relief.

Cate patted him on the arm. "Good going getting us the tour of the castle!"

Jack grinned and wiggled his eyebrows at her. "Thanks. I thought you would appreciate that."

"Let's see how he handles the tower when we tour the castle."

"I'm interested in that, too. He seems like a nice chap. I hope we don't find anything untoward."

Cate snickered, covering her amused expression with a hand. “Did you just say chap?”

He loosened his collar. “Sorry. I guess the past is rubbing off on me.”

“Anyway, I can’t imagine anything untoward. He seems enamored and very much devoted to his wife. He dotes on her. After talking with him I’d be shocked if he was the rogue everyone made him out to be.”

“Perhaps he’s a fantastic actor.”

“Perhaps. But he seems so genuine.”

“I guess we shall see,” Jack responded.

Cate nodded in agreement. “Well, I’m going to change and get ready for dinner.”

“Great plan. We need to devise a strategy for the upcoming dinner with Randolph and Victoria, too. Although, this should be an easy one. We’re off the hook with Randolph, no other guests to worry about, and I’m starting to get used to the 1800s!”

Cate cocked her head, her eyebrows raised. “Wow! Are you beginning to enjoy this?”

Jack laughed and shook his head. “I wouldn’t go that far, Cate.”

Cate made her way back to her bedroom suite to undress, happy to change back into modern clothes. She took Riley for a quick walk before dinner then spent the rest of the evening lounging on her chaise.

The following day Cate spent relaxing. Although she enjoyed her trips and savored every moment of her excursions to the past, time difference was proving more difficult than she was prepared for. Akin to jet lag, Cate found herself fatigued from living her double life. She spent hours in the past. Upon coming home, however, only a short period of time had passed. The result meant her days were longer than twenty-four hours.

She spent her relaxing day researching castle history for her new book, though she couldn’t deny the best research was likely spending her time immersed in the past. After her weekly lunch with her staff, she and Jack outlined a plan for the upcoming dinner party in 1856.

With a plan in place, Cate wandered back to the kitchen to collect Riley who had been contentedly chewing a bone there.

As she approached the space, Mrs. Fraser’s voice carried down the hall. “Now where could that have gone? Have you seen it, little Riley?”

Cate wandered into the space, her brow furrowed. “What’s going on?”

Mrs. Fraser waved her hands in the air in frustration. “Oh, well, I’m afraid my old age is catching up to me.”

“What?”

“I could have sworn I set out two pieces of meat for tonight’s dinner. But I cannae find the smaller one of them. I must not have put it out. Well, looks like I’ll have to make do with what I have. It’ll be enough, but I won’t be able to put any away for sandwiches over the weekend, in case your guest wanted a quick snack.”

Cate waved away her concern. “Aww, well don’t give it a second thought, I’m sure we’ll be just fine without it, Mrs. Fraser. Nothing to worry about.”

Cate gathered Riley and his bone. She intended to spend some time selecting her next dress before settling in her sitting room for a lazy afternoon. After another debate over two dresses, she selected a demure dark blue gown, much less grandiose than her previous dinner gown since they would only dine with family.

She spent the rest of her day researching before turning in early, the extra hours catching up to her.

Following her early night, Cate awoke refreshed. She would spend another day on pins and needles in giddy anticipation of her upcoming dinner party. It had been years since Cate had any family. When her parents died, she assumed she was alone, with no family to speak of. Although Randolph and Victoria’s familial connection spanned generations, time travel had made them seem like immediate family.

Cate had already excused both herself and Jack from dinner, using the explanation that they had a few errands for the estate to take care of in town. With that news, Mr. and Mrs. Fraser had left the castle early, heading home for a quiet dinner. That left Jack and Cate alone to dress and travel back for their dinner party.

The familiar excitement crept into her body as she watched the second hand of the timepiece slow to a crawl. Within an instant, they were whisked back to 1856. Sneaking from the castle, they made their way to the front door where Thomson greeted them. They reentered the castle, this time as guests. Thomson showed them into the sitting room where Randolph and Victoria awaited them.

“Ah, Jack, Catherine, lovely to see you again,” Randolph said, preparing a cocktail for them both.

“Yes, thank you for joining us for the evening,” Victoria greeted them.

“The pleasure is all ours,” Jack answered as he eased onto the couch. “And I must confess, we are looking forward to the tour.”

“Yes,” Cate added, “I am fascinated by your home. There is nothing comparable in my country.”

Victoria cocked her head and furrowed her brow. “Are there no grand homes in America?”

“Grand homes, yes. Castles, no,” Cate answered.

“My wife is quite taken with your home,” Jack added.

“Well, then we should start the tour!” Randolph suggested, raising his glass to them.

“At your convenience, sir,” Jack said.

Randolph showed them out of the sitting room. They spent over an hour touring the house. Randolph pointed out several unique features. Cate found it fascinating to see the castle a mere sixty-four years after it was built.

They concluded their circuit, ending back in the sitting room to enjoy a cocktail before dinner. Conspicuously missing from the tour was that particular tower room.

Cate took a chance mentioning it during their pre-dinner conversation. “I noticed a turret while Jack and I walked the grounds. Forgive me,” Cate said, pressing a hand to her forehead and offering a demure smile, “what room was it on our tour?”

“Ah, we didn’t visit it on the tour, dear Catherine,” Randolph answered.

“Oh, what a pity. I hoped to see it.”

There was a pause in conversation.

Jack flicked his gaze to Randolph as he tapped the side of his glass. “I’m afraid my wife has romantic notions about that tower. White knights rescuing princesses and so on.”

Randolph roared with laughter. “I’m sorry, Cousin Catherine. There are no white knights or princesses. I’m afraid the only thing you’ll find in our tower room are chests full of old articles from past generations. I doubt one could even set foot in the room.”

Cate cast a fleeting glance toward Jack before offering a smile to Randolph. “Well, there is my romantic bubble burst.”

“I’m so very sorry to have crushed your quixotic concept of our home. I can only hope to make it up to you with our dinner.”

Thomson appeared as if on cue. “Dinner, sir,” he announced.

“What perfect timing,” Randolph said as they stood to enter the dining room.

As they sat for dinner, Cate feigned forgetfulness. “Oh, how silly of me, I seem to have left my bag in the sitting room.”

“Oh, you mustn’t worry, nothing will happen to it,” Victoria reassured her. “We will all remember to retrieve it before you depart.”

“Oh, thank you. I should like to keep it with me. If it isn’t too much trouble, perhaps one of your footmen could retrieve it?” Cate waved a finger in the air at one of the men with a hopeful expression.

“Of course,” Randolph said. Turning to the nearest footman, he said, “Andrew, retrieve Mrs. MacKenzie’s bag, wouldn’t you?”

Cate offered a smile to the short, dark-haired, dark-eyed man, though his mouth seemed to be set in a perpetual scowl. He left the room without a word, returning a moment later with Cate’s bag.

She smiled at him again as he handed it to her before shooting a glance at Jack. Jack arched an eyebrow, giving her a knowing glance and a slight bob of his head to acknowledge that they’d just identified the victim.

Dinner conversation turned to the upcoming Halloween ball that Lord and Lady MacKenzie were hosting. Cate showered Victoria with her praise for the idea.

“I hope it is a success and we can make it an annual event! It promises to be so much fun,” Victoria responded.

“We are looking forward to it,” Cate assured her.

“I am thrilled you are attending. It has made my planning more enjoyable knowing we can share it with family. And on this subject,” Victoria continued, “my dressmaker is coming Saturday mid-morning. We will finalize options for my ball gown. I was hoping you’d not have plans, Catherine, and could call at that time. Perhaps she can design something for you as well? Unless you have a gown already or prefer your own dressmaker?”

“Oh,” Cate began, glancing at Jack then her dinner plate, unsure of what to say.

“I expect you can fit it into your schedule, can’t you, dear?” Jack encouraged, nodding at her. “You’ve not found a dressmaker you’re fond of.”

Cate smiled at him before flicking her gaze to Victoria. “Thank you for the invitation, Victoria. I have given no consideration to my gown. This is very helpful.”

“Splendid!” Randolph said, “it appears you ladies have everything under control.”

“Oh, but there are so many details to attend to,” Victoria corrected.

Randolph offered his wife a grin and a wink. “Well, all the important details, anyway.”

The dinner continued with pleasant conversation about the upcoming ball and other frivolities. They finished their night with a nightcap before Cate and Jack, escorted by Randolph, slipped upstairs to return to their own time.

“Well, that was an interesting evening,” Cate said as she slipped into the library’s armchair after changing to modern clothes.

“Rather enjoyable,” Jack admitted, slouching into the supple leather.

“And very informative!”

Jack dipped his chin at her and pointed a finger in her direction. “Yes, a clever ruse on your part to elicit the name of the servant.”

“Lucky, too,” Cate said, “Randolph chose Andrew. And he omitted the tower room from the grand tour! We know it’s not full of boxes, we’ve seen a woman there.”

“Yes, I found it interesting how Randolph side-stepped that when you asked about it.”

Cate tapped her chin. “I wonder why.”

“I don’t know. But if he is lying about it, I can’t imagine it’s for any good reasons.”

“I’m afraid I can’t argue with you,” Cate admitted.

A sinking feeling filled her. Perhaps Jack had been right. Maybe Randolph was a madman, clever at hiding his murderous tendencies. He’d already lied to them once. Would he do it again?

CHAPTER 14

Cate pondered the information they'd received earlier. Or specifically, the lack of information. Why had Randolph lied to them about the tower room? What was he hiding? And would he kill to keep it hidden?

"Maybe I'll learn something at my fashion show with Victoria on Saturday. Thank you for the encouragement to accept her."

"Well, you need a dress, I'm sure. Although, I'm not pleased you'll be going on your own."

"I'm rather sorry about it too," Cate acknowledged. "I was hoping you could have taken a peek around the place while I enjoyed my fashion show."

"Gee, and here I thought you cared, Cate."

Cate grinned at him. "I'll also admit I will miss you. The only times I've traveled alone were by accident! And they were scary!"

"That's because you assumed you were seeing ghosts!"

Cate chuckled at her early experiences with time travel, recalling the nonsensical information she had been faced with and how she had concluded the castle was haunted.

"Well, it's a lot more fun this way. But I'm sure I can handle a small shopping trip while you pick up Molly from the train station. Thank you again for offering to get Molly. I didn't want her driving for hours by herself in a foreign country."

“My pleasure, Cate. Just don’t be late from your little shopping excursion! I don’t want to explain where you are to anyone!”

She winked at him as she waved the timepiece in the air. “I’ll make sure to keep an eye on my time! Now, I suppose I should let you go home. We both need rest before the meeting with Mrs. Campbell tomorrow.”

“Yes, these extra hours in my day are really becoming exhausting. So is Isla Campbell. So, I will bid you adieu, m’lady!” Jack stood and bowed extravagantly.

Cate yawned as she climbed into bed after seeing Jack off. The extra time to her day exhausted her and so did the prospect of an Isla Campbell meeting. She needed all the rest she could get for the three-hour meeting.

Cate dragged herself from bed the following morning. While she had slept well despite her evening’s excitement, she dreaded the planning meeting. Today promised to be a humdinger. With one week to go before the party, Mrs. Campbell wanted to discuss every detail. She had insisted Jack and Mr. Fraser be present to account for the exterior decorating plan.

Cate shortened her walk with Riley to accommodate the meeting, scheduled for 9 a.m. Mrs. Campbell arrived fifteen minutes before her scheduled time. This time, Cate was prepared for her early arrival. She met her at the front door, showing her into the library to begin their discussion.

“I can hardly believe we are less than a week away!” Mrs. Campbell exclaimed as she entered the library with Cate.

Cate led her to the set of armchairs, sinking onto one. “It has snuck up on us, hasn’t it!”

“Oh, and I am so glad you both could join us, Jack and Charlie,” she said, greeting the two men. “Forgive me for taking up your day, but I am finicky about every detail. We must strive for perfection with this ball.”

“A noble goal,” Jack answered.

“I agree,” Cate added. “Where shall we begin?”

Mrs. Campbell perched on the armchair next to Cate. “Well, I believe we should begin with the external decorating scheme.”

Mr. Fraser opened his folder. He spread his design, notes, and orders across the low table centered between them. “I have made...” he began.

“Yes, Lady Cate showed me your design. I found it...” She paused. “Quaint. I had a few ideas to spruce it up. Give it a more sleek, modern design.”

Mr. Fraser sat straighter in his chair, a frown on his face.

Mrs. Campbell began to remove notes from her own folder.

“Oh, that won’t be necessary,” Cate interjected with a wave of her hand.

Bewilderment crossed Mrs. Campbell’s face as she arched an eyebrow at Cate. “Oh, while I realize Charlie has presumably made the required arrangements. I deemed that...”

“He has not only taken care of all the required arrangements, but I considered the design perfect.” Cate lifted her chin with a smile.

“I appreciate your candor, Lady Cate. Although, my concern stems from the clash it may provide to the interior design that we have planned.”

Cate shook her head. “Mr. Fraser’s exterior design will not be changed. I don’t consider the designs clashing, but that they provide a complimentary contrast.” She punctuated her statement with a curt nod.

“Surely there’s some room for...” Mrs. Campbell tried again.

“The design will remain unchanged. That is final. Now, let’s proceed. Mr. Fraser, you were saying?” Cate focused her attention on the older man.

Mr. Fraser nodded, offering an appreciative smile to Cate. “Aye, as I was saying, there are several elements involved in my design. Banners are ready and we will hang them on Monday. Trimming is complete, we will make final adjustments on Monday to the gardens. I arranged everything needed for the lighting. Lighting will arrive on Tuesday. Bailey’s farm is bringing the pumpkins and cornstalks for us on Wednesday. We are, from our end, ready to go, Lady Cate!”

“Wonderful,” Cate answered. “Mrs. Campbell, how are we with your arrangements?”

Mrs. Campbell, a frown still on her face, began, “Would it be possible to do a walkthrough to envision the exterior proposal?”

“Yes, we will complete a walkthrough of both the interior and exterior.”

Mrs. Campbell gave the briefest of smiles. “Wonderful,” she said in a monotone voice. “Well, on my end, all arrangements are taken care of, also. Linens have been ordered and will be delivered to the town library on Monday. Tables and chairs will arrive on Wednesday. Lighting and other decorations are also coming Wednesday. The musicians have been confirmed. I approved all final menu choices with the caterer yesterday along with our final numbers. Which, if I may add, are fantastic. This event sold out weeks ago. It is the event of the season!”

Cate smiled at her. “I’m glad this has been a success so far. With all your planning and attention to detail, it will be a very grand event.”

“Oh, I do hope so!” Mrs. Campbell exclaimed. “Well, shall we begin the walkthrough? I’m eager to see the gardens and get a clearer picture of the vision. And we need to discuss the final interior design and placement.”

Cate stood and clasped her hands in front of her. “Sure! Let’s move to the ballroom.”

The group wound through the halls into the ballroom, exiting through the massive double doors leading outside. They began with the gardens. Mr. Fraser and Jack had them in exquisite shape already. They looked enchanting and would, without question, add to the ambiance of the party.

Mrs. Campbell was less enthused about the design but admitted that the gardens were well-kempt. And, while the design was still more quaint than she imagined, she was satisfied with the end result. Cate held back rolling her eyes at the remark. Satisfied was a far cry from the word Cate would have used to describe the design.

At Mrs. Campbell’s insistence, the men stayed on through the interior walkthrough and design discussion. If they needed to assist with decorating, Mrs. Campbell wanted to be sure they had a firm handle on her vision.

When they had fleshed out every minute detail down to the number of prongs on the appetizer forks, Cate ushered them to the kitchen for lunch to conclude the meeting.

Mrs. Campbell feigned confusion about being steered downstairs, surprised that Cate ate with the staff. She had assumed, as she stated as they descended the steps, that she would enjoy a private luncheon with the Countess.

When lunch ended, Cate almost skipped to the front door to see Mrs. Campbell out. She sunk into one of the large leather armchairs in the library after watching Mrs. Campbell’s car disappear down the drive. It was an exhausting morning. Still, they had accomplished everything they needed to. Cate was pleased with the progress and looking forward to the party.

She smiled to herself. Prior to the party, though, she had plans to look forward to. She picked Riley up to take him for a long afternoon walk. As they walked, she contemplated her full day tomorrow. She’d start with her dress fitting with Victoria for the upcoming Halloween ball in 1856. Upon returning from that, she was enthusiastically anticipating Molly’s arrival. In just over twenty-four hours, her friend would join her at the castle. She couldn’t deny the excitement building inside her.

She enjoyed a leisurely evening, her last night alone in the castle before guests arrived. It would be nice to have life in the castle, although she had gotten used to being alone here. She no longer checked dark corners for ghosts or found the moonlit rooms unnerving. Instead, Cate laid in bed admiring the shadows created by the moonlight in her room. She dozed off, dreaming of ball gowns.

The following morning, Jack left the estate early, making the long drive to Edinburgh to retrieve Molly from the train station. Cate readied herself for her trip to the past. Mrs. Fraser was busy with preparations for the soon-arriving guest, making it easy for Cate to slip to the past unseen.

Cate snuck down the backstairs, made her way to the front door and knocked to gain entrance. Thompson showed her to Victoria's private sitting room.

"Oh, Catherine!" Victoria rushed to her, giving her a warm embrace and a kiss on her cheek. "Please come in, sit down. May I offer you tea?"

Cate sank into one of the chairs at the table. "Thank you, tea would be delightful."

Victoria poured them each a cup of tea. "My dressmaker should arrive any moment. Have you thought about design, color, fabric?"

Cate smiled at her enthusiasm. "I hadn't. I hoped to see what you selected so I may complement it."

Victoria beamed as they discussed fashion. "I'm so eager to show you my selection. I've chosen a burgundy ensemble with a drop waist. I plan to try the new bodice style, with the front closure. The button detail it adds to the bodice is quite alluring."

Cate stirred her tea before setting her spoon on the saucer. "It sounds lovely."

"I was thinking, Catherine, with your fair skin and light eyes, perhaps something in sapphire. I believe it would be very becoming on you and a nice contrast to my dress. Oh, I don't mean to be overbearing though if you prefer another color."

Cate sipped at her tea as she considered the suggestion, agreeing it would work well on her. "No, I think that may be the perfect selection."

Victoria squeezed Cate's hands. "Oh, how fortunate I am that you have traveled to us, Catherine!"

Cate took another sip of her tea before she set the cup in the saucer. "I agree! Victoria, I don't mean to be improper, but I hoped I could ask a candid question?”

Victoria cocked her head, but gave a slight nod to encourage Cate to continue.

“Your footman, the one who retrieved my purse, Alexander, was it? Has he been with you long? I feel as though I’ve seen him before. He seems so familiar to me.”

“Oh, you mean Andrew? He is new to the household. We had a...” Victoria stumbled. “An incident. It left us rather short-handed. Andrew was not highly recommended but, well, given the circumstances, we accepted him.”

“Incident?” Cate questioned, then added, “oh, I hope I’m not prying.”

Victoria offered a tight-lipped smile, “Of course not, you’re family. Several months ago one of our footman left, in the middle of the night, in fact. He claimed to have seen strange people wandering the estate. The final straw was when he was roused from his bed by what he called a screaming banshee.”

Cate straightened in her seat as she listened to the tale, intrigued to know more about the circumstances that had brought the soon-to-be victim to the estate.

CHAPTER 15

Cate raised her eyebrows at the tale of ghosts and mayhem.

Victoria continued, “Oh, how this must sound. I assure you, there is nothing wrong with our home!”

“I don’t doubt that, Victoria,” Cate assured her. “I’m rather surprised to hear that a grown man gave in to such nonsense.”

Victoria raised her cup to her lips. “I quite agree, Catherine. However, it seems these tales abound at every turn. The village is filled with them.”

Cate offered her a shrug as she nibbled at the corner of a biscuit. “People love gossip.”

“Quite. Especially when the rumors are stoked by our servants.”

“Your runaway footman?”

“And others. Just a few months ago, Lorna, one of our housemaids, ran screaming through the house to our housekeeper carrying on about having seen a woman at the top of the stairway.”

Cate raised her eyebrows as she glanced at Victoria over the rim of her teacup. “Indeed! She must have been imagining things.”

Victoria shrugged and waved her hands in the air. “She claimed the woman was shouting at her, babbling incomprehensible nonsense, frantic about something.” She shook her head, dismissing it. “I don’t know. I believe the girl to be unstable, perhaps.”

Cate’s mind returned to when she had moved in a few months before. Prior to her discovery about her true inheritance, she had inadvertently time traveled to this exact time. The maid had not been crazy, she had seen Cate herself standing at the top of the main staircase. She had shouted to her to help find a missing Riley. She remembered the poor maid fleeing from the room at the sight of her.

Cate set her teacup in its saucer and offered a consoling smile, hoping the maid would not recognize her if they came face to face again. "The mind can play many tricks, particularly in a house this large."

Victoria offered her a broad grin. "How judicious you are, cousin Catherine."

A light knock sounded on the door before it popped open. Two women stepped into the room. "Madame Bisset, m'lady," the maid announced.

Victoria rose and waved the woman to the table. "Please come in Madame Bisset. It is my pleasure to introduce my cousin, Catherine MacKenzie. Mrs. MacKenzie will also attend our ball. We would like to discuss her dress with you."

"A pleasure to meet you, Madame MacKenzie," the woman answered in a thick French accent. "Countess Victoria," she said, kissing Victoria on each cheek, "I have some lovely new designs for you to consider."

"We are excited to see them. Please, sit. Shall I pour you tea?"

"Thank you, Countess." Madame Bisset sat between the two women at the round table. She placed a portfolio in front of her, opening it.

"Oh, please show Mrs. MacKenzie the design for my gown first. Then we'll consider Catherine's dress."

Madame Bisset pulled one design from the pile, showing a large, hooped skirt, a bejeweled bodice with button detail down the center.

"How charming," Cate exclaimed as she studied the design.

Victoria beamed, raising her chin with pride in her selection. "And now, Cousin Catherine, we'll find you something equally charming. Oh, Madame Bisset, we deemed a sapphire blue may be an attractive color for Mrs. MacKenzie. Do you agree?"

Madame Bisset considered it, eyeing Cate up and down. "Yes," she said, after a moment, "quite fitting, Countess."

The ladies spent another hour going over designs, discussing options and adjustments. Cate settled on a hooped skirt with a ruffled bottom and black lace details. The bodice included a ruffled top. Victoria pronounced that she had the perfect sapphire necklace to fit the neckline and insisted that Cate borrow it for the evening.

Madame Bisset gathered Cate's measurements, and they concluded their tea. Cate remained for a few moments after Madame Bisset departed. The two women chatted about what a lovely morning they enjoyed before saying their goodbyes.

Cate asked Victoria if she could stop by the library to borrow a book, stating that she and Jack planned to be traveling for several days. She could not visit with Victoria until October twenty-eighth. After Victoria showed her to the library, she assured Victoria she could see herself out after she made her selection.

Left alone, Cate grabbed a book and snuck back to the bedroom closet to return to her own time. She changed clothes and hurried down to the bottom level of the castle to assist Mrs. Fraser with any last-minute preparations before Molly's late afternoon arrival.

With everything prepared, she waited with Riley as the car drove down the gravel drive toward the castle. Molly's hand waved from inside the window as the car eased to a stop.

She flung her door open and leapt from the car with an excited squeal. "CATE! Oh, my! It's so great to see you!"

She wrapped Cate in a giant hug before holding her arms out to take Riley. "And hello, Riley! Oh, come here you sweet little boy! Oh, you both look so great!"

"It's good to see you, too, Molly. How was your trip?"

Molly's eyes rose up to the castle, darting all over the structure. "Oh, my gosh! Look at this place! Huh? Oh, the trip? It was fine, great. Oh, sorry, I'm just overwhelmed by this whole thing. I mean, I can't believe this is your home!"

"It is incredible!" Cate answered. "Would you like to see the inside?"

"YES! I'm dying to explore every part!"

Jack chimed in before they could enter the castle. "I'm taking the luggage to the Rose Room, right?"

"Yes, that's right, thanks, Jack!" Cate answered.

"Oh, oh my gosh, my luggage, here, I can get it." Molly scrambled to grab her suitcase.

"Nay, I wouldn't have it, lassie. I'll carry your luggage up," Jack admonished with a grin. "You'll get the royal treatment here!"

"Aww, thanks," Molly said.

Cate slipped her arm around Molly's waist and pulled her toward the house.

"I already feel like I'm getting the royal treatment with the chauffeured ride from the train station and now luggage service to the, what was it? The Rose Room, did you say? I could get used to this!"

They made their way through the double doors into the foyer.

Molly's eyes went wide and she pressed her hand over her open mouth. "CATE! This is unbelievable! I can't believe you live here! I am so jealous!"

Cate smiled, remembering her own reaction to seeing the castle's entryway months ago. Mrs. Fraser approached them from across the foyer.

Cate waved her over. "Oh, Mrs. Fraser, what great timing. Please come meet my friend, Molly."

Mrs. Fraser stuck her hand out with a smile. "It's a pleasure to meet any friend of Lady Cate's."

"Molly, this is my friend and housekeeper, Mrs. Emily Fraser."

A giggle bubbled up from Molly. "Lady Cate! Oh, how far you've come, honey! It is a pleasure to meet you, Mrs. Fraser."

"I just came up to determine if there was anything Ms. Williams needed after her trip," Mrs. Fraser said to Cate.

Cate glanced at Molly who was already shaking her head. "Oh, no. No, I'm all good! Thanks, though. And please call me Molly!"

Mrs. Fraser smiled and nodded at her. "A pleasure to meet you, Molly. Well, I'll begin dinner preparations then." She turned on a heel to return to the kitchen.

Cate raised an eyebrow at her last comment. It appeared she wouldn't stand on ceremony with Molly, obliging her by using her first name.

Cate motioned for them to proceed up the massive staircase. "Well, I'll show you to your room. Jack should have your luggage up there soon. You can freshen up before dinner. If you need anything, I'll show you where to find me."

"Thanks, Cate! Oh, I'm so excited to check out my room. Even if it's in the dungeon, it'll be better than my current place."

"I haven't found a dungeon yet. Not enjoying the new apartment?" Cate asked as they ascended the stairs.

Molly groaned and rolled her eyes. "Ugh, no. It's cramped and crappy. Just horrible. I swear I spotted a cockroach or a mouse or something gross behind the fridge, too.”

Cate grimaced, her delicate nose wrinkling. Her heart sank as she led Molly down one of the wide halls. Unable to continue payments on her house, Molly had no choice but to sell and move into a small apartment. Guilt coursed through Cate over her recent stroke of good luck.

They wove through the halls to the wing containing Cate’s bedroom. A few doors down from the double doors that lead to her suite, Cate said, “Here we are. I’m right down the hall through those double doors if you need me.”

Cate pushed the door open and signaled for Molly to enter first.

Molly’s jaw dropped and her eyes went wide. “Cate, it’s beautiful!”

Molly stepped inside, gawking at the bedroom suite, decorated in a mauve-rose color and appointed with dainty, feminine details. It boasted a large fireplace with a loveseat and a comfortable armchair and ottoman, grouped around the fireplace making a cozy setting. Across the room, a four-poster bed stood against the wall. It also contained an en-suite bathroom for Molly’s convenience.

Cate lifted her shoulders as she smiled. “I imagined you might like it, it’s one of my favorite rooms!”

Jack arrived with the luggage. “Where would the lady like her suitcases?”

Molly fluttered her hand in the air. “Oh, gosh, just anywhere is fine!”

“Maybe by the wardrobe, Jack?” Cate suggested.

Jack wheeled the luggage over to the wardrobe. “All right, easy enough. Anything else you might need?”

“No, I don’t think so, thanks!” Cate answered.

“M’lady!” Jack said, giving his usual bow before leaving the room.

Molly giggled at his extravagant departure. “He’s too much.”

Cate laughed as she lifted Riley from Molly’s arms. “Yes, he’s quite the comedian. Well, I’ll let you get settled. See you for dinner around five thirty. I’ll pick you up right here!”

“Good thing,” Molly said, “I’ll get lost!”

“It can be overwhelming! It overwhelmed me, too, when I arrived. But you’ll learn it!”

Molly’s smile turned upside-down. “Too bad by the time I do, I’ll be ready to leave.”

Cate smiled at her, giving her arm a squeeze. “See you soon, Molly!”

She returned to her bedroom with Riley in tow to relax before dinner. After a quick jaunt with Riley, she made her way to Molly's door, giving it a light knock. Within seconds, Molly whipped open the door.

She had changed her outfit from jeans and a sweatshirt to a pair of black leggings and a burgundy tunic for dinner. "Oh, Cate! You said casual was okay, right? Is this okay?"

Cate smiled and nodded at her. "It's perfect. Is this a new 'Scotland sweater?'"

"It is, yes, do you like it?"

"I do! It's a gorgeous color, it looks great on you!" Cate said.

"Aw, thanks, honey."

"Ready for dinner?"

Molly stepped into the hall and swung her door shut behind her. "Am I ever! I'm starving! Traveling really makes you hungry. Lead the way, Cate!"

Cate and Riley led her to the dining room. Mrs. Fraser set out the last dish on the sideboard. "Lady Cate and Molly, I hope you enjoy your meal! I have a special dessert prepared for you both afterwards. I'll serve that in the library whenever you are ready."

"Thank you, Mrs. Fraser! Please enjoy your dinner," Cate said as she lifted her plate from the sideboard.

"Cate, have I told you how jealous I am of your life?" Molly said, as Mrs. Fraser left the room. "This dining room is beautiful. Well, the whole house is! Castle I should say!"

They made light conversation during their meal about Molly's trip, the latest goings on in Aberdeen and at Aberdeen College. Jeff, Cate's old boss, struggled to fill the needs of the department. After Cate's departure, he'd been forced to cover most extracurricular events himself, unable to convince anyone else to put in the extra time.

"Serves him right, if you ask me. After what he did to you with that tenure-tracked bid, he should get stuck!" Molly said as she cut her roast beef.

When they finished their dinner, Cate led her guest to the library. She'd set Molly's gift out earlier by the fireplace. A roaring fire burned inside, the glow bouncing off the gift bag.

"Oh, wow, Cate! I continue to be awed by your home! Oh, this fire looks so cozy!"

They settled into the armchairs near the fireplace. Riley opted for his usual spot on the rug, cuddled close to the warmth of the fire.

Mrs. Fraser arrived with a tray of her homemade cookies and two steaming mugs of hot chocolate. "This will keep you warm on this chilly October night!"

"Thank you so much, Mrs. Fraser," Cate said as the woman slid the tray onto the coffee table.

"If you need anything else, let me know, Lady Cate!"

"We'll be fine, Mrs. Fraser, and we'll clean up after ourselves. You are free to retire for the evening."

"I'll see you in the morning, then, Lady Cate. I hope you sleep well, Molly." Mrs. Fraser left the room, pulling the doors closed behind her.

Molly wrapped her hands around her mug, sniffing the aromatic beverage before taking a sip. "Mmm, this is the best hot chocolate I have ever had."

"She is a fantastic cook! You'll like these cookies even better!" Cate waved the plate in front of Molly.

Molly took one from the tray, nodding her head to confirm that Cate was correct in her assessment.

"I have another surprise I hope you'll like, too," Cate said as she set the plate on the tray. She rose from her seat and retrieved the gift bag, handing it to Molly.

"More surprises?" Molly mumbled, mouth full of cookie. "Wow!"

"A welcome gift, of sorts. I hope you like it!"

"Aww, oh, honey, you didn't have to do this! But I'm so glad you did!" Molly grinned, pulling the tissue paper out.

She grabbed the blanket out of the bag first. "Oh, this is beautiful! It's so soft and cuddly! I love it!" She reached back in, pulling out the book and photo album next.

Cate settled back into her chair, grabbing her mug. "The book discusses the haunted castles of Scotland. It not only mentions Dunhaven Castle, but that it's considered to be haunted. I thought of you as soon as I spotted this since you were so concerned it was haunted."

Molly giggled and shot a glance to Cate. "I did tease you about that, but see, someone else concluded it was haunted, too!"

"The one with the picture of the castle is a photo album. You can keep all your memories of Scotland in there."

“Aw, Cate,” Molly said, clutching it to her chest, “I love them, all of them! You didn’t need to buy me anything though! The invitation to stay was enough!”

“I enjoyed the shopping and I’m so glad you like everything.”

Molly clung to the items. “I do, I really do.” She closed her eyes, taking a deep breath. “I needed this, Cate. I’m so sorry, I’m sorry.” Her voice broke and a tear rolled down her cheek. She sniffled and sank her head into her hands.

Cate reached over and rubbed her arm in a silent display of support, waiting for her friend to recover enough to talk about what upset her.

CHAPTER 16

Cate's heart broke for her friend as she waited for her to regain her composure.

Molly sighed, wiping her tears away with a hand and sniffing. "I'm okay, I'm sorry. I didn't want to ruin our first night."

"You're not ruining anything, Molly," Cate answered. "There's no need for an apology."

Molly nodded as she continued to wipe at her cheeks. "It's just that I feel..." She paused and blew out a long breath. "So stupid. Just so incredibly stupid. It's so embarrassing."

Cate responded with an apologetic smile.

Molly grasped her hand, giving it a squeeze. "I just can't believe it still sometimes. I can't believe Tom cheated on me, with my own student assistant. What's worse, I introduced them. I took her out to lunch with Tom and myself to thank her for being a great assistant."

Cate listened without responding, allowing Molly to get it out.

Molly waved a hand in the air as she shook her head. "Great assistant, huh? And he just continues on with his life while mine is blown apart. We had to sell the house. I had to move into some crappy little apartment because I can't afford anything else, meanwhile, she moved in with him! They're playing house together somewhere. It makes me sick."

Molly sank her forehead into her palm.

"It's not your fault, Molly. This is all on Tom and your assistant."

“Yeah, yeah, that’s what everyone tells me. Accompanied by that sad, pitying look in their eyes. I hate even walking around town. I feel like the laughingstock. I wish I didn’t have to go back.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped at her friend’s words. “I’m so sorry, Molly.”

Molly continued, “I mean, my sister said I could stay with her for a bit, IN HER BASEMENT.”

Cate wrinkled her nose, her lips forming a grimace.

Molly waved at her expression and nodded. “Yeah, exactly! Like that’s inviting! She couldn’t even offer me a spot in her kids’ playroom, which is essentially her fifth bedroom! Says she’s ‘full up’ now that she’s taking care of Ted’s mom.”

Molly rolled her eyes. She sniffled again, taking a deep breath, and shook her head. “But that’s enough of my misery. I will not let Tom and Aimee ruin the trip I have looked so forward to! At this moment, my life is perfect! I am in Scotland, with one of my very best friends, in her castle. I will not spend my time moping! Now, give me another one of those cookies, because I am also not counting calories on this trip!”

Cate smiled at her and squeezed her hand. She picked up the tray, offering a cookie to Molly. They spent the rest of the evening talking about Cate’s transition to Scottish life. Molly insisted that Cate give her the grand tour of the castle and grounds the following day

Given the plan for Molly’s first full day in Scotland, they turned in early, after finishing their hot chocolate and cookies and cleaning up their mugs. Cate wished Molly a restful first night in the castle as they parted ways for the night.

Cate bundled tighter in her cardigan as she walked with Riley the next morning, watching the sun cross the horizon and paint the moors with bright oranges, reds, and yellows.

She glanced at the stones of the castle, also colored from the morning sun, wondering how Molly had slept. She hadn’t disturbed her on her way out with Riley, in case she was sleeping in after her long day of travel.

After Riley had his fill of frolicking in the yard, Cate gathered him into her arms and returned to the castle. She pushed in through the front door and hurried up the stairs to Molly’s room.

She waited a few moments after knocking, but received no response. She tried again, pounding louder on the door. She sucked in a long breath as she waited for an answer, again receiving nothing.

She called Molly's name through the door, straining to listen for any noise but none sounded.

Molly must be a sound sleeper, she figured, as she wound through the halls and down to the dining room, planning to check on Molly later.

She pushed through the door in the dining room leading to the kitchen below. Voices and laughter floated up the stairs as she descended.

Cate furrowed her brow as she realized she overheard two women's voices. She recognized Mrs. Fraser's voice and, after a moment, identified the other as Molly's.

She reached the kitchen doorway, peering in at the scene. Molly stirred the oatmeal as she listed easy ways to keep the oatmeal from sticking or becoming lumpy to Mrs. Fraser.

Mrs. Fraser shook raisins into a bowl, a towel slung over her shoulder. "Now, I knew most of those tips, Molly, but that last one I cannae say I've heard before. I will have to try that."

"It works like a charm, I promise!" Molly answered with a grin.

Mrs. Fraser twisted and spotted Cate in the doorway. "Oh, good morning, Lady Cate. You're sneaking up on me again."

Cate wandered further into the kitchen with a laugh. "Sorry. I just got here, I didn't want to interrupt!"

Mrs. Fraser waved a hand in the air. "You'd never be interrupting, Lady Cate."

Molly greeted her with a broad grin. "Good morning!"

"Good morning, Molly. How did you sleep?"

"Great! Best night's sleep I've had in a while. That bed is fabulous! I was up early, so I figured I'd pop down and see if I could lend a hand with anything." Molly nodded to the pot she was stirring. "Make myself useful."

Cate smiled at her as Mrs. Fraser answered, "And what a hand she is! She knows her way around a kitchen, this one! Well, that should be about it. If you ladies would like to head up to the dining room, I'll bring everything up."

"Oh, I assume the oatmeal goes in this server here?" Molly asked, already starting to pour it in. "I'll carry this up if you want to bring the toppings."

"I can help," Cate offered.

Mrs. Fraser shooed her from the kitchen. "Nay, Lady Cate. Besides you haven't got a free hand." She nodded to Riley in Cate's arms.

“Oh, he’s capable of walking.”

“We have a handle on it, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser assured her. “Don’t we, Molly?”

Molly nodded as she continued to empty the pot into the server. “We sure do!”

Cate bit her lower lip as the scene unfolded in front of her. Mrs. Fraser checked the oatmeal as Molly poured it, marveling that there was not one lump and the bottom of the pot was clean.

An idea formed in Cate’s mind. She pressed her lips together, determined to follow up with Mrs. Fraser later.

She led the way upstairs with Molly and Mrs. Fraser trailing behind her. She and Molly prepared their oatmeal as Mrs. Fraser filled their water glasses before returning downstairs.

As they settled at the table, Cate tossed Riley a dog biscuit from the stash Mrs. Fraser set out for him every morning.

She lifted her spoon filled with oatmeal and blew on it. “I’m so glad that you slept well.”

“Oh, I did. Best night’s sleep I’ve had in months. I was asleep before my head hit the pillow. I don’t think I even moved.”

Cate sprinkled a few more raisins into her oatmeal and stirred them in. “That’s great, Molly. I was concerned that you had a bad night. When I knocked this morning and didn’t get a response, I worried our ghosts may have gotten you!”

Molly slid the spoon from her mouth as she shook her head. “Nope, great night! That’s why I got up early. I felt so good I thought I’d see if I could lend a hand to your housekeeper. She seems so nice. Hey! I thought you said there were no ghosts!”

“We have no ghosts, I promise. I’m only teasing. But sometimes it can be tricky relaxing in a different bed.”

Molly waved her hand around to encompass the room. “Oh, I’ll have no trouble relaxing in this place. Like I said, I love this place! It’s such a nice change from the peeling paint and dirty wallpaper in my new apartment.”

Molly rolled her eyes. “I can’t wait to see the whole castle. Say, how d’you sleep? I hope you have enough energy to show me everything and I mean everything!”

“Plenty of energy here!” Cate assured her. “And I’m sure Riley will love to show you his loch.”

“I can’t wait to see it, Riley!” Molly said to the little dog.

They finished their breakfast, discussing more of Cate’s new life. Molly, true to her word, did not want to discuss any more of her situation. She found her new life “depressing” and didn’t want to be reminded of it as she was living her “dream vacation,” according to her.

Cate obliged her, trying to keep the conversation light. Although, she still experienced a sense of guilt discussing her recent good fortune when Molly’s luck seemed to be on the downturn.

They began their tour after breakfast outside. Molly met Cate in the foyer after running back to her room to grab another one of her special sweaters she’d purchased for the trip.

They stepped into the cool, crisp air, squinting against the brilliant sunshine. Riley bounded in front of the two women as they walked down the path that led to the back gardens.

Molly marveled at the landscaping and the gardens. Light fog still clung to the tops of the moors that surrounded them. They continued to the loch with Molly playing fetch with Riley.

Molly remarked again about the breathtaking scenery as they settled on the banks. They spent another half hour chitchatting about the area and the grounds of Dunhaven Castle before returning for lunch.

Molly leapt from her seat as they finished eating, insisting on the grand tour of the castle’s interior. They spent the rest of their day scouring every detail of the castle, ending back in the library and curling up in the armchairs to enjoy a cozy dinner fireside.

Exhausted after their excursions, they retired early, planning a trip to town the following morning. The two women spent the morning shopping and retrieving Molly’s costume for the ball.

“I hope you have enough room to pack all those souvenirs,” Cate said as she helped Molly haul her loot up to her room.

Molly winced as she stared down at the multiple bags clutched in each of their hands. “Oh, gosh, I may have over shopped. Oh well!”

They dumped the bags in Molly’s room before heading downstairs to greet Gayle. Her car barreled up the drive just as they stepped out the door onto the gravel drive.

Gayle eased her car to a stop near the door. Jack pulled her door open for her, offering his hand to assist her out before he removed the luggage from the boot.

“Hello, Gayle!” Cate called, “how was your drive in?”

“Hello, Lady Cate,” Gayle said, smoothing her sweater over her slacks and reaching out to embrace Cate. “It’s so lovely to see you again, dear. The drive was not too bad, but I will admit, I am stiff! And hello to you sweet Riley!” Gayle gave him a pet under the chin, getting down on his level to greet him.

“Aww, well, I hope a night in one of our beds will ease that!” Cate answered as she motioned to Molly. “I’d like you to meet my friend, Molly Williams.”

“Hello, Molly,” Gayle said, extending her hand, “it’s a pleasure to meet you. Lady Cate has told me nothing but wonderful things about you!”

“Cate always was a fantastic liar!” Molly said with a laugh, shaking Gayle’s hand. “A pleasure to meet you, too, Gayle.”

“Shall we head inside?” Cate suggested. “Mrs. Fraser should have dinner ready in about an hour. I put you in the room you stayed in on your last visit. You can unwind and freshen up after your long drive.”

“That would be lovely,” Gayle responded. “And thank you, Jack, for retrieving that luggage.”

“My pleasure, ma’am!” Jack responded, carrying the luggage in behind them.

“Molly, I’ll be right down after showing Gayle to her room. Would you mind taking Riley into the sitting room for me?”

“Sure!” Molly responded, happy to relieve Cate of the cute pup.

Cate made her way up the stairs with Gayle. The two chitchatted about the upcoming party and Gayle’s costume. She left her in her bedroom to relax and change prior to dinner then made her way back to the sitting room to spend the hour before dinner with Molly.

Cate found her sitting on the floor near the fireplace with Riley, stroking the dog’s fur. “Oh, he’s loving that,” Cate said as she pushed through the double doors.

Molly shot her a glance and chuckled. “Me, too! It’s cozy here by the fire. Oh, I just love it here. And I love everyone’s accents, they all sound so posh!”

Cate eased into an armchair with a laugh. “It sounds normal to me now, but it was so strange to me when I first came.”

“So, Gayle is the secretary for your attorney, right? The guy who sprung the big news on you?”

“Yes, Gayle is his assistant. She helped me move into the castle. She’s so friendly and kind-hearted, she made my transition so much easier. I was delighted when she said she could attend the party.”

The women chatted a few more minutes before heading to dinner. Between Gayle’s and Molly’s outgoing natures, conversation flowed easily during the meal. They planned another trip into town the following day.

As they settled into the sitting room after the meal, Cate’s phone rang. She checked the display, finding Mrs. Campbell’s number on the screen. She swiped to accept the call.

“Hello, Mrs. Campbell.”

“Lady Cate!” the woman’s harried voice sounded on the other end. “Thank goodness you answered.”

Cate licked her lips, trying to prepare a response to the woman’s panicked voice when she plowed forward without waiting for a response.

“I know we have a meeting scheduled on Wednesday, but we must meet tomorrow.”

“Oh, is everything okay?”

“No,” Mrs. Campbell said flatly. “Everything is most certainly not okay. Oh, I cannot believe this. And I apologize for the added stress to your schedule, but, well, quite frankly, Lady Cate, this is an emergency!”

CHAPTER 17

“Emergency?” Cate questioned, her heart dropping at the word.

“Yes,” Mrs. Campbell gasped out on the other end of the line.

“Simply disastrous. Oh, I don’t know what we’ll do, but we must meet tomorrow to discuss it.”

“Oh, to have your enthusiasm. See you tomorrow.” The line clicked as the perturbed woman hung up.

Cate arched an eyebrow as she glanced at the phone she’d just pulled away from her ear.

“Everything all right, Lady Cate?” Gayle questioned.

Cate raised her eyebrows as she slid her phone onto the side table. “There is some sort of emergency with the party. Mrs. Campbell requested a meeting. Sorry, ladies, looks like I won’t make our trip into town tomorrow.”

“Oh, poor Cate,” Gayle said with a frown. “No fun for you.”

“That’s okay. I can have fun in Dunhaven whenever I want.”

“Good point, Cate,” Molly chimed in, before twisting to face Gayle. “She lives here so she shouldn’t get to have as much fun as us. We’re on vacation!”

“Well, I’m certain you’ll have a lovely time in town,” Cate answered. “Don’t feel bad for me. I’m certain Mrs. Campbell will keep me busy.”

“Deal,” Molly said, “looks like we’re free to shop ‘til we drop, Gayle!”

“Yes, it does!” Gayle agreed. “Well, shall we head to bed to get a nice rest before our shopping spree?”

“Great idea!” Molly said, thumping her hands against the chair arms as she stood.

They headed to bed, all of them arising early for a quick breakfast before they parted ways. Cate waved them off as she strolled away from the castle with Riley, meeting Mrs. Campbell in the library upon her return.

Mrs. Fraser had already shown the librarian into the sitting room, grumbling to Cate that the woman had arrived well before her appointment and had the audacity to seek Mrs. Fraser out in the kitchen to ask where she should wait. Cate went to the sitting room, Riley in tow, for her meeting.

“Mrs. Campbell, lovely to see you again, although I’m sorry it’s because of an emergency!” Cate said, walking through the door, Riley in her arms.

“Oh!” Mrs. Campbell exclaimed as she saw Cate enter, “you’ve brought the dog.” She eyed him like a bug. “Hello, there.”

“Yes,” Cate said, setting him next to her on the loveseat as she sat down and motioned for Mrs. Campbell to do the same. “Oh, you aren’t allergic, are you?”

“Oh, no, nothing like that. I just thought he might be a distraction, well, I hope not,” she said, waving her hand in the air as if to dismiss her comment.

“He shouldn’t be, he’s well-behaved. I hope we can resolve whatever issue there is quickly, to set both our minds at ease.”

“Yes, so do I!” Mrs. Campbell said.

“So, what is the issue?” Cate prompted.

“Oh, yes, yes, I’m sorry, I’m just not thinking today, ever since I got the call yesterday. Here is the long and short of it, I ordered burgundy tablecloths for all the tables we’ll be setting up in the ballroom and various areas. The tablecloths they sent are red.” Mrs. Campbell paused, closing her eyes as if unable to deal with the horror of the situation. “Of course, I called at once to complain. However, according to them, there isn’t much that can be done. The tablecloth company can’t locate enough burgundy on such short notice. We’d either have to drive to Edinburgh to pick up half of them or use the red.”

Cate sat stunned, never having dreamt that the color of tablecloths for a party would constitute an emergency.

“I know, I know,” Mrs. Campbell continued when Cate failed to answer, “it’s a travesty. Everything we’ve done is planned around the burgundy, napkins, decorations. Since it’s so impactful, I wanted to leave the final decision to you, Lady Cate. I was so flabbergasted. I didn’t know what to do.”

After a moment, Cate collected herself and answered, “Well, given the circumstances, I say we just go with the red. It will be very dramatic!”

Mrs. Campbell’s eyes widened and a shocked expression covered her face. “Really?” Cate’s choice seemed to flabbergast her as much as the so-called emergency.

“Yes. As you stated, there’s little we can do now. None of us can spare the time to drive to Edinburgh to pick up more tablecloths. We’ll have to make the best of it.”

Mrs. Campbell bit her lower lip. “Oh, yes, I suppose so. Well, I hope they don’t clash with the draperies in that room.”

“I’m sure it will be fine. We can describe the color as ‘blood red’. Very Halloween-oriented!”

Mrs. Campbell gave her a tight-lipped smile. “How enterprising of you, Lady Cate. Yes, we shall make the best of a bad situation. And we shall ask for a discount! I will see to that myself!”

Cate stood to end the conversation. “A very good idea, Mrs. Campbell. I know you’ll negotiate a good discount. And crisis averted!”

With some reluctance, Mrs. Campbell also stood. “I suppose so. Well, if you’re positive you’re satisfied with the solution, then I guess I can be on my way.”

“I am certain we can make the red work! It will provide a lovely contrast to the other décor. If things are too match-y, it may seem drab.”

Mrs. Campbell gave her a wide-eyed smile, still horrified by the situation. “Ah,” she began, not sure how to answer.

“If anyone can pull off this look, Mrs. Campbell, I’m sure it’s you and Dunhaven!”

Bolstered by Cate’s confidence in her, Mrs. Campbell raised her chin and broadened her smile. “I’m up to the task, Lady Cate! You can count on me!”

“That’s the spirit!” Cate said as they walked to the door.

“Well, I shall see you tomorrow then for the initial setup. I pray there will be no other crises waiting ‘round the corner to spring on us!”

Cate flashed her crossed fingers at Mrs. Campbell. "Fingers crossed! See you tomorrow, bright and early!"

Cate closed the door after Mrs. Campbell's car pulled down the driveway, sighing and rolling her eyes. She checked the timepiece that hung around her neck. About an hour before lunch remained. It would provide the perfect time to have the discussion she had been planning with Mrs. Fraser.

Cate wound her way down to the kitchen, knocking on the door jamb on her way in to announce her arrival.

Mrs. Fraser glanced up from her work. "Ah, Lady Cate, is the pest gone?"

Cate laughed at her description as she settled at the kitchen table. "Yes, Mrs. Campbell has left."

"And what, pray tell, was the emergency?"

"The linen company sent red tablecloths instead of burgundy."

Mrs. Fraser slung her dish towel over her shoulder after wiping her hands. "Oh, heavens! Well, that certainly was an excellent reason to interrupt your day! That woman is a ninny. I'm sorry, Lady Cate, I should be more charitable, but I just cannae tolerate that woman."

"It's okay, Mrs. Fraser. I marveled at the alarm it caused her, too. There wasn't much anyone could do. The company cannot send the correct color because they don't have enough stock. We'd have to drive to Edinburgh to collect the correct ones, which no one has time to do. Long story short, I told her we'd stick with the red and make do, despite her apprehension that it will clash with anything and everything else that we'd planned."

Mrs. Fraser glanced up from the cookies she arranged, her eyes wide. "Was she expecting you to send someone to Edinburgh, or worse, go yourself?"

"I had the distinct impression that's what she was hoping for. Since that is not an option, red it is!"

"A wise choice, Lady Cate. The red will be fine." Mrs. Fraser gave her a nod of her head before waving a bone in her hand for Riley.

Riley's dark, almond-shaped eyes gleamed with excitement as he danced on his hind legs. "Here you are, little Riley, a nice juicy bone for a special little boy! I'll have your lunch ready soon, Lady Cate. I'll bring it up to the library."

“If you have a moment before lunch, I’d like to speak with you about something, Mrs. Fraser.”

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands on her apron. “I always have a minute for you, Lady Cate. Do you mind if I continue to prepare lunch while we talk?”

“Not at all. I can help a little, too!”

“Now don’t trouble yourself at all, Lady Cate, I can do it,” Mrs. Fraser said, shooing her away to a seat at the table.

Cate yielded to her demands, taking a seat at the table before launching into her request. “Now, what did you want to discuss, Lady Cate?” Mrs. Fraser asked as she bustled around the kitchen.

Cate bit her lower lip before launching into her request. “Well, I know that you’ve been considering retirement after finding a suitable replacement to train. As much as I’ll regret the day you leave, I realize that it is something we need to plan for, even though I hope it’s still several years off.”

Mrs. Fraser nodded as she set serving utensils out on a tray. “Aye, and I have mixed feelings about it, too, Lady Cate. But don’t you fret, I’ll still be around on the estate, and I hope you’ll let me visit from time to time!”

“Mrs. Fraser, you are welcome to visit or stay anytime you’d like!”

“Thank you, Lady Cate. Though there’s nothing to fuss over yet. I haven’t had any luck finding a suitable replacement to train yet!” She shook her head in disbelief. “Seems no one wants to go into service these days!”

Cate sucked in a deep breath. “About that, I had an idea that I wanted to run past you. Now, I’d only consider it if you are one hundred percent on board with it. If you have even the slightest reservation, I won’t ever mention it again. And please don’t feel obliged to say yes for my sake, only if you’re comfortable and agree.”

“My goodness, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser said, coming to a dead stop, “well, I’m all ears but I’m a little nervous given that disclaimer!”

Cate offered a nervous smile, feeling much the same way. “I had an idea for a replacement for you and someone who can relieve you of some heavier chores until you retire. My friend, Molly.”

“Ms. Williams?”

“Yes. I should tell you I haven’t mentioned it to her at all, so she may not even be interested. I will only mention it to her if you approve of the idea. She hasn’t been having an easy time of things lately. She’s struggling to make ends meet and to get back on her feet after the rug was swept out from under her. A change of scenery might be just what the doctor ordered!”

“Or just what her ladyship ordered.” Mrs. Fraser nodded her head. “And very kind of you to think of helping her.”

Cate tapped her fingers against the table. “Again, I don’t know if she’d accept. I haven’t mentioned the idea to her. I wouldn’t do that until you’ve had time to consider it and let me know your thoughts. Take a night or two to sleep on it before you give me your answer.”

“I don’t need to sleep on it, Lady Cate. I would be happy to take Molly on to train, if she wants the job.”

Cate straightened in her seat, a grin forming on her lips. “Are you sure?”

“Aye. Molly’s been a good friend to you and she’s a good lassie. Besides, in the end, the choice is not mine but yours.”

Cate shook her head. “No. The choice is half yours, Mrs. Fraser. These are your last few years here. I want you to be happy. You will work closely together in training her. It’s important to me you are comfortable with the choice. So, are you sure? Please take all the time you need to consider it.”

Mrs. Fraser shook her head as she continued with her work. “I needn’t any more time to consider it. I like Molly. She’s a whiz around the kitchen. I’d feel more than comfortable leaving Dunhaven and you in her care once I’m fully retired, which won’t be for several years if I have any say in it.” Mrs. Fraser wagged a finger in the air.

The smile broadened on Cate’s features and her mind leapt ahead to how she’d ask Molly. Though, it also raced ahead to the day she’d have to say goodbye to Mrs. Fraser.

“Well, there it is, you have my blessing. Extend the offer to Molly!” Mrs. Fraser added.

Cate nodded at her. “Okay, I’ll speak with her about it before she leaves. Thank you, Mrs. Fraser.”

“I hope she accepts, Lady Cate. I think she’d be a wonderful addition to the castle! You know, it’s a shame what that man, if you can call him that, did to her. But his loss will be Dunhaven’s gain if she accepts!”

“I hope she accepts too, Mrs. Fraser. I’ll let you know as soon as I have her answer.” Cate beamed at her.

As the conversation came to a close, Jack and Mr. Fraser came through the door.

“Ah,” Jack said, “Lady Cate! Joining us for lunch today?”

“Well, it isn’t my normal lunch day, but since I’ll miss it tomorrow, I’d like to stay today if you’ll have me.”

With no objections, Cate spent her lunch with her staff, discussing the final details to accommodate Mr. Smythe’s arrival.

As Cate settled on the banks of the loch after her meal, she reflected on the conversation she’d had with Mrs. Fraser. Excited to ask Molly to join her staff, she prepared the way she’d make the offer.

After a time, her mind turned to the past. She and Jack had not visited in nearly a week, and she was itching to return to the investigation. They had identified the servant who would become the victim. Could they elicit any other information before the murder?

The busy schedule over the next few days meant they could not risk a trip back even if time almost stood still. With a sigh, Cate collected Riley and returned to the castle, forcing herself to focus on the present.

Tomorrow would kick-start full swing of party preparations. She would need all the stamina she could muster, leaving no energy to live a double-life.

She enjoyed the last few moments of quiet solitude before returning to the castle to prepare for dinner. As she approached, a car wound down the driveway, returning from Dunhaven.

Cate greeted an excited Molly and Gayle as they spilled out of the car with dozens of packages.

“Oh, Cate!” Molly exclaimed, “I think I may need extra luggage and an extra seat on the plane to take all this back.”

Cate eyed the piles of packages in the boot. “I hope they can get the plane off the ground with all of that!”

“She might have to make two trips,” Gayle quipped.

“Only if I can stay another week here between them,” Molly added.

Cate relieved them of a few packages and ushered Riley into the castle ahead of everyone. They climbed the stairs, laden with the purchases and went their separate ways to freshen up for dinner.

Excitement built as the party approached and they spent most of the meal discussing the work ahead of them, opting for an early evening to prepare for the decorating.

After breakfast the next morning, everyone met in the ballroom. Riley opted to spend the day in the kitchen with a new bone from Mrs. Fraser.

Mrs. Campbell arrived early, surveying the crew of Mr. Fraser, Jack, Molly and Gayle. "I see reinforcements have arrived."

"Yes, and ready to work!" Gayle answered with a grin as she smoothed her untucked blouse over her jeans.

"I've gone over the basic plan with them. Today is the delivery and setup of tables, chairs, and so on inside and most of the exterior decorations. Tomorrow, we work on the decorations inside," Cate said.

"And pumpkin carving!" Molly exclaimed with a fist pump.

"Yes, pumpkin carving," Cate agreed.

Mrs. Campbell shook her head and arched an eyebrow. "You Americans and your pumpkin carving."

"I think it's fun, too!" Gayle added. "Are you sure you won't join in the competition, Mrs. Campbell?"

Mrs. Campbell issued a polite but disingenuous smile. "Positive. Well, the truck with the tables and chairs should arrive any minute."

They stood in awkward silence for the few moments it took for the delivery truck to arrive and back to the gardens.

Mrs. Campbell remained in the ballroom, overseeing all items coming in. The others followed Cate to the truck to coordinate and assist with unloading.

With everyone's help, they unloaded the truck in just under two hours. The repositioning and setting up of all items took far longer. They completed the basic set up of the furniture after a working lunch.

They had just finished the meal when the trucks carrying the decorations for outside arrived. The cornstalks and pumpkins seemed endless. It took the better part of the afternoon to unload the materials from the trucks.

Everyone worked until late afternoon, finishing about half of the setup. They planned to finish the rest first thing the next morning. They broke from their work, allowing everyone to freshen up before Mr. Smythe's arrival.

Cate, Gayle and Molly reconvened at the castle's driveway as Mr. Smythe's car pulled down the drive. Jack arrived just as his car slowed to a stop, ready to assist with the luggage.

"Hello, Mr. Smythe," Cate said as he stepped from the car, "it's so nice to see you again. How was your trip in?"

“Lady Cate, hello. The trip was pleasant. I completed a good amount of paperwork on the train.” Cate smiled to herself; the man’s work ethic was limitless. Gayle followed Cate in greeting him.

“I’d like you to meet my friend from the States, Molly Williams,” Cate said, motioning to Molly.

“Hello!” Molly said, thrusting her hand forward. “It’s nice to meet you.”

Mr. Smythe accepted it, pumping it up and down. “The pleasure is all mine.”

“Mr. Smythe, I’ve put you in the Blue Room, as usual,” Cate informed him.

Jack emptied the luggage from the boot. “I’ll take the luggage up straight away.”

“Thank you, Mr. Reid,” Mr. Smythe answered.

Cate motioned toward the doors. “Shall we?”

The group made their way inside.

“I trust you didn’t put your pumpkin carving design in your luggage, Mr. Smythe,” Gayle teased. “Jack might try to peek at it.”

He patted his breast pocket, raising his chin. “I’ve got it here in my pocket. I take no chances.”

Cate chuckled at the truth in his statement.

Mr. Smythe set a foot on the stairs, excusing himself. “If you ladies don’t mind, I’ll take my leave to freshen up before dinner.”

“Okay. We’ll see you at dinner,” Cate answered with a wave.

Gayle and Molly entered the sitting room while Cate excused herself to retrieve Riley before dinner. She meandered to the kitchen.

Mrs. Fraser appeared to be in a frenzy as she entered.

“Mrs. Fraser!” Cate exclaimed. “Is everything all right?”

The woman offered Cate a worried glance. “I’m afraid we have another emergency.”

CHAPTER 18

Cate drew her chin back to her chest at the pronouncement of an emergency. Her stomach turned over and her heart skipped a beat as she wondered if something happened to Riley.

Mrs. Fraser fluttered her hands in the air. “Don’t mind, Lady Cate, it’s not that bad. And I’m getting it fixed.”

“What happened? What’s wrong?” Cate asked.

“I had to make a quick change for our dinner this evening. I was short one piece of meat.”

Cate furrowed her brow, not understanding.

“Your little monkey stole one right off the table and disappeared with it this afternoon.”

“RILEY!” Cate exclaimed, eyeing the little pup who laid near the stove as though nothing had happened. “Shame on you!”

Mrs. Fraser shook her head at Cate as she continued with meal preparations. “Oh, don’t blame the poor pup. I practically left it right under his nose. All he had to do was jump on the chair and grab it. It’s only natural that he’d take it.”

Cate collected the dog from the floor, frowning at him. “It’s so unlike him. He’s typically well-behaved. I am so sorry. I should have checked in with you earlier to ask if you needed help. I wasn’t thinking! I shouldn’t have left him with you, you have so much extra work. But, as I said, he’s not usually like this!”

“Oh, it’s nothing to worry about, Lady Cate. I was able to adjust the recipe. Besides, with the stories you’ve told me about your cooking, I’m not sure you could have helped. Oh, I’m only joking, Lady Cate.” Mrs. Fraser winked at her.

Cate chuckled at the assessment. “You are correct, though. Can I do anything to help?”

“Under any other circumstances, I would decline, but since I am behind, would you fill the water and wine glasses upstairs?”

“Yes, I can manage that task!” Cate declared, retrieving the water pitcher from the refrigerator and the opened wine bottle from the counter.

When Cate returned after completing her task, she found Mrs. Fraser’s kitchen back in its usual order. “See, Lady Cate, I told you I had it under control.”

“I never doubted it, Mrs. Fraser.”

“Now, out with you, back to your guests!” Mrs. Fraser pronounced, waving Cate out of the kitchen after she returned the water jug to the refrigerator.

Cate climbed the stairs to the dining room, finding Molly and Gayle already there.

“Ah, there you are, Cate!” Gayle said.

Gayle offered Riley a scratch under the chin. “Uh-oh. What have you done little fellow?”

“The little thief tried to abscond with our dinner!”

“Oh, no! Riley! I hope you weren’t successful! I’m starved!” Molly said.

“Don’t worry, Mrs. Fraser has it under control.” Cate answered.

“I’d expect nothing less!” Gayle said, as Mr. Smythe entered the dining room.

They were seated for dinner just as Mrs. Fraser entered with the meal. The group enjoyed their dinner, making light conversation as they ate. The delicious meal certainly did not hint at any mishaps. After a brief nightcap, everyone retired for the evening, exhausted from their long day.

The group met the next morning for another long day of decorating. Even Mr. Smythe, dressed in a casual ensemble, pitched in to help.

They spent their morning setting up hay bales, cornstalks and pumpkins, adjusting lights and arranging other decorations. Cate worked with Molly on the displays closest to the ballroom doors.

They positioned a few pumpkins on top of a hay bale, calling to Molly to ask how they looked from the door. She received no response.

“Molly?” Cate called, twisting to face her.

Molly stared up at the castle, biting her lower lip. “What? Oh! Sorry! A little to the left, honey.”

Cate rose to her feet, dusting off her hands. “Everything okay?”

“Oh, yeah, yeah.” Molly waved her hand in the air. “Just me being a downer.”

“What’s wrong? Allergic to hay bales?”

“No. Just realizing the party is tomorrow. I’m still looking forward to it, but... well, it also means my trip is almost over. I’ll be so sad to leave.”

Cate cocked her head, using the moment to broach her idea. “Molly, what if you didn’t have to leave?”

Molly roared with laughter. “If I didn’t have to leave, I’d consider my life perfect.”

A grin crept over Cate’s face and Molly offered her a confused stare. “Do you know something I don’t? Did Mr. Smythe tell you I have a long-lost relative with a castle to give me?”

“No. But... I had an idea.”

“An idea?” Molly raised her eyebrows.

“Yes. Mrs. Fraser, my housekeeper, is planning to retire in the next few years. She was hoping to find a replacement to train, but so far, she hasn’t had any luck. I remember how much you love to cook and bake. And after I saw you two in the kitchen together the last few days, I spoke with her and asked if she thought you might be a fitting replacement. She agreed that you’d be a wonderful selection. So, I’d like to offer you the job.”

Cate bit her lower lip, her eyebrows jiggling. “I realize it may be a surprise and that you may not have an answer, and that’s fine. Please take all the time you need to consider it. Oh, and I realize, also, that this may not even be something you’d consider. That’s okay, too, you’re under no obligation here, Molly.”

“You can... what?” she stopped short as she noticed Molly grinning at her.

Tears welled in Molly’s eyes and she pressed her lips together, shaking her head at Cate. “Oh, Cate. Stop your babbling and give me a hug.”

She drew Cate into a tight embrace. “Thank you for the offer. Your kindness makes me feel all warm and fuzzy.”

Cate squeezed her, patting her shoulder. “I just want to help. You seemed so unhappy when you came. But, please, you’re not obligated to...”

Molly pulled back, interrupting her. “Cate, I would love to work for you.”

Cate’s eyebrows raised and a slight grin crossed her open lips. “You would?”

“Yes! Oh, this wasn’t one of those things where I was supposed to decline politely was it?”

“No! I’m thrilled! I just assumed you might need some time to consider it! It’s a big move!”

Molly’s lips puckered into a frown, and she shook her head. “Nope, there’s nothing for me in Aberdeen. You’re right, my life was miserable before I came. I hate living in that town now. I need a fresh start, and nothing’s fresher than a new country! I have been so happy since I’ve been here, it’s the happiest I’ve been in months. I don’t want to leave, but it will be easier knowing I’m coming back... for good!”

Cate pulled Molly into another huge. “I’m so glad you accepted, Molly. There are a million arrangements to make. We have a lot to discuss, salary, start dates, living arrangements and all of that. Oh, I want you to live at the castle, if that’s okay! There are so many details, but it’ll be so fun discussing them!”

“If that’s okay? I couldn’t imagine a better place to live! Oh, Cate! I’m so excited! I believed the best day of my life was the day I arrived here. But I was wrong. Today is the best day!”

Cate grinned at her before she turned back to the hay bales. “We better get this display finished before we get in trouble for slacking!”

“Yes, I don’t want to be fired before I even start.”

With their renewed enthusiasm, they made quick work of the displays.

The garden decorations took the better part of the morning. After the group ate lunch, they gathered in the ballroom to put the final touches on the décor there. By mid-afternoon, everything was in order. After one final walkthrough, Mrs. Campbell was satisfied. The group disbanded to freshen up before dinner.

Cate strolled through the ballroom and gardens one final time before heading up to her room. Festive Halloween décor adorned the ballroom.

Blood red linens covered the tables placed around the room. Seats were placed along the outskirts of the room, adorned with burgundy chair skirts.

Pushing out through the massive doors, Cate entered the garden outside. Transformed into a magical fall wonderland, hay bales, pumpkins and cornstalks greeted her at every turn. Lights swung overhead to allow the guests to enjoy the space well after the sun set. Cate made her way to the far end of the garden, peering back at the castle. Banners swung lazily in the breeze, lending a regal air to the castle.

Only a few final touches remained, the largest of which was the addition of the carved pumpkins. They'd meet in the kitchen this evening and carve them over a dinner of light sandwiches.

Cate strolled back into the house and to her sitting room. She expected Riley to greet her, however, she found the room empty. A wave of panic swept over Cate until she spotted the note on her side table. Mrs. Fraser, despite the fiasco yesterday, thought the pup would be too cooped up for the day. She had "rescued" him from the room, taking him to the kitchen with her for the day.

Cate changed and fixed her makeup and hair then went straight to the kitchen.

She found Riley watching Mrs. Fraser set out the sandwiches. Pumpkin carving stations filled each place setting at the table.

"Good afternoon, Mrs. Fraser," Cate said. "No incidents today, I trust, Riley?"

Mrs. Fraser set the plate of sandwiches on the table. "No incidents, Lady Cate. He's been the picture of perfect behavior."

Cate sank into a seat and scooped the dog into her arms. "I'm glad to hear that. Riley, did you thank Mrs. Fraser for rescuing you?"

"It was my pleasure. I hated to see him alone all day."

Cate eyed the setup for each person complete with a bowl for scrapings and seeds and a set of carving knives. "Well, thank you for taking care of him, Mrs. Fraser. And these sandwiches look great! You have been busy!"

"Aye, Lady Cate. I couldn't help much with the decorating, so this is my contribution."

Cate smiled at her. "You more than contributed by providing us all with lunch! It's going to be a fun evening!"

Mrs. Fraser laid out a variety of baked good on another plate. "I quite agree. I cannae wait to carve my winning pumpkin!"

“Your winning pumpkin, is it? Pretty confident, Mrs. Fraser.”

“That I am, Lady Cate!”

Cate chuckled at the statement as she snapped the lid on the tin of cookies. “Oh, I have some great news, Mrs. Fraser.”

“Oh?”

“I spoke with Molly earlier this morning and she has accepted the position to follow in your footsteps as the housekeeper! There are lots of details that still need to be discussed, but it looks like we’ve got your replacement settled.”

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands on her apron and beamed at Cate. “That’s wonderful news, Lady Cate! Although, I won’t be leaving until I am satisfied with her work.”

“I’d expect nothing less, Mrs. Fraser.”

Molly joined them next. “Hi girls! I figured I’d pop down and see if I could help with anything.”

“Hi, Molly! I just told Mrs. Fraser the good news! That you’ll be returning to us to learn her position and take over once she retires.”

Molly squealed, waving balled fists in the air. “I’m so excited, I can barely contain myself. It took all in me not to send Jeff my letter of resignation the moment I went to my room. I was too lazy to type it all on my phone, though! But I will send it the moment I get back!”

Mrs. Fraser said, “Molly, I’m so pleased that you’ll be joining us. Lady Cate made an excellent suggestion to bring you on.”

“I’m excited to start! I wish I didn’t have to go home!”

“Well, Miss Molly, you can start right now by setting out a second plate of biscuits from that tin in front of you.” Mrs. Fraser nodded to the tin on the preparation table.

“Sure thing!” Molly responded as she tugged the lid off.

Cate sank into her chair at the table. “Don’t worry, you’ll be back before you know it, Molly. We’ll figure out the details this weekend before you leave, then you’ll have something to look forward to!”

The ladies discussed a few more minor details about Molly’s new position before Mr. Fraser and Jack joined them, followed within minutes by Gayle. Mr. Smythe arrived last, explaining he’d spent a few extra minutes making adjustments to his award-winning design.

Over the next three hours, the group enjoyed their work, conversation, and roasted pumpkin seeds before carrying their creations to the gardens outside.

After finishing the carving, they enjoyed hot chocolate and cookies before retiring for the evening. Cate tossed and turned, finding it difficult to sleep. Her attention turned from her upcoming party to the one being hosted by Randolph and Victoria. A murder would occur, and she'd met the victim. Yet, they were no closer to discovering why he was murdered or by whom. More questions remained than answers.

Cate threw back the covers and slipped into her slippers. She roamed the halls until she found herself in the tower room.

She squinted as she flicked on the light and stared at the box.

"What happened here in 1856?" she murmured.

She closed her eyes, trying to imagine a scene where an enraged Randolph bashed in his footman's head then tossed his body from the window. She wrinkled her nose. Something didn't fit.

Perhaps the murderer was the mysterious "S." Had she gone mad from being locked into the tower room and murdered a man? But why would Randolph confess?

Cate scanned the room again. The murder weapon was never mentioned in any of the news articles. Had it never been found? Could it still be in the castle?

Cate eyed the wardrobe across the room. It stood six inches from the floor on raised legs. She'd discovered a secret compartment in the furniture piece, but she hadn't looked under it. Could it be hiding a centuries-old murder weapon?

She skirted the boxes and knelt on the floor in front of the wardrobe. She peered underneath. The room's light was not bright enough to pierce the darkness under the wardrobe. She cursed herself for not bringing her cell phone. She considered retrieving it, then decided she would make do without it. Steeling her nerves, she closed her eyes and reached a hand underneath, blindly feeling around.

She yanked her hand back after a moment, her nose wrinkling as she worried about what she might touch. She bit her lower lip and thrust her hand under the wardrobe again.

Her hand struck something. Instinctively, she pulled it back before pressing herself against the floor and squinting into the shadows.

She stretched her arm under again, feeling for the object. Her fingertips found it. Cold metal touched her skin. She grasped it and tugged. The object swiveled, wedged under the heavy wardrobe.

She squeezed her lips together, yanking at it until she freed it and pulled it from under the wardrobe.

She stared down at the find. A thick layer of dust obscured every surface of the object. She blew on it, sending a cloud of dust billowing into the surrounding air. After a few sneezes, she wiped more dust away and studied the object.

A brass globe sat atop a rectangular stand on the heavy object. She turned the object over in her hands as she studied it.

It nearly slipped from her hands as she glanced at the bottom. A thick smear of rust-colored material covered the bottom. Cate's heart skipped a beat. Was she holding the murder weapon from a centuries old murder in her hands?

CHAPTER 19

Cate climbed to her feet, still clutching the brass globe. She stared at the large brownish red smudge on the bottom, wondering if it was blood.

With her heart still pounding, she threaded through the halls to the kitchen, placing the item in a plastic bag before washing her hands.

She returned to her sitting room and collapsed onto the chaise, staring at the item in her lap.

Could this object be the murder weapon? Why didn't the authorities find the object?

Cate set the paperweight on her side table and checked the timepiece. Already after midnight, she trudged into her bedroom to go to sleep, leaving her mysterious find behind.

The rising sun pierced through her windows a few hours later, awakening her from a dead sleep. She stretched and rose, kicking herself for roaming around the castle for half the night.

After breakfast, activity buzzed in the castle. Final touches were added to the décor in the ballroom and gardens by Historical Society volunteers. The caterers descended on Mrs. Fraser's kitchen to begin party preparations, chasing the woman from her usual haven. She snatched a tin of shortbreads before being ushered out.

Cate sank into an armchair next to her in the library as the woman nibbled on a cookie and read a novel, her feet propped on an ottoman.

"It's nice to see you with your feet up, Mrs. Fraser."

Mrs. Fraser shook her head. "Chased from my own kitchen, I was."

"Good thing, it's your day off!"

"Aye, you mentioned that, but I still don't understand what we will eat for lunch."

Cate grinned at her, arching an eyebrow. "Don't worry, Mrs. Fraser, I have it covered!"

Jack pushed through the doors to the library. "I hope it's not cereal!"

Cate glanced over her shoulder at him. "And what's wrong with that? I'd even spring for the kind with marshmallows."

"You hear that, Mrs. Fraser? And you worried about our lunch."

Cate rose from her seat, smoothing her leggings. "Jack, I had a question for you if you have a minute."

"Sure, what did you need?"

"Come with me, I'd like you to take a peek at something."

Riley leapt onto Mrs. Fraser's footstool, curling in the blanket draped over her legs.

"Well, it looks like you've made yourself quite comfortable, Riley."

Mrs. Fraser shooed her away. "Leave him, Lady Cate. He's nice and cozy. Not to mention, he's keeping my feet warm!"

"Thanks, Mrs. Fraser," Cate said. "We won't be long."

"Take your time, Lady Cate! Both of us are cozy here!"

Cate led Jack from the library toward the back stairs.

"Everything okay with the party preparations?"

"Yes," Cate said as they mounted the stairs. "It has nothing to do with that. I found something I'd like you to take a glance at."

"Care to give any more explanation?"

Cate held a finger in the air, her eyebrow arching. "Yes, but not just yet. I want you to look at it first and give me your impression."

She led him to her sitting room, crossing to the chaise and grabbing the bagged object from the side table.

He accepted it as she passed it off to him, bobbling the heavy object. "Wow, it's heavy."

He glanced at it, turning the bag and its contents around in his hands.

"Something I'm supposed to notice?"

"Turn it over," Cate answered.

Jack's eyebrow arched and he shot a glance at Cat. "Is that blood?"

"I'm not sure, but that's what I thought."

Jack scrunched his eyebrows, staring at Cate. “Where did you find this? And why do you think it’s blood? I mean it looks like blood but why would there be blood on this paperweight?”

“I found it in the tower room, wedged under the wardrobe. The same one where I found the mysterious note from ‘S.’”

Jack screwed up his face before realization dawned on him. “You think this relates to the murder?”

Cate gave him a knowing nod. “Yes. Well, that’s the most obvious idea in my mind.”

“Surely the police would have found this when the murder occurred. What are the chances the murder weapon lay hidden in the tower room for over a century?”

“I wondered about that, too. But I re-read the articles about the murder again. When the body was first found, they assumed he had died from the fall. They wouldn’t have looked for a murder weapon. They would have presumed the fall killed him, whether or not it was an accident. It was only after the autopsy that they realized he was dead before he fell. By the time they searched for the murder weapon a week had already gone by. They could have easily missed it!”

Jack pondered the information, nodding his head. “It’s a long shot, but you could be correct. They found that he was killed by blunt force trauma to the head, right?”

“Right. This is the sort of object that may have struck the fatal blow.”

“Or it could be rust and discoloration from being stuck under the wardrobe for years.”

Cate cocked her head. “I have a method to tell if it’s blood.”

“I’m all ears.”

“We can put a few drops of peroxide on it. If it’s blood, it will bubble. If not, it won’t.”

“Worth a try, I guess. Do you have some?”

“Yes, let me grab it.” Cate disappeared from the room, retrieving a bottle of hydrogen peroxide from her bathroom and an eye dropper. “Okay, open that bag and let’s try this.”

Jack tugged the bag open and removed the paperweight.

Cate filled the eyedropper with peroxide then dribbled a few drops onto the stained surface. Within seconds, the surface bubbled and fizzed.

They shared a glance.

“So, it is blood,” Cate said as she eyed the fizzing liquid.

“Looks that way. You may be right, Cate. We may have a murder weapon in our hands.”

“I’m not sure if that makes me feel better or worse,” she answered as she stared down at the brass object.

“Well, it tells us where the murder occurred, most likely.”

“Yes, I’d say it’s likely the murder occurred in the tower room. I doubt someone bludgeoned Andrew to death somewhere else then went to the tower room to hide this object after throwing his body from the window there.”

Jack nodded in agreement.

“Well,” Cate said, relieving Jack of the object and nesting it back inside the plastic bag, “I expect we’ve learned all we can for the moment from this. We should go grab Riley and head to lunch!”

“Ah, yes, your infamous and mysterious lunch. We wouldn’t want the cereal to get soggy.”

Cate made a face at him, rolling her eyes and shaking her head. “Come on.”

They returned to the library and Cate retrieved the little pup, asking everyone to meet her in the dining room for her mystery lunch.

She waited at the front door for the delivery and carried it to the dining room with Riley trailing behind her.

“Lunch is served, American style!” she exclaimed as she popped through the doors with her bounty

Molly clapped her hands. “Yay! Pizza! Oh, I hope there is pepperoni.”

“There is pepperoni, cheese, mushroom and green pepper!” Cate announced as she plopped the boxes down next to the paper plates and plastic cups she’d set out.

Mrs. Fraser opened one box, the aroma of greasy pizza filling the air. “Why, Lady Cate, I expect I might enjoy this lunch!”

“Mmm,” Jack said, already diving into his mushroom slice, “this might be your best cooking ever, Cate.”

“And you assumed it would be cereal!” Cate retorted, a hand on her hip as her guests filled their plates.

After lunch, Cate and Molly cleared the plates and cups, taking everything to the kitchen for disposal. Riley trailed behind them. Abuzz with activity, caterers bustled around preparing dishes, serving trays and unpacking food. The exterior door swung open and closed in an endless cycle as people traveled in and out.

They tied up the trash bags and set them near the door when Riley bolted through the open space as a caterer stepped inside.

“Riley!” Cate shouted after him.

She raced to the door as the pup bounded across the yard and disappeared from her sight.

Cate ran a few steps into the grass. “RILEY! RILEY! COME BACK HERE!”

She shouted for several more minutes to no avail. The little pup did not return.

She marched further into the yard, shouting at the top of her lungs.

Molly followed after her. “Maybe we should enlist help. We still have some time before we need to get ready.”

Cate nodded, her face creased with worry over Riley’s off behavior. “Yes, perhaps we should. I’m concerned he ran off because of all the excitement in the house. It may have frightened him. I don’t want him to get too far from the house and become lost.”

Molly patted her shoulder. “Sure. Don’t worry, we’ll find him! He couldn’t have gotten far.”

Cate nodded to her, glancing back over the rolling hills.

Molly thumbed back toward the castle. “Tell you what, you stay out here, keep calling him. I’ll go get the others.”

“Thanks, Molly.” Cate crossed her arms and bit her lower lip as she continued to scan the property.

Within minutes, Molly had the search party organized.

“Thank you all for helping. He went over the ridge over there,” Cate said, pointing in the direction she’d last seen Riley, “I’ve never seen him run so fast. I’m sorry for the trouble, I just don’t want him to become lost if he is frightened.”

“Of course, Lady Cate, we’re happy to help you look,” Mr. Fraser reassured her. “Mrs. Fraser and I will head to the loch, the laddie enjoys it there.”

“Molly, Gayle and I will go to the back garden and see if the chap has gotten himself into the decorations there,” Mr. Smythe offered.

Cate nodded as she tugged her sweater tighter around her. “Thanks.”

“That leaves us,” Jack said, “we’ll follow where he ran over the ridge. Meet back here in twenty minutes whether or not you find him so we can figure out our next course of action.”

They agreed to the plan then split up to search for the small dog. Cate gnawed her lower lip as they trudged across the property. She couldn’t face the party if Riley was lost.

Cate hurried across the yard, her eyes searching every corner of the landscape in the hopes of spotting a glimpse of the tiny dog.

As they crested the hill, they searched the horizon. There were no signs of Riley. Cate called to him several times, but spotted no sign of him.

“Should we continue further?” Cate asked.

Jack shielded his eyes, scanning the horizon. “Yes, but which way?”

“Oh, I don’t know,” Cate said, her voice wavering.

Jack waved a finger in the air. “Hey, isn’t the folly along that path there? You’ve found him there a few times before, haven’t you?”

Cate’s eyes widened and she grasped his forearm. “Yes! Oh, maybe he ran there! At least I hope so, anyway. Come on, let’s hurry.”

Cate hastened to the path with Jack dashing behind her. The folly came into sight a short distance away. They jogged toward it, calling Riley’s name.

They reached the folly with no sign of Riley. Jack thumbed on his flashlight before entering.

Despite the bright sunshine, the interior remained darkened.

“Riley!” Cate called, her voice echoing off the stone as she stepped inside.

Jack swept the flashlight around the walls.

“Riley!” Cate called again.

A whimper emanated from across the room.

A stone bench ran the length of the back wall. Cobwebs and leaves adorned it, making it difficult to see underneath. As Jack trained the light under it, something dashed out, cracking into Cate’s leg and causing her to stumble back a step.

“RILEY!” she exclaimed as the little pup leapt up toward her. “Oh, Riley! Why did you run off? Thank goodness we found you!”

Cate scooped him into her arms, hugging him close. She kissed the top of his black head as she squeezed him again. He offered an appreciative lap on the cheek.

With his flashlight still trained on the stone bench, Jack cocked his head, his brow wrinkling. “That’s interesting.”

“What is?”

Jack bent to one knee, grabbing a red object from amidst the decaying pile of leaves. “There’s some garbage here, it looks like.”

He stared at the chewed-up bag. “Yum-yum Bones. Isn’t this one of Riley’s treat bags?”

Cate stepped closer, eyeing the bag. “Yes, it is.”

Riley wriggled in her arms, leaping to the stone floor below and darting under the bench. “Riley!” Cate exclaimed. “What is so interesting under that bench?”

“Perhaps he left a treat from his treat bag,” Jack said as she shined his light under the bench. “Or not.”

Cate knelt on the floor next to Jack, peering under the bench. “What is it?”

She blinked a few times to adjust to the light before her eyes went wide. She straightened and gawked at Jack. “Is that...”

CHAPTER 20

Cate glanced under the bench again, detecting not one pair of eyes gleaming against the flashlight's beam, but two.

"Another dog, it looks like," Jack answered her unfinished question.

"Riley, come out here. Come on." Cate settled onto her haunches, patting her thighs. Riley trotted out from under the bench, glancing at Cate then the other pup. "I think he's trying to tell us something."

"Yes, I think so. And by the looks of it, he's been trying for the last month. I see what's left of Mrs. Fraser's steak here, a torn open bag of treats and some other food scraps." Jack reached under the bench, coaxing the other dog out. "Come on little fella, come on. We won't hurt you."

With Jack's urging, the other dog crept out from under the bench.

Riley whimpered, wagging his tail at Cate. The dog stood just taller than Riley but was about his size. He appeared to be gray and white, however, mud smudged large portions of his fur. His fluffy tail curled in a tight pigtail over his back.

Cate extended her hand to the dog. "Oh, hello, little guy. Are you a guy?"

The dog stretched his neck, sniffing Cate's hand before attempting to retreat under the bench.

"Oh, no you don't," Jack said, snatching him before he could hide again. "Looks like Riley has found a friend, Lady Cate."

“Looks like it. Well, I suppose we better take them both back to the house. We can inquire about lost dogs in town later. For now, we should get him cleaned up and fed. Poor thing, it seems he’s been hiding here for quite a while.”

“Yes, it does. But it looks like Riley has kept him well fed.”

Cate scooped Riley into her arms, kissing him on the head. “Indeed, he has. And it also explains all of his naughty behavior of late. Oh, Riley, what have I told you about bringing home strays?”

They hiked the path back to the house, arriving last.

“We found him!” Cate shouted from a distance, lifting Riley in her arms.

Molly applauded the announcement.

“And then some!” Jack added.

“Is that...” Gayle began, her finger pointing to the dog in Jack’s arms.

“Another dog?” Molly finished for her.

“Yes,” Cate said, as they closed the distance between them. “We also found the remnants of your stolen steak, Mrs. Fraser. And a bone from the other piece of meat you thought you had forgotten in the freezer.”

“So, I haven’t gone senile! The little bugger stole it, did he?”

“He did,” Cate admitted. “I’m sorry!”

“No apology needed, Lady Cate. It looks like he did it for the right reasons. Hello, little pup.” Mrs. Fraser ruffled the other dog’s fur.

Cate heaved a sigh of relief. “Well, with the emergency over, everyone can return to their party preparations! I will give this little one a bath and something to eat.”

After everyone welcomed Riley and his new friend, they dispersed. Cate offered both dogs a bowl of food. The new pup downed his in seconds. The poor animal still seemed to be hungry despite the amount of food Riley had been providing him.

After they ate, Cate used the washbasin in the laundry to give the second dog a quick bath. She wrapped him in a towel and carried him to her bedroom, Riley trailing behind.

After toweling him off, she set him on the floor. Riley carried a ball to him, setting it down in front of him. He then retrieved a bone, dropping that in front of the other dog, too. He nudged it toward him, encouraging his canine friend to chew it. The little gray and white pup snatched the bone, carrying it a few feet away and settling in to chew it. Satisfied, Riley curled in his bed, his eyes becoming heavy.

Riley's concern for the other dog warmed her heart. She found herself hoping no one owned him. Riley could use a friend.

She'd have to settle that matter later. Now, she needed to ready herself for the party.

She left the two dogs behind in her bedroom while her makeup, opting for a dramatic look to match her blood red ball gown, and swept her hair into an up-do. Her travels to the past had provided her with plenty of practice.

Before slipping into her costume, she checked on the dogs, finding them nestled together in Riley's bed. Riley's chin rested on the other pup's back as though protecting him.

She smiled at the scene before rousting the two from their slumber for a quick walk, then settled them back in their shared bed before donning her costume.

With her selection from the same era they time traveled to, Cate found the costume almost normal. She checked the gold timepiece hanging from her neck. With a few minutes before she needed to be downstairs, she spent the time giving Riley and his friend a little TLC.

A knock sounded at her door.

"Yes?" she called.

"Just me," Jack's voice answered, "can I come in?"

"Yes, you can! Everything okay?"

"Yes," Jack announced as he entered in his costume. "I just wanted to see how Riley's little buddy is doing."

Cate rose from her seat on the chaise and motioned to the two dogs curled in the bed. "He seems fine. Riley has been sharing his bed with him. He's still shy with me, but he seems to have a friend in Riley."

Jack stooped down to pet the two dogs. Riley climbed from his bed to give Jack an appreciative lap to his face. "You're still my best buddy, Riley. And kudos to you for taking care of your little friend."

Cate smiled at them again. "I wonder if he belongs to someone."

"We can ask around at the party tonight," Jack suggested as he stood.

Cate sucked in a breath as she eyed Riley curling next to the other dog again. "I'm almost hoping he doesn't. It would be nice for Riley to have a pal."

“I suppose we’ll find out soon enough! May I escort you down, Lady Cate?” Jack asked, giving an extravagant bow.

“Thank you,” she said, adding a curtsy.

Jack offered his arm and together they made their way down to the ballroom. The room hummed with activity as the caterers began their preparations for food service. Drinks were being set out, warming candles lit and appetizers placed on trays. The band tested their instruments.

Molly joined them next, her costume a take on Marie Antoinette. She beamed with excitement, a broad grin on her face.

“This place looks great!” Molly said.

Gayle and Mr. Smythe arrived next, each of them dressed in clothing from the seventeenth century. Mr. Smythe looked at home in the formal clothing.

Mr. and Mrs. Fraser were right behind them. Cate awaited their arrival, dying to see Mrs. Fraser’s top-secret costume. Mr. Fraser had selected an old-fashioned Scottish outfit, complete with a kilt. Mrs. Fraser wore an eighteenth-century hooped skirt in a blue tartan fabric. She looked regal and Scottish to the core.

Cate loved the outfit, telling Mrs. Fraser how fitting she found her costume. If there were to be a costume competition, everyone agreed Mrs. Fraser stood a great chance of winning.

Chimes rang throughout the house.

“That would be Mrs. Campbell, I’d bet,” Cate said. “I’ll go meet her and then I had better get ready to greet guests!”

She made her way to the front door, opening it to Mrs. Campbell, dressed in a regal ball gown.

“Good evening, Mrs. Campbell! Please come in!” Cate ushered her through the door and to the ballroom.

The woman followed Cate to the ballroom, eyeing the setup again and issuing orders moments later to ensure the party came off without a snafu.

Cate left the ballroom with the very capable Mrs. Campbell in charge. While Mrs. Campbell had volunteers to welcome the guests and escort them to the ballroom, she wanted to be there to greet all the guests when they arrived.

She didn’t have long to wait before her first guests arrived. The guests, many townsfolk from Dunhaven, were excited to see the castle. Most had never seen the interior of the castle, despite it dominating the landscape of the town for their lifetimes. Cate found herself excited to greet them and meet those she hadn't met yet.

When the bulk of the guest list had arrived, Cate left the greeters at the door for the remaining stragglers and joined everyone else in the ballroom where the party was in full swing. Music filled the air along with talking and laughing. The caterers mingled with champagne and hors d'oeuvres.

Cate made her rounds, speaking with each guest again. She made sure to direct them to the pumpkin contest and encouraged them to vote. After she was sure she had spoken to everyone and any new arrivals, she found Molly and Mrs. Fraser hovering near one of the food stations.

She joined them, finding them critiquing the assortment and presentation. "Can't you take one night off?"

"I find it enjoyable to critique cooking that isn't mine," Mrs. Fraser retorted. "Besides, Molly and I are comparing notes as a beginning step to her training."

"I don't mind," Molly chimed in. "I'm so excited to start, I don't even want to go home!"

"Look at it this way," Cate said, "it's just a small detour to collect all your belongings!"

"A tiny one if I have any say in it," Molly said.

"I'll be speaking to Mr. Smythe about the paperwork before he leaves. I hate to make him work on his vacation. But I don't think he ever takes a vacation."

Cate left the two women to continue their critique of the catering. She caught Mrs. Campbell as she was taking a break from circulating amongst the guests to micro-manage some of the caterers. She asked the woman to oversee the pumpkin carving competition vote so that the results were above reproach.

After squaring that away, Jack approached. "If you have a minute, Lady Cate, I think I may have found the owner of the extra dog."

Cate's heart sank. She had hoped to keep the dog and the appearance of the owner disappointed her. Yet, she understood, knowing how she would feel if she lost Riley and someone else found him and wanted to keep him.

Jack led her to a couple outside admiring the pumpkin carving. "Lady Cate, this is Mr. and Mrs. Frank and Cara Bailey, owners of Bailey's farm."

"Oh, yes, we met earlier. You provided all the pumpkins, cornstalks and hay bales. Thank you!"

“I think they also may have provided the new addition upstairs,” Jack added.

“Aye,” Frank said with a nod. “I think you may have ended up with one freeloader from the Bailey farm, Lady Cate.”

Cate forced a smile onto her face. “He’s just upstairs if you’d like to take a peek.”

“I don’t want to interrupt your party, Lady Cate,” Frank said.

“I think I can slip away for a few moments, follow me.” Cate signaled for the couple to follow her from the ballroom, leading them to her upstairs suite.

Riley and friend were curled in his bed. The two lifted their heads to peer at the newcomers as they entered, too lazy to get up.

Frank glanced at Cara, nodding his head. “Aye, that’s him. He looks right at home here!”

Cate smiled, despite a pang of sadness. “I’ll bet he misses his real home.”

“He never really had a ‘real’ home, Lady Cate,” Cara said. “Our dog had puppies a little over a year ago. We found homes for all of them except this one. He’s very reserved and never stood out to anyone considering adopting one of our pups. About a month ago, he disappeared. We searched and searched for him but never found him. I suppose he was hiding out here on your estate.”

Cate squatted down to pat his head. “Aww, what a shame. He’s very cute! Poor baby, getting lost!”

“It appears your dog has taken quite a liking to him!” Frank said.

“Yes. Riley has been sneaking off to see him for the entire month, I believe. He’s been supplying him with as much food as he could steal, too,” Cate answered with a laugh.

“What a fine friend!” Cara said. She glanced at Frank who nodded again. “Lady Cate, I don’t suppose you’d be interested in providing a home for him? It looks like Riley likes his new friend.”

“Oh!” Cate exclaimed, straightened. “I... Well... I’d love to! I mean, only if you’re sure. After a year, you must be attached to him. I don’t want to take him away from you.”

Cara wrapped her arm around Frank’s and shook her head. “Nay, Lady Cate, we always hoped he’d find a good home. It seems he’s found a fine one here. Living on a farm, we have so many animals. This poor pup seems to need more attention than we can give him. But I'm sure he'd receive nothing but the best care here!"

Cate grinned at her. "Then I wholeheartedly accept. I think Riley will be thrilled he's staying."

Cate rubbed the new dog under the chin. "Did you hear that? You've got a new home! And don't worry, I'll get you your own bed, too."

"He'll have the royal treatment now!" Jack said. "What will you name him, Lady Cate?"

Cate glanced up at the couple standing next to her. "I think I'll name him Bailey!"

Satisfied with the results, everyone returned to the party downstairs. Cate was thrilled to keep Bailey and she bet Riley would be, too.

When they returned to the ballroom, the party was still going strong with music, dancing and revelry. Mrs. Fraser milled around the room, introducing everyone to Molly, her successor and protégé. Although quick to dispel rumors she'd soon be retiring, she seemed to be enjoying her moment as the proud peacock with her new peachick.

People flitted from inside the warm ballroom into the cool, crisp autumn air and the escape of Mr. Fraser's gardens.

No matter what activity they were participating in, it seemed everyone was enjoying the party.

Mr. Smythe had already commented to Cate that he considered the party to be a success. Gayle hadn't left the dance floor since the music began. Molly's unwavering grin made it apparent that she was enjoying herself. Jack's loud laugh with friends confirmed his enjoyment.

As Cate entered the ballroom, Mrs. Campbell sought her out. They had the results from the pumpkin carving contest and were ready to announce the winner. She suggested it may be an appropriate time for Cate to make a small speech to the group.

Cate wrinkled her nose at the prospect. Despite having been a college professor, speeches were not Cate's forte. She made a brief statement, thanking everyone for attending, and stating that it was a pleasure to meet each and every one of them.

She gave all credit for the party's success to Mrs. Campbell. Her concluding remarks hinted at another party and the hope to make the Halloween party an annual event.

When finished, Cate handed the microphone back to Mrs. Campbell, who had a few announcements of her own to make. Following her remarks, she waved a notecard in the air.

“We have the winner of the pumpkin carving contest!”

A round of applause went up through the crowd. Mrs. Campbell’s volunteers carried the carving in, setting them on the stage next to her.

“Before I announce the winner, I’d like to reveal the carver of each pumpkin.” She slid on a pair of reading glasses and glanced down at her card.

“The dog by shrub pumpkin was carved by Mr. Jack Reid.”

Another burst of applause sounded and Jack nodded and waved a hand.

“Lady Justice by Mr. William Smythe.” She paused for the applause. “The cornucopia by Emily Fraser. The image of Dunhaven Castle by Charlie Fraser. Spooky jack-o-lantern by Lady Cate. Smiling pumpkin by Molly Williams. Surprised pumpkin by Gayle Pearson.”

After the applause died down, Mrs. Campbell asked the band for a drum roll.

She cleared her throat and arched an eyebrow, glancing down at the card before removing her glasses. “The winner of the first annual Dunhaven Castle Halloween Ball Pumpkin Carving Contest is...”

CHAPTER 21

Mrs. Campbell scanned the crowd as she let silence hang in the air. Everyone waited with bated breath for the winner's name. She arched an eyebrow. "CHARLIE FRASER!"

Applause broke out throughout the room along with cheers from Cate, Mrs. Fraser and Jack. His meticulous design had gained him the glory his quiet nature often failed to capture.

Cate returned to Mrs. Campbell's side on the stage, retrieving a trophy hidden away behind a table skirt. A secret to everyone but Cate and Mrs. Campbell, they'd ordered a trophy for the winner. Their name would be engraved along with the year of their win. She was overjoyed to hand it over to Mr. Fraser after a few pictures were snapped of Lady Catherine with the winner.

Following the award ceremony, Mrs. Campbell concluded by inviting everyone to enjoy the rest of the party. Music commenced again and chatter filled the room.

Cate poured herself a glass of punch and made her way to the edge of the room, overlooking both the ballroom and the gardens. She watched life pass her by, as the cool autumn air caressed her skin, comforting her off after her moment in the spotlight.

She reflected on her time in the castle. From the moment she'd stepped foot onto the property, she had felt an incredible sense of ease. She had never experienced such a homey feeling as she had here. She sensed that Molly had the same sentiment about Dunhaven.

The party wound down within a few hours. Cate said her goodbyes to most guests before returning to an almost empty ballroom. Her own guests, staff and Mrs. Campbell remained. After a few moments of conversation with Mrs. Campbell, the woman also said her goodbyes. Cate saw her off.

Despite being exhausted after a fabulous night, they decided to meet for a nightcap after changing. Left over energy from the party kept them up for another hour, discussing everything from Cate's new dog to Mr. Fraser's win. Finally worn-out and sleepy, the group parted ways for a much-needed rendezvous with their beds.

Cate spent an extra hour in bed the next morning, enjoying the sunrise as it painted a cloudless sky with vivid purples and pinks.

The ball had been a rousing success. Mrs. Campbell already babbled ideas about the next event as she left the castle, dubbing it "Christmas with Lady Cate," and intent on hosting a winter celebration to showcase the castle bedecked in holiday splendor.

The idea of planning another party exhausted her, but she couldn't deny it was an excellent idea. At least Mrs. Campbell seemed content to allow Cate the weekend to recover, suggesting that they meet on Wednesday to discuss the next event.

Cate pushed the next party from her mind, determined to focus on a lazy weekend with her friends. They had no plans which, in Cate's mind, were the best plans. She couldn't wait to discuss Molly's return.

As she ushered the dogs outside for a morning jaunt, she found Molly wrapped in one of her "Scotland sweaters" enjoying the view.

"You will need a lot more sweaters," Cate called.

"I KNOW!" Molly bellowed. "Cate, I am so excited!"

"So am I!" Cate exclaimed as she closed the gap between them.

Molly took one of the leashes from Cate. "I'm telling Jeff as soon as I get home, I'm giving him my two weeks the day I am back!"

"We need to discuss so much. When do you plan to move?"

"Tomorrow? Do I even need to go back?" Molly asked as the gravel crunched under her feet.

She gazed at the scenery surrounding them, understanding the impulse to want to stay. Although she was likely biased, she found it one of the most beautiful spots on earth. The rolling hills, the way the mist clung to the moors, the sky painted like a picture, the way the colors reflected onto the castle's stone giving it a magical glow; all of it created a setting that couldn't be more perfect.

"You don't have to go back," she answered, "but you may want a few items from home."

"Sadly, you're right. I do need more than a week's worth of clothes and a travel toothbrush. Although, I won't need much else, will I? Not that I have much, a handful of cheap pieces of furniture in my awful apartment. But I still need to deal with it. What did you do with your stuff?"

"Donated most of it. I took my clothes and a few personal keepsakes. But furniture, kitchenware, my car, all of that went to charity."

"I think I will do the same. You have no idea how happy it makes me to say that. Wow!"

Cate grinned at her as they wandered through the side garden. "It makes me happy, too. I'll be counting the days until you are back and in your Rose Room! Let's continue this discussion over breakfast. We can discuss timelines with Mr. Smythe. He took care of all my paperwork for my move."

"I can't wait. Will I become a Scottish citizen?"

"I think so!" Cate wrapped Molly in a hug, excited to see her friend so energized. It was a contrast to Molly's arrival. The difference one week later was astounding. No longer dwelling on the past, Molly focused on her bright future.

The women wandered back to the castle. As they entered the dining room, they found Mrs. Fraser fussing over some food on the sideboard. Cate scolded her for bothering on her day off, insisting that Mrs. Fraser sit at once and let Cate make a plate for her. The rest of the group soon joined them. Everyone helped themselves to the à la carte cold breakfast.

During breakfast, the conversation turned toward Molly's upcoming move. With Mr. Smythe's advice they nailed down a rough date for her return. Much to Molly's delight, with Mr. Smythe's recommendation and Molly's own estimates for tying up loose ends, she would be back to Dunhaven by mid-December.

"Christmas in a castle," Molly said, pressing her hand to her chest. "I can't believe it."

"Are you sure you don't want to postpone until after the new year? Spend Christmas with your family and friends?" Cate asked as she stabbed a blueberry with the tine of her fork.

“Nope,” Molly said with a wave of her hand. “I’d rather spend Christmas with my new family in the Rose Room than sleep on a foldout couch in my sister’s basement.”

“I shall plan to have all the paperwork completed as your Christmas present,” Mr. Smythe said with a wink as Mrs. Fraser wrapped her arm around Molly’s shoulders.

“We’ll be happy to have you, Miss Molly.”

The group enjoyed a quiet weekend on the estate. Cate enjoyed having the company, though she missed her family in the past. She longed to visit them, excitement building for her dress fitting appointment on Monday. It helped ease the disappointment she would feel when all her guests left.

On Sunday, the group took one final trip to Dunhaven together before everyone departed Monday. Mr. Smythe drove back alone while Gayle and Molly drove together to the train station. Both women were glad to have the company for the long drive and train ride. Molly had a late flight back to the States. She didn’t return to work until Thursday, when she planned to hand in her resignation and begin preparing to move to her new home.

Cate watched the cars disappear down the drive. Mr. and Mrs. Fraser and Jack joined her, waving as everyone departed. Everyone returned to their respective duties. A sad quietness descended on the castle.

Riley and his new friend, Bailey, provided a wonderful distraction to combat the silence. The two pups enjoyed wrestling, playing with a ball, tugging on toys together. Riley seemed to enjoy his new companion, rolling around the floor like a puppy again.

She sat with her chin propped in her palm as the dogs frolicked, daydreaming about trying on her ballgown today. The fated ball grew closer and closer and their window for seeking information dwindled.

She pushed her frustrations with their investigation aside and prepared for her trip back.

When she was ready, hair swept up, and hooped skirt on, she made her way to meet Jack. Slowing the watch, they traveled back to 1856. They traversed the usual circuit down the back stairs and around to the front of the castle. Thomson greeted them, leaving Jack to find his way to Randolph’s study while he showed Cate to Victoria’s sitting room.

Victoria rose and greeted Cate with an embrace.

“Cousin Catherine,” Victoria said, kissing her cheek, “it’s lovely to see you again. And how were your travels? I hope your journey did not tire you too much.”

Cate followed her to the table she had arranged for tea. “Excellent. I have this for you. I hope you are keen on it.” Cate removed a silk fan. Before visiting, she had searched high and low for something to return with for Victoria. She was careful to select something fitting for the time period.

“Oh!” Victoria said, clapping her hands together before taking the fan from Cate. “It’s lovely, Catherine! How grateful I am that you thought of me while on your tour.”

“How has your dress come along?” Cate asked as Victoria set the fan aside.

“I’m very pleased with it. I had a fitting last week. The color is striking, I shall be a standout! As will you in the sapphire gown! Are you eager to see it?”

Cate’s smile radiated as she nodded her head. “I am! I must confess patience is not a virtue I possess. I was most eager for our trip to end!”

“If I may also confess, it is not my virtue either. I was impatient for your return! I have missed you!”

Before Cate answered, Thompson opened the door, announcing Madame Bisset had arrived. The woman glided into the room followed by two servants carrying garments. They placed the garments on a nearby chair, following Thompson out of the room after delivering their packages.

“Countess and Mrs. MacKenzie,” she said, throwing her arms around both women as they approached her. “I trust you both are well?”

“We are,” Victoria answered. “Please, sit down. Let us have some tea.”

“Lovely,” Madame Bisset said, sitting at the table. “Oh, Mrs. MacKenzie, I am so pleased with your gown! I hunted for the perfect fabric. I had it re-dyed to be the exact color we discussed. Oh, it is truly lovely, simply marvelous. When paired with Countess MacKenzie’s gown, you two will be dazzling.”

“I am so eager to see it!” Cate said as she stirred her tea.

“As am I,” Victoria agreed. “We have been discussing it all morning. Oh please, may we see it now? Catherine, you wouldn’t mind postponing your tea for a moment to model for us?”

“I thought you’d never ask!” Cate exclaimed, leaping from her seat.

“Just a moment, I’ll ring for my ladies’ maid, she can assist you, Catherine.”

Within moments, Bryson, Victoria’s ladies’ maid, arrived.

Victoria waved her in. "Oh, Bryson. Please assist Mrs. MacKenzie in trying Madame Bisset's creation! We are impatient to see it!"

Bryson motioned for Cate to follow her to the dressing room, carrying the gown with her. Bryson's proficiency in working with various garments outdid Cate's on her best day. She had Cate ready in record time.

"How's it coming, Catherine?" Victoria called in.

Cate appeared in the doorway.

Victoria clapped her hands together. "OH! Madame Bisset, you have outdone yourself again. Oh, Catherine! It's incredible! We shall be the belles of this ball. Are you pleased with it?"

With a grin, Cate glanced down at the details of the sapphire gown. "Very! It is extraordinary!"

The frills, trimmed in black lace over the deep sapphire color, fell delicately to the floor. When Cate moved, the fabric sashayed and flowed around her like water gently floating along in a stream. Madame Bisset had added beading details on the off-the-shoulder sleeves.

Victoria rushed to a jewelry armoire nearby, removing a necklace. "Come, Catherine, envision the entire ensemble."

She led Cate to a mirror, placing the necklace around her neck. The sapphire necklace sparkled around Cate's neck, matching the neckline well. "It's perfect! Oh, please say you will borrow it!"

"I couldn't decline, Victoria," Cate said, "it is too perfect!"

"Splendid! I am so pleased!"

Madame Bisset fussed over the dress, pinching it here and bunching it there. She commented that it fit very well, just a few minor adjustments would bring it to perfection. Cate returned to the dressing room to change out of the evening gown, hating to take off the beautiful gown.

After changing, she returned to the tea table, finishing her tea and light snacks with Victoria and Madame Bisset. They talked fashion and the upcoming ball. Cate felt like a schoolgirl, giggling over lace details and accessories.

They saw Madame Bisset off, spent a few more moments chattering about the upcoming party, then Victoria walked Cate to Randolph's study to meet Jack. A man unknown to Cate exited the room as the ladies entered. The foursome spent a few moments chatting, however, Randolph seemed distracted, checking the gold timepiece several times.

Jack suggested they be on their way, perceiving Randolph's anxiety. Randolph agreed, excusing himself from seeing them out, stating they were family and could do so on their own. Victoria said her goodbyes, leaving Jack and Cate in the hallway to find their way to the front door.

"That was something. Tell you when we get back." Jack started toward the main staircase when Cate tugged him back. "What?"

"I think we should follow Randolph," she whispered.

He lowered his voice, his brow furrowing. "Follow Randolph? Why?"

"Didn't you notice how troubled he seemed? He kept checking his watch. We should follow up on that."

"Perhaps he had something important to do," Jack countered.

"Or perhaps this ties into the murder. We're days away, and Randolph is uneasy and agitated. I think we should at least check it out."

"Okay, okay. But we cannot, under any circumstance, prevent this murder from happening. I'm not even sure we should help Randolph stay out of jail, but I understand your impulse to protect your family."

They hurried down the hall in the direction Randolph had gone earlier. Cate spotted him walking down the path leading to the loch. They dashed out of the castle, making their way to the path, careful not to get too close.

As they approached the loch, Cate and Jack ducked behind a large tree, concealing them but allowing them a full view of the loch.

Randolph continued toward the water. When he reached the bank, another person emerged, approaching Randolph. Cate recognized Andrew, the footman who was soon to be murdered.

She smacked Jack in the chest.

He rolled his eyes at her, loathe to admit she was right.

They watched as the two men conversed. Their gestures and postures suggested they were arguing. After a few moments, the conversation turned more heated.

Randolph grasped the footman by his collar, shaking him before lobbing the man backwards.

Moments later, Randolph stormed toward the castle past Jack and Cate's hiding spot. They shrunk back into the shadows of the large tree.

"Now what?" Jack whispered.

"Let's follow him," Cate said, pointing to Andrew, who was still smoothing his ruffled clothing.

"I was afraid you would say that."

Within a few moments, Andrew made his way down the path. They waited until they could follow him without being spotted.

When they entered the castle, Andrew was nowhere in sight.

“Let’s split up,” Cate suggested, mounting the stairs.

“That’s a terrible idea, Cate,” Jack began.

“We don’t have a choice, I’m not taking no for an answer,” Cate said. She spun and sprinted up the stairs two at a time.

Jack groaned behind her.

She continued despite his grunting, with a specific destination in mind.

Breathless, she scurried down the second floor hall toward the turret stairs. She peered up the curving stairway, craning her neck as if it would help her see through the stone walls. Gathering her skirts, she started up the steps.

As she climbed, she glimpsed the door at the top. It stood open. She sped up, fashing toward it. When she was within a few steps of it, Andrew appeared at the top.

He spotted her and slammed the door shut behind him, locking it. His lips settled into a sneer. “Something I can help you with, Mrs. MacKenzie?”

Cate’s eyes widened as her heart pounded in her chest. She swallowed hard, forcing herself to think logically. “Oh, yes. I seem to have lost track of my husband. Have you seen him?”

Andrew lifted his chin, stiffening his posture. “I have not seen him, madam.”

Cate swallowed hard, continuing, “Are you sure? I could have sworn I saw him ascending these very stairs!” She took another few steps up.

He stepped down toward her from the landing. “You are mistaken, Mrs. MacKenzie. If you’ll excuse me, I must return to my duties.”

Cate held her hands out to stop him. “Oh, but...”

Annoyance shone plainly on his face. “Yes, Mrs. MacKenzie?”

“I wondered... might I have a quick look around the tower room? I’d love to see the views.”

“No, you may not, Mrs. MacKenzie. Now, if you’ll please excuse me.” He pushed her down another step.

Andrew turned to face her again, climbing the stairs to her level. “Perhaps you should concentrate on locating your husband.”

“What would the harm be?”

“You should learn to mind your own business, Mrs. MacKenzie,” he said, bringing his face close to hers. His lips formed a sneer and his features conveyed the disdain he felt for her in one evil look.

Cate swallowed hard as Andrew’s demeanor changed from annoyed to threatening. She glanced down the stone steps, wondering if she would survive a fall should he push her before she flicked her gaze back to him.

CHAPTER 22

Andrew narrowed his beady eyes at Cate, his nose wrinkling at her. “Shall I ask Thomson to assist you in finding your absent husband?”

She forced a weak smile. “No, thank you. I’m sure I’ll find him,” she whispered.

He nodded to her, staring at her as she descended the stairs. She glanced back once. Andrew loomed above her. She quickened her steps, rushing to the bottom of the tower stairs and almost toppling into Jack as she rounded the bend.

He caught her as she spilled into the hallway. “How did I know I’d find you here.”

“Ah, Mrs. MacKenzie,” Andrew said, rounding the stairway behind her, “I see you located Mr. MacKenzie. I shall call off the dogs.”

Jack gave Cate a puzzled look.

Cate shot Jack a glance, grasping his hand and squeezing it. “Yes, I ran into Andrew while looking for you. I’m sorry I lost track of you somewhere.”

Jack nodded and smiled down at Cate. “Well, you found me!”

“How fortuitous. Mrs. MacKenzie seems to have an innate ability to lose precious things then wander about searching for them in places she shouldn’t.”

Jack’s smile faded and he squashed his eyebrows together, cocking his head. “Excuse me?”

Andrew clasped his hands behind him, lifting his chin. "Mrs. MacKenzie shouldn't be wandering the halls of the castle, sir."

Jack wagged a finger at the man. "Mrs. MacKenzie and I are family, sir. Lord and Lady MacKenzie have graciously opened their home to us. I don't believe either of them intended it to have the restrictions you are implying."

Andrew crinkled his nose, smirking. "You misunderstood me, Mr. MacKenzie. I am only concerned about the lady's well-being. The castle has many dangerous places, including the tower room which is filled with many trunks. She may be hurt should one of them fall on her."

Jack firmed his jaw. "How kind of you to exhibit such concern for my wife. I will be sure she is cautious in future visits."

Andrew forced a smile and nodded to him as he pushed past them down the stairs.

"I think we should head back," Cate suggested once he was out of earshot.

"Great idea," Jack agreed.

They wound through the halls to the bedroom. Slipping inside, they set the watch back to normal time, returning to their time.

Jack breathed a larger than normal sigh of relief. "Don't do that again."

"Do what?" Cate asked.

"No splitting up. I don't even want to travel back, yet I know you'll never agree!"

Cate's shoulders slumped. "We must go back. Victoria will be crushed if we don't attend the party."

Jack rolled his eyes as he stalked away from her. "Yes, yes, I realize that. Randolph made it clear how much Victoria was enjoying your time together. But I think we need to have a serious conversation about dropping this murder investigation, Cate."

"Why?"

He shot her a wide-eyed glance. "Cate! Did Andrew not give you the same vibe he gave me? He was threatening us, in particular, you."

"I don't..." Cate began.

"No, no, no, no, no," Jack said, waving his arms in the air, motioning her to stop her answer. "I don't want to hear you defend him. It was obvious. He was threatening you."

"Which only makes me more curious!"

"Bah!" Jack exclaimed, waving his arms in the air again.

“Think about it! I caught him leaving the tower room. He was attending to whoever is hidden in there. Who is it? Why are they hiding her? Why is he privy to the secret? Why was he arguing with Randolph?”

“I don’t know the answer to any of those, but given what we saw today, it is possible that Randolph killed him. You saw the hostility between them firsthand.”

Cate contemplated for a moment before responding. “I still disagree. Randolph would not have put his family in harm’s way by doing that, even if he is prone to losing his temper.”

Jack shook his head again. “I don’t want you alone with that man again.”

Cate didn’t answer, flicking her gaze to the hardwood floor below her feet “We should attempt to gather more information in the remaining days we have. Do you have time for a quick trip tomorrow and maybe Wednesday? I’ll come up with some excuse to visit.”

Jack shook his head, his hands falling to his hips. “Oh, Lady Cate, I will never win. Okay, okay, whatever you say, boss. I’m beginning to look forward to this guy being gone.”

“He will be soon enough. That’s why we need to gather as much information as we can before he makes his exit.”

“Okay, but only because we are already committed to this investigation. And no splitting up!”

Cate agreed with a nod. “Same time, same place tomorrow!”

“Guess so,” Jack acquiesced.

“Oh, hey, what did you want to tell me when we got home?” Cate inquired.

A smile spread across Jack’s features. “Oh, I had almost forgotten in the excitement. I met my great-great-great-grandfather.”

Cate’s eyes lit up and a grin crossed her lips. “Malcom Reid? Was he the man we passed on our way into Randolph’s office?”

“None other. That was... strange. I can see the appeal though. You must feel the same with Randolph and Victoria.”

Cate’s smile broadened. “It is, they are my family. I feel a connection to them, no matter how odd that may sound.”

“I understand. Meeting Malcom was... staggering, mind-blowing. I now understand your enthusiasm for time travel.”

“I’m glad you met him. I’ll bet you’ll be seeing more of him.”

Jack wrinkled his nose. "Okay, okay, I guess that's a good thing."

They parted to change clothes and return to their normal day. Cate spent a large part of the day enjoying the grounds with Riley and their newest friend, Bailey.

While Cate walked with her pups, her mind mulled over the growing mystery in 1856. Things seemed to be reaching their breaking point, hurling toward a precipice with her powerless to stop it. It was amazing, even knowing that tragedy was about to strike, she still seemed incapable of altering the situation. Perhaps despite any interventions, some events were destined to happen.

Cate second-guessed herself, questioning if she had been more aggressive in her early investigation if they would have had a better chance of preventing the upcoming tragedy. She shook her head. Not only could they not interfere to prevent the man's death, but if they had been any more aggressive in their investigation, it may have tipped their hand. Although, they had done a poor job of covering their tracks, Randolph had seen right through their weak facade.

She sighed, settling on the banks of the loch with Riley and Bailey at her side. Her pondering turned to the conversation she had witnessed on these same banks only hours ago.

Unable to hear the heated words exchanged, she couldn't tell what they argued about, but it was clear they were arguing. Randolph was annoyed, perhaps even angry. What if her entire theory was wrong? Perhaps an innocent man was not punished. Perhaps Randolph was guilty.

"I confess," she said to the two dogs, "I have no clue what I'm doing. Now, don't tell Jack. But I'm worried. What do you think, Riley? Should I press on?" The little dog didn't answer. "How about you, Bailey?" He, too, was mum on the subject.

Cate surmised the only way to find answers was to continue their investigation. Resolute in her plan, Cate focused her energy on enjoying the rest of her day.

Before dinner, Cate received an email from Gayle thanking her for the stay and informing her she and Mr. Smythe were back in London. She had seen Molly to the airport for her late-night flight. Gayle looked forward to seeing Molly again in a few short weeks when Molly arrived in Scotland permanently.

The email eased Cate's nerves, it was nice to know two of her three guests were settled. She now awaited an email from Molly, stating she was home safe and sound. She'd have a good while to wait, not expecting to receive the all clear from Molly until Tuesday afternoon.

She opted to eat dinner with her staff, finding the castle too quiet after the departure of her guests. They enjoyed another delicious meal courtesy of Mrs. Fraser, discussing the events of the week, Molly's new position, Cate's new addition and Mr. Fraser's pumpkin carving win.

Jack asked if a "Christmas with Lady Cate" competition was in the cards. Mr. Fraser joked that he'd likely win, so perhaps they should consider having his name engraved on the trophy before it was sent. They shared a hearty laugh. Cate helped clean up following dinner, as much as Mrs. Fraser permitted her. She gathered both dogs, retiring to her sitting room to enjoy a movie before turning in for the night.

She rose before the sun the next morning, pacing the floor of her sitting room, leaving Riley and Bailey sleeping in the bedroom. Her mind raced with plans for their trip today.

Jack hadn't mentioned glimpsing the globe they presumed was the murder weapon yesterday. Perhaps in the excitement of the encounter with Andrew he had forgotten. Or perhaps he hadn't found it anywhere in the castle. If the latter was true, they needed to explore further today.

She settled onto her chaise as the sun peeked over the horizon. Clouds dotted the sky, diffusing and reflecting the sun's rays. When the fiery ball made its debut, Cate rose, dressing for the day and shuttling the pups outside before breakfast.

Jack met her in the library following breakfast.

"Ready?" Cate asked as she leapt from the desk's chair.

"Nope. But I doubt that matters."

Cate crinkled her nose at him. "Oh, before we go, did you spot that paperweight anywhere yesterday?"

Jack put his hands on his hips and shook his head. "I did not, though I could have missed it."

"That should be our first priority today. If we find it, we may be able to identify the scene of the murder."

"Right," Jack said with a nod. "We keep to the shadows and search for any clues we can find."

"It'll be faster if we split up and do a quick scan of—"

“No,” Jack interrupted.

“But—”

“I said no, lassie. Remember, you’re not supposed to be traipsing about the castle alone after the incident with Andrew.”

Cate chewed the inside of her cheek as she silently disagreed.

“Just think about it. There’s less chance of getting caught the less time we spend there.”

Jack shot her an unimpressed glance. “I’ll consider it.”

Cate offered a tight-lipped smile. “Great. Meet in a few hours in the usual spot?”

“Okay,” Jack answered with a nod before they parted ways.

Cate took a morning walk with the two pups before settling them into her sitting room and readying for their trip.

She met Jack in the bedroom closet afterwards and they slowed the watch, slipping backward to a bygone time.

After a few minutes of spirited, whispered arguments, Jack ceded that they would split up to investigate with Cate scouring the upstairs and checking the main level. They would meet back in the closet in thirty minutes.

Sneaking into the hallway, they parted ways. Cate poked around a few upstairs rooms where she was almost certain not to find anyone. She found nothing of interest and spotted no sign of the murder weapon.

She meandered through the halls, wandering to the turret. She stood at the bottom, hands on her hips as she stared up the winding stairs.

With a quickened pulse, she tugged the skeleton key from around her neck, flicking her gaze back up the steps.

What did she expect to find? What would she do if she found someone inside? How would she explain? She would answer those questions when and if the situation faced her.

One by one, Cate climbed the stone stairs to the turret. Each step she took solidified her resolve. She must open the tower door and determine what or who waited inside. She also needed to determine if the murder weapon was in that room. As she rounded the bend, the tower door loomed ahead of her.

She paused for a moment, hesitating as she second guessed her plan. She shook her head, shaking away any doubt. Setting her jaw, she plodded up the remaining stairs. She tried the doorknob, finding it locked.

With a shaky hand, she grasped the key swinging around her neck and pulled it over her head. She inserted it into the lock.

As she turned the key, a voice boomed behind her. “Oi! What do you think you’re doing there?”

CHAPTER 23

Cate stiffened, her heart skipping a beat at the sound of the man's voice. She ripped the key from the lock, tucking it into the pocket of her dress before she spun to face the voice's owner.

An indignant Andrew stormed up the steps toward her.

"I... I..." Cate stammered.

"You what, Mrs. MacKenzie?" he demanded, meeting her on the landing.

Cate swallowed hard. "I thought I heard a noise, someone crying."

He narrowed his eyes. "And you took it upon yourself to investigate it, roaming through someone else's home uninvited?"

Cate raised her chin. "Not someone's. My family's."

Andrew poked a finger toward her. "Your husband's family, Mrs. MacKenzie. You are not a member of this household regardless of your husband's relationship to Lord MacKenzie. You should not be poking your nose where it is not welcome."

He grabbed Cate's arm roughly, dragging her down the stairs. "Now..." he began when they reached the bottom.

"Excuse me," a new voice shouted, "unhand my wife, sir!"

Cate twisted to find Jack marching toward them.

"Your wife, sir," he said, emphasizing the last word and dropping Cate's arm, "has been skulking around the castle. Again. I caught her at the tower door."

Jack closed the gap between them, his hands on his hips. "I would hardly call it skulking. My cousin, Lord MacKenzie, has given us free access to the property, including the castle. You have no business telling either of us where we are or are not permitted."

"Yes," Cate added, "what are you hiding up there?"

Andrew gave them an annoyed stare accompanied by a smirk. "I'm merely stating that you, madam, should take care when roaming the estate. You may find yourself in harm's way."

"I don't appreciate the veiled threat," Jack retorted.

Andrew cocked his head, his nose wrinkled in annoyance. "No threat at all, sir, just friendly advice. Now if you will excuse me, I have several duties to attend to."

Andrew turned on a heel, climbing the steps to the tower.

Cate flicked her gaze up to Jack. "Thanks."

"Let's go," Jack said, motioning for her to precede him down the hall.

Cate acquiesced without a word, plodding down the hall and back to the closet. Together, they reset the watch to normal speed, returning to their own time.

Once back, Jack could no longer contain his frustration. "Are you mad?" he shouted.

Cate sighed, lowering her chin to her chest. "I'm sorry. I found nothing in the bedrooms. We need more information, information that's only in the tower room. They're hiding something there, something very important."

Jack flailed his arms wildly. "Are you kidding me, Cate? Do you hear yourself? That man has threatened you, twice now! He caught you somewhere you shouldn't have been, manhandled you down the steps and who knows what he would have done next if I hadn't shown up. And all you can think about is what he's hiding?"

Cate spun to face him as she paced the floor. "Yes, all those things you mentioned means it must be something big! Besides, what were you doing there? You must have had the same idea I did."

"I doubt that. I finished downstairs and didn't see you anywhere upstairs. I suspected where you were. I hoped I was wrong, but I wasn't." Jack loosened his collar with a sigh.

"We need to go back tomorrow. Try to find something, anything out. We're two days away from the murder."

Jack breathed another sigh, shaking his head. "Cate, I really think we need to rethink this."

"We can't. We need to follow through. No tower runs this time, I promise. Let's go back and observe. We're so close to the murder, there's got to be some telltale signs. We have to use everything we know to get information."

Jack considered it. "Okay. But no more stunts. I'm serious, Cate."

Cate held her hands up in surrender. "I have that meeting with Mrs. Campbell tomorrow about the next party. We can go after lunch, mid-afternoon?"

"It's a plan."

They parted ways, Cate heading back to her suite to change and spend some time with Riley and Bailey. Despite the wonderful distractions the pups provided, Cate found herself unable to concentrate on anything but the impending murder. Tomorrow marked one day prior to the murder's occurrence. They were no closer to the solution. The only thing Cate had accomplished was making an enemy.

She put it out of her mind. There was nothing she could do tonight. She settled for the evening with a book and her two best friends.

A thick fog covered the area and dark clouds threatened rainy weather when Cate awoke the following morning. The gloomy weather matched her mood. Frustrated by her lack of progress, she hoped to make more headway today.

Before she could, though, she had a party planning meeting with Mrs. Campbell. The librarian and historical society president hoped to capitalize on the rousing success of the Halloween ball. With the momentum of the previous party still rolling, Mrs. Campbell wanted to nail down a few details and get an announcement released pronto.

She met Mrs. Campbell at the front door, prepared for her fifteen-minute-early arrival.

Mrs. Campbell bustled into the house, carrying an armful of materials. "Lady Cate! You were so right to postpone this meeting until mid-week! It gave me a plethora of time to research and plan. My mind is just overflowing with ideas. Not only for 'Christmas with Lady Cate,' What about 'New Year with our Newest MacKenzie,' or 'Cupid and Lady Cate,' the first day of spring celebration, Burns' day. There is no end to my list."

Cate's eyes widened at the last statement, but the woman's enthusiasm proved contagious. "Well, it sounds like we have quite a bit to talk about then!"

Mrs. Campbell spread her materials across the coffee table as they settled into the armchairs in the library.

Mrs. Campbell sat back with a grin on her face, waving her hands in the air. "Let's start with the Christmas party. I'm thinking plaid!"

They spent the next two hours discussing dates, details, décor, and announcements for the Christmas event. They wrapped up discussing the potential for a few other events, to which Cate agreed.

Despite her earlier trepidation, Cate found herself eager to host the holiday party and share the stunning castle with others.

Mrs. Campbell took her leave just before lunch with a long to-do list. An equally long list existed on Cate's end. Cate glanced at it, chuckling as she considered that Jack would likely find the work on the list preferable to their next task.

She folded the paper and shoved it in her pocket, planning the best way to broach the topic during lunchtime conversation. Mrs. Fraser made it easy, asking specifically about the meeting as they sat down for their meal.

Cate pulled the list from her pocket and slid it toward the men across from her.

"It sounds lovely to me, Lady Cate! And Molly will be here for the party, she'll be so pleased!" Mrs. Fraser exclaimed.

Cate eyed the two men who exchanged glances, their eyebrows raised. "Yes! She will be thrilled!"

Jack leaned forward in his chair, waving a finger at a particular item. "Is she serious about number four?"

"I told her we'd need to consider whether that was a practical option."

Jack read it from the list, his nose wrinkled. "Snow machine in the event it doesn't snow?!?"

Cate shrugged. "She wants all the magic and majesty of a Bing Crosby White Christmas."

"I'll hope for snow," Jack answered as he tossed the list on the table.

"Me, too," Cate admitted.

"It doesn't matter to me if there's snow or not. Not eating my own cooking is magic enough for me!" Mrs. Fraser said with a laugh.

“Speaking of, I thought perhaps we should consider a catered meal on Christmas Day, too! I’d like everyone to have the holiday off.”

“That sounds lovely, Lady Cate. Leave it to me,” Mrs. Fraser said, “I know where we can get a good Christmas meal.”

“Okay,” Cate agreed. “I’ll cross that off my list. Sorry to add to yours!”

“’Tis nothing, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser assured her. “Do you think we’ll be having guests in the castle again?”

“I’m not sure. I plan to invite Mr. Smythe and Gayle, but given that it’s Christmas, they may prefer to spend it at home.”

“Well, you just let me know and I’ll plan accordingly,” Mrs. Fraser said, patting her hand.

They finished their lunch, speaking further about a few other details that would need taken care of before the party. With the event only two months off, they would need to sort out details on their end soon. They planned to meet on Thursday afternoon to go over design ideas and sort out decorations already at the castle.

After lunch, Cate took the dogs for a short walk before returning to her bedroom to dress for her trip to 1856. She had no plan, unusual for her, but planning hadn’t helped her in the past. She hoped to find something before the party tomorrow night and subsequent murder.

She hated feeling this helpless, but she was determined to press on. After dressing, she met Jack in the closet. They slowed the watch, returning to 1856. Sneaking down a set of backstairs, they exited the castle and made their way to the front.

“It makes me nervous that we don’t have a plan,” Jack said, knocking on the door.

“I know what you mean, but I’m not sure what we can do except observe and gather more information,” Cate said with a shrug. “We’re so close to the murder, something, anything may be a clue or tip us off. We just need to keep our eyes and ears open.”

“I like that. Observe only, good idea,” Jack said as the door opened.

“Ah, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie,” Thomson said, motioning to the foyer. “Please come in. I shall announce your arrival.”

“We’re not expected, I hope it’s not an inconvenience,” Jack said as they entered.

“I am certain it won’t be. You’re family, sir. You can wait in the sitting room.”

Cate and Jack shuffled to the sitting room to wait as Thomson announced their arrival. Randolph joined them soon after.

“Jack, Catherine, lovely to see you,” Randolph said, striding toward them to shake Jack’s hand and kiss Cate’s.

“My apologies, we come unannounced. My wife has borrowed one of your books and wanted to return it as soon as she had finished.”

Randolph waved his hand at them. “Think nothing of it, you’re family, family is always welcome.” Randolph poured drinks for the men as Victoria entered the room, hurrying to Cate to give her a hug and kiss. “You have missed little, my dear, just our cousins apologizing for disturbing our peace.”

“You are never disturbing us,” Victoria assured them.

“We apologize for coming unannounced. But I have finished with the book I borrowed and wanted to return it.”

“You needn’t make a special trip, but I will not object as I do love to see you,” Victoria said, ringing the bell on the wall to alert the servants of a request.

“Truth be told,” Cate said, “I hoped to return this and select another.”

“By all means! I must make time to read, as you do, Catherine,” Victoria said, as Thomson entered the room. “Thomson, please bring some tea for me and Mrs. MacKenzie.”

“Right away, Lady MacKenzie,” Thomson said with a head bow before leaving the room.

The foursome made polite conversation, discussing the upcoming ball. Excitement built for the festivities. They made plans for Cate and Jack to arrive early so Cate could dress at the castle. Victoria insisted this was most convenient for Cate.

Tea arrived, delivered by Andrew, who seemed surprised to see Cate and Jack. He offered a fleeting smile that resembled more of a smirk as he set the tray down near Victoria.

When they finished tea, Victoria ushered Cate upstairs to show her the necklace she planned to wear, a new gift from Randolph for the occasion. Jack seized the opportunity to excuse Randolph from playing host. “Well, I shan’t keep you any longer, cousin. I’m capable to wait for my wife’s return on my own. I’m sure you have business to attend to.”

Randolph checked his watch. “Yes, if you don’t mind waiting alone, I do have something pressing that requires my attention.”

“Not at all, cousin.”

“I dare say though, you may be in for a long wait. I fear ladies discussing clothing and jewelry may take longer than discussions in the House of Lords!” Randolph roared with laughter at his own joke before disappearing through the door.

Jack smiled as he left. Randolph may be correct. Either way, it gave him a chance to take one last peek around. He had detected nothing that hinted at the upcoming tragedy.

Cate and Victoria scurried down the hall in a cloud of giggles as the men exchanged a few final comments.

Victoria steered her to her suite. She crossed to the large jewelry case across the room. “Wait until you see it, Cousin Catherine. It is simply marvelous!”

She opened the case. The necklace gleamed and sparkled. A large ruby hung in the center, surrounded by smaller rubies on either side.

“Oh! Victoria, it’s beautiful!”

Victoria giggled with delight. “Isn’t it? And it is a perfect match for the red dress I planned for the ball. It seems Randolph pays attention when I speak! He has matched the stone perfectly!”

“It will look exquisite with your dress!”

A knock sounded at the door.

“Come in!” Victoria called.

Andrew poked his head into the room. “Andrew? What did you need?”

“I apologize for the interruption. Mrs. MacKenzie, I believe you may have dropped this.” He handed her a small slip of paper.

“Oh, how kind. Thank you, Andrew,” Cate said, accepting the paper. “I am so clumsy!”

“Thank you, Andrew,” Victoria said, dismissing him. He exited the room with a curt smile.

Cate shoved the note into her purse, feigning admiration for the necklace a few more moments. After a polite amount of time, she excused herself, expressing her excitement for the upcoming ball and telling Victoria that she would show herself to the library to select another book.

Cate embraced Victoria then left the room. She traveled downstairs to the library, hastily returning the book before digging the paper out of her purse. She read the note.

Catherine— I must see you, it's urgent. Meet me at the loch at 3:30.

-Randolph

Cate glanced at the clock on the mantle. It was almost 3:30 p.m. already. She huffed, gathering up her skirts and fleeing from the library to the nearest exit door. The note slipped from her hands, fluttering to the floor as she raced from the room to meet Randolph.

Once outside, she ran down the path toward the loch. As she approached, she spotted no one. She hurried toward the loch, hoping she hadn't missed him. Perhaps this was the break she had been waiting for. She couldn't lose this opportunity.

She approached the edge of the loch, out of breath. She panted, scanning the area for Randolph. As she turned, a figure raced toward her side.

Before she could react, Andrew grabbed her by the arms. "You really don't know when to stop, do you, Mrs. MacKenzie?"

Cate struggled against him, gritting her teeth. "Let go of me."

He fought her, squeezing her as he forced her backward. "I've got a good thing going here. I will not allow you to ruin it for me!"

"What thing is that?" Cate demanded.

"I told you to mind your own business. You couldn't do that, could you?" he roared at her, pushing her another step back.

Cate struggled to maintain her footing, but proved no match for him. "Let go!"

Step by step, he shoved her back toward the loch. Her feet splashed into the icy water. The bottom of her dress soaked through as it swirled over the water's edge. She struggled to push back onto the bank, but she was engaged in a losing battle. The water crept further up her legs as the bank descended.

"You are a problem, Mrs. MacKenzie. Now, you won't be," he growled.

He gave her one massive shove, toppling her backward into the loch. Cate expected the bottom to be nearer than it was. There was a steep drop-off in the loch's bed behind where she had been standing. She lost her footing as she toppled backward, icy cold water surrounding her.

Clawing at the water, she struggled to stay afloat. She kicked her legs, but they became entangled in the fabric of her slips and skirts. The dress weighed heavier and heavier on her as the water penetrated the fabric. She thrashed wildly for a moment before she slipped below the surface. She reached toward the light as she sank further.

CHAPTER 24

Cate struggled as she sank further into the icy waters of the loch. The distance between her and the surface continued to grow, and the light at the top began to close.

Suddenly, she surged upward. Hands grabbed her, and she rushed upward. She broke through the surface, gasping for air as someone dragged her ashore. She collapsed on the bank, choking and coughing.

Jack loomed over her as she laid on the ground. "Cate! Cate! Are you alright?"

She gulped a few more breaths of air before nodding her head. "Yes," she choked. "I'm okay."

Soaked through, Jack fell backward onto the bank with a deep sigh.

After a moment, she sat upright. "Thank you." She took another moment to catch her breath before adding, "Lucky you found me when you did."

Jack scrubbed his face with his hands. "Aye, damn lucky. If I wasn't so relieved you're alive, I would let you have it for sneaking off like that. No splitting up, remember?"

"Yes, I remember. But I got a note from Randolph. Well, that's what it said, anyway. It told me to meet him at the loch and I had no time to find you."

Jack pushed up to his elbows. "I know. I found the note on the library floor when I was poking around. I came as quickly as I could. Not fast enough to stop that bastard from tossing you into the loch, but at least fast enough to stop him from killing you. Cate, you've got to be more careful!"

Cate wrung the fabric of her dress as best as she could. "I know, I know. I'm sorry. I wasn't thinking. I suppose we should get back. I'd like to get home and change into something warm and dry."

"Me, too. Assuming we still can, that is."

"Why wouldn't..." Cate began before the realization struck her. "THE WATCH!"

"Aye, the watch," Jack answered.

She pawed it from the folds of her dress, clicking open the cover. The second hand ticked ever-so-slowly, but it still ticked. "It's still working, hopefully it's not damaged."

"Let's not wait to find out. Let's go," Jack said, standing and offering her a hand to right herself. "Before it breaks."

She allowed him to tug her up. "Okay."

They hastened to the castle, through a back entrance, up to the closet and prayed as they rubbed the timepiece.

Cate breathed a sigh of relief as it sped up. "Oh, I hope that worked and we're home," she said as the timepiece ticked normally.

"Only one way to find out," Jack said.

They left the closet. Cate ran down the hall to her bedroom suite. If they were home, she should find two small dogs waiting for her there. She burst through the double doors. Two tiny pups lifted their heads, eyeing her.

Cate beamed at them. "Riley! Bailey!"

Both dogs ran to her. She knelt on the floor, gathering them into her arms. "We're back!"

"Thank heavens," Jack said behind her.

"At least we haven't broken the watch."

"It may be better if we had."

Cate stood, stamping a foot on the floor. "No. We still have the murder to solve and Randolph's reputation to save!"

"Yes, I realize that. But I'm less happy about it now than I was before. This is getting dangerous, and we've taken a reckless chance that may have stranded us in the 1800s!"

"It's more dangerous because we're on to something!" Cate said. "What is in that tower room that has Andrew so apprehensive that he's willing to kill for it?"

“I can’t believe you’re still so interested even after what happened,” Jack said, shaking his head. “Oh, Lady Cate, I’ll never figure you out.”

Cate turned serious. “To be honest, I am still shaken by it. I guess it’s how I deal with anything unpleasant, throw myself into the ‘research’ I’m working on.”

Jack grinned at her. “That, my dear Lady Cate, is called avoidance. I’m going to get out of these wet clothes. You should do the same.”

He meandered to the door in his still-wet clothing, turning back to give her a grand bow before he departed. “M’lady.”

Cate shook her head at him. “Jack,” she said before he left.

“Yeah?”

“Thanks again. You’re a lifesaver.”

Jack’s shoulders slumped and he shook his head. “Oh, that’s a terrible joke, Lady Cate, just terrible.”

She grinned, sticking her tongue out at him as he left.

Cate peeled off the wet clothing, laying the garments out to dry before re-dressing in a warm sweater and pair of leggings. She cuddled under a thick blanket, unable to focus on anything but the impending murder. And the unfortunate incident that almost killed her before she was even born and stranded Jack in 1856.

She worried they wouldn’t solve the mystery or salvage Randolph’s reputation. Tears brimmed in her eyes as she considered this may all be for naught. Tomorrow night, a man would lose his life. Would they be able to save her ancestor?

She spent a restless night and morning pacing the floor of her suite as she worried over the upcoming ball.

After what seemed an eternity, the moment for Cate to ready herself arrived. She eyed her previous dress as she slid on her underskirts. It still lay spread across the bathroom floor, still damp from her unexpected dip in the loch.

Cate’s stomach turned at the sight which reminded her of how dangerous the situation remained.

She chased the doubt from her mind as she slid her dress on and fastened it. She put the final touches on her hair and clothes before giving her two pups a hug and kiss and leaving them in her bedroom. She met Jack, who carried his formal clothes slung over his shoulder in a garment bag, in their usual spot.

“Ready?” she asked.

“As I’ll ever be. You?”

She heaved a sigh. “I think so. I’m nervous, I’ll admit, but I am ready.”

“Then away we go!!” Jack said, placing his hand over hers to slow the watch.

Within ten minutes they had arrived in 1856, snuck out of the castle and were ushered back inside. Thomson showed Cate to Victoria’s suite before offering Jack a separate bedroom in which to change. Abuzz with activity, the castle reminded Cate of the hours before her own party. Servants bustled here and there, preparing for the onslaught of guests to arrive.

“Ah, Cousin Catherine!” Victoria exclaimed as she leapt from her seat. “I thought you’d never arrive! I must confess, I’ve been a ball of nerves all day. I’m like this before all my parties. Oh, I do hope tonight’s a success.”

Victoria’s excitement made Cate’s heart ache. She knew the tragic end that awaited them along with the family’s fates.

Cate’s lips faltered before she pasted a smile on and tried to match Victoria’s enthusiasm. “I have been excited all day!”

Victoria hugged her again, squealing with excitement. “Let’s have some champagne!”

The woman poured two flutes from a bottle chilling nearby, handing one to Cate and taking a sip from her own.

Cate sipped at the bubbly liquid as Victoria guided her to the dressing table. “Come, let’s get you ready! Bryson!” she called, “Bryson!”

She pushed Cate into the seat and fussed with her hair. “What are you thinking about your hair? I’m thinking let a few locks flow down like this. What do you think?”

“Pretty! I’ve never worn it like that!”

Victoria winked at her. “Jack will be surprised! He’ll love it! He won’t be able to take his eyes off you!”

Cate smiled back, hoping the sadness she felt didn’t creep into her expression.

Victoria waved her ladies’ maid over and showed her the style. “Bryson, here’s what we’re thinking. You can do that, can’t you?”

“Oh, I can try,” Cate offered.

Victoria waved her hands away. “Nonsense! Bryson is a fabulous hair stylist. Relax and let her work her magic!”

Victoria sank into an armchair across the room, sipping champagne, as Bryson began to whip Cate's hair into a style. Her deft ability swept Cate's hair into the updo Victoria suggested much faster than Cate could have.

"How is that, m'lady?" Bryson asked Victoria.

"Excellent! Yes!" Victoria approached Cate. She fussed a bit with the style then agreed it was what she had envisioned. "Now, time for the dresses! Oh, yours first, yours first!"

Cate bit her lower lip, offering a genuine smile. Sincere excitement filled her as Bryson brought the dress over. She sipped more champagne to ease her nerves, unaccustomed to being dressed, or rather undressed, by a ladies' maid.

Victoria pressed her fingers to her forehead and winced. "Oh, we should have planned for you to stay the night. I hate to think of you having to collect your belongings and carry them home."

"We'll be fine," Cate said. "Don't give it another thought."

"At least let us send you in a carriage."

"Nonsense," Cate argued. "We'll be fine. I am an American, after all. We excel at this!"

"Let's postpone this discussion until after the party," Victoria said, not willing to give in just yet. "Oh, that color looks just lovely on you!"

Cate glanced in the mirror. The dress, still unfastened, hung around her frame. Her creamy skin stood out against the sapphire color. Victoria's selection was spot on.

Bryson finished fastening the dress and Cate gave a twirl. "What do you think?"

"It's perfection! Now, the necklace!" Victoria fetched it from a nearby jewelry box and placed it around Cate's neck. "The final touch! Stunning!"

Cate smiled as she ran her fingers over the large gemstones. "Your turn!"

She switched places with Victoria, taking a seat in the armchair and sipping the rest of her champagne.

"That color is beautiful!" Cate said as Victoria slipped into the red dress. "It complements your skin so well!"

"Isn't it? Yes, it is a good shade for my coloring. I was not blessed with the creamy complexion you have, Catherine."

Cate stifled a laugh, never thrilled with her pale skin.

As Bryson finished fastening Victoria's dress, Cate spied the necklace box on the dressing table. She set down her champagne flute and retrieved it from the box.

"Now, your finishing touch!" she exclaimed, placing the necklace around Victoria's neck.

"Thank you! Come, look in the mirror," Victoria said, pulling her next to her so they were both in front of the mirror.

"Beautiful ladies!" Bryson chimed in from behind them.

"Thank you!" they answered in unison.

"Oh, Catherine, I'm so excited!" Victoria squealed, squeezing Cate's hands. A knock on the door interrupted them from further conversation. "Yes?" Victoria called.

"May we enter?" Randolph answered.

"Oh, just a moment!" Victoria called back. She reached to her dressing table, snatching a bottle of perfume. "Here," she said, spraying some on Cate and then herself. "Now we are ready!" she called.

The door swung open, and Jack and Randolph strode into the room.

"Well, if these aren't two angels descended straight from heaven in front of us, cousin." He took Victoria by the hands, admiring her, then kissing her cheek. "You look lovely, my dear. Simply lovely."

"Thank you, husband. How kind. And how handsome you are!" Victoria answered.

Jack raised his eyebrows at the romantic gesture before making his best attempt to follow Randolph's tough act. "So, this is the infamous dress. It has lived up to its potential. You look beautiful, Catherine." He kissed her cheek.

Cate held in a giggle at his act. "Thank you. I must thank Victoria for the necklace, it's a perfect match!"

"Oh, it pales when compared to your beauty, cousin Catherine!" Randolph said. "Well..." he checked his watch, "we should proceed downstairs. Guests will arrive soon! Shall we?"

He offered Victoria his arm. She accepted. Jack followed suit and Cate threaded her arm through his. They followed Victoria and Randolph to the ballroom.

"The ballroom looks lovely, Victoria," Cate said as they entered.

Decorated in black lace with red accents, the ballroom gave off a seasonal vibe. An orchestra set up, testing their instruments. Cate eyed the band, realizing neither she nor Jack had any dancing skills appropriate for the era. Her passing knowledge of a waltz would be no match for the attendees. She hoped to keep off the dance floor as much as possible.

Victoria checked with the staff, fussed over the décor, and then returned. "I suppose it's passable," she said in answer to Cate.

"Nervous, darling?" Randolph asked her.

"As always, yes," she admitted. "I want to make tonight a success."

"I'm sure it will be, my dear. Now, we should ready ourselves to receive guests. They should arrive any moment now."

Cate removed herself from blocking the entry way, dragging Jack behind Victoria and Randolph so they could greet their guests first. She spotted Andrew across the room, delivering a few items from the kitchen. He did a double take when he spotted her before turning on a heel to leave. Nervous butterflies rattled in Cate's stomach at the sight of him. On one hand, the prospect of facing the man who almost drowned her overwhelmed her. On the other hand, she felt pity for him, knowing his fate.

"Your friend looks happy to see you," Jack whispered.

"Yes, he seems downright tickled," Cate breathed.

"Don't go sneaking off anywhere out of my sight."

"Don't worry, I won't," Cate agreed.

"Good, it'd be a terrible shame to ruin that dress."

Cate gave him a light smack with the back of her hand then changed the subject as the first few guests arrived. "It's interesting, though, to see the similarities and differences between our Halloween ball and theirs."

"Lucky for us, the biggest difference was no one was killed at ours."

Cate nodded in agreement but said no more as Randolph and Victoria called them over to introduce them to their first batch of arrivals. As more guests poured in, Cate and Jack stayed close to their hosts to be introduced to other guests.

Once most introductions were complete and the influx of guests died down, the foursome separated, moving around the room to mingle. Victoria wanted Cate to chat further with old friends from London. She ushered Cate around the room skillfully, entering and exiting conversations like a professional. After a few hours at her own party, she had been exhausted from playing social butterfly. Victoria seemed to thrive on it.

Cate attempted to keep an eye out for any strange occurrences despite the dizzying array of conversations she enjoyed. In particular, she paid careful attention to Randolph's whereabouts. Knowledge of his whereabouts were crucial for her to determine if he was innocent.

She spotted him moving through the guests across the room, Jack in tow. He must be introducing Jack to guests as Victoria was with Cate. With any luck Jack would be able to account for Randolph's location for a large portion of the party.

While Cate and Victoria conversed with a duchess, the name and lineage of which Cate had already forgotten, Randolph and Jack approached, providing refreshments for both ladies.

Cate checked the time. Only an hour and a half remained before the body would be discovered.

She eyed Jack's half-full glass. Subtly, she tried to signal him to drink it so they could escape for a private conversation. After a few attempts, he understood, downed his drink and announced that he needed to retrieve another. He offered to return with refreshments for anyone else, but no one took him up on the offer. Cate excused herself with him.

"I didn't think you would ever pick up on that," she said as they walked away.

"Your skills at charades are weak, Lady Cate."

They retrieved a new drink for Jack and retreated to a corner to talk.

"Well?" Cate said, monitoring the party. "Anything interesting on your end?"

"Nothing of note. I've heard enough about land deals, the House of Lords, and almost everyone asked me if my wife knew anything about the impending conflict in the States. But no hints at why someone will soon be murdered."

"Randolph was never away from you, right?"

"Never. What about on your end?"

"I heard less than you! All my talk was about marriages, births, parties, and clothing. Oh and one rather heated discussion about the best painter for a handsome portrait."

"Do you think Victoria may have killed him? And Randolph covered for her?" Jack asked. "He seems protective of her."

"But why?" Cate questioned, as they watched Randolph and Victoria laughing with a group of friends. "It doesn't fit her personality at all, and she doesn't seem to have much to hide. In fact, she seems an open book in the discussions I've had with her."

“I just can’t figure out who else he’d be covering for if he didn’t do it.”

“I don’t know. It must have to do with that mysterious woman in the tower. Now would be a perfect time to meet her but we can’t leave the party.”

“And we will not split up,” Jack insisted.

“No, you’re right. I don’t want to end up thrown down the tower stairs by Andrew. I’d end up dead before I was born!” Cate sipped at her champagne.

Further conversation was stunted when Randolph tapped his glass, signaling everyone to silence. A hush fell over the room.

Randolph shouted from the center of the room, “Welcome everyone to our first Halloween Ball!”

The crowd responded with applause.

Randolph waited for them to die down before continuing. “My wife, the beautiful Victoria, and I are so glad you could join us! I would like to take a moment to thank each of you for joining us on this chilly October evening. From those of you who traveled from afar to those of you who live in our own town, we are so pleased to have you at Dunhaven Castle! Now, I won’t drone on and on, but I want to take one more moment to recognize the efforts of my exquisite and magnificently talented wife, Victoria, who put all this together. Victoria, my dear, you have outdone yourself. This ball will be remembered for years.”

The last statement plunged a knife into Cate’s heart. Haunting words spoken only one hour before a murder.

“Please, everyone, let’s raise a glass to my beloved Victoria,” Randolph continued. Everyone raised their glass. “And now, without further ado, let’s dance!”

The room burst into applause. Animated conversation reignited, and the orchestra readied to play their first waltz. Randolph led Victoria to the middle of the floor to begin the dancing. Cate and Jack inched toward the wall, hoping to avoid the dance floor.

Cate glanced at Jack, her lips pressed together in a thin line. “I’m hoping to avoid any dancing. I imagine it would be a dead giveaway that we’re not from this century.”

Jack adjusted his collar. “No kidding. I’ve got no idea what they’re doing.”

“At least we can easily account for Randolph’s whereabouts!”

Cate and Jack kept to the outskirts of the room for several dances. After a few rounds, Randolph and Victoria, who had switched partners several times, approached.

Randolph sipped at his drink. "Wallflowers, are we?"

"I'm sorry to say we are," Jack admitted.

"Oh, surely, cousin Jack, you'll dance with your lovely wife!" Victoria said.

"I think she'd prefer I didn't. I've two left feet, and her toes would never survive it!"

Cate nodded in agreement. "I'm happy to watch the fun."

"Nonsense, Cousin Catherine!" Randolph exclaimed. "I shall have the next dance and I shall not step on your toes!"

"Oh, really, that's not..." Cate began with a shake of her head.

"Now, I won't take no for an answer," Randolph insisted, taking Cate's hand, and tugging her to the dance floor.

Victoria chuckled and waved her on, patting Jack's arm with her other hand. "Don't worry, Cousin Catherine, I'll keep Jack company while I rest for the next round!"

A wide-eyed Cate issued a panicked glance toward Jack as Randolph swept her away.

Randolph led her to the center of the floor.

"I'm not much of a dancer..." she began.

"Poppycock! Follow my lead, you'll be fine. This one is easy, I shall show you. If you don't catch on, we shall simply tell everyone dancing in America is altogether different! Place your hand just so. Excellent! And off we go. Just like this. One, two, three, one, two, three, one, two, three and turn, one, two, three, one, two, three, that's the way."

Randolph whisked her around the floor, making it easy despite Cate's less than perfect performance. A grin spread across her face as she spun around the floor. By the end of the dance, she found it as enjoyable as promised. As the music came to an end, she applauded, curtsying to her partner while still breathless from the experience.

Randolph began to speak to Cate but was interrupted. Andrew approached, whispering in Randolph's ear before disappearing.

Randolph pressed his lips together in a thin line, his jaw flexing. "Please excuse me, cousin Catherine, there is something urgent I must attend to."

"By all means," Cate managed as Randolph spun to leave.

Peering around, she spotted Jack in their favorite corner. Victoria was being led to the dance floor by a new dance partner. Cate widened her eyes, tilting her head toward Randolph in a signal for him to follow her.

“What’s up?” he asked, joining her as she scurried to keep up with Randolph.

“Andrew just said something to Randolph. He seemed agitated and excused himself to attend to ‘urgent business.’ Something’s up, we need to follow him.”

“Did you see where he went?”

“Yes, down this hall. There!” Cate pointed to a light streaming from an open door.

They crept forward toward the lit room. Cate’s heart pounded against her ribs as she wondered if they were about to witness a murder.

Cate swallowed hard, shooting a glance at Jack with anguish etched into her features. Loud voices floated into the hall as they approached the open door.

“... will NOT continue to be threatened in my own home!” Randolph shouted.

“Don’t look like you’ve got much choice the way I see it,” Andrew answered.

“Do not presume to tell me what I have and haven’t,” Randolph blasted back.

“What you have is a secret whore,” Andrew snarled.

“How dare you, sir!” Randolph retorted.

“How dare I? How dare I? How dare you! Asking me to wait on your whore, fetching her this and that, all the while asking me to keep quiet about it. And nothing in it for me.”

A scuffle sounded. Cate shifted to peer through the crack in the door. Randolph had Andrew by the collar.

“Now you listen to me you sorry excuse for a human, this ends tonight! I shall pay you what you ask, and you shall vacate this property and never return.”

Andrew squirmed from his grasp. “You’d turn me out on the street given the information I have on you? That wouldn’t be wise.”

Randolph smirked. “Any tale you tell now will be the sour grapes of a released staff member. No one will believe you. Now collect your things and go after you've attended to Sonia."

"You're making a huge mistake, friend. You've no idea the lengths I'll go to to protect what's mine. Just ask Catherine MacKenzie."

With that he spun and exited the room. Cate pushed Jack backward, flattening him against the wall. In his rage, Andrew stormed past them, never noticing them hidden in the shadows.

Cate stared after him. "Do we follow him or stay with Randolph?"

"He looks like he's going to the kitchen, we can't very well go there..." Jack began when a figure loomed at the door.

Randolph stood in the doorway, spotting them in the shadows. "Catherine... Jack..." he stumbled, trying to compose himself, "I must apologize for my prolonged absence. I hope I haven't been missed."

"Randolph..." Jack began.

Cate pushed Randolph back inside the room. "Randolph, we must speak with you. We overheard your conversation with Andrew. He must leave the house now!"

"Catherine," Randolph questioned, "what is the meaning of this?"

Cate jabbed a finger at him. "Perhaps you should be the one explaining that. What is the problem with Andrew? We saw you the other day at the loch and overheard you tonight. What is he threatening you with? Who is Sonia?"

Randolph's posture stiffened and he flexed his jaw. "I can't answer those questions, Catherine, I'm sorry."

"Damn it, Randolph, now isn't the time to be tight-lipped!" Cate exclaimed.

Randolph eyes widened at her statement.

"She's only trying to help, Randolph," Jack chimed in. "We need the answers to those questions."

"Why? What do you know?"

Cate glanced at Jack, rubbing her forehead in frustration.

"Nothing we can share," Jack responded.

"I'm afraid I'm the same with nothing to share. But perhaps you can answer this. Why did my footman suggest I ask you about the lengths he's willing to go to in order to protect what's his?"

Cate sighed as Jack began, "We can't..."

"He pushed me into the loch yesterday after catching me wandering in the castle a few times. I almost drowned. I was lucky, Jack pulled me out before anything happened to me.”

Randolph’s eyes went wide and he skirted the desk. “My God, Catherine! Are you alright? You should have informed me at once!”

“It’s difficult to explain. I don’t... this time traveling is so difficult to navigate. You must accept there are things we can’t share with you.”

Randolph considered her statement for a moment. “I understand. But I ask you to offer me the same consideration.”

They were at a stalemate, neither side willing to reveal additional information.

“I’ve relieved him of his position. He’ll soon be gone from this house, so he shan’t be bothering you again.”

Cate’s heart sank. She prayed that whatever she and Jack had done in the past had changed events enough that Randolph was correct.

Randolph checked his pocket watch. “Now, we should return to the party before we are missed.”

Cate nodded in reluctant agreement. A check of the nearby clock showed it was almost the time that the body would be discovered. Perhaps, in the end, they had avoided the horrible mess.

“You go ahead without me, I need a moment. I’ll be right behind you,” Randolph said. Cate glanced at Jack again. “Now, go! I’ll be fine!”

Cate and Jack acquiesced, exiting the room, and heading toward the ballroom.

“Do you suppose we should have left him?” Jack asked.

“I’m not sure we had a choice,” Cate admitted. “It’s almost time for the murder anyway, maybe we somehow avoided it.” She shrugged, defeated for the moment.

They entered the ballroom where the party continued in full swing. Music filled the air accompanied by laughing and enthusiastic conversation from the revelers.

Victoria approached them, grinning. “There you are! Have you seen Randolph? He seems to have disappeared.”

She scanned the crowd for him.

Cate plastered a smile on. “Oh, he was right behind us. We were discussing a painting and stepped out to view it. I’m afraid it was our fault! He should be here any moment.”

“Yes, a family portrait,” Jack added. “My sincere apologies, Victoria. I’m afraid I was somewhat overzealous in asking about an ancestor. Randolph is a gracious host.”

“Yes,” Cate agreed. “Again, we’re so very sorry for stealing him away!”

Victoria waved it away. “No apology needed, dear cousins. I was hoping to have another dance with him though.”

“I’m sure he’ll be here any moment,” Cate assured her.

They waited together a few more moments before Victoria spotted him.

“Ah! There he is!” Victoria exclaimed.

Randolph approached them, smiling, seeming unruffled. He kissed Victoria on the cheek.

“Viewing a painting while we have a ball occurring? Honestly, Randolph! You are such a terrible host!” Victoria teased.

“Well...” Randolph began, when he was interrupted. A blood-curdling scream ripped through the air. The noise startled the guests, most of them grinding to a halt mid-dance. The band one-by-one stopped playing as another scream and more shouts came from outside the ballroom.

One of the servants, who had run toward the scream, raced back inside toward Randolph. “M’lord, you had better come quick.”

“What is it?” Victoria asked, concern crossing her face.

Cate and Jack shared a glance, knowing what awaited Randolph.

“Stay with Victoria,” Jack said, following Randolph and the servant outside.

Cate stood with Victoria, a frown on her face at being left behind. Within seconds, two men carried a limp form through the door and propped her in a chair. The woman, the source of the initial scream, had fainted dead away after realizing what her gaze had fallen upon while walking the gardens.

Victoria, Cate in tow, rushed to her side. “What’s happened? Is she all right?”

“Merely fainted, Lady MacKenzie,” her companion replied.

“Bring smelling salts and some brandy,” Victoria ordered a staff member.

“Excuse me,” Cate said, leaving her to attend to the unconscious guest.

She made her way to the gardens, following the path toward a small group of men that included Randolph and Jack. As she approached, she saw the limp form of Andrew sprawled in an unnatural pose. Blood pooled under him, his eyes stared straight ahead. Cate's stomach turned at the sight. She squeezed her eyes shut, blocking out the image.

"My God, Catherine!" Randolph shouted. "You shouldn't be here."

Jack turned and caught sight of her. "Cate! Catherine," he corrected, approaching her, "you don't want to see this, go inside."

Cate nodded to him, her eyes still wide and staring at the body.

"We'll talk later," he said, turning her away from the scene.

Cate returned to the ballroom where Victoria continued to hover over the ill woman. As she startled back to consciousness, Victoria handed her a brandy to sip.

The sobbing woman sipped the drink with a shaky hand.

"What is it? What caused you to take such a turn?" Victoria asked, smoothing the woman's hair.

"Oh, it was simply awful! Too awful to speak about," she sobbed.

Victoria looked to her companion for an answer.

Before he could provide it, Cate stepped between them. "Victoria, perhaps we should give her some room and discuss this in private."

"Discuss what? What has frightened poor Louise so? Why won't anyone tell me?"

Cate tried her best to usher Victoria away from the growing scene, but she failed. Whispers turned to gasps, gasps to louder expressions of shock and horror.

Cate pitied Victoria as Louise's companion informed her of the cause. "Why, m'lady, she saw a body. Someone has died this Hallow's Eve, fallen from the turret it looks like. It appeared to be one of your footmen."

"What?" Victoria gasped.

"Not died, murdered!" another guest chimed in.

Victoria swooned. Cate, along with a nearby gentleman steadied her. Randolph, Jack, and several others rejoined the group.

Victoria searched his face for answers. "Randolph?" she breathed, shaking her head in disbelief.

Randolph put his arms around her. "I'm sorry, my darling," he said, then raised his voice, "and I'm sorry to all our guests. There has been a tragedy tonight. I fear that young Andrew, one of our footmen, has met with an accident that cost him his life."

Gasps rung throughout the room as Randolph confirmed the rumor. "The police have been sent for. I ask that all of you please remain calm and within the ballroom until they have arrived. Thank you for your patience and please, despite the dreadful news, continue to enjoy the refreshments while you wait.” He nodded to the staff to continue serving beverages to the rattled guests.

Victoria wrung her hands as she stared at the floor. “How could this happen?”

Randolph guided her to a nearby chair. “Come, darling, please sit down.”

She eased onto the chair before springing back up. “Oh, I should...” her voice trailed off, unable to suggest something suitable to do.

“Just rest, darling.” Randolph soothed her. “The police will be here any moment.”

“Are you alright?” Jack asked Cate.

Cate bobbed her head up and down. “Yes, thank you. I’m fine. I wish I hadn’t seen the body, but yes.”

Cate guided Jack a short distance from the reeling Victoria, so she did not overhear their conversation. “Did you spot anything of interest?”

“Nothing more than we already know,” Jack answered. “The fall didn’t kill him, as we read.”

“It’s that obvious?”

“Yes,” Jack said. “It was obvious.”

“It couldn’t...” Cate began when Randolph interrupted her.

“Catherine,” he called, waving her over.

Cate hastened to him with Jack following behind.

“Could you please stay with Victoria? She’s taking it rather poorly, I’m concerned. There are many things I should attend to, but I am reluctant to leave her.”

“Certainly,” Cate assured him. “Jack can help with anything you need.”

“Thank you, both. Jack, please follow me.”

Cate stepped toward Victoria, placing her arm around the woman’s shoulder. She offered her a consoling smile, not able to offer much else in the way of comfort.

“How could this happen?” Victoria asked, concerned.

Cate could offer no answers. Within a few more minutes, the first round of police arrived. They swept past the ballroom to the crime scene. Randolph and Jack, met them outside with a few other men. They conversed for several moments before two officers entered the ballroom.

“Good evening, everyone,” one shouted to the crowd. “As you well know, a member of the MacKenzie staff has died this evening. We do not know the circumstances surrounding this death, it appears it may be accidental. Still, we should like to speak with each of you before you leave tonight. If you would please form two lines at the door, you will need to speak with one of us before leaving. Please form two lines, thank you! Please move in an orderly fashion, thank you!”

The officer continued to instruct the partygoers until everyone had formed two lines and they commenced questioning the guests.

Victoria glanced up at the lines of her guests. The band had begun to gather their instruments and join the line.

“Oh,” Victoria moaned, her voice faltering, “oh, what a mess.” Tears formed in her eyes.

“Victoria, perhaps we should remove ourselves from the commotion and retire to your suite. I’ll inform the police of our location, you can rest,” Cate suggested.

“Perhaps you are right, I feel lightheaded.”

“Come, let’s get you settled.” Cate helped her from the chair. Along the way, she found Bryson, suggesting that the woman accompany them to help settle her mistress. Once in the privacy of Victoria’s suite, Cate left her in Bryson’s capable hands while she returned to the ballroom to help see guests off.

When the last guests departed, the police asked to speak with the staff then the family members. Randolph organized the staff to be questioned, offering them the night off from their clean-up if they did not feel up to the task given the circumstances.

Jack rejoined Cate for a moment. “We better get our stories straight. We only have a few moments.”

“I plan to stick to the truth as much as I can,” Cate answered. “We were with Randolph discussing a painting then returned to the party. A few minutes passed before we heard the scream.”

“What about Andrew?”

“Nothing. I don’t plan on mentioning our run-ins with him. We’d have little reason to have had many conversations with him. It shouldn’t be a stretch.”

“I agree. We say as little as possible.”

Cate nodded as an officer approached them.

“Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie, we’d like to speak with each of you. Perhaps Mrs. MacKenzie first so she may return to Lady MacKenzie and rest.”

Cate found the statement amusing despite the circumstances, but she nodded her agreement.

“If you’ll follow me, Mrs. MacKenzie, you can have a seat right here.”

Cate recounted her version of events to the officer. She left out any hint of conflict between Randolph and Andrew or herself and Andrew.

“I’m so sorry to put you through this trouble, Mrs. MacKenzie,” the officer whispered with a consoling glance. “I don’t have any further questions for you. But if it wouldn’t be too much trouble, could you show me to Lady MacKenzie’s room so I may gather a statement from her?”

“Yes, I would be happy to,” Cate agreed.

Cate led the officer to Victoria’s room. She knocked at the door and entered first, explaining to Bryson that the officer wanted to speak with Victoria. Bryson conceded she wasn’t sure Victoria could offer any answers, but they were welcome to try. She would situate Lady MacKenzie in her armchair, and Cate could show the officer in. Cate retrieved the officer from the hall, showing him into the bedroom.

“Hello, Lady MacKenzie,” the officer began. “I’m terribly sorry about this imposition, but I won’t be more than a moment.” He asked her to recount where she was when the body was discovered.

Victoria struggled to respond, her answers confused and nonsensical.

“She was in the ballroom the entire time,” Cate offered.

“Yet, you were not, Mrs. MacKenzie, so you cannot attest to that, is that correct?”

“Correct, although we were not gone for long. She was there when we left and when we returned. I believe she was enjoying a dance with a gentleman whose name I don’t recall. She was with us when the body was discovered.”

“I see. Well, I shan’t trouble you ladies any further. Good evening, Mrs. MacKenzie, Lady MacKenzie. I can show myself out and back to the ballroom.” He exited the room.

“OH!” Victoria exclaimed bursting into tears, covering her face with her hands.

Cate rushed to her side. “Perhaps you should lie down, Victoria.”

She pulled her hands away from her face. Tears streamed down her cheeks. “I desired a party everyone would remember. I suppose I achieved that.”

“Oh, Victoria, I’m so sorry your party was ruined.”

“How shallow I must sound,” Victoria groaned, wiping tears from her face. “A man is dead. A man who was in my employ, in my household for months and my first concern is my party.”

“You don’t sound shallow, Victoria. This evening was important to you. There is nothing wrong with being upset.”

“We shall once again be the talk of the town.” She exhaled a ragged breath.

Cate understood her trepidation. According to what she read, things would only get worse. Even without the chain of events about to unfold, a murder on the estate would provide the town with juicy gossip for months.

“Yet this, too, shall pass, Victoria. Soon, they will move on to discuss the next sensational story.”

Victoria burst into tears again. She clutched at Cate’s hands. “What a disaster. Oh, I couldn’t bear this without you here, Cousin Catherine. Thank you.”

Cate offered her a consoling smile. “Come now. You should rest, Victoria.”

Victoria nodded, allowing Cate to help her to her bed.

Cate covered her, then sat on the edge of the bed, holding her hand. “Try to sleep.”

Victoria nodded to her as Cate stroked her hair. She let her eyes slide closed. Exhausted from the excitement of the party and the tension that followed, Victoria drifted off in seconds.

A quiet knock sounded on the bedroom door. Bryson poked her head in.

Cate held a finger to her lips, signaling her to stay silent as she eased to stand and crept to the door.

Randolph and Jack waited in the sitting room.

Cate pulled the door closed behind her, signaling to them to keep quiet. “Victoria is asleep.”

“How is she?” Randolph asked.

“Upset. Perhaps the sleep will do her good,” Cate answered.

“You are calming for her, Catherine. Thank you.” He squeezed her hands.

“Randolph, we need to speak to you,” Cate said.

A knock sounded at the door. "Sir," a footman said, peering in. "You're needed downstairs."

Randolph nodded at him. "You two will return tomorrow, please?"

Cate and Jack nodded after sharing a glance.

"Good. Speak with you then. Excuse me."

Randolph followed the footman. "

Well, I guess that's our cue," Jack said.

"Yes, seems so. Just let me check on Victoria one more time." Cate crept to the bedroom, inched the door open and peered in. She eased it shut and tiptoed back to Jack. "She's asleep."

"Good. Okay, let's go."

Cate unclasped her necklace and left it in its box before she accepted Jack's arm. They made their way to the bedroom closet, setting the watch back to their time.

Despite spending over eight hours in the past, only half an hour had passed in the present time.

Cate yawned as they slogged out of the closet. "I am exhausted, but I'll never be able to settle."

"Same here," Jack admitted.

"We have a little time before dinner. Want to compare notes?"

Jack tugged at his collar. "Can I change first? I've been in this monkey suit all night, it's stiff as a board."

"Me too – this dress is beautiful, but wow is it heavy! Meet you in the library?"

"Perfect," Jack said with a nod.

Cate dragged herself to the bedroom to change clothes.

"What a night!" she exclaimed to Riley and Bailey.

They cocked their heads, listening to her babble.

"I suppose the two of you don't understand, it's still afternoon for you! Oh Riley, Bailey, what a mess. I hope we can help poor Randolph. Come on, let's meet Jack in the library and see what we can learn!"

At the mention of Jack's name, Riley leapt to his feet, his tail wagging. Bailey studied him, giving a slight wag to his tail.

Riley danced as Cate gathered a notebook and pen along with the newspaper clippings about the murder. He nudged at Bailey, exhibiting his excitement and encouraging Bailey to join in.

"Okay, little buddies! Let's go!"

After Cate opened the door, Riley dashed down the hall. Bailey raced to keep up with him. The black and white dog barreled down the stairs and sprinted to the library. Bailey hurried behind him. The two dogs burst through the open doors, Riley galloping straight to Jack.

“Well, hello, little fella!” Jack said, lifting him into his arms. Bailey approached Jack, eyeing the scene cautiously. “And hello to you, too, other little fella!”

Jack tousled Riley’s fur, and Riley gave him an appreciative lick on the face. When Cate caught up, she found Jack kneeling down, still holding Riley, giving a tentative Bailey a quick head rub.

Jack climbed to his feet as Cate wandered to the armchair. “The new addition isn’t as keen on me as Riley.”

“I’m sure you’ll win him over. Riley took an immediate shine to you, which is unusual for him. Bailey is more bashful than Riley. I’m sure he’ll come around soon, though! He’s had a tough start!”

“Aye, but he’s living the life of... well, Riley now.” Jack gave a hearty laugh as Riley cocked his head quizzically at the mention of his name.

Cate groaned at the joke. “You should take your act on the road.”

“I’ll keep my day job, thanks,” Jack declined. “Or my night job, or whatever I’ve got here. I feel like I’ve lived through two days already and it’s not even suppertime yet.”

Cate winced as she sank into the armchair near the fireplace. “Yes. The only thing keeping me awake is fretting over Randolph and Victoria. I feel terrible for them both.”

“Aye, so do I. I expected it and it still was a shock. I can imagine they are both reeling. Well, unless Randolph expected it, too.”

Cate considered the statement. They witnessed a heated argument between Randolph and Andrew not long before the man ended up dead. Had her ancestor snapped and killed the man?

CHAPTER 26

“*H*e couldn’t have done it though, right?”

Jack rubbed his chin as he considered the question. “I don’t know. Perhaps he could have. We weren’t with him the entire time. There was a gap between when we returned to the party and when he returned.”

Cate chewed her lower lip as she performed a quick calculation in her head. “Yes, but was it a large enough gap for him to have committed a murder? I don’t imagine so.”

“It would have been a tight window but may be possible.”

“Really tight,” she answered after a few moments of recollection. “It’s safe to assume the body was thrown from the tower window based on where it landed, would you agree?”

Jack bobbed his head up and down. “Yes, I’d consider that a reasonable assumption.”

“Okay, so that means Randolph had to leave his office, locate Andrew, kill him with the globe paperweight by striking him with multiple blows, toss his body from the tower, discard the murder weapon in the tower room and return to the ballroom all within that small time frame. It doesn’t seem possible.” Cate ticked the points off on her fingers as she spoke.

“Well, assume Andrew was in the tower and Randolph knew it.”

Cate curled her legs under her as her mind continued to whirl. “Okay, that’s a safe bet. And it would shave some time off, but still, that’s a tall order to go to the tower, murder someone, throw his body out the window and make it back to the party within... what would you estimate it at? Perhaps five to seven minutes?"

"No longer than that, yes. And yes, that is a tall order."

"We could try it out and time it," Cate suggested.

Jack slouched in his seat. "It's not a bad idea, although I was rather comfy here."

Cate rolled her eyes at him.

"Okay, okay, Lady Cate, we'll try it."

They left the dogs playing with a ball in the library and navigated the halls to the room that served as Randolph's office.

"Okay, now, as soon as I leave, you go to the tower room, unlock it, pretend to bash someone multiple times with a paperweight, heave their body out the window then meet me in the ballroom," Cate said.

"I never realized how teacher-like you really are, Lady Cate. Okay, got the time ready on your phone?"

"Yes. Oh, give me a few moments head start. We didn't see or hear Randolph leave his office when we were walking down the hall."

Jack nodded at her, taking his position behind the desk. "Got it."

"Okay, here we go!" Cate said, starting the timer and striding from the room.

She walked to the ballroom on the same route they used at the party, stepping into the now empty, cavernous space. She watched the seconds tick by on her app as she waited for Jack. Time ticked by slowly. She chewed her lower lip as she began to doubt she'd been correct in her assumption. Perhaps Randolph did have the time to commit the murder.

She paced the floor as the time reached the five-minute mark. No sign of Jack, but she couldn't breathe a sigh of relief yet. With a deep sigh, she increased her speed, pacing double-time in an ever-widening circle.

As Cate rounded the corner in the far end of the room, Jack appeared in the doorway, gasping for breath with beads of perspiration on his forehead.

"Time?" he gasped.

Cate checked the timer. "Seven minutes, forty-eight seconds."

He doubled over, letting his hands rest on his knees as he continued to suck in breaths. "I had a few thoughts along the way."

Cate eyed him with an arched eyebrow. "Let's go back to the library. Looks like you need a rest!"

"Great idea, Lady Cate!"

They meandered back to the library. Jack sank into the armchair, scrubbing his face.

Cate curled her legs under her as she frowned. "So, that window is really tight. You were forty-eight seconds over the time frame we came up with. So, I'm not sure it helps."

Jack poked a finger at her. "But as I spent a few moments thrashing my arms around pretending to murder someone with a brass paperweight something occurred to me. This is a close contact crime. Is it likely that he'd end up with no blood on him?"

Cate raised her eyebrows. "Oh, great point and I didn't see any."

"Neither did I. And I doubt he had time to clean it off. I ran so we could determine the shortest amount of time Randolph would have had to commit the murder."

"By the sound and sight of you, it was much faster than Randolph would have. He wasn't out of breath and wasn't perspiring when he rejoined us."

"Maybe he's in better shape than me," Jack suggested.

Cate shot him a look.

Jack wiggled his eyebrows at her. "Thanks for the vote of confidence."

"Okay, we've ruled out Randolph as a suspect."

"I agree. The possibility is remote."

Cate breathed out a sigh of relief. "One thing settled: Randolph is not the murderer. Two questions remain. Who is the real killer and why does Randolph cover for them?"

Jack flung his hands in the air, slapping them against the supple leather. "Between the guests and the staff, there were over one hundred people. There's no way we could keep track of where everyone was, this is impossible, Cate."

"It's not. Would Randolph confess to a crime he didn't commit for the vast majority of the people there?"

Jack cocked his head. "Good point."

"That narrows the list. There are only two people I imagine he would protect."

Jack mulled it over. "Victoria. She's the only one I can come up with."

"Victoria, yes. He'd do anything for her. But she's not the murderer. I doubt she left the party for even a second. It's not her he's covering for."

There is someone else, though. And I'd put money on the fact that she is the murderer."

Jack scrunched his features in thought. "Who?"

"Sonia."

"Sonia?"

Cate nodded. "Yes, the woman he told Andrew to attend to before he vacated the castle. Sonia."

"We don't even know who Sonia is or what she means to him."

Cate let her legs fall to the floor as she leaned forward. "She's the woman from the tower. It fits! The body falls from the tower. Randolph sent Andrew to the tower. The woman there murders him. When the investigation draws too much attention, Randolph confesses to divert the attention away from Sonia."

"That's a great theory, Cate, but it reminds me of a certain cheese."

"Huh?" Cate said, wrinkling her brow in confusion.

"Your theory is like Swiss cheese, it's full of holes."

Cate frowned at him. "It's a darn good theory if you ask me. And I love Swiss cheese."

Jack leaned forward as he made his case. "Come on, Cate. Think about it, really consider what you're suggesting. To start, what is the motive? Why would Sonia, who we don't know is even the tower lady, kill Andrew? Could Sonia possess the strength it takes to inflict the injuries Andrew sustained? Even if she did, does she have the strength to toss his dead body out of a window? From what we saw of her, which was only a glimpse, I understand, she appeared to be a smaller woman. No larger than you. Do you think you could have beaten Andrew and tossed him from a window?"

Cate blew out a long breath. They sat in silence for a few moments, each ruminating over the discussion. Jack had many good points. However, not many other theories made sense. But the notion left several dangling threads such as motive and opportunity. She could answer none of Jack's questions.

She squashed her lips together. "There's something else. When I had my unfortunate incident with Andrew..."

Jack gave her a wide-eyed stare. "Unfortunate incident? Is that what you're calling it now?"

Cate bit her lower lip and shrugged. "Sounded better than saying when Andrew almost drown me. Anyway, when the 'thing' happened, Andrew mentioned something about having a good thing going that he wouldn't let me ruin. Could that play into it?"

"A good thing going?" he asked. "As in his position at the castle, perhaps?"

"But how would I ruin that?"

"By telling Randolph that he was rude and manhandled you."

"He'd kill me over that?"

Jack rubbed at his eyes. "Who knows."

Cate stretched and yawned. "I'm tired, too. We're spinning our wheels. We need dinner and a long nap!"

As if on cue, Mrs. Fraser arrived with Cate's dinner tray. "All finished with your estate business and ready for dinner, I hope!"

Jack pushed himself up to stand. "Ah, estate business is never finished."

"That's the truth! But time for a break! Now, come on, you," she ordered, pushing Jack toward the door, "let's leave Lady Cate to a quiet meal. She looks as though you've tired her out with all your estate business."

Cate spent her meal mulling over their discussion but coming to no new conclusions. Her overtired mind failed to process anything new. She spent the evening dwelling on her worry for Randolph and Victoria. Anxiety coursed through her, particularly since she couldn't solve anything tonight.

Sheer exhaustion drove her to bed. She fell asleep, awakening in the same position she'd fallen asleep in. Still drained, she dragged herself from her bed. She walked through the misty landscape to the loch, shivering as she recalled her last visit here had almost been fatal.

She returned to the castle, nervous anticipation making concentrating on anything before their late morning trip to 1856 impossible.

An email from Molly was the only thing that could capture her attention. Despite her worry, she found herself smiling at the subject line: I DID IT!

Hi Cate! Well, I did it! I quit! Told Jeff yesterday and gave my two-week notice! He wasn't happy, asked me to stay until the end of the academic year but I've got better things to do!

Speaking of, WOW, how did you do this when you moved? I am so excited but I looked around my cramped little apartment and wondered how I still have so much stuff?!?! I already stopped to get boxes, I will start packing this weekend. Where should I send everything?

I haven't broken the news to my sister yet, I'm waiting so I can savor the moment. I'm just waiting to hear from my ex, too. Won't take long for word to filter to him through the grapevine in this town!

I hope everything is going well for you there. I can't wait to be back "home" (and I really can't wait to call Scotland home!). Miss you, Riley and Bailey!

Love you guys!

Molly

The grin on her face broadened as she read Molly's enthusiastic email. She flicked her gaze in the air as she tried to imagine the look on Jeff's face when Molly resigned. She almost felt sorry for him. Almost.

She clicked the reply button and sent Molly the information she'd requested and some encouragement for the packing that lay ahead of her. She informed her the Rose Room awaited her and told her about the newly planned Christmas event at the castle.

With the email on its way, Cate closed the laptop and headed upstairs to dress for her trip to the past, beating Jack to the closet. She arrived fifteen minutes early, pacing the floor of the bedroom as impatience coursed through her.

Jack stepped into the bedroom as she spun on her heel to stalk in the opposite direction. "You're early!"

"Ready?" Cate asked.

Jack offered her an amused smirk. "Anxious?"

Cate wrung her hands. "Yes. I won't deny it. I'm nervous. I feel sorry for Randolph and Victoria. Even if we learn nothing, we can at least support them."

Jack clapped her on the shoulder. "I understand. I feel the same way. Randolph didn't commit this crime. It is a shame his family is destroyed by this. I still can't figure out why he does it."

“Let’s hope to get some answers today. Let’s not push too much, though. I realize we only have a limited amount of time, but I think we should proceed with caution.”

Jack stopped dead on their walk to the closet. “Ohhh, what is this I’m hearing? Lady Cate wants to proceed with caution? I can’t believe my ears!”

“Oh, stop,” Cate said with a chuckle. “I’m being serious!”

“I’ll believe it when I see it, Cate. Now, come on.”

They stepped into the closet and activated the timepiece, sending them back to 1856. After their usual circuit out and around to the front door, Thomson met them, ushering them into the house. He showed them to Randolph’s office. Two police officers exited the office as they entered.

Randolph shoved the timepiece into his pocket. “Jack, Catherine. Thank you for coming. Catherine, Victoria is in her room. She has not emerged from her room. But I’m sure she would see you.”

“I will visit her in a moment. Are there any developments regarding the investigation?”

“The officers told me they expect the autopsy to occur early next week. They’re bringing in a coroner from Edinburgh. I don’t understand what they expect to find. The man fell from a third-story window. It seems rather obvious.”

Cate wrinkled her brow, knowing what they would find. It appeared Randolph did not, still believing Andrew died from the fall.

“Randolph, what did you discuss with the police yesterday?” Cate inquired.

“The standard questions, same as they asked everyone, I assume. My whereabouts, information about Andrew, any issues I’ve noticed as his employer.”

“What did you tell them?” she pressed.

Randolph scrunched his features. “The truth. I told them I last saw him alive when I fired him. I imagine you overheard that. We then spoke for a few minutes before returning to the party.”

“We weren’t with you returning to the ballroom,” Jack said. “Did you tell them that? We did, I hope it hasn’t caused any trouble.”

Randolph waved his hand in the air, dismissing it. “No trouble at all. I arrived in the ballroom only a few moments after you. I spoke with a few servants then returned to the ball. They can confirm my story.”

Cate and Jack shared a glance. So, this was the alibi disclosed in the early news articles before Randolph confessed.

Cate considered pushing further and inquiring about Sonia, but deciding not to push any further at the moment, sure Randolph would refuse to discuss it. "I'm glad. I have been worried all night. If you'll excuse me, I'll go to Victoria now."

She snaked through the castle's halls to Victoria's suite. With a quiet knock, she called to Victoria.

Within a moment, Victoria pulled the door open. Appearing beleaguered, she glanced up at Cate before her eyes fell to the floor below.

"Oh, Catherine," she muttered, "please come in. I shall ring for tea."

Cate sank into a chair next to her, patting her hand. "How are you, Victoria?" Cate asked, taking her hand as she sat down.

"I suppose I'm carrying on. Thank you for helping last night. Randolph told me you saw the guests off. Thank you. I wasn't up to it. I shall be known as a terrible hostess, I suppose."

"Everyone will understand," Cate assured her.

Bryson arrived with a tea tray, leaving it with Victoria after checking if anything else was needed.

Victoria poured tea for Cate and herself. "I can't thank you enough, Catherine, for your help not only with the guests but also for what you did for me last night. Oh, I was so distraught. Thank you for comforting me when I needed it."

"I didn't do much. Did you get any sleep?"

"Yes, yes, I did. Although I remain exhausted. I cannot wait for this mess to end. I haven't been able to face anyone yet. How did you sleep? Oh, you had to travel home after that, I feel awful. You should have stayed with us."

"Don't trouble yourself over it, Victoria. Randolph offered," Cate fibbed, "but we did not want to disturb the household at such a time. I slept little. I experienced a restless night. I worried about you."

"Oh," Victoria said, grabbing Cate's hand, "you are such a dear, Catherine."

Cate sipped her tea. "Randolph said the coroner should arrive early in the week to complete his investigation."

Victoria brooded in her chair, staring at the fire dancing in the fireplace. "What a nasty business. I cannot wait for it to end."

“I understand. Hopefully soon.”

Cate changed the subject, asking how Victoria would celebrate the upcoming Christmas holiday. The two women chatted about the holiday, Victoria’s son Ethan, winters in Dunhaven and more before Cate suggested she should find Jack and depart.

“Thank you, Cousin Catherine, for providing a distraction for me today. I do appreciate your stopping by.”

“You’re welcome, Victoria. Jack has some business this weekend, but I will check in again on Monday with you if that’s suitable.”

“Most suitable. In fact, please join us for dinner on Monday if you can.”

“I shall share the invitation with Jack, but I believe we are free.”

“Wonderful. I shall see you then.” Victoria embraced her, kissing her on the cheek.

Cate navigated to Randolph’s office, finding Jack with Randolph and Malcolm, discussing a few estate items.

She knocked on the jamb. “Sorry to interrupt. I’m here to collect Jack.”

Jack stood, saying his goodbyes to Malcolm and Randolph.

Randolph rose from his seat. “When can we expect you again? I hope soon.”

“Monday,” Cate answered, “for dinner.”

“I shall look forward to it,” Randolph answered.

The men exchanged handshakes and Jack and Cate departed, making their way to the closet and returning home.

“Change and meet to discuss before lunch?” Cate suggested.

“Sure, meet you in the library,” Jack answered.

With both now in regular clothing, they slouched into the leather chairs near the fireplace.

Cate drummed her fingers on the arm. “We can confirm that Randolph had a solid alibi, now. If servants saw him after we did, there’s no way he had the time to kill someone and return to the ballroom.”

“Right, so we have that confirmed.”

“Nothing of note on my end from Victoria. She’s holding up okay. It’s taken a toll, but she’s doing fine. I imagine the real issue will come when Randolph confesses. Perhaps we can avoid that.”

Jack flung his hand in the air. “I don’t see how. I’ve got nothing on my end. Randolph acts like nothing happened. He won’t even discuss it. We spent most of the time going over estate business. He asked about the circumstances of your mishap with Andrew.”

“What did you tell him?”

“I danced around an explanation, saying Andrew caught us on the way back to the time travel location and wasn’t happy about it.”

“Did he buy that story?”

Jack nodded as he slouched further in the chair. “I think so, yes.”

“Anything else?”

Jack shook his head. “No, nothing of note. Although, can I just say how weird it is to discuss estate affairs with my great-great-great-grandfather?”

Cate laughed at the odd statement. “No stranger than it is to discuss fashion with my great-great-great-grandmother.”

Jack held up his hands in defeat. “You win, estate business has changed less than fashion.”

“Well, anyway, we’re on hold until Monday. I told Victoria we’d visit then, and she invited us to dinner. I’m hoping the autopsy results are in. That’s when the real action begins. Until then, Randolph will tell us nothing.”

“I agree. He’s tight-lipped, and he will remain so until something precipitates a major change.”

“Right, like him confessing to a murder he didn’t commit to protect Sonia. I hope we can prevent that but I’m not sure.” Cate bit her lower lip as she drummed her fingers again.

“We may have to let it play out. We’re not supposed to be changing things, remember?”

Cate scrunched up her face. “Yes, I know. But I intend to prevent Randolph from going to jail and ruining his and Victoria’s futures. I’m just warning you.”

Jack held up his hands again as she poked a finger in his direction. “I realize that. I won’t try to stop you. You’re protecting your family. I’d do the same if it was Malcolm accused. Rules be damned.”

Cate offered him a tight-lipped smile and a nod as she stood. “Well, it looks like you’re off the hook for the weekend.”

He rose to his feet with her. “Oh boy, you mean I only need to go through forty-eight hours in the next forty-eight hours?”

Cate chuckled. “Yes, two whole days of only twenty-four hours each.”

“What will you do with your normal twenty-four hour days?” Jack asked with a wink.

Cate threw her arms out to the side with a sigh. “Fret, most likely. I’ll try to keep my mind off things by working on my book and maybe getting a few things ready for Molly’s arrival.”

They spent a few more moments discussing Molly’s impending move before disbanding for lunch.

Her weekly dinner with her staff aided in relieving her mind of some of the stress she felt waiting for time to pass. The rest of the weekend dragged.

When Monday finally arrived, nervous anticipation kept her agitated from sunrise. The autopsy results would be revealed today. The situation would spiral from here.

The cause of death would be revealed. Randolph would confess to a crime he didn’t commit and devastate his and Victoria’s lives.

Cate spent the day reviewing the case again, unable to push it from her mind. In mid-afternoon, she readied for the trip. As she and Jack set the watch back to 1856, her hands trembled.

After slipping from the castle, Jack knocked at the front door. Cate wiped sweaty palms on her dress. Thomson answered, ushering them inside. Victoria swept into the room, her face a mask of worry.

“Thank God you’re both here, cousins. Please, come quickly.”

Cate’s forehead pinched. “What’s happened?” Cate asked breathlessly.

A pained expression crossed Victoria’s beautiful features. “Oh, it’s just terrible.”

CHAPTER 27

Cate's stomach somersaulted at the woman's words.

Victoria chewed her lower lip, wringing her hands. Worry creased her forehead. "The police are here speaking with Randolph. Andrew did not die in the fall. He was hit on the head, that's what caused his death. A blow to the head. Well, blows, there were multiple. This has now changed the entire investigation. It's now considered murder. They are questioning Randolph further and want to search the castle. What a disruption. Oh, I am so sorry, we may be late for dinner."

Cate guided the woman to the loveseat. "Don't worry about dinner, Victoria. I'm glad we are here to wait with you. Let's sit down."

"Oh, yes, let's sit down. Oh, Jack, you're an attorney, aren't you? Perhaps you could join Randolph in speaking with the police. I'd feel so much more at ease knowing you were there, that he had legal advice from someone we can trust, from family."

"Ah..." Jack hesitated.

"He would be more than happy to," Cate answered for him. She gave an encouraging nudge to Jack.

"Oh, thank you," Victoria said, leaping from her chair to embrace Jack.

Jack offered a nervous chuckle. "That's what family is for. Catherine, a word before I join Randolph?"

Cate squeezed Victoria's hand before leaving the room with Jack.

"Cate, are you crazy?" Jack whispered when they were alone in the hall. "I'm not an attorney."

“No, but you’re aware of the specifics of the case. You know where this is heading. The ‘legal advice’ is the easy part, tell him to remain silent! Just make sure he doesn’t confess to a murder he didn’t commit. And don’t let them search the house without a warrant. You can stall them until we can brainstorm, just tell the police they aren’t allowed to do what they want to do without a judge signing off.”

Jack ran a shaky hand through his hair. “You watch too much Law and Order, Cate.”

“Good thing I did!”

“Maybe you should be the lawyer,” Jack answered, adjusting his collar.

“I can’t, there aren’t women lawyers yet, remember? Come on, you can do it! I have faith in you.”

Jack nodded, his cheeks puffing as he blew out a long breath. “Okay, here goes nothing.”

He headed down the hall to Randolph’s office, giving Cate one final glance and a salute before disappearing.

Cate offered an encouraging smile before returning to Victoria. The two women sat together in nervous anticipation, making limited and distracted conversation.

After half an hour, Randolph and Jack joined them.

Victoria sprang from her seat, rushing to them. “What happened?”

“They’re gone for now,” Randolph told her.

Cate studied Jack’s face, searching for more answers.

“They cannot search the castle until they have a warrant to do so. I expect them to return, but we will be prepared when they do. This will not be chaos. They will respect your rights and your home.”

A smile spread across Cate’s face, and she winked at Jack. His new role suited him.

“Thank heavens and thank you, Cousin Jack,” Victoria said, fanning herself as she collapsed into a chair. “What a mess.”

“Indeed,” Randolph agreed. “With any luck it will be cleared up soon and we can return to our lives.”

“Do the police have any suspects?” Cate asked.

“They haven’t said,” Randolph answered. “Andrew had several questionable associates, though. It doesn’t surprise me this was his fate.”

“Just terrible,” Victoria said, shaking her head.

“Enough of this talk tonight,” Randolph said, pouring a drink and handing it to Jack.

Victoria agreed, climbing to her feet. “We should go in for dinner, I imagine Cook is beside herself with the delay.”

“Yes, I expect you are correct, my dear. Shall we?”

The foursome wandered to the dining room. Cook sent her apologies along with the first course of soup. With the unexpected delay, the meal no longer remained piping hot. As the main course was served, and the quartet engaged in light conversation, attempting to avoid discussing the ongoing murder investigation. Halfway through their dinner Thomson interrupted them, approaching Randolph to whisper in his ear.

The expression on Randolph’s face transformed in an instant. He whispered a response to Thomson who nodded and left the room. Within minutes the butler returned, whispering again to Randolph.

Randolph flung his napkin onto the table in disgust. “How dare they intrude on our dinner!”

“What is it?” Victoria asked, setting her fork down.

Randolph leapt from his seat. “The damned police. They have sought Judge Darrow over his supper to obtain a warrant.”

Jack stood, setting his napkin on his chair as he prepared to follow Randolph. Before they could step out, the doors burst open. Several police officers stormed into the room.

“What is the meaning of this? How dare you interrupt my meal!” Randolph shouted as they entered the room.

Jack placed himself between Randolph and the officers. “Allow me to handle it, Randolph. May I see the warrant, please?”

One officer handed him the paperwork, adding, “You’ll find everything in order. We shall begin our search posthaste.”

“Just a moment.” Jack held up his hand.

“Mr. MacKenzie, please stand aside and allow us to conduct our business. The warrant is in order.”

“I...” Jack began, searching for an argument but finding none. Victoria joined Randolph, putting her arm on his shoulder. Cate glanced over Jack’s at the paperwork. “It appears everything is in order.”

“Just a moment!” Randolph shouted. “No one will lay one finger on anything in this house!”

“Lord MacKenzie, you may not interfere with this investigation, please stand aside.”

“There isn’t a need for a search,” Randolph insisted.

“Do you have information that would suggest a search is not warranted?” the officer asked.

“Yes...” Randolph began.

Jack held up his hand. “Wait, Randolph, do not say another word.” He turned to the officer in charge. “I’d like a private moment with my client.”

“If your client has information about the murder, I’d like to hear it.”

“And you shall,” Randolph insisted.

Jack squeezed his eyes shut, spinning back toward Randolph. “Randolph, please, I must insist as your legal counsel that you remain silent.”

The officer shook his head, a scowl on his lips. “Enough of this charade, boys, search the house.”

Randolph flung his hand in the air. “There’s no need, I tell you! The murderer is right here. It was me. I am the guilty party. I killed Andrew Forsythe.”

Victoria gasped, covering her full lips with a trembling hand. Jack’s head sunk to his chest, and Cate’s stomach turned over.

The officer’s face twisted into a mask of confusion. “You?”

“Yes. I did it. I created a false alibi, but I can no longer live with the guilt.”

“Randolph, please,” Jack said through clenched teeth.

Randolph waved him off.

The police officer, eyes wide, shook his head, saying, “Randolph MacKenzie, I place you under arrest for the murder of Andrew Forsythe.”

“Oh my God,” Victoria exclaimed, swooning. Cate raced to her side, easing her in a chair. One of the other officers handcuffed Randolph.

“I suppose you can lead us to the murder weapon,” the lead officer asked. “Otherwise, we still must conduct the search.”

“I can tell you where it is, but I doubt you’ll find it. I threw it in the loch the day after the murder.”

“We’ll try dragging the loch tomorrow morning. It’s too dark now,” the officer said. “Come along, Lord MacKenzie, we need to take a formal statement from you at the station.”

Cate leapt to her feet, rushing to Jack's side and lowering her voice. "Jack, you must go with him."

"What for?" Jack whispered, his voice thick with sarcasm. "He is a murderer, he's murdered any attempt I have at a defense!"

"Still! Go with him, try to minimize the damage. And try to find out why he's doing this!"

Jack sighed and nodded. "Okay, okay. I'll see what I can do."

Cate squeezed his arm in a silent display of support. "Good luck."

"I shall go with my client. He is not to be questioned unless I am present," Jack said, returning to his normal voice.

"Very well. You both can follow me," the officer said.

"Oh no! Randolph!" Victoria sprang from her chair throwing her arms around him. "Please," she begged the officer, "please do not take him."

"Lady MacKenzie, please stand aside."

"No!" she wailed.

The officer nodded to another who pulled her away.

"Don't touch me!" she shouted.

"Get your hands off of my wife!" Randolph bellowed, approaching the officer.

Chaos ensued as the police restrained both Victoria and Randolph.

"Victoria, please," Cate said, grabbing her by the shoulders, "this will not help. Please, let Jack straighten it out."

Tears fell from Victoria's eyes. "Yes," she gasped out. "Please, Cousin Jack, help him." She flung herself into Jack's arms, sobbing.

Jack patted her shoulder, promising to do his best.

Cate pulled her away, sitting her in a chair while the men cleared the room. She requested Thomson to fetch Bryson, directing that Victoria should be taken to her room to rest.

Thomson disappeared to fetch the ladies' maid below stairs. With Bryson's help, Cate took Victoria to her bedroom suite. Bryson dressed her in her nightclothes and situated her in bed. Cate delivered her a brandy to settle her nerves.

"Why is this happening?" Victoria croaked before downing the glass.

"Try not to worry, cousin. Jack will do whatever he can to settle this."

"Yes." Victoria nodded. "Yes, Jack must help him. Or..." her voice trailed off.

“Do not even think it, Victoria. Please close your eyes and try to sleep. You have had a severe shock.”

“How can I sleep with Randolph...” Her voice trailed off again, unable to verbalize the situation.

Cate adjusted her covers, taking her hand. “Please try to rest. Perhaps when you awaken, he will be returned. You’ll want to have all your strength then.”

Victoria nodded, squeezing Cate’s hand. “Please stay, Catherine. Ask Bryson to make up a room. You mustn’t return home alone, anyway.”

Cate nodded at her with a weak smile. “I shall wait here for Jack to return.”

Victoria gave another nod, satisfied, and closed her eyes. The shock and anxiety of the events took a hard toll. The tea Bryson prepared with the addition of the sleeping draught also aided and she drifted off to a fitful sleep.

Cate removed herself to the sitting room, asking Bryson to fetch her when Jack returned.

She collapsed into the armchair near the fireplace. She found herself tired yet unable to rest. The fire danced in front of her as she stared into it, her mind incapable of settling. She spent an hour fidgeting in the chair, jumping at every noise, hoping it was Jack returning.

After an hour, Cate rose from the chair to pace the room. She peeked in at Victoria who was still asleep, moaning as though suffering from a bad dream.

Cate entered the room, taking her hand and stroking her forehead until she was quiet. She returned to pacing the sitting room floor until weary. She sank into the armchair again, letting her head rest against the wing. Her eyes were heavy, she closed them for a moment and drifted off to sleep.

Cate’s body shook all over. Startled, she bolted up, her eyes snapping open.

“What? What time is it?” she asked, her voice groggy with sleep. Confusion flashed across her face before the realization of her whereabouts set in.

“Almost 2 a.m. You fell asleep. Come on,” Jack said, standing and offering his hand for her to join him.

Cate rubbed her eyes before grasping it. "Where are we going?"

"Home, silly."

"Home? What happened with Randolph? Wait, I should check on Victoria."

Jack stopped her. "Bryson is with her. We can talk about what happened when we get home and out of these clothes."

Cate nodded, sleep still in her eyes. She glanced back toward Victoria's room. Worry clouded her mind, but she hoped Victoria slept through the night. She followed Jack to the closet and returned to their own time.

"Whew, what a night," Jack said when they were home.

"Yeah. I bet you are tired."

Jack scrubbed his face with his hands. "You aren't kidding."

"Do you want to discuss everything tomorrow after you've had some sleep?"

"No. I'd rather do it while it's fresh in my mind. Besides, I'll not be responsible for you laying awake all night wondering what's happened."

Cate gave him a small smile. "I appreciate that. I would like to know."

"Let's change. We have about thirty minutes before dinner."

Cate nodded as they exited the closet. "I'll ask Mrs. Fraser to send a tray up for you with mine, in the name of estate business. We can talk over dinner then you can go home straight after."

"Perfect. I'll meet you in the usual spot?"

"See you in the library as soon as I'm changed and have taken the dogs for a quick jaunt outside."

Cate returned to her bedroom suite, greeted the dogs then changed. Exhaustion coursed through her despite her nap. She couldn't imagine how tired Jack must be. "Okay, boys," she said to Riley and Bailey, "let's go for a quick walk before dinner."

On her way out, she asked Mrs. Fraser to send both her dinner and Jack's to the library, offering to carry one tray up on her own. After a short walk with the dogs, Cate returned to the kitchen to collect her tray and accompany Mrs. Fraser to the library.

Jack lounged in his usual armchair, his chin dipping toward his chest as he nodded off.

"Here we are, lazy bones," Mrs. Fraser said as she slid the tray in front of him.

Jack's eyes snapped open, and he yawned. "Thanks."

Mrs. Fraser wagged a finger at him. “Now dinnae you go getting used to this treatment. I’m only doing it this once.”

“I wouldn’t dare, Emily, I wouldn’t dare.”

“I’m glad I did. I dare say you look like you’re coming down with something!”

“Ah, I just didn’t sleep well enough last night,” Jack said.

“We’ll see,” Mrs. Fraser said, “best you eat all your dinner and try to stave off whatever bug you caught. You sure you want to hang around this one, Lady Cate? I hope he doesn’t breathe his germs onto you. Can’t your business wait until you’re well?”

“Afraid not. I won’t breathe in her direction.”

“Well, I suppose I’ll go eat my own dinner far, far away from the germs.” Mrs. Fraser laughed, shaking her head as she departed.

Cate sank into the chair next to Jack, setting her tray on the table in front of her.

Jack stabbed a few pieces of the meal with his fork, already digging in.

“Hey,” Cate chided, “stop breathing in my direction.”

“Very funny, Lady Cate. You know very well I’m not sick.”

Cate giggled before diving into her own meal. “Okay, so what happened? What took until two in the morning? And did Randolph come back with you? What did he tell the police? Is he sticking with his story?”

CHAPTER 28

Cate perched on the edge of her seat, awaiting answers from Jack about Randolph's situation.

"Whoa, whoa, slow down, Cate. One thing at a time. I'll go over everything I remember then you can ask questions."

Cate bit her lower lip. "Okay."

He took a few more bites of food before beginning. "Okay, so I tried my best, but Randolph is sticking to his story so far. I spent hours trying to talk him out of it and trying to find out why he confessed. I even told him we knew he couldn't have done it. He refused to change his mind. He refused to tell me who he was trying to protect. Kept saying he realized what he was doing, and he was guilty."

Jack ate a few more bites of food and washed it down with some water. "I gave him my 'professional opinion' about what he was doing. He didn't care. The police questioned him. I did my best to minimize the number of questions and, after a while, they gave up. Told me they'd finish questioning him tomorrow. Speaking of, we need to be back tomorrow morning at nine for Randolph's questioning."

Cate nodded at the statement before her shoulders slumped. "I don't get it. Why is he doing this? It has to be Sonia."

Jack sank his head into his hands. "He wouldn't say. What a mess. I fully expect to lose my first and hopefully only legal case."

"Well, your client isn't doing you any favors."

"No, he is not."

Cate wrinkled her nose, offering Jack a consoling glance. “How bad did the questioning go? What did he admit to?”

“Not much, thanks to my superb legal maneuvering. And what he explained fell short of making much sense. That’s why the police want to question him again. And why I was able to postpone it until tomorrow.”

Cate furrowed her brow. “What do you mean?”

“The explanations he provided did not add up upon close inspection. He’s lying, and it’s obvious at times.”

Cate raced across the room, fetching a pen and paper. “Any specific discrepancies you remember?”

“He couldn’t identify the murder weapon. Said he didn’t remember what he grabbed to hit him with. When they questioned him on how he knew what item to throw into the loch, he flip-flopped, said he remembered what he hit him with at the time and directly afterwards but can’t remember now.”

Cate raised her eyebrows as she jotted it all down. “That sounds made up. I remember the news story mentioned the police being skeptical. I’ll bet this is why.”

“There was another time they asked about his supposed alibi. He said he had time to commit the crime and talk with the staff. Later he said the staff lied on his behalf at his request.”

“Is he still at the police station or did you get him out of custody?”

Jack shot her an incredulous glance. “I’m not that good of a fake lawyer, Cate. No, he’s still in custody. Spent his night in a cell.”

Cate shook her head at the situation as she tapped her pen on the notepad. “Perhaps you’ll have better luck tomorrow. I could speak with him, maybe that will help.”

Jack flung his hands in the air. “It can’t hurt. Although, we can’t give him any information. You can’t tell him what will happen to him or even hint at it.”

“You’re right. But I can try to convince him, anyway.”

Jack nodded to her. “How is Victoria taking it?”

“Not great. I got her to sleep. Once she wakes up and realizes Randolph is still in custody, I can imagine it will send her into a tailspin.”

“I would expect so, yes.”

“I’m hoping my talk with Randolph kills two birds with one stone. Convince him to stop this charade and make sure he’s okay so I can report back to Victoria and set her mind at ease.”

Jack raised his eyebrows at the statement as he set his fork down on his plate. “You’re optimistic.”

“I’m sure I’ll fail at this, but I have to try to change this.”

“Are you going to be okay if it turns out we can’t?”

Cate froze as she considered it. “I’m not sure if okay is how I’d describe it but...” She paused, still pondering it. “At least we tried. That’s all we can do.”

Jack pressed his lips together and nodded. “I just don’t want you upset over something that we very well may not have the power to change.”

“I’m sure I’ll be upset, but we have to try. If we can’t change it, I’ll accept that.”

Jack stared at her a moment before he gathered his tray. “Well, that about does it for me. If you don’t mind, I will head home.”

Cate waved for him to set the tray down. “I don’t mind. Just leave that tray, I’ll take it down with mine.”

“And have Mrs. Fraser scold me tomorrow for making Lady Cate carry both trays? No way, lassie. I’ll take them both down myself. She’s already mad at me for breathing my bogus germs on you.”

Cate laughed as she handed her tray off. “Okay, you take them.”

Jack stacked the two trays and strode to the door, spinning to offer an extravagant bow. “Good evening, m’lady.”

Cate rolled her eyes as she held in a laugh. “Good night, Jack.”

She arose the next morning as anxious as she was the night before. She practiced her speech for Randolph over and over in her head, revising and adjusting it, attempting to create a speech that wouldn’t fail. After an hour, Riley and Bailey seemed more than convinced. She hoped her speech had the same effect on Randolph.

She tried it once more in the mirror as she dressed to meet Jack. They traveled back and made the walk into town, arriving at the police station with fifteen minutes to spare.

Cate suggested she visit with Randolph before their questioning began. At first, the police refused, but with a little convincing on Jack and Cate’s parts, they agreed to allow Cate five minutes to visit with Randolph. Jack wished her good luck with her venture, sending her into the interrogation room.

Cate sat in the small, sparsely decorated room on an uncomfortable chair. She fidgeted, trying to ease the cramp developing in her back.

An officer led Randolph through the door, his wrists in thick handcuffs. She smiled at him as he sat across from her.

"Five minutes," the officer reminded her, then stood at the door.

"May we have privacy, please?" Cate asked.

"I'm not to leave you alone with the prisoner," he answered.

"Please?" Cate asked again, "if you could step just outside the door."

With a nod of his head, the officer stepped into the hall, hovering at the entrance.

Cate turned toward Randolph, reaching for his hands. "How are you?"

He withdrew them from the table. "Catherine, you shouldn't be here."

"I had to come. I must speak with you."

Randolph shook his head at her. "Please, Catherine, go to the castle, take care of Victoria. She is, in all likelihood, beside herself with worry and distress."

Cate tapped her finger against the wooden table between them. "She is, and for no reason, Randolph."

"There is a very good reason, Catherine. Her husband has just confessed to murder. She is confused, anxious, distraught. She needs you. Go to her."

"I'd like to share good news with her once I see her."

Randolph lifted his chin, a stoic expression on his features. "I'm afraid there may be none to give."

"Why, Randolph? You are innocent. You must end this madness!"

Randolph remained silent.

Cate splayed her hands out to the sides. "Why have you done this? Who are you protecting?"

"Officer!" Randolph shouted.

"Randolph, please!" Cate pleaded. "You must listen."

The officer entered the room. "We're done here," Randolph said.

Cate shook her head, shooting him a pleading glance. "No. Randolph, don't do this."

"Mrs. MacKenzie, if you please." The officer motioned toward the door.

"I'm not finished!" Cate exclaimed.

“Go to Victoria, Catherine. We’re finished,” Randolph said.

Cate sighed as the officer approached her, making it clear the visit was over.

“Please think about it, Randolph,” Cate added before leaving the room.

She stalked to the entryway where Jack waited for her.

“Any luck?” he asked.

Cate shook her head as she cast her eyes downward. “Afraid not. He wouldn’t listen to anything I said.”

Jack sighed as he squeezed his eyes closed. “Great! Well, looks like I’m in for a fun morning.”

Given the conversation she’d just had with Randolph, she did not envy his morning. “Do what you can. I’ll see you back at the castle.”

“Be careful, Cate. Wish me luck.”

“Good luck! You’ll need it,” Cate said, giving his arm a squeeze.

She hurried down the hall, twisting to give him a wink and a wave before she pushed through the doors into the street.

She plodded out of town, her heart heavy at her failure. What would she tell Victoria? How could she rationalize Randolph’s choices? How could she assure Victoria the situation would work out? She had no answers to these questions. Her uncertainty slowed her pace to a crawl.

The castle loomed in front of her. Tears formed in her eyes, threatening to roll down her cheeks. She pursed her lips, blinking them away and taking several deep, steady breaths.

After a few moments, she had composed herself and continued toward the castle, assuring herself that she possessed the strength to survive this ordeal.

When she arrived, Thomson greeted her at the door. “Thank goodness you are here, Mrs. MacKenzie,” he said, taking her coat. “Lady MacKenzie has taken a terrible turn upon finding out Lord MacKenzie did not return last evening.”

“Oh, no. I had hoped she wouldn’t become too upset over it before I could be here.”

“Please go to her room. Perhaps your visit will cheer her.”

“I will and I hope so. Thank you, Thomson.”

Cate wound through the halls to Victoria’s suite. She knocked at the door and Bryson ushered her into the room.

“Thank goodness you’ve come, Mrs. MacKenzie. She’s been like this all morning,” Bryson said, wringing her hands.

Victoria sat propped in her armchair, her complexion pale and her lips white. She stared straight ahead with glazed eyes.

Cate winced before she plastered on a weak smile and glanced at the ladies’ maid. “Thank you, Bryson. You may go.”

Bryson nodded to her, glancing toward Victoria before exiting.

Cate approached Victoria, kneeling beside the chair, taking her hand, and gently rubbing it. “Victoria. Victoria? It’s Catherine.”

After a gentle shake, Victoria blinked a few times, focusing on Cate. “Catherine! Is Randolph with you?”

“No,” Cate said. “He is with Jack. They are at the police station.”

Victoria’s eyes filled with tears. “Oh,” she cried.

She patted the woman’s hand. “Do not worry, Victoria. Jack is with him. He’ll take care of Randolph.”

Victoria buried her face in her hands. “He spent his entire night in jail.”

Cate eased into the chair next to Victoria’s. “Yes, he did. Jack did all he could, but he could not convince them to release Randolph last night. I’m sorry, Victoria.”

Victoria wiped at the tears on her cheeks. “Please don’t apologize, Catherine. I know Jack is doing all he can, and I thank him for it. However, I cannot dismiss my anguish over Randolph.”

“I understand. I can imagine how worried you must be. But, Victoria, you must remain strong for Randolph’s sake.”

Victoria dried her tears with her handkerchief as she sniffled.

Cate offered a fleeting smile. “I saw Randolph this morning. He looked well, tired but all right. He was, however, concerned about you.”

Victoria’s sobbing intensified. “Just like Randolph,” she croaked. “Always worried for someone else. Oh, Catherine, I cannot believe he is a murderer. Am I being foolish?”

Cate reached out, rubbing Victoria’s arm. “No, Victoria, you are not. I do not believe it either and neither does Jack. I do not understand why he confessed, but I am certain Randolph is no murderer.”

Victoria clasped Cate’s hand in hers, forcing a smile onto her tear-stained face. “Thank you, Catherine.”

“I’d like to be able to tell Randolph that you are doing all right under the circumstances and allow him to focus on himself.”

“Yes,” Victoria said, sniffing then breaking down in sobs again.

Cate perched on the arm of Victoria’s chair, wrapping her in an embrace.

After a moment, Victoria patted Cate’s arm. “Thank you, dear Catherine.” She dried her eyes again, sniffing. “Thank you. You are right, I must be strong. I can be with your support.”

She returned the hug. “Oh, I must look a fright.”

Cate smoothed Victoria’s hair, wiping away a few tear stains. “Why don’t you splash some cool water on your face? You’ll feel better.”

Victoria nodded, rising from the chair and wandering into the bedroom. She poured water from her pitcher into the basin and cleaned her face.

Cate smiled at her as she patted her face dry. “Shall we get you dressed?”

“Yes, perhaps then my mood will improve.”

“I understand how upsetting this is, but you must remain strong for Randolph and your son, Ethan.”

“He is too young to understand.”

“But he can sense your upset, the upset of the household. He’ll need your strength now more than ever.”

“How do you do it, Catherine? How do you remain so positive and focused? My head feels as though my brains have been scrambled.”

Cate pondered her question a moment. “When I was younger, my parents passed away in an unexpected accident. The shock left me the same feelings you are experiencing, but I realized I had no choice but to continue moving on with my life.”

Cate approached Victoria, grabbing her hands. “I do, however, understand what you mean. But give yourself time, Victoria, the shock will pass.”

“Oh, Catherine, I’m so sorry, I did not know. You’ve never mentioned about your parents.”

Cate shook her head, dismissing it. “No need for an apology. Now, let’s pick a dress that will brighten your day.”

“Perhaps something in blue, not too ostentatious given the circumstances but not depressing.”

“We’ll get through this, Victoria.”

“Thank you, Catherine.”

Victoria called for Bryson. Cate helped Victoria dress and when Bryson arrived, she tamed Victoria's hair into a low bun. Victoria asked her to have tea sent to the solarium and to have Ethan brought there. Victoria, at Cate's encouragement, wanted to keep her son close.

The two spent an hour fussing over Ethan and sipping tea. Victoria smiled once or twice during the visit. The time spent with her infant seemed to improve her mood.

As the noon hour approached, Thomson entered. He informed Victoria that Cook wanted to speak with her regarding the menu for the week. Victoria excused herself, leaving Ethan on Cate's lap.

As she departed, Thomson turned to Cate. "Mrs. MacKenzie," he whispered, "I wanted Lady Mackenzie distracted. Mr. MacKenzie has returned. He has asked to see you. I'm afraid the news may not be good. I did not want to upset Lady MacKenzie."

"Thank you, Thomson," Cate said. "I will take Ethan and meet him in the library."

"He is waiting in the foyer."

Cate gathered the child into her arms and made her way to the foyer to collect Jack.

"Oh, Cate, I hope Thomson was discreet," Jack said as she approached.

"He was. Victoria is distracted, let's talk in the library."

They hurried down the hall, shutting themselves inside to speak.

"What's happened?" Cate asked once in private.

"It's not good, Cate. I mean, it's not terrible, but it's not good." Cate waited for him to continue. He shook his head. "The questioning did not go well. He's giving conflicting information."

"That's not good."

Jack sighed and shook his head. "Unfortunately, that's the good news. His conflicting information has the police unsure. They haven't charged him yet, but I'm not sure how much longer we can avoid it. I'd guess a formal charge is coming this afternoon, tomorrow morning at the latest."

Cate sighed, her shoulders sagging. "We need a plan."

"You aren't kidding, one that is Randolph-proof."

Cate furrowed her brow as she patted the child's back. "What do you mean?"

"He's impossible. I suggested he consult with a more experienced attorney in these types of cases before plowing ahead with his admission of guilt.”

“And?”

“And he flat-out said no. Then threatened to fire me if I didn’t do what he wanted.” Jack rolled his eyes as he ran his fingers through his hair.

“I cannot believe he is being so stubborn! How frustrating,” Cate said with a shake of her head. “How are you holding up?”

“I don’t know. It’s incredibly aggravating, but then again, I’m making this up as I go. I feel like I live on a bad episode of a legal drama.”

Cate sighed, squeezing his arm in a show of support. “What now?”

“Unless he’s charged, there’s not much.”

“Do you need to return to the police station?”

“There’s no need for me to return today, but I’m not sure I want to face Victoria. Thomson seemed to think the mere sight of me may cause a fit.”

“She is doing better than when I arrived this morning, but yes, Thomson may be right. I’m afraid the slightest thing will send her reeling.”

“Ah, what a mess. Can’t he see what this is doing to his wife?” Jack asked, throwing his arms in the air.

Cate brooded over the situation. “Why is he protecting this other woman at Victoria’s expense?”

After a moment, Cate’s gloomy expression changed, her eyes becoming bright, her lips parting in excitement. “Jack! Do you suppose you could go to the station and make sure they don’t charge Randolph until tomorrow morning at the earliest?”

Jack’s brow furrowed. “I’m not sure I can pull that off, but I can try. Why?”

“I have an idea. It would require us to return this evening, but I have an idea.”

Cate grinned up at Jack as her mind raced ahead with her plan.

Jack opened his mouth to follow up with a question when Thomson knocked then entered the room.

“Pardon the interruption, but Lady MacKenzie is finishing up with Cook. Perhaps you should return to the solarium, Mrs. MacKenzie.”

Cate nodded at him. “Thank you, Thomson.”

Thomson nodded then exited, closing the doors behind him.

“I’d better go.”

Jack heaved a sigh. “I’ll do what I can at the police station then come back for you. Cate, I’m not going to like this idea you have, am I?”

“Not one bit.”

Jack puckered his lips and shook his head. “I was afraid of that. Can’t wait to hear it so I can really detest it. Wish me luck!” He gave her a salute as he left the room.

“Good luck!” she called after him.

Cate returned to the solarium, prior to Victoria and settling herself with the baby before her hostess returned.

Victoria suggested they move to the dining room for lunch. The ladies lunched, trying to keep conversation light.

As they finished their meal, Thomson arrived again. “Pardon me, Lady MacKenzie, Mrs. MacKenzie, Mr. MacKenzie has returned.”

Victoria’s eyes grew wide. “Send him in at once.”

“Yes, Lady MacKenzie.” Thompson nodded, leaving the room to fetch Jack.

Within moments, Thomson appeared with Jack in tow. Cate stared at him for some sign about what happened at the station. Jack gave her a slight nod. Cate breathed a silent sigh of relief. He pulled it off, she didn’t know how, but he must have.

Victoria perched on the edge of her chair. “What news of my husband?”

“The police have questioned him extensively. There will be no formal charge made for at least the next twenty-four hours.”

“Will he be returning home?”

“Not yet. But I hope soon,” Jack answered her.

“This is good news, Victoria,” Cate said, placing her hand on Victoria’s arm.

Victoria didn’t look convinced but nodded her head at Cate, placing her hand over Cate’s.

After a moment, she turned to Jack. “Have you eaten anything?”

Jack took a seat across from Victoria. “No, ma’am.”

“Oh, let me have something sent up. You must be famished!”

Cate shared a smile with Jack as Victoria rang for service. With encouraging news, she seemed to be returning to her old self.

Cate hoped her plan worked, so the trend continued. She hated to see vivacious Victoria reduced to a lonely hermit.

Victoria had sandwiches sent up for Jack which he ate with vigor, starved from the morning’s events.

As he finished, wiping the corners of his mouth, he thanked Victoria for the lunch. “And I’m sorry to seem ungracious but I have a few things I must attend to. Catherine, we should go and allow Victoria a chance to rest.”

Victoria’s forehead crinkled. “Oh, must you?”

“I’m afraid we must,” Jack answered for the both of them as he placed his hand over Victoria’s. “We’ll be back bright and early tomorrow morning, I promise. There is nothing to worry about, Victoria. Please try to rest, this will all be over soon.”

Victoria clasped his hand in hers, also reaching for Cate’s. “Thank you, both of you.”

Cate squeezed the woman’s hand. “Jack’s right, Victoria, you should rest. This is taking a tremendous toll on you. Please promise you’ll rest.”

“I shall try. Although, I worry about Randolph. I do wish he was home.”

“I tried my best...” Jack began.

Victoria waved her hand in the air, stopping him. “I understand and appreciate all that you’ve done. I’m not suggesting there is a deficiency with your work, Jack. But I would be more settled with Randolph at home. Still, I promise to rest.”

“Good. As Jack said, we’ll be here tomorrow morning.”

“Let me ring for Nanny to take Ethan.”

Cate rose and balanced the baby on her hip. “Oh, let me take him to the nursery. We’ll show ourselves out afterward.”

“Are you certain?” Victoria asked.

Cate answered her with a nod.

“Thank you, Catherine. I shall see you tomorrow.” Victoria embraced Jack then Cate, giving Cate a kiss on the cheek.

Cate and Jack took Ethan to the nursery then used a discreet path to get to the closet and return home. Jack breathed his customary sigh of relief after they were back.

“I’m dying to know how you pulled off your legal coup,” Cate exclaimed as they returned.

“And I’m dying to know your plan to save a man who doesn’t want to be saved,” Jack answered.

“Meet in the library?” they chimed in unison.

Cate laughed. “Yes, after we change, of course.”

“Of course,” Jack said with a chuckle.

After greeting Riley and Bailey, Cate undressed, stripping off her dress and undergarments in favor of modern clothes. Once changed, she and the pups made their way to the library to meet Jack.

“Hey, buddy!” Jack exclaimed as Riley bounded over to him. “I missed you! Did you miss me?”

“I expect he did, despite us only being gone for...” Cate checked her timepiece. “Twenty-four minutes.”

“This time differential is killing me. I’ve eaten lunch already, and it’s only 9 a.m.”

Cate sank into her usual armchair. “I know the feeling. Okay, I can’t take any more suspense. How did you pull off the delay in the formal charges being filed?”

Jack collapsed into the armchair next to her. “I threw everything I could at them. Told them he was under duress, tired and not thinking straight. I reminded them that his story did not add up and they needed to consider other suspects because of that. Then I threatened them about a few procedural things, and they agreed to hold off.”

“Wow, you must have been doing your homework. Been watching Law & Order, huh?”

Jack chuckled as he kicked his feet up on the coffee table. “Yep. Okay, your turn. I’m dying to learn how you plan to fix this.”

“Randolph will not cooperate, we know that. So, it’s on us to take matters into our own hands.”

Jack’s eyes narrowed and he searched the ceiling for a higher power to assist him. “I’m alarmed already.”

“We need to learn more about Sonia, about what motive she may have had and why Randolph would go to such lengths to protect her. Randolph isn’t going to offer us any information.”

“So, what do you propose we do? Give him truth serum?”

“No,” Cate said, shaking her head. “I propose we ask Sonia.”

Jack’s feet returned to the floor as he leapt forward in the chair. “Ask Sonia?!”

“Yes. Assuming she hasn’t run away yet, she should still be in the tower room. We must ask her who she is and what happened that night. She must have killed Andrew. He fell from the tower, or so it appeared. He must have been with her, and she must have killed him. We have a key. We’ll take it back this evening, speak with Sonia, learn what we can and come up with a plan to proceed.”

Jack balanced his elbows on his knees as he vetted the plan. “What makes you assume she’ll talk to you?”

“We must convince her. I think she will.”

“Why would she? How are you so sure?”

“Well,” Cate conjectured, pondering a moment, “she only has contact with the servant or servants who care for her. Randolph is gone. It was clear she was fond of him. She’s got to be reeling, just like Victoria. Only she has no support system like Victoria has. The servants cannot provide her with any help, they have no means to. She may be more accommodating than we expect.”

Jack sucked in a deep breath as he considered it. “It’s a gamble.”

“There isn’t much choice.”

“You’re right. You want to do this tonight?”

“I think it may be best. Perhaps we can sneak back when most of the household is quiet. Then we’ll have some time before we return tomorrow to sort through whatever information we receive and devise a plan.”

Jack pursed his lips, contemplating for a moment before he nodded. “Okay, agreed.”

“Wow, that was easy!”

“You make a good point. And my legal skills leave a lot to be desired. With Randolph’s reckless behavior, he will go to jail. I can’t stop it unless we gather more information. I don’t want to be responsible for ruining Randolph’s life.”

Cate leaned forward, grabbing Jack’s hand. “You wouldn’t be responsible, even if we can’t stop this. Randolph is calling the shots. There’s not much you can do.”

“Thanks, Cate. But I still can’t help but feel somewhat responsible, considering I am the man’s legal counsel.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped and her face fell. “I’m sorry about that. I feel terrible having put you in that position.”

“Don’t. I could have refused, but I wouldn’t have.”

“We didn’t have to use the cover story we did. That’s what thrust you into this position.”

“I’d still be in this position. He refuses to have any legal counsel. He’s only accepting my help because it would seem awkward to Victoria if he didn’t accept ‘Cousin Jack’s’ help.”

Cate smiled at Jack. “Thanks for being a good sport about it.”

Jack rose to his feet and stretched. “No problem, Lady Cate. Now, I suppose some work awaits me.”

“Maybe you should rest first? Catch a nap?”

“I’ll be all right. I’ll take a quick nap after dinner before we travel back tonight.”

“Sounds good. See you later... around eight?”

“Perfect. See you then, Cate.”

Jack left Cate in the library. She slouched into the chair, putting her feet up on the table in front of her, trying to plan how to spend her hours before their second time-travel trip. She’d need a distraction.

She climbed to her feet and collected the dogs, heading outside to the loch for the morning.

Following her lunch, Cate scoured the castle for clues about Sonia. She searched the tower room again. She re-read the note to Randolph, stared at the sketch she had drawn of him. She searched through any documents she could find from the era for even the hint of a reference to the mysterious Sonia. She hoped to find something she could use to further the conversation she planned for this evening. She came up empty.

Cate cursed the lack of information. It did little to help her form a course of action for appealing to Sonia. They would walk into the situation blind. And nothing could be done about it. It could not be avoided. Information or not, they must confront Sonia and convince her to supply any information she could to aid in resolving the crisis with Randolph.

Cate took the dogs for another walk before dinner, hoping the crisp air would clear her head. She settled on a strategy of appealing to Sonia's esteem for Randolph. She hoped it worked. They were quickly running out of options.

As she waited for evening to approach, she browsed around on her laptop, finding an email from Molly.

Cate! I shipped the first set of boxes over to you yesterday! They should arrive within the next ten days. Would you let me know when you get them?

I heard from Gayle, too. She has the ball rolling on the paperwork for me to move. This is starting to feel so real now. I'm counting the days down.

And I told my sister! She called me over the weekend to ask me if I was coming for Thanksgiving (after she told me she didn't know where she'd put everybody!). I told her I was too busy to come and would have a quiet Thanksgiving alone. When she asked what I was too busy with, I told her I was packing to move... TO SCOTLAND. I also told her I won't be there for Christmas since I will be at my new home in a SCOTTISH CASTLE!!! I don't think I've ever heard that woman speechless, but I did on Sunday!

Well, I should get back to work. I'm counting the days down until I blow this joint, too! Jeff has me doing a complete overhaul of the office 'to prepare it for the new person', painful 'til the bitter end.

Rolling my eyes

Talk to you soon, Molly

The slight distraction brought a smile to Cate's face. With each passing day, she grew more excited for Molly's arrival. She typed a reply, answering all Molly's questions and reminded her not to forget to shop for a Christmas party dress while she was looking for more Scotland sweaters.

The email left Cate with a renewed sense of purpose and drive. She closed her laptop and climbed off the bed to dress for the trip. Tired from their big day, Riley and Bailey never moved from their slumber, curled together in Riley's bed.

Cate slipped her crinoline underskirts on then her hooped skirt dress. She fixed her hair and put the finishing touches on her outfit. She gave both pups a kiss on the forehead, earning a large sigh from Riley as he stretched and settled back in.

"I won't be too long, I hope," she promised him.

She retrieved the tower room key before joining Jack in the closet to return to 1856. They snuck out of the bedroom and down the hall, creeping toward the tower stairs. They made it unscathed and began the climb to the tower.

As they approached the top, Jack asked, "Are you sure about this?"

"We don't have a choice. There are things we must learn, and confronting Sonia is the only way we will learn them."

Jack shook his head, raising his eyebrows. "You're one brave but stubborn lassie, Cate."

"I will take that as a compliment. Let's go, before I lose my nerve."

They climbed the last few steps to the tower door. Cate drew in a deep breath, inserted the key and turned it. Her heart pounded in her chest as she twisted the knob. She took one last deep breath before opening the door.

CHAPTER 30

Cate peered inside as the door swung open. In this century, the room was unrecognizable. Instead of piled boxes and bare floors, the tower housed a bed, dresser, writing desk, an easel, and a large area rug. Candles burned inside, lighting the room. Black fabric covered the windows, shutting out any light from the outside. The only similarity was the large wardrobe, placed in the same spot as it was in Cate's time.

A woman crouched at the wardrobe. She swung around to face them, peering at them with piercing blue eyes. Black hair framed a young, teenaged face. She stood and her green cape, tattered and frayed, swirled around her ankles.

"Who are you?" she demanded.

Cate stepped into the room, pulling Jack in with her and shutting the door behind them. "We're friends of Randolph's. I'm Cate and this is Jack. Jack is representing Randolph in the case the police are building against him for the murder of Andrew Forsythe. Sonia, is it?"

The mention of the murder investigation perturbed the woman. "Will he be cleared of the charges?"

"That is our goal, but we need your help," Cate said.

"My help?"

Cate nodded at her. "Yes. You must tell us what really happened that night."

The woman turned her back to them, wringing her hands. "I do not know what you mean."

Cate shook her head as she approached the girl. "Sonia, we don't have time for evasive answers. If we don't have the facts, we cannot help Randolph. Sonia, he'll go to jail! You don't want that, I know it."

Sonia collapsed onto the bed, tears falling from her eyes.

Cate hurried to her and eased onto the mattress. "Sonia, please help us!"

Sonia wiped the tears from her cheeks. "How do I know I can trust you?"

"We're here to help, both you and Randolph. We realize Randolph has been protecting you, both by keeping you in the tower room and by confessing to a crime he didn't commit. What we don't understand is why. We need to understand that to help him."

Sonia remained silent, licking her lips as she wrung her hands again.

"Sonia, please. Right now, we are your only friends. We only want to help. By the looks of it, you need it. Were you running away? Randolph will be devastated to find out you're missing."

Sonia nodded her head, tears threatening again. "I must go. I've cost this family too much now."

Cate grasped her hands and squeezed. "Randolph will be devastated if you leave. We can help, but we must have all the facts. Please, help us help you and Randolph."

Sonia shook her head, tears welling. "Please, you mustn't tell anyone about me. Only Uncle Randolph and a handful of people know I'm here. Not even his wife Victoria is aware."

Cate glanced at Jack. "Uncle Randolph?"

Sonia wiped away the tears that had fallen to her cheeks. "Yes, Randolph is my uncle."

Cate crinkled her brow. "Are you Lorne's daughter?"

Sonia shook her head. "No, Emilia was my mother."

"Emilia? Randolph's younger sister? But she died from influenza at age fifteen. I wasn't aware she was married nor had any children."

Sonia cast her eyes downward to her lap. "I'm afraid that's the story created to hide me, the ugly blemish on the family name."

"You mean..." Cate began.

"Yes, my mother died at age fifteen but not from influenza, she died in childbirth. I was a bastard. She was unmarried. My grandparents preferred that I be an orphan. Although that's a fair bit better than my paternal grandparents wanted for me. Uncle Randolph wouldn't allow it. He insisted

I stay here, argued with his parents. They couldn't explain the new baby without questions being asked. My father's family wanted no part of me, nor any potential for scandal on the family name. Uncle Randolph kept me a secret. Oh, please don't judge him for putting me in this room. I've been more than comfortable."

Cate stroked the girl's hair. "I understand, and we will say nothing, but you must promise not to leave. We can make sure you remain safe. Now, can you tell me what happened the night Andrew died?"

Sonia's face pinched as more tears fell from her eyes.

"Shh, shh." Cate soothed her. "I realize how hard this must be, but we need to understand the facts so we can help you both."

Sonia nodded again, breathing deeply, and composing herself. "Andrew used to bring me some of my meals. He was a vile man. Accused me of being many vulgar things. He blackmailed Uncle Randolph. At first, he paid, but Andrew demanded more and more. I felt so terrible. I almost left then. I wish I had."

"I'm sure Randolph is pleased you didn't leave."

"I do not agree," Sonia sobbed.

"It's all right, Sonia," Cate said, rubbing her arm, "please, continue."

"That night, that horrible night," Sonia lamented. "Andrew came here. He seemed different. Worse than ever, angry and bitter. He... He..."

Sonia stumbled, unable to find the words. "He attacked me," she managed, a few more tears rolling down her cheeks. "He ripped my dress. Said that he'd have his way with me, too, like Randolph. Uncle Randolph never hurt me. Not like that."

Sonia choked out her words amidst tears, struggling to tell the story. "He..."

Cate pressed her lips together in a thin line, understand the meaning of her words. She patted the girl's arm. "We understand, Sonia. You then defended yourself?"

Relieved of any sharing any of the lurid details, Sonia sucked in a deep breath. "Yes. I grabbed the first thing my hand reached and hit him."

Her shoulders sagged, and she sobbed as she continued. "I hit him. I hit him over and over until he didn't move."

Cate wrapped her arms around the girl and held her. "It's all right, Sonia. It's over now. You did nothing wrong."

She glanced at Jack who shook his head in disgust over Andrew's behavior.

After a moment, Cate prodded her to continue. "How did Andrew end up falling from the window?"

"Anna, one of the maids who has always been a loyal friend to me, helped me throw his body over. I didn't know what to do. I did not want Uncle Randolph to see what I had done. Perhaps he would have regretted his choice to help me. We struggled but succeeded in pushing him out the window nearest to this bed. I hoped it would appear as an accident. As though he had jumped. Then Anna assisted me in cleaning up the... mess. When Uncle Randolph told me the police were involved, I prayed they would find it to be an accident. But now..." her voice trailed off again.

Cate patted her shoulder. "I don't want you to worry, Sonia. We're here to help."

Sonia dried her tears. "I don't see how."

"Leave that to us. Can we trust you not to leave?"

"I imagine it would be easier if I did," Sonia argued.

"It wouldn't. Randolph will never forgive himself. Please promise us you'll stay, at least until you speak with us again."

Sonia nodded as she sniffled. "I promise. I will stay... for now."

Cate offered her a smile at the decision. "Sonia, before we go, is there anything else you can tell us about Andrew that might help us?"

Sonia reflected for a moment. "Andrew was not a nice man. He was involved in many nefarious things. I often spied him meeting with a man, exchanging things in the middle of the night. I am not aware of what the exact nature of their business was, but I cannot imagine it was anything respectable being conducted in the wee hours of the morning."

"Thank you, Sonia. That is helpful. I apologize for making you relive that night, but I assure you things will improve."

"Thank you for trying to help. And for not judging my past."

Cate stroked her hair. Hidden away for her entire life and made to believe she was a blight on her family, Cate pitied her. They needed a plan to help her.

"Try to rest, Sonia. We'll visit again when we have a solution."

"Please let it be soon," Sonia said, squeezing Cate's hand.

Cate helped the girl remove her tattered cape and settled her in bed. She blew out the candles that lit the room before she and Jack snuck from the room. She shut and locked the door behind her before they returned to the closet and their own time.

“That poor girl,” Cate declared upon their return.

Jack shook his head. “And that bastard Andrew.”

“Yes. We must come up with a solution. We have to help them!”

“I’d love to, I don’t know how we can, though. I’m at a loss. Unless we turn her in for it and hope we can prove self-defense, I don’t see a way out of this.”

Cate sank onto the edge of the bed outside the time rip location. “There must be a way. I need time to deliberate. Perhaps we should discuss this after breakfast and see if we have any ideas.”

Jack yawned. “Good idea. Despite all the excitement, I’m exhausted. I don’t think I can put an idea together. It’s cutting it close though, we’ve got to be back tomorrow afternoon. They will charge Randolph, there’s no avoiding it.”

“Okay.” Cate squeezed his arm. “Don’t worry, we’ll find a way. Try to get some rest. Are you okay to drive home?”

“Yeah, yeah, I can make it,” Jack answered. “Hey, you try to get some rest, too. Don’t be up all night scheming.”

“Who, me? Never! See you tomorrow.”

“Yes, you, Lady Cate. See you tomorrow.”

They parted ways, with Cate returning to her room. Riley and Bailey leapt up to greet her as she entered. Despite her weariness from the long day, worry clouded her mind. They had no plan to fix the situation and they were running out of time.

Cate shook her head as tears threatened to spill onto her cheeks. She remained on her chaise for another forty-five minutes after she changed before surrendering to her growing sleepiness. She climbed into bed, drained and no closer to a solution. Despite her upset, she fell asleep within minutes.

Cate bolted upright in bed, gasping for breath. Confused, she sat dumbfounded for a few moments. As her breathing calmed and her mind settled, she realized the source of her distress.

A strange dream had disturbed her otherwise restful slumber. She and Jack had been at the castle in 1856. Sonia was there, visiting. Randolph entertained them with stories of his exotic travel. Victoria discussed an upcoming party. Andrew arrived, threatening to ruin all plans, but in the end, he dissolved away to nothing, blowing away like smoke in the wind.

Cate clutched at the covers as the silly dream left her unsettled. She slid from under the sheets and out of bed. Her bare feet touched the cold floor, jarring her awake further.

Moonlight drenched the room. She took a few moments to stare out over the glowing landscape. Something about the dream bothered her, she found herself unable to shake it from her mind. She paced the floor for a few moments.

As she settled onto her chaise, a notion struck her. She leapt up, her breath quickening. After a few moments of pondering, a smile crept across Cate's face.

It was an unusual idea, but it just might work. She couldn't wait to tell Jack. She hoped he agreed. At the very least, they had a direction to move in and a plan they could try.

Excited but still tired, Cate crawled back into bed. Satisfied with her strategy, she fell back asleep and slept until her alarm.

The morning sun brightened the sky, painting it a rainbow of reds, oranges, and yellows. The vivid display matched Cate's sunny mood. She sprang from her bed, rushing to dress for the day. After a brief trip outside with Riley and Bailey, she made her way to the kitchen. She greeted Mrs. Fraser with a happy grin, picking up her breakfast for the morning to take upstairs. She hoped she could finish it without bursting from excitement.

After breakfast, she returned her dishes despite Mrs. Fraser's protests and gathered Jack in the name of estate business. He followed her upstairs where they settled in the library. Taking a deep breath, Cate said, grinning, "I have a plan!"

"Great! I came up with nothing, so I'm all ears. I can't believe it, but I'm all ears for a Cate Kensie plan."

"Keep an open mind. I don't have all the quirks sorted out, but I think it might work."

Cate spent the next hour detailing her plan to Jack. They discussed it at length, debating various aspects, revising minor details, adjusting pieces, gauging reactions from other parties and settling final elements. When they were satisfied, they glanced at each other.

"Well, Lady Cate, it's crazy but it just might work."

CHAPTER 31

Cate and Jack sat in the armchairs as each of them considered the plan Cate had outlined.

“Gosh, I hope this works,” Cate said. “We have to act fast, though, we don’t have much time.”

“You’re right. We need to get things in place before I’m due at the police station. They will file charges against Randolph this afternoon unless we can convince them not to. The only way we can do that is to convince Randolph to recant his story. And the only way he’ll do that is if he knows Sonia is safe.”

“Will retracting his confession be enough for the police to dismiss him as a suspect?”

Jack shrugged his shoulders as he drummed his fingers against the chair’s leather. “Perhaps not outright, but it should shed enough confusion that they will consider other suspects. At least I hope so.”

“Well, it’s our only option, so let’s change and do this.”

“Okay. And if you’ve got any good luck charms, now’s the time to carry them, Lady Cate. Meet you in the usual spot!”

“See you in a few!”

They separated, each going to don their era-appropriate apparel. Cate changed in record time, selecting the least fussy dress that she had to make their tasks easier. When she was ready, she met Jack in the bedroom closet. He paced the floor, anxiously awaiting her.

“Second thoughts?”

“Nope, not one. Just anxious to get moving.”

“Me, too,” Cate agreed. “Let’s go.”

Together, they rubbed the watch, sliding back over one hundred and fifty years. When they arrived, they hurried straight to the tower room.

Cate unlocked it and they hastened inside, closing the door behind them. The first step of their plan required them to convince Sonia to trust them and follow their direction.

“Cate!” Sonia exclaimed. “I spent much of my night wondering if I had dreamt you and wondering if you would return.”

“We are real,” Cate assured her, “and we have a plan.”

Sonia listened intently as Cate outlined their plan, summarizing the highlights and positive outcomes. “Do you think this will work?” she asked.

“Yes, it will work,” Cate pledged, “it has to.”

“I trust her,” Jack chimed in. “We’ll make it work.”

Sonia nodded. “All right, then let us proceed.”

“Good. Come along.” Cate stood, pulling Sonia to her feet. “We must gather your things and move you.”

Between the three of them, they assembled Sonia’s limited possessions, placing them in a suitcase.

“Follow me,” Cate said to Sonia, lugging the suitcase with her.

“Be safe,” Jack said as they stepped onto the stone stairs.

Cate nodded at him. “I’ll be back as soon as I can to help.”

“Okay. I’ll do what I can before you’re back.”

Cate led Sonia through the halls, avoiding any contact with other occupants of the castle. They arrived at their destination, a bedroom closet in an unused bedroom.

She situated Sonia in the closet, making her as comfortable as possible. “Stay here until either Jack or I come for you. Try to stay quiet. No one should be in here but just in case.”

“I have been hidden for years. I know how to remain unseen.”

Cate fussed with a pillow as she shot her a glance. “You’re right, sorry. Well, with any luck, we’ll be back soon.”

Sonia squeezed her hand and offered her an encouraging nod. “Go, Cate. And thank you.”

Cate smiled at her before she darted from the room, racing to the tower to finish helping Jack. By the time Cate returned, he had already stripped the bed, pushed the desk and dresser near the door and rolled up the area rug. He had also removed the blackout curtains from the window.

Cate’s eyes widened as she marveled at his progress. “Wow, great job so far!”

“Are you sure you’re able to do this in that outfit?”

“I’ll try. I picked a less cumbersome dress just for the occasion. Come on, we’ll move the desk first.”

“Right,” Jack said, positioning himself behind the desk, allowing Cate to take the front and walk facing forward. “Ready?”

“Ready. Straight to the unused bedroom.”

“And hope no one is there. Okay, on three.” Jack counted to three, and they lifted the desk. They managed to wrangle it down the stairs without too much effort, tucking it away in an unused bedroom near the tower stairs.

They climbed the steps again, repeating the process with the dresser. This heavier item they stowed in the storage room a few steps down from the tower room.

They dismantled the bed, shoving the mattress in the same storage room as the dresser and stacking the frame in the corner of the room. Next, they shifted several boxes from the storage area into the tower, shoving them in various locations to make it appear to be used for storage.

Cate huffed as she sank onto the top of a trunk they had dragged into the area. She wiped a few beads of sweat from her brow as she caught her breath. “Okay, part one of the plan finished. Sonia is moved, and the tower room is dismantled. No one would suspect someone has lived here for over a decade.”

“Now on to part two. You ready?” Jack asked, holding out his hand to pull Cate up to standing.

Cate grabbed his hand and let him pull her to her feet. “As I’ll ever be!”

They made their way out of the castle and began the trek to town. They approached the police station and entered. Jack asked to see Randolph, stating Cate wanted to visit with Randolph first then he wanted a few moments with his client.

The desk clerk disappeared into an office for a moment then returned. "Mrs. MacKenzie, if you'll follow me."

Jack gave her a nod of encouragement as she followed the clerk to the interview room.

She drummed her fingers against the table as she awaited his arrival.

Moments later, an officer led Randolph into the room. Still in handcuffs, he plopped into a chair across from Cate.

"Five minutes," the officer warned before stepping out.

"Catherine, lovely to see you, but you should be with Victoria."

"No time to waste with niceties, Randolph," Cate whispered. "We have a plan, I'll explain it quickly, but you must trust me and do as I say."

Randolph screwed up his face. "Plan?"

"Yes, listen carefully. I won't have time to repeat this."

Cate explained the plan to Randolph in as much detail as time allowed. Randolph's jaw unhinged as she described the details. He sat stunned for a moment when she finished.

"And Sonia is safe?"

"Safe as houses," Cate said, using a popular Victorian phrase.

"Catherine, that's one hell of a plan. Do you suppose it will work?"

"I hope so. I had to be creative, you put us in one heck of a mess with your confession!"

Randolph pressed his lips together and cocked his head. "Apologies, dear lady, but I will not allow Sonia's safety to be compromised."

"Admirable, Randolph, but we must also consider your wife's and child's lives. This plan offers everyone a chance at happiness. Now, we just have to hope it works."

The officer returned to the room. "Time's up."

"Take care, Randolph, and listen to Jack," Cate said as she stood and exited room.

She passed Jack as she ambled down the hall on his way to consult with his "client." She reached for his hand, smiling and giving it a squeeze as they passed each other.

"Good luck!" she mouthed.

Jack grinned at her and winked. "Showtime!" he whispered.

Cate pushed through the doors into the chilly autumn day, beginning her walk back to the castle. She would return to provide Victoria with as much comfort as she could while they awaited the next phase of their plan to play out.

Nervous butterflies flitted in her stomach as she wondered how the events played out in the police station.

She glanced up at the castle standing tall in front of it, hoping for the residents inside today would mark a change in their luck.

She approached the rambling structure, giving the door knocker a solid smack.

Thomson greeted her, guiding her into the house. “Lady MacKenzie will be so pleased to see you.”

Cate followed him to Victoria’s suite.

“Lady MacKenzie, Mrs. MacKenzie has arrived.”

“Catherine! Come in!”

“Hello, Victoria,” Cate said, entering the room and offering the woman a hug.

“Please sit down. Tea?” Victoria offered, motioning to the tea set already on the table.

Cate sank into a chair at the table as Victoria poured her a cup. “Thank you.”

Victoria pressed a shaky hand against her forehead. “I’m so thankful you are here. I’m a bundle of nerves.”

“Jack is at the station now. I hope he brings good news with him today.”

“As do I. I’m so unsure.” Her voice broke as she shook her head.

Cate grasped her hand. “Victoria...” Cate began.

“No, no,” Victoria interrupted, “I must press on. Must keep my head up.” She raised her chin as she selected a biscuit from the tray and nibbled the corner.

“There is nothing to fret over yet. Save your strength, you may not even need to fret! Jack has a plan.”

“Let us hope and pray that is the case. I trust Jack.”

Cate pulled one of the cookies from the tray. “Shall we change the subject?”

“Please,” Victoria said.

They chatted about whatever struck Victoria’s fancy over tea. As late afternoon approached, conversation became intermittent as Cate’s mind became distracted by the lateness of the hour. The women moved to the sitting room, enjoying some time with Ethan. Several more tedious hours passed. The nanny took Ethan for his evening feeding and bath, leaving Cate and Victoria on their own to pass the time again.

After another hour, Cate feared for her sanity, sure the waiting would drive her mad.

“Should Jack’s plan be taking this long? Oh, what if they’ve charged him?” Victoria cried.

Cate feared the same, but she patted Victoria’s hand and plastered a smile onto her face. “We haven’t any news yet. No news may be good news.”

“But...” Victoria began when there were sounds from the foyer. Cate and Victoria shared a glance, before both of them raced from the room.

Victoria’s eyes widened as she hurried through the doors into the foyer. “Randolph!” she exclaimed, rushing to him. “Oh, my darling husband.”

She threw her arms around his neck in a full embrace. “How are you? Have they mistreated you?”

Randolph wrapped her in a tight embrace. “Victoria, I’m fine, just fine.”

Cate’s heart melted at the scene she witnessed from the doorway. She glanced at Jack with a soft smile, her heart about to burst with excitement. While interested to know the details, the current result satisfied her.

Victoria released Randolph, twisting to pull Jack into an embrace. “How can I ever thank you, Cousin Jack? You have my eternal gratitude.”

Jack patted her shoulder. “We’re not out of the woods yet, to coin a phrase from my wife, but most of the difficulty has passed. The investigation’s focus should move from Randolph. They shouldn’t trouble you anymore.”

Victoria took a step back, wiping tears from her cheeks. “Oh, what a spectacle I am.”

Randolph motioned toward the doorway. “Shall we go into the sitting room? I could use a drink.”

“As could I,” Jack agreed.

Randolph followed Cate inside, aiming for the drink cart. He poured two full glasses, offering one to Jack before he pulled the cord on the wall to summon Thomson.

The butler entered to inquire after their needs.

“Champagne,” Randolph ordered, “four glasses. We are celebrating tonight!”

Thomson, a joyous smile on his otherwise stuffy features, left to oversee the request.

Once delivered, poured, and each of them held a glass, Randolph toasted, "To Jack. Catherine, your husband is a legal genius."

They all raised their glasses to Jack.

"Well, I don't know about that, sir," Jack said, after sipping his champagne. "But you certainly tested my mettle."

"No need to be modest, boy. You got me out of quite a tight spot. I made a serious miscalculation, and you handled it with ease."

"We can never repay you, either of you, cousins," Victoria said. "Catherine, you are to be commended, too. Were it not for you, I wouldn't have survived. And Jack, dear Jack, I cannot thank you enough."

"It is our pleasure," Jack answered for the both of them. "Besides, I had to help Randolph. I needed a favor from him."

"We'll do anything, just name it," Victoria said.

"Thank you for being so accommodating without yet knowing the request," Jack said.

"I know the request and I hardly think we're being overly accommodating," Randolph said.

"You know it?" Victoria asked, cocking her head.

"I do." Randolph nodded. "We had plenty of time to discuss it while the police sorted through things."

"Are you both going to play coy? What is it?"

CHAPTER 32

All eyes turned to Jack as they awaited his request. The last piece of the plan, Cate waited with bated breath for it to fall into place.

Jack pressed his lips together, setting his champagne glass on the coffee table in front of him. "I've just learned my niece, Sonia, my sister's child, has been orphaned. My sister died birthing Sonia, and now my brother-in-law has passed away in an accident."

"Oh, how terrible for the poor child," Victoria lamented.

"Yes, it is most unfortunate. As her next-of-kin, the duty falls to me to look after her. With my need to travel, it may become difficult. While I realize the imposition a request of this magnitude places on you, I beseeched Randolph if she may spend some time at the castle until such time that Catherine and I are settled and can take her in. Perhaps, she could provide companionship for you, Victoria."

Victoria straightened, waving her hand in the air. "Imposition? Nonsense! She is family. There's no imposition at all. We would welcome her. How delightful to meet a new family member."

Randolph eased onto the sofa next to his wife. "I concur. It's poppycock to think it an imposition!"

"What is her age?" Victoria inquired.

"She is nearly sixteen," Jack answered.

Victoria clapped her hands together, a grin forming on her features. "Oh, what fun we shall have! You were right to come to us. She should not be unsettled, traveling about the country at this age. She must be guided, supported, and trained. We shall make sure she is raised to make a fine match and become a true lady. Do not give it a second thought, cousins. I will see to it all. When will she arrive?"

"In fact, she is already here. I traveled to retrieve her last evening, returning early this morning with Sonia."

Victoria's eyes lit as plans formed in her mind. "Oh, you must send for her at once! And I must send for my dressmaker. We must buy her a new dress or two, perhaps even three, for the upcoming holiday season. We will travel to London. We will attend many holiday parties before and after the new year."

"As you can see, Cousin Jack," Randolph said, "my wife has the situation well in hand."

Jack chuckled at the statement. "Yes. It appears so. In all seriousness, I am fortunate to count you as family."

"Well, I agree with my wife. Sonia should be sent for at once. I shall tell Thomson to set an extra place for dinner. Please, cousin, might you retrieve her tonight?"

"I should be glad to." Jack rose and bowed to them.

"Oh, Randolph, please have Mrs. Carmichael prepare the bedroom down the hall from mine for Sonia. You don't mind if she stays with us beginning tonight, do you, cousin Jack?"

"Not at all. It would be preferable that she become settled prior to our departure. This would give her a few weeks to become comfortable while we are here to visit. I shall retrieve her now." Jack nodded at them again before he strode from the room.

Randolph crossed behind him, ringing for the butler and instructing him to arrange for Jack's niece, Sonia, to join them for dinner and to stay with them going forward.

Cate sat on pins and needles waiting for Jack's return with Sonia. If the current situation with the police held out, this would solve the last issue. It would be impossible to tell until she spoke with Jack how likely it was that the investigation would close without further troubling the MacKenzie household.

After what seemed an eternity to Cate, Jack arrived.

He stepped into the sitting room and tugged forward a waif of a girl. "May I present my niece, Sonia Morgan."

Sonia stepped around him, glancing shyly at Victoria then Randolph.

“Sonia, my dear child, come in. Please, call me Uncle Randolph.”

“I should like that, Uncle Randolph,” Sonia said, her voice barely above a whisper.

Jack guided her forward as Victoria rose.

“Sonia, welcome!” She approached the girl and embraced her, adding a kiss on her cheek. “I am your Aunt Victoria. We are so pleased to welcome you into our family and our home. Please, come and sit down.” Victoria led her to the loveseat to sit. “Your journey was no doubt taxing on you. Are you exhausted from it?”

“I am rather tired,” Sonia admitted.

Cate assumed the source of her weariness was from worry rather than travel.

“Poor child. We shall go to dinner soon, you can retire afterwards to rest. I’ve had a bedroom prepared for you near mine. I look so forward to your stay. We shall have such fun together, Sonia!” Victoria held Sonia’s hands in hers, offering a wide, bright smile.

“Thank you for your graciousness, Aunt Victoria,” Sonia answered.

“There is no need for gratitude, Sonia. We are family. Oh, I hope you enjoy fashion. I cannot wait to have my dressmaker in for an appointment with you. You are a very pretty girl,” Victoria said, fussing with her hair. “Your complexion is light but very attractive. You shall do well in bold colors.”

“I shall be excited to have a new dress of any color.”

Victoria beamed at her. “Oh, no my dear, not a new dress. We shall buy many new dresses for you. You shall need them. We shall attend many events.”

Sonia smiled for the first time, a full, genuine smile. Cate found herself also smiling at the scene. Sonia would now live a full life. Victoria would have a friend and companion. She would no longer feel lonely, far from her old life and friends. All that remained was for the police to clear Randolph of all charges and close the case. Cate hoped it was only a matter of time.

The group enjoyed the rest of their evening. Victoria already began her training of Sonia during dinner, prompting the girl to sit properly, holding her utensils as a lady should and how to make light, entertaining conversation. She reminded Sonia that she, one day, would host her own dinner parties as the lady of a household.

Following dinner, Victoria excused herself to settle Sonia in her new room. Cate tagged along to help. Before the ladies departed, Sonia offered Jack a tight hug and a sincere thank you.

“How touching,” Victoria said to Cate. “Do not worry, cousin Jack, she shall be well taken care of. Come, Sonia, let us get you settled in your new bed.”

Cate and Victoria led Sonia to her new room. She marveled at it, asking Victoria if it was really hers. Victoria assured her it was.

Bryson had set out the few items Sonia brought. Victoria assessed them, then sent Bryson to fetch another nightgown from Victoria’s collection, claiming the one Sonia had “simply wouldn’t do.”

After dressing her in the new nightgown, Victoria settled her in bed. Cate gave Sonia a warm hug which Sonia returned along with a thank you. After a few more moments of fussing, Victoria and Cate left Sonia to sleep.

“What a dear child she is,” Victoria said as they returned to the sitting room. “Do not worry, Catherine, I shall check on her in a bit to be sure she is settled. I sometimes find myself unable to sleep in a new location so I shall know just what to do.”

“She is lucky to have you now, Victoria,” Cate said.

“She has not enjoyed the presence of a mother before, poor child, and one can tell. But do not worry, I shall have her up to snuff by next season for her debut.”

Cate smiled as they entered the sitting room, rejoining Randolph and Jack.

“Have her all settled, my dear?” Randolph asked.

“Settled and snug in her new bed,” Victoria answered. “And do not worry, cousin Jack, as I told Catherine, I shall have Sonia prepared to make a fine match in short order. She shall have the upbringing of a fine lady. Oh, Jack, has she any musical training? It is sometimes a good skill for young ladies to possess. It makes them seem clever.”

“I do not believe she has, Victoria,” Jack answered.

“Randolph, we should arrange for her to learn piano-forte. I do hope she might show some skill for it. We shall see!”

Randolph waved a hand in the air. “Of course, my dear. Whatever you suggest.”

“I shall make a list.”

“Wonderful, my dear,” Randolph said before turning to address Jack. “Well, cousin, as you can see, we have the situation well in hand. I hope this sets your mind at ease.”

“It does, sir, it does. I shall feel most comfortable leaving her in your care. You have taken a great weight from my mind.”

“We both appreciate it very much,” Cate chimed in. “We shall take our leave for the evening. It has been a trying day, I’m sure you both would like to relax.”

“Indeed,” Victoria answered, “as has it been for both of you. Please get some rest. Will you visit tomorrow?”

“Yes,” Jack said. “I’d like to see how Sonia has settled. Perhaps we shall stop in the afternoon for tea.”

“We shall look forward to seeing you then,” Randolph agreed. “I shall walk you to the door.”

They left Victoria in the sitting room while Randolph led them to the foyer. “Jack, Catherine, I cannot thank you enough. I shall forever be in your debt.”

“Save your thanks for when we are sure you are cleared of all charges, Randolph,” Jack said.

Randolph clapped him on the back. “All in due time, my boy, all in due time. Now, I shall see you tomorrow. You should have an unfettered path to your destination if you go now.”

“See you tomorrow, Randolph,” Cate said.

They ascended the stairs, winding through the halls to the bedroom closet. They used the timepiece to return to their time.

Jack breathed his customary sigh of relief.

“WOW!” Cate exclaimed, her hands balling into fists that she waved in the air. “I want to hear all about it.”

Jack sighed and shook his head, collapsing onto the bed in the bedroom. “I want to take a nap. Whew, I can’t believe it’s only been an hour.”

Cate’s shoulders slumped and she pouted at him. “Oh, come on, I’ve been waiting all day.”

Jack waved a finger in the air. “Actually, you’ve only been waiting an hour.”

“How are you not excited?”

Jack chuckled as he propped himself up on his elbows. “Okay, okay. I’ll admit it, it felt rather good helping both Randolph and Sonia today.”

“Rather good? That’s it?” Cate asked, raising her eyebrows.

Jack’s face twisted into a happy smile. “It felt pretty damned good.”

“So, out with it!”

Jack tugged at his collar. “At least let me change first!”

“Okay, okay... Library?”

Jack nodded as he pulled himself up to his feet. “As usual, Lady Cate.”

Cate hurried from the room, tearing off her dress and changing into her regular clothes. She gathered the dogs with her and rushed to the library.

Jack joined her moments later. “Wow, Lady Cate, you beat me. You must be anxious to hear this story!”

Cate twisted in her seat, tapping her hands against the back of the chair as he made his way over. “I am! I don’t understand how you did it, Jack. Now, come on, tell me every detail! Don’t leave anything out.”

“Okay, okay,” Jack agreed, sinking into an armchair. Cate perched on the edge of hers with bated breath. “It wasn’t too difficult. Once Randolph stopped insisting he was guilty, I succeeded in convincing the police to consider other suspects.”

“Did it take any convincing on your part?”

Jack threaded his fingers together and clutched them around his neck. “Only an assurance that Sonia was safe. I told him you had seen to it yourself, that you’d never let anything happen to the girl.”

Cate shook her head and shrugged. “And then what? He just told the police to cancel his confession?”

“No, it was more difficult than that. He recanted his statement. The police were not happy. They reviewed his statement over and over from when he confessed and his subsequent questioning. We pointed out all the inconsistencies, which they themselves questioned on both occasions. Then I asked them to review the original statements taken from the night of the party. Randolph’s new statement matched that one and the other witness testimony. They realized, as we did when we went through the same exercise, that it was impossible for Randolph to have killed Andrew.”

“So, he’s off the hook, right?”

“Well, they asked him not to leave the area just yet and they haven’t officially removed him from the suspect list, but I expect it’s only a matter of time. Still, we should check back until he is no longer considered a suspect. Or until the investigation is closed, assuming that’s before the end of the year.”

“Wait, did I just hear you suggest we should time travel?”

Jack laughed as he drummed his hands against the chair’s arms. “Yes, my dear Lady Cate, I suggested it. I want to see this through. It’s my first big legal win.”

Cate cocked her head at him, giving him a coy smile. “Yes, apparently you are quite the legal genius.”

Jack jabbed at finger at her. “You know it.”

“Did the police mention any other suspects?”

“Yes, they did. I inquired after telling them I hoped my client would no longer be bothered by this. They said they may poke around the grounds but doubted they would find much.”

“Because it’s been too long since the murder?”

“No, they didn’t presume the murder weapon was on the estate.”

Cate furrowed her brow at the statement. She realized they hadn’t ever found the weapon since she had, but why hadn’t they looked?

CHAPTER 33

Cate raised her eyebrows in surprise. “Really? They don’t think they’ll find the murder weapon?”

“Yes. From the eyewitness accounts of that night, several people told the police they had seen Andrew meeting with another man earlier that evening. The man wasn’t someone anyone was acquainted with, but they had seen him with Andrew once or twice before. They appeared to be arguing. The police assume the man was an associate of Andrew’s and murdered him over whatever they were arguing about.”

Jack nodded at her as he kicked his feet up on the coffee table. “Right. Probably the same man. Based on his description, the police suspect he was a rather disreputable fellow. They assume Andrew was involved in some nefarious things and it cost him his life.”

Cate twirled a lock of hair around her finger. “Wonder what will happen when they find him, and he says he’s innocent. He may even have an alibi.”

“I doubt they’ll ever find him. With the trouble, he’s probably long gone never to return to avoid any suspicion.”

“Gosh, I hope so,” Cate said, chewing her lower lip.

Jack waved a hand at her. “Relax, Cate, we stand a good chance. And a far better chance than we did when Randolph was professing his guilt.”

Cate contemplated for a moment. “Hmm, wow, I still can’t believe this worked.”

He shot a glance at her. "Hey! What do you mean you can't believe it worked? You insisted this plan would work!"

Cate pulled her feet up onto the chair with a shrug. "Well, I hoped it would work, but now that it did, I'm shocked it went so smoothly. I mean, Randolph confessed, he was insistent. Then he just recanted, and they accepted it."

"They had no choice. His confession was questionable from the start. That's why I had such an easy time getting them to agree not to charge him right away. Even they questioned if it would stick."

"Wow," Cate whispered, stunned into silence after considering the breadth of the situation.

"Now it's just a waiting game to get the all clear, which I hope comes soon."

"Me, too. You know, we're approaching the end of the year, it's sad to realize we won't be able to visit anymore."

Jack nodded, a wistful expression on his face. "Yes, I can't believe I'm about to admit to this, but I will miss them."

"Me, too," Cate said with a sigh. "Oh, well, I suppose we should start our day... again."

"I suppose so. I'll tell you one thing I won't miss is living two days in the time of only one," Jack said as he hauled himself to his feet.

"You and me both. It's evening to me but we haven't even had lunch yet. At least it's helping my terrible sleep habits. I sleep the entire night!"

"And it only took time travel to cure your insomnia. Who would have ever guessed traveling through time would benefit one's health."

Cate gave him an amused look. "Back to research for me and preparing for Molly's arrival."

"Have you heard from her? I'll bet she is excited."

"I have. She's already sent some of her things."

"I'll bet she would have stayed here and never gone back if she could have."

"I agree. She's counting the days down."

Jack stretched and strode toward the door. "Well, let me know when her things arrive, I'll get them moved. If you need anything else done before she's due here, let me know, I'll get right on it."

"Thanks, Jack."

Jack left her in the library. Cate sat for another few moments, pondering the results of the last few days. After a time, she roused herself from her daze, deciding to take the dogs for a long walk.

After the walk and lunch, she settled in the library determined to make progress on a chapter of her book. Before beginning, she checked her email, finding the latest report from Molly awaiting her.

Hi Cate– More boxes on their way to you. One more round should do it! Gayle also helped me book my ticket. I am arriving in London on December 15 and will take the train to Scotland on December 16. I think she’s planning to contact you to see if it would be best for me to rent a car and drive or have Jack come for me. I’m fine either way, I’ll be on cloud nine, you just tell me which is best for you.

I’m wrapping things up in the office with my “complete inventory.” Soon, I’ll just be finishing my time. Jeff is already interviewing for my replacement so I can train them before I leave.

And I saved the best news for last. I ran into Tom yesterday at the grocery store. He tried to play the nice guy, you know, “hi, how are you, how have you been” blah, blah. I told him great, I don’t think he believed me. So, I informed him why I was doing great. I told him I quit my job and wouldn’t be in my place much longer. Then I dropped the bombshell about my moving to Scotland. I’m not sure who was more shocked, my sister or Tom. I don’t care, but I had a good time telling both of them.

Anyway, only five more weeks!!!!!!!!!!

Molly

Molly’s excitement bounced off the screen. With her arrival less than a week from the Christmas extravaganza, Cate thought it best to have Jack collect Molly rather than fuss with a rental car.

She sent the information back in an email to Molly and pressed send. An email from Gayle arrived moments later, requesting similar information and Cate responded with the same.

While visiting 1856, Cate had discovered several pieces of information that she deemed interesting for her book. Her personal experience in the past gave her a new perspective. Her book would be one-of-a-kind with its unique information.

She spent her afternoon and evening penning a chapter, her mind able to focus after solving the issue with Randolph. Cate turned in early, sleeping without issue given her long day.

The following morning, Cate longed to return to check on the situation in 1856. Concern plagued her. She wondered how Sonia was adjusting, how Victoria was, if there was any further trouble for Randolph.

She questioned how she would handle it when she could no longer visit with them. It was heart breaking for her. Still, as of now, she could visit with them and would meet them today. She focused on this idea as she watched Riley and Bailey frolic near the loch.

After lunch, she readied herself, meeting Jack in the bedroom closet at 3:30 p.m. They slowed the timepiece and returned to Randolph and Victoria's time. They traversed the back passages of the castle to the outside then the front door. Thomson greeted them, showing them into the solarium for tea. They found Victoria and Sonia already seated, discussing a schedule of plans for Sonia's musical education. Sonia wore one of Victoria's gowns. Her hair coiffed in a becoming style with a matching ribbon.

As they entered, Sonia stood, curtsying. "Good day, Uncle Jack and Aunt Catherine."

Victoria smiled and nodded, as the girl took her seat again. She beamed to Cate and Jack, giving them a wink. "Come in and sit down, cousins. Sonia and I were just discussing furthering her education. She is keen on learning an instrument."

"Hello, Sonia. You look well," Cate said.

"Indeed," Jack added, "how was your first night in the castle?"

"Splendid," Sonia answered. Her eyes sparkled with renewed interest in life. "I slept well. The bed's most comfortable."

"I had Bryson alter this dress for her," Victoria said. "To tide her over until my dressmaker can create some new things for her. The color does well on her. It always made me sallow. Would you agree, Catherine?"

"Quite fitting," Cate concurred.

“I’ve already sent for the dressmaker and to acquire a piano-forte instructor. Sonia may be keen on learning a language, too. She is quite clever,” Victoria said.

Jack smiled at them. “I’m so pleased.”

Randolph strode into the room, joining them at the table. “Well, cousins, I’m so pleased you could join us.”

Jack stood, shaking his hand. “Randolph, Sonia looks well. I am so pleased with Victoria’s plans for her.”

“As am I!” Randolph admitted as both men seated themselves. “I am afraid, however, I have some bad news.”

Cate’s heart skipped a beat and the color drained from her face. “Oh no, what is it?”

“I shall no longer require your legal counsel, Jack. The police have cleared me of the murder and removed me from the suspect list. I know how you shall miss sparring with them.”

“That’s fantastic news, Randolph,” Jack said, clapping him on the back. “Although, I will miss the scrapping.”

“I could do without it,” Victoria noted with a wrinkle of her nose.

“What of the case?” Jack asked.

“They are searching for some dubious character by the name of Simon Dupree. Involved in all sorts of scandal, that one. He was seen on the property multiple times, including the fateful night. I doubt the police will ever catch up with him. Long gone at the first hint of trouble, I’m sure.”

“Undoubtedly,” Jack agreed.

“Please may we speak of something lighter?” Victoria pleaded.

“Agree,” Cate chimed in.

The group of five spent the rest of their meal engaging in light conversation.

A twinge of sadness shot through Cate with each passing moment. With the case settled and the year drawing to a close, she inched closer to being unable to visit with her new friends.

The fact was made even more real when Jack announced his business would conclude within the next two weeks and they would leave the area. Victoria expressed her disappointment but encouraged them to visit. They promised to try, but Cate realized full well this was an empty pledge.

At the conclusion of their evening, Randolph offered to walk Cate and Jack to the door, mentioning he would like a moment alone with the couple before they departed. They strode to his office, and he closed the door behind them.

“With the year drawing to a close,” Randolph began, “I suppose we shan’t be meeting much more.”

“Sadly, no,” Cate said. “As the new year arrives, the time clock will reset, as I understand it. Therefore, our travels using this specific rip would bring us back to relive this same year.”

“Correct,” Randolph agreed.

Cate was silent for a moment, composing herself. “I... that is, we...” she stumbled. “I wish there was another way. It would be nice to visit.”

“I cannot offer any solutions. But perhaps...” he began.

Cate’s eyebrows shot up. “Yes?”

“You may find it helpful to consult with Douglas. To this day, I do not understand how he tamed the power in this castle.”

“Douglas MacKenzie, the original castle owner?” Jack asked.

“Yes, old Doug, my grandfather. A crafty bugger, that one. If anyone can find you a way, he can.”

“I promise to look into that!” Cate vowed.

Jack slid his eyes closed and shook his head. “Please, sir, don’t encourage her.”

“Ah, laddie, apologies, but my encouragement or lack of will not change her mind.”

“Probably not,” Jack answered.

“Definitely not. She’s a MacKenzie, we’re a strong-willed lot!” Randolph waved his fist in the air.

“You’ve got that right,” Jack agreed.

“I for one am glad of it. Without her willfulness, I may be in prison.”

Jack nodded at him, cocking his head. “Aye, that’s a likely bet, sir.”

“On that note, I wanted to say thank you. Thank you to both of you. I cannot ever repay you for what you’ve done.”

“There’s no repayment necessary, Randolph,” Cate said with a wide smile. “We are so pleased to have helped.”

“Even so, my family and I are indebted to you. And now, before this moment turns maudlin, particularly for Catherine, let us part ways. I hope to see you at least one more time before the year is out.”

“You will,” Cate promised.

“So, it’s goodbye for now, Catherine and Jack. Until we meet again,” Randolph said.

They said their goodbyes, promising to see each other at least once more before Jack and Cate returned to the closet and their own time. Cate spent the rest of her evening glum, knowing they would soon say goodbye for good to her ancestors. She held on to the hope that one day she would meet Douglas MacKenzie and perhaps devise a way to return to visit with Randolph and Victoria as their lives continued.

As the month of November continued, Cate spent most of her time researching and planning for the upcoming Christmas event and Molly’s arrival. With the year drawing to a close, Cate’s time to visit with Randolph and Victoria also grew short. She and Jack found the time mid-month to take one last trip to 1856. Good fortune continued for the MacKenzies of 1856. The police abandoned any hope of finding Andrew’s killer. While the case remained unsolved, it had more or less been forgotten, written off as a senseless tragedy among a den of thieves.

They said their goodbyes, stating that, after a brief tour of Britain, they would return to the United States. Cate’s eyes welled with tears as she said goodbye to Victoria, Randolph, Sonia and little Ethan, presuming it would be the last time she would see them.

After returning home, Cate dug out the folder containing the articles Mrs. Campbell provided her alerting her to the murder. With a shaky hand, she opened the folder. The article titled “MURDER AT DUNHAVEN CASTLE” sat on top of the pile. Cate dug further into the stack of photocopies, searching for the articles discussing the investigation and subsequent trial and conviction of Randolph. She shuffled through the papers. Near the end of the stack, she found what she was hunting. The article that announced Randolph’s conviction now read “MURDER REMAINS UNSOLVED: SUSPECT SOUGHT.” Cate skimmed the article. It reported that after a lengthy investigation, which cleared Randolph of all charges, a new suspect had been sought. A known associate of Mr. Forsythe was the top suspect. Anyone having any information should contact the police.

On the top of the page, an article detailed an upcoming party given in the honor of Sonia MacKenzie, cousin to Lord and Lady MacKenzie, at the castle. Cate smiled at the new headlines. They had made a difference. She set the papers on her night table, intending to share them with Jack in the morning.

She spent the next several weeks frequenting the portrait gallery, where she felt close to her ancestors. She spent time staring at the portraits of Victoria and Randolph, wishing them the best.

As the month came to a close, Cate filled her time with research, meetings with Mrs. Campbell and preparing for Molly's arrival in two short weeks. Anticipation for Molly's arrival occupied Cate's mind, easing her tendency to dwell on those she had left behind.

During their latest meeting, Mrs. Campbell left a folder with Cate containing another set of articles about Dunhaven Castle's past. That night, Cate climbed into bed. With a dog nestled on either side of her, she opened the folder. It contained several news clippings that Mrs. Campbell put together for Cate's research.

Cate grabbed the first article from the top of the stack. Her eyes widened as she read the headline. The paper, marked from the year 1925, announced in block letters: THEFT AT DUNHAVEN CASTLE. Cate cocked her head to the side. "Well, this looks interesting," she said, settling back to discover her next mystery.

The shadowy figure raced away from the sprawling castle's dark facade. The crescent moon overhead barely lit the form as it crossed the surrounding hills. Only the massive gemstones caught the light as they fled from Dunhaven Castle with the family's heirloom jewels.

Lady Catherine Kensie bit her lower lip as she tugged her cardigan tighter against the chilly December weather, imagining the scene that occurred on a dark winter's night almost a century ago. She chuckled to herself as she realized it probably happened nothing like that.

"What do you think, boys?" she asked her two furry friends, Riley and Bailey, who sniffed a set of bushes edging the path. "Is that how the theft occurred?"

Cate glanced up at the castle rising above her, blocking the afternoon sun. A shiver passed through Cate as the wind blew past her. She shoved her hands in her pockets, her shoulders rising toward her ears.

"Yikes, come on, boys! It's getting too cold out here!"

She entered through the kitchen, greeting Mrs. Fraser who was busy preparing dinner for the evening.

"Brr, it's cold out there!" Cate said as she ushered the dogs into the room.

"Aye, it is. And we haven't even gotten to real winter yet!"

"I hope Molly packed warm clothes. It'll be quite a change for her coming from the States."

Mrs. Fraser set out utensils on Cate's tray. "Less than a week. I bet she's excited."

"She is," Cate answered. "There are more and more exclamation points with every email."

Mrs. Fraser wiped her hands on her apron before she tugged open the oven's door. "Heading up to work on your book?"

"Yes. I'm going to try to get a few paragraphs in before dinner."

"Good luck, Lady Cate!" Mrs. Fraser called as Cate ushered the two dogs up to the library, where she planned to complete work on her book before dinner.

Cate plopped into the desk's chair and tugged her laptop open before she pulled her notebook over. She smiled as she perused her notes, most of which consisted of information from when she'd met her ancestors, Randolph and Victoria MacKenzie, while time traveling with her estate manager, Jack Reid, to solve a centuries-old murder.

With a deep breath, she set the notebook aside and typed up a first draft of her experiences. She closed her laptop as Mrs. Fraser flitted into the room and slid her dinner tray onto the coffee table across the room.

After thanking her housekeeper for the meal delivery, she sank into the supple leather of the armchair near the fireplace. Flames danced inside, warming the two dogs napping nearby.

Cate stared down at the manila folder on the coffee table as she pulled her tray onto her lap. She tugged it onto the chair's arm and flicked it open. A set of articles from Isla Campbell, the town's librarian and historical society president, stared back at her.

She stared at the thick black words making up the headline: THEFT AT DUNHAVEN CASTLE.

Cate re-read the article, detailing a theft that occurred on New Year's Day in 1925. Someone had stolen two expensive heirloom necklaces as the family slept off the New Year's Eve festivities.

Cate flipped through the other articles supplied by Mrs. Campbell, all of them connected to the theft and the subsequent investigation. Neither the jewels nor the culprit were ever found.

As Mrs. Fraser returned to collect her tray, Cate closed the folder. "Oh, thank you, Mrs. Fraser. I wish you'd let me return these myself."

"Nay, I wouldn't hear of it, Lady Cate. Besides, in a matter of days, I can have that whippersnapper, Molly, running up for it." Mrs. Fraser chuckled, winking at Cate.

Cate grinned at her as she slid the folder onto the coffee table. “Good plan.”

“Aye, no rest for her when she comes. Now, is there anything else I can fetch for you, Lady Cate?”

“No, Mrs. Fraser, nothing at all. Please enjoy the rest of your evening.”

“You do the same, Lady Cate. I plan to pack a few things this evening for our upcoming stay.”

“I’m so glad you and Mr. Fraser decided to spend the holiday season here at the castle. I know the cottage is close, but it will make things so much easier for you. Not to mention that I’m ecstatic to have you here.”

“With the party and the guests, it sure will,” Mrs. Fraser answered. “And I must say, I am quite looking forward to those parties.”

“I am, too, although,” Cate said as she glanced at her phone’s calendar, “I am not looking forward to all these meetings with Mrs. Campbell about it.”

“The first party is only ten days away, Lady Cate. After the new year, you can relax.”

“Yes, the Snow Ball is creeping up on us. And with the New Year’s Eve VIP party right on its heels, my schedule is packed. How did I let her talk me into two major events in two weeks?”

“You’re too soft, that’s how!” Mrs. Fraser said with a wink.

“Gosh, I hope so. Well, have a good evening, Mrs. Fraser.”

The woman bustled from the room with the remains of Cate’s meal. Cate’s eyes fell onto the folder again and she flipped through it one more time. Her mind turned to the upcoming conversation she planned to have with Jack about the theft.

He’d likely want to leave the past in the past. But she couldn’t help but be curious about what had happened.

She flicked the folder closed. It would be an uphill battle to convince Jack to investigate, but she felt prepared to make her case.

She gathered both pups, carrying them to her room and settling in near the cozy fire for a night of reading.

Cate bounded out of bed the next morning, ready to discuss her latest project with Jack. The chill in the morning air chased her back into the castle after a brief time outside with the dogs. She enjoyed her breakfast, warmed by the fire in the library.

After breakfast, she gathered her materials about the theft and wandered the castle in search of Jack. She came upon him near the ballroom, adjusting a few artificial Christmas trees near the doors leading inside the room.

“Good morning,” she said as he crawled from under one of the trees.

“Good morning, Lady Cate. Would you mind doing me a great favor, lassie?”

“Not at all. What do you need?”

“Tell me, does this tree grouping look acceptable? I don’t want any mistakes before the party czar shows up tomorrow.”

Cate giggled at his nickname for Mrs. Campbell. She stepped back to inspect the tree placement from all angles. “It looks acceptable to me.”

Jack climbed from the floor, dusting his hands off. “No doubt, she’ll still find something wrong about it.”

Cate chuckled as she wobbled the folder back and forth behind her back. “Now that you’ve got your tree placement worked out, could I have a moment of your time?”

“Sure, lassie, what is it?”

Cate whipped the folder out in front of her.

Before she could speak, Jack said, “Oh, no. No, no. If this is about that bloody snow machine the party czar wants, the answer is no. I will not have a snow machine dragged onto these grounds...”

Cate shook her head, waving her hands in the air to stop him. “No, no, it’s not. Although you may prefer it was.”

“Oh, no. Worse than the snow machine?”

Cate crinkled her nose. “Not to me but...”

“The only thing worse than dragging a snow machine through the gardens of Dunhaven Castle is time travel.”

“You’re such a stick in the mud,” Cate complained. “Just take a peek at these articles.”

He waved his hands at her, dismissing her comment, but accepted the folder. He flipped it open, glancing through the articles. He snapped it shut, handing it back to her.

She raised an eyebrow at him. “Well?”

“Well, it appears due to a very unfortunate turn of events, some of your inheritance was stolen, Lady Cate. I dare say you’ll do alright without it. I’ve seen the estate’s financials. You should be able to get by.” He winked at her.

She rolled her eyes at him and shook her head. “You know very well my interest in this has little to do with recovering my lost inheritance.”

“Yes, yes,” Jack replied. “Righting wrongs and experiencing the past by living in it and all that, I know.”

“Oh, come on, you had to have noticed the interesting bit about the missing items at least.”

Jack raised his eyebrows at her. “Interesting bit?”

“Yes, they describe the missing pieces of jewelry in the first article. And the third article has a picture of the items. Notice anything?” Cate asked as she retrieved the pages from the folder.

“They’re very pretty, Lady Cate.”

Jack studied it before shrugging his shoulders. “I’m still not getting it.”

Cate frowned at him. “Jack, that’s the necklace I wore to the Halloween Ball that Randolph and Victoria held when we investigated the murder!”

“Ohhhhh,” Jack responded. “Oh, yes, I remember it. It was quite a necklace.”

Cate nodded as she stuffed the paper back inside the folder. “Yes, it was. I recognized it right away when I saw it. It was Victoria’s. It appears the other stolen piece was also hers. It’s the necklace she wore that night.”

“Whoever stole those made off with a fortune.”

“Yes, and it would have broken Victoria’s heart to realize someone stole her jewelry.”

Jack inched one tree a bit to the left. “Yes, it would have. A terrible shame.”

“You know this year is one of the ones we can travel to. Well, the year when they discovered the jewelry was missing. It appears to have been stolen on New Year’s Day. While everyone was sleeping after ringing in the New Year, someone else was busy helping themselves to the family jewels. I wonder...”

“Nay, Lady Cate,” Jack interrupted her. “I don’t like when you wonder. Your wondering gets us in trouble most times.”

Cate shook her head at him. “That’s not true.”

“It is! The last time you wondered, we went back to 1856, became embroiled in a murder investigation, almost got killed and...”

“And solved a murder and saved my ancestor’s life and reputation. Along with the life of a young woman!” Cate finished.

Jack scowled at her. “That’s not exactly where I was going with that.”

“But it’s true,” Cate added. “Wouldn’t it be wonderful to solve another mystery? Stop a theft? Help the family again?”

“Oh, Cate,” Jack replied, shaking his head at her.

“Consider this: whatever progress we make on finding the lost jewels of Dunhaven Castle distracts me from finding a link to Douglas MacKenzie. If I can’t find a link to Douglas MacKenzie, I can’t determine how he’s harnessed the castle’s powers. And if I can’t determine how he’s harnessed the castle’s powers, we’re stuck only traveling to times with locations we know of!”

Jack winced as he reshaped a branch. “You’ve still not got that comment from Randolph out of your head, huh?”

“I haven’t,” Cate admitted. “Randolph was Douglas’ grandson. In two generations, they lost the secret of how Douglas harnessed time travel? Did he never tell them? Was it kept secret? If so, why? Oh! To have a conversation with Douglas...”

Jack shook his head at her. “I’ll never understand your mind, Lady Cate.”

“Oh, come on. You can’t tell me these questions don’t cross your mind.”

“I can and I will, lassie. These questions have never crossed my mind. I’ve no desire to play with a power we don’t fully understand and can cause tremendous damage.”

“I’m not planning to damage the past irreparably,” Cate promised.

Jack took a few steps back, rubbing his chin as he studied the grouping of trees. “Whether you plan to or not, it could happen. We have no idea what might damage the past irreparably. And it’s not just that, Lady Cate. If anyone ever discovers this secret, do you realize the danger the entire world may be in? Not to mention us! I don’t like time traveling to begin with, but we may be damn lucky that we’ve only got a limited ability. Let’s not push too far and chance more things going wrong.”

“So, we’ll just focus on the jewelry heist then?”

Jack threw his hands in the air, flicking his gaze toward her. “Bah, Lady Cate, how do you always manage to turn my adamant arguments against all your plans into agreement with them?”

A grin spread across her face. “It’s a talent, I suppose.”

“I’d call it something different,” Jack mumbled.

“Anyway,” Cate answered, “there’s nothing we can do now. With this party fast approaching, there’s no time to travel to the past...”

“Thank heavens,” Jack interjected.

Cate grimaced at him. “And I should research more. So, you are off the hook. At least until I’ve done that.”

“Oh boy! I hope you’re busy with no time to research!”

Cate frowned as she consulted her calendar. “I do have the meeting with Isla tomorrow. That meeting will eat up most of my morning. And I’ve got to finish a few things before Molly arrives on Sunday.”

“I never imagined I’d appreciate Isla Campbell so much as I have today,” Jack said, following his statement with a loud laugh.

“Very funny. While I have her here, I’ll ask her about the theft and get some research done, anyway.” Cate arched an eyebrow at him as he frowned at her.

“As long as I live, I don’t imagine I’ll ever understand you, Lady Cate.”

“What’s hard to understand? It’s fun visiting other time periods!”

“I don’t consider it fun to chance radically changing history.”

Cate shook her head, waving her hand at him. “Oh, you worry too much.”

“Somebody’s got to do the worrying! And I’ve got to worry double, once for me and once for you!”

Cate shook her head again, but laughed. “Okay, deal. I’ll do the researching and you do the worrying. And now I’ll leave you to your trees.”

“They’re only my trees until they are set up, then they become your trees, Lady Cate.”

“I haven’t forgotten! I’m excited to decorate them over the coming week for the party. I hope we have enough lights, garland, and ornaments!”

“We’ve got boxes and boxes, don’t worry about that,” Jack answered.

Cate clapped her hands as she studied the large trees in front of her. “Good! I’ve never had a Christmas tree this big! Riley and I always had small trees in my apartment. Even when I was a kid, our trees were never this large!”

“Nothing like days of decorating to put you in the holiday spirit.”

“And hot chocolate and cookies, courtesy of Mrs. Fraser,” Cate added. “She’s got quite a lot planned for our upcoming decorating parties!”

“I’ll bet,” Jack answered. “Mrs. Fraser’s cookies. Mmm. Now, that I can get excited about.”

“Noted. Perhaps I can pack a tin of her cookies for our trips to the past. Maybe then you’ll be excited!”

“Doubt it.”

“Oh, well,” Cate said with a sigh. “I tried! Well, I should get back to work. I’ve a million details to go over before my meeting tomorrow. Have fun with the trees!”

“Will do, Lady Cate.” Jack gave her a quick salute before returning to setting up another grouping of Christmas trees on the opposite side of the doorway.

Cate wandered to the library, her mind in the clouds. Her brain whirled as she imagined outfits for their visits to the Roaring Twenties. Plenty of clothes were stored in the castle by generations past for the purposes of time travel.

She practiced conversations complete with customs and jargon from the time. Despite Jack’s reluctance, Cate’s mind surged with excitement at the idea of time travel. As a historian, she felt fully prepared for the endeavor. And despite her brush with death during their last trip, she experienced no hesitancy about jumping in headfirst with this mystery.

Besides, this one should prove much easier than the last. With only a thief on the loose, how much danger could there be?

CHAPTER 2

Cate took another glance at the folder containing the old articles, her mind flitting to the cold New Year's Day morning. She imagined a figure clad in black sneaking around the castle, slipping into Lady Anne MacKenzie's suite and removing two valuable necklaces.

Who had been the culprit? And how had they gotten away with it?

Cate's mind wandered to who may have been on the estate at the time. She stared at the folder for another moment, trying to piece together information before she wrinkled her nose. With her own parties looming over her, she didn't have time to research 1925 right now.

She shoved her research on the jewelry theft under a stack of papers at the back of the desk. Instead of pursuing her desire to dive straight into that mystery, she opened her party planning dossier. The file had grown from a small manila folder to an accordion file organizer containing several color-coded folders.

With a heavy sigh, Cate withdrew several of the folders to verify detail after endless detail concerning the upcoming event. After this, she mused, she'd have to move on to the other accordion folder, filled with information on the fast-approaching VIP event.

As she ticked off tasks on her party-planning to-do list, Cate marveled at how Mrs. Campbell kept all these details straight. During their meetings, she rarely referenced her notes, able to recall even minute details with ease off the top of her head.

Cate giggled as she read yet another memo from Mrs. Campbell asking Jack and Mr. Fraser to reconsider the use of a snowmaking machine to “add a magical ambiance” to the castle grounds. The note, written in red ink and underlined three times, highlighted the persistence of the so-called party czar. She had requested the machine four times and four times been denied her request. It didn’t seem to matter. She was like a squeaky wheel with the repeated ask.

Cate’s chuckle drew the attention of the two small pups who raced over, certain her utterance signaled a sign of distress.

“Hello, Riley and Bailey,” Cate greeted them as they danced on their hind legs. “Do you have any input concerning the battle of the snow machine?”

Riley cocked his head to the side, staring at Cate. Bailey stood on his hind legs, waving his paws up and down, issuing a high-pitched note that Cate nicknamed “singing.”

“Hmm,” Cate murmured, “I’m not sure Jack would agree.” At the sound of Jack’s name, Riley danced on his hind legs again. She chuckled at him and his love for his newfound friend.

She glanced to the mound of paperwork still awaiting her attention, then back to the two small dogs.

“This can wait until this afternoon,” she told them. “How about a nice walk?” Both dogs danced at the “w-word,” earning another chuckle from her.

She bundled herself and both dogs in warm coats and proceeded outside, ball in hand, for a sojourn around the property to fill the rest of the morning hours. As they walked, Cate took in her surroundings. She shook her head in firm disagreement with Mrs. Campbell. These grounds didn’t need a snow machine to achieve a magical ambiance.

After lunch, both dogs, tired from their walk, lounged near the roaring fire in the library, allowing Cate to finish her party-related tasks. Despite the lack of physical activity, she was spent by the time her dinner arrived.

She stuffed the folders for the VIP event into her accordion organizer just as Mrs. Fraser arrived with her tray.

“Still working on those parties, Lady Cate?” Mrs. Fraser asked as Cate cleared a spot on the desk.

“Just finishing. Wow! There are so many tiny details!”

“With that woman at the helm, there’ll be no shortage of those, without a doubt!”

Cate stood from the desk chair and stretched. “Do you have your gowns ready for both events?”

“Aye, Lady Cate. I’ve a beautiful black ball gown with a plaid sash tied in a bow for the Snow Ball. And, well...” Mrs. Fraser paused, her features reddening, “Mr. Fraser talked me into a black gown with silver sparkles for the New Year’s Eve party. Oh, I’m not sure why I allowed myself to be talked into it. At my age, marching about dressed as a disco ball.” She shook her head at herself.

“I’m sure it’s just beautiful. The sparkles are perfect for that party!”

“Oh, thank you, Lady Cate. I just hope no one considers me dressing too young for my age.”

“I’ve no doubt your gown is appropriate for you! Mr. Fraser has great taste!”

“Aye, aye, he does,” Mrs. Fraser answered with a nod. “I’ve never been to such a party before, Lady Cate. I’m at sixes and sevens about it. I cannae believe at my age I’m attending my first VIP party with the lords and ladies of the country!”

Cate grinned at Mrs. Fraser’s excitement. This made her endless cycle of party work worth it. Molly’s excitement was also building for the two parties.

Cate invited her staff as guests to both parties to allow them to enjoy the castle as she did. While Molly was excited about her new journey, her gushing about the two parties made it obvious how thrilled she was to be included.

Molly’s latest emails babbled about her gowns, being sent straight to Dunhaven, shoes, hairstyles and more. With only days to go before her arrival, Molly’s nervous energy was at an all-time high.

As she ate, Cate checked her email, finding an update from Molly. She stated she had checked into a hotel for her last night in Aberdeen. The following morning, she had an early morning flight to London. With no love lost between Molly and her current home, she was counting the hours until her flight.

Cate snickered as she blew on her soup to cool it before eating. She imagined Molly staying up all night to count the minutes down until she could kiss Aberdeen goodbye. She didn’t blame her. Molly’s surprise divorce and the subsequent fall out had made life unbearable for the normally chipper woman.

She smiled as she reflected that in a matter of days her friend would join her and settle into her new life. Cate bit her lower lip realizing her excitement for Molly's arrival might temper her enthusiasm for travel to the past. She planned to spend the next two days preparing Molly's new room. She finished her dinner and curled up afterward with a good book to relax for the evening. Her mind fought to concentrate on her book, but it wandered to Molly's arrival and daydreamed of travel to the past.

Friday arrived before Cate was ready. Despite the full night of sleep she enjoyed, nothing prepared her for Isla Campbell's party-planning meetings. After breakfast, Cate took her usual walk with Riley and Bailey before settling them in the library with a couple of bones. She planned to meet with Mrs. Campbell in the sitting room. Mrs. Campbell, not a fan of animals, would find the addition of two pups unwelcomed, so Cate made other arrangements.

Cate stood waiting at the front door twenty minutes prior to their scheduled meeting time. Mrs. Campbell had a habit of arriving at least fifteen minutes early. Often, to Mrs. Fraser's dismay, if no one was available at the front door, she'd wander through the halls until she came upon someone.

Like clockwork, Mrs. Campbell's car glided down the drive fifteen minutes early. The woman bounded out of her vehicle, dozens of folders, swatches and other party paraphernalia in hand.

Cate greeted her, stepping from the door to relieve her of some materials. "Wow! You've been hard at work."

"With only a week to go, Lady Cate," Mrs. Campbell's Scottish brogue answered, "we cannot be too careful. We must make sure everything matches perfectly. Are the trees set up?"

Cate led the way into the sitting room off the main foyer. She plopped the materials down on the loveseat. "Yes, Jack set them up yesterday. We can take a look after we've finished these details."

Mrs. Campbell nodded her head in agreement. “Yes, there are many details to check and double-check. I will not risk another debacle like the one at the Halloween party.” Mrs. Campbell gave her a knowing glance coupled with a grimace.

Cate held back laughter, recalling the so-called debacle. Mrs. Campbell had turned the delivery of red linens instead of burgundy into a Greek tragedy. After the mix-up, Mrs. Campbell was determined to avoid another “costly mistake.”

Cate, too, was determined to avoid one after the tizzy it sent Mrs. Campbell into for Halloween. She retrieved her folders from the nearby table, settling into a small space she carved out across from Mrs. Campbell.

“I wanted to begin with the linens. As I mentioned earlier, I do not want another issue. I have checked, rechecked and triple checked with the linen company.”

She groaned, dropping her head between her shoulders and rolling her eyes. “Can you imagine the issue if they bungled the linens this time? Oh! I’ve had nightmares of clashing plaids all week! I will feel so much better once they are delivered tomorrow.”

Cate offered her a smile as she picked up a fabric swatch. “I’m sure we all will. And I hope they get the selections correct. These patterns are so beautiful. They will be lovely for Christmas.”

“There is no room for error!” Mrs. Campbell said, nodding her head in agreement. “Particularly with the tight turn around between the two parties!”

Cate nodded, selecting another swatch and holding it against the first. “And with such different looks!”

Mrs. Campbell nodded as Mrs. Fraser entered the room carrying a tray.

“Can I offer you some tea, Mrs. Campbell?” Cate asked as Mrs. Fraser settled the tray on the coffee table between them.

“Oh, yes, thank you! Hello, Emily.” Mrs. Campbell nodded to the woman. “How are you? Almost out the door, eh?”

“Oh,” Mrs. Fraser responded, “I wouldn’t put it that way. I’ve got a good deal of training to provide the new lassie.”

“Oh?” Mrs. Campbell replied, playing dumb. “Lady Cate, you won’t let her retire until she’s properly trained the staff, is it?”

Cate opened her mouth to answer, but Mrs. Fraser beat her to it. “Nay, you’ve got it backwards, Isla. I won’t retire until I’m good and ready, and the new whippersnapper has a complete handle on every aspect of the estate and Lady Cate's care!"

Cate smiled at Mrs. Fraser's response. "And I will be happy to have you here every minute, Mrs. Fraser. And once you've retired, I expect you to be here often as my guest!"

"Well," Mrs. Campbell responded with a wrinkled nose, "you'll have good practice playing guest at the two parties."

Cate bit her tongue, hoping they did not need to rehash the discussion about her staff not being "up to snuff" with the VIPs.

"Aye," Mrs. Fraser agreed. "I'm looking forward to them both. Now, is there anything else, Lady Cate?"

"No, thank you, Mrs. Fraser," Cate answered.

Mrs. Fraser nodded to her, shuffling from the room.

Cate poured Mrs. Campbell a cup of tea, handing it to her along with the tongs for sugar. She offered the cookie plate to her next. "Cookie? Mrs. Fraser bakes them, and I've never tasted anything better."

Mrs. Campbell offered a slight smile, pulling one from the plate with her fingertips as though it may poison her. She nibbled a corner, searching for some flaw she could point out.

Cate bit off a chunk of cookie as she stirred her tea. "I swear these taste better with every batch!"

"Mmm, yes, no doubt Emily learned her baking skills from our many excellent neighborhood bakers! Oh, that reminds me, the cookie selection!" Mrs. Campbell dropped the rest of her cookie onto her saucer next to her teacup and placed the saucer on the coffee table. She searched through her folders, pulling a legal-sized paper from a red folder. After sliding it to Cate across the tabletop, she pointed out several starred items.

The women spent the next two hours checking final details, making final arrangements, and wrapping up loose ends. Cate enjoyed several of Mrs. Fraser's cookies as a reward for the tedious work. As they finished these tasks, Mrs. Campbell finished her second cup of tea before asking if she could view the progress on the ballroom preparations.

"Yes!" Cate answered, standing and placing the teacups and saucers onto the tray. "Follow me."

Cate led Mrs. Campbell to the ballroom. As they approached, Jack emerged from the room.

"Ah, Lady Cate, good day!" he greeted her, bowing. "And Isla, hello."

Mrs. Campbell smiled at him for a moment, offering him the briefest of glances. She turned her eyes to the grouping of trees on either side of the doorway.

“As you can see,” Cate said motioning to the trees, “Jack has done a great job getting these ready to be decorated!”

“Hmm,” Mrs. Campbell mumbled, still eyeing the trees. She pursed her lips, squinting at them. “Does this appear... off to you?”

“Ah...” Cate began.

“Lady Cate assured me they were spot on,” Jack answered, giving two thumbs up.

“Perhaps a fourth tree...” Mrs. Campbell suggested, waving a hand in the air.

Jack’s jaw dropped as he searched for an answer.

“I’m not certain that’s necessary,” Cate answered. “Three is a nice number! Four would look too... square.”

“How enlightening your analyses always are,” Mrs. Campbell responded, sarcasm creeping into her voice. “Oh, Mr. Reid, with the trees settled, I wondered if I might bend your ear for a moment.”

“Of course,” Jack answered, offering a polite smile to the woman while casting a sidelong glance at Cate.

“I’d like to make one final plea for the snowmaking machine. We’ve no assurances of snow next week...”

Jack interrupted her, holding up his hand. “I’ll stop you there, Mrs. Campbell. After a lengthy consultation with Lady Cate, we have all agreed a snow machine is inappropriate for the grounds. I realize and appreciate the effect you intend to achieve, however, to pull it off may cause damage to the grounds and we aren’t willing to take that risk.”

“Jack is correct,” Cate added. “We gave it extensive consideration. We both realize how important it is to you. I can assure you we did not dismiss it out-of-hand, but in the end, we were not comfortable with the idea.”

Mrs. Campbell frowned for a moment before responding. “Well,” she began, again eyeing the Christmas tree setup, “I suppose if you’re decided, there is nothing more to say!”

She lowered her voice, mumbling, “Except what good is a Snow Ball with no snow.”

After overhearing her mumbled comment, Cate responded, “The forecast seems favorable for some snow the evening of the event. Maybe we'll get lucky. Shall we take a peek inside the ballroom?"

"Oh, you Americans, always with the optimistic point of view," Mrs. Campbell replied. "Yes, I'd like to see the tree placement inside."

Jack followed the women into the ballroom to ensure everything was in order. After a few minor adjustments, Mrs. Campbell declared everything acceptable.

"We will decorate over the next week. The next time you see these trees, they will be transformed!" Cate promised.

"And you've got my schematic? Showing how you should place the decorations and colors on the trees?" Mrs. Campbell asked.

Cate patted her folder. "I've got it right here and have already made copies for everyone who will assist with the decorating. We will have everything just as you proposed!"

"Excellent, excellent!" Mrs. Campbell pronounced. "With everything in order, I will see you on Thursday! Jack, keep up the good work. And if you change your mind about the snow machine, call me at once!"

Jack simulated an amused chuckle, finding the comment anything but amusing. "Oh, I will."

"Well, I guess that's everything then. We'll see you again on Thursday," Cate agreed, nodding. "I'll walk you out."

Cate showed Mrs. Campbell to the front door, saying her goodbyes and watching the car pull down the drive. She breathed a long sigh of relief before returning to the sitting room, intending to return the tea tray to the kitchen. To her surprise, Mrs. Fraser had already retrieved it.

Cate glanced at her timepiece. She had a half hour before lunch. She decided to take the dogs for a short walk.

She made her way to the library and pushed through the double doors into the rectangular space. As she entered, she found both Riley and Bailey staring at a bookcase near the door. Her brow furrowed, wondering what held their attention.

"What has you two so interested in that bookcase?" she inquired of the two pups.

Riley glanced at her, then directed his gaze back to the bookcase. Cate wandered over, giving both dogs a scratch on the head. Riley leapt to his feet, approaching the bookcase, then staring at Cate.

"What is it, buddy? Did you lose a toy or bone?"

Cate approached the bookcase, sweeping her hand around the bottom and glancing at the lower shelves. The small dogs couldn't reach much further up the bookcase, so she doubted any of their belongings could have landed higher.

"I don't see anything here," she stated, standing and shrugging her shoulders.

Riley glanced at her again, then returned his gaze to the bookcase, issuing a small whine. Cate screwed up her face, confused as to the dog's interest in the bookcase.

"What are you trying to tell me, Riley?"

The small pup remained silent on the issue beyond his interested gaze.

Cate shrugged again, glancing at Bailey. "I don't suppose you want to fill me in on the details, do you, Bailey?"

The other dog met her gaze with bright eyes but offered no explanation. "Well, since we're at a standstill on this subject, how about a walk?"

Riley whipped his head around to stare at Cate. Bailey jumped to his feet.

Cate chuckled at their behavior. "I'll take that as a yes. Come on, you two."

She strode to the door as the dogs raced ahead of her. She hesitated as she reached it, her fingertips lingering on the doorknob as she spun to stare at the bookcase. A shiver ran up her spine. What had drawn the dogs to it? She wasn't certain, but she didn't have a good feeling.

Cate gave one final glance at the mysterious bookcase, her skin turning to goosebumps before she spun and took a step toward the hall. She almost collided into Jack, who approached the library. “Whoa! Sorry!”

“Oops! A near collision, sorry, Lady Cate! But I’m glad I ran into you, pun intended!” Jack answered with a jovial laugh.

“Very funny,” Cate responded. “What did you need?”

“Do you have a moment? I wanted to vent about the party czar.”

“I’m about to take the dogs for a quick walk. Care to come along?”

“Sure, perhaps the fresh air will soothe my frayed nerves,” Jack answered.

They proceeded to the front door, letting the dogs out and heading toward the side garden.

Jack clasped his hands behind his back as they strolled along. “I just wanted to ensure that we are on the same page with that bloody snow machine.”

“We are. I trust your judgement.”

Jack shook his head as he stared at the horizon. “I cannot believe that woman brought that infernal machine up again. This has to be the fourth time we’ve told her no. I’m sorry for jumping into the conversation, Lady Cate. Perhaps it wasn’t my place, but I couldn’t take anymore.”

Cate’s nose crinkled as she snickered. “It’s okay. I’m not sure how many more ways we can say it before she’s convinced we mean it.”

Jack rolled his eyes and shook his head. "Ah, that damned woman."

The dogs frolicked in around the bushes as she held in a laugh at Jack's last statement. "Careful, you're starting to sound like Mrs. Fraser."

"Aye, Emily and I have the same view of her, I'll admit it," Jack answered.

"You can swap horror stories over lunch," Cate added then called the dogs back to her.

"Oh?" Jack questioned as they turned back to the castle.

"Yes," Cate replied. "Mrs. Fraser brought tea to us for the first part of our meeting and had a small conversation about her retirement with Isla. I'll bet she was boiling when she left the room."

"If the conversation went beyond a standard 'hello,' I'm sure she was."

They entered the castle through the main doors. The dogs raced off to the library as soon as they opened the door.

"What's with them?" Jack inquired.

Cate shrugged as they scurried away. "No idea. I found them both staring at one of the bookcases in the library. I'm not sure what is so intriguing about it, but it seems to have captivated their attention."

"Perhaps they'd like to take up reading."

"Yes, I'm sure that's it," Cate answered. "Sir Riley is really fitting into his role as lord of the manor. He only needs a pipe and a monocle, and he'll be all set."

Jack chuckled at Cate's joke as Mrs. Fraser approached them with Cate's lunch in hand.

"Oh, I can take that from here, Mrs. Fraser," Cate stated, reaching for the tray.

"Enjoy your lunch, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser expressed. "I'm sure you'd like a quiet moment now that the ninny left."

Cate chuckled at Mrs. Fraser's nickname for Mrs. Campbell.

"Oh, she could use it. The ninny was even more of a ninny than usual!" Jack said.

Cate grinned at them. "I'll leave Jack to fill you in on the details. I've already told him I was sure your conversation about retirement with Mrs. Campbell exasperated you."

"Oh, you've no idea," Mrs. Fraser admitted. "Come along, young Jack, wait until you hear what that woman said this time!"

Another giggle escaped Cate's lips as she watched them disappear down the hall together. She carried her tray to the library, where she found the two dogs on either side of the bookcase. Two sentinels guarding some unknown treasure. She shook her head at them as she set the tray on the desk.

After opening her laptop, she browsed her emails as she ate. An email from Molly with the subject On my way! appeared in her inbox. Cate smiled as she read it. The brief email said Molly's plane was about to take off and she'd be in London by afternoon. She promised to text once she was settled at her hotel. It wouldn't be long before Molly was a permanent resident of Dunhaven Castle.

Cate glanced at her watch. In just over forty-eight hours, Molly would call Dunhaven Castle home. She monitored the second hand as it ticked off the seconds, drawing Molly's arrival ever closer. As Cate reflected on her friend's arrival, her mind swung from the future to the past. The case of the stolen jewelry pushed itself to the front of Cate's brain. Who had stolen the jewelry, and why? Why was it never recovered? Where did the case go cold? Cate's mind turned the limited details from the newspaper articles over and over, searching for a clue.

She found none. With a sigh, she opted to begin her weekend early, curled up with a good book by the room's massive fireplace. After receiving an email that Molly was settled in her hotel room, Cate relaxed into her evening.

She spent the early morning hours of Saturday pacing her bedroom floor. She watched the sun rise over the moors while Riley and Bailey lounged in their beds, too lazy to crawl out in the cold weather. The warm yellow sun painted the sky a rainbow of colors, brightening the frosty morning.

Cate's mind swam with a variety of things, bouncing from topic to topic, planning, pondering, organizing, reminding, listing tasks, and reaffirming her schedule. She cataloged the final details to be completed before Molly's arrival. Some decorating would begin today and last several days.

True to form, Mr. Fraser developed a magical plan for the gardens outside. Even with the cold weather predicted for the party, many partygoers would likely still escape the heat of the interior to enjoy the gardens. The plan promised to provide an ethereal effect, snow or not.

Cate found the design charming, like an enchanting walkthrough light show. She appreciated the fact that Mr. Fraser had captured a nostalgic American holiday display to remind her of home for her first Christmas in the castle.

Her mind turned to another Christmas, one that occurred in 1924. In 1924, the MacKenzie family gathered to celebrate their Christmas and New Year. As they rang in 1925, however, someone robbed them.

Cate plodded into her sitting room, retrieving the folder containing the articles of the theft. She glanced through the articles again. Pencil in hand, she noted a few items in the margin to follow up on. Her overcrowded mind longed to spend a quiet day researching this mystery, but she had many duties to attend to. She glanced at the timepiece.

“Soon,” she promised. “I’ll visit soon.”

She dressed for the day and took the dogs for a quick walk before breakfast. She joined her staff for breakfast, eager to discuss decorating plans. Everyone planned to pitch in, each decorating a tree or more inside and outside the ballroom. Within minutes of arriving in the kitchen, she found herself able to push her longing for research aside, filled with giddy excitement to decorate a Christmas tree.

Mrs. Fraser, who stayed with Mr. Fraser in the castle the night before, arose early and was already baking cookies. Mr. Fraser sat at the kitchen table studying his outdoor design. The aroma of sweet-smelling shortbread cookies filled the room.

“Mmm,” Cate murmured as she entered. “I’m ready to skip breakfast and go straight for the cookies!”

“Not if I have anything to say about it,” Mrs. Fraser told her. “We’ve got a long day of work ahead, and you need your breakfast, Lady Cate!”

Jack chuckled, already seated at the table as well. “I’ve already tried that, Lady Cate. My attempt was a bust, too.”

“There’ll be plenty of time for nibbling on cookies while we decorate. And I’ve already got milk warming for hot chocolate.”

Cate smiled at her, already salivating for the tasty warm drink.

“If you behave yourselves, there’ll be a repeat performance when we decorate our private tree on Wednesday,” Mrs. Fraser promised.

Cate shot Jack a glance, giggling. “I’m excited to decorate this weekend for the party. Although, I’m more excited to spend the day with everyone on Wednesday! I haven't decorated a tree with anyone other than Riley in a long time!"

"I'm excited for the cookies!" Jack answered, reaching toward the pan as Mrs. Fraser pulled it from the oven.

"Don't even try it," she warned, batting his hand with her oven mitt. "With that done, breakfast is ready!"

"Sit down, Mrs. Fraser. Let me get your oatmeal. You've done enough work this morning." Cate ushered her to the table.

"Oh, what nonsense! I'm capable of retrieving my oatmeal."

"I'm aware of how capable you are, but I insist," Cate asserted.

Mrs. Fraser shook her head but allowed Cate to serve her.

Cate retrieved her own bowl, and sank into a seat next to the woman.

After a quick clean up, they moved to the ballroom for the first round of holiday decorating. Jack and Mr. Fraser had already placed bins of decorations from years past in the room, along with any new purchases. Cate brought the dogs with her, wanting to include them in the festivities.

They began on the trees in the main hall outside the ballroom. Cate reminded them to check their schematic to be sure the color scheme matched Mrs. Campbell's wishes. Jack commented they'd be up the entire night before the party redecorating if her plans were not met.

The morning work went quickly as they strung lights and garland on the trees, adding ornaments and a tree topper to finish. They admired the finished products before moving on to the next set of trees.

Cate and Mrs. Fraser retrieved the cookies and hot chocolate while Jack and Mr. Fraser continued to string lights on the next two trees. They finished both groupings of trees outside the ballroom before they stopped for lunch.

When they returned in the afternoon, they decorated the trees inside the ballroom. The row of dull green Christmas trees standing in front of the windows overlooking the garden came to life with sparkling white and colored bulbs, silver, gold and plaid garland and snowflake ornaments. Riley and Bailey spent their afternoon playing tug of war with a large plaid bow they had stolen from one of the boxes.

Cate stood back, admiring their work as the afternoon turned to evening. She hoped Mrs. Campbell would be pleased. The bright, sparkling trees transformed the ballroom into a winter wonderland. Tomorrow, while Jack drove to Edinburgh to pick up Molly, they would add details to the scene.

Blankets of fake snow, wreaths, wrapped boxes, sleighs, and more would be added to augment the already festive scene.

They finished for the day, gathering in the kitchen for a light meal of sandwiches prepared the day prior by Mrs. Fraser. With the growing excitement for Molly's arrival, Cate hoped she would sleep that night. The day's demanding physical work allowed her to nod off within minutes of her head hitting the pillow. The following morning, Cate felt well rested from a deep sleep.

After breakfast and a thirty-minute walk with the dogs, she began her Sunday by finishing details in Molly's room. She set out a few framed photos on the mantle, unpacked a few personal items, placing them around the room, and laid out a welcome gift basket on the bed. Pleased with her work, she hoped the added touches helped settle Molly into her new home.

She spent the rest of the morning adding more detailed decor to the ballroom with Mr. and Mrs. Fraser. They finished the decorating mid-afternoon, just in time to freshen up before Molly's arrival. Mrs. Fraser hurried below stairs to put the final touches on the special dinner she planned to welcome Molly.

Cate ushered the dogs downstairs and out for a quick walk. As she led them back to the front door, the estate car pulled down the drive.

Riley raced toward the vehicle as Jack climbed from behind the wheel. He bounded to the car, balancing on his hind legs to capture Jack's attention.

Cate approached the passenger door with Bailey as it burst open. Molly spilled out of the car, her excitement overflowing. "CATE!" she shouted, racing to her and throwing her arms around her. "I made it!"

Cate returned the hug. "Yes! The time seemed to drag. It seemed like this day wouldn't arrive, but here it is! I've been excited for days! It'll be so nice to have you settled in the castle."

"I can't wait to get settled! I can't wait to start my new job! How about that, huh? I'm actually excited about work! It doesn't even feel like work!"

Jack retrieved Molly's lone suitcase from the car's trunk. Riley bounded toward Molly to greet her. Molly bent to pet both dogs before they entered the castle.

She hugged her purse to her chest, following Cate into the foyer. "Christmas in a castle! I'm so excited I could burst! How are the decorations coming?"

“Almost finished!” Cate announced as Jack passed them on the way to deliver Molly’s luggage to her room.

“I bet the place looks great. And thanks for waiting for me to get here to decorate the private tree,” Molly replied, placing her hand on Cate’s arm. “It makes me feel like I’m part of the household already!”

“You’re welcome. I’m looking forward to it. These trees have been fun to decorate, but I can’t wait to decorate our tree! And I’m excited for Mrs. Fraser’s hot chocolate and cookies!”

“Me too!” Molly giggled.

“Interested in taking a peek at the ballroom?” Cate inquired. “We have some time before dinner.”

“Sure!” Molly agreed. “I can’t wait to see it! Jack told me your two little rascals absconded with one of the bows yesterday.”

Cate led Molly toward the ballroom, Riley and Bailey in tow. “They did, the little thieves. They had a fabulous time tugging on it until they tore it to shreds.”

As they approached the ballroom, Molly gasped, eyeing the trees. “Oh goodness, it’s beautiful!”

Even unlit, they appeared majestic and festive surrounding the doorway. Cate led Molly inside, striding across the room to turn on the tree lights.

“OH!” Molly shouted from inside the doorway. “It’s incredible! You’ve done a magnificent job! I’ll bet Mrs... ah, what’s her name, will be so pleased!”

“Campbell,” Cate informed her, crossing back to admire the lit trees again. “And I sure hope so. Although Mrs. Campbell has a way of spotting any flaw, no matter how small. I’m sure she’ll demand something be adjusted.”

Molly laughed as Cate hurried across the room to turn off the lights. “Is she still on you about that snow machine?”

“She is. Jack is at his wit’s end with her. She asked him again on Friday,” Cate replied, closing the ballroom doors as they exited. “I’m surprised he didn’t lunge at her.”

“This place looks great with or without snow!”

“I agree!” Cate answered, leading her upstairs to the bedrooms. “Here you are, the Rose Room! I’ll give you some time to unwind and freshen up before dinner.”

“I’m too excited to unwind! I’m super excited to be back here! I feel so at home here, so I’m sure I’ll be relaxed in an instant.”

“I took the liberty of setting some of your things out,” Cate responded, opening the door. “I’m sure you’ll want to shift things around, but at least it’s a start. I unpacked the clothing also, so you don’t have to do it. Especially since you wanted to dive right in with work tomorrow! Are you sure you wouldn’t rather take a few days to settle in?”

“I’m positive!” Molly answered as she followed Cate into the room. “Oh, wow! You made it so homey! You put my photos out! And my blanket!”

“Oh!” Molly exclaimed, seeing the welcome basket on the bed. “Aww, Cate, you shouldn’t have! This opportunity was enough. You didn’t have to do this!”

Molly picked up the new cardigan Cate laid out with the welcome basket, hugging it to her chest. “This is beautiful! Thank you! I love it!”

Cate pulled Molly into a hug. “You’re welcome! I’m glad you like it. See you in about half an hour for dinner?”

Molly nodded. “Thanks. Oh! I almost forgot. I have something for you. Oh, it’s buried in the luggage, I’ll get it out and bring it to dinner.”

“No rush,” Cate noted. “See you soon!”

Cate escorted the two pups from Molly’s room, closing the door behind her, and steered them toward her bedroom suite. When she emerged for dinner, she found Molly waiting in the hallway, a brown bag in hand.

“Found the stuff I brought!” she declared, holding the bag up with a triumphant expression. “I’ll give it to you downstairs. I brought something for everyone!”

They navigated to the kitchen. Molly received another round of welcome hugs as they entered the kitchen. Mrs. Fraser set the last dish on the table, and they sat down to eat.

As they ate their Scottish Berry Brûlée, a special dessert prepared for Molly’s arrival, Molly passed out her gifts. She brought a special Christmas ornament for each of them. Jack and Mr. Fraser each received a bear dressed in a Scottish kilt. Mrs. Fraser received a teddy bear dressed in a plaid dress. Cate received a teddy bear dressed in an eighteenth century ballgown.

“I figured we could hang them on the tree together!” Molly informed them. “I brought my own, too, see?” She brandished a bear wearing sunglasses and an American flag t-shirt.

A smile spread across Cate's face. "That's such a cute idea," Cate agreed. "Thank you, Molly. It will make a memorable ornament for a memorable Christmas."

Molly smiled and pointed to Cate. "Oh, I have one other thing for you."

She withdrew a trinket box with a coat of arms on the lid from the bag. "This is from Maggie Edwards. You remember her, don't you? She worked for me. I ran into her a few times over the last semester. Remind me to tell you what happened with her, it's wild! Anyway, when I told her I was moving, she made a point of dropping this off for you. She came across it at her shop and thought it would be a perfect gift for you."

"Oh, thanks! It's beautiful!" Cate answered, gazing at the box. "Yes, I remember Maggie. I spoke with her before your last visit. She emailed me and said she ran into you! I promised her a visit!"

"Who's the mysterious Maggie? Some American celebrity?" Jack asked after a bite of his dessert.

"She was a student at Aberdeen College," Cate explained. "She worked as a graduate assistant with Molly. She lives in the town neighboring Aberdeen. She's got a great little antique shop slash bookstore there."

"And a hunky new boyfriend to help her with it, too," Molly added.

"No more Leo?" Cate inquired.

Molly shook her head, swallowing some dessert and washing it down with a sip of water. "Mmm-mmm," she began as she drank. "Nope. No more Leo. Henry now. A gorgeous Aussie. Took her on an around the world adventure, finding her uncle who was kidnapped by grave robbers! It was crazy! Anyway, invite her over, she'll tell you all about it!"

"Ollie Keene was kidnapped by grave robbers?!" Cate shouted, shock in her voice. "What?"

"Yep," Molly assured her, nodding. "Went searching for Cleopatra's tomb and ended up on the wrong side of some nasty people. That's how she met Henry."

"That is crazy!" Cate agreed.

"Wow! I never realized how exciting American life is," Jack chimed in. "Lady Cate, you must be so dreadfully bored here."

Cate sighed dramatically. "Yes, nothing ever happens here." She shot a coy glance at Jack who understood her meaning all too well.

“I, for one, am looking forward to an unexciting life,” Molly responded, missing out on Cate’s meaning. “Although I don’t imagine one can call life in a castle dull or boring!”

“I’m with you, Molly. A simple life is the best life!” Mrs. Fraser agreed as she stood and cleared a few dishes from the table.

Without missing a beat, Molly rose, pitching in to clear the table. “I agree! Although I still maintain living in a castle is not what I call a simple life.”

“You Americans really find castles fascinating, don’t you?” Mrs. Fraser queried.

“And you’re sure you want to start working tomorrow? Don’t want a few days to settle into your new home?” Mrs. Fraser questioned.

“Nope! Cate already asked me, and I already declined. I’m ready to begin! Besides, you all have most of my things unpacked for me! So, I am settled in!”

The two ladies chatted about their upcoming day as they cleaned the kitchen. Cate, Jack, and Mr. Fraser pitched in to finish clearing the table. After dinner, everyone retired to their separate spaces. Cate cuddled with her dogs on her chaise lounge under a thick blanket. Laptop in hand, Cate sent a quick email to Maggie thanking her for the gift, asking about her adventure across the globe, and extending an invitation to the castle.

After sending the email, Cate grabbed her folder with the news articles about the theft. With Molly settled in and a good deal of the decorating complete, the mystery was consuming her mind.

She wrote a few preliminary questions on a sheet of paper and listed a few places to begin her search for the culprit and preparation for traveling to the era.

Cate bit her lower lip as she stared at the notes. One question burned in her mind: who could have committed the crime and gotten away with it?

CHAPTER 4

Cate awoke with a start. The mystery of the heist permeated her mind the moment she opened her eyes. Specifically, she wondered who would be close enough to the family to have access to family heirlooms.

As she stretched, her muscles resisted her movement. She winced as she climbed from her bed. The decorating, while enjoyable, took a physical toll. With a groan and a frown, Cate popped the top on her bottle of acetaminophen and washed two capsules down with two gulps of water.

She stretched for a few minutes before enjoying a long, hot shower. She dressed for the day, already feeling some relief from her aches and pains.

Both dogs still lounged in their beds, too lazy to move. Cate grinned at them as she pulled her boots on over her leggings. After kneeling next to them, she stroked each of their heads and prodded them from their beds.

The promise of a long walk roused Riley. At the mention of the special “w” word, he bounded out of bed, offering a small yip and dancing in a circle. Bailey, excited by Riley’s enthusiasm, leapt from his bed, joining the fray.

As she nestled deeper in her coat, she pondered what she may find about her 1925 mystery. She glanced back at the castle, imagining it in the Roaring Twenties. As she did, she flicked her gaze up to the second story.

She drew in a deep breath. Today would mark Molly’s first day of work. Would she enjoy her new position? She hoped Molly found it a welcome change, though she worried she may regret her choice.

She returned to the castle, ushering the two pups into the sweet-smelling kitchen. Mrs. Fraser and Molly readied breakfast.

“Good morning, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser called from across the kitchen.

“Good morning,” Cate answered, waving to both women.

“Good morning, Cate. Oh, Lady Cate,” Molly responded, catching herself and glancing toward Mrs. Fraser with some trepidation. Mrs. Fraser nodded to her.

“Now,” Mrs. Fraser informed Molly, “Lady Cate eats breakfast with us on Monday mornings, so there’s no need to set the dining room. But on the other days of the week, Lady Cate takes her breakfast in the dining room.”

Molly nodded, making a mental note of the schedule. “Right. Mondays with us, all other days in the dining room,” she repeated.

“Yes,” Mrs. Fraser confirmed as Cate seated herself at the already-set table. “Unless she requests otherwise.”

Riley and Bailey found a spot near the warm stove, curling up for a nap to prepare for their morning stroll after breakfast.

“Oatmeal is the normal unless we’re entertaining. In that case, we put out a bigger spread. Well, you’ll see over the holiday. And Lady Cate uses brown sugar and raisins, so we keep the pantry well-stocked. On occasion, I’ll put out other fruit if it appears good at the market. Blueberries, cranberries and the like.”

Mrs. Fraser wasted no time in instructing Molly on the workings of breakfast. Cate found it strange to listen to the instructions about how to prepare her breakfast. She glanced at the table in front of her, pursing her lips as Molly repeated Mrs. Fraser’s instructions.

“Now, I use this server,” Mrs. Fraser instructed, “when breakfast is served upstairs with guests. I fill a bowl for Lady Cate when she eats upstairs alone. When we eat here, we take it straight from the pot. Lady Cate insists!”

“I could save you the wash and take it from the pot every day, Mrs. Fraser,” Cate offered, joining the conversation. “I’m capable of carrying a bowl of oatmeal from the kitchen to the dining room.”

“Now, we’ll have nothing of the sort, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser scolded. “And if you’re going to change the routine, I’ll not allow you to eat down here anymore!”

Cate bit her lower lip, glancing to Molly.

“I’m starting to wonder who’s really in charge here,” Molly whispered as she set a bowl of brown sugar on the table in front of Cate.

Cate giggled as she tugged the bowl to the center. “Me too.”

Mrs. Fraser, a fan of tradition and propriety, preferred to maintain centuries-old traditions established for attending family members in a household such as this. Cate, an American, was unused to the attentiveness of a staff and, having lived a life devoid of such traditions, was still adjusting to them. She appreciated Mrs. Fraser’s dogged determination to maintain the standards of serving a countess, but hated putting the woman out.

“How was your first night in your new home?” Cate inquired of Molly as Mr. Fraser and Jack entered.

“Fabulous,” Molly admitted. “Best night’s sleep I’ve had since I was here last!”

“You’ll have another good night’s sleep tonight, I imagine,” Mrs. Fraser teased. “I’ve got a full day planned for us!”

The statement didn’t dampen Molly’s spirits. She grinned at Mrs. Fraser as she gave the oatmeal one last stir. “I can’t wait! This is all ready.”

Cate grabbed her bowl from her place setting and approached the pot. One of her bargains for breakfast with the staff was serving herself first. Mrs. Fraser insisted, and no one dared approach the pot before Cate, lest they invite the wrath of Mrs. Fraser. Cate filled her bowl, followed by Jack, Mr. Fraser, then Mrs. Fraser and Molly.

They gathered around the table.

“How are the preparations outside coming along?” Cate questioned as they ate.

“Splendid,” Mr. Fraser assured her. “It will be a winter wonderland for the guests!” Proud of his garden design, Mr. Fraser beamed as he answered Cate’s question.

“If only we had snow...” Jack joked.

Cate laughed, shaking her head. “If you’ve changed your mind...” she teased, letting her voice trail off.

“I know just who to call if I have,” Jack answered.

Cate giggled, reminding Molly of the ongoing battle between the household and Mrs. Campbell regarding the snow machine.

“What is your dress like for the ball, Molly?” Mrs. Fraser inquired.

“Oh, bright, Christmas red!” Molly exclaimed. “It has a shawl collar, kind of almost off the shoulders, but not quite. And a big, red bow cinched with a glittery brooch on the side.” She pointed to her right hip.

“Sounds very pretty,” Mrs. Fraser replied.

“I splurged on it,” Molly answered. “I wanted something flashy as a last purchase in Aberdeen. Then I made them mail it here. I’ll bet that got around town with lightning speed!”

They discussed a few additional party details before changing the subject.

“Will you be working on your research today, Lady Cate?” Mrs. Fraser inquired.

“Yes,” Cate answered. “I’m moving on to another time period. Mid-1920s.”

“I thought you were working on the 1850s?” Mrs. Fraser questioned.

“Yes, I was. However, something intriguing came up, and I’d like to follow up on it. I’ll return to the 1850s once I have this sorted out. I’ve done a fair amount of work in that time period already.”

“You don’t say,” Jack replied.

“Well, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser answered. “How you captured the era, the MacKenzies’ very personalities, and made them come alive! I must say, the chapter I perused made it almost sound as though you were on the estate in those times!”

Jack choked on the water he was sipping at Mrs. Fraser’s compliment. He sputtered a cough out as he regained his composure. Cate shot Jack an amused glance, suppressing a giggle.

“I’d believe it,” Molly chimed in, none the wiser to Jack’s reaction. “I’ll bet Cate’s a talented writer!”

“Oh, yes, almost like she’s lived through it, so vivid.”

“Almost...” Jack expressed.

After breakfast, Cate gathered several materials to begin her research, settling in the library with Riley and Bailey. She spread her work across the desk, setting out several blank sheets of paper along with her list of questions from the previous night.

Cate began by consulting the family tree written on the inside cover of the family bible. She traced her finger down the tree, finding the family members alive in 1925.

During this era, Rory MacKenzie, Randolph and Victoria's grandson, and his wife, Anne, inhabited the castle. Both in their thirties, they were joined in the castle by their almost eleven-year-old son, Oliver. Oliver was the father of Cate's benefactor, Gertrude MacKenzie.

The small family was low on Cate's suspect list as they stood nothing to gain from the theft. Short of Oliver playing a childish prank, she could think of no reason for them to have stolen the jewels. As far as Cate was aware, there was no insurance payment for them, so they stood to gain nothing from falsely suggesting they had been stolen.

She turned her attention to anyone else in the family who may have been on the estate during the theft. Rory's father and mother were both deceased by 1925. A large inkblot stained the piece of the page detailing her side of the family.

She still wasn't certain who was responsible for the destruction of the family tree in the bible. However, she had tracked down the information through her attorney's assistant, Gayle Pearson.

She dug through her notes, finding the family tree she'd restore with Gayle's help. This reproduction contained the information that laid under the inkblot. According to her research, or rather, Gayle's, Rory had a younger brother, Lucas. Lucas, Cate's great-grandfather, was six years his brother's junior.

She stared at their names, wondering if they lived in the castle, too, or if they had taken up residence elsewhere. With a limited knowledge of her family, she added it to her list of unknowns.

While she hated to admit it, if they were on the estate at the time of the theft, they were suspects. Motives could be many. However, the one that stood at the top of the list was jealousy. Was Lucas motivated by envy to rob his older brother, Rory, of part of the inheritance that he would never receive?

She hoped this wasn't the case. She felt guilty even entertaining the idea that her great-grandfather could be a thief. A thief she descended from. The idea made her skin crawl, and she hoped to prove it incorrect. Could this be the reason for the inkblot, Cate wondered?

With an abundance of reluctance, Cate created a new sheet titled Possible Suspects, and she placed her great-grandfather and his wife on it. They wouldn't welcome their first child, her grandfather, Charles, until later in 1925, according to her family tree.

Based on his birthday, in the latter half of the year, she concluded pregnancy wouldn't have prevented them from traveling to visit family for the 1924 holiday season. While she had no confirmation, they may have been in the castle. Perhaps she could find conclusive evidence that they were not and remove them from the suspect list right away. Perhaps a Christmas card wishing happy holidays and suggesting they would not see the family or family home. She wrote a note to check for any evidence of this, hoping to find something to rule them out.

She stared at her research so far, grimacing as she read the only two names on her suspect list. Disappointment filled her as she realized how likely it was that her direct ancestor may be the culprit.

Two voices interrupted her fretting. Mrs. Fraser and Molly made their way through the door.

"Just as I told you," Mrs. Fraser announced. "Lady Cate often takes her lunch in the library. She's usually here working."

Molly nodded, carrying the tray as Mrs. Fraser directed her toward the set up near the fireplace.

"And how is the research coming along, Lady Cate?" Mrs. Fraser asked.

"Slow," Cate admitted. "I'm shocked it's time for lunch already! I must have let my imagination run away with me and time ran right along with it!"

Mrs. Fraser waved at the messy desk. "It appears you've done a good bit of work judging by the spread on the desk!"

Cate winced as she glanced at the cluttered desk. "Or made a fine mess at least!"

She approached the fireplace and eased into her chair. "And how is the first day going?"

Molly grinned at her. "Great by my marker!" She glanced to Mrs. Fraser who nodded in agreement.

"Aye," Mrs. Fraser concurred. "She's a fast learner and a good worker. You made a fine choice in her, Lady Cate."

Molly beamed with pride at the woman's comments. "Anything else you need, Lady Cate?"

Cate shook her head. "Nope. I'm all set! Have a great lunch, ladies!"

"Thanks!" Molly exclaimed, following Mrs. Fraser from the room.

Cate rose and tossed a few logs onto the fire, then plopped back into her armchairs near the roaring fireplace. She glanced around for the two dogs.

Not finding them laying near the fireplace surprised her. Her brow wrinkled as her gaze swept the room, locking on them laying in front of the same bookcase she found them intrigued with a few days ago. It appeared to have captured their interest again.

“Riley! Bailey!” she called across the room. “What are you two doing over there?”

Riley glanced to her, then returned his gaze to the bookcase. She shook her head. If she didn’t already possess a research plan for the afternoon, she’d have tried again to find out what was so interesting about that bookshelf.

Instead, she was hellbent on searching employment records to add to her list of potential suspects.

She finished her lunch and took the dogs for as long a walk as the chilly afternoon air allowed. The cold temperatures drove them back inside to a roaring fire, stoked and tended by Mr. Fraser while they were out.

The dogs curled near it and Cate left them to their dreams while she searched the castle for employment records from the 1920s. After an hour of hunting, Cate stumbled upon records from the era. She gathered the record books into her arms and hurried back to the warmth of the library’s fire.

Nestled under a blanket in an armchair near the fireplace, she noted the name of each employee working when the theft occurred. When completed, her list totaled over twenty. She stared down at it, deciding she’d narrow it down based on a change in employment status in the months just prior to or following the theft.

She created a new column on her note sheet for employment dates when the library doors popped open. She stared down the names, wondering if one of them could be the culprit. She bit her lower lip as she realized she wasn’t wondering, but rather hoping one of them would be the guilty party.

The alternative turned Cate’s stomach. Could her family have been blotted out of the bible because they were thieves?

CHAPTER 5

Cate pondered the list with a frown when a whimper sounded across the room. She glanced up to find Riley eyeing the bookcase again.

With another whine, he lowered his head to his paws, his almond-shaped eyes fixed on it.

Cate narrowed her eyes at his behavior when two voices interrupting her musing.

“And as you can see, you’ll often find Lady Cate still working at dinner time.”

Cate fumbled with her timepiece, her eyes going wide when she noted the hour. She rushed to gather her research into a folder, clearing and cleaning her space. “Oh, I’ve lost track of the time again!”

“Same old Lady Cate!” Molly exclaimed, carrying the tray to Cate’s location. “Sometimes I’d text her to make sure she remembered to go to lunch or class. When she was researching, nothing, and I mean nothing, pulled her attention away.”

Mrs. Fraser nodded at Molly’s comment. “Oh, I’ll bet. Lady Cate’s only been here a few months and already I can see how she throws herself into her work! If it weren’t for us, I’d worry she’d not eat!”

“Or eat cereal,” Molly joked as Mrs. Fraser groaned at the idea.

Cate held back a chuckle at the truthful admittance on Molly’s part. “My diet has improved by leaps and bounds since I’ve moved here.”

“I’m glad!” Mrs. Fraser replied. “Enjoy your dinner, Lady Cate!”

“Thank you. Enjoy yours, too.”

Before eating, Cate cleared her area, dumping all her materials on the desk. She returned to the armchair near the fireplace, relaxing into it and pulling the tray onto her lap. She settled after a brief walk with the dogs in her room.

About an hour before she retired, a light knock sounded on her door. She swung her legs over the edge of her chaise, shouting, "Come in!"

Molly's head popped through the door. "Hey, sorry to disturb you, may I come in for a minute?"

"Sure," Cate replied, rising to her feet, "what's up? Is everything okay?"

"Oh, yeah, yeah," Molly responded, waving her back down onto the chaise. "Don't get up. Everything's fine."

Cate plopped onto the chaise between the two dogs as Molly approached her. She perched on the foot of the lounge. She took Cate's hands in hers and said, "I just wanted to tell you how great my first day went and how thrilled I am that you offered me this job. And how happy I am that I accepted it."

Cate smiled at her. "I'm so glad, Molly."

"I didn't want anything more than that and I won't disturb your evening any further. But I wanted you to know how happy I am."

"I appreciate you telling me, Molly. I'll admit, while I hoped you'd love it here, I worried you wouldn't."

"And that's exactly why I came. I know you. I realize you're a worrier! Only you would worry that changing someone else's life for the better didn't make them happy!"

Cate chuckled and pulled Molly into a hug. "No. I worried that I didn't change your life for the better. But I'm so glad to hear that wasn't the case!"

Molly squeezed her back. "Well, I'm going to read and relax in my room. Mr. Fraser built me a cozy fire for my second night here, and I'm going to take advantage!"

Cate grinned at her as they pulled away from each other. "Go put your feet up. Enjoy the Rose Room!"

"Oh, I plan on it! Goodnight, Lady Cate."

"Goodnight. Oh, you don't..." Cate began.

Molly waved her hand at Cate. "I do. Because it's proper, and I'm determined not to let those traditions die. There's really something magnificent about how Mrs. Fraser insists on the pomp and circumstance. Almost magical. I'm proud to be a part of this grand tradition. So, goodnight again, Lady Cate.” Molly nodded her head toward Cate before striding from the room.

Cate’s eyes followed her across the room. Self-respect and confidence filled Molly’s stride. Never a shrinking violet, Cate had been surprised during her last visit to see how battered Molly’s ego had been. It appeared the change in her circumstances improved Molly’s outlook. Contentment filled her as she witnessed the happiness displayed by her dear friend. She smiled to herself, diving back into her book. She’d sleep well tonight, contented with all her friends close and happy within the castle walls.

Cate awoke drenched in sweat, gasping for breath. Her heart thudded in her chest at a rapid pace. Her breathing, labored and ragged, made her lightheaded. Her hands trembled as she gulped for air attempting to calm herself.

As her breathing and heart rate slowed, she climbed from her bed. She paced the floor of her bedroom, eventually venturing out into her sitting room to collapse onto her chaise. What had disturbed her sleep, she wondered? What caused her to awaken in such a state?

Cate laid her head back onto the chair’s plump back. A dream, she mused. Yes, that was it. A dream had startled her from her sleep. She tried hard to recall the details. She pushed her mind to reach for any piece of information.

A party, she remembered. She was hosting a party in the dream. Cate stood in the ballroom, in a long sapphire-blue, princess-style evening gown. Randolph and Victoria greeted her with an embrace before taking their place for a waltz on the dance floor. After that, several guests swirled around her with a ceaseless amount of chatter. Her head swam with it as face after face passed in front of her, some smiling, others leaning in to kiss her cheek. Music filled the room, loud and discordant. Cate’s head ached from the off-key noise. Incessant chatter, high-pitched laughter and a swirl of mixed perfumes filled the air. Something about the entire event overwhelmed her far beyond the general anxiety experienced by an introvert at social gatherings.

Needing to escape from the dizzying parade of guests and noise, she excused herself, fleeing from the ballroom and shutting herself inside the library. She gulped for air as she leaned against the library doors, composing herself. Riley and Bailey greeted her, racing toward her. She bent over, gathering both into her arms. Warm kisses raced across her cheeks. As her nerves loosened from the tight knot they were balled in, Riley and Bailey pulled away. Both dogs spun to face the bookcase.

“What is it about that bookcase?” Cate inquired.

The dogs raced to it, Riley yipping at it. Bailey followed suit, tossing his head back and howling in a panic at the bookcase. The dogs became more and more frenzied as Cate approached the bookcase. The windows blew open and an icy wind flew around the room. Cate rubbed her bare arms as she continued across the room.

Riley and Bailey continued their frantic barking, undisturbed by the windstorm in the room. Papers swirled in a whirlwind. She fought through them to the bookcase. As she neared the wall, the bookshelf dissolved, fading away to blackness. A gaping hole yawned in front of her. Icy cold air gusted from the hole. Riley and Bailey ceased barking, backing from the hole, their tails between their legs. They turned and raced to hide under the desk.

Cate’s brow furrowed as she followed their scamper across the room. A noise spun her back toward the hole in the wall. An unearthly groan emanated from the hole. Cate took a step closer to the void. Air wafted from the blackness, accompanied by another groan. This time, it sounded like a voice. “Hello?” Cate called into the darkness.

She stepped closer, squinting into the dark. As she took another step closer, a powerful gust of wind blew from within the cavity. The gale storm wind knocked Cate onto her backside. As she struggled to sit up, a voice growled from within, “BEWARE!”

Cate gasped at the recollection, realizing it was this ominous warning that had awakened her from the nightmare. She struggled to find meaning in the dream. After an hour she gave up. She chalked the dream up to her subconscious mind’s reaction to the stress she experienced from the upcoming parties and her worry over Molly’s arrival. Her mind must have pieced together details from the past few days to create a strange and terrifying experience.

She sighed, chuckling at herself. “What a foolish girl you are, Cate Kensie,” she whispered.

She shook her head. She’d let her fear get the better of her as she had when she first arrived, imagining ghosts lurking in every hall. Embarrassed by her behavior, Cate dragged herself back to bed.

The sun had already made its appearance over the moors when Cate awoke. She’s slept in after her rough night. She leapt from bed, not wanting to be late for breakfast, entering the dining room just as Molly and Mrs. Fraser appeared with her breakfast.

They exchanged good mornings before Cate settled in for her breakfast. Afterward, she made her way to the library, intending to continue her research on her list of potential suspects. As she entered the room, her eyes slid to the bookcase. She ogled it suspiciously, as though she expected to relive her dream during her waking hours. She shook her head at the bookcase, turning away from it and approaching the desk.

After a moment, unsettled despite her best attempts to shrug off the dream, she decided a walk with the dogs was in order. It gave her an excuse to peruse the gardens off the ballroom and glimpse the progress being made on the outdoor decorations.

Cate spent the better part of her morning outside, despite the chill in the air. Mr. Fraser and Jack transformed it into a winter wonderland, and she found it difficult to tear herself away from it. She circled through multiple times, each time finding something new that she missed before. Delighted with the progress, Cate sought the two men to commend them for their hard work.

Cate returned to the library just as Molly delivered her lunch. “Thanks, Molly!”

“Long morning walk? I’m surprised you’re not frozen solid!”

Cate laughed as she rubbed her hands in front of the blazing fire. “I couldn’t tear myself away from the gardens. Mr. Fraser’s design is magical. It’s like a winter wonderland.”

“Oh, I can’t wait for the party!” Molly squealed. “Until then, I’m excited to decorate tomorrow!”

“Me too! I don’t want to keep you from your lunch, enjoy it!”

Molly nodded to her as she disappeared through the door. Riley and Bailey stretched in front of the blazing fire, soothed by its warmth after their morning outside.

As Cate ate, she stared at the bookcase that was the source of her consternation in her dream. She bit into her pickle, her eyes narrowing at the bookshelf.

After a moment, she rolled her eyes. “Cate, knock it off!” she scolded herself, earning a glance and a sigh from Riley. “It was a silly dream, nothing more. A bookcase does not dissolve away into thin air!”

“Talking to yourself?” Molly inquired, entering the room.

Startled, Cate almost dropped the tray right off her lap.

“I’m afraid I was,” Cate admitted. “Just trying to make sense of my research.”

“Needed expert advice, huh?”

Cate giggled as she handed the tray off. “Yep.”

After Molly exited, Cate wandered to the desk, plopping down on the desk chair. Determined to make more progress, she opened her folders and spread out her notes. She glanced through the employee list. She flipped open the records, ready to track down their dates of employment.

At the top of the list was Lachlan Reid, Jack’s great-grandfather. She did not suspect he was the thief. She had only listed him since he was the estate manager in 1925, so they were aware of all of the players. Lachlan was Stanley Reid’s father.

Cate made a note to ask the elder Mr. Reid about any information his father may have passed along about the theft. She also noted Lachlan was not a suspect and his employment dates were not of interest since he worked most of his life on the estate. She would never dream of insulting Jack, Stanley or the memory of his family by suggesting he had robbed the MacKenzies.

Cate moved on to the remaining list of employees. She scoured the employment records back to front over and over, jotting down hire dates when available, dates of first payments, termination dates and dates of last payments listed. She cobbled together rough dates of employment for each of the people on the list. The project took her the entire afternoon.

Cate admired her handiwork as Riley pawed her leg. A smile spread across her face as she glanced down at the small dog. “Look, Riley! I got everyone's dates! Are you proud of me?"

Riley glanced quizzically at the paper Cate brandished in front of him.

"Next step is to comb through these dates and determine if anything seems suspicious! For example, someone coming to work just before the theft, or leaving soon after."

Riley's dark almond-shaped eyes stared back at her as though he understood.

"What do you think, Riley? Will I find anything interesting?" she questioned, setting the sheet down as she scooped him into her arms.

Riley gave her a lap on the face, causing Cate to chuckle. "Thanks for the vote of confidence, buddy. I bet you're dying for a walk! We have just enough time before dinner, let's find your brother!"

Cate rose from the chair, carrying Riley with her. She roused Bailey from his peaceful nap near the fireplace. After dressing both dogs in a cozy winter coat and donning one herself, she led them outside for an evening walk before dinner.

She returned to the library just before dinner, snapping her laptop open to check her email before dinner arrived. She found one from Maggie Edwards.

Hi Cate... or should I say Lady Cate?! You're welcome! As soon as I saw the trinket box, I thought of you! I was glad I caught Molly before she left for Scotland so she could take it over. Saved me a trip to the post office! I needed the rest after that exciting trip. I'm sure Molly told you my uncle Ollie (I think you knew him while you were at Aberdeen) was kidnapped. In the end, it all turned out for the best! Not only did we find Uncle Ollie, but we also found Cleopatra's tomb!!!!

I've never been on such a wild ride in my entire life! Henry was my rock through the whole thing! I can't wait for you to meet him! I hope I don't sound too eager, but I'd love to accept your invitation to visit! Maybe in the spring? I bet it's just beautiful there during that season. I bet it's just beautiful there in all the seasons!

I heard from Molly already. She sounds ecstatic about her new job! Gosh, I can't wait to visit and see you both! Let's talk about a spring visit if that's okay with you!

Enjoy the holidays! Maggie

Cate grinned at her laptop screen. Same old Maggie, she mused. Cate always found Maggie's more extroverted nature alien, although she appreciated her forthrightness. Maggie had no qualms to accept her invitation and suggest a date. Spared from the awkward second-guessing of whether to suggest a date or not, Cate was pleased to have Maggie take the lead.

She returned Maggie's email over dinner, agreeing to a spring visit. As Cate finished the email and closed her laptop, she leaned back in her chair, spooning another mouthful of Mrs. Fraser's soup into her mouth.

Cate carried her tray to the fireplace, in a pensive mood. She finished her dinner as she watched the flames dance in the fireplace. After Molly retrieved her tray, Cate settled into her armchair near the fire with a novel.

After a few moments, she found it impossible to concentrate. Her eyes focused on the bookcase across the room. Details of her dream floated back through her mind. She shivered as she recalled the icy wind that had gusted through the room.

She pressed her lips together as she tried to steady her nerves and assure herself that everything was fine. A moment later, she snapped her book shut and raced across the room, calling the dogs after her.

She stared at the bookshelf from the hallway, a frown on her lips as the unshakable feeling of terror descended on her.

CHAPTER 6

Cate swallowed hard as she sucked in breaths. She stared back at the bookcase, recalling the fear she'd experienced in her nightmare. With her unsettled nerves getting the better of her, she elected to relax in her sitting room for the evening. She gathered both dogs into her arms and scurried from the library. Before closing the door behind her, she shot one last glaring look at the bookcase that cost her a good night's sleep the previous night.

Cate bounded out of bed, excitement filling her. Today, for the first time in years, she'd decorate a Christmas tree with people she considered family instead of alone.

Of course, she never considered herself alone even before moving to Scotland. She'd had her trusty pal, Riley, with her through the holidays. Riley, however, did not often hold up his end of the conversation.

It thrilled Cate to have others share in draping the tree in lights and ornaments. She also looked forward to the warm cookies and hot chocolate Mrs. Fraser promised. Cate wasn't sure if the tree decorating or the cookies excited her more, but either way she felt like a kid on Christmas morning. She could almost taste the buttery flavor of the cookies in her mouth already.

Cate skipped downstairs with Riley and Bailey in tow. The household planned to gather after breakfast and make a relaxing day of tree decorating. Cate brought an ornament she purchased for Riley's first Christmas with her.

She'd tracked down a matching one online and had it sent to add to the tree marking Bailey's first Christmas. She'd also purchased several new toys for the two pups to find under the tree on Christmas morning. This Christmas would also mark the first time in years Cate would exchange gifts with others. She had excitedly shopped for unique gifts for everyone.

Cate was the first to arrive to the sitting room. Evidence of Jack's presence was obvious with the arrival of the live Christmas tree set up near the window. A smiled spread across Cate's face as she eyed the tree. After a spirited discussion weeks ago, Mr. Fraser and Jack had won Cate over from a fake Christmas tree to a real one. Mrs. Fraser, who claimed she had no horse in the race, mentioned enjoying the scent of a real pine to help sway Cate's mind. Cate agreed, confessing she'd never had a live tree before.

"All the more reason to have one now!" Jack concluded after they decided.

Jack joined Cate in the sitting room, carrying two boxes of decorations with him.

"Let me help you," Cate offered, relieving him of one of the boxes.

"Thank you, Lady Cate. I've got two more boxes to bring," he informed her as he set his box down.

Cate dumped hers near the tree. "I'll come with you. I can carry one of the boxes."

"At the risk of Mrs. Fraser having my head, okay. There's a light one you can carry. Besides, I'm sure I can't talk you out of it," Jack mentioned.

"You can't." She followed him from the room, leaving the two pups sniffing the boxes like newfound treasure.

"Oh, while I have you," Cate began as they traversed the hallways to the storage area.

Jack side-eyed her, arching an eyebrow. "Oh, no. I suspected you had an agenda."

Cate huffed at him. "I do have an agenda. It's helping you carry the boxes. And, to kill two birds with one stone, I figured I'd impart the information I found in my search for the missing jewels."

Jack clasped his hands together and shot her a hopeful glance. "Have you solved the case yet?"

"Afraid not. I've got a good list of suspects. I plan to try to narrow it down tonight. I created a list of everyone working on the estate at the time, along with anyone else who may have been in the house visiting for the holidays."

"Anyone look promising as a thief?" Jack questioned as they entered the storage room.

"I'm not sure yet. I spent hours yesterday collecting employment information for each employee whose name appears in the records. I tracked down all the start and end dates, more or less. I plan to check if anyone was a recent addition to the staff just before the theft, or if anyone quit shortly after."

Jack nodded as he tugged a box free. "Sounds like a solid plan. Do you suppose you'll find anything?"

Cate shook her head. "I doubt it, but it's a decent place to start. I assume it's an angle the police or family would have followed up on."

"Possibly. Or they may not have, and you might get lucky."

Cate nodded, her eyes downcast and her lips pressed together in a thin line.

"Something else on your mind?" Jack asked as he handed her a small, light bin marked "Christmas decorations."

Cate shifted the box to balance on her hip as she frowned. "Rory MacKenzie, the master of the castle in 1925, had a brother, Lucas. He's my great-grandfather. Oh! Speaking of great-grandfathers, Lachlan Reid served as estate manager then. He's your great-grandfather. He's Stanley's father! I wonder if your grandfather has any information about the theft. Perhaps his father passed some stories to him."

"Uh-oh," Jack mumbled as he freed another box. "This is serious."

Cate's brows knit together. "What do you mean?"

"You're avoiding. When you avoid, there's something troubling you."

"I'm not avoiding!"

"Oh, aren't you? I suppose that worried expression on your face came from telling me I may run into my great-grandfather."

Cate shrugged and adjusted the box on her hip. "Well, you do hate time travel."

"Cate, what's on your mind?"

Cate stared down the hall as they ambled its length. “Well...” Cate’s voice trailed off.

“Caaaaate,” Jack prodded.

“What if Lucas MacKenzie was the thief?”

“Rory’s brother? Your great-grandfather? Why would he steal from his own family?”

“Because he didn’t inherit the bulk of the estate like his brother, Rory?” Cate conjectured.

“That’s a stretch,” Jack responded.

“It’s not. Family jealousies can run deep. Rory inherits the castle, the title, most of the fortune, most likely because he was born first. It must seem unfair in many instances.”

“Are we sure Lucas inherited nothing?” Jack inquired.

Cate’s eyebrows knit. “I’m unsure of the terms of the will, but I’d be surprised if he inherited anything substantial. Remember, he was my great-grandfather. My family wasn’t wealthy. I’m not saying we weren’t comfortable, we were. But we weren’t millionaires.”

“Okay,” Jack answered, rubbing his chin. “So, Lucas is jealous of big brother, Rory, for inheriting the fortune and steals some of the family jewels. Possible, but I’m still not convinced it’s probable.”

“Probable or not, we can’t rule him out. He’s a reasonable suspect. He has a motive...”

“Potential motive,” Jack corrected.

Cate nodded, then continued. “He likely had means and opportunity, as I doubt they’d keep the family jewels under careful guard from family members.”

“Okay,” Jack agreed with a nod. “You’ve got a point. I agree he should remain on the suspect list for now. But why is it such a worry?”

“If Lucas turns out to be the thief... well...” Her voice trailed off as she slowed to a stop, staring at her feet with a grimace on her lips. “I’ve descended from a thief!”

“Oh, Cate,” Jack admonished gently. “Is that what’s got you worried? So what? It doesn’t make you a thief! Besides, I think it’s a long shot.”

Cate shrugged, remaining unconvinced. “It would explain why my family was blotted out of the family bible. It may also explain the unsolved case. Perhaps Rory figured it out. To save face, he may have kept mum about it outside of the family, including to the police. But he blotted my side out of his life.”

“We have no confirmation the blot occurred in Rory’s time,” Jack responded. “And isn’t Lucas still listed? The blot only covers his children and their children and so on, right?”

Cate nodded. Lucas’s name was still visible in the Bible. “Right.”

“It’s quite a leap to assume Lucas is the thief. And even if he is, Cate, it means nothing now. What your great-grandfather may or may not have done has no bearing on you. You, Catherine Kensie, are a wonderful, caring, kind person.”

A smile crossed Cate’s face.

“For that matter,” Jack continued. “Perhaps it was my great-grandfather who was the thief. And, as you can see, even if it was, it has no bearing on how wonderful I am.” He grinned at her.

Cate giggled as she shook her head. “No. No bearing on your humility either. And, just to be clear, I considered your ancestor, but there’d be no reason for him to steal it and continue working on the estate.”

“That’s not true. Perhaps he had a similar reason of jealousy. Perhaps Pap is hiding those jewels somewhere at home for a rainy day. Perhaps he did it for the thrill. Perhaps Lachlan sold them and set up a trust fund I’m not aware of!”

“Oh, Jack,” Cate responded, shaking her head. “Now who’s reaching?”

“Well, perhaps it is a reach, but my point is let’s not be judge, jury, and executioner for your great-grandfather just yet.”

Cate nodded, agreeing. “Okay, deal.”

“Good, I’m glad that’s settled,” Jack answered as they approached the sitting room door.

“Oh, one more thing,” Cate muttered, screwing up her face as she glanced up to him.

“Uh-oh,” Jack groaned. “That expression is just as bad as the worried one.”

Cate rolled her eyes at him. “We can’t investigate until after the new year. But we could make a quick trip to the past after the Snow Ball to check the lay of the land.”

“Ugh,” Jack groaned. “And here I assumed I had at least two weeks off from time traveling!”

“Perhaps we can rule Lucas out as a suspect. I’d sleep a lot better if we could!” Cate flashed her best pleading glance to Jack.

Jack rolled his eyes at her. “Okay, okay. You tell me when and I’ll go with you. For the sake of clearing your name and your sleep habits, Lady Cate.”

Cate smiled at him. “Thank you. I appreciate that and so do my sleep habits.”

They pushed through the doors, finding the rest of the group already sorting through decorations. Molly and Bailey played tug-of-war with a frayed bow. Riley nosed through the bins with Mrs. Fraser and Mr. Fraser worked to unravel a string of lights. Cate beamed at the Christmas card-like scene. No matter what she found investigating the theft, she would not allow it to dampen her spirits.

They spent the rest of the day stringing lights, hanging ornaments, sipping hot chocolate and enjoying Mrs. Fraser’s cookies. Cheese and wine were served in the afternoon as they relaxed and shared memories of Christmases past. To add the final touch, Cate climbed the step ladder and placed the star on top of the tree. Afterward, Jack lit the lights, turning the tree into a glimmering focal point of the room. Applause erupted from the group as they admired their handiwork.

Cate slept like a log that night. She awoke refreshed and ready to greet Mr. Smythe and Gayle, set to arrive later in the day. She even felt prepared to take on the Isla Campbell meeting scheduled this morning. With the party just around the corner, Mrs. Campbell would be brimming with enthusiasm.

With her busy schedule, Cate figured the day would race by. She climbed from her bed, dressing for the day as she hummed a Christmas carol. The dogs enjoyed a brisk walk after breakfast before she herded them into the library with a pair of bones courtesy of Mrs. Fraser. With the pups occupied, Cate met Mrs. Campbell at the front door, escorting her to the decorated sitting room.

“Oh, oh, doesn’t that tree look marvelous!” Mrs. Campbell complimented.

“Thank you! We took a day as a household yesterday to decorate it together.”

“Oh? You mean... with the... staff?”

“Yes! Jack, Mr. and Mrs. Fraser and our newest addition, Molly!” Cate noted as Molly entered with a tray of tea.

“Speak of the devil!” Molly joked, setting the tray down on the coffee table as Cate and Mrs. Campbell settled into their seats.

“Mrs. Campbell, you may remember Molly Williams, our newest addition to the castle. Molly worked at Aberdeen College with me.”

“Oh, hello, Molly!” Mrs. Campbell greeted her, eyeing her from head to toe. “Welcome to the staff!”

“Thank you! I’m excited to be here!”

Mrs. Campbell studied her another moment before turning her attention to the tea tray.

“Thanks, Molly. We’re all set,” Cate prompted, realizing Mrs. Campbell hoped to be rid of Molly to begin their meeting.

“Oh, right! Just give us a ring if you need anything else!” Molly disappeared through one of the doorways, leaving Cate and Mrs. Campbell alone.

“Charming girl,” Mrs. Campbell commented, sounding as though she didn’t mean it.

Cate poured her tea, handing it to her. “She’s a wonderful addition.”

“I’m glad to hear she’s working out. Well, we have a million details to discuss. Shall we begin?”

“Yes,” Cate replied, opening her folder. They covered the remaining outstanding details, discussed the timeline for final setup and double-checked all the particulars. As they finished, Cate mentioned viewing the trees. “I imagine you’ll be quite pleased when you see them. They’re exactly what you wanted.”

“I cannot wait to verify that! Oh, but before we go, I hoped to take a few minutes to discuss the upcoming VIP New Year’s Eve party.”

“Of course,” Cate agreed.

“Oh, I realize we’ll meet again twice before that event, but my nerves are getting the better of me!”

“Well, I’m sure you’ve got everything handled as always, Mrs. Campbell,” Cate assured her.

“Yes, yes,” Mrs. Campbell waved her hand in the air, glancing over her reading glasses at Cate. “Platitudes are comforting but,” she began, pulling her glasses away from her face and shutting her eyes. “This party must come off without a hitch. It's so vital. This is the first time in years the castle will entertain VIPs. There is no room for error!"

"I understand..." Cate began.

"With all due respect, I'm not sure you do, Lady Cate," Mrs. Campbell interrupted her. "Peerage, lines of succession, et cetera. Americans tend not to be well-versed in these subjects. Word of parties such as these get around. We want them to get around the appropriate social circles and for the proper reasons. We want to be the talk of the town, for all the right reasons! We want everyone who is anyone to seek an invitation to Dunhaven Castle again!"

Cate smiled and nodded. "I'm coming to understand the importance, yes."

"Oh, I apologize if I sound overbearing. But Dunhaven Castle has been no stranger to elites in the past! And we want it to welcome them again! Why, I'm almost certain Dunhaven Castle has welcomed even a duke once or twice before!"

"How exciting!" Cate feigned.

"Oh, yes! To welcome a duke... oh!" Mrs. Campbell shut her eyes as though she was imagining the scene in her head.

Cate indulged her. The parties meant a great deal to the woman, and Cate allowed her to have her moment. "With the work you're doing, I'm certain we'll welcome a duke again. Soon, I'll bet!"

"You're too kind, Lady Cate."

They spent another forty-five minutes going over details for the VIP event. Afterward, Mrs. Campbell and Cate toured the ballroom and gardens outside. After a few minor adjustments, the decor satisfied Mrs. Campbell's picky tastes. Even the gardens received her approval after careful inspection. Mrs. Campbell promised to return prior to trucks arriving with the tables and chairs the following morning.

After seeing her off, Cate shut the door behind her, leaning against it for a moment.

"Exhausting, isn't she?" Jack queried, startling her from her musings.

"Yes," Cate laughed. "But at least she approved everything with minimal changes."

"But she couldn't resist mentioning that bloody snow machine one last time."

Cate chuckled, glancing at her timepiece. “Almost lunch time. Good thing. I’m starving!”

“Party planning makes you hungry, does it?”

“It does. But first I’d better take the pups outside.”

“Where are the poor little pups? Shut away from the party czar?”

Cate chuckled as she led Jack to the library. “Yes. Shut away in the library with a few bones courtesy of Mrs. Fraser.”

She popped open the door, searching the room for Riley and Bailey. She spotted the bones discarded on the rug near the fireplace. After scanning further, she found both dogs in their new favorite spot.

“That’s odd,” Jack noted.

Cate stared at it for a moment, swallowing hard as he tried to understand why it was that drew both her and her dogs to the bookshelf.

CHAPTER 7

Cate's eyes focused on the bookshelf. A shiver shot up her spine again as her heart thudded in her chest.

"Yoo-hoo, Lady Cate?" Jack inquired.

Cate raised her eyebrows and sucked in a deep breath. "Sorry. Yeah, the dogs have been at that bookshelf for days, but I hadn't found anything of interest. I'm going to have to follow up on it later."

"Let me know if you find anything," Jack requested.

"I will," Cate answered. "If I get a chance after the party, I'll give it a thorough search."

"Speaking of, anything else that needs taken care of before the party or before Mr. Smythe and Ms. Pearson arrive today?"

Cate shook her head. "No, we're all set!"

"Okay," Jack answered. "I'll meet you out front when they arrive to help with the luggage."

"Thanks! Come on, Riley and Bailey, let's go for a walk!" At the offer, both dogs bounded toward Cate. Cate indulged them in a walk both before and after lunch, feeling guilty for keeping them contained all morning. By mid-afternoon, they were tired enough for a quick nap before the rest of Cate's guests arrived.

The rest of the day flew by with Cate greeting Mr. Smythe, the estate's attorney and his assistant, Gayle, in the late afternoon and enjoying a dinner with her guests before they retired early, both tired from their long journey. Cate turned in early also, hoping to get a solid night's sleep before the final set up tomorrow. She slept soundly, her dreams filled with balls, dresses and entertaining royalty.

Cate's alarm screamed through the morning air, startling her awake. Cate bolted upright, surprised she hadn't awoken before it as usual. She must have been more tired than she realized from the commotion in the house yesterday. At least she had slept, she figured, as she climbed from her bed, yawning.

She plodded to her en-suite bathroom to shower and dress for the day. She hopped outside for a few brief moments with the dogs before breakfast. Frosty morning air greeted her, and she snuggled deeper into her coat. It signaled a cold snap moving into the area. The latest weather pattern was predicted to bring snow with it, just in time for the party.

After breakfast, everyone met in the ballroom to await the arrival of the tables, chairs, and other last-minute furniture items for setup. Mrs. Campbell arrived moments before the trucks pulled up. With everyone's help, they were unloaded by late morning, and they completed the final setup by late afternoon.

Cate was returning to her suite with the dogs for a cozy night of reading when Jack caught her in the upstairs hallway.

"Lady Cate," he called, flagging her down. "Do you have a moment?"

"Sure, what's up?" Cate asked as Jack scooped Riley up for a petting.

Riley offered an appreciative lick to the face as Jack scratched his ears.

"I just wanted to tell you when I checked on these little rascals earlier in the day, I found them staring at that bookshelf again."

Cate's brow furrowed. "I do not understand what keeps them so interested!"

Jack shrugged his shoulders. "I'm not sure either. I did a cursory glance over it. Nothing jumped out at me. The only reason I bring it up is because with the frequency that you've mentioned them interested in the same spot, we may want to have it looked into by an exterminator."

Cate pulled her lips back in a grimace. "An exterminator?"

"Yes, to ensure there are no vermin."

“Vermin?” Cate queried further, a deeper frown setting into her delicate features.

Jack chuckled at her reaction. “Yes, vermin, Lady Cate. Not very regal, but nevertheless, sometimes an issue in these old places.”

Cate wrinkled her nose at the notion but nodded. “Perhaps after the party, no sense in worrying about it right now. We’ve all got enough going on. Besides, I haven’t spotted anything, so, with any luck, it’s just a minor problem, if that’s the issue.”

“Right, I agree. Hopefully it isn’t the issue, but if it is, better to take care of it sooner rather than later. I’ll call on Monday to set up an appointment. It can’t hurt to have it checked.”

“Sounds like a plan. You can do it right after our trip to the past!” Cate exclaimed.

Jack rolled his eyes at her. “Don’t remind me. I’d rather the vermin than the time traveling.”

Cate made a face at him before they said their good nights. Jack returned Riley to her, and she and the pups disappeared down the hall into her suite. With the day’s work, she slept well when she retired. Not even the mice of the castle roused her. When Saturday morning arrived, she awoke to a winter wonderland outside her window. Overnight, several inches of snow had fallen. It dusted the landscape in a pristine white blanket. The sun crested the moors, creating a sparkling effect on the ground below. The white diamond blanket gleamed under the brilliant sun. It was a perfect winter scene for the party later.

Cate almost hated to step out into the unspoiled display and ruin it with footprints, but the dogs required their bathroom break before breakfast. She stood under an eave as she watched the dogs frolic around in the white powder. Aberdeen didn’t receive vast amounts of snow, so the sensation was new to Riley. He enjoyed it, bounding through mounds of snow with a goofy grin on his face. Both dogs nuzzled their faces into the cold, wet snow, pushing and rolling it around with their snouts. When finished, Riley wore a white beard of snow that clung to his fur in clumps.

Cate, a dog under each arm, pushed through the kitchen door. “Oh my!” Mrs. Fraser exclaimed. “What have we here?”

“They were a little overzealous in the snow,” Cate commented. “I don’t want them creating a melted mess in here.”

Mrs. Fraser lifted Riley from Cate's arms as Molly retrieved a towel. Together, they towed off both dogs before allowing them to settle in front of the warm stove.

Cate donned her dress for the party. Her black velvet bodice met her flowing plaid ankle-length skirt with a large plaid bow. Cate smoothed the fabric of the skirt as she gazed in the mirror. "What do you boys think?" she asked Riley and Bailey.

Both dogs, each sporting matching plaid bow ties, gazed at Cate, a quizzical expression on their faces.

Riley ventured over, sniffing at Cate's skirt, then cocking his head to the side and staring at her. Bailey, who didn't care for his new attire, rubbed at his face in an attempt to pull the tie off.

Cate ushered the two pups from the room, meeting Molly along the way. She scooped Bailey into her arms and Cate gathered Riley into hers. Together they made their way to the ballroom to await the guests' arrival. Mrs. Campbell arrived moments later, spending most of her time assessing the decor and making adjustments. She finished by giving a list of orders to the catering staff. After sending them on their way, orders in hand, she rejoined the group.

"Well, everything now seems to be order," Mrs. Campbell noted. "Is everyone ready?"

Everyone nodded, dressed in their finest and ready to receive guests. Jack held Riley and Mrs. Fraser carried Bailey, leaving Cate free to meet and greet guests.

"Are you sure the dogs will be... uh, that is, won't they be anxious through this?" Mrs. Campbell inquired.

"Oh, they'll be just fine. We'll put them to bed before the music and entertainment begins," Cate assured her. "It'll be fun for people to meet them."

"Oh," Mrs. Campbell glanced toward them, a disdainful look on her face. "I'm sure it will be."

Chimes sounded throughout the castle.

“Ah, that must be our first guests arriving,” Cate announced. “Places everyone!”

Nervous chuckles escaped her as she departed with Mrs. Campbell.

The ballroom filled up within fifteen minutes of the first guest arriving. When Cate reentered, leaving her post at the front door guarded by historical society volunteers, a buzz of chatter filled the air. Several people grouped around Riley and Bailey and their caretakers, fussing over both boys. Riley, secure in Jack’s arms, enjoyed the attention. Bailey played gracious host well as Mrs. Fraser encouraged him to “shake hands” with each guest.

Cate joined them, checking on both dogs before moving on to make her rounds around the room. She greeted each guest again, spending a few moments with each to discuss holiday plans, weather, hobbies, and a myriad of other small talk options. She tried to make everyone feel welcome and ensure they were enjoying themselves. Despite her introverted nature, Cate found this party easier than the Halloween Ball. It appeared her hostess skills were growing.

After greeting all her guests a second time, she returned to her two best buddies, suggesting they depart for a good night’s sleep. With Jack’s help, she returned them to her suite upstairs, removing their bow ties and settling them in their beds. They returned to the party within a few minutes.

Mrs. Campbell stormed toward them as they reentered. “There you are!” she exclaimed as though she’d been searching for hours.

“Is everything okay?” Cate inquired. “We just stepped out to settle the dogs.”

“I suppose it is now that I’ve found you. The orchestra is ready to begin.”

“Oh, great!” Cate exclaimed.

Mrs. Campbell nodded expectantly at her.

Cate glanced around the room, unsure of the meaning behind Mrs. Campbell’s stare. “Is there something else?”

“Of course, you should lead off the dancing, Lady Cate! Set the tone for the evening. Everyone will expect it of you.”

“OH!” Cate exclaimed. “Oh, no, I don’t think that’s necessary. Oh, it’s fine to just begin. I’m sure everyone will realize.”

“Nonsense, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Campbell dismissed, waving her hand in the air. “It wouldn’t be proper at this event to allow the guests to ‘join in’

whenever they'd like. The lady of the house must lead the first dance!"

"Well..." Cate hesitated, seeking a way out of the situation. "Perhaps Mr. and Mrs. Fraser. They're a lovely couple and they'd do great starting the dancing off!"

"But they are not the Countess of Dunhavenshire!" Mrs. Campbell tittered.

"But I..." Cate tried again.

"Nonsense, nonsense. No excuses. Who will you choose as your dancing partner? Have you someone in mind?"

"Ah..." Cate floundered, eyes wide as she searched the room.

"Lady Cate," Jack chimed in, bowing extravagantly, "might I have the pleasure of the first dance?"

Cate chuckled at him, breathing a sigh of relief. "Yes."

Mrs. Campbell eyed him up and down. "Well, I suppose he'll do. He's a nice strapping lad. I hope you have good form. And don't step on her toes."

"I wouldn't dream of it," Jack assured her.

Mrs. Campbell offered him an annoyed glance. "I shall make the announcement, then you lead Lady Cate to the dance floor to begin."

"Thanks for the save," Cate whispered as Mrs. Campbell departed for the small stage near the orchestra. "That threw me."

"You're welcome. I have a feeling the party czar is less than thrilled. If she had her way, you'd at least be dancing with someone equal in station."

"Or a duke," Cate said with a chuckle.

Mrs. Campbell tapped on the microphone. "Oh, hello, is this on? Ah, yes it is! Good evening, everyone. Thank you for attending the first annual Snow Ball at Dunhaven Castle! I hope you are enjoying yourselves and are as excited to be here as I am. I'd just like to take a moment before we begin the dancing to thank Lady Catherine Kensie, Countess of Dunhavenshire, for offering her lovely home for the event."

Cate held in a giggle, recalling it as less than an offer and more of a demand.

"The gardens outside have also been decorated for your enjoyment, please take a moment to enjoy them if you need a breath of fresh air. They are quite the winter wonderland! We're about to get underway with our entertainment and dancing, so I won't take up much more time! So, without further adieu, our Lady Cate will start us off, escorted by Mr. Jack Reid. Please join in with her after she sets our tone!"

Jack led Cate to the dance floor after she encouraged Mr. and Mrs. Fraser to join in after they began.

Cate smiled at Jack as she placed her hand in his and her other hand on his shoulder. He gripped her waist, a nervous grin on his face.

“I must confess, Lady Cate, I doubt I’ll be as good a partner as Randolph MacKenzie, but I’ll try not to step on your toes.”

Cate chuckled as the music began. Her mind flitted to her nightmare of a few nights ago. She swallowed hard as she hoped the music didn’t have the same dizzying effect it had in her dream.

CHAPTER 8

Cate sucked in a deep breath as they swirled around the dance floor. Images of her nightmare flitted through her mind, and she worried that she'd have a similar reaction. The music ramped up and she swallowed hard. Her heart beat hard in her chest. She glanced up at Jack with a tentative smile, trying to stop her lower lip from trembling.

She blew out a deep breath as she suffered no ill-effects after the first thirty seconds.

"Listen, I'm no dancer either," she admitted with a nervous grin.

"You made it look so easy with Randolph!" Jack noted as the orchestra played.

"Randolph made it look easy. He was the one who had to drag me around the dance floor," Cate said as they began to sway to the music.

They circled the dance floor once more before others joined in. Mr. and Mrs. Fraser joined next. The ever-outgoing Molly had already found a partner in Mr. Smythe to join with for the first dance. Gayle partnered with a local business owner, and was followed by Mrs. Campbell and her husband. Several others joined in as the music continued. Cate relaxed as the dance floor filled and she ceased to be the main focus of the group. The music, perfectly tuned, did not have any disorienting effects.

The song ended and everyone applauded. Despite enjoying the dance, Cate left the dance floor, relieved to have finished her duties as hostess.

"We made it through without me breaking your toes!" Jack exclaimed in triumph.

“And I didn’t trip you either! Although I am pleased to be finished with that duty.”

“My dancing’s that bad, is it? And here I thought I won you over.”

Cate blew out a relieved sigh and a chuckle. “It’s not. And as thoroughly enjoyable as that experience was, I’d have preferred it without everyone gawking at us.”

“Ah, I’ll keep that in mind. Lady Cate prefers private dances.” He smiled at her and winked.

Their conversation ended as a gentleman approached and asked for a dance with Cate. She obliged him, allowing him to lead her back to the dance floor. She spent the next several songs bouncing from partner to partner, though she found each experience enjoyable.

She left the dance floor to retrieve a drink, parched from the effort of the dances.

Jack sidled up to her as she floated at the room’s edge. “You say you’re not a dancer, Lady Cate? You seem to be doing a fine job of it for the last hour or so, lassie!”

“I’ve had a good set of partners.”

“Speaking of a good partner, Lady Cate,” Stanley Reid began approaching his grandson, Jack, and Cate, “would you fancy a dance with a real partner?”

“A real partner?” Jack questioned. “She’s already done that. Didn’t you catch the first dance? We were on full display, Pap.” He offered a playful clap on the older man’s back.

Molly approached the trio as they spoke.

“Oh, I saw it, that’s why I’m offering her a real dance. Poor lassie with you and your two left feet dragging her around the dance floor.”

“Two left feet, bah!” Jack replied.

“I would be happy to dance with you, Mr. Reid,” Cate answered with a chuckle.

Molly wrapped an arm around Jack’s shoulders with a giggle. “How about your two left feet dragging me around?”

“I’d be happy to,” Jack answered, offering her his arm.

“Watch your toes,” Stanley warned Molly with a wink as each couple made their way to the floor.

As the next song began, Cate marveled at Stanley’s smooth moves on the dance floor. He grinned at her. “I told you I was a good dancer.”

“Very good!” Cate agreed. “Lots of practice?”

“I’ve had a fair amount,” the older man admitted with a wink. “Enough to make that young laddie look like an amateur.”

Cate laughed as Stanley deftly spun her around. “Jack’s not a bad dancer either.”

“Learned everything he knows from me.” Stanley spun Cate around, flinging her away from him before pulling her back. “But I kept a few tricks to myself.”

Cate eyed him sideways, her grin on her face. “Poor Jack. You kept him in the dark on the best moves!”

“Aye,” Mr. Reid answered with a knowing nod.

As they came together in closed position, Cate glanced at him. “Do you mind if I ask you a question not related to dancing?”

“I don’t mind at all, lassie.”

“I’ve been reading about the theft that occurred here at Dunhaven Castle. The one back in 1925. I was wondering if you had any information about it.”

“Ah, the infamous theft. Yes, happened when my father was the estate manager here.”

Cate nodded at him as they swayed with the music. “Yes. That’s right. Did he ever mention it or anything about it?”

“Aye, he mentioned it all right. Never solved it. Said it was a real shame someone stole those jewels. Beautiful pieces, a real loss to the family.”

“Yes, the pieces were beautiful. I’m surprised the police never solved the case.”

“Looking into it, are you?” Mr. Reid asked, a twinkle in his eye. “One of the rips goes back to the year when the theft was discovered, doesn’t it?”

Cate smiled and nodded. “It does. And I’ll admit, I’d like to investigate it.”

“Jackie fighting you tooth and nail?”

“You know him so well. He isn’t pleased, but he’s willing to try at least.”

“Progress!”

The music ended, and the two left the dance floor to finish their discussion over a cool glass of punch. Jack wandered to them after a brief word with Molly.

Stanley sipped his punch and shook his head. "Well, I wish I could tell you more, lassie, but I'm afraid there wasn't much information available to solve the crime."

"Ah, she's hit you up for information on the theft, eh, Pap?" Jack queried, grabbing a glass of the cool beverage.

"Aye. We were discussing it while we floated across the floor. Did you see how it's done, Jackie?" Stanley arched an eyebrow.

Jack sipped at his glass. "Very funny, Pap. Now, is there anything you can tell us about this theft so Lady Cate can stop with her harebrained schemes to travel to the past?"

Stanley shook his head. "Fraid not. No one ever found the jewels. It's still a mystery. And a terrible shame. My father told me the jewels were stunning."

Cate sucked in a breath, arching an eyebrow. "So, he did talk to you about it?"

"Aye," Stanley responded, nodding again. "He shared this story with me once. I asked about it after reading it in an old newspaper article."

"And?" Jack prodded.

The corners of Stanley's lips turned down as he shrugged. "And nothing. The jewels went missing after a New Year's Eve party. They didn't return the jewelry to the safe that night. Nothing out of the ordinary. Figured they would be safe. They never imagined a theft would occur!"

"No suspects?" Cate questioned.

"Oh, they considered everyone on the estate. But they never found the jewelry and never built a strong case against anyone. Dad said after a while Rory refused to speak of it any further. He assumed it was too painful since they were his grandmother's jewels that had been lost. No one ever brought it up again. The mystery faded into oblivion, just like the jewels."

Jack shook his head. "Damn. I hoped you had the inside track."

"Thank you for the information," Cate replied.

"Sorry I couldn't be of more help," Stanley lamented. "I'm afraid those jewels are lost forever."

"Oh! There you are!" Mrs. Campbell shouted above the din of the room, waving to Cate. A tall, thin gentleman followed her. "Lady Cate, please meet Lord Dickinson. He'll be attending our VIP event. He traveled early to attend the Snow Ball. He's fascinated with your home!"

“Oh, thank you,” Cate voiced, smiling at the man as she shook his hand. “I’m pretty smitten with it myself.”

“How charmingly American of you,” he commented, bursting with laughter before whisking her away for a dance. Afterward, Mrs. Campbell cornered Cate to discuss the experience, gushing over the coup of having the likes of Lord Dickinson for not one but two events on the estate.

As the dancing wound down, Cate made another round through the party, chatting and conversing with each of her guests. The party started to wind down around midnight and guests overwhelmed Cate wishing to express their goodbyes and thank yous.

After the last guest had departed, Mrs. Campbell chattered to Cate about the rousing success of the event. With another event a little over a week away, she already had her next project to focus her excited energy on. Mrs. Campbell reminded Cate of their upcoming meeting on Friday. Only after Cate assured her she had not forgotten about the meeting did she judge it appropriate to depart.

Cate found the rest of the group snuggled around the Christmas tree in the sitting room.

She dragged herself into the room, slipping her shoes off as she sank next to Molly on one of the loveseats. “Whew,” she groaned. “I’m exhausted!”

“It was a lovely party, Lady Cate,” Mr. Smythe replied, nursing a nightcap.

“Oh, I agree,” Gayle echoed. “You’re getting good at this.”

Cate offered a weak smile. “I’m not sure about that. Mrs. Campbell is a pro at these things.”

Mrs. Fraser guffawed at the mention of Isla Campbell’s name. “And she’ll have this place rented out every chance she gets, I’m sure.”

“Not if I can help it!” Cate commented. “While I love to share this castle with anyone who wants to enjoy it, I value my privacy!”

“It sounds like she plans to milk this for all it’s worth,” Molly agreed with Mrs. Fraser. “She hasn’t stopped yammering on about having the ‘upper crust’ of society here.”

“She’s planning to put Dunhaven on the map, all right,” Mr. Smythe added. “I must agree the VIP party was a splendid idea.”

“She’s full of those,” Cate admitted. “Although, I have to say again, she’s quite good at this and her ideas are well-planned.”

“Except for the snow machine,” Jack interjected.

Cate nodded, grinning at him. “Except for the snow machine, yes.”

“Well,” Gayle announced as she stood, “I had a splendid time! And I am looking forward to the next party! But for now, I’m looking forward to stretching out in my bed. So, I shall say good night to everyone.”

Mr. Smythe finished his drink. “Yes, I will also take my leave.”

“You’ve both got the right idea,” Cate admitted. Everyone agreed, exchanging good nights and retiring for the evening.

As Cate changed into pajamas, she reflected on the evening. Another successful event was under her belt. She even enjoyed herself, feeling less overwhelmed than she had at her first party. A smile crossed her face as she went over the night’s events.

As she turned the bathroom light’s off, padding across her room to climb into bed, she recalled her conversation with Stanley Reid. While he could not provide much information, something he mentioned rattled through her mind. The elder Mr. Reid commented that, after a time, Rory refused to speak of it. He surmised it was too painful a memory. Cate wondered about the validity of that statement.

Perhaps there was another reason Rory MacKenzie refused to speak of it any further. Perhaps he learned the fate of the jewels and wanted the story buried lest the family name be impugned. Perhaps it was Cate’s ancestor who was the thief. Perhaps Rory MacKenzie preferred not to speak of it not because it was his grandmother’s property stolen, but because his own flesh and blood was responsible. The idea blazed through Cate’s mind as she struggled to sleep. She chewed her lower lip as she stared at the ceiling, one question burning. Was she descended from a thief?

CHAPTER 9

*A*nervous excitement drove Cate from her bed on a cloudy Monday morning. Trepidation over her ancestor's potential involvement in a theft had filled most of her night. But today, she may find an answer.

Despite entertaining guests, the time differential would allow Cate and Jack to disappear into the past for several hours and not be missed.

As she dressed for the day, Cate marveled at the trick of time travel, appreciating the anomaly today. With the trip taking less than an hour by her estimation, they would be back to the present in less than five minutes.

If she could determine if her grandparents were at the castle for the 1925 Christmas season, she may be able to rule them out as suspects.

Cate bit her lower lip as she considered it, hoping the poking around they did revealed some clue.

She met Jack in the library around ten. Most of the household, both past and present, should be occupied around this time, allowing them to make their trip unnoticed.

Riley bounded toward Jack, leaping into his arms as he approached.

"Good job, laddie!" Jack praised the little pup as he caught him mid-leap.

Bailey pranced across the room, interested but not quite as sold as Riley on Jack's appeal.

"He's really taken to that new trick you've taught him," Cate said.

"Aye, he has. He's a good little laddie, aren't you, Sir Riley?"

Riley answered with an appreciative lap on Jack's face.

“And you’re a good laddie, too, Mr. Bailey,” Jack assured the other dog, giving him a pat on the head.

Cate raised an eyebrow at him, her eyes sparkling with excitement. “Are you ready? I set the clothes out from the 1925 trunk in the usual place for you earlier. I think they’ll fit! I left them in your usual spot. All we have to do is change!”

“Nay, but I don’t suppose I have a choice.”

“Don’t be a stick in the mud. This is the easiest trip we’ll ever make! No talking to anyone. No stories to tell.”

“Speaking of stories. What is the cover story this time? In case we need it. Oh, please, let’s not make me a lawyer. The last time we pulled that number I ended up almost getting a man sent to death row.”

“First, you didn’t almost get him sent anywhere. Randolph did that on his own. Second, you ended up getting him released and the case against him dismissed. And third, we don’t need to say you’re a lawyer this time. People traveled more during the 1920s than the 1850s.”

“Hmm,” Jack pondered a moment, setting Riley on the floor. “True, but it makes most sense to continue the charade of being family. It gives us the best access to the family and the house. Although, on this trip, there is no reason to say we’re staying in Dunhaven. They had cars then! We could be traveling from town to town!”

“Good point. We don’t need to be traveling for business. So, there’s no reason for you to be a faux lawyer. Instead, we could be on vacation!”

“On vacation? The last time we spent weeks coming and going. Is that wise? Vacations are usually short term.”

“Hmm,” Cate murmured. “What about...”

“Land deals! We’re traveling in the area to consider properties for clients. I’m a land agent, seeking properties for wealthy clients whose information I cannot disclose because of confidentiality.” Jack puffed his chest out at the suggestion.

Cate pursed her lips. “It should work. Many estates had fallen on hard times before and during this era. It would make sense.”

“Perfect. That’s our story then. While in the area, I decided to look up my distant MacKenzie cousins and pay a call on them. This is my lovely secretary, Cate.”

Cate’s jaw dropped, a look of dismay on her features. “Secretary? Come on! Why do you always get to play the relative?”

“Because even in the 1920s, an American cousin sounds fishy. And what else would you be? Oh, you could be my wife again,” he added with a wink.

Cate shook her head, tapping her chin as she considered the options. “I’ll take wife. Even in the 1920s, a secretary traveling with her boss would look too forward. It might raise too many eyebrows. I’ll have to dig up that fake wedding band again, I suppose.”

“Okay, Cate. Shall we change and meet in your sitting room at eleven?”

Cate nodded. “Yes. I plan to leave the dogs there, too. The rip exists in the bedroom so they should be safe, and it’ll be easy to tell which era we’re in when we open the bedroom door.”

“Oh, that reminds me, before we go, I called the exterminator this morning. He’s going to stop by tomorrow. I realize it’s the day before Christmas but better sooner than having vermin running about all over the castle days before the VIP party.”

Cate wrinkled her nose. “I agree. Tomorrow’s fine. Okay, I’ll see you soon!”

Cate ushered the two dogs to her suite. They settled near the fireplace, playing with a few toys Riley pulled from his toy bin. Cate disappeared into her bathroom, doing her best to pull her hair into an acceptable style for the 1920s. After she was satisfied, she pulled on her day dress, which fell just below her knee and featured a drop-waist characteristic of the period. She paired it with t-strap pumps, also common for the era.

Cate glanced in the mirror, fussing with her hair until a knock sounded at her sitting room door. She rushed to the door, opening it, and waving Jack into the room.

He entered, wearing his British wool suit Cate selected for him. “These clothes are much more comfortable than the last getups, but they still leave something to be desired.”

“These are much more comfortable than the 1850s hooped skirts. I am not complaining in the slightest.”

“Yes, it appears much less unwieldy. If you fake a fainting spell again, I can easily drag you around the castle! Ready to get this over with?”

“Just a minute,” Cate replied, dashing from the room. She returned a moment later, shoving a gold band onto the ring finger of her left hand. “Now I am. Can’t forget my fake wedding ring!”

“No, we can’t forget that!”

Cate gave each pup a pat on the head and a kiss goodbye.

Jack tugged at his collar before shooting Cate a glance. "I must say, Lady Cate, I'm flattered you picked posing as my wife over my secretary. What a boost to my ego!"

Cate rolled her eyes at him. "Let's get going. That is, if you can fit through the door with your boosted ego."

"Okay, okay," Jack agreed, following Cate into the bedroom.

He placed his hand around Cate's as she clutched the timepiece. Together they rubbed the watch's face with their thumbs. The timepiece's second hand slowed, signifying interaction with the time rip. Within moments, the second hand crawled across the face, barely moving.

Cate spun to eye the room. "We made it!"

Jack pressed his hands over his chest in various areas. "I guess so."

Cate pointed across the room to an empty spot. "The dog beds are gone. We're in 1925!"

"Stop sounding so excited about it," Jack responded, creeping to the door. He inched it open and peeked into the sitting room. "All clear."

"Let's go!" Cate answered, pushing past him into the sitting room.

"Cate!" he hissed.

"What? No one should be in this wing. Gertrude used this bedroom well after the 1920s. If the ancestors in this era kept to the plan, they kept this room and hallway clear since a time rip leads to this year."

"Still, we should be careful!" he warned, hurrying to catch up and pass her. He approached the doors leading to the hallway. He twisted the knob inch by inch, easing the door open and peering into the hallway. "Clear."

He shut the door again, twisting to face her. "Cate, are you sure about this?"

"Yes!" she exclaimed just above a whisper. "It's two days before Christmas, the house is likely abuzz with Christmas preparations. Any holiday guests should have already arrived. Let's just have a peek around."

Jack wiped a bead of sweat from his brow. "Okay, okay. Let's get this over with."

He opened the door, stepping into the hall. Cate skirted around him, toward the intersection with another hallway of bedrooms. She turned the corner before retreating instantly and shoving Jack backward. She held her finger up to her lips and nodded her head to the other hallway as she signaled to peer around the corner.

They both leaned around it, staying as hidden as possible. A couple disappeared into a bedroom halfway down the hall. Raised voices floated down the hall, though no specific words could be made out.

Within a few moments, the man emerged, storming down the hallway. A moment later, the woman appeared, sniffing, and wiping her nose with a handkerchief before shoving it up her sleeve. She sighed before heading in the opposite direction from their hiding spot with a determined step.

Cate narrowed her eyes, glancing to Jack. He shrugged his shoulders in response. She motioned for them to continue down the hall. Cate noted the bedroom the couple used, planning to check it for any clues when she returned to her time.

They reached the end of the hallway and Cate sped down a back set of stairs. She hurried along the corridor toward the main staircase.

Jack raced behind her. "Cate, where are you going?"

"To identify that couple. They must have been headed down here. Perhaps to the sitting room or the library. Let's see if we can overhear a conversation!"

They spent a few moments skulking around the common areas of the castle. They found nothing. A lone woman read in the library, her feet propped on an ottoman. The slit between the doors allowed no other information about who else may be in the room, if anyone. They spotted the man from the bedroom scene walking outside alone. Another woman sat in the sitting room, working on needlepoint.

"Shoot!" Cate groused, stamping her foot as they hid around a corner near the main staircase.

"Sorry, Cate. No conversations to overhear. Let's head back."

Cate pressed her lips together in a thin line as she nodded. Jack led her down the hallway to the backstairs. They ascended the staircase, turning into the hallway containing the 1925 couple's bedroom, on their way toward Cate's suite. Halfway down the hall, a footman rounded the corner from the hallway containing Cate's bedroom.

Jack and Cate stopped dead as did the other man. For a brief moment, they stared at each other, each party hesitant and questioning. Time seemed to stand still.

Cate's eyes went wide, her jaw hung open in shock. Her pulse quickened and she swallowed hard. The easy trip had just turned dangerous. They'd been spotted. And they were cut off from the return point.

She glanced at Jack as the man called, “Oi! Who are you two?”

Cate grasped Jack’s arm, tugging him in the opposite direction.

“Hey! You two stop right there!”

Cate raced around the corner, Jack in tow. She ran full speed, veering around another corner.

“Quick!” she shouted. “To the back hallway!”

They ran headlong down the next hall, approaching the windowed corridor overlooking the back gardens. Cate skidded to a halt, out of breath and puffing with effort.

She grabbed Jack’s hand, placing the time piece in his palm. After placing her thumb on his thumb, she wrapped her hand around his. She forced his thumb to rub the face. “Come on, come on!” she implored as the second hand speeded up.

They both glanced up as the footman rounded the corner. Cate’s eyes widened and her heart thudded against her ribs. Her knees wobbled underneath her as she wondered if they would escape.

CHAPTER 10

Cate gasped as the footman narrowed his eyes at them. He stalked forward, his sights set on them. “There you...”

Within seconds, he disappeared before their very eyes as they slipped back to the present time.

“Oh!” Jack gasped, grabbing his chest as he collapsed against the windowsill.

Cate breathed a sigh of relief, propping herself against the neighboring windowsill. “That was close.”

Jack issued her a troubled glance. “That’s what you call close? That man almost caught us! We disappeared right in front of that man’s eyes! Thank goodness you remembered this hallway is a universal return point.”

Cate nodded as she caught her breath. “Yeah, or we’d be toast!”

“We already are, aren’t we?”

“What do you mean?” Cate inquired.

“That footman got a good look at us. He’ll recognize us if we go back.”

Cate shook her head. “Only if we go back this month. If we travel in January, he wouldn’t have seen us yet. The year resets. Since he saw us in December of 1925, and we’d be traveling back to January of 1925, he hasn’t seen us yet. We’re in the clear to investigate after the new year.”

Jack tapped his hands against the stone sill as he needed. “Oh, right. I never keep that straight.”

“Good thing I do,” Cate said with a grin.

“Oh, yeah,” Jack said, his voice still shaky. “Good thing. Now we’re clear to take our life in our hands again.”

“Next time we won’t skulk around. We’ll just sneak from the house and ‘visit’ with the family!”

Jack pushed himself up to standing, running a shaky hand through his hair. “Oh, is that all?”

“Very funny.”

“So, we’re agreed no more trips to the past until after the new year at least?”

Cate nodded with pursed lips. “Agreed. We can’t chance getting caught again and we can’t introduce ourselves to anyone. We’re chained to the present until after the new year.”

“I prefer to call it safe until after the new year,” Jack countered.

“Well, on the bright side, it gives me over a week to plan our next trip! Now,” Cate said, straightening from her lean against the wall, “time to change!”

“First suggestion I’ve agreed with in this whole situation!”

Cate eyed him as he chewed his lower lip. “You okay? Need a hand?”

Jack heaved a deep breath and wiped a bead of sweat from his brow. “My heart is just settling to normal rhythm. One day you’ll be the death of me, Lady Cate.”

“I certainly hope not!” Cate said with a giggle.

They threaded their way through the back hallways, avoiding her company and returning to their respective bedrooms to change. As Cate removed her 1920s frock, she reflected on their journey. Who was the couple they spotted in the hall? Was it her ancestors, Lucas and Amelia? Their presence on the estate in late 1925 would suggest they had been invited back the following holiday season. Which led Cate to surmise there hadn’t been a falling out. Or had that been when Rory discovered they were the jewel thieves and refused to speak of the incident further? Too many questions stirred in her mind. Those questions piled on top of the close call would likely make for a sleepless night later.

She considered the chance meeting. Jack and she had been in the wrong place at the wrong time, stumbling upon the surprised footman. Her palms dampened with sweat as she recalled their race through the hallways to escape since the lone footman barred their pathway to the rip point.

A long sigh escaped her as she folded the dress and set it aside in her bedroom. Their first visit to 1925 was a bust. They gained no information. They couldn't visit again until after the new year. Cate sank to her bed, perturbed by the situation.

After a moment, she rose, unable to solve anything and unwilling to sit still and fret. Instead, she decided to visit the room they had spotted the couple in after lunch. If she was lucky, perhaps she would find a clue to their identity. If she was even luckier, perhaps she'd find the missing jewelry. Cate chuckled to herself as she rounded up the dogs for a pre-lunch walk. She wasn't that lucky. Then again, she had inherited a castle...

After lunch, Cate enjoyed a long walk with Gayle and Mr. Smythe around the property. They parted ways for an afternoon respite. Cate seized the opportunity to search the bedroom she flagged during their visit to the past.

At first glance, the bedroom didn't appear to hold any secrets. Cate spent her time poking around any hidden areas she found. She peered under the bed, shining her cell phone's flashlight into every nook and cranny. She searched through drawers, most of which were empty. She slipped her hand between the mattress and box springs, feeling around blindly for any scrap of evidence. She found nothing.

Cate sat back on her haunches, sighing. She glanced around the room again. Undeterred, she made another search, this time peering behind furniture, checking underneath drawers, pressing decorative features on the walls and anything else to find a secret compartment or hidden message.

She finished, hands on her hips, glaring at the room with narrowed eyes. It told her nothing. She hadn't expected to find much, but she was still disappointed. She trudged back to her bedroom to freshen up before dinner, frustrated.

Cate gasped, shooting up to sitting as she caught her breath. Her heart raced and sweat beaded across her forehead. Another nightmare, she recalled. A shaky hand reached for the clock, checking the time. It was two in the morning. Cate collapsed back into her pillows. She closed her eyes, but after a moment, they snapped open again. She couldn't sleep yet, not with the memory of the nightmare running through her mind.

She recalled the details, allowing her mind to process it in an attempt to calm herself. In the dream, Cate entered the library, intent on doing work. She carried dozens of folders in her arms, brimming with papers. She struggled through the door. Riley and Bailey greeted her on the other side. As she entered, the two dogs burst into a barking fit. Riley's shrill howl mixed with Bailey's raucous baying. The sound startled Cate and she lost her grip on her research materials. The folders fell to the floor, their contents dumping in a chaotic array in front of her.

"Shoot!" she mumbled, stooping to collect the papers. She glanced toward the dogs as they continued their ear-piercing ballad. As she raised her eyes to them, her jaw dropped open. The source of their panic obvious, she sprang to standing, her eyes unwavering from their target. A gaping hole stared back at her where a bookcase had been. She swallowed hard, digging deep to find the courage to approach the dogs and shoo them away from it. As she stepped toward them, a gust of wind blew through the room, rustling the spilled papers. The air smelled of musty dampness. She continued a few more steps, now fighting the growing windstorm. The contents of the dumped folders swirled around the room in a dizzying eddy. She held her arms in front of her face, shielding it from the flying papers that threatened to slice her cheeks with their razor-sharp edges.

The sweeping wind reduced Cate's eyes to slits. An odd sound met her ears, causing her to open her eyes wider and lower her arms. She stared into the black abyss yawning in front of her, straining to make out any sound. Then it hit her like a wall of water. An unearthly disembodied voice warned her to beware. She clapped her hands over her ears, squeezing her eyes tight as she doubled over. Her heart pounded, her pulse raced, and she held her breath. Then she awoke.

Cate shook her head at the dream's memory. She concluded she was nervous about what the exterminator would find. She rolled over, staring at the moonless sky. Even with the stars, the sky seemed as black as the gaping void in her dream. She shivered, reminded of the phantom voice emanating from the hole. She was glad the exterminator was coming today. Perhaps then she could put one mystery to rest.

Cate paced the floor of the library, waiting for the exterminator to arrive.

“You’re going to wear a hole in the floor, Cate,” Jack warned.

“I can’t help it. I had another dream about that bookcase. I can’t wait to get these results!”

After the exterminator arrived, Cate continued her nervous traipsing about the room, anxious to hear the man’s report. After two hours of poking around the library and other various locations in the castle, the man, whose uniform name tag read Duncan, noted a few things on his clipboard, then glanced to Jack and Cate.

“Well, what’s the verdict?” Jack questioned.

“Everything appears in order. No signs of infestation, droppings or anything of the sort,” Duncan answered, his Scottish accent thick.

“Really? Nothing?”

“Don’t look a gift horse in the mouth, Lady Cate. I, for one, am glad we don’t have mice or bugs.”

Duncan put his hands in the pockets of his gray overalls. “It appears you don’t. I’ve no idea what’s intriguing the little rascals. I’ve found nothing. Which is excellent given the size and age of the castle. I placed a few traps around, just in case. I can return on Friday to check on them. If there’s nothing in them, I’d say you’re all clear.”

“Well, I suppose it is good news,” Cate admitted with a sigh.

“Yes, it is,” Jack agreed. “Friday is fine.” He reached out to shake the man’s hand. “You can leave your bill with me, and I’ll show you out when you’re ready.”

Duncan retrieved his bag, stowing his clipboard inside after tearing off the top sheet and handing it to Jack. He slung it over his shoulder and reached for Cate’s hand. “Lady Cate, enjoy the rest of your day.”

“Thank you,” Cate answered as she shook his hand.

Duncan turned to Jack and said, “Lead the way, Jackie.”

Cate chuckled at Jack’s nickname, one used by his grandfather and evidently his former high school classmates.

Jack appeared a few moments later, stuffing the paperwork into his estate folder. “Well, barring any finds in the trap, we don’t have to worry about any creepy crawlies in the castle.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “Thank goodness! That’s not a subject I’d like to discuss just before lunch!”

“Me too! I’d hate to have my lunch ruined. I’m starving!”

After lunch, drizzly rain kept everyone indoors. Mr. Smythe had brought two jigsaw puzzles to pass his holiday. “A lovely puzzle, wouldn’t you agree?” he asked Cate as she admired the picture on the box. “Reminds me of a winter in Dunhaven in olden times with the horse-drawn sleigh and the snow-covered streets!”

“A little too many snow-covered everythings,” Gayle quipped, not as pleased with the one-thousand-piece puzzle as Mr. Smythe.

Cate imagined Mr. Smythe’s assessment was correct, figuring the town looked similar to this in bygone eras. She glanced outside the window. Cold rain drizzled from a gray sky, washing away the snow. Cate lamented the loss of the white powder, but a Christmas Day storm promised a white Christmas again by mid-morning.

“Whew,” Gayle sighed, hands on her hips. “Cate, I dare say we need you to more than dabble if we plan to finish this puzzle before we depart!”

Cate laughed, staring at the partially built puzzle, consisting of an outer ring of edge pieces and a blank center. Gayle attempted to build the horses, sleigh and its passengers but didn’t have much luck.

“Mmm, yes, this is thoroughly challenging,” Mr. Smythe agreed. “But we’re up to the challenge! If we begin with the snowy pieces...”

“Begin with the snowy pieces?” Gayle cried. “Why that’s all the pieces!”

Cate snapped her book shut and inched closer to the table. “Okay, I’ll play.” She began on an unoccupied corner, starting with the snow-covered ground.

Hours later, with cricks in their necks, they left the puzzle in favor of dinner. It remained half finished, but they had made significant progress on the snow-covered ground, much to Mr. Smythe’s delight.

After their evening meal, which they shared as a group with staff and guests alike, they gathered again in the sitting room, lit only by the roaring fire and lights from the Christmas tree. They enjoyed each other’s company, swapping stories of Christmas' past before bed. The easy evening relaxed Cate, allowing her to fall into a tranquil sleep.

Christmas morning brought snow from the day's first light until mid-morning. After playing in the white powder, Cate settled Riley and Bailey near a warm fire in the sitting room. The household met to exchange gifts over a light meal.

Out of everyone, Riley and Bailey received the most.

"We may need to put another room on the castle for all these toys," Cate joked, eyeing the spread under the tree after the gifts were unwrapped.

"Those two cuties are too fun to buy for," Molly commented.

"I agree," Gayle chimed in. "And I deleted a few items from my cart before I purchased, I'll have you know."

"I preferred edible presents," Mr. Smythe responded, handing each dog a treat. "You only need to store those until they are eaten."

Cate offered a wry smile at Mr. Smythe's practicality as she sipped her hot chocolate.

"Aye, they'll be out of those in no time," Mrs. Fraser confirmed. "Those two rascals are always begging for a treat."

"Reminds me of someone," Stanley, who had also joined them for Christmas, joked as Jack snagged another cookie from the cookie tray.

"Those laddies take after the perfect specimen," Jack retorted. "And why pick on just me. Lady Cate's been sneaking cookies all day!"

"Lady Cate is allowed because she is the lady of the house," Mrs. Fraser answered.

"Hey!" Cate exclaimed. "Stop counting my cookies!"

Molly grabbed another cookie from the tray and refilled her hot chocolate. "Yikes, I hope you haven't been counting mine."

Gayle agreed, nodding her head.

"Okay, okay," Jack said, holding his hands up in defeat. "Stop picking on me, ladies, I haven't been counting anyone's cookies!"

"You need to keep a better eye on him, Stan," Mr. Fraser suggested with a chuckle. "Jackie's going to get himself in trouble one of these days with those girls."

"Don't worry." Mrs. Fraser patted Stanley's hand. "I've got my eye on him. The moment he steps out of line..."

"Please, don't continue," Jack answered. "I've learned my lesson. And weren't we talking about the laddies and their love for treats?"

Jack poured a few more from the bag, handing them out to Riley and Bailey.

“Nice dodge,” Cate responded.

“How about a few Christmas carols?” Mr. Smythe suggested. He seated himself at the piano to accompany the singing. The group passed the rest of the afternoon with hot chocolate, cookies, and Christmas carols.

Dinner brought a fantastic feast, courtesy of the catering company Mrs. Fraser contracted. The amount and variety of food left everyone full and sluggish. They gathered again around the Christmas tree in the sitting room for a lazy evening.

Cate climbed into bed, satisfied with her first Christmas in the castle. The gifts she received brought a smile to her face, each for its own unique reason. However, Cate felt as though she needed no gifts this Christmas. Her new home and family were gift enough.

The next day, Cate joined her guests and staff for a day of post-Christmas shopping in town. It allowed her staff an additional day of rest since the group dined in town for both lunch and dinner after enjoying a quiet morning on the estate. They enjoyed the town’s picturesque, charming nature and the post-Christmas sale prices. Molly joked she may need to request a raise after her purchases, many of which were gifts she planned to send home. A nice reminder to her sister of her new life, she stated.

They returned to the castle in the early evening. Cate dumped her packages in her sitting room and retrieved the dogs for an evening walk. She contemplated her upcoming day. A meeting with Mrs. Campbell topped her to-do list. Preparations for the upcoming VIP New Year’s Eve event must begin after clearing away the Snow Ball set up and decorations.

The past few days had been idyllic, a wonderful relaxation after the bustle of the party. Ready to take on the next event, she climbed into bed for a solid night’s sleep before her planning and work meeting tomorrow.

Cate sat at the library desk. A blank cursor stared back at her. The penning of her chapter on Douglas MacKenzie, the castle’s first proprietor, stalled. She pawed through her notes, searching for information to add to the chapter. As she searched, the words blurred on the page. She blinked a few times, trying to clear her tired eyes. She stared at her notes, finding them incomprehensible. Letters jumbled together into meaningless nonsense.

She shook her head, shutting her eyes. When she opened them, the words on the page appeared to be moving. Disgusted, she shoved the papers away from her, realizing the movement wasn't words but bugs. The insects scattered in all directions, hiding from the light in any dark corner they found on the desk.

Cate pushed back from the desk, standing and retreating a few steps away. While she contemplated what to do, a breeze rustled her hair. She snapped her head in the wind's direction, surprised to find an open black hole in place of one of the bookshelves in the room. Her pulse quickened as she stared at the hole. Despite her better judgement, she approached the opening, trying to make out anything within. She spotted nothing except blackness.

She stood at the edge of the opening. Cool air drifted from the space hidden by the bookcase. She peered into the darkness. A musty smell filled the air inside.

"Hello?" she called.

A roaring sound barreled toward her. It filled the air around her, sounding like a train barreling ahead of rushing waters. She retreated a step as a new sound filled the air. Light and fluttering, she barely detected it after the barrage of noise moments earlier.

She shrieked and held her arms to cover her face as papers flew out of the space like bats from a cave at dusk. The black hole continued to spit papers into the library at a terrifying rate until they obliterated the room's floor.

She swallowed hard as the last few pages drifted through the air before settling in a lazy dance to the floor below. One paper wafted near her as it sailed through the air, landing at her feet. Black lettering, bold and thick, appeared on the upside-down page. She reached for it, turning it over to read it.

As she turned the page, the black letters turned scarlet red and dripped from the paper. In horror, Cate threw it down, realizing blood formed the letters. A chill shuddered through her body as the image of the single, blood-red word burned in her mind: BEWARE.

CHAPTER 11

Cate clutched her pillow, moaning in her sleep as she writhed in bed. She bolted upright, holding back a scream. Her eyes darted around the room as panic filled her. She trembled all over, clutching at the bedsheets.

She spotted familiar things: her wardrobe, a chest of drawers, two sleeping pups in their beds, a moonless sky beyond a draped window. As her heart rate slowed, Cate caught her breath and sighed, running her fingers through her hair. She glanced at the clock. Blue digits glowed 1 a.m.

She collapsed back onto the pillow behind her. Another nightmare. This one more terrifying than the last. Cate's tired mind attempted to rationalize her dream, determining the bugs were a remnant from the exterminator's visit. The indiscernible words were a metaphor for her stalled research while she entertained guests. After a while, she gave up, deciding not to pursue the impossible task of rationalizing what her subconscious mind cobbled together.

Instead, she tossed and turned for another hour, still too unsettled to fall asleep. She chided herself for her foolish behavior, but even still, she found herself unable to relax. She climbed from her bed, pacing the length of her sitting room. After several laps, she wandered from her room into the hall. Without realizing, she wound her way through the halls to the library. She hesitated for a moment, hovering at the room's entrance. Still unsure, she ventured one step into the room, then a second. On her third step, a random groan emanated from the centuries-old castle, sending her scrambling out of the room and up the staircase.

As Cate clung to the banister as she caught her breath, her mind scolded her childish behavior. She felt like a youngster who, afraid of what may lurk in the darkness, raced up the basement stairs before anything captured them. Still, nothing compelled her to return to the lower level to explore the library.

Instead, she ambled down the hallway toward her bedroom. As she rounded a corner, she bumped into a dark figure. She bit back a scream, stumbling back several steps as she swatted at the dark figure looming in front of her.

“Lady Cate?” Jack whispered. “Cate! It’s me!”

“Jack?”

“Aye,” Jack replied, his face lighting up as his cell phone’s light lit the dim hall.

Cate placed her hand on her heart, breathing a sigh of relief. “Oh, thank goodness.”

“Who did you imagine it was?”

“Oh, I don’t know,” Cate answered, fluttering her hand in the air to dismiss her foolishness. “A ghost?”

Jack screwed up his face. “A ghost? Is that what has you roaming the halls in the wee hours of the morning, lassie? Searching for ghosts?”

“I’m ashamed to admit it but, sort of.” The dim light hid the rising red color on her cheeks. “What are you doing roaming the halls in the wee hours of the night?”

“Investigating a noise. Must have been you. Or perhaps that strange man with the cobwebs on his clothes and menacing red eyes I passed on my way here.” He glanced over his shoulder with a shudder.

“Very funny, Jack,” Cate replied, crossing her arms and shaking her head.

Jack grinned at her, his smile appearing more smirky in the cell phone’s dim light. “Now, what’s all this about searching for ghosts?”

Cate rolled her eyes, mostly at her own behavior. “I had a nightmare. I feel foolish now, but I got up to search around for anything unusual.”

“Unusual? Why don’t we talk about it over a warm cuppa to settle your nerves?”

Cate hesitated.

“I know where Mrs. Fraser hides the cookies,” he said, sweetening the deal.

“Sold,” Cate replied.

They made their way to the kitchen where Jack set about making two cups of tea. He set a steaming teacup in front of Cate and an open tin of Mrs. Fraser’s best shortbreads.

“Now that I’ve plied you with tea and cookies, will you tell me what odd thing you were searching for at 2 a.m.?”

Cate swallowed a chunk of her cookie. “I told you. I had a bad dream. I couldn’t sleep after it, so I went to the library - that’s where my dream took place - to figure out what caused the nightmare. Stupid, really.” She tapped her fingertips on her cup as she rolled her eyes at her own behavior.

“What was your dream about?” Jack inquired, biting into a cookie as he leaned across the kitchen’s island toward Cate.

Cate sipped her tea before launching into her tale. “I was in the library trying to work on my research. I stared at my papers, but nothing made any sense. It was like I couldn’t read any of my notes. I tried to clear my eyes, but when I glanced at the papers again, bugs covered them. I backed away from the desk, trying to decide what to do when I noticed a gaping hole where one of the bookcases used to be.”

“Gaping hole? Where the bookcase is? The one the dogs are so interested in, you mean?”

Cate nodded. “Yes, the bookcase. Only the bookshelf wasn’t there anymore, instead it was just a big black hole. For some dumb reason, I approached it and yelled down the hole and then there was a loud noise and papers flew out of it. They were everywhere, flying around the room like crazy! One of them landed near my feet and when I picked it up it said ‘beware’ in blood.”

“‘Beware’ in blood, huh?”

Cate nodded again as she munched on another cookie. “Yep.”

Jack nodded his head, his lips tightening to a line. “Well, this is an easy one to solve, Lady Cate. I’ve already pinpointed the meaning of your dream.”

“You have?” Cate inquired, her eyes growing wide as she fidgeted on the stool.

“Mmm-hmm,” Jack murmured, bobbing his head up and down.

“What is it? What does it mean?”

“It means you, my dear Lady Cate, have been watching too many movies about ghosts.”

“Ah!” Cate scoffed. “That’s not funny! And I haven’t been watching any ghost movies for the record.”

Jack chuckled at her reaction. “Oh, come on, Lady Cate, it’s quite funny. But on a serious note, I don’t imagine it’s anything to worry about. Your mind is likely processing the events of the past few days. The dogs’ reaction to that bookcase, the exterminator, your inability to work on your research with all the excitement in the castle. It makes sense, right? Getting nowhere on your work, bugs, the bookcase.”

“What about the paper that says ‘beware’ in blood?”

Jack shrugged. “Perhaps beware of letting the party czar talk you into more parties.” He grinned, a twinkle in his eye.

Cate stared into her teacup, tracing the rim with her finger.

Cate offered a weak smile. “Yes, I realize that, but I’m not convinced it’s as simple as you’re making it.”

“Listen, dreams rarely have any real meaning. Only to those strange folks on TV who want to take your money for them to tell you some mumbo jumbo about how it means your life will change or you’ll come into money.”

“This is the third dream I’ve had about that bookcase, though.”

Jack bit into a shortbread. “Have all of them been the same?”

“Not identical. But they all have had a black hole where the bookcase is, and two of them have warned me to beware.”

Jack pondered it for a moment as he chewed his cookie. “I still don’t imagine it’s anything to worry about. You’ve been anxious about the bookcase since the dogs reacted to it. The dreams are your subconscious trying to parse through your apprehension.”

Cate sighed, still far from accepting Jack’s simple solution. However, the tea, cookies and conversation alleviated her nerves.

She stretched and yawned. “Maybe you’re right.”

“Of course, I am!” Jack exclaimed. “I’m always right!”

Cate flashed him an amused smile. “Even if you’re not, I feel much better. I’m ready for bed!”

She yawned again, shuffling to the sink with their teacups. “Better wash these first before Mrs. Fraser finds them in her sink and we get in trouble for messing up her pristine kitchen!”

“You’re right. You wash, I’ll dry.” He pushed the cookie tin back into its hiding spot high on a shelf behind a basket, then grabbed a tea towel to dry the cups and saucers before putting them away. “There, no evidence, not even a crumb.”

Cate nodded in approval. “We’d make great burglars. Not a trace of us!”

Jack walked Cate to her suite. “Good night, m’lady,” he said with an extravagant bow.

“Good night, Jack. And thanks,” she replied, smiling at him. She disappeared into her sitting room, crossing it, and climbing into bed. She pushed the replay of her dreams and their conversation regarding them from her mind, determined to sleep.

Still groggy, Cate dragged herself from her bed the next morning. While she’d slept after her tête-à-tête with Jack, the hours of interrupted sleep left her drained. She groaned as she slogged into the bathroom, showering on autopilot. The steamy shower helped her to wake up. She toweled off, applied her makeup, pulled on her clothes, and greeted her dogs, ready to take them for a morning walk prior to breakfast.

After breakfast, Mr. Smythe suggested they move the puzzle table to the library so he and Gayle could continue work on the puzzle while Cate used the sitting room for a pre-party meeting with Mrs. Campbell. Gayle suggested settling Riley and Bailey with them, too. If they were lucky, Mr. Smythe mentioned, they would finish the puzzle today and could try for a second one-thousand-piece puzzle depicting fireworks over the London Eye on New Year’s Eve. Gayle groaned at the challenge, but Mr. Smythe seemed thrilled by the prospect. Cate left them to their puzzle-building, returning to the foyer to await Mrs. Campbell.

At 9:15 a.m., Mrs. Campbell’s car blazed a path down the drive. Cate, prepared for the fifteen-minute early arrival, met Isla at the door.

“Oh, Lady Cate! I am still buzzing with excitement from the Snow Ball. I’ve received nothing but compliments!”

“As well you should, Mrs. Campbell. You did a fabulous job with the planning!” Cate said with a smile as she ushered the woman into the sitting room.

“Thank you! Even the snow cooperated, and we didn’t need the snow machine. I am so glad that wasn’t an issue!”

“As am I,” Cate admitted.

“Now,” Mrs. Campbell said, plopping on the loveseat, dropping her folders on the cushion next to her, “this upcoming event is quite different. We must be prepared for the dissimilarity, so the event comes off without a hitch. There is, again, no margin for error. Some of the country’s most affluent, upscale figures will be in attendance.”

Cate nodded as she scanned the latest copy of the guest list. “You have outdone yourself with the guest list.”

Mrs. Campbell pinched her face into a curt smile. “Speaking of the guest list, are you certain your staff wants to attend?”

“Yes, they are looking forward to it!” Cate assured her.

“Of course,” she responded, sounding dejected by the answer. “I only wanted to be sure they weren’t uncomfortable. The guest list can be overwhelming!”

“I’m certain they will handle it with ease and grace.”

Mrs. Campbell offered another pithy glance to Cate. “If you’re sure. Let’s move on to discuss final menus and flow of the party. We begin with a seated dinner in the dining room.” Mrs. Campbell went over the details of the party, having it planned minute by minute as far as Cate could tell. Cate was surprised she hadn’t suggested talking points at each juncture for Cate.

Mrs. Campbell shared the seating chart, pointing out the intricate details of how she had positioned the guests. Mrs. Campbell, adept in the intricacies of how dinner parties at estates of this position must be conducted, had expertly placed individuals according to their station and to maximize conversation flow. Despite her at-times boorish nature, it pleased Cate to have someone so knowledgeable leading the planning efforts.

The party was an ambitious undertaking, however, for the guest list, a party of this degree would be expected. Cate guessed most of the guests turned down other offers to attend this party, probably out of curiosity since it had been years since the castle entertained VIP guests.

After reviewing the details, Cate and Mrs. Campbell met Jack in the ballroom to go over changes to the decor. Thankfully, there were few, however the trio removed the linens from the Christmas party and placed them in Mrs. Campbell's trunk. The plaid linens, while perfect for the Snow Ball, were "unsuitable" for the New Year's Eve party. They would be switched for gold and silver, which would arrive the day prior to the party.

They made a few adjustments to the placement of the tables and chairs before Mrs. Campbell was satisfied. After perusing the dining room and commenting on the decor for the event, Mrs. Campbell decided they had covered everything. She bid Cate farewell just prior to lunch, reminding her of their next scheduled working meeting on Monday.

Cate pushed through the doors to the library, exhausted by her lack of sleep and morning meeting. Gayle waved Cate over to show her the progress on the puzzle. Mr. Smythe surmised they would finish this afternoon.

Cate greeted the two dogs lounging near the fireplace. After rousing them from their slumber, she suggested a walk before lunch for them. Riley leapt to his feet, excited to go.

"Oh, that reminds me, Cate," Gayle mentioned, glancing up from the puzzle. "Both pups were intrigued with that bookcase. They stared at it for a good part of the morning, smelling and pawing at it." Cate followed the line of Gayle's finger. She pointed to the bookcase that filled Cate's nightmares.

Cate did her best to fluff off the comment, shrugging nonchalantly. "Yeah. They seem very interested in that. Enough that Jack called an exterminator. He found nothing. Guess they're seeing things!"

"Guess so!" Gayle chuckled, returning to fitting her piece into the puzzle.

"I'll see you both in the dining room as soon as I take these little rascals for a short walk!"

"Have fun, Riley and Bailey!" Gayle called as they left.

Cate walked the perimeter of the castle with the dogs before lunching with her guests. In the afternoon, they retreated to the library. Mr. Smythe's sole mission centered around the puzzle's completion. He preferred to begin the second puzzle fresh the next morning. Cate chuckled at his work ethic as he pushed Gayle to focus. Cate, flanked by Riley and Bailey, settled into an armchair near the fireplace, laptop in hand.

Cate opened her book document, intent on penning a few words in her latest chapter. Instead, she became distracted by the bookcase across the room that haunted her dreams. She stared at it with narrowed eyes over the top of the laptop.

The light conversation concerning the puzzle faded into the background as she replayed her dreams in her mind. Her head sank back into the chair behind her as she ruminated. In each dream, a gaping hole replaced the bookshelf. An idea struck her. She snapped the laptop shut, setting it aside, and strode to the bookcase.

Riley and Bailey were quick to follow her, glancing between the object and Cate as though trying to communicate something.

“Everything all right, Cate?” Gayle inquired.

Cate nodded, glancing back at them. “Yes. Just curious to determine what Riley and Bailey find so interesting about this bookshelf. They’ve been at it for two weeks!”

“I’m sure it’s nothing,” Gayle assured her.

“It must have a smell that intrigues them. Perhaps another dog,” Mr. Smythe suggested.

“Yes, it’s probably something simple,” Cate agreed. “But I’m not making much progress on my work, so I figured I’d distract myself.”

“You could finish this puzzle,” Gayle commented.

“And steal the joy of finishing the job away from you? I wouldn’t dream of it!”

“I’d live,” Gayle whispered, shielding her lips from Mr. Smythe with her hand.

“I heard that,” he murmured, his eyes never leaving the puzzle.

Gayle made a face at Cate before letting a giggle slip and turning her attention back to the puzzle. Cate returned her gaze to the bookshelf. She peered at it, studying it from top to bottom. With some hesitance, she approached it closer. She read a few book titles from the shelf as she ran her fingers along the beautifully bound but aging books.

Riley and Bailey stayed behind Cate, settling to the floor, peering at Cate as she studied the contents. She sniffed the air near the shelf, not noticing any scent. Although Riley’s and Bailey’s noses were far more adept at detecting odor than hers. At random, Cate pulled a few books from the shelves, flipping through them before replacing them.

After thirty minutes, she gave up, gleaned no information from her search. She returned to her armchair and forced herself to write a paragraph in her book. After many deletions, rewrites and edits, she was satisfied with the work and closed her laptop for the day. She opted to take the dogs for another walk after reviewing the progress on the puzzle. By her estimation, Gayle and Mr. Smythe would finish by the time she returned from her walk.

Outside, Cate and the dogs made the trek to the ice-ringed loch. Leafless trees waved in the distance, their bare branches reaching toward the cloudy gray sky. A light drizzle drove them back sooner than she expected. She returned to the library to witness the triumphant finish of the thousand-piece winter scene jigsaw puzzle. Mr. Smythe snapped a picture with his cell phone for posterity prior to dismantling the puzzle to ready the table for tomorrow's venture.

They followed dinner with a nightcap and Cate turned in early, exhausted from her previous sleepless night.

Saturday brought a bright, sunny, cold day to Dunhaven. Cate, wrapped in a warm coat, gloves, scarf and hat, spent a good bit of her morning outside walking with Riley and Bailey, both sporting their tartan coats. Gayle and Mr. Smythe joined her for part of her excursion before returning to the castle to begin their second puzzle.

Cate's mind hovered between her two mysteries as she circled the property. Days away from the new year, the theft crept ever closer. With no clues, she was no closer to solving it than she was when she discovered the mystery. She'd found nothing obvious in the employee records to suggest any staff member was involved. Still, she had some work to do inspecting the records to discover if any interesting anomalies existed. She grimaced, concluding her ancestors remained the prime suspects.

Her mind flipped to the bookshelf in the library. She'd taken a closer glimpse at it yesterday. Nothing stood out. The shelves held a variety of books. Nothing seemed of particular interest to her. She found no evidence of bugs or other creatures that may have stirred the dogs' interest. Were her dreams about the bookcase purely driven by stress? Or were they a warning?

Cate glanced down at the two pups, nosing around a nearby bush. "I don't suppose either of you is willing to discuss your interest in the bookshelf?"

Riley glanced up at her, his head cocked to the side. His eyes twinkled as though he held a secret. "Yes, little Mr. Riley," Cate added, reaching down to scratch his chin. "What has gotten you so interested in that one spot?"

Riley gave Cate's hand an appreciate lick, then returned to sniffing the ground. "I guess neither of you is talking, huh?"

"Talking to ourselves, Lady Cate?" Jack questioned, rounding the corner.

Cate jumped, spinning to face him. "Oh! You startled me!"

"On edge? And now talking to yourself. Tsk tsk, Lady Cate. If you're not careful, you'll be in a looney bin soon."

"I was talking to the dogs."

"Oh, I see. Talking to the dogs, eh? Did they answer?"

Cate offered him an unimpressed stare. "No, they didn't, thank you. They refused to discuss the bookshelf in the library."

"Are you still on about that bookshelf, lassie? The exterminator said it's right as rain. Nothing found in the traps either when he stopped yesterday. We're in the clear."

"In the clear from vermin, yes."

Jack's brows scrunched together, and he glanced sideways at Cate. "What other possibilities were we considering?"

Cate shrugged as she eyed the dogs milling around. "Nothing in particular. But the dogs were at it again yesterday, according to Gayle. Something has got them bothered. And then there are my nightmares. Three of them, all similar, all revolving around that bookshelf."

"And likely stemming from your overwrought mind. Between the parties and the guests, your quiet little country life is upside down."

"I enjoy having Gayle and Mr. Smythe here."

"Yes, but as enjoyable as you may find it, it's still quite a change to your normal, quiet routine. That coupled with the dogs' interest and your mind is concocting all sorts of strange manifestations."

"Perhaps. Or perhaps it's a warning."

CHAPTER 12

Jack furrowed his brow and scratched his head. “A warning? Of what?”

Cate shrugged again. “I’m not sure, but this seems more meaningful than just something my excitable mind cooked up. The dogs’ reactions paired with the ‘beware’ messages in my dream can’t be coincidence or conjecture.”

“But beware of what, Cate?” Jack inquired as they returned to the castle, with Riley and Bailey leading the way.

“No idea. But why would my brain add a strange detail like that?”

“Once I dreamt my teeth fell out, but look,” Jack responded, grinning, “they’re still all here! Who knows why our subconscious minds do what they do!”

They arrived at the castle door, pushing through into the warm, aromatic kitchen.

“And what is our subconscious mind doing?” Mrs. Fraser inquired, catching the tail end of Jack’s comment.

“I’m afraid mine is scaring me,” Cate admitted sheepishly. “I’ve had a few nightmares in the last week and can’t seem to decide if they’re just a creation from my stressed mind or a warning.”

“A warning?” Mrs. Fraser questioned, stopping dead and staring at Cate. “Why, Lady Cate, whatever of?”

“Same question I had,” Jack responded. “My conclusion was a warning not to agree to any more parties with the party czar.”

Mrs. Fraser chuckled. "Well, I daresay that's why your mind is frenzied. That woman would drive a saint from heaven to cast off his halo and swear like a devil."

Cate giggled at their mutual dislike of Mrs. Campbell.

Molly nodded at Mrs. Fraser. "I agree. I've only met her a few times, but she puts out an unpleasant vibe."

"She isn't my favorite person either, however, she's a pro at party planning. And I must admit, the parties are a positive thing for the castle in my opinion. This place deserves to be a showpiece, admired far and wide!"

"Aye, I can't argue with your last statement, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser agreed. "But your health comes first. If you're fretful because of the parties, we'll have to do something to fix that! Tell you what, I'll make you a special tea after dinner tonight. You'll sleep like a baby."

"I appreciate that, Mrs. Fraser," Cate responded. "But really, I'm fine, don't trouble yourself."

"'Tis no trouble at all! I'll have it ready with the dessert."

"Thank you! Well, I won't say no to a good night's sleep, that's for certain."

"As well you shouldn't," Mrs. Fraser agreed. "Now, off you go to get ready for your lunch. Leave the pups with me, I've got a few bones for them."

Cate nodded, leaving Riley and Bailey to receive their treat from Mrs. Fraser. She ascended the stairs, heading for the library but found it empty. She found Mr. Smythe and Gayle in the sitting room setting out pieces of their latest jigsaw puzzle. They had built the edge, and they worked to group pieces together to fill in the middle.

"Here you are!" Cate greeted them, plopping next to Gayle on the loveseat. "You've made quite a good start."

"Yes!" Mr. Smythe exclaimed. "Building the edges is the first step toward success!"

Cate deemed this the most excited she'd ever seen the man.

"Seems like an appropriate time to break for lunch."

"I agree," Gayle commented. "I am famished."

"I suppose it's a good time. We'll start the fireworks section when we return," Mr. Smythe responded.

They left the puzzle behind, lunching in the dining room before separating, with Cate going to the library to complete some work while Gayle and Mr. Smythe returned to the sitting room for their afternoon puzzle session. Cate settled into the chair behind the desk. She spread her notes over the desk's surface, opening her laptop in front of her.

She took a deep breath as her document loaded, glancing over her notes. After a moment, she stared at the blinking cursor marking the spot her next character would be placed. An eerie sensation passed over her and she shivered. The scenario too closely resembled the events of her latest nightmare.

She glanced over her shoulder at the bookshelf before spinning back toward her laptop and adjusting herself in the chair. She cleared her throat, placing her hands on the keyboard. After squaring her shoulders and tightening her jaw, she raised her eyebrows and typed the word "The." After a few breaths, she typed "castle." Her creativity ran out after those two words. She sighed, her shoulders drooping.

Her eyes flitted around the room, perusing everything but her work. Her gaze finally settled on the bookshelf. She slammed the laptop shut and stalked across the room, staring at the bookcase.

She scanned the shelves again. The bookcase, built of dark, solid wood, contained decorative accents around the edges. Cate pushed on the bookcase. It didn't budge. Next, she tried pulling on the bookshelf. Again, nothing.

Cate stood back, frowning at the bookshelf. She felt around the edges, pushing and pulling the decorative pieces. No movement, no clicks of secret panels opening, nothing. Cate sighed. "That always works in the movies," Cate bemoaned.

A notion crossed her mind. Perhaps a fake book triggered a secret panel or prompted the bookshelf itself to open.

"Only one way to find out!" she stated aloud.

She began with a middle shelf, expecting the trigger, if it existed, to be there. Starting on the left, Cate pulled each book out, removing it from the shelf and piling them near the armchair. The number of books forced Cate to split the stack into two before she ended up with a wobbly tower of books that threatened to collapse.

With the shelf empty, Cate examined it closely. She ran her hand across every available surface of the shelf and its surrounding area. She brought her eyes level with the shelf, inspecting it for any anomalies. She examined every aspect of the shelf. Nothing stood out to her.

She moved to the shelf below. Book by book, she emptied it, creating another two stacks on the floor. Again, she examined every inch of the shelf, her fingertips probing the entire surface. Nothing generated any reactions.

Cate stood, glancing at the growing mess around her. Before continuing, she put a note on each stack marking the shelf number and side of the shelf where the books originated.

After logging the locations for her current piles, she knelt on the floor, tackling the bottom shelf. One by one, she removed and stacked the books next to her on the floor.

Halfway through, Jack popped his head through the door, knocking. "Lady Cate?" He glanced around the room, not finding her where he expected at the desk.

"Yeah?" Cate answered, placing a note on top of her newest stack.

Jack stepped into the room, his brow furrowing, his face contorting into a questioning expression. "This is a new spin on your research."

"I'm afraid I wasn't getting very far on that. I typed two words and one of them was 'the.'"

"So, you decided to tear apart the bookshelf instead, huh?" Jack inquired, sidling up to her, still staring at the mess spreading out around her.

Cate stood, dusting her hands off. "Pretty much. I tried to open it or determine if there was a secret panel or something, but so far, no luck. Now I'm removing every book in case it triggers a hidden mechanism. Or in case the books are covering a trigger point."

Jack nodded, pulling his mouth into a thin line. "Well, I suppose I'll leave you to it. I just wanted to make sure there wasn't anything else that needed taken care of before the next party."

Cate shook her head. "No. We'll just have the linens to do when they arrive Monday and the balloon drop will need set up the day of the party. But Mrs. Campbell has her own crew of 'experts' setting that up."

"Okay, great." Jack glanced around at the piles of books. "Well, if you need any help here..." His voice trailed off as though unsure he wanted to offer help.

"I'll be okay," Cate replied, stooping to the bottom shelf to continue her work.

Jack knelt down next to her. "Where are you putting this stack?"

Cate smiled, handing a book to him and pointing to her most recent stack. "Put it next to that one."

"Got it."

Together, they created an assembly line to remove the books and shuttle them to a stack. When they cleared the shelf, Cate examined it.

"Anything?" Jack questioned as he marked the stack of books.

"Nope, nothing," Cate responded with a shake of her head.

"Four more shelves to go. Top shelf next or move to the next empty shelf?"

"Let's move to the top. We'll keep those books closer to the shelf to make it easier to remove them."

"Good plan, Lady Cate," Jack replied, pushing one of the library's ladders to the bookcase. "I'll do the climbing and hand the books down to you."

"Okay," Cate agreed. "I hate to send you up the ladder but..."

"But I'm more used to a ladder than you. We can't have Lady Catherine Kensie falling and breaking her leg mere days before the VIP party."

"True," Cate replied, nodding, "Mrs. Campbell would never forgive either of us."

"No, she would not," Jack added, climbing the ladder and pulling the first few books from the shelf. Cate reached high overhead, grasping the books between stretched hands. "Got 'em?"

"Yep," Cate breathed, straining as she juggled them and lowered them to the floor with a wince. "Maybe less next time, though."

"Okay. No problem."

Jack handed the books down two by two, and Cate stacked them as close to the shelf as she could with the other stacks. She marked the two stacks as Jack climbed down from the ladder.

"I figured you would want to scour that shelf yourself for a mechanism."

"You figured right!" Cate answered, mounting the first step of the ladder. She climbed to the top, inspecting the shelf. The smooth wood showed no flaws or imperfections consistent with a hidden mechanism. Still, she ran her fingers over every inch. She probed the sides of the bookcase, the top and any decorative elements at the top.

"Anything?" Jack called up to her.

Cate shook her head. “Nope,” she answered, deflated. “Three more to go!” She climbed down off the ladder, sending Jack back up for the second shelf from the top.

“Looks like there might be some interesting volumes in that stack,” he said, ascending the ladder.

Cate glanced down at the piles. “Hmm. I will check them out as we put them back.”

She accepted the first set of books Jack handed her, beginning a new pile. Cate placed this stack a few steps away as the stacks began to crowd them. She shuttled the books away from the shelf, scurrying back and forth until the shelf was empty.

They switched places, with Jack waiting below as Cate ascended to the newest empty shelf for a careful inspection. Again, she found nothing. Two shelves remained, and Cate’s hopes dwindled with each book they removed. Careful inspection of the last two shelves offered no clues, hidden mechanisms or anything else of interest.

Arms crossed, Cate stared at the empty bookcase with a disheartened sigh. In one last effort, Cate pushed and pulled the now-empty bookshelf, hoping it may move after being relieved of its load.

“Help me push,” Cate appealed to Jack, grunting as she leaned her full weight into the shelf.

Jack obliged, pushing and pulling the shelf with Cate. They pushed forward, side to side, and pulled back. The shelf didn’t budge.

“I doubt this solid old bugger is going anywhere,” Jack said, giving the bookcase a pat.

Cate sighed again, frowning at the bookshelf. She threw her arms in the air as she shook her head. “Nope, you’re right. I must have been wrong. I was sure we’d find something. Sorry I wasted your time.”

“It wasn’t a waste, Lady Cate. Should we return these to their rightful place?”

Cate checked her timepiece and shook her head. “It’s getting close to dinner. We’ve managed to waste the entire afternoon! I’ll tackle it tomorrow. Thanks for your help!”

“We’ll tackle it tomorrow morning. I helped make this mess, I’ll help you clean it up.”

Cate chuckled as she waved her hand to decline. “More like I forced you to help make the mess. You can have your Sunday off.”

Jack shook his head. “Nay, Lady Cate. I’ll help you. We’ll tackle it tomorrow morning. I’ll still make dinner with my grandfather. This won’t take that long.”

Cate smiled a thank you at him. “Okay, if you’re insisting, I’ll not turn you down twice. Thanks.”

He nodded to her before giving her a deep bow. “Of course, m’lady.”

Cate rolled her eyes as she giggled at his theatrical display. “You’re such a ham. Well, I better run the dogs out before dinner.”

“Okay. Meet you tomorrow morning around nine?”

“That sounds perfect!”

Cate navigated below stairs, finding Mrs. Fraser and Molly abuzz with activity as they made final dinner preparations. Riley and Bailey gnawed on bones near the warm stove.

“You two seem quite content with those bones,” Cate said, ruffling the fur on the tops of the heads.

Mrs. Fraser ladled soup into a tureen. “Aye, perfect angels, they’ve been, Lady Cate.”

“Did you make a lot of progress on your book, Lady Cate?” Molly inquired.

“I made a lot of progress on books, but not mine. Jack and I ended up removing all the books from the bookshelf Riley and Bailey have been so interested in. We found nothing,” Cate continued, shrugging, “but it took the better part of the afternoon.”

“What were you hoping to find?” Molly questioned as she bustled around the kitchen. For less than a week on the job, it appeared as though she’d been working these kitchens for years.

“Nothing in particular, I guess. I’m not sure what I expected. But the dogs are unrelenting with their interest in that shelf. That coupled with a few nightmares I’ve had about it made me curious enough to examine it.”

“Nightmares?” Molly queried further.

“Yes,” Cate responded with a sheepish nod to her head. “I had a few bad dreams about that stupid shelf. So, my overzealous mind concluded the shelf held some secret.”

“It’s not a reach in a big old castle like this. You never know where a secret passage might be hiding!” Molly replied.

Mrs. Fraser considered the statement. “Nothing comes to mind about that library. Course hidden nooks and crannies exist in a few areas, but not there that I'm aware of."

"Well, we made a thorough test of that hypothesis, and you are correct, Mrs. Fraser. There is nothing there."

"At least now you know and can put that to rest," Mrs. Fraser answered with a nod of her head.

Cate nodded in agreement. "Okay, boys," she said, turning to Riley and Bailey. "How about a walk before dinner?"

As the sun crested the moors, Cate stretched, working out the kinks in her arms, legs and back. Her sore muscles complained with every movement, but after a few extra moments in bed, her aching muscles obliged her and moved her to her bathroom for a steamy shower. She dressed for the day, ready to clean up the mess she created in the library.

How foolish, she chided herself. Not everything was a mystery for her to solve. Some dreams were just that, dreams. Perhaps Riley and Bailey spotted a shadow on the bookcase and imagined something was there.

She stepped into the chilly morning air with the two pups, bundling deeper into her knee-length coat. Pleased to return to the warmth of the house, she climbed the stairs, arriving in the dining room with Mr. Smythe and Gayle.

Gayle exclaimed over breakfast that she had convinced Mr. Smythe to accompany her into town for a shopping trip. They'd lunch in town but planned to be back for dinner. While Mr. Smythe itched to get back to his jigsaw puzzle, he agreed to the break.

Cate saw them off as she took the dogs for their morning walk around the property. She returned to the castle in time to meet Jack in the library for their morning task.

"Good morning, Sir Riley!" Jack exclaimed as Riley leapt into his arms. Bailey trailed behind him, accepting a chin scratch from Jack. "And good morning to you, too, Mr. Bailey. And a hearty good morning to you, too, Lady Cate."

"Good morning! Ready to help me clean up my folly?"

"I am," he assured her, setting Riley on the floor. "I built a fire for good Sir Riley and Mr. Bailey to curl up by while we work."

“They’ll enjoy that,” Cate replied, as Riley approached the fireplace and curled into a ball near it. “Where shall we start?”

“Top,” Jack suggested. “I’ll climb the ladder while I’m still fresh! Then, when we’re good and tired, we can sit on the floor and work.”

Cate nodded and waded through the stacks of books to the two marked “TOP SHELF.”

“We’ll work right to left.” She fanned through the pages, holding the book open to the floor before handing it off.

“What are you doing, speed reading?”

“No, just checking the books to see if there’s anything interesting stuffed inside,” Cate informed him, thumbing through the next book before handing it up to Jack.

“You’re really intent on finding something, huh?”

Cate shrugged one shoulder, trying the next book. “While we have the books down, it doesn’t hurt to check. I’m no longer convinced anything is here but...”

“But you’re convinced something is here.”

“No. I just remain skeptical that the dogs’ reaction and my dreams are meaningless.”

“Fair enough. We’ll find out soon enough if your hunch is correct.”

Cate continued her cursory search of each book before handing it up to Jack. The careful examination of each book slowed the work, however, she persisted. They finished the first stack. Her fastidious review of each book slowed the process. She glanced up to the half-filled top shelf, realizing this task would take them all morning.

“Sorry,” Cate apologized, her eyes flitting to Jack for a moment as she searched the next book.

“No apology needed,” Jack assured her. “I’ve got all morning.”

“I didn’t intend to take up your entire morning though.”

“I don’t mind, Cate. I’d rather do it now than have an encore.”

She tried to move faster with this stack. However, several small books made the process tedious. They finished the stack, finding nothing. Cate sighed under her breath, her hopes deflating with each book. Jack descended two steps on the ladder, ready to restore the next shelf.

Cate moved to the first stack for this shelf, searching the first book, then handed it to Jack. With nothing found, they wrapped up the second shelf with five more to go.

“One more then I’ll need a breather,” Cate informed Jack.

“Sounds good to me.” He climbed off the ladder, pushing it away, able to reach the remaining shelves from the floor.

With both of them searching through the books, the task went faster. Three shelves in and they had nothing to show for it but sore fingertips and dusty hands.

Cate collapsed into a leather armchair near the fireplace. Riley lifted his head, eyeing her through narrowed eyes. Satisfied everything was well, his head dropped back to the rug below him with a deep sigh.

“We’ll make quick work of those last four shelves,” Jack assured her. “Between the two of us, we’ll tear through those stacks.”

Cate nodded without answering.

“Too tired to answer?”

Cate gave him a weak smile. “No. But with every book that passes, I feel more and more foolish.”

“It wasn’t all for naught, Lady Cate!”

“No?” Cate queried. “How do you figure?”

“It gives me something to tease you about for years to come. That makes it worth it in my book, pun intended!” He issued a devilish grin aimed her way.

Cate offered a wry look in return. “You’re right. That makes it all worth it.”

Cate paused for a few long breaths. “Well, I suppose we should get back to it.”

“Okay,” Jack groaned, pulling himself from the chair.

They approached the next two stacks, sorting through the books, checking them one-by-one, and replacing them on the shelf. They moved on to shelf number five. Four books in, Jack thumbed through a book, shaking it upside down. A yellowed envelope fluttered to the ground from between the pages. Excited, Cate dumped her empty book on the shelf and raced to retrieve it.

“What is it?” Jack inquired. “Note written in blood warning you to beware?”

Cate grabbed it, turning it over in her hand, searching for any markings. “I’m beginning to worry you may quit your job in favor of stand-up comedy.”

She joined Jack with the envelope. “There’s nothing on the envelope. No address or salutation.”

“Anything inside?”

Cate opened the aging envelope. Two handwritten papers had been folded and stuffed inside. She unfolded them. Black cursive handwriting filled the yellowed paper.

Jack peered over Cate’s shoulder as they read the note. She swallowed hard, her eyes widening as she read each line. She shuffled to the next page, scanning the text scrawled on it. When she finished reading, she twisted to face Jack, her mouth hanging open, aghast.

“Cate, don’t jump to any conclusions.”

“Don’t jump to any conclusions? Did you read it?”

“Yes, I read it. And I already realize the scenario your hyperactive mind is creating.”

Cate sank into one of the armchairs, the letter still in her hand. Her other hand propped her chin up as thoughts raced through her mind. Hypotheses were created, accusations were produced, and conclusions were formed in seconds. The warnings made sense. But they hadn’t been calling her to investigate, but rather warning her to stay away. That she wouldn’t like what she found if she kept searching.

Jack tugged the papers from between her fingers, folding them and setting them aside. “Cate,” he said, perching on the edge of the armchair nearest her, “we don’t know what that letter refers to. It could be to anyone about anything. It could mean nothing.”

“And it could mean everything,” Cate countered.

Jack shook his head. “You’re jumping to conclusions. Even if you’re correct, it has nothing to do with you. Let’s put it aside, finish the work here, sleep on it and discuss it tomorrow.”

“But...”

“But nothing. We both read it. We both interpreted it differently. It’s vague. Leave it, let’s discuss it tomorrow.” Jack paused for several breaths. “Plus, there’s only a few more days until we can investigate the theft. Then we’ll figure out if this has any meaning for ourselves.”

Cate brightened at the prospect of time travel. Jack bringing up time travel, anticipating the trip, not complaining or disagreeing marked progress, even if he was only doing it to humor Cate and get her mind off the disturbing note.

Cate nodded her head in agreement, poking a finger at him. “Okay. But only because you promise we can investigate at the first opportunity

“I promise!” Jack answered, right hand on his heart, left raised in the air. “Now let’s get at these shelves. I’ve got a dinner date!”

“I do not want to keep you from your date!”

“No,” Jack replied, standing and pulling Cate to her feet. “You’ll never hear the end of it from Pap if you do.”

They left the note on the coffee table as they returned to their work. Despite the findings already made, they continued to check each book for anything it may contain. Book by book, shelf by shelf, they finished the task.

As Cate placed the last book on the shelf, Jack breathed a sigh of relief, wiping at his brow. Riley, who had joined them as they knelt on the floor working on the bottom shelf, leapt to his feet. Cate assumed he, too, was excited to be finished with the task.

Instead, the little dog narrowed his dark, almond-shaped eyes, glaring at the bookcase. After a moment, he backed up two steps and emitted a long, high-pitched howl.

His boisterous bark awakened a sleeping Bailey who climbed to his feet, racing to Riley’s side. He glanced at the bookcase as Riley continued to back away, still barking. Bailey joined in the fray, adding a raucous yipping to Riley’s yapping.

She shushed them a few more times before they quieted, shaking her head at them.

Riley, still vigilant, sat on his haunches, ready to leap into action at the first sign of distress or danger. Bailey stood at his side. He stared at the bookcase, his mouth opening and closing, ready to bark at a moment’s notice.

“Perhaps it’s the books they hate,” Jack mentioned.

Cate twisted back to the bookshelf, eyeing it. After a moment, she shrugged her shoulders. “I don’t—” She stopped short, her brows knit together in confusion. She put her hand out in front of her, moving it around.

“What is it, Cate?” Jack asked, his eyes toggling between her and the bookcase.

“Air.”

“Air?” Jack questioned.

“Yes, here. Put your hand here.” She waved her hand to pinpoint where he should place his. “Do you feel it?”

After a moment, Jack shook his head. “No, I...” He paused. “Wait, yes! A draft, slight but there.”

He glanced around the room. All the windows were closed and many of the curtains drawn to help keep the cold at bay. None of the curtains rustled, signifying no air leaking from the windows.

Cate climbed to her feet. She raced to the desk drawer, pulling it open. She retrieved a box of matches kept there.

“Good idea, Lady Cate,” Jack said, as she knelt next to him.

She struck one of the matches, holding it in front of her. It flickered, the flame blowing away from the bookshelf. Cate waved the flame out and crawled closer. She peered at the edges of the shelf, running her fingers around its frame.

“Let me have a look,” Jack said.

Cate sat back on her haunches, allowing him to access the bookcase.

Jack pawed at the edges of the shelf. He shook his head. “You’re right, there’s air coming from here.”

“That’s what’s driving the dogs crazy. There must be some scent on it. Outside, perhaps?”

“How is the outside air getting here? This isn’t an outside wall,” Jack responded, still staring at the shelf.

“Leaky chimney? The chimney for this room doesn’t abut this bookcase. Is there another chimney from another room?”

Jack shook his head. “Not that I’m aware of. There isn’t a chimney anywhere near this bookcase.”

Cate tightened her lips in speculation. “Perhaps there’s something there we don’t realize. Maybe an old chimney. Perhaps there were renovations that left behind remnants of a previous iteration of construction.”

“As far as I recall, the library hasn’t changed. In fact, it appeared almost identical when we were here in 1856.”

“Yes, I agree. If there were changes, they weren’t perceptible. Are there plans for the castle we could consult?”

Jack nodded. “Yeah, there are. I’ll dig them out as soon as I get back from dinner with Pap and we can check them out tomorrow.”

“Okay,” Cate agreed as she checked her timepiece. “Oh, speaking of, you better get going or you’ll be late!”

“Mm, yeah,” Jack responded, checking his wristwatch. “Damn, I’d prefer to solve this now!”

Cate grinned at him. “Enjoying sleuthing on the mysterious case of the leaky bookshelf, are you?”

“No. But I’m concerned about what air is leaking from where. In an old place like this, we don’t want any minor problems to turn into major ones that may become expensive to fix.”

“All business as always, huh? And here I assumed you were ready to crack a case and find a secret passage lurking behind here, brimming with jewels and treasure.”

“I doubt that, Lady Cate. Likely just some strange issue that will need fixing before we’ve got a freezing cold library, or worse, a flooded one.” Jack climbed to his feet and Cate stood.

“We’ll look at it first thing in the morning,” he promised.

“Okay.”

“Until then,” Jack warned. “Don’t let your imagination run wild, okay? No pirate treasure or ghost’s gold.”

“You’re no fun!” Cate cried jokingly.

“No, I’m not. And I like me just fine that way.” He dusted his hands and gave a parting ruffle to each dog’s fur. As he spun to leave the room, he spotted the letter on the table. He snatched it on his way toward the door.

“Hey! Where are you going with that letter?”

“Oh, you saw that, huh?” Jack inquired, spinning to face Cate, a sheepish grin on his face.

“I did,” she replied, one eyebrow raised at him.

“Figured I’d take it with me so you couldn’t read it over and over and obsess over it.”

Cate stalked to him, pulling the letter from his hands. “I won’t obsess. But I will read it again. A few times. And take some notes. Jot down some ideas.”

“Obsess over what it means,” Jack concluded for her.

“I won’t obsess, I promise. I’m not even going to read it again until later. I’m planning to spend the afternoon puzzle building with Mr. Smythe. I figured I’d give Gayle a break, take her place.”

“Ah, that sounds like a perfect way to spend the afternoon. Let your brain solve a safe, innocent, straightforward puzzle.”

“Exactly.” She folded the letter, placing it back in its envelope and setting it on the desk. “Say hello to your grandfather for me.”

“Will do, Lady Cate. See you tomorrow morning.” Jack stepped to the door. As he bowed extravagantly, he said, “M’lady.”

Cate spent the afternoon bent over the Fireworks over London jigsaw puzzle. Gayle nearly tripped herself fleeing from the puzzle table and grabbing a book to spend the afternoon reading.

As Cate worked to build the London Eye with a bursting red firework over top, her mind wandered to the letter retrieved from the mysterious leaky bookshelf. She’d promised not to dwell on it, but her mind could not let it rest. Still, she pressed on, helping Mr. Smythe complete a good amount of the puzzle before dinner.

In his estimation, they would finish the puzzle tomorrow just in time for the New Year, the party and their imminent departure. It was obvious he couldn’t be more pleased with himself.

Cate considered it the first time in seven months of knowing William Smythe that she’d ever seen him enjoy himself outside of work. Wonders never cease, she reflected.

After dinner, Cate curled up with a book in her sitting room. She’d tucked the letter into the pocket of her cardigan earlier and removed it, placing it on the side table in her sitting room when she retired to her suite. Now, as she tried to focus on the words filling the page in front of her, the small, yellowed envelope beckoned to her like a siren to a seaman.

Her eyes drifted sideways, staring at its frail, aged countenance, its yellow-white color a stark contrast to the deep, rich wood of the table. She shook her head, returning to her reading. No, she chided, she would not dwell on it. Not before bed. Otherwise, she’d be treating herself to a night full of postulating, theorizing, fretting and sleeplessness.

Cate read another sentence. The words passed through her brain as though it didn’t exist. Two sentences later, she found herself staring at the small, unmarked envelope. She hadn’t a clue what she’d read, her mind unable to retain any of the context. She snapped the book shut, trading it for the envelope.

After sliding the thick papers out, she glanced at them. Despite the words they held, there was something extraordinary about holding something so personal from another era. Another individual, one within her family, had held these pages, written their thoughts. The written word was rare in this day and age. People rarely wrote hand-written notes or letters anymore, relying on the speed and ease of typed communication.

Cate turned the pages over in her hands, noting the feel of the paper, the stylized cursive handwriting, the thick, black ink, the care, and time put into folding the pages. Even given the note's contents, she appreciated the nearly century-old piece of history she held in her hands. If the note hadn't suggested something vile, she'd have been giddy to reread it multiple times.

Regardless of her opinions on it, the note existed. It recorded history. Her history. With a big sigh, she re-read the note, painful as that history was to acknowledge. The letter contained no salutation, beginning in a frank and curt manner.

I include no salutation for you know who you are, and I cannot bear to write your name. I can barely bear to acknowledge that you exist. What you have done to me, this family, your own family is a travesty. You should be ashamed, regardless of the excuses you gave for your abhorrent behavior.

What you have stolen from this family is far more precious than you realize. Or perhaps more precious than you wish to acknowledge. While you believe it is "due" you, it is not.

My husband warns me not to let my anger get the better of me, but I am so filled with rage and loathing toward you, I wonder if it is even possible for me. Perhaps my husband is of a better disposition than I am, however, it may be, perchance, that he is better suited at hiding his true feelings. Although, those feelings run more to heartbreak than anger.

There is nothing more to be said. But know with your theft, you have robbed this family of more than valuable keepsakes. You have stolen trust, faith and loyalty also.

Should we ever meet again, and I sincerely hope we never do, I would cross the street rather than look at you. If you ever return to this household, I will have you arrested at once, regardless of my husband's inclination to turn a blind eye to your wicked ways.

I wish you all the happiness I'd wish unto my worst enemy.

I hope your bounty smothers you and crushes your very soul under its weight.

Anne MacKenzie

Cate heaved a sigh after reading the emotionally charged letter. Anne, Rory's wife, displayed strong feelings for someone. While she never sent the letter, the words contained within showed her level of anger and frustration with the unknown recipient. Cate scanned it again. The words "stolen," "theft" and "robbed" leapt off the page. These couldn't be coincidental. Anne's letter must refer to the theft of the precious family heirlooms.

The other unmistakable component was the reference to the thief's origins. Anne claimed the person robbed their own family, implying a family member had been the culprit. This brought a frown to Cate's face. Rory's immediate family consisted of his wife, child, parents and his brother, Lucas. Of course, there were cousins, distant or otherwise. However, Anne's reference to being "due" something would suggest a family connection at a closer level. She had a sinking feeling her original fear and suspicion was correct. Lucas MacKenzie, her great-grandfather, had stolen the jewels. The letter seemed to confirm her suspicions. She was descended from a thief. One willing to rob his own family.

CHAPTER 14

Cate startled awake, glancing around the dimly lit room. She swallowed hard, getting her bearings as her sluggish brain raced to awaken. Riley and Bailey lay near the fireplace, sound asleep. She had drifted to sleep pondering and fretting over the meaning of Anne's letter. The pages, now strewn across the floor after falling from her limp hand, reminded her.

She reached down and scooped the papers off the floor. A forlorn feeling swept over her as she glanced at them. Her ancestors were thieves. No wonder someone blotted them out from the family bible. Now Cate owned the castle. Anne MacKenzie was probably rolling in her grave.

She folded the note and tucked it back into its envelope. She set it on the side table on top of her discarded book. As she swung her legs over the side of the chaise, intent on retreating to her bed, the memory of her dream flooded back to her.

The dream had awakened her with a start. Her confusion upon waking distracted her, but now it all came rushing back. Another nightmare about the bookshelf. Generations of the family surrounded her in the sitting room. They introduced themselves with bewildering speed. When Rory introduced himself and Anne, Cate explained she descended from Rory's brother, Lucas. Anne MacKenzie dropped Cate's hand, an expression of disgust on her face. Cate recalled the letter, and the emotions expressed by Anne. Generations worth of gaps between her and her great-grandfather had not quelled the fury the theft stoked within her.

She spun, stalking away from Cate, her face a mask of rage. She whispered in the ears of Victoria and Randolph. Shocked expressions crossed their faces. They gasped, their eyes flitting to Cate.

The information branched through the generations of the family. Everyone gaped at her, their eyes glaring with acrimony and distrust. Cate backed away, speechless, unable to explain away anything. She closed the sitting room doors behind her. Tears streamed down her face. She ran to the library, seeking the comfort of Riley and Bailey. She trusted her two dogs would not turn their backs on her.

As she entered the library, a strong gust of wind blew the doors from her grasp. Her eyes narrowed as her hair twisted in the air. She stepped further into the room, seeking the source of the wind. She studied the windows, all closed.

She glanced across the room, her eyes widening. A gaping hole stood where the bookshelf used to be. Cate marched toward it.

With Riley and Bailey nowhere to be found, concern filled her they had stumbled into the void. "Riley! Bailey!" she called.

A booming voice answered back, stunning her, and causing her to fall backward. "BEWARE!"

Cate shuddered at the memory of the dream, specifically at the disembodied voice shouting its ominous warning. She shook her head. What was it about that bookshelf that haunted her? Perhaps she would find out when she and Jack checked the plans for the castle.

It would need to suffice. She needed sleep. It was already after midnight and her snooze on the chaise left her cramped with a crick in her neck. Besides studying the castle plans, most of the setup for the New Year's Eve party must be completed today. She needed all the energy she could muster.

After carrying each pup to their bed, she dragged herself to her own, climbing in and stretching out. By shifting her shoulders back and forth, she eased the kink in her neck. The rhythmic motion lulled her to sleep.

Cate met Jack the following morning before Mrs. Campbell was scheduled to arrive. He carried a cardboard tube, pushing the library door open for her to enter first.

“Those the plans?” Cate inquired.

“Aye,” Jack confirmed.

Cate cleared a space on the desk. “Let’s see what’s behind that bookcase, shall we?”

Jack popped the top of the tube, extracting the plans and spreading them across the desk. The blue pages contained detailed drawings of the castle. Cate stared at the crisscross of lines, marks, numbers, and words, finding the plans disorienting even though she lived in the castle.

She searched for a space matching the library. Jack found it first, pointing it out. He’d had no trouble reading the plans.

“So, what’s behind it? Secret passage? Hidden chamber?”

“A hallway.”

“What? There has to be something between the hallway and the bookcase!”

Jack shook his head. “Nope, there’s nothing on the plans.” He shuffled through a few other pages containing the schematics for the other floors. “Nothing above it or below it that would lead to air leakage.”

Cate wandered to the bookshelf, her finger on her lips. “Something is causing the air flow.”

“No chimneys, no outer walls, no pitch changes in the roof.” Jack shuffled the papers again. “Nothing I can identify to cause air flow.”

Cate continued to stare at the bookshelf. “What is your secret?”

“Are you sure they noted secret passages and rooms on those plans?”

Jack nodded. “These are updates of Douglas MacKenzie’s original plans. Copies of his personal copy. He included all the secrets of the castle on his plans to make sure they were built to his specifications. A lot changed during the last renovation. Some of those secret spaces were converted to bathrooms to update the castle.”

Cate meandered back to the desk. Jack pointed out a few “secret” rooms, now bathrooms. Cate grimaced as Jack rolled the plans up and stowed them back in the tube. “Sorry, Lady Cate. No secret pirate gold for you.”

“Darn,” Cate answered, snapping her fingers. Something nagged at her in the back of her mind, but she pushed it aside. The plans told a different story than her imagination created. Facts didn’t lie or exaggerate, unlike her overly inventive mind.

“I guess that’s that,” Cate said with a shrug as Jack slid the top back on the document tube. “Meet you in the ballroom?”

Jack nodded and waved the tube in the air. “I’ll see you there as soon as I return these to the office.”

They parted ways, with Cate collecting Mrs. Campbell from the front door before escorting her to the ballroom. The trio spent the rest of their morning making final adjustments to the layout, setting out the linens and finishing adjustments to the decorations.

Cate slept in on the last day of the year. The promise of a late night chock full of hostess duties meant she’d need to log the extra sleep. She spent a lazy day trying to relax before the party. With the party beginning with a late evening sit-down dinner, she had plenty of the day to enjoy with her guests.

Much to his delight, Mr. Smythe finished his puzzle, snapped a picture for posterity, and dismantled it, careful to break apart the pieces so the next player could “enjoy the full experience.”

The castle would be too quiet after they left, Cate mused. She would miss their quiet presence after their holiday stay. Still, she hoped her time travel adventure would distract from missing her guests.

When late afternoon arrived, Cate began dressing for the evening’s event. As she slipped into her gold-sequined, trumpet-style, floor-length gown, thoughts crowded into her mind. Last New Year’s Eve, Cate was holed up in her small apartment in Aberdeen with Riley. She’d bought a mini-bottle of champagne and chocolate covered strawberries to ring in the new year with sweatpants and sweets. In a well-worn Aberdeen College sweatshirt, athletic socks, and a messy faux-bun created with an old scrunchie, she parked herself next to her pup with a bowl of popcorn. She’d fallen asleep on her couch before midnight, a romantic holiday-themed comedy streaming on the television.

Cate chuckled, reminded of how different her life had been then. Fast-forward one year and she stood staring into a floor-length mirror within her bedroom suite in a gold-colored evening gown, her hair coiffed in a chic updo, evening make-up complete with smoky eyes and red lips.

The suite alone surpassed the size of her apartment by a hundred square feet at least. The remaining castle dwarfed the apartment building she'd called home. She, too, had changed, morphed into a new version of herself.

She stared into her own blue eyes, noting the changes both physical and mental. She recalled her awkwardness at social events. Now a countess, she didn't have the flexibility to shy away from social settings or shut herself off from the world. While she still enjoyed her privacy, Countess Cate was becoming more at ease with entertaining, becoming accustomed to playing the role of gracious hostess.

She smoothed her dress a final time before slipping on her shoes. Her mind shifted gears, from her own journey less than a year ago to the events of almost a century ago. As she buckled the ankle strap, she imagined her counterpart one hundred years ago, doing the same thing.

Anne MacKenzie, then the Countess of Dunhavenshire, was likely dressing for her own New Year's Eve party. Perhaps donning a floor-length ballgown like Cate or perhaps a shin-length dress with a drop-waist. Had she worn her hair up or in the popular finger waves of the time?

Cate imagined she wore a headband, popular during the Roaring '20s. She'd donned some of Victoria MacKenzie's jewels, removed from the safe for the evening. Which necklace had she chosen to wear, and which was left in her room for the evening, Cate wondered?

When she attended Victoria's Halloween Ball in 1856, Cate had borrowed Victoria's sapphire necklace. Victoria, gifted a new ruby necklace by her husband, Randolph, had worn it as a perfect match to the color of her ballgown. Which was Anne wearing tonight? In either case, both of them would be gone by morning. Stolen away in the wee hours of 1925.

Cate glanced to the timepiece she wore around her neck. Mere steps away was the rip that could take her to 1925. After the clock struck midnight, she could travel back to the moment the jewels were stolen. Perhaps she should. Perhaps after her own party wound down, she should convince Jack to travel back and catch the thief red-handed.

The memory of her last attempt to catch someone red-handed flashed through her mind. She'd ended up being tossed into the loch and nearly killed. She escaped thanks to Jack's good timing. He fished her out before she drowned.

No, she thought, perhaps catching the thief red-handed was a bad idea. Besides, who would she say she was when the confrontation occurred?

Would she admit to Anne and Rory she was a time traveler from the future, there to stop the robbery? Rory would realize the truth, but would Anne? That was assuming she could stop the thief without meeting an unfortunate end. Surely someone willing to steal was willing to do other nefarious things.

She'd also have no guarantee they'd arrive in time to stop the thief. Anne MacKenzie said she retired for the evening around 1 a.m. The theft occurred sometime between then and when Lady MacKenzie's ladies' maid noticed the jewels missing around eleven the following morning.

If her party lasted longer than the MacKenzie party of the past, they could miss the theft. Then again, if the theft occurred later in the morning, they could be hanging around the halls for hours, increasing their odds of being discovered.

Cate shook the silly idea from her head as she slipped the timepiece beneath her dress. She'd have to let the theft happen and investigate it from there.

She crossed her bedroom to the sitting room. Sprawled near the warm fireplace, both pups laid chewing bones provided by Mrs. Fraser. She stroked their backs with each hand. Riley lifted his head from his prize, giving her a quick sniff.

"Yes, I'm all dressed up, buddy. Not my usual leggings, huh?"

Riley stood on his hind legs, reaching for her face with his tongue.

"Thank you for the kiss, but I'm not going anywhere. Just downstairs for a party. You hold down the fort with your brother, Bailey. I'll be back as soon as I can!"

Cate gave the two dogs another scratch before leaving them to their bones and heading downstairs.

The doorbell chimed as Cate arrived at the foot of the stairs.

Jack pulled it open after a wolf whistle. "You clean up nicely, Lady Cate," he said, grinning.

"As do you," Cate said as Mrs. Campbell pushed through the door, her black formal gown's sequins shimmering with each step.

“Oh!” she exclaimed, stopping short mid-step and leaving Jack unable to close the door. “Don’t you look elegant, Lady Cate. How befitting the golden gown is on our newest Countess.”

“Thank you,” Cate answered, looping her arm through Mrs. Campbell’s to lead her to the sitting room where pre-dinner drinks were being served. Mr. and Mrs. Fraser, along with Molly, were already present. “And your dress is also lovely. What beautiful detailing with the subtle shimmer of sequins.”

Mrs. Campbell giggled. “Yes, well, I succeeded in finding something suitable for the occasion without being overdone.”

Jack followed them into the sitting room as Cate offered a drink to Mrs. Campbell. She took a small sherry. “Oh, Jack, shouldn’t you be at your post?”

“My post?” he asked, sipping his scotch.

“Yes, aren’t you filling in as butler this evening?”

“Oh, no!” Cate exclaimed, a giggle escaping her with her words. “One of the waitstaff we hired is handling that. Jack just happened to be in the foyer when you arrived. He’s a guest tonight, remember?”

“Oh, yes,” Mrs. Campbell replied, her voice brusque. “How could I forget?”

“In case your memory is failing you,” Jack chimed in. “This is my grandfather, Stanley Reid. He’s also a guest tonight.”

“Yes, I do remember Stan. Good to see you again. Forgive me, I had quite forgotten about Lady Cate’s guest list with so many other details swimming through my mind.”

“Of course, Mrs. Campbell,” Cate responded. “I just mentioned earlier this week the fantastic job you’ve done in putting together these events. Everyone on my guest list has been most excited to attend.”

“I’m sure,” Mrs. Campbell noted, her voice still dry. Mr. Smythe and Gayle arrived moments later, requesting a drink from the waitstaff, and joining in the conversation. Soon afterward, guests began to arrive, were shown in for cocktails and introduced. Cate met several lords and ladies, even a fellow countess, although her husband, the count, was no longer alive. An up-and-coming industry titan who was recently knighted by the Queen also was in attendance.

Cate’s head swam with details of who was who, who knew who, where they were from and why that mattered. She wondered if she’d really grown into her role of Countess, as she'd thought she had only an hour ago. As she struggled to keep up with the witty banter, dry British humor, and dizzying array of intricate peerage, the dinner announcement was made.

Cate breathed a sigh of relief as the group headed for the dining room. Her everyday, no-frills dining room had been transformed into a scene from a movie. Crisp, white linens covered an intricately set table. Lit candles beamed from the center where pine sprigs and cones surrounded them. The place settings were delicately laid, perfectly spaced, and the silverware gleamed. She wondered if she had wandered onto the set of Downton Abbey by mistake.

"Oh gosh, it looks so great in here. I feel like royalty," Cate overheard Molly say to Mrs. Fraser.

"Aye," Mrs. Fraser agreed. "Dunhaven Castle has entertained many a gentleman and lady through the years."

"Yes, even a Duke here and there!" Mrs. Campbell exclaimed with pride as she pushed past the women into the ballroom, leading a lord something-or-other to a place setting next to Cate's.

As everyone was seated, Cate spied her staff near the far end of the table. She smiled forlornly to the group, separated from her by what seemed like miles of table. Molly waved to her, chattering to Mr. and Mrs. Fraser, gesturing to the decor. The elder Mr. Reid chatted to the woman sitting to his right. If Cate recalled, she was the daughter of one of the VIPs. She giggled at whatever Mr. Reid told her, his hands gesturing in the air.

Everyone seemed to be enjoying themselves. Cate made a short speech thanking everyone for attending prior to the meal being served. Mrs. Campbell had arranged a meal fit for a king, with seven courses. The food never seemed to end. The meal, lasting several hours, concluded well into the night, leaving less than two hours before midnight.

After dinner concluded, drinks and music flowed in the ballroom until midnight approached. As she eyed the time passing, she pondered the MacKenzies of 1924. With only minutes left before midnight, they hurled toward an unstoppable event. While not as devastating as the murder that occurred sixty-some-odd years earlier, it still would leave a scar. Its effects would ripple through time.

As the moment approached, champagne flutes were distributed, and the crowd counted down the final few seconds until the clock chimed midnight. Balloons cascaded from the ceiling. Gold and silver globes showered down around them, floating across the floor as people exchanged hugs, kisses, handshakes and well-wishes for a happy and healthy new year.

A loud cannonade of sound drew the revelers to the back gardens. “Oohs” and “aahs” rose among the group as fireworks exploded overhead, showering the onlookers with colored lights. Despite the chilly air, almost every guest lingered outside for the entire show. An explosion of applause resounded after the final firework sparkled overhead.

The party wound down around 1 a.m. with most guests saying their goodbyes about twenty minutes past. By quarter to two, everyone had departed, including Mrs. Campbell, promising to contact Cate “very soon” about the next event. Cate joined her staff in the sitting room for one final toast to the evening’s success before everyone retired, exhausted from the evening.

Cate climbed into bed around 3 a.m., two exhausted pups nestled in their beds below. As she drifted to sleep, Cate wondered if the jewels were already stolen in 1925 or if the nightmare had yet to unfold.

CHAPTER 15

Eate opened her eyes to bright sunshine late the next morning. A sinking feeling filled her as she realized almost a century ago, her ancestors were waking up to a nightmare.

She stretched out in bed before venturing out, choosing her bathrobe instead of dressing. She bundled the robe tighter around her neck as the cold struck her when she let the dogs out for a few moments.

Despite her late rise, no one else was awake. She ushered the dogs back to her suite after their breakfast, tiptoeing through the halls with the cold breakfast she'd retrieved for herself from the refrigerator. She settled on her chaise, balancing her bowl of fruit and cereal on her lap as she pulled a blanket across her legs. Riley and Bailey leapt onto the chaise, nestling into the blanket on either side of her.

She ate her breakfast, her mind wandering to the events of 1925. In two hours, Anne's maid would discover the missing jewelry. The house would be turned upside-down, the guests and staff would be questioned, and a full police investigation would be launched. During that investigation, something would come to light that would cause Rory to refuse to speak of the incident and Anne to pen the letter sitting on her side table. But what?

It had to be that a family member had stolen the jewelry. This wouldn't be the first time the MacKenzie family covered up a dark secret. Emilia MacKenzie, Randolph's younger sister, died birthing her first illegitimate child. The family listed her death as caused by influenza and kept her child locked in the tower room. While Randolph loved the child, she had been kept a secret, a blemish on the family name.

A jewelry theft from a family member would possibly evoke a similar response. Cate imagined the family Bible, the ink splotch over her side of the family. She envisioned Anne staring at her branch of the family, enraged. With a contemptuous expression, Anne poured ink over that branch, blotting them from her memory and the family.

Cate planned to continue her investigation into the staff today, but all signs pointed to her great-grandfather, Lucas. Cate sighed, her spoon rattling around the empty bowl on her lap. The effect echoed the thoughts rattling around her brain.

She set the bowl aside, laying her head back. Tempted to read the letter again, Cate rolled her head to the side, staring at the small envelope. Her fingers reached out and touched the envelope, the texture rough on her fingertips.

The grainy texture mirrored the harsh words contained inside. She swallowed hard, pulling her hand away. The enmity and acrimonious language disturbed her. She didn't blame Anne for her reaction. She understood her emotion of betrayal. She experienced something similar when her tenure-tracked request had been denied by her old workplace. She'd felt the same sense of betrayal, the same wish to lash out. This betrayal, from a close family member, must have stung even worse than hers. But she refused to read it again. She'd dwelled on it enough.

She must focus on changing things. The theft had occurred, but could she solve the mystery? Could they find the missing jewels and return them? Was it possible to do this before anyone was any the wiser about the thief's identity? Or, at least, could the strained relationship between the family members be salvaged if the jewels were returned?

Cate was determined to answer these questions. She returned her bowl to the kitchen, washing, drying, and putting it away. It appeared no one else had ventured down yet. The stack of bowls set on the island remained untouched, six spoons still splayed next to them. On her way back to her suite, she stopped in the library, picking up her research folder.

She paused for a moment before exiting the room, eyeing the bookshelf. The bookshelf, the source of the disturbing note, still held a secret. At least in her mind it did. Even after finding the note, it still haunted her dreams. The air escaping from behind it must signify something. She refused to believe it resulted from a loose shingle or leaky chimney. Her mind maintained something else caused this.

But what, her analytical side mused? The plans showed nothing behind the bookcase. No secrets lurked on the other side. Cate sighed, frowning at it before she departed, heading for her sitting room.

She met no one in the halls as she made her way back to her suite. Everyone was enjoying a long, luxurious sleep, leaving the castle quiet. Cate's anxious mind put a stop to her sleeping ability. The theft that occurred on this day nearly one hundred years ago filled her mind the moment she awoke. She'd soon be able to investigate in person, and she wanted a solid understanding of who Jack and she should pay close attention to.

Cate snuggled under her blanket, opening her folder. She shuffled through the papers, locating her suspect list and her staff list. She studied the list of names, searching for any clue that may hint toward them being a thief.

No one had left the employ of the MacKenzie family immediately following the theft. However, she reasoned a quick departure of an employee would call suspicion, so the thief, if they were a member of the staff, would probably stay long enough to cast away any suspicion from themselves.

Several staff members had been employed long before the theft and remained so long after the theft. Cate placed check marks by those staff members' names. They would be low on the suspect list. It wasn't probable that a loyal staff member would steal from the family they served, nor that they would stay around to continue their job afterward.

The remaining list consisted of five individuals. Two maids, a groom, a footman and an under-butler. Cate noted their arrivals and departures. Most of them had arrived at least a year prior to the theft, except the footman. William Barrow, the footman, had arrived nine months prior to the theft. Their departure dates were all within one year of the theft. Alice Huxley, a scullery maid, left the employ of the MacKenzies four months after the theft. The other maid, Bertha MacIntyre, worked until September 1925. William Barrow ceased to be listed in the employment register around the same time as Bertha. The groom, Thomas Gould, was last paid by the estate in June. And the under-butler, Charles Forsythe, departed in May.

Cate noted these five staff members on her suspect list. She placed them below her great-grandfather's name. The evidence gathered thus far continued to support a case against him. She listed her reasons for suspecting them next to their names. Near Lucas' name, she wrote Motive: limited inheritance, Evidence: Anne's angry letter, Opportunity: ? Was Lucas at the castle then?

Next to the staff's names, Cate jotted a note that their arrival or departure suggested they may be connected to the theft. It was weak, but it made Cate feel better to include it.

Perhaps she could find out more about the staff prior to her journey to the past with Jack. She doubted much information was kept about them, but perhaps she could dig up something to help eliminate one or more of them or provide more evidence to include on her suspect sheet.

She climbed from her comfy perch and dressed for the day. Thoughts tumbled around her mind like clothes in a dryer as she dressed and pulled on her boots. As she took the dogs out for a walk around the property after bundling both herself and both pups in winter coats, her mind created fantastical theories about the culprit's identity. Her logical side shot down every one of them, concluding the prime suspect continued to be Lucas MacKenzie.

Dejected, Cate entered the castle through the kitchen door, shaking off her cold coat.

"Up and about already, Lady Cate?" Mrs. Fraser inquired. She stood in the kitchen, a plaid bathrobe wrapped around cozy flannel pajamas.

"Yes," Cate confessed. "I've already enjoyed my first walk of the new year with the dogs."

"I took full advantage of my sleep-in! I don't mind getting up early, but I will admit the luxury of a long, lazy morning was welcome." Mrs. Fraser fixed two bowls of cereal and fruit.

"Need help carrying them up? Or can I bring a cup of tea to you with your breakfast?"

"Nay, I've got it, Lady Cate. But thank you." The woman disappeared into the hallway. Cate noted three bowls remained. One other person had claimed their cold breakfast. Cate wasn't certain, but she guessed it was William Smythe.

Her guess was confirmed as she stripped off the dogs' coats. Mr. Smythe, already dressed in a casual outfit, wandered into the kitchen, placing his bowl in the sink, and setting about washing it.

“Good morning, Cate,” he said in his usual tone. If Cate hadn’t known she wouldn’t have guessed he’d had a late night.

“Good morning. I hope you slept well and enjoyed a late morning,” Cate answered, picking up a towel to dry the bowl and spoon and put them away.

“Yes,” he responded. “And I plan a leisurely day. I spotted a detective novel in your library and with any luck, I will polish it off in one day! If I manage it, this shall have been one of the most successful leisure trips I’ve ever taken! If I’m needed, I shall be in my room.”

“I won’t hold you back. Enjoy your book!”

Mr. Smythe gave her a curt but genuine smile before disappearing down the hall. Cate marveled at the man. He considered completing two one-thousand-piece jigsaw puzzles and polishing off a detective novel the definition of a successful trip. What a unique individual.

Cate ushered the dogs upstairs to her suite. The rest of the household still slumbered, and she intended to retreat to her room with the employment and household records for 1925 to determine if she could discern any additional information about her newest suspects.

She retrieved the records along the way and fished out the two bones Mrs. Fraser had provided for the pups the night before. A pleasant fire warmed the sitting room when she returned. Mr. Fraser must have built the fire while Mrs. Fraser fetched their breakfast.

Cate appreciated the simple gesture, which brought a measure of calm to the room. She settled the dogs with their bones near the fireplace and plopped down next to them. She laid out each item in a semi-circle around her, setting her note sheets and pen in her lap.

She picked up the employment ledgers first, studying them in depth around the dates when each employee departed. She scanned the pages for notations, differences in payments, anything that may suggest a reason for leaving.

There were no special notes listing reasons for departure for any of the five employees Cate flagged. She didn’t expect there would be. She hoped to get lucky, but luck was not on her side. She tossed the book aside, sighing and staring at the pile of other records she’d retrieved. She’d spend her afternoon digging through these, looking for a needle in a haystack.

As she contemplated the work ahead of her, a quiet knock sounded at the door.

“Come in, it’s open!” she shouted as she shuffled through paperwork.

The door opened and Molly slipped inside.

“Good morning, Lady Cate,” Molly greeted her, joining her on the floor.

“Or, gosh, afternoon, I guess!”

Cate chuckled, setting the papers on the floor. “Good day. Did you sleep well?”

“I did,” Molly responded, stretching. “What a party!”

Cate nodded, raising her eyebrows. “Yes. Last year for New Year’s Eve, I was asleep before the ball dropped. How life changes.”

Molly agreed, nodding. “Last year, I was married,” she lamented.

“O-Oh,” Cate stuttered, her voice dropping to a whisper. “Molly, I’m sorry. I didn’t mean...”

Molly waved her hand in the air, interrupting Cate. “No, no. I didn’t mean that as a bad thing. I wasn’t reminiscing of better times. I was recalling a worse time.”

Cate offered a tight-lipped smile, grabbing Molly’s hand.

After a few breaths, Molly continued, “That’s part of the reason I came here today. It’s been a couple of weeks since I arrived. I just wanted to let you know how happy I am you offered me the position and I accepted.”

Cate gave her a fuller smile, her face brightening at Molly’s admission.

“That party was like a fairytale. And I’m loving the job here. I get to cook and bake, which is one of my favorite things to do. I live in a castle! The grounds here are beautiful. It’s like I’m living a dream.”

“The only problem is that nasty boss you have,” Cate quipped.

Molly burst into laughter, throwing her head back and holding her stomach. “Yes, her. She’s just terrible. She makes Jeff look like a saint.” Molly wiped a tear from her eye as she collected herself.

“Oh my,” she said with a final chuckle. “In all seriousness, though, I love it here. Thank you for offering me this position.” She grabbed Cate’s hand, squeezing it.

“I’m glad it’s working out for you, Molly. It’s a big change. I love it here, but that doesn’t mean it’s for everyone. Scottish country life is quiet. Some people would hate it here. I’m glad you don’t! And I’m glad you told me. You know me, I’d worry about your acclimation otherwise.”

Molly nodded. "I realized that. That's why I wanted to tell you how I felt. I'm in love with my life now. For the first time ever. And I mean that. I wasn't this happy even when I was a newlywed."

Molly sighed, staring into the fireplace. "In retrospect, I suppose I realized then Tom and I weren't right for each other. But I just kept on clinging to that idea that we were."

She shook her head. Her eyebrows raised, and a smile brightened her face. "But everything worked out, everything is corrected. Perhaps I had to suffer through that to realize where I was supposed to be. Otherwise, maybe I wouldn't have had the courage to move to a new country."

"That's a good attitude to have."

"It's easy to look at it that way when it's the best decision of my life!"

Cate pulled her into a hug. "I'm so glad this worked out and we're both happy here!"

Molly squeezed her back in the embrace. After they let go, Molly stared at the mess on the floor. "Research?"

Cate nodded as she scanned the mess. "Yeah. Figured I'd spend a lazy day in front of the fire sorting through some records for my book."

"Only you consider this a lazy day. I remember finding you sprawled at a library table many a day like this at Aberdeen."

"It's mindless work to do while I'm still sleepy."

"Did you get any sleep?" Molly inquired.

"Yes, I did. But I was awake early. Residual energy from the party, I guess," Cate responded with a shrug.

Molly gave her a coy smile. "You are turning into quite the countess."

It was Cate's turn to roar with laughter. "Oh, right. I'm such an outstanding partier."

"I'm serious! You are the picture of grace. Composed, polite, kind, and beautiful."

Cate blushed at the string of compliments. "Thank you."

"Your dress last night... stunning. So elegant, so perfect."

"Thanks," Cate answered, color rising in her cheeks from the compliment. "Your dress was great too. You looked like you came right off a magazine page!"

"I sort of did," Molly admitted. "I bought a knock-off of a dress a celebrity wore on the red carpet! I will not ask for a 'Who wore it best' poll, but..."

“Well, I’d vote for you! You looked like a million bucks! And those shoes were to die for!”

“A million pounds here. Oh... wait, that sounds bad.” Molly chuckled at her own joke.

Cate giggled, too.

“Anyway, you are really the definition of aristocratic breeding, even if you didn’t grow up in it!”

“You may be going too far. But I appreciate your sentiments. I’ve really grown up since I’ve come here. It’s been easy though, like you said. I’m living most people’s fantasy.”

“No one deserves it more than you, Cate.”

“Speaking of fantasies,” Cate said after a pause, changing the subject. “I emailed Maggie. She’d like to visit in the spring. So, looks like we’ll be entertaining again in a few months!”

“That will be fun! She’ll love this place. What with that antique shop? She’ll be exploring your house like it’s an auction. May want to check her suitcase before she leaves, in case she tries to smuggle anything to her shop.”

Cate laughed. “I’ll hide the silverware.”

Molly pulled her phone from her pocket as she chuckled at Cate’s joke. “Here’s the picture I snapped of us last night. We should send it to Maggie. I’m going to have it printed and framed.”

Molly faced the phone’s display toward Cate. Cate studied the screen, recalling posing for the selfie with Molly. Their smiles beamed back at her. Their arms around each other, cheeks together, they appeared the vision of happiness. Molly’s assessment was correct. The photo documented a great memory.

“Aw. Can you print one for me too? I’d like to frame it and put it on my mantle. I love it! Our first holiday!”

“Sure thing! When I was scrolling through my pictures from last night, I fell in love with this one. Well,” Molly said, slapping her hands on her thighs. “I’ll let you get back to it. I just wanted to express my gratitude again and make sure you realized just how happy you made me.”

Cate smiled at her. “I’m so glad! And you don’t have to keep thanking me. I’m just as grateful you’re here. So, thank you for taking the job! You were always a good friend to me while I was at Aberdeen College, glad I could return the favor.”

Molly pulled Cate into a tight hug. “Have fun with your restful work.” She giggled as she climbed to her feet, shaking her head at Cate’s version of relaxation.

Cate’s eyes followed her as she exited the room, pulling the door closed behind her. The exchange left Cate contented and upbeat. She dove back into her work with renewed enthusiasm.

She spent the entire afternoon and early evening pouring over the records.

As Cate munched on a cold roast beef sandwich, she studied a personal accounts book. Number after number floated past her eyes. Dress expenses, personal investments, allowances. Her eyes glossed over. As week after week, month after month passed, Cate began to doubt she’d find anything. When she reached August, she considered giving up. She figured since she was over halfway finished, she’d press on and finish the book.

As Cate worked through the September records, she found an entry that almost made her drop her sandwich.

CHAPTER 16

Riley's head popped up, hoping for a bite of the roast beef if it landed on the floor after Cate bobbed her food. She caught it before it hit the floor.

Listed in the register book was the entry Wedding Gift - Mr. and Mrs. William and Bertha Barrow. The names seemed familiar. She shuffled through her papers, locating the suspect list she'd made. She scanned it and found William Barrow and Bertha MacIntyre. It couldn't be a coincidence. William and Bertha departed in the same month. And in that same month, the MacKenzies of 1925 gave one William Barrow and his new wife, Bertha, a wedding gift.

Cate smiled at her paper. The two staff members had likely met, fallen in love, and married, leaving the estate for another opportunity after their marriage. This lowered them on the suspect list, given the obvious reason they departed. Cate noted it, pushing them to the bottom of the list and placing a large question mark next to them to signify her doubtfulness as to their guilt.

The list was narrowing. Unfortunately, her ancestors remained at the top. Still, she'd made good progress. Satisfied with her work, she snapped the register book shut. She and Jack would have a good start on their investigation. They'd concentrate on the individuals on this list when they returned to 1925 to investigate.

Cate cleaned up the mess she'd created, returning all her sources to the office files. She used the rest of the evening to relax with a movie.

She rose early the next morning. Breakfast would be served early to accommodate Mr. Smythe and Gayle's early departure.

Cate met them in the dining room. "Good morning."

"Good morning, Cate," Gayle responded. "I was just mentioning to Mr. Smythe how sad I am to leave. It was a lovely visit with two lovely parties included."

"I'm so glad you enjoyed it. I'll miss you both, but I'm glad you enjoyed your stay."

"Most enjoyable!" Mr. Smythe agreed.

"Did you finish your mystery novel?" Cate inquired.

"Yes. Quite a good whodunit. I polished it off early last evening. So that's two puzzles and a novel I've completed. Not a bad take for this trip in my estimation. A perfect holiday," Mr. Smythe replied.

"I'm so glad you consider it a success," Cate answered.

"I consider it a success despite those tedious puzzles," Gayle added, chuckling.

"Those puzzles keep your wits sharp!" Mr. Smythe assured Gayle.

"Molly seems to be settling in well," Gayle replied after a quick eye roll at Mr. Smythe.

"Yes. She is. I spoke with her yesterday and she mentioned how at home she felt and how much she loved the new job."

"Mrs. Fraser seems quite pleased with her," Gayle added.

Cate nodded. "Yes, they get along well and Molly loves working in the kitchen as does Mrs. Fraser."

"She seems a valuable addition to the staff," Mr. Smythe agreed. "I'm so pleased it worked out so well."

"And your new addition, Bailey, seems to have settled right in, too," Gayle mentioned.

"Oh, yes! He's really coming around. And Riley is delighted with his new friend!"

Gayle ruffled the fur on Riley's head. "This little pup is a darling."

"Thank you," Cate answered. "He loves life, that's for certain!"

"He seems thrilled with his new yard!" Mr. Smythe added.

"With the parties over, how will you fill your time?" Gayle questioned.

The mystery of the missing jewelry flitted across Cate's mind as she shrugged. "Oh, I'm sure I'll find something to fill my time!" She paused a moment, then added, "Plus, I'm certain Mrs. Campbell will soon have the next party lined up!"

Gayle chuckled at Cate's comment. "Well, I, for one, am sad they are over. And look forward to another!"

"I look forward to having you back at the castle soon. But you don't need a party to plan a visit. You are both welcome anytime. Please just let me know when you'd like to stay, and we'll arrange it!"

"How generous of you, Cate," Gayle replied.

"I've had such a lovely time, I may take you up on that sooner rather than later."

"Please do! I'm glad you found your time here relaxing and pleasant!"

They finished their breakfast, continuing light conversation before Cate saw them off about an hour after. She offered a wistful wave as they pulled down the drive, sad to see her guests go. She consoled herself with a long walk of the property with her dogs. Despite the chill in the air, she settled on the banks of the loch for a few moments of quiet reflection.

"Well, Riley and Bailey, tomorrow we'll start exploring the theft. What do you expect we'll find?"

Riley stared back with quizzical eyes while Bailey offered a small whine.

"I'll admit," Cate continued, "I'm not as excited to tackle this mystery as I was the last one. I'm a little nervous about what I'll learn about my ancestors."

As if in response, Riley climbed onto Cate's lap, settling in with a kiss to her cheek. Bailey cuddled next to her. Perhaps the dogs sensed her apprehension and hoped to assuage any trepidation on her part.

Cate wrapped her arms around both pups. "You're right. No matter what I find, it'll be okay. But I'm still nervous. Don't tell Jack though," she confided, winking at them.

"Don't tell Jack what?" Jack inquired, appearing behind her.

Cate shook her head. "Nothing, just vetting some ideas out loud to the dogs."

He settled on the ground next to her. "Did they have any worthwhile commentary?"

"I'm afraid not."

"Perhaps you should try a human audience."

“That’s not a bad suggestion. It might provide more feedback than a kiss on the cheek.”

Jack motioned for her to continue. “So, let’s have it.”

Cate sighed before plowing into her latest research. “Well, I spent yesterday researching employment records and noting anything unusual or suspicious.”

“And?”

“And... it appears my ancestors are still the most likely suspects. I found five staff members whose departures were within a year of the theft. Hardly damning evidence against them, but enough to consider them above others who stayed on for years.”

“Seems fair enough.”

Jack’s brow knit. “Each other?”

Cate nodded as she stared out over the rippled waters. “Yes. At least, it seems so. A maid and a footman departed the same month. Also during that month, I found a note in the private ledger entry stating an amount was paid out of that account for a wedding gift. The first and last name matched the footman, and the first name matched the maid.”

“Okay, that seems a fair assumption then,” Jack agreed with a nod. “So that leaves us three staff members whose departures still make them suspicious.”

“Yes,” Cate replied. She provided Jack with the information about the remaining staff members.

“All right,” Jack answered when she finished. “Those are the folks we’ll concentrate on when we begin our investigation tomorrow.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “Wow, Lady Cate quiet about time travel? Not brimming with excitement? Are you ill?”

“I’m not. I’m just still nervous about proving my ancestors are thieves. Solving the mystery if that is the end result seems...” Cate’s voice trailed off, unable to finish the sentence.

“We have no confirmation they are the thieves. Let’s start with an open mind. Perhaps we’ll be proving they aren’t thieves!”

“Open mind, right,” Cate repeated.

“We have no confirmation that letter from Anne MacKenzie refers to this incident. It could be anything!”

“That’s a stretch, but you’re correct. We have no confirmation the letter refers to the theft.”

“Me too,” Cate replied, accepting Jack’s hand to pull her to standing. “I guess we’ll find out soon enough if you’re right!”

“Care to make it interesting? Put a little wager on it?”

“What? Twenty bucks I don’t descend from a line of thieves?” Cate inquired.

“Twenty pounds maybe. You live in the UK now, remember?”

“Right. Okay, twenty pounds says my ancestors committed the crime.”

Cate, Jack and the two pups returned to the castle, warming themselves near the kitchen stove.

“Are you planning to clean up the ballroom today?” Cate questioned Jack as Mrs. Fraser and Molly finished lunch preparations.

“Yes. We’re starting inside. We’ll take two days with that, then move outside. The weather’s supposed to improve next week. It will be easier to clear the gardens in the milder weather.”

“I’d like to help with the interior at least. I’ll meet you after lunch in the ballroom.”

Cate shook her head. “Nope. I got us into this, and I’ll help to get us out. At least with the interior decorations!”

“Drawing the line at the outside work?”

“I am. Your version of milder weather is still cold for me!”

Mrs. Fraser put the finishing touches on Cate’s tray, which Cate picked up before Molly could. “I’ve got it, Molly!”

Molly glanced to Mrs. Fraser, who nodded at her. “Often Lady Cate is too ambitious, and we let her carry her own tray.”

Cate offered a wry smile at Mrs. Fraser as she called the dogs to follow her upstairs. She lunched in the library, studying notes from her book at the desk while she ate. The dogs remained quiet, napping near the fireplace, tired after the long morning walk.

Despite their quiet demeanor, Cate still eyed the bookcase across the room with suspicion. Distracted from her work, she approached the bookcase. No air flowed from it today. She began to question what she and Jack had experienced the other day. Were they mistaken? Nothing in the castle plans pointed toward any structures behind the bookshelf that could cause such a phenomenon. Perhaps they were barking up the wrong tree in searching.

No, she concluded with a shake of her head, the dogs noticed the phenomenon as well. That was what called their attention to the issue to begin with. Surely the dogs were not mistaken. Their senses were superior to her human ones. Plus, the match implied air flow also. No, an air leak existed behind this bookshelf. There was no doubt.

She checked her timepiece, reminded that she would use it tomorrow to begin unraveling another mystery on the estate. It was already a few minutes past one. Jack and Mr. Fraser would be in the ballroom working, having finished their lunch fifteen minutes earlier.

She rushed to clean up her paperwork on the desk and hurried from the room, glancing back at the two dogs, sleeping on the area rug near the fireplace. As she did, something caught her eye. Her brows knit together as she performed a mental calculation, glancing between the hall and the library.

She was pulled from her mental machinations by Molly, who skirted past her into the library.

"Excuse me, Lady Cate. Something wrong?" Molly inquired, retrieving the empty tray.

"Oh, no. Just considering if I should move the dogs to my sitting room or leave them napping here."

"Well, you know what they say, Lady Cate," Molly began.

Cate nodded.

"Let sleeping dogs lie," they said in unison.

She closed the doors behind them as they both departed, parting ways with Molly heading downstairs to the kitchen and Cate heading down the hall to the ballroom.

"Sorry I'm late!" she announced, entering the ballroom.

"You're not late, Lady Cate," Jack assured her as he and Mr. Fraser attempted to fold a table linen. "You can't be late to a job that's not required."

Cate chuckled, more at their attempt to fold the linen than Jack's joke. "Why don't you let me take over the linen folding and you can dismantle the tables and move them?"

"Aye," Mr. Fraser agreed. "I'm afraid Emily would faint dead away if she spied our folding abilities."

Cate laughed louder at this admission. "I agree. Don't worry, my lips are sealed. I won't give away your secret."

"Thank you, Lady Cate," Mr. Fraser replied.

Cate laid the tablecloth back on the table, straightening it then set about folding it into a neat square. She placed it in a nearby bin provided by the linen company. She continued around the room, folding table linens, napkins and runners as she went, dragging the bin behind her.

Jack and Mr. Fraser followed her, deconstructing tables and setting them aside for the rental company to pick up.

With that work finished, they folded chairs, stacking them against the tables before finishing for the day. They planned to remove the decorations from the Christmas trees tomorrow and dismantle those to return to storage.

Cate returned to the library to collect the dogs for a pre-dinner walk. Both dogs were excited to see her after her absence, showering her with kisses and wagging tails. Cate finished her day with a relaxing meal and a movie in her sitting room.

Time travel pervaded her thoughts, crowding into every corner of her mind. She and Jack planned to travel to 1925 the following afternoon, hoping to introduce themselves to the family and gather some preliminary information.

The movie on Cate's laptop played on without Cate hearing it. Her mind ran wild with excitement and nervous anticipation. Cate doubted she'd sleep tonight. Still, she would try. After closing her laptop, Cate took the dogs for one final walk before crawling into bed and squeezing her eyes shut in her best attempt to go to sleep.

She tossed and turned for hours, practicing greeting family members from an era gone-by. She rehearsed feigning shock at the unfortunate news of the theft. Midnight came and went, leaving Cate still wide-eyed and worried. She bit her lower lip, wondering if she'd shake hands with a thief tomorrow.

CHAPTER 17

Tears streamed down Cate's face. She wiped at them with the back of her hand, feeling ridiculous and childish. As silly as it sounded, she was glad to still have Molly, the Frasers and Jack staying in the castle. Their presence, despite being asleep and rooms away, calmed her frayed nerves. She'd slept only two hours before the nightmare woke her.

Her hands still trembled from the experience. But her heart rate and breathing had settled into a normal rhythm. The stress must be playing tricks on her mind, Cate thought. She recalled the details of the dream as she tried to process it.

It centered around the bookcase in the library again. A black hole filled the spot where the bookshelf once stood. Cate approached it as wind swirled around her, blowing from the void. Eerie, haunting sounds emanated from the space. She peered into the blackness, unable to see anything.

She grabbed a nearby flashlight, training the light into the hole. At first, she spotted nothing. Then a light beam blinded her, glaring back as though she'd turned the flashlight into her own eyes. As she squinted against the light, she lowered her flashlight, discovering a mirror in front of her.

She stared at the mirror, careful not to shine the light in such a way as to blind herself. Something was odd about the reflection. Cate glanced down at her attire. She wore a simple ensemble of leggings, a tunic, and cable knit cardigan. Her brows scrunched together as she returned her gaze to the mirror. Her reflection wore a low-necked blue and gold-striped gown with a skirt opening to show her petticoat, a style traditional of the late 1700s. Her hair was piled high on her head with curls trailing down her neck.

The reflection stared back at her, tears streaming down her cheeks. Her mirror image's mouth opened and closed as though trying to impart some words to Cate. A shadow passed over the mirror and her reflection glanced behind herself as did Cate. She snapped her eyes back to the mirror after finding nothing lurking behind her. Her reflection continued to search behind her as darkness crept across the mirror.

Within moments, an ear-piercing shriek shattered the silence surrounding her. The noise, emanating from her reflection, splintered the glass in the mirror. It crumbled, littering the floor with shards of glass. She peered at the pieces, noting movement in them. Hands trembling, Cate lifted a shard from the rubble, watching a tiny portion of the scene she witnessed in the full mirror moments ago continue to unfold.

Fireballs rained from an unknown source, landing and exploding with a spray of flame and earth. Her reflection passed by, racing away from the unknown attacker. She watched for another few breaths before she dropped the shard.

The ground shuddered beneath her, and a deafening noise tore through the room. Her ears rang from the sound, and she pushed herself up to sitting from where she had fallen when the foundations of the castle shook. Disoriented, she tried to stand, but a second explosion knocked her off her feet again as it blasted through the castle's exterior wall.

She crawled to the window, gazing out at the hellish landscape. Black clouds blocked out the sun. Fires raged across the grounds. Bolts of lightning streaked across the sky. Her eyes widened as a large fireball hurled straight toward her.

The dream ended before she was struck but still prompted her to bolt upright, her chest heaving and heart pounding. Tears flowed from her eyes as she clutched her bedsheets. The realization set in that it had only been a horrible nightmare. She recovered, gulping down a few deep breaths while chiding herself about her foolish reaction.

Still, her mind remained troubled as she eased back into the pillows. She'd never struggled with nightmares before. This continued obsession from her subconscious mind regarding the bookcase baffled her. What was her mind trying to impart?

Or was this preoccupation with the bookshelf a misdirection, a trick of her subconscious mind. Was she focusing on an easy target while her mind attempted to wrap around other stressors?

Perhaps her uneasiness about her ancestor's involvement in the jewel theft was causing this. Perhaps she remained fixated on the bookcase because it held the secret unsent letter from Anne MacKenzie highlighting the family member's involvement in the episode.

Still, Cate pondered, staring out of the window at the moonlit sky, this seemed rather extreme. And why the strange clothes? If the center of her stress was the theft, why was she not dressed in clothing from the 1920s. Instead, she saw herself in clothes from a much older period. What was the connection?

She shook her head, returning her gaze to the ceiling above her. Perhaps she was crazy for even trying to make sense of her nonsensical dream. Often, there was no explanation, no reasoning or sense. Perhaps her overstimulated mind pasted together a variety of things to create the scenario, and it held no meaning.

She tried to convince herself of that idea. She repeated to herself that it was just a dream, that it had no meaning. Like a child afraid of the dark, she placated herself with these platitudes until she fell asleep.

Cate crawled from her bed the following morning, yawning as she plodded her way to the bathroom for a shower. Still tired when she emerged, she hoped the wintry morning air would awaken her. She gathered the dogs, taking them out before breakfast. After breakfast, she left them chewing fresh bones with Mrs. Fraser in the kitchen and made her way to the ballroom to finish assisting with the dismantling of the party decorations.

She yawned as they pulled ornaments from the tree and placed them in bins to be put away for another year.

"Late night, Lady Cate?" Jack inquired as she yawned a second time.

Cate shook her head before answering, weighing how much to say. "Something like that."

Jack peered down at her from the ladder he stood on to reach the top of the gigantic tree in the ballroom. "Uh-oh, I feel like there's more to the story.”

Cate stared ahead, her mind churning about not only her dream but their upcoming trip to the past.

“Cate?” Jack questioned when she didn’t respond.

“Wound up about the visit to the past later, I guess,” she answered, shrugging.

Jack narrowed his eyes, staring at her.

“What?” she asked, shrugging again.

Jack didn’t respond, handing her another ornament without averting his gaze.

“Okay, okay,” Cate caved. “I had another nightmare about that stupid bookshelf.”

“The bookshelf again?” Jack queried, climbing down from the ladder while juggling a few ornaments.

Cate sighed as she tossed ornaments in the bin. “Yes, the stupid bookshelf again.”

“Same thing? An open hole there?”

“Yes and no. Same thing with the gaping hole there. But then it took a weird turn. In the hole was a mirror. But when I glanced at my reflection, it wasn’t me. I mean, it was me, but I wasn’t dressed in the clothes I was wearing. I had on a dress characteristic of the late 1700s. Then I noticed my reflection was crying. She glanced behind her, and I thought I saw something, so I did the same. Then the reflection of me started screaming, and then the mirror broke into pieces. But in the broken shards, I could still see what was happening to my reflection. There was fire everywhere. Then the next thing I knew, I was on the floor and my ears were ringing. The whole castle shook all over. I crawled over to look out the window and fire surrounded us all over the property. It was like a hellscape. It was horrible.” Cate shook her head again, her brow furrowing as she recalled the terrifying dream.

Jack listened to each detail before speaking. “I’m not discounting how awful that must have been, but I wouldn’t put too much stock in it, Lady Cate. We all have nightmares. As unpleasant as they are, they rarely mean anything.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “Yes, I realize that. That’s what I kept repeating to myself last night. But…”

“But I keep experiencing these dreams. They’re getting harder and harder to discount as nothing when they continue to crop up.”

Jack nodded at her. “Yes, I understand that. Perhaps it has something to do with the investigation we’re about to embark on. Maybe once we get a better handle on it, they’ll die down.”

“I hope so. We can’t begin soon enough.”

Jack grinned at her. “Ah, there’s the Cate I know! Excited to time travel!”

Cate chuckled, returning his smile. “Yes, despite it all, I’m excited.”

They spent the rest of the morning boxing decorations and dismantling artificial trees. Mr. Fraser had made good progress on some of the trees leading into the ballroom. They helped him finish them before lunch.

“We’ll haul these up to storage this afternoon, Jack,” Mr. Fraser suggested as they broke for lunch.

“Sounds good. I’ll meet you here as soon as I finish the estate business with Lady Cate after lunch,” Jack fibbed.

Cate opted to have lunch in the dining room, attempting to avoid the library. Despite Jack’s assurances, she preferred not to encourage her subconscious mind with more fuel. She consumed her lunch in record time, excitement growing for her trip to the past. She hurried upstairs, dressing in a tailored ladies’ travel suit for the occasion. Jack appeared in a men’s traveling suit, knocking at her door within thirty minutes of lunch.

Cate greeted him with a grin.

“Ah, Lady Cate, your mood has improved, I see.”

“It has! I must admit I’m excited to go. And you’re right, whatever the outcome, it has nothing to do with me. It may be a disappointment, but I’m grateful for the opportunity to immerse myself in the culture.”

Cate closed the door to her sitting room behind them. “The Roaring Twenties! What an exciting time to go to. The world was changing, modernizing and having a fabulous time doing it! Flappers, Jazz...”

“Gangsters,” Jack commented.

Cate stopped dead. “In America!”

“Still too close for comfort,” Jack responded.

Cate rolled her eyes at him. “Come on, let’s go.”

She waved him into the bedroom, holding out the timepiece.

“I’m glad you’ve gotten over your angst,” Jack responded, wrapping his hand around hers.

Together they rubbed the watch face. Within seconds, the second hand slowed. It continued to stall until it crept along, keeping time in the present, not in the past.

When the second hand reached its slow crawl, Cate glanced around. “We’re here,” she said, pointing to the missing dog beds.

Jack adjusted his collar and wiped a bead of sweat from his forehead. “So we are.”

Cate stepped to the doors, flinging them open to the sitting room. She crossed the room, Jack following behind her.

“Wait up, Cate,” he whispered as they crossed the room. “We’re going down the back stairs at the end of the hall, correct?”

“Correct. Then sneak around the corner and head straight to the main entrance. Fingers crossed we’re well received!”

“Fingers and toes. I’m crossing everything I’ve got,” Jack quipped. “Last time was a spectacular fail. We were caught in our backstory almost right away!”

“It should be easier to blend in this time,” Cate noted, as they cracked the door to peer into the hall. “The Twenties are much less formal than the 1850s!”

“At least there’ll be no waltzing. All clear. Let’s go.”

Jack pulled the door open, and they hurried down the hall, disappearing in the stairway at the end of the hall. They descended and exited the castle unseen.

Rushing around the corner, they slinked past the front windows, ducking when needed to reach the front door.

Jack lifted the lion’s mouth door knocker. “You sure?”

“Positive,” Cate responded. The last time she hadn’t been, but this time her confidence was bolstered. Not only by their previous experience, but also because the time period was far closer to their time than the previous. It should make blending in easier than when they traveled to 1856.

Still, nervous butterflies flitted around Cate’s stomach as the door opened. “May I help you?” a large man with a deep voice inquired.

“Mr. and Mrs. Jack MacKenzie to see Rory MacKenzie. I’m a distant cousin.”

The man raised thick eyebrows, questioning, “Are you expected?”

Jack shook his head. “We didn’t send a letter, as we weren’t sure if my schedule would allow us to visit. Lucky for us, it did! So, we took a chance!”

The man frowned but stood aside. “Please come in. I will announce you to Lord and Lady MacKenzie.” The butler ushered them into the sitting room.

“He didn’t seem pleased,” Jack noted as the doors closed behind them.

“No,” Cate admitted. “I hope Rory and Anne are friendlier.”

“You and me both or our investigation may be finished before we start it.”

The doors swung open, interrupting their conversation. A tall man entered the room, his athletic form hidden under a men’s day suit. Thick, dark, curly hair topped his head and piercing blue eyes, deep set in his face, stared at them. He had a friendly countenance. There was no mistaking him as a MacKenzie. Cate saw the resemblance between this man and his grandfather, Randolph. Would he be as cold as his butler?

CHAPTER 18

“Cousin Jack,” the man greeted them, holding his hand out as he stepped toward them. “Rory MacKenzie.”

Jack took his hand, giving it a long, firm shake. “Jack MacKenzie, distant relative. Very distant. Pleasure to meet you! And this is my wife, Cate.”

“Mrs. MacKenzie,” Rory said, turning his attention to her.

“Lord MacKenzie,” Cate returned, taking his hand in a light handshake.

“Lord MacKenzie was my father. I’m Rory,” he answered. “My wife, Anne, should be along any moment, I’d expect. What brings you to Dunhaven?”

“Land,” Jack answered.

“In the market for a castle?” Rory asked with a chuckle.

Jack laughed. “Not quite. But I’m in land management. I search for properties that might interest my clients. They hire me to do their legwork. We were in the general area and hoped to stop in. I wasn’t sure how long my business would take. Some of the clients can be picky.”

“How fortunate your latest clients allowed you time to visit us. Are you able to stay long?”

“Given the conclusion of my last land deal, we were hoping to take a vacation in the Scottish countryside for a week or two. Perhaps discover some of my heritage.”

The doors reopened, and a woman entered. In a day dress, she wore her dark hair swept into a low bun at the nape of her neck but full around the face.

“Ah, please meet my wife, Anne,” Rory introduced them. “Anne, this is a cousin of mine, Jack MacKenzie and his wife, Cate.”

“Pleased to meet you,” Jack and Cate echoed to the woman.

“Have you ordered tea yet?” Anne inquired of Rory.

“Not yet.” Anne traveled to the wall, pulling a cord to ring for the butler. “Won’t you both have a seat, and we can get better acquainted? Anne, Jack was telling me they plan to vacation in the countryside for a week or two after the conclusion of a successful land deal.”

“How lovely,” Anne answered, taking a seat opposite Jack and Cate who had settled on a loveseat. The frowning butler entered the room and Anne ordered tea from him, calling him Benson.

They made small talk regarding the castle and neighboring town until Benson returned with a tea tray. “Excuse me, m’lord,” Benson said, clearing his throat. “Might I have a brief word outside?”

“Please excuse me for just a moment,” Rory said as Anne poured and offered tea to Cate, then Jack.

Anne asked how Cate enjoyed Scotland, recognizing her accent as American. After Cate answered, assuring her she found the country charming, Anne informed them that Rory’s brother, Lucas, was staying at the castle for the holidays. She assured them he and his wife would be interested to meet Jack and Cate.

Cate’s pulse quickened at the mention of his name. Not only her great-grandfather, Lucas was also her top suspect. As she attempted to settle her racing pulse, Rory returned. Anne gazed at him with questioning eyes.

“My sincerest apologies, you’ve caught the household in quite the uproar, I’m afraid,” Rory explained.

“It’s my turn to apologize,” Jack responded. “We took a chance on visiting and with no notification, appear to have caught you at an inopportune time.”

Rory waved his hand in the air, dismissing Jack’s concern.

Anne glanced to the floor before making eye contact with Jack and Cate. “We’ve suffered an unfortunate incident.”

Jack pressed his hand to his chest. “Oh, there’s no need to rehash any details on our account.”

“You’ll read about it in all the local papers, sure enough,” Rory assured him.

“Yes, it’s a tawdry story that’s quite captured the town’s interest, I’m afraid,” Anne admitted. “Following our annual New Year’s Eve party, some of the family’s more precious jewelry pieces were stolen. Quite the story in these parts, a brazen theft right from under the family’s nose.”

“The police are still mucking about the estate, searching for the culprit.”

Jack feigned shock. “How terrible. Have they any leads?”

Anne shook her head as Rory responded, “No. The police have done nothing thus far but wave their hands and inconvenience my holiday guests.”

“Yes,” Anne agreed. “The poor Richardsons were scheduled to depart today and have been asked to stay for several more days. I daresay any future guests may shy away from us with this fiasco.”

“Don’t fret over it, Anne, fair-weather friends are not friends.”

“I understand. However, I feel terribly responsible. It was I who suggested we secure the jewelry the following day rather than immediately following the party. Careless of me, I realize.”

“Anne, it was not your fault,” Rory assured her.

Anne pressed her lips together, tilting her head as though considering the idea. Then she shook her head as though dismissing it. “My apologies for seeming curt, but if you’ll excuse me, I’d like to lie down. I am not feeling at all well.”

Jack stood as Anne rose from her seat. “Not at all, Lady MacKenzie. I hope you recover soon.”

“Thank you. And please, call me Anne.” Anne left the room as Cate took another sip of her tea.

“Again, apologies,” Rory said as the doors shut behind Anne. “Anne has taken the theft quite badly. It upsets her to no end.”

“Understandable,” Jack answered, reclaiming his seat next to Cate. “Ah, if you don’t mind me sticking myself where I don’t belong, my wife, Cate, is quite the amateur sleuth. Perhaps she could help solve the case. She’s even helped the police in solving a murder once.”

Rory’s eyebrows raised, glancing to Cate. “Really?”

“Yes,” Jack answered for her, placing his arm around Cate’s shoulders. “Cleared an innocent man’s name!”

“Bravo, Mrs. MacKenzie,” Rory responded.

“Please, call me Cate,” Cate answered. “And thank you. I seem to have a knack for mysteries. I’d love to assist in any way I can. Especially if it can help ease Anne's nerves. Poor lady."

"Oh, but I wouldn't dream of asking you to spend your travels lurking around the depths of our castle in search of lost jewels."

"I can't imagine a trip more interesting or memorable for my Cate," Jack responded with a loud laugh. "It's the least we can do for showing up on your doorstep unannounced."

"No, no. Do not trouble yourselves about that. We're happy to have met you and hope to entertain you more than once over your stay here. I suppose if you'd find the challenge entertaining, I've no objections. Typically, I'd decline your kind offer, but poor Anne has herself tied in knots over this. Perhaps you'll be more effective than these bumbling detectives The Yard has sent." Rory rolled his eyes.

"I've never met a mystery I couldn't solve, so I hope to have the jewels back in your possession in short order!" Cate exclaimed.

"Tell you what, why don't you stop by tomorrow? The detectives will return in the mid-afternoon. You can discuss the details with them over afternoon tea," Rory suggested. "Unless you have plans for the day already."

"That sounds perfect. We've no solid plans for our stay yet," Cate informed Rory.

"Well, then allow me to get onto your schedule again before it fills. If you'd join us for dinner on Monday, you can meet more of the family. My brother Lucas and his wife, Amelia, are staying with us."

"How charming, that sounds lovely, thank you," Cate answered, glancing at Jack.

"Yes," he added, "a most gracious invitation. We would be happy to join you. Is 6 p.m. appropriate to arrive?"

"Yes, that should be perfect," Rory answered. "Are you staying in town?"

"No," Jack informed him. "We're in neighboring Canberry."

"Ah," Rory answered. "That seems a bit of an inconvenience for you. What with the traveling back and forth. Why not stay with us?"

"We couldn't possibly inconvenience you that way," Jack replied.

"Inconvenience? Hogwash! Your wife has just offered to help solve the theft, and I've pressured you both into being here over the next two days! The least we can do is offer you a room."

“There’s no guarantee how long this may take, we’d prefer not to take the chance of wearing out our welcome,” Jack dodged.

“Nonsense! Have your luggage sent for, you’ll stay here.” Rory strode to the wall, pulling the bell alerting the servants.

“Oh...” Jack’s voice faltered as he searched for words to rescue them from the situation.

Cate’s jaw dropped open as she glanced wide-eyed at Jack. She shrugged as Benson entered the room.

“Benson, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie will be staying with us going forward. Mrs. MacKenzie is an amateur detective and has taken on our missing jewelry case. Prepare a room for them. Perhaps the suite at the end of the unused hall. It should allow Mrs. MacKenzie sufficient privacy and room to conduct her investigation.”

“Yes, m’lord, very good.” Benson disappeared from the room to handle Rory’s request.

“This is very generous, Rory,” Jack said, standing. “But please, there’s no need to send for our luggage. We’ll stay the night in Canberry and return tomorrow following lunch.”

“If you’re sure,” Rory replied. “Whatever you judge is best.”

“Well, we should be off,” Jack announced, glancing at Cate who set her saucer and teacup down on the coffee table and stood. Jack extended his hand to Rory. “I can’t tell you what a pleasure it was to meet you, cousin.”

“The pleasure is all mine,” Rory assured him, grasping his hand. “And quite a stroke of luck! I hope your wife can assist us.”

“I’ve no doubt she can.”

Cate said her goodbyes. Rory walked them to the front door, seeing them out. Cate and Jack walked down the drive, silent at first.

As they passed a row of hedges, Jack cut in behind them, making the circle back to the castle. “Should we...” Cate began.

Jack raised his hand to halt her speaking. “Later.”

Cate bit her tongue as they approached the castle. Using a back entrance, they snuck inside and crept unseen to what would become Cate’s bedroom. Without a word, they used the timepiece to return to the present.

Once returned, Jack dropped the time piece, wandering away while exhaling a loud breath. He doubled over, hands on his knees.

“Should we talk about it?” Cate inquired.

Jack snickered. “Talk about what a bad turn the situation just took.”

Cate sighed as she paced the floor. "Or how we're planning to pull this off. I mean, staying at the castle? There's no way we can be present for everything, meals, family time, the works."

"And there was no avoiding it. He didn't give us a choice. I had to accept."

"Yes, I know. You didn't have a choice."

"At least I bought us some time until tomorrow."

"I hope it's enough to figure this out."

"Look, Cate, perhaps we should just quit while we're ahead. Never return, just leave things go," Jack suggested.

Cate glanced up sharply at him. "What? No! No way!"

"Cate," Jack cautioned, his hands on his hips, "this is way beyond what we can pull off. We can't go missing from the castle in either time and we can't keep dancing back and forth between past and present. We'll run ourselves ragged between the time added to our days and the constant costume changes."

Cate nodded her head. "I agree. This presents us with quite the sticky wicket."

Jack remained silent.

"But I don't agree that we can't find a way around it."

"You're being a little too optimistic."

"And you're being too pessimistic. We'll figure something out. We have until tomorrow afternoon. If we don't find a solid solution, my vote is we go back and take things as they come. It's not like we can't return if things get too difficult. We'll be in the castle! It'll be easy to slip away and head back."

Jack dropped his head back between his shoulder blades. "Oh, Cate," he groaned, shaking his head, "I'll never understand how your mind works."

"What? I'm just pointing out that it's not the end of the world. We may be able to pull this off after all. And if we can't, so what? We just come home! And we're already in the castle to do that!"

"You're right about that. At least we'll have easy access to the time rip. Okay, I'm convinced. We'll go back tomorrow as planned. You speak with the police, and we'll figure things out from there. If worse comes to worst, we can always feign sightseeing or some other nonsense to get us out of family obligations."

“That’s the spirit!” Cate replied, grinning at him. “Plus, things have taken an interesting turn in terms of suspects. Who are the Richardsons? Could they have reason to steal the necklaces?”

“I suppose we’ll find out, won’t we?”

“We will! Well, I suppose after I change, I had better pack us a few suitcases that we can carry with us tomorrow.”

“Suppose so,” Jack answered with a sigh.

They parted ways to change and, after an afternoon walk with the dogs, Cate spent the remaining time before dinner packing for their stay at Dunhaven Castle in 1925. She filled the luggage with multiple items for each of them, ranging from day clothes to evening wear. They could then leave the suitcases in the past, adding to their ruse of staying at the castle.

She hoped they could pull off the subterfuge. Despite her trepidation about identifying her ancestor as the culprit, she still hoped to solve the mystery.

Cate bounded from her bed with a mix of excitement and anxiety filling her. She cursed having to wait until afternoon to travel. She attempted to spend most of her morning keeping busy, either with trekking around the property with Riley and Bailey or working on her research. She spent her work time in the sitting room, still avoiding the library. While she felt foolish, she explained it away to herself and Mrs. Fraser as a need for a change in scenery to motivate and assist her in making progress.

The move failed to effect much change. Her progress remained slow, her mind distracted by her upcoming travel. After lunch, Cate hurried to her room, dressing for the trip. She fussed with the finger curls she put in her hair, trying her best to style them like Anne’s. She changed clothes to a 1925-appropriate outfit and waited for Jack’s knock at her sitting room door.

She perched on the edge of her chaise, gazing at the two pups who chased each other around, play-fighting over a toy moose. She blew out a long breath, catching Riley’s attention. He pranced over to Cate, sniffing her clothes then staring at her as though demanding an explanation.

Cate smiled at him, ruffling the fur on his head with her fingers. “What do you think, Riley? Do I look like I belong in the Roaring Twenties?”

Bailey joined them while Riley eyed Cate. “Care to give your opinion, Bailey?”

Neither dog offered their thoughts. “I guess I’m a little early,” Cate admitted, drumming her fingers on the chaise’s seat. “Jack and I got ourselves into some hot water yesterday and I’m not sure how we’re going to handle it, so I’m a bundle of nerves.”

Riley cocked his head to the side. “Yes. I’m not sure how we’re going to handle this, but I’m determined to try.”

A knock sounded at the door.

“That must be my partner in crime now!”

The pups stared at the door as Cate hurried to open it. Jack entered and Riley raced toward him.

“Hello, Sir Riley,” Jack called as Riley leapt into his arms. “Have you talked Lady Cate out of her crazy plan?”

Riley offered a lick of Jack’s cheek in response. “I’ll take that as a no. How about you, Bailey?” Jack asked the other pup who stood at his feet.

“I figured as much. So, it’s up to me, I guess. Cate, are you sure about this? Rory seems... savvier than Randolph.”

“He may be, but he seemed friendly enough. If things go wrong, we come back and we don’t return. Simple as that.”

“I have the impression it will not be ‘simple as that’ when it comes down to it.”

Cate shrugged, as she led him to the bedroom. “I’ve got suitcases packed. We can leave them there to keep up the ruse we’re staying. That should help with our cover up.”

Jack blew out a breath. “I should have said we were staying in Dunhaven.”

“No, the other town was a good call. That’s what gave us away to Randolph. We said we were staying in town and no one in town knew us.”

“Yes. But we landed ourselves in a world of trouble, anyway.”

“At least we’ve not gotten ourselves caught yet! See, we’re improving!”

“I really need your optimism, Lady Cate. Well, I suppose if we’re going to do this, we may as well go.” Jack held out his hand for the timepiece.

Cate grinned at him. Despite the danger, excitement brimmed in her. Instead of the timepiece, though, she offloaded a suitcase into his hands. She grabbed her own along with another case, jostling them into one hand’s grasp. Then she offered the timepiece.

Jack sighed, closing his hand around hers; they activated the mysterious mechanism controlling the time rip. As the second hand slowed to a crawl, Cate and Jack slipped back into another era.

Cate glanced around the room, confirming it was devoid of her personal effects. "We're here."

"For better or worse," Jack replied. "I hope we can sneak out with these things without any trouble!" Jack waved the suitcase in the air.

"It's not too heavy. I can still hurry."

"Give me yours," Jack insisted.

Cate opened her mouth to protest, but the expression issued by Jack stopped her. She handed the suitcase off, keeping her train case.

"Okay," Jack answered with a nod of his head. "Here we go."

They exited the bedroom, crossing the sitting room. Jack eased the door open, peering through the crack. He held a finger to his lips, motioning with his head toward the hall.

Cate nodded, understanding his signal to mean someone was in the hallway.

They waited a few moments in silence. Cate held her breath, afraid even the sound of light breathing may give them away.

After a few moments, Jack peered through the opening between the doors again. This time he offered a thumbs up. They proceeded down the hall, hurrying to reach the stairway. They scrambled down and were able to exit the castle.

As they circled toward the front entrance, Jack wiped a bead of sweat from his brow. "Too heavy?" Cate quipped, motioning toward the suitcases.

"This whole situation is too heavy."

They reached the main entrance and Jack used the door knocker to summon Benson. The butler showed them into the sitting room, assuring them he would have their luggage placed in their room.

Cate and Jack waited. Jack's leg bobbed up and down. Cate placed her hand on his knee to steady it.

"Sorry. I'm nervous."

"You don't say."

He wiped at his brow again. "I can't believe you're not."

"I didn't say that. I'm just better at hiding it."

The doors to the sitting room swung open and Rory entered. "Jack, Cate," he greeted them, approaching with his hand out. Jack rose and shook his hand, then Rory embraced Cate. “Glad you made it. I didn’t hear a car.”

“Oh, we walked from the property edge,” Jack explained.

“Ah. Carrying luggage? Your American wife must be made of strong stuff!”

“That she is,” Jack assured him.

“Well, allow me to show you to your room. You’ll find it suitable, I’d imagine, to continue your work.”

Rory motioned for them to exit the room. They stepped out into the hallway and waited for Rory to lead them upstairs.

“Thank you again, cousin, for offering the room. It is very generous of you to welcome us this way.”

“Not at all,” Rory replied as they made their way up the main staircase.

They traversed the halls with Rory leading them to the hallway they had just navigated to sneak from the castle. As he marched down the hall toward the room they had just come from, Cate hoped the surprise on her face was not apparent. Could he be placing them in the exact room she used nearly a century later?

She glanced at Jack, who gave a slight shrug to acknowledge the strange situation. Sure enough, Rory led them to Cate’s suite’s doors. He opened them, stepping inside and motioning for them to enter. “I hope you’ll find this suitable.”

Cate swallowed, stepping into the room and pretending to the best of her ability to act as though it was the first time she saw it. “It’s lovely!”

“Yes,” Jack agreed.

Rory closed the doors behind them. “And I believe best suited to your travels back and forth between here and your own time.”

CHAPTER 19

Cate's stomach somersaulted, and she glanced wide-eyed at Jack.
"Ahhhhh," Jack began.

"You are time travelers, aren't you?" Rory pressed.

"Time travelers?" Jack repeated as though unfamiliar with the concept. He creased his brow, playing confused.

Cate followed his lead. "What an interesting concept. Most entertaining!"

Rory chuckled, narrowing his eyes. "Let's not play coy. I'm not outraged at your presence. Quite the opposite, I'm thankful. If you can help solve the mystery and set Anne's nerves to rest, I should be grateful."

Cate swallowed hard. She glanced at Jack and, with a shrug, said, "Okay, you caught us. We can't tell you much else, but yes, we aren't from this time."

Rory nodded, a smile on his face. "I knew it. My instincts were correct."

"But how?" Jack questioned.

"Two things," Rory explained. "First, your names. Jack and Cate MacKenzie. When I was a boy, my grandfather told me a fantastical tale about two time travelers that saved his life. He told me one day I'd understand more about the story, but when I was a child, the legend of these two time traveling heroes filled my imagination. Their names: Jack and Cate MacKenzie."

Jack rolled his eyes at their foolish gaffe of using the same names as when they had visited Rory's grandfather, Randolph MacKenzie's era in 1856.

“And the second thing?” Cate inquired.

Rory paced the room in front of them. “I’ll admit, after hearing your names I was suspicious, but I wasn’t sure until you told me the second piece of information.” He spun to face Jack. “You, Jack, mentioned Cate helped solve a murder and saved an innocent man’s life. That coincided with my grandfather’s story. I put the pieces together and bet you were the same two who’d helped him.”

Cate and Jack shared a glance. “That makes it official then.”

“Official?” Rory queried.

“Yes. We are officially the worst time travelers ever.”

Rory burst out laughing. “It can’t be easy maintaining your cover when the castle’s proprietor is aware of the secret. Oh, on that note, my brother, Lucas, is unaware of the astonishing secret protected within these walls.”

“Understood,” Cate answered, nodding. “We don’t plan on spreading that information. We were only hoping to help solve the mystery.”

“And again, I am most grateful. I’m afraid Anne’s taken the loss badly. She feels responsible for the loss of the keepsakes. They were my grandmother’s jewels. Oh, but you probably realize that. You were acquainted.”

Cate nodded again. “Yes. In fact, I wore one of the necklaces to the Halloween Ball she hosted.”

“How fascinating. I must admit, I’m not as adventurous as my great-great-grandfather, Douglas, nor as you, Jack and Cate. I don’t do much time traveling.”

Rory offered a small chuckle. “If I am correct, this room leads to this year. So, you may use it as a conduit to shuttle back and forth between times. This should make your comings and goings easier.”

“Yes, it will. Thank you,” Cate answered.

“Well, with that settled, I’ll leave you to discuss your plans before the police arrive. They plan to be here midafternoon. You may speak with them then about the investigation. I shall tell them to provide you with any information you request.” Rory strode to the doors leading to the hall. “Oh,” he mentioned, turning back, “will you be dining ‘in town’ this evening?”

“Yes,” Cate replied. “But we will still join you for dinner tomorrow if the offer still stands.”

“It most certainly does. I shall tell Anne that you plan to take in sights in the area whilst here, that will explain your absences without trouble.”

“Thank you, Rory,” Cate answered with a smile.

Rory exited the room, closing the doors behind him.

Jack collapsed onto the chaise lounge, exhaling loudly. “Oh, you’ve got to be kidding me!”

Cate sank onto the chaise next to him, her hands clasped as she leaned on her thighs. “We really are the worst time travelers ever, aren’t we?”

Jack gave her a sidelong glance. “Yes, we are. We are oh-for-two on these trips.”

“Using the same name was not that smart in retrospect.”

“No. We should have made up different names. Like Hank and Beth MacKenzie or something.”

Cate wriggled her nose. “Hank and Beth?”

“Yeah, Hank and Beth.”

Cate shrugged. “Oh well. At least, it worked out. Rory was extremely accommodating. And it only makes our work easier!”

“Lucky us!” Jack retorted.

“Now all we have to do is prove my great-grandfather isn’t a thief. Then we can chalk this up to another successful venture!” Cate stood. “Come on. Let’s see if the police have arrived.”

“Ugh,” Jack grumbled but climbed to his feet. “My heart is just returning to normal speed.”

Cate giggled at him. “Oh, come on, you need some excitement in your life!”

Jack and Cate traversed the halls, arriving in the foyer as Rory escorted the police from his study.

“Ah, how fortunate! This is the woman I was speaking of,” Rory informed the officer. “I’d appreciate it if you’d fill her in on any details. Her reputation at solving crimes is most exceptional. You can speak in the sitting room.”

The officer studied Cate up and down with a grunt. “Follow me.”

Cate and Jack began to follow the man through the doors when he stopped short.

“You too?” he questioned, jabbing a finger toward Jack.

“If you don’t mind,” Jack responded.

The officer rolled his eyes. “Anyone else who’d like to discuss the private details of the case?”

“No, thank you, Officer MacCullough,” Rory replied, a perfect example of non-reactionary British breeding.

With another roll of his eyes, Officer MacCullough led them into the sitting room.

“Shall we sit?” Cate requested, motioning toward the setup near the fireplace.

“I suppose so, Mrs., ah, MacKenzie was it?”

“Yes, that’s correct. Catherine MacKenzie, Cate for short. This is my husband, Jack.” Cate extended her hand to shake his, as did Jack.

“And how are you related to Lord MacKenzie?” the officer asked after grazing her hand with his in a limp handshake.

“My husband is a distant cousin,” Cate explained.

“I see. Well, Lord MacKenzie asked that I share the current information about the case. Before I do so, I want to make it clear, Mrs. MacKenzie, that I prefer you do not interfere with the investigation. This is serious police business.”

“I don’t plan to interfere, but, as Lord MacKenzie may have mentioned, I’m good at mysteries. I’d like to assist. Poor Lady MacKenzie is beside herself.”

Officer MacCullough offered another eye roll in response before continuing, reading from his tiny notebook. “I suppose you’ve heard the story, but here it is again. The jewelry was removed from the safe on 31 December. Lady MacKenzie selected the piece she would wear for the party and left the other piece on her dressing table. When she returned to her room following the party, the other piece of jewelry was still there. She removed her necklace and earrings, setting them next to the others in their case. She retired around 1 a.m. and when she dressed the following morning at eleven, the jewelry was discovered missing.”

“Thank you for the recap, I am aware of that. What of the investigation?”

With a sigh, the officer flipped a page and continued to read. “We interviewed everyone. No clear suspects emerged.”

Cate’s jaw dropped. “That’s it?”

“Yes, Mrs. MacKenzie, that’s it. We’re working with very little information here. Most people were asleep during the robbery. No one has a clear motive. For all we know, someone snuck in, grabbed the jewelry, and ran off!”

“While that’s a theory, I’m not sure how plausible it is. This would imply someone knew that Lady MacKenzie would leave the jewelry on her dressing table and could navigate to her room to retrieve it while she slept.”

“Thank you for that adept analysis, Mrs. MacKenzie, but it doesn’t rule out the possibility.”

“No, it doesn’t, but it makes it more likely that the culprit is right under our noses in the house.”

The officer appeared vexed, as though his patience with the amateur detective was wearing thin. “We’ve interviewed everyone. Nothing’s stood out. We continue to check on the statements we’ve taken, verify details and so on, but nothing has pointed to anyone.”

“No leads? Not even a conjecture?” Cate questioned.

“We have no solid leads, Mrs. MacKenzie. If you ask me, I’d say her ladies’ maid did it. The opportunity the young woman had alone makes her the primary suspect.”

“That’s rather prejudicial, wouldn’t you say?”

Officer MacCullough let out a sigh. “Nothing else points to anything solid. Often hunches provide the best avenues in my experience.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at him, guessing his experience was not all that vast. After a moment, she nodded. “Thank you, Officer MacCullough, for the information.”

He nodded to her and turned to leave. As he reached the doors, he faced her again. “Oh, and just a reminder, Mrs. MacKenzie, I don’t want you interfering in my investigation.” With that, he pulled the doors open, exiting the room.

Cate nodded in agreement. “He does not seem pleased about us butting into his case.”

“What case? The man’s done less investigating than you have, Cate.”

Cate chuckled. “You may be right. And his theory that it’s Murray, Anne’s maid, is absurd. Based only on conjecture with nothing substantiated.”

“I didn’t remember her name appearing anywhere on your suspect list,” Jack admitted.

“No, it doesn’t. Although, I may be wrong,” Cate answered with a shrug.

“I doubt it. His entire case is based on the fact that it was convenient for her to have stolen the jewelry. Yet I’m sure he has no answers about how she’s disposing of it or why she’s never had sticky fingers before. Certainly this isn’t the first time she’s handled pricey items for her ladyship.”

“I agree. The case is weak. I doubt it’s her.”

They were silent for a moment.

“I don’t know what we expected to be honest,” Cate admitted. “We already realized the case goes unsolved. So, it isn’t any wonder the police have zero theories.”

“No, you’re right. Looks like we have our work cut out for us then. The police won’t be of any help.”

“Yes. Well, perhaps we should take our leave for the day. It’s almost time for the dinner gong and we’re supposed to be ‘dining in town’ tonight. We should disappear to our room and return to our time.”

“Okay, Cate,” Jack agreed, happy to return to the present.

They navigated to the room. Before leaving, they unpacked a few items from their suitcases to make the room appear lived in. Cate also rumpled the bedsheets so the maids would find the bed “slept in” when they tidied the next morning. With their work complete, they returned to the present.

When they returned, Cate reminded Jack that despite Rory’s invitation to dinner Monday, their dinner plans were tomorrow, Sunday, in their time. Jack thanked her for the reminder before leaving to change.

After changing and eating dinner, Cate spent her evening writing notes about their journey. She tried to include all relevant details she had gleaned from the police detective, which had been few. His supposition about the maid seemed more a guess than a theory. Still, Cate noted the direction the investigation seemed to be heading.

She compared her new findings to the notes she had made prior to the trip. The new information did nothing to augment her current hypotheses regarding the guilty party’s identity. The maid didn’t even appear on her list of probable suspects. And Cate wasn’t about to add her name, either.

The notion made little sense. It was only a step away from the old “the butler did it” theory. The only names she added to the suspect list was that of the mysterious Richardsons. She wrote a note asking who they were and if they could have any motivation to have committed the theft. It was around this time that many families found themselves unable to keep up their lifestyles. Perhaps the Richardsons were one of these families. Perhaps a jewel heist would provide enough funds for them to maintain their home. It was a wild theory, but no less probable than the theory of the maid committing the crime.

Cate sighed, staring at the note sheets spread in front of her. Try as she might, willing them to provide more information failed. Frustrated, she stuffed them back into her folder and tossed it on the nearby side table. Her head sank back onto the chaise. Perhaps she would find out more information tomorrow at dinner. She would meet the rest of the family then. She'd also meet the Richardsons. Perhaps then she could shore up or dismiss the case against them.

Cate awoke the following morning with her mind in a knot. Her two trips to the past had clarified nothing. Instead, they'd only added two names to her list. Two names, she reminded herself, that did not represent family members, at least not to her knowledge.

She'd added the Richardsons to the list, but Anne's damning note spoke to their innocence. In her blind desire to make the criminal anyone but her ancestor, she'd listed them on her suspect sheet the previous evening. But now, in the cold light of day, she questioned her decision to do so. It was likely unfair, but she'd leave it for now.

Cate wandered the property with the dogs after breakfast. Her investigation weighed on her mind. With no leads from the police, she'd be going it alone. So far, she'd not made much progress. With any luck, meeting everyone at dinner would provide some enlightening information. But what information could she glean from light conversation over cocktails or at the dining table?

Her mind attempted to concoct a plan for retrieving information. However, she couldn't see a way to fish for information without being obvious, especially without knowing the players involved, their personalities, and how they might react to her. Furthermore, her introverted nature made her a less-than-proficient conversationalist.

Cate imagined scenario after scenario in which she might elicit information from someone without being obvious. She sighed as she stared out over the loch, frozen at the edges. None of these conversations would occur the way her mind created them. No amount of preparation would help her. Tonight, she would have to wing it.

She returned to the castle, using her time after lunch to search for any details about the Richardsons of 1925. She found none.

To fill the time, Cate opened the manuscript for her book. She focused long enough to type a description of Rory and Anne MacKenzie into the document. Pleased with her ability to complete even a small amount of work, she saved the document and closed her laptop. After checking the time, she realized it was nearly time to return to the past. They planned to dress for dinner in 1925 with the clothes she packed. However, she changed into a suitable dress before they departed.

Jack met her in the late afternoon, sneaking into the castle so as not to run into the castle's other occupant, Molly. He had already changed into period-appropriate clothing before they made the trip back.

"Whew!" Jack exclaimed, wiping sweat from his brow as 1925 settled around them. "I was so afraid we'd appear in front of a maid."

Cate glanced around the room. The bed was made, and the suite tidied. "If I'm not mistaken, they'd tidy the room in the morning, so we must be careful if we pop back then."

"Well, I suppose we should change for dinner. Would you like to go first?"

"Thanks," she answered, pulling a dress from her suitcase. Cate entered the bathroom, fixing her hair into an updo. She touched up her makeup with the few supplies she brought with her. After slipping out of her day clothes, she pulled on the dinner gown she selected for the evening. With a bodice filled with silver beads, the dress weighed heavily on her. Frills cascaded to the floor from the drop waist and flutter sleeves caressed her arms. She finished the look with a choker, popular in this era. She pulled on her shoes and emerged from the bathroom.

"Your turn," she announced.

"Wow, that's some dress!" Jack replied as he grabbed his evening clothes.

Cate lifted her chin with a smile. "Thanks. I thought it was rather pretty, too!"

Jack's process went much faster than Cate's. She waited for him in the sitting room, pulling on her elbow length black gloves. He emerged from the bedroom, pulling at his collar. "Could they make these any stiffer?"

“Stop complaining, you look great!” Cate answered, standing.

“That has less to do with the clothes and more to do with my stunning good looks, Lady Cate,” Jack quipped, flashing her a grin.

“And your humility,” Cate retorted with a wink.

“Aye, humble to a fault, that’s me,” Jack said, broadening his grin. He offered Cate his arm. “Shall we?”

Cate accepted, and they sauntered to the sitting room where the family and their guests met for cocktails before dinner.

When Cate and Jack entered, Anne and Rory were already present. Another couple sat on the loveseat across from Anne. The man rose as Cate and Jack came in.

“Ah, there you are. You see, Anne, I told you they’d be dining with us,” Rory said as they entered.

“Oh! Yes, I was worried when you weren’t at any of the earlier meals. I wondered if the nasty business with the police put you off.”

“Not at all,” Cate assured her. “We’ve been taking in some sights around the countryside.”

“Yes,” Jack added. “We left early this morning. We are early risers.”

“Please allow me to introduce you to my brother, Lucas, and his wife, Amelia,” Rory announced, guiding them to the other couple in the room. “Lucas, this is our distant cousin Jack MacKenzie and his wife, Cate.”

Jack shook hands with Lucas and Amelia, who remained seated.

“A pleasure,” Lucas replied as he shook their hands.

Cate swallowed hard as she gazed into the eyes of her great-grandfather. She searched them; the momentous moment tainted by her conjecture about him being a thief.

CHAPTER 20

Lucas smiled down at Cate as she tried to steady herself, wondering if she was shaking hands with a thief.

He stared for another moment before tearing his eyes away to speak with Jack as he lowered himself onto the loveseat next to his wife, Amelia. “And how are you related to us, cousin Jack?”

“Oh, ah, I’ll attempt an explanation, though I’m never good at familial connections of this nature,” Jack stalled. “My great-great-great... or is it great-great...”

The appearance of another couple interrupted Jack’s attempts at an explanation.

“Good evening,” the older man greeted them. On his arm, a much younger wife.

“Ah, good evening Bryce.”

Cate noted the first name, Bryce Richardson. She’d search any records she could find on him when she returned. Rory made introductions, presenting Cate and Jack to the Richardsons.

She learned Bryce’s wife’s name was Eleanor. Stories like Eleanor’s were familiar to her as a historian. Eleanor, also an American, was a “dollar princess.” New money who married into British nobility. Eleanor gained a title and status while Bryce gained a fortune to keep his estate running. It was unlikely that these two had stolen the jewelry unless they had suffered some recent misfortune that resulted in the loss of Eleanor’s money.

Judging by the jewelry Eleanor sported, a large ruby necklace, rings on many fingers and a cascade of sparkling bracelets, this wasn't the case.

Cate surmised she could cross the couple off her suspect list. At least it made conversation with Eleanor easier since it thrilled the woman to no end to have found another American to talk to.

During dinner, Jack's connection to the family came up once again. Jack, looking like a deer caught in headlights, stared at Lucas as he commented, "Jack, you never finished your explanation of how you're related."

"Didn't I?" he answered, his brow furrowing as though confused. "Oh! How thoughtless of me. Well, as I began to mention, we share a..."

"Great-great-great-great-grandfather," Rory finished for him. "I believe you missed one of those greats earlier, Jack. Yes, Douglas is our common relative. Jack descends from Finlay's brother."

"Oh, yes, quite distant then," Lucas responded.

"Quite," Jack answered, nodding.

"But still carrying the MacKenzie name," Lucas added. "How interesting! How close and far we all are."

"Yes," Rory agreed. "And how fortunate to have met our relative. We are pleased you are staying with us."

"Yes. I hope to get to know you better," Lucas commented.

"Will you be staying on long?" Cate inquired.

"Lucas and Amelia planned to stay through next weekend," Anne informed her. "This dreadful investigation has stranded Bryce and Eleanor here. Oh, how we've ruined your plans."

"Think nothing of it, dear lady," Bryce assured Anne. "Paris will still be there in a few days' time."

"And how exciting to be caught up in a real mystery!" Eleanor exclaimed.

"How gracious you both are," Anne replied.

"It sounds as though we'll have the opportunity to get acquainted," Lucas followed up. "I understand you'll be staying at least a week."

"Yes," Jack assured him. "And we'd like to spend some time getting to know everyone."

Dinner conversation continued discussing various small talk items. Afterward, Cate departed with the ladies to the sitting room, allowing the men to enjoy a brandy and cigars. She made polite conversation, hoping to have a discussion with Lucas.

After twenty-five minutes, the men joined them in the sitting room. Cate touched base with Jack before circulating around the room to speak with others. She made her way to Lucas after speaking with Rory for a few moments.

“Jack and I are both pleased you were here for the holidays. When we chanced stopping by, we hoped to meet at least Rory. We were so fortunate to meet you both!” Cate began.

“I’m pleased to have been here to meet you also,” Lucas responded.

“Do you often spend the holidays here?”

“We have since our marriage, yes. Amelia enjoys winter on the estate over the hustle and bustle of the city.”

Cate nodded in understanding. “It is charming here. I see the appeal.”

“So, you are enjoying our little hamlet? How does it compare to the States?”

“I am enjoying it very much,” Cate answered. “Life seems so very settled here.”

Lucas sipped at his drink. “Do you find us very quaint compared to life there?”

“Not at all. A refreshing change!”

“Where are you from there, Cate?”

“Just outside of Chicago. What about you? Where do you call home?” Cate sipped at her sherry, a bundle of nerves as she tried to glean information from Lucas.

“London, at the moment,” Lucas responded.

Cate raised an eyebrow. “At the moment?”

“Yes. We spend most of our time there, anyway. We spend the Christmas holiday in Dunhaven and we summer at Amelia’s family estate.”

“Oh, how lovely,” Cate commented. “The English countryside is enchanting. I’m sure the summers are truly restful.”

“Indeed,” Lucas agreed. “Amelia’s family’s country home is most charming.”

“Will the property come to you?” Cate pressed, hoping she didn’t overstep.

“No. Amelia’s inheritance is most generous but does not include the country estate. That will go to her brother, who will also inherit the title of Earl.”

“How interesting. I hope you don’t find me too forward, but I’ve little idea about how these things work here. In America, we have no restrictions on passing property to daughters. I understand that to be entirely different here.”

“Oh, it is. Land can be passed but not title. And the title only goes to one person. As with myself and my brother, Rory. He inherited Dunhaven Castle, along with the title of Earl of Dunhavenshire. As second-born, I did not.”

“This is so fascinating to me. Lines of succession do not exist in the States. I imagine this may lead to some... jealousy in some families. With assets being split and titles being passed to only one son.”

“Oh, it can cause quite the uproar in some families, you can be sure!”

“Hmm, it seems to have caused no strife in yours. What a wonderful testament to your parents.”

“Oh, none at all,” Lucas assured her. “Father provided well for each of us, I’ve nothing to be jealous of. And to be frank, the burden of care of the castle and the county is better laid on my brother’s shoulders than mine. He was always more serious than I. I was a dreamer!”

Cate smiled at him. “And are you still?”

“I’ll admit, I’ve quelled most of my childish fantasies, but I still enjoy the freedom afforded me by being the younger brother.” He winked at her.

Cate chuckled as she tapped her fingertips against her glass. “There’s nothing wrong with that. It is fortunate that you enjoy your role. Many people would allow displeasure to build inside them over it. I find it frustrating. A person can change many things, but family is not amongst them.”

“Very true, Cate. And family is too important to spend life bickering with. What about your family? Do they miss you terribly with your move here? I assume with Jack’s business you reside in the country?”

Cate nodded. “We do, yes, at the moment. We, too, are a bit of two rolling stones. We haven’t settled just yet.”

“Perhaps you’d prefer life in the States nearer to your family?”

“I have no family. My parents passed when I was younger, before I met Jack. I have no siblings.”

Lucas pushed out his lips in a frown. “Oh, how tragic for you. It must have been very jarring and frightening to be orphaned at a young age.”

Cate offered a closed-mouth smile. Her great-grandfather summarized her true feelings when her parents died in the tragic and unexpected car accident. Strange, how he read her reaction to her father and his own grandson's death so well.

"I've upset you," he continued, reading her expression. He set his drink down, placing a hand on her arm. "My sincerest apologies. Do you need to sit down?"

Cate shook her head, shaking the feelings from her heart as well. Enough time had passed that, despite the temporary sadness that swept through her, she could recover without descending into an emotional wreck.

"No, no," she responded, waving her hand at him, "I'm fine. It has been several years. But your description is accurate."

Lucas nodded, giving her a pitying expression. After a moment, he suggested they change the subject. They chatted for several more minutes about the country and a few recommended attractions Cate and Jack may like to visit while staying at the castle. Cate thanked him for the suggestions before continuing to circulate the room.

After another hour, Cate and Jack announced they would retire for the evening. They promised Anne to join them for dinner the following day, informing her they'd be off on another day trip to some of the sights Lucas suggested.

They traversed the halls to their room, changed from their evening clothes to something more suitable to appear in the following day prior to dinner. As Jack changed, Cate again mussed the bedsheets and laid out a few items around the room to give the appearance of a couple staying there. When they finished, they used the timepiece to return to the present time.

Jack gave his customary sigh of relief when they returned. "

Glad to be home?" Cate inquired.

"Yep. I'm always nervous when we time travel. I'm with Rory on this, not adventurous."

Cate giggled at his faint-heartedness for time travel. She checked the timepiece. It was only late afternoon. Despite the hours they'd spent in 1925, only minutes had passed in the present. "Would you mind comparing notes after we change?" Cate inquired of Jack.

"Not at all. I'm curious to hear what you learned. I spotted you talking to Lucas."

“And you must share the secrets you learned during the cigar and brandy men-only session,” Cate chuckled, rolling her eyes.

“Oh, no, no, no, Lady Cate,” Jack chided, waving his finger at her. “Those secrets of the universe can never be shared to someone outside of the male gender!”

Cate offered him a wry glance as he backed out of the room, winking at her. “Meet you in the library in a few.”

Cate sped through changing, then gathered the dogs, two cups of hot tea, and headed for the library. When she arrived, Jack was already lounging in an armchair near the fireplace. Riley raced over to leap onto his lap for attention. Bailey trailed behind, staying on the floor.

“Hello, Sir Riley!” Jack greeted him. “And Mr. Bailey, too!”

“He’s starting to come around,” Cate noted as she sank into the chair opposite Jack’s.

“Aye, he is. Poor little fellow, he’s so shy, but he’s learning from his big brother that there’s nothing to be afraid of. Aren’t you?” Jack ruffled the fur on Bailey’s head. “So, what did you learn from Lucas? Did he confess to the crime?”

“No,” Cate answered with a shake of her head. Her brows wrinkled as she went over their conversation in her mind. “And to be honest, it would have surprised me if he did it.”

“Really? Isn’t he your prime suspect?”

“He was. He is.” Cate shrugged and sighed. “I don’t know anymore.”

“What about your conversation with him leads you to think he may not be our guy?”

Cate pondered the question. “Well, several things. First, one would assume the motivation for a theft is money. Assumedly the thief will profit. It appears that Lucas isn’t in need of money. Unless he’s squandered it all and is putting on a good show. Or his motivation is wanting to make Rory unhappy. But that doesn’t seem to be the circumstance. He stated his father left him a generous inheritance, as did Amelia’s father. He also admitted he preferred not to be lord of the manor. He considered it a burden and regards his brother’s personality as better suited for the role.”

Jack raised his eyebrows as he digested the information. “Sounds as though he was reasonably open with you. How’d you get that information from him?”

“He mentioned Amelia’s family holds the deed to a country home that they summer at. I asked if the property would pass to Amelia. When he said it didn’t, I feigned ignorance in the ways of how British property and titles pass and allowed him to explain that they typically go to the first-born sons and titles cannot pass to daughters. Then I pretended to consider the information and concluded that this may cause strife within many families. I tried to guide the conversation to determine if there was any hint of jealousy between my great-grandfather and my great-uncle.”

“No hints?”

“None. He seems to hold to the belief that family is most important, and it’s senseless to spend life arguing with them.”

“Anything else?”

“He was very kind when we spoke about my parents’ deaths. I’ll admit I found that conversation bizarre considering we were speaking of his grandson’s death. Anyway, his general nature doesn’t seem to coincide with a jewel thief.”

“So, is he officially off the suspect list?”

Cate curled her legs underneath her on the chair. “No. Perhaps he’s a fantastic liar. Perhaps all his familial sentiment and openness about his feelings regarding his brother’s inheritance are a cover.”

“He didn’t strike me as a liar. He seemed very genuine when I spoke with him. Even during our secret man meeting.”

Cate chuckled at Jack’s last statement. “You’re really not going to tell me what went on during the secret meeting, are you?”

“Lady Cate, I’m bound by centuries of tradition and trust not to. What is discussed over brandy and cigars after the ladies have left is privileged information. Like a confession or attorney-client privilege.”

Cate rolled her eyes at him. “Well, as long as it doesn’t affect our investigation, I’ll leave you to your secrets. My other reason for not removing him from the list is Anne’s letter. She clearly calls out a family member. Perhaps it pertains to this theft, perhaps not, but it’s our biggest clue. And Lucas is the only family member present.”

Jack tapped the chair’s arm. “Again, she never references the jewelry or anything specific. It could refer to anything.”

“What are the chances a letter that discussed being robbed and something being stolen refers to something outside of the major jewelry theft at the estate.”

Jack flung his arms in the air. "I'm not a statistician."

"I don't think you need a doctorate in statistics to realize the event is unlikely."

"Okay, okay, but given the information you just shared, I'd try to keep an open mind as we proceed. Don't get stuck on that one bit of information."

"You're right. And like I said, I'd be surprised. If Lucas is the thief, he's also an exceptional liar."

"Perhaps it's Amelia," Jack suggested. "Anne may consider her family being her sister-in-law."

Cate considered the new idea, her eyebrows raising. "Maybe. What would Amelia's motivation be? It appears she was also well-provided for. They aren't wanting."

"Perhaps she is motivated by jealousy? Lucas may not have wanted to be king of the castle, but perhaps Amelia wanted to carry a title."

"It's a possibility," Cate agreed, "although something doesn't scan to me."

"Why's that?"

"Amelia would have realized it was unlikely for Lucas to inherit the castle. If she wanted a title, she could have married a man sure to receive one."

"Perhaps she didn't have any offers."

Cate sipped at her tea. "Perhaps."

"But you don't believe that."

"No, I don't. But you have a point. Both she and Lucas need to stay on the suspect list. However, we'll keep an open mind about other suspects."

"You've still got a few staff members on your list, right?"

"Yes, and the Richardsons, however, they don't seem likely either. First, they aren't family, so Anne's letter doesn't make sense. And even if we disregard that, unless they've lost a great deal of money quickly, they probably aren't doing it for the cash. Plus, if you noticed the amount of jewelry on Eleanor, I doubt they're hurting."

"That could be fake. And how do you know they've got a fortune?"

"Eleanor is American. It's probable she's a dollar princess."

Jack sipped at the hot liquid, screwing up his face. "A what?"

"A dollar princess. She was an American heiress. Eleanor married Bryce to gain a title and a place in society. He married her to salvage his estate from financial ruin. It happened quite a bit just prior to the twenties. Given their age difference, I'd say that's what happened."

"Interesting," Jack responded, rubbing his chin. "So, with the infusion of cash, it's not likely they are broke."

"No, unless he made some poor investments. However, that doesn't seem to be the case. I know people can present the illusion of wealth, but with their frequent travels, I'd say it's more than an illusion. I'll try to spend some time with Bryce and Eleanor at dinner tomorrow and see if I can extract any information."

"Okay, good plan."

"I don't agree, but it's the best we've got. The only thing I'm certain of is that Anne's ladies' maid didn't do it."

"Certain?"

Cate nodded. "Yes, she'd been with Anne since she was a child. She was a maid in her parents' household who became a ladies' maid to Anne as she aged and married Rory. She's had plenty of opportunities to steal from both families and never did. Why would she do it now?"

"Did they have some kind of argument? Is Anne looking to replace her?"

"No," Cate answered with a shake of her head. "According to Anne, she feels terrible over the position the girl is in. She's adamant that Murray did not steal from her."

"Ah, did you learn this in your secret girls only meeting?"

"I did. Unlike you, I'm willing to share the secrets of the universe despite centuries of tradition."

"Well, then I suppose we continue on checking out the other guests and the few staff members we've got on the suspect list."

"Yep, that's about all we can do. You're off the hook until around four tomorrow afternoon, I guess."

"All right, then. I suppose I'll head home and enjoy life in the present."

Cate nodded as Jack stood. "Enjoy the rest of your day off."

"I will. See you tomorrow." Jack ambled to the doorway, turning back before he left. "Oh, I almost forgot. Have you had any more dreams about the, you know?" He pointed to the bookshelf.

"No. I haven't. Hopefully it was just a fluke caused by the drafty castle."

“I hope so, too,” Jack answered with a smile. “Good night, Lady Cate. Sleep tight, don’t let the bookshelves bite,” he called as he proceeded down the hall.

“Very funny,” Cate shouted after him. She sat for a few more moments in the library pondering the case or lack thereof she was building. Finding no additional information after going over the conversations in her mind, she chose to retire to her room. She gathered Riley and Bailey and exited the library. Despite no more disturbing dreams, Cate had no desire to remain in the library. She shuddered as she gave the bookcase one final look, still disturbed.

Cate drummed her fingers on the desk as she stared at the cursor on her screen. A frown formed on her lips.

She'd spent most of her morning searching for information on the Richardsons. She'd found a few news articles mentioning them and one announcing their marriage.

Based on the information in the article, her guess was correct, Eleanor was a dollar princess. The infusion of cash into Bryce Richardson's estate allowed him to keep the house until his son sold it later in the century. They did not appear to be suffering from a lack of money. Cate concluded they could be removed from the suspect list.

After lunch, Cate spent the few hours before she and Jack planned to travel back to 1925 working on her book's manuscript. She found she possessed neither the interest nor the concentration needed to make any decent headway. Instead, she gaped around the sitting room, searching for anything to divert her attention from the task at hand. She'd chosen to work in the sitting room again, remaining apprehensive about spending time in the library. It was foolish of her, she realized, but her instincts still preferred to avoid the room until her subconscious mind stopped obsessing over it.

Cate closed the document on her laptop. Anything she wrote today she'd likely delete the next time she worked, so there was no sense in wasting time. Instead, Cate browsed around a few shopping sites and checked her email. She found a few personal emails and sent responses to each sender. When she finished the last response, she checked her timepiece. She had enough time to walk the dogs before changing for her trip to the past.

After the walk, Cate paced the floor of her sitting room with time to spare even after changing. Time seemed to stand still as she waited for Jack to arrive. Finally, a soft knock sounded at the door. Cate raced to open the door, waving Jack inside.

“Anxious?” he asked with a chuckle.

“Very. I hate waiting all day.”

“Okay, let’s get going then,” Jack replied as they entered the bedroom.

They used the timepiece to activate the time rip, sending them back to 1925. Cate glanced around the room, noting it had been tidied. A note on the night table bearing her and Jack’s names caught her eye. She dashed to it, tearing it open.

“Who is it from? What does it say?” Jack asked, peering over her shoulder.

“It’s from Rory. He says they have canceled formal dinner. Anne is too upset because... oh my gosh!” Cate exclaimed with a gasp. “Murray has been arrested and charged with the theft!”

“With what evidence? Where is the proof of her guilt?”

“I’m not sure, he doesn’t mention anything else. He says to seek him out when we arrive to discuss the situation.”

“This is a good thing.”

“A good thing?” Cate questioned, spinning to face him.

“Yes, I won’t have to wear the monkey suit tonight,” Jack responded with a grin.

Cate grimaced at him. “It’s not that bad!”

“It is! You try wearing a starched collar all night! It has rubbed my neck raw!”

“The beaded dress isn’t exactly the height of comfort, you know,” Cate informed him. “But comfort aside, I rather like the monkey suit.”

“Yes, it makes me look rather dashing, doesn’t it?”

“I appreciate the value placed on formality in eras like this. People were fervent about customs and traditions. Things like dinner took on special meaning.”

“If you had money,” Jack pointed out.

“Yes, I suppose you’re right, but my romantic side clings to the pomp and circumstance of it all.”

“My romantic side clings to my plaid pajama pants and a well-worn hoodie,” Jack quipped.

“Funny. Well, no need to change. Should we look for Rory?” Cate queried, waving the note in the air.

“Guess so. Let’s find out what’s going on so we can adjust our plan.”

Cate and Jack left the bedroom, navigating to the office where they supposed Rory may be working. Despite the late hour, since there was no need to change for dinner, they found him there.

“Ah, Jack, Cate, please come in. You received my note, I trust.”

“We did. How terrible for Anne and Murray!” Cate replied.

“Yes, I’m afraid Anne is taking it badly. Hence the canceled dinner. I hope we haven’t inconvenienced you in that way. I can have a tray sent up.”

“Not at all,” Cate replied, “we don’t need a tray. What evidence do the police have that prompted the charge against Murray?”

“Little, it seems. She has the best means and motive according to Officer MacCullough.”

“That’s no reason to charge the poor girl,” Jack chimed in.

“I agree,” Cate concurred.

“Despite both my and Anne’s protestations, Officer MacCullough continued forward with the arrest. I’m afraid there’s little to be done.”

“I’d like to speak with her,” Cate replied, pacing the room. “We’ll go as soon as we’ve finished speaking.”

“To what end?” Rory questioned. “Murray maintains her innocence. I’m not sure what details she can provide to you to assist.”

“Perhaps none,” Cate admitted, “however it may do her good to realize more than you and Anne are on her side.”

“I’m sure she will appreciate your support, yes,” Rory agreed.

“Is there anyone you suspect, Rory?” Cate questioned.

“Suspect? No, there isn’t anyone. This turn of events shocked me, to be honest. It gives me chills to conclude a thief lives among us.”

Cate’s heart dropped as she considered at the top of her suspect list was Rory’s own brother. Poor Rory could barely accept that there was a thief within his household. How shocking would it be to realize the thief was a member of your own family? No wonder Anne wrote the scathing letter. The disappointment they both experienced must have been soul-shattering.

Cate reminded herself she hadn’t yet solidified the case against Lucas. Perhaps she’d be proven wrong, though she didn’t see how. “What about the Richardsons? Is there any reason to suspect them?"

"Bryce and Eleanor?" Rory inquired. "You must be joking!"

Cate shrugged. "I'm not accusing them. But we've got to eliminate some people to zero in on the correct person."

"Their reputation is above reproach. And what would be their motive?"

"Financial?" Cate posed it as a question.

"With Eleanor's fortune, I shouldn't expect they'd need money."

"So, her fortune is intact? It's not been lost?"

"Lost?"

"Yes. No gambling problems or bad investments?"

"None that I am aware of. And those tales do get around."

"Okay," Cate said, throwing her hands in the air, "so we can clear them of any suspicion."

Rory nodded in agreement. "I'm quite at a loss, Cate. But I do appreciate your help with this. Thank you for trying."

"There's no need to thank us. We're happy to help." Cate glanced at Jack. "Well, I suppose we should head to town. If we learn anything worth passing along, we'll share it with you before we return to our time."

"Thank you. Can I send you in a car? Make the journey a little less taxing?"

Cate considered it. "If it's no trouble, that would be preferable."

"No trouble at all!" Rory responded, pulling a cord on the wall to call Benson.

Within moments, a servant arrived at the door. "Yes, m'lord?"

"Ah, Forsythe, please arrange a car for Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie to go to town. They're visiting the police station. Have Williams wait with them and bring them back."

Cate recalled the name. Charles Forsythe was the under-butler and on the suspect list. She side-eyed him, trying to assess his character with a glance. His dark hair was slicked down to his head and his mouth seemed set in a permanent scowl. Did his dark eyes hold secrets behind them, Cate wondered?

"Very good, m'lord. I'll make the arrangements at once. I shall have Williams bring the car 'round to the front." The under-butler gave a slight bow and left.

"What happened to Benson?" Cate questioned when the man departed.

“He’s likely busy attending to ensuring meal trays are delivered. Forsythe is our under-butler.”

Cate nodded, recalling the detail from her research. “Well, we’ll leave you to your work.”

She and Jack departed. “I just need to collect my coat upstairs. I’ll bring yours, too.”

She hurried up the stairs, navigating the halls to her room and retrieved the coats they wore when they arrived. She pulled hers on, fastening it before returning to the foyer with Jack’s.

By the time he’d donned his, the car arrived in front of the house. They stepped into the chilly air climbing into the backseat and confirming their destination with the chauffeur. He pulled the car near the station and informed them he’d wait there until they were ready to return.

They crossed the street, entering the building.

Jack and Cate MacKenzie to see Lillian Murray,” Jack told the clerk at the desk.

“One moment,” the clerk replied, disappearing into a back room. He returned, saying, “I’m afraid Miss Murray isn’t permitted visitors.”

“We’re not visitors,” Cate insisted. “Please speak with Officer MacCullough. I’m sure he’d inform you we have permission to see her.”

The clerk offered an annoyed glance to Cate. “Mr. MacKenzie, please understand...”

“My wife is correct. If you’ll check with MacCullough, you’ll find we are not mere visitors.”

“Sir, I...”

“No!” Jack exclaimed, raising his voice a bit. “I’ll not hear excuses. Now I’ve explained as has my wife that we’re approved to see the prisoner. Please arrange our visit at once!”

The man appeared startled but complied. “Wait here just a moment.”

He disappeared again, then returned. “Right this way.”

He signaled them to follow down the hallway. Cate and Jack were familiar with it, having traversed these halls almost seventy years ago when freeing Randolph from prison.

“Good going,” Cate whispered as they followed the clerk down the hall.

“Thanks. Same to you for scoring the car ride!”

Cate raised her eyebrows, smiling at him. The clerk showed them into the same room they had met Randolph in, instructing them to take a seat.

“Weird, huh?” Cate inquired, as they sat down.

“Definitely. I hold such fond memories of this room.”

Cate chuckled and tapped his chest. “I’ll bet.”

The door opposite them opened, and a woman appeared, her hands in handcuffs. The woman’s hair hung around her face, having long since escaped the low bun she’d placed it in. She wore a haunted expression, the shock of the situation apparent in every worry line. She sank into the chair across from them, making no eye contact.

“Hello, Lillian,” Cate began once they were alone.

The woman didn’t respond. Cate’s heart broke for her. She reached across the table, taking the woman’s hand in hers. “Lillian, we’re very sorry this happened to you, but we don’t believe you are guilty. We’re here to help.”

The woman raised her tear-filled eyes to Cate’s. Confusion crossed her face. “Help?”

“Yes,” Cate reiterated. “We believe you are innocent. We want to help, to prove your innocence.”

Lillian’s brow furrowed, and she slid her eyes between Cate and Jack. Tears spilled down her cheeks, and she clung to Cate’s hand with both of hers as she wept. They allowed her the moment of emotional release.

Cate rose from her seat, approaching the woman and wrapping her in an embrace and stroking her hair. “Shh, Lillian, it’s all right.”

Jack pulled Cate’s chair around the table, allowing her to sit next to Lillian as the woman composed herself. He offered her a handkerchief.

Lillian accepted it, drying her eyes as she choked back her sobs. “I’m ever so sorry, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie.”

“It all happened so fast,” Lillian choked. “I was preparing Lady MacKenzie’s dress for dinner when the police burst in and took me into custody.”

“It must have been very traumatic for you,” Cate agreed.

Lillian nodded. “It was not me,” she insisted. “I didn’t take the jewels!”

“No, I’m sure you didn’t. And we plan to prove it.”

Lillian sniffled, glancing between them. “I’m afraid I can’t pay you.”

“We don’t want any payment,” Cate informed her, shaking her head. “We just want the guilty party caught.”

“And we don’t want to see an innocent person accused,” Jack added.

“Right,” Cate confirmed. “Now, if you’re up to it, Lillian, could you tell us anything you remember about the night before and the morning after the theft?”

Lillian nodded, swallowing hard and composing herself. “Lady Anne... er, Lady MacKenzie,” she corrected, “retired around one in the morning. I tended to her. She informed me to place the jewelry on her dressing table and leave it for the morning. I did as she instructed.” A sob escaped her. “If I’d only taken them to the safe for Mr. Benson to put away right, then...” her voice trailed off.

“No,” Cate asserted, “you did nothing wrong. This isn’t your fault.”

Lillian nodded. “I put them on the dressing table and placed her dress over the chaise to be inspected and cleaned the next morning. I left and retired for the evening.”

“Did you place the jewelry in its case?”

“Aye,” Lillian responded. “I placed it into the velvet bag.”

Cate lowered her chin and inquired further, “And the bag was placed on the dressing table?”

“Aye,” Lillian said with a nod.

“Did you see or hear anyone as you returned to your room?” Jack inquired.

“Nay,” Lillian answered. “Not a soul.”

“Anything unusual when you returned to your room? Odd noises? Doors closing later than they should have?” Jack inquired.

“None that I recall, sir,” the maid answered.

“And the next morning?” Cate questioned.

“I went to her ladyship’s chambers to retrieve the dress for cleaning. It was then I noticed the dressing table empty. I asked Lady MacKenzie if she’d returned the jewelry herself or asked another servant to do it. She said no, and we searched her room, figuring maybe they’d fallen onto the floor or the like, but we didn’t find it. It was then they called for the police.”

“Okay, Lillian. Thank you for the information,” Cate answered. “Can you recall anything else uncommon about that night? Anything at all, whether or not you presume it’s related. Anything that wasn’t within the normal operations of the household?”

Lillian pondered a moment, her brow furrowing in thought. She shook her head as though to signal a negative response. Then she sat straighter.

“What is it, Lillian?” Cate encouraged her.

“Might be nothing. But that night, Lord MacKenzie’s valet took ill. Mr. Benson ordered him to bed right after the staff dinner. Said he’d tend to Lord MacKenzie himself if he had to.”

Cate considered the information. “So, Lord MacKenzie’s valet went to bed for the night, leaving someone else to tend him. Yes, that might be useful. Thank you, Lillian.”

Cate glanced at Jack who nodded. “Okay, we’re going to go now. We’ll try to visit tomorrow or the next day. If you think of anything else, hold on to it or write it down and we’ll follow up on it.”

Lillian nodded and squeezed Cate’s hand, offering a tight-lipped smile. “Thank you ever so much, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie. It means so much to me that someone is willing to help. I know Lord and Lady MacKenzie to be on my side, but it lifts me to no end to have more folks believe in me.”

Cate squeezed her hand back. “Take care, Lillian, and try to get some rest. We’ll try to have you out of here as soon as we can.”

Cate and Jack stood to leave. As Cate moved to skirt the table, Lillian leapt from her seat, throwing her handcuffed arms around Cate in a tight hug.

Cate returned her embrace. When she pulled back, she saw something new in Lillian’s teary eyes: hope.

They exited the police station, crossing the street to the car. They refrained from speaking until they were alone in the castle’s foyer. Even then, Cate held up a finger to silence any conversation. “Let’s find Rory and give him a brief update, mention no names, then regroup when we’re alone,” Cate whispered.

Jack nodded in silent agreement. They proceeded down the hall to Rory’s office, finding it empty.

“Try the sitting room?” Jack queried. Cate nodded, and they backtracked, checking the sitting room, finding it empty. “Now what?”

Cate pulled the ribbon on the wall. “Let’s ask Benson.”

They waited a few moments until Benson appeared in the sitting room doorway. “Yes?” his deep voice questioned.

“Oh, Benson,” Cate answered. “Have you seen Lord MacKenzie? He asked us to speak with him upon our return, but we’ve not been able to locate him.”

“If I’m not mistaken, he is with Lady MacKenzie. She’s taken ill, shock from the events of today. I’m sure you understand. Shall I disturb him?”

“No,” Cate answered, shaking her head and strolling to the desk in the room. “Please don’t disturb him. I’ll leave a note you can deliver to him when convenient.”

Cate scribbled a note onto the paper there, folding it and handing it to Benson. He placed the note in his breast pocket.

“I shall deliver it when we speak next. Is there anything else you require for the evening? A tray from the kitchen for dinner, perhaps?”

“No, nothing, thank you,” Cate replied. “We plan to retire for the evening.”

“Very good, Mrs. MacKenzie. I shall see you are not disturbed.”

“Thank you,” Cate answered.

She and Jack returned to the bedroom and used the timepiece to return to their time.

“Same drill?” Jack questioned. “We’ve got some time before dinner.”

Cate changed and gathered her notes and her two furry friends. She entered the library, finding Jack in his usual spot.

Jack slouched in his seat. “Oh, what a mess we have on our hands, Lady Cate.”

“Indeed,” Cate agreed, slumping into the chair next to him.

She opened her folder, spreading the materials across her lap. She uncapped her pen, preparing to jot down notes as they spoke.

“Okay,” she muttered, pen cap between her teeth. “Lillian Murray has been accused and arrested. But we’re sure she didn’t do it.” Cate shuffled the papers around, finding her suspect list. She stuck the pen cap on the pen’s end and continued. “We can cross the Richardsons off. They didn’t do it. We’ve got multiple reasons to remove them, agreed?”

Jack rubbed his chin. “Okay, agreed.”

“What’s your hold-back?” Cate asked, noting his hesitation.

“Nothing, just weighing how sure I am.”

“And?” Cate inquired.

“I’m sure enough. According to Rory, they have no money problems, and their reputation is above reproach. I can come up with no motivation for them to steal from Rory and Anne. I’m certain the police would have searched for the necklace, and they didn’t find it with them.”

Cate nodded as she scratched their names from the list. “Rory’s right about their money. They keep their estate until his son sells it much later, so that seems right.”

“Okay,” Cate murmured, scanning the list, “there’s no one else we can remove right now.”

“Anyone we should add?”

“The valet, perhaps,” Cate conjectured. “And Benson.”

Jack’s eyes went wide. “Benson? Lady Cate, whatever for?”

CHAPTER 22

Cate shrugged her shoulders at Jack's shocked expression. "I don't actually imagine he did it, but according to Lillian, on the night of the party, the valet was too ill to attend Rory and Benson sent him to bed and said he'd take his place if no one else could attend Rory."

Jack screwed up his face. "How do you figure that makes either a suspect? The valet was sick, and Benson filled in."

"The valet's illness seems convenient. What if he faked it to steal the necklace later but have a good alibi?"

"Point taken. Okay, add the valet. But why Benson?"

"What if Benson poisoned Rory's valet, so he was out of commission, sent him to bed and attended Rory so he was nearer to Anne's bedroom to steal the jewelry?"

Jack rubbed his chin again. "Hmm, that's quite a theory."

"Again, I doubt it's correct, but let's list Benson with a big question mark. The other thing I'll note is he said he'd attend Rory if he needed to, but we don't know if he did or someone else did."

"Who else would have?" Jack questioned.

"A footman... or Forsythe, the under-butler. He'd be the more likely one."

"And he's on your suspect list."

"He is," Cate answered, circling his name. She wrote Find out who attended Rory on New Year's Eve on her note sheet. "Anything else?"

Jack pondered for a few moments. “No. Lillian didn’t have much information to offer.”

“No, she didn’t. But we’ve got a few leads to follow. When should we return to do that?”

“Tomorrow afternoon? Right after lunch, perhaps?”

“Sounds great. I’ll try to catch Anne for afternoon tea. Perhaps she’ll open up more one-on-one.”

“I suppose I’ll drink a brandy and smoke a cigar in the sitting room.”

“Might be a good time to meet your ancestor, Lachlan. You haven’t run into him yet.”

Jack firmed his jaw. “No, I haven’t. I’m not sure how I feel about that.”

“What do you mean?”

“My grandfather’s father. It’s just odd. Although, I suppose it’s the same for you. You mentioned the strangeness of discussing your parents’ deaths with your great-grandfather. The poor man was discussing his own grandson’s death and never even realized it.”

“No, and it is odd. But also monumental, unforgettable.”

“I can imagine,” Jack agreed.

“If you do meet him, enjoy it.” Cate paused a moment. “We really are lucky. No one else gets to meet their ancestors. The people whose decisions were responsible for their very existence.”

“It truly is a gift. I’m starting to understand the appeal you’ve always recognized.”

Cate smiled at him.

“Don’t give me that look, Lady Cate. I’m still not completely keen on this whole thing.”

“Well, I suppose we must keep trying until you are!”

“I was afraid you’d say that. And on that note, I’m going to leave you to your notes.”

Cate began shoving her papers back into the folder.

“No more theorizing tonight? I’m shocked.”

“Oh, I’m going to do plenty of theorizing, but not in this room!”

“Oh?” Jack questioned.

“Still not keen on the creepy library with its unexplainable, leaky bookshelf.”

“Lady Cate, I didn’t realize you were such a ‘fraidy cat.’”

Cate frowned at him. “Neither did I! But after that last dream,” Cate uttered with a shrug, “I’m just uneasy every time I’m in here.”

“Well, you have plenty of other rooms to use, I guess,” Jack quipped as they walked from the room.

“I’ve no shortage of those,” Cate replied, shoos the dogs into the hallway as she shut the door.

Following dinner, Cate retired to her suite, curling up on her chaise with her notes spread. She’d focus on the other servants in her discussion with Anne tomorrow. They were the only remaining suspects outside of her great-grandfather. As unfair as it was, she hoped against hope to find something to ease her suspicion of her ancestor.

The following morning, Cate stared at her suspect list again. Fresh eyes offered no aid in solving the mystery. Today they would visit 1925 in the early afternoon, hoping to catch the household for afternoon tea. Cate planned to discuss the staff with Anne. She’d glean any details she could hoping to make a definitive decision on some of the suspects on her list.

She shoved the list into her folder, setting it on her side table. She returned to her laptop, pushing herself to continue work on her manuscript. Despite her distracted mind, Cate made some progress on her book. Pleased with herself, she shut the laptop and took the dogs for a walk to the loch before lunch.

Again, Cate found herself practicing for conversations that, in all likelihood, would never occur. She determined creative ways to solicit information from Anne without singling any particular person out as she dressed for her trip back.

When she finished, Cate checked the time piece. She had plenty of time to spare prior to Jack’s arrival. Cate sank onto her chaise, reviewing the suspect list for the umpteenth time. No new information leapt out at her.

Jack arrived right on time. Cate folded the suspect list and shoved it in her pocket. “Ready?” he asked as he slipped into her suite.

“I am. Ready to get more information!”

“Okay, let’s go.”

“Wow! You’re raring to go today!”

“I’m getting used to this. It’s weirdly becoming normal.” Jack shook his head. “Wow, I can’t believe I just said that. Never imagined I’d utter the phrase time travel is becoming normal.”

Cate chuckled as they stepped into her bedroom. "I'm glad you're getting used to it. Soon you may even admit it's fun!"

"I wouldn't go that far, Lady Cate," Jack cautioned as he wrapped his hand around hers. They activated the timepiece and arrived in 1925.

Cate approached her suitcase, rummaging through it. "What are you doing?"

"I want to change. I wore this yesterday," Cate responded.

"Oh, right, I forgot."

Cate selected another dress and disappeared into the bathroom. She emerged in her new dress, folding the other one and returning it to her suitcase. Jack had also selected another outfit, swapping places with her to change. When he returned, she suggested he find Rory.

"Yes, I plan to needle any information I can from him."

"Okay, good. I'll do the same with Anne. Afterward, we should visit Lillian at the police station. I don't want her becoming despondent. She was so upset yesterday."

"Yeah. Poor woman. I hope we can help her."

"Me too. Well, let's get to it."

Jack and Cate emerged from the suite and made their way downstairs. They found Rory in his office.

Cate inquired as to Anne's whereabouts, informing Rory she hoped to take afternoon tea with Lady MacKenzie. Rory agreed it would be an excellent idea since Anne still harbored many emotions over the arrest of her ladies' maid.

Cate left the men to talk and followed Rory's directions to Anne's room. She knocked at the door but received no response. She tried again, but still received no answer. After trying the doorknob, she found the room unlocked. She pushed the door open a few inches, sticking her head through and scanning the room. Anne lay on her chaise, staring into the fire in the nearby fireplace.

"Anne?" Cate whispered. The woman didn't respond.

"Anne?" Cate tried again, this time raising her voice louder.

"Oh!" Anne answered, snapping her head to look at Cate. "Oh, Cate. I'm sorry, I didn't hear you. Please come in. Although I'm afraid I won't make for much company."

"That's all right," Cate assured her, entering the room and closing the door behind her. "Rory informed us about the predicament with Murray.

I'm so sorry to hear about that. What a terrible mess."

A tear fell to Anne's cheek. Her hand rushed to wipe it away. "Yes," she replied, attempting to steady her voice. "The poor girl is in quite... a predicament." Her voice broke as she finished the statement.

"Oh, Anne," Cate replied, putting her arm around her shoulders. "Please try not to fret."

Anne wiped at her tears again, sniffing. "Silly, I realize. The girl is a servant. However, I believe she is earnest in what she says. She insists she is innocent."

"It's not silly. I also believe she is being truthful. And I do not consider your worry for her silly."

"Thank you," Anne answered, patting Cate's hand. "Yes, Murray is quite a confidant. Almost a friend, actually. She came with me from my father's home, she's been with me quite a long time."

"Which is why I regard the police's current course of action with great suspicion. No doubt if Murray planned to steal from you, she's had many other opportunities to do so. Why now? They have nothing to suggest any motive on her part."

"No, I quite agree."

"I'm not sure if Rory confided to you, but Jack and I are investigating on our own. I hope to help clear Murray's name."

"He did not but thank you."

The two were silent for a moment.

"Perhaps you'd like to take some afternoon tea in the tearoom," Cate suggested. "It may lift your spirits."

"Oh, what a terrible hostess I am. I'm sorry, Cate. However, I'm not sure I'd provide good company."

Cate was about to respond when a knock sounded at the door, and it popped open.

"Knock knock!" Amelia called in, peeking into the room. "Oh, Cate! Hello!"

"Hello, Amelia," Cate answered.

"I didn't realize you were in here. I came to retrieve my sister-in-law for tea."

Anne offered a brief smile. "Thank you, Amelia, but as I just explained to Cate, I'm not very good company this afternoon. Why don't you two go along without me?"

“Nonsense!” Amelia replied. “Getting out of this room is exactly what you need. Now, come along, let’s work on improving your mood.”

Amelia’s optimism seemed infectious.

Anne offered a wider smile. “All right, you’ve convinced me. Just allow me to fetch my shawl. The tearoom is sometimes cold at this time of year.”

Amelia nodded as Anne disappeared into her bedroom.

Cate smiled at her great-grandmother. “Great job convincing her. She was adamant about not leaving the room when I tried.”

“I agree.”

“Poor thing! What a terrible mess this all is.”

“Yes.”

Amelia swept a lock of her hair back. “First the missing jewelry, then her ladies’ maid accused. I don’t suppose it’s true, but if it turns out to be, it’s a terrible abuse of trust.”

“I don’t expect it to be true either,” Cate responded as Anne emerged from her room.

“Ready?” Amelia asked in a cheery voice.

The ladies made their way downstairs to the tearoom and within fifteen minutes were served hot tea with finger sandwiches and scones. Amelia kept the conversation light and flowing. Her sunny disposition made things easy.

“Well, Cate, tell us about yourself,” Amelia encouraged as Anne poured tea.

“Nonsense! How did you meet Jack?”

“We were seated together at one of my aunt’s dinner parties,” Cate fibbed, sticking to the backstory they created before their first-time traveling excursion.

“I see,” Amelia responded. “And how do your parents feel about your moving to another country? They must miss you terribly. Do you visit often?”

“My parents passed away before I married Jack.”

“How sad, what of your siblings? Do they miss you, particularly since your parents are gone?”

“I haven’t any siblings. Therefore, the move was easy. It allowed Jack to stay near to his family, and since I have none, there was no worry about mine. What about you, Amelia?”

“I’ve two older brothers,” Amelia said with a roll of her eyes.

“I’ll bet that was a challenge growing up!” Cate exclaimed.

“Quite. Always teasing me about my dolls and the like. I prayed for a sister every night.”

“Were you very disappointed when you didn’t receive one?” Cate queried, biting into a cucumber sandwich.

Amelia glanced to Anne. “No, because I received one.” She reached to Anne, grasping her hand.

Cate smiled at the gesture. “How lovely.”

“Indeed,” Amelia agreed. “When I married Lucas, I could not have asked for a better sister-in-law. We are like sisters despite there being no shared blood.”

“I am lucky to count you among my family, Amelia,” Anne agreed.

“Do you have other siblings, Anne?” Cate inquired.

“Yes, three. An older sister and two younger siblings, a sister and a brother.”

“Are you very close with them?”

“Only with my younger sister,” Anne responded. “We are close in age. A surprise we got along so well. One tends to find sisters that close in age sparring over dresses, men and so on, but Clara and I get along well.”

“What a pity you’ve no siblings, Cate. Did it bother you very much growing up?”

“No,” Cate admitted following a moment of introspection. “I suppose I didn’t know any different. When my parents passed, though, I’m sure it would have been easier to bear with siblings.”

“But then you met Jack. How fortunate. It is obvious he adores you,” Amelia declared.

Cate smiled at her. “Yes, funny how life works.”

Their conversation continued, discussing winters at Dunhaven, Amelia’s summer estate, travel and other small talk items. Cate’s mind whirled as the women conversed, trying to piece together their relationship and ferret out any reason for Amelia to have committed the theft. At the conclusion of their tea, she could find no reason that Amelia would have committed the crime. Was Amelia good at covering up a secret jealousy of Anne, or was she not the guilty party?

Deflated, she waited in the foyer to meet Jack whom Forsythe had been sent to retrieve. When he returned with Jack in tow, he asked them to wait in the sitting room before proceeding to town. Lady MacKenzie requested them to carry a note to Murray.

As they settled on the loveseats near the fireplace, Jack inquired if Cate had uncovered any information.

“Not really,” Cate admitted, her voice lowered. “Although, it appears Amelia genuinely cares for Anne. Unless she is a fantastic liar, I can’t imagine she’s our thief either. Did you find anything of interest?”

Jack raised his eyebrows. “Get ready to be impressed. I found out who filled in for Rory’s valet on New Year’s Eve.”

Cate’s breath caught in her throat as she waited to learn who the guilty party would be. Would it bolster their suspect list or tear it to shreds?

CHAPTER 23

Jack grinned at her as he withheld the information for a moment with a coy grin. “It wasn’t Benson!”

“No? Who was it?” Cate asked, her eyebrows raised.

“Forsythe, the under-butler.”

“Forsythe,” Cate repeated, pulling her suspect list from her pocket. She hurried to the desk and noted the new information on her sheet. “I’d say we can cross off Benson then. He was a long shot, anyway. And if he wasn’t playing valet, then the theory that he poisoned the valet in order for his presence upstairs to be accounted for is no longer valid.”

“I agree,” Jack answered. “And put a question mark near Amelia since, given your experience with her, we can’t find a motive for her either.”

Cate complied, and they studied the reduced list.

Jack tapped his fingers against the list. “That leaves three servants at the top of the list.”

“Yes. The groom, the scullery maid and the under-butler. But this list calls into question our largest piece of evidence. The letter from Anne.”

“We aren’t even sure that letter concerns this investigation.”

“We need more information about these three. Perhaps we should ask Rory after our visit with Lillian.”

As they considered the list, Forsythe returned, note in hand. “I’ve had the car brought ‘round for you. Here is the note from Lady MacKenzie.”

“Thank you, Forsythe,” Cate responded, accepting the note.

She and Jack proceeded to the front entrance, finding the chauffeur waiting for them just outside the door. He drove them to the police station, again waiting for them outside.

Cate and Jack entered and secured a visit with Lillian Murray. Cate reiterated their support of the woman and reassured her that Anne also believed her version of events. They passed along the note and were pleased to find that it brought Lillian some measure of comfort.

“We’re still working on searching for clues and information,” Cate asserted.

“Thank you,” Lillian responded.

“How are you holding up? Are they treating you well enough?”

Lillian sniffled. “They continue to drag me from my cell all hours of the night. They ask me over and over to repeat my story or encourage me to admit to my wrongdoing. But I didn’t do it! I cannae admit to something I didn’t do.”

“And you shouldn’t have to,” Cate agreed. “We will discuss the matter with the police. You shouldn’t be harassed like this!”

“Oh, please, don’t put yourself out on my account, Mrs. MacKenzie. ‘Tisn’t any trouble. I’ll survive it.”

“It’s nonsense! You’re exhausted. Their continued harassment will take a toll on you. They hope to coerce you into a confession to make their jobs easier. It’s unacceptable.”

“I’ll admit, I would enjoy a night’s peace even if it is in a jail cell.”

“We will speak to them on our way out,” Cate assured Lillian. “Now, was there anything else that you’ve remembered since we spoke last?”

Lillian shook her head. “No, I searched my brain, but I came up with nothing. I’m sorry.”

Cate grasped her hand and squeezed. “Don’t apologize. We have generated some leads we will continue to work on. I hope to have some good news for you soon.”

Lillian offered a slight smile. “Thank you again, Mrs. MacKenzie. And please, if you see Lady MacKenzie, thank her for her kind note and apologize on my behalf for the trouble.”

“I will.” Cate squeezed Lillian’s hand again and offered her a smile before leaving.

As the maid walked down the hall, Cate glanced at Jack. “We must speak with someone about her treatment.”

“Aye, that’s terrible. Poor girl.”

“I’ll ask to see Officer MacCullough.”

They approached the clerk’s desk and Cate requested a meeting with the officer.

“Just a moment.” The clerk sighed, disappearing into another room. He reappeared, motioning for them to follow him. “This way.”

Cate and Jack followed him into a room filled with desks. Officer MacCullough sat at one of them, reviewing a document.

“Thank you,” Cate said, storming toward the officer. “Officer MacCullough, I demand you cease at once with your poor treatment of Lillian Murray. The girl is being badgered at constantly.”

“I beg your pardon, Mrs. MacKenzie?”

“She’s being awoken all hours of the night and harassed. That, Officer MacCullough, is coercion and is grounds to have any information you receive from her thrown out of court.”

“Are you now an attorney, Mrs. MacKenzie?”

“I am well-versed in matters of the law enough to know what you are doing is borderline illegal.”

The man rolled his eyes. “Mr. MacKenzie, control your wife, please!”

“Control my wife?” Jack exclaimed, stepping in front of Cate. “I’ll do no such thing! She is correct. I’ve a background in law, though I’ve given up my practice. But if I must resume practicing law to see Miss Murray is given fair treatment, I will. You are not to question her unless I or another attorney is present. Any straying from this and I shall sue you and this entire police department.”

Jack wagged his finger at the man. “Don’t tempt me, Officer MacCullough. Your so-called investigation is shoddy and full of questionable practices. It would be an easy case, a laddie fresh out of law school could win it with his eyes closed.”

“I’ve a right to conduct my investigation as I see fit, Mr. MacKenzie. And if I…”

“No, that’s where you’re wrong, sir. You’ve not the right to conduct it as you see fit, only as the law allows. Now, I shall return tomorrow and if I’ve heard you have put Miss Murray through the same machinations she’s undergone in the last twenty-four hours, I will go to the judge myself and see that you lose your badge!”

Officer MacCullough set his face into a scowl. “Fine, Mr. MacKenzie. But if your wife keeps poking her nose into my investigation and I’m stopped from finding out the truth... so help me, I’ll...”

“You’ll what?” Jack queried, his eyes narrowed at the man. After a few breaths of silence, Jack added. “As I thought. Good day, Officer MacCullough.”

He grabbed Cate’s arm, dragging a stunned Cate from the police station and to the waiting car outside. They drove home in silence, not wanting to give too much away in front of the driver.

When they entered the foyer, Cate stopped Jack from proceeding to find Rory. “Wow! That was some speech!”

“That’s what he gets for telling me to control my wife. The jerk.”

Cate offered him a wry smile.

“What? The man clearly has a problem with women. Consider how he’s treating poor Lillian.”

“It is awful. They hope to pressure her into a confession and wrap up the case with a nice bow.”

“They have no interest in solving the case, only closing it,” Jack agreed.

Cate crossed her arms and flicked her eyebrows up. “I didn’t realize you were going to resurrect your law career.”

“Neither did I, but it seemed an appropriate time to dust off my law degree.”

Cate giggled as they strode down the hall. “Perfect timing.”

“So, shall we find Rory?”

“Yes. I’d like to ask him a few questions about the staff members.”

“He should be in his office still. Oh, by the way, I met Lachlan. And yes, it was staggering.”

Cate smiled at him, happy he met his great-grandfather. They reached Rory’s office and Jack knocked at the door.

“Come in!” Rory called, writing a note in his ledger. He glanced up. “Ah, Jack, Cate, how is Murray?”

Rory frowned at the statement. “Oh no. How terrible. Is there anything we can do?”

“I’ve spoken with Officer MacCullough,” Jack chimed in. “I hope the behavior won’t continue. They are trying to coerce a confession from the girl using any means possible.”

“Oh, I do hope the behavior stops now that you’ve brought it to Officer MacCullough’s attention.”

“So do I. We’ll check back tomorrow.”

Rory nodded at them.

“In the meantime,” Cate added, “I was wondering if we might ask you a few questions?”

“Of course,” Rory agreed, setting his pen down. “What is it you wish to know?”

“Lillian maintains her innocence and I believe her. But someone within this household stole that jewelry. Is there anyone who you’d suspect, even if in the slightest?”

“Why, no, no one. As I mentioned, the event shocked me.”

“Can you recall anything out of the ordinary in the days prior to the theft? Or in the days that followed? Any unusual behavior, unexplained disappearances, anything?” Cate questioned further.

Rory shook his head. “Not that I am aware of. Benson would have better information on staff whereabouts, but surely you don’t suspect—”

“Rory,” Cate interrupted, “someone stole that jewelry. Either a guest in your house or a staff member. We must use whatever we can, no matter how small the clue, to determine who that was.”

“Perhaps if you speak with Benson...” Rory began, seemingly at a loss with the conversation.

“All right,” Cate agreed. “We’ll follow up with Benson. Would it be suitable to speak with him now?”

“Yes. I’ll ring for him,” Rory said, strolling to the wall cord and pulling it.

“Thank you. We’ll meet him in the sitting room to discuss the matter,” Cate suggested.

“Very good. And thank you.”

Cate and Jack exited the room, traversing the halls to the sitting room.

“He’s in some serious denial,” Jack said as they entered the room.

“Yes,” Cate answered. “He’ll be heartbroken if it turns out to be Lucas. He can barely fathom it being a member of his household staff.”

“He looks at the world through rose-colored glasses.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “Yes, he’s a bit sheltered in his view of the world.”

The doors opened, interrupting their conversation, and Benson strode in. "Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie. Lord MacKenzie informed me you are working on investigating the theft. Lord MacKenzie said you have some questions you wish to ask me. A terrible business, this."

"Indeed," Cate answered. "Yes. We are hoping to aid Lillian Murray in proving her innocence."

"I shall answer anything. But..." He paused. "Never mind," he said after a moment, shaking his head.

"What is it, Benson?" Cate inquired.

"Nothing, Mrs. MacKenzie. I was only concerned you may believe me to be the culprit. I have worked hard to keep my reputation above reproach, ma'am. I hope you don't find my comments out of turn but..."

"Not at all," Cate assured him. "And no, we did not ask to speak with you because we believe you are the thief. Lord MacKenzie suggested we speak with you because you would know the staff whereabouts better than he."

"Ah, very good, Mrs. MacKenzie, and I am most grateful you've found no issue with my character."

Cate smiled and nodded at him before she proceeded. "Benson, was there anything unusual that you noted in the days just prior to or just following the theft? Any odd behavior or unusual requests? Any staff members requesting time off, for example?"

Benson pinched his brow in concentration. "No, none that I can recall."

"What about the night of the theft? Lillian Murray told us Lord MacKenzie's valet was taken ill?" Jack inquired.

"Yes, Mr. Calhoun took a sudden turn following the staff meal. I sent him to bed."

"Any chance he was faking his symptoms?"

Benson shook his head as he clutched his lapel. "None. The man was white as a sheet. He retched all over the staff dining hall floor. Poor Alice, the scullery maid, had to clean it up. I don't expect he moved out of his bed after that."

"I see," Cate replied, tapping her chin. "And who filled in his role?"

"Forsythe. I intended to do it, but he offered since I had several other things to attend to."

"Mr. Forsythe hasn't been with the household long, has he?" Cate questioned.

“Mmm, the better part of a year,” Benson responded.

“Did he come with references? He seems young to be an under-butler.”

Benson glanced down at his well-polished shoes, his lips forming a frown. “I did not review his references. I am not sure, Mrs. MacKenzie.”

“Who did?” Cate queried, finding it odd the butler and head of the staff did not handle the hiring of his under-butler.

“Lord MacKenzie himself, Mrs. MacKenzie.”

Cate’s forehead wrinkled as she processed the information. That was odd. Why would Rory handle the hiring of the under-butler? He’d have approved Mr. Benson’s recommendations, but he’d not have taken it upon himself to go through the intricacies of hiring lower staff.

“Is there anything else you can tell us that you deem may be relevant?” Cate asked after a breath.

“No,” Benson replied after a moment. “I am shocked this occurred, to be honest. My theory is the thief snuck into the castle in the wee hours of the morning and absconded with the jewelry, never to be heard from again. At least that is what I hope happened.”

Cate smiled at him. He, too, preferred not to suspect a member of his own staff. He presumably felt any fault within the staff reflected on his own character. “Thank you, Benson. I hope we have this sorted soon and you are correct. Lord MacKenzie prefers to imagine none of his guests or staff are thieves.”

“And what do you think, Mrs. MacKenzie?”

“I’ll reserve any comment until I have all the facts at my disposal,” Cate answered.

Benson wagged a finger in the air, a grin crossing his lips. “Very wise, Mrs. MacKenzie. Is there anything else?”

“No, Benson, nothing. You may go.”

“Another dead end,” Jack commented after the butler departed. He ran his fingers through his hair in frustration.

“Perhaps, perhaps not,” Cate said with a coy grin.

CHAPTER 24

Jack stared at her with his brow furrowed. “What do you mean? Did I miss something from that conversation?”

“The fact that Rory hired Forsythe.”

“So?”

Cate paced around the room. “It’s rather unusual in a staff this size that Rory would have a direct hand in the hiring of a staff member like the under-butler. The butler, yes, his valet, yes. But an under-butler? I’m surprised he took that on himself. Mr. Benson should have been the one to interview and go over his references.”

Jack considered it for a moment. “It could mean nothing. There are a million reasons Rory could have hired Forsythe. Perhaps he offered him a job as a favor to a friend, or he stole him from another wealthy friend because he liked his attention to service or something.”

“There is one way to find out,” Cate replied.

“Ask Rory,” they said in unison.

Jack led the way down the hall to Rory’s office.

They knocked at the ajar door, entering after Rory called for them to come in. “Jack, Cate, did you speak with Benson? Was he of any help?”

“We did,” Cate answered. “We’re still sorting through what he’s told us. We had one follow up question for you, though. Benson mentioned that he didn’t hire Forsythe, the under-butler, but that you handled the hiring. Was there a particular reason for that?”

“Surely you don’t suspect Forsythe?” Rory questioned.

Cate kept her expression and response neutral. "I didn't say that, but I found the detail odd. We're just following up on anything that seems irregular."

"There's really nothing to it," Rory explained it away, glancing at his desk as he waved his hand in the air. "He came recommended from a friend. He needed a position, and I provided it. I took him on in London when I was on business there. Benson wasn't with me, otherwise he'd have handled it."

Cate nodded, parsing the information.

Rory glanced up at her, raising his eyebrows. "I can assure you his character is above reproach."

Cate nodded again, adding a smile. "Thank you, Rory. That answers my question."

"Unless there is something else, I'll return to my ledgers," Rory responded.

"No, nothing. Good night, Rory."

"Good night."

Cate and Jack left Rory to his work, returning to the bedroom and their own time. It remained early afternoon despite the hours they'd spent in 1925.

Cate paced the floor from the moment they returned. "Did that seem strange to you?"

Jack shrugged and shook his head. "He seemed to have an explanation for why he handled the hiring."

"Before he gave the explanation. His initial reaction to my question."

Jack pondered it a moment. "I guess he seemed evasive."

"He didn't answer it. He immediately jumped to the conclusion that we may suspect Forsythe."

"Which we do," Jack added.

"Correct, but we didn't say that. His reaction seemed odd."

Jack considered it again. "You could make that case. Although it's a bit of a stretch."

"A stretch?" Cate questioned.

"His reaction wasn't that odd."

Cate chewed her lower lip. "No, it wasn't bizarre but... it struck me as a strange response. Again, it's nothing major, but nothing we've learned so far has been major. We're piecing together a puzzle with only the nubs of each piece instead of whole piece."

"Rory judges Forsythe's character to be irreproachable. How good a judge of character is he, do you imagine?"

Cate pondered it a moment before throwing her arms in the air. "No idea. If we went by Rory's estimation, then Mr. Benson's theory is correct. Some unknown sneaked into the house, pocketed the jewelry and escaped."

"Come on, Cate, you don't honestly believe that, do you?"

"No, I don't. It's a ridiculous theory. So that leaves us with the fact that Rory has misjudged someone. Perhaps it's someone he doesn't know well enough to judge."

"I guess I'll change and get back to work. Don't sweat it, Cate, we'll figure it out."

"Yeah," she murmured, still consumed by her thoughts.

Jack strode to the door, turning back before he exited. "Hey, Cate?"

"Yeah?"

"Let it rest for the night. We'll start fresh tomorrow."

Cate nodded. She spent the rest of the afternoon attempting to read a book. Perhaps Jack was correct. She was overtaxing her mind, and it was getting her nowhere fast. After dinner, she settled to watch a movie. The movie played on in the background as her mind churned through all the information they learned, or lack thereof. She came to no new conclusions.

The next morning, Cate set her open laptop in front of her on the floor of her sitting room. She spread her notes around her. Riley and Bailey stared at her, curious about what she was doing. Cate studied the papers, willing them to provide her with more information.

"What do you think, boys?" she inquired of her furry friends. "Who is the guilty party?"

Riley and Bailey stared at her, each with dark, questioning eyes. "Nobody strikes you as the culprit?"

Cate frowned. "Me neither. Let's review what we know so far."

Riley laid down in front of her, as though waiting for the presentation to begin. Bailey remained on his feet, staring at Cate.

"The suspects still on the list are Lucas and Amelia, my great-grandparents. Why are they still on the list? Anne's letter provides damning evidence against one or both of them, assuming her letter refers to this theft, which we can't confirm. But it's safe to assume that."

Cate paused, considering the information again. “Yet neither of them seems to have any motivation to commit this crime. They both appear to care for Rory and Anne. Though it’s possible they are faking. So, we can’t cross them off the list.”

Bailey took a seat as Cate continued to her next group of suspects. “Rory assured me the Richardsons are innocent. Although Rory’s judgement may be questionable. However, they have since left the estate so we’ve no way to continue investigating them. And, to be honest, boys, they had no motivation. That leaves us with the staff. I’ve flagged the groom, the scullery maid and the under-butler.

“The groom and scullery maid were likely nowhere near the area, nor did they have any reason to be. Although, I suppose I should check on their alibis. Forsythe would have had opportunity, but what is his motive? If Rory employed him as a favor, would he return that favor by robbing him? Perhaps.”

Cate sighed, sinking her head into her hands. “I suppose it could be anyone of them or another staff member not listed. I have no idea! This investigation is going nowhere! I have the sinking feeling we may not solve this. Which means poor Lillian Murray may never clear her name. Ugh! What are we missing?”

After a moment, she recovered, grabbing her laptop. She typed in the names of each servant, one-by-one, beginning with the scullery maid. Alice Huxley didn’t generate many results, but after a good deal of scouring the web, Cate found a death notice. The woman had died at sixty-three, having worked her way up from scullery maid to assistant cook at Dunhaven Castle.

Next, Cate tried the groom, Thomas Gould. Thomas had married in 1932 to a woman from London. He’d lived until seventy, fathering five children. Nothing of note jumped out to Cate.

She tried the last name on her list, Charles Forsythe. Cate combed through every resource she found, however, none matched the time frame to fit with the man living on the estate in 1925. She searched news articles and death notices, finding none that fit.

She sighed, slamming her laptop shut. Another dead-end.

Riley, who had fallen asleep as Cate searched the web, lifted his head to eye Cate.

“Nothing new to report, buddy.” He lowered his head back to the carpet below.

A knock sounded at her door. “Come in, it’s open!”

“Hi, Lady Cate! Lunch is served!” Molly announced, carrying the tray to her coffee table. “Wow! Look at all that work. How do you keep everything straight?”

“I’m afraid I’m not keeping much straight on this subject,” Cate answered.

“Is this for your book?”

Cate nodded. She hated lying, but she couldn’t explain. Plus, it wasn’t exactly a lie. She’d likely write about this in her book. “Thanks, Molly!”

“You’re welcome. Just remember who serves you your lunch when you’re a famous author!”

“I’d never forget!”

Molly smiled at her, almost bumping into Jack as she tried to exit the room. “Oops! You have a visitor! Hey, make it snappy, lunch is ready downstairs!”

“Will do,” Jack promised. “I just have a quick question for Lady Cate.”

Molly exited, leaving them alone to talk.

“What’s up?” Cate asked, climbing to her feet.

“I wanted to make a suggestion.”

“Okay?”

“Let’s head back and check the staff alibis after lunch. It might turn up nothing, but perhaps we can find some clue that will lead us in one direction or another.”

“Wait. Is this Jack Reid suggesting we time travel?”

“Very funny, Lady Cate. You should take your act on the road. The Comedian Countess.”

“Okay, I won’t look a gift horse in the mouth. Let’s try it. It won’t hurt to ask each of them.”

Jack scanned the mess spread across the floor. “I’m assuming you have gotten nowhere?”

“No,” Cate admitted. “I’m getting nowhere, just staring at the same information. I even Googled the staff members, but I found nothing. I don’t know what I expected to find, but...”

“Googled them? Did you find anything at all? It’s not like they were on social media in 1925!”

“Just death notices. Although I couldn’t find one for Forsythe. But we have no idea where he went after he left Dunhaven, so I may just be missing it.”

“Well, perhaps we’ll find something this afternoon. Meet you at one?”

“Sounds good. Now you better get down to your lunch before Molly and Mrs. Fraser have a fit!”

“Okay, see you soon, Cate.”

Cate settled in, polishing off her lunch as fast as possible. She left her tray, cleaned up her notes, and retreated to her bedroom to prepare for their trip. At 1 p.m., she overheard a commotion in the sitting room as both dogs scurried to greet Jack at the door.

“Come in!” she hollered. “Your fan club awaits!”

“Hello, hello!” Jack greeted the dogs as he came in the door. He entered the bedroom, carrying Riley with Bailey trailing behind him. “Are you ready, Detective Cate?”

“I am,” Cate assured him. “And my fingers are crossed that we find something. Although, what are the chances of that? The police didn’t.”

“The police probably didn’t even ask the staff, judging by Officer MacCullough’s detective skills.”

“Good point,” Cate admitted.

“Speaking of, we should go to the police station. Make sure Lillian isn’t being mistreated.”

“Okay. It might take a bit to question all the staff. Do you want to split our efforts? You go to the police station while I question the staff?”

“I hate to split up, but it might be easier that way. We’ll discuss our findings when we’re back.”

Cate nodded as she held out the timepiece. “Okay, sounds like a plan. Let’s go.”

Together, they used it to slip back to nearly a century earlier. After arriving, Cate and Jack sought Benson. Jack requested a car to town while Cate inquired if she could question the staff about their whereabouts on the night of the theft. Benson approved both requests, telling Cate to use his office to speak with each staff member. He then left her, taking Jack with him to retrieve a car for his trip to town.

Cate scanned the staff list Benson provided her. Most of them were finishing up their lunch when she arrived. Benson had asked them to stay until she had spoken with them. She called the first few kitchen maids, asking them where they were between the hours of 1 a.m. and 11 a.m. For the first several hours, they all reported being asleep. Most of them shared a room with someone else, and neither party recalled hearing the other slip in or out during the night. The scullery maids spent the rest of the morning in the kitchen.

Cate moved on to the cook, whose story was similar. She then worked her way through the maids and footmen. No one's stories drew any red flags. All reported being asleep until early morning, when they began their chores. They worked in pairs which provided them with solid alibis.

Cate moved on to Charles Forsythe. She found him in the silver storage room, pulling several pieces from the shelves to be polished.

"Sorry to interrupt. Do you have a moment?" Cate inquired.

"Yes, Mrs. MacKenzie. It's no interruption. I am checking the silver pieces used over the holiday have been properly polished."

"We can speak here if you prefer so you may continue your work."

"If it's convenient and no trouble to you."

"No trouble at all."

Cate asked the standard barrage of questions. She received the answers she expected. Mr. Forsythe's only difference was he did not share a room with another staff member. A privilege of being the under-butler. Other than that, his story matched the other staff members: he was asleep until early morning, when he arose to begin his duties. Several people saw and spoke to him that morning. Cate thanked him for his time, checking his name off her list.

She then moved on to her last group of people. She interviewed the grooms. Nothing in their stories seemed suspicious. The last name on her list was Rory's valet. He had been mending an overcoat and finished as Cate searched him out. "May I have a moment to ask a few questions?"

"May I return this upstairs first?" he questioned.

"It won't take but a moment," Cate assured him. This was the second time the man avoided her request. "Can you return it after?"

The man dithered a bit before nodding his head. "All right, Mrs. MacKenzie."

"Thank you. If I'm not mistaken, you took ill the night of the theft, is that correct?"

"Yes, it is."

"And did you spend the entire night in your room?"

He glanced down at his feet as he answered. "No."

Cate glanced up from her note sheet. "No?"

Still avoiding eye contact, he provided more information. "No. I left my room from 3 a.m. to four-thirty."

"May I ask where you were?"

"My stomach still experienced fits. I didn't want to keep my roommate awake, so I came down here. I returned around four-thirty and fell asleep until seven. Then I arose and began my normal work."

Cate narrowed her eyes. No one had mentioned their roommate being absent. "Who is your roommate?"

"Thomas, the groom."

"Did anyone see you downstairs?"

The man pursed his lips. "No, I'm afraid not."

"Was Thomas abed when you left?"

"Yes, I believe so. I didn't check for certain."

"And when you returned?"

He nodded. "Yes. Again, I believe so. It was dark, and I didn't check."

"Thank you, Mr. Calhoun. That's all."

The man left the room. Cate checked her notes. Thomas Gould mentioned Robert Calhoun being his roommate, but he omitted hearing him leave. Was Calhoun that quiet? Or was Thomas Gould not there to realize he'd left? Robert Calhoun specifically mentioned he did not check and was not certain that Thomas was in the room. Thomas Gould was a name on her suspect list. Was he the thief?

Cate's mind swirled with questions as she climbed the stairs, navigating to the sitting room. She collapsed on the loveseat there to wait for Jack's return.

She attempted to piece together a situation in which Thomas Gould was the thief. After building the case against him, she played devil's advocate, trying to poke holes in her theory and identify weak points. Next, she tried to create a scenario in which Robert Calhoun stole the jewelry.

He had no solid alibi and admitted being out of his room. But why admit it when he easily could have lied and stated he was in his room the entire night? Perhaps he was afraid Thomas Gould realized his absence and reported it. Or perhaps he admitted it to throw investigators off the scent. To appear upfront and honest as he covered his tracks.

Jack's entrance into the room interrupted her thoughts. "Well?" Cate asked as she rose to her feet.

"She had a good night. They left her alone. They still won't release her, but at least we've succeeded in assuring they won't harass her into a confession."

"Good. One thing settled. For now."

"No hits on the servant query?"

Cate held a finger up. "Nothing solid, but something interesting."

"What's that?"

"Our sick valet admitted to being out of his room between three and four-thirty."

Jack's eyebrows raised as he sank onto the loveseat. "Really? Did he say why? Maybe tell you he was stealing a few necklaces?"

"Nothing quite that definitive," Cate answered with a chuckle, easing onto the cushion next to him. "He said he was downstairs in the servants' dining hall. Said he was sick and didn't want to wake his roommate. No one saw him. No one can corroborate the story."

"What about the roommate? Can he at least confirm the times? That he was gone from three to four-thirty?"

"That's interesting, too. His roommate is Thomas Gould."

Jack arched an eyebrow. "One of our suspects."

"Yes, and he never mentioned the valet's absence. So, either he didn't know, or he's lying."

"To protect Calhoun?"

Cate tilted her head, pressing her lips together. "Or because he didn't realize he was gone because Thomas Gould wasn't in the room but rather was stealing the jewelry. Robert Calhoun couldn't be sure Thomas Gould was in bed when he left or when he returned. He said the room was dark, and he didn't pay attention, he assumed he was there."

"Hmm. That's the first solid lead we've had. Two people without alibis during the time the theft may have occurred."

"I wouldn't say solid, but it's something!"

"Yes. Let's concentrate on those two. Perhaps we can dig something up on where Thomas Gould gets himself off to and trace things from there."

"Okay, I'll research it tonight. Should we plan to return tomorrow morning? Perhaps float any information we have past Rory?"

"You want to speak with him now?"

Cate shook her head. "No. We don't have much. I'd rather try to find something more substantial. Rory doesn't want to believe one of his staff did it. We'll need something to convince him."

"Okay, let's go home then."

Cate agreed, and they returned to the bedroom, slipping back to the present. Jack sighed with relief as they returned. "It's good to be home. At least we made some progress on this trip though!"

"A little," Cate said with a nod. "I'll keep searching, maybe we can make something stick. And at least Lillian is having an easier time."

"Yeah. Shame I couldn't have her released."

Cate arched an eyebrow at him. "Losing your legal skills?"

“Well, I haven’t applied them for almost seventy years! I’m rusty. I’ll try again tomorrow.”

Cate chuckled at his poor joke then grinned at him. “You’re a good guy, Jack Reid.”

“And you are quite a lady, Lady Cate,” Jack responded, bowing to her. “Text me if you find anything in your research.”

“I will.”

She set up camp in her sitting room for the rest of the afternoon. She performed an Internet search for both men’s names, seeking any additional information available on them. There wasn’t much, but she pieced together that Rory’s valet passed away in his late sixties in a neighboring village. He’d owned a small farm there he’d purchased after leaving the life of service with money he’d saved. Cate noted it, wondering if he’d used money from selling the stolen jewelry to purchase it.

Thomas Gould, the groom who’d left Dunhaven Castle months after the theft, died years later in London. He’d owned a restaurant there in partnership with another man, an Italian. The restaurant was well known for its pasta. How did Thomas afford to buy the restaurant? Was his fortune changed by stolen items?

Cate continued to search for more information about either man’s change of fortune. She also consulted the household records to determine if she could glean any additional details from them. She worked through dinner, scouring every resource she could find.

After hours of work, she tracked down information on Robert Calhoun’s land purchase. The land was owned by the MacKenzies. She noted it, wondering if Rory had given the man a break on the price after years of loyal service.

She continued, seeking information on Thomas Gould’s restaurant. As she searched, her eyes became heavy. Despite the early hour, she fought to stay awake. The extra hours being crammed into her day were catching up with her.

She let her head drop back onto the chaise for a moment. Within seconds, she drifted to sleep.

She startled awake. Darkness surrounded her. She must have fallen asleep and stayed asleep for a few hours. Outside, only starlight shined in the sky. She reached to the lamp, flicking it on. Nothing happened. She tried again but met with the same result. The power must have gone out, she surmised.

She searched the drawer of the table for a flashlight, finding none. She stumbled from the chaise into her bedroom, feeling her way to her night table. She kept a flashlight in the drawer for just such occasions, ever since the power went out on one of her first nights in the castle.

She wrapped her fingers around it, flicking it on. Its dim light shined onto the wall in front of her. The clock on the night table was dark, confirming further her theory about the power outage.

She checked her timepiece. Midnight. No sense in worrying about the power failure at this hour. She didn't want to wake anyone for the problem. Instead, she'd go back to bed and hope to sleep.

She headed back to the sitting room to collect Riley and Bailey. Before she called them, her sitting room doors blew open. A chilly wind circulated the room.

Cate shrugged her cardigan tighter around her shoulders as she crossed the room to determine the source and close the doors. As she grabbed hold of both door handles, a noise sounded. It began as a deep growl and seemed to originate from somewhere down the hall. She strained to listen. As she turned her ear toward the sound, it changed.

"CATHERINE," a deep voice growled.

Startled, Cate leapt back a step. The voice's owner was unknown, and Cate did not recognize it as belonging to anyone she knew.

Cate took a deep, steadying breath. "You're going batty, old girl," she told herself aloud, trying to remain calm.

Her heart thudded in her chest so hard it echoed in her ears. "It's an old house, there are lots of noises," Cate continued, "you're imagining things."

She grabbed the door handles again, intent on closing the doors and going to bed. As she pushed the doors shut, the sound occurred again, this time, louder.

"CATHERINE!" the voice roared as though displeased by being ignored.

This time the sound was unmistakable. Cate was incapable of talking herself down. This noise was not the random groaning of an aging castle. It was a voice. Someone called to her. Who?

Cate shined the flashlight beam down the hall, her pulse quickening. "Who's there?"

She took a tentative step into the hallway, shining the beam around. It failed to penetrate the length of the hall. Cate swallowed hard and took another few steps.

“Hello?” she called again into the darkness. “Jack? Mr. Fraser?”

Though she realized the voice did not belong to either of them, she hoped by some strange set of circumstances they were in the castle.

A wave of fear passed over her as a chill filled the air. Her breath shone in a fog as she breathed. Something was not right. She would text Jack despite the time of night. She could not shake this foreboding feeling.

She retreated a step, continuing to keep her eye on the end of the hall. After a few steps backward, she turned and ran toward her suite like a child running up their basement stairs from the monsters they presumed hid in the darkness below.

As she reached the doors, they slammed shut, preventing her from entering her room. She turned the doorknob, pushing against the door, but it didn’t budge. She pounded against it, pushing with her shoulder, but it was shut tight.

Cate turned her back to the door, leaning against it as she lamented the fact that her cell phone lay behind the doors, preventing her from texting Jack.

She’d go find Molly. She should be asleep in her bedroom at this hour.

As her mind parsed through ideas of what to do next, the floor shook, winds blew through the hall and the voice spoke again. “CATHERINE!”

Cate held her hands over her ears, squeezing her eyes shut. She slid down the door behind her to a sitting position.

“Stop!” she shouted back.

Silence fell over the castle and the air calmed.

Cate removed her hands from muffling her ears. Another noise sounded throughout the castle.

Jack’s voice called to her. “Cate? Lady Cate?”

“Jack!” she shouted in response. She climbed to her feet and raced down the hall toward Jack’s voice.

“Cate!” he called again.

“Jack! I’m here,” she answered, turning the corner toward the main staircase.

Jack’s voice sounded again below, though he seemed further away.

“Jack!” she yelled again. “Don’t move, I’m coming to you!”

Cate scurried down the stairs, arriving at the foyer. She splayed her light around the area, searching in all directions for a sign of Jack.

“Jack?” she called into the darkness around her.

“I’m here! Stay where you are, I’ll come to you!” she shouted back.

Cate traversed down the hall. Light shined from inside the library. Jack must be inside. Cate hurried toward the room, entering and toggling off her light. The power was on in this room. Lamps were lit across the space.

Jack stood near the bookshelf. He stared at it, his back to her.

“Jack! There you are!” Cate exclaimed. “The power is out everywhere but here!”

He did not respond, nor did he move.

“Jack?” Cate questioned. She stepped toward him.

“Jack?”

She received no response.

“Jack,” she said again, growing irked by his lack of response. “This isn’t funny.”

She paused. “Come on, I’m serious. Some weird stuff has been happening and I’m a little scared.”

She closed the gap between them, tapping him on the shoulder. “Jack?”

The figure twisted enough for Cate to realize this was not Jack. He grasped her arm, pulling her in front of him. His other arm squeezed around her waist, pressing her against him and leaving her no room to escape. She wriggled in his grasp but couldn’t pull away.

“Hello, Catherine,” the man hissed.

“Who are you?” Cate choked through tears.

She received no response. The bookshelf in front of her dissolved away, leaving only a black void. Her captor pushed her toward it.

“No!” she struggled against him. She dug her feet into the floor, but he pushed her as though she were only a doll.

“NO!” She shrieked again.

As blackness closed around her, she cried for help, but none came.

CHAPTER 26

Cate shot upright. Sweat beaded on her forehead and her heart pounded. Tears streamed down her cheeks, and she gulped for air.

She glanced around her surroundings. She was sprawled on her chaise in her sitting room. The side table lamp lit the room. Fresh tears fell as Cate realized she'd only been dreaming. She clutched at her blanket as her heart slowed. She wiped her tears with the back of her hand, once again feeling foolish.

She collapsed back onto the chaise behind her. Why were these dreams so taxing on her, she wondered? She was well beyond the age where nightmares should cause this much stress. Stress, yes, perhaps that was the cause. These would disappear once she'd solved the mystery of the jewelry theft, she assured herself.

Cate reached for her phone to check the time, finding it was only ten. A texted message from Jack appeared on the lock screen. After toggling her text app open, she read his message: Find anything interesting?

Perhaps it was too late to return his texted, but she decided to answer anyway, hoping the distraction would calm her nerves. She typed back: Maybe... found both of our new suspects made larger purchases after leaving the estate... not exactly a smoking gun but maybe enough to look into further

Cate set the phone down on her lap. Despite the normalcy around her, Cate's nerves remained unsettled. Her phone's text alert made her jump. She fumbled with the device to open the text from Jack: Interesting... we should follow up on it tomorrow... I was wondering where you were... thought you fell asleep on me

Cate smiled at the message and responded: Yes... we should... and I did, sorry... fell asleep and had another nightmare... ugh :(

Within a minute, Jack returned a text: That stupid bookshelf again?!

Cate responded with an affirmative and waited a few breaths before the next text arrived: Sorry, Lady Cate... I hope we solve this mystery soon... you need a good rest! Do you think you can sleep now?

Cate pondered the question. Tiredness surged through her, the reaction to the nightmare only lent toward her fatigue. She responded: Yes... I think so Jack replied: Good. You can tell me all about the latest version of your nightmare tomorrow... for now, get some rest. :) Good night, Lady Cate.

Cate replied with a similar sentiment before toggling her phone off and gathering the dogs for bed. After a short trip outside, she retired, able to fall asleep despite her frightening experience.

The sun creeping over the moors awakened Cate the following morning. She rose with a groan, cursing the nightmare for having spent her energy. Still, she was eager to follow up on her leads gathered from her day of research.

Cate passed the morning searching for any other information she could find about the purchases made by the valet and the groom. She found Thomas Gould purchased and opened his restaurant only a few months after leaving Dunhaven Castle. Cate noted the information, finding it suspicious. Where did he get the money to purchase a restaurant so soon after working as a groom?

She moved her staff lunch to today since she had spent the day researching yesterday. After lunch, Cate requested a few moments to speak with Jack concerning some estate business.

They proceeded upstairs and she started to climb to the next floor to change and return to the past.

Before she could ascend the stairs, Jack grabbed her arm. "Wait," he said. "Do you want to talk about your nightmare?"

Cate stepped back onto the landing with a shrug of her shoulders. "It's becoming more of an annoyance now than anything. Silly, really. I wake up with my heart pounding, sometimes in tears."

Cate shook her head. "I feel ridiculous. Like a child."

“This one was different, but it still involved the bookshelf.”

“What happened?”

“I was in my sitting room. I must have been asleep because the dream started when I woke up. The lights were out. I thought the power was off. I was on my way to bed when the doors to the room blew open. I went to close them, and someone called my name. They continued to call me. I walked down the hall to determine where it was coming from and the doors to my sitting room blew shut. I tried to open them, but I couldn’t. While I was figuring out what to do, I heard your voice calling me. I followed it and you were in the library. Or at least I thought it was you, but it wasn’t. It was someone else. They grabbed me and the bookshelf disappeared, and they shoved me into the black hole. Then I woke up.”

Cate shrugged again. “I don’t understand what my fixation is with the bookshelf, but something about it bothers me.”

Jack rubbed his chin. “Hmm, I still think this is stress. We found the note you’re fixated on in a book on that shelf. That’s why your mind is dwelling on it.”

“I’m hardly fixated on it, but I think it’s an important clue!”

“Either way, it came from the bookshelf. Your mind is associating that with all the stress of assuming your great-grandfather is a thief.”

Cate nodded and sighed. “I hope that’s it. There’s only one way to determine that: to solve the case. Let’s go try!”

“Okay, Lady Cate. I’ll change and meet you in your suite.”

They climbed the stairs, parting ways to dress for the time period they’d soon find themselves immersed in. Jack knocked at the sitting room door as Cate pulled on her second shoe.

“Come in!” she shouted.

Jack entered as Cate fastened the buckle and stepped into the sitting room to meet him. “Ready?”

“Yes. Do we have a plan? Talk to the two servants again? Or Rory?”

“What about Forsythe or Benson? They’d have the most information about the servants. Perhaps we should consult with them and determine if we can find any additional information that clarifies the future purchases they made. Thomas Gould, the groom, purchases his restaurant soon after leaving Dunhaven, which is only a few months after the theft.”

“Interesting timing,” Jack noted as they strolled into the bedroom. “Perhaps he had the funds to make such a large purchase from a little black-market jewelry sale.”

“I’m wondering the same thing. That puts him square at the top of our suspect list!”

“All right then, we have our plan. Away we go,” Jack stated, holding his hand out for the timepiece.

They arrived in 1925 and exited the suite, descending below stairs to find Benson or Forsythe. Benson’s office was empty, but they found Forsythe in the mending room. Cate knocked at the door jamb.

“Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie,” Forsythe answered, standing. “Is there anything wrong? May I help you?”

“I was hoping to have a few more minutes of your time,” Cate responded. “We’ve a few questions about two staff members you may be able to assist with.”

“I’d be happy to. Please, let us use Mr. Benson’s office for privacy.” He ushered them down the hall to the office, closing the door behind them. “How did your inquiry go yesterday, Mrs. MacKenzie? I hope it proved fruitful. Murray’s situation has upset us all.”

“All of you but one,” Cate replied.

Forsythe’s brows knit together. “But one?”

“Whoever is the real thief. They probably don’t care.”

“Ah, I see your meaning. And you suppose one of the staff is the culprit?”

Cate shook her head. “I don’t suppose anything just yet. But there were questions raised yesterday that bear following up on.”

“I shall assist you in any way I can,” Forsythe assured them.

“Thomas Gould and Robert Calhoun share a room, is that correct?” Cate inquired.

“Yes, that is correct,” Forsythe confirmed.

“And Robert Calhoun was the ill staff member the night of the theft?”

Forsythe nodded as he stood behind Benson’s desk. “Correct. Mr. Benson sent him to bed following our dinner. The poor man was ill.”

“According to Mr. Calhoun, he remained ill. And in the wee hours of the morning, he exited his room and came to the servants’ dining hall so as not to wake his roommate.”

Forsythe arched an eyebrow. "Interesting, I assume no one can confirm his story."

"No, which leaves two of the servants without an alibi during the hours the theft occurred."

"I see. That is concerning. Do you suspect one of them?"

"I'm not well enough acquainted with either to accuse them and their lack of alibi is no proof of guilt. Perhaps you can tell us more. Is there any reason to suspect either? Perhaps a financial issue that may have prompted them to do something so desperate?"

"We're not looking to accuse anyone, we just want the truth," Jack added.

Forsythe remained silent for a moment, rubbing his chin. "I'm not aware of anything, but if you'll give me a day, perhaps I can track down some information that may help confirm or refute any suspicion against them."

"All right," Cate replied with a nod. "That would be most helpful. Thank you."

"Shall we agree to meet here around this time tomorrow?"

"Yes, we'll see you then, thank you."

"Yes, thank you," Jack added. "Would you be able to arrange a car for a trip to town?"

"Yes, I shall do so at once, Mr. MacKenzie. You may wait in the sitting room. I'll have the car brought 'round."

"Thank you," Jack answered.

Cate and Jack departed the office, climbing the stairs to the main floor.

"Going to check on Lillian?" Cate inquired as they entered the sitting room.

"Yes, I think we should."

"I hope she's had another peaceful night. Well, as peaceful as possible in a jail cell."

"Me too, otherwise I'll have to flex some legal muscle," Jack quipped, flexing his own muscle in a ridiculous pose.

The car passed the window, rolling to a stop outside the front door. "There's our ride," Cate said, standing from the loveseat.

They proceeded to the car and into town.

The clerk's shoulders sagged as they entered the police station. "I'll get her, go ahead back," he waved them on as they approached the desk.

“Thank you,” Jack answered, proceeding down the now-familiar hall to the interrogation room. They settled into the uncomfortable chairs as they waited for Lillian. A uniformed officer led her into the room, handcuffed.

“Hello, Lillian,” Cate greeted her as she sat down. She reached across to take her hand. “How are you holding up?”

“All right under the circumstances, Mrs. MacKenzie, thank you.”

“Have they let you rest?”

“Mostly, aye,” Lillian nodded.

Jack stared at her until she made eye contact. “Lillian, has something happened?”

She shook her head, averting her gaze.

“Lillian,” Cate prodded, squeezing her hand tighter, “you can tell us anything. It’s important you are honest with us so we can help you.”

“Have you made any progress?” Lillian queried.

“A little,” Cate admitted. “We’re following a few leads, but we have nothing solid yet. Lillian, don’t avoid the question. If the police have mistreated you, you must tell us. Jack can handle them to be sure they don’t trouble you further.”

“I’m a terrible burden, complaining when you’re already doing so much to help,” Lillian replied, a tear rolling down her cheek.

“You’re no burden, Lillian,” Jack assured her. “I’ve a legal background and if they’ve done anything since our last visit, even talked to you without someone else present, we should know.”

Lillian glanced between them both. “They questioned me again.”

Jack groaned.

“They didn’t harm me, only made me answer questions again.”

“They’ve no right to do that I’ll see that you’re not bothered again. Stay here with her, Cate.” Jack stood and stormed from the room.

Cate squeezed Lillian’s hand. After a breath she said, “While we wait, perhaps you can give me some information on two of the servants in the house.”

“I’ll help in any way I can, Mrs. MacKenzie.”

“We’ve learned there are two servants without alibis. We’re not suggesting they are guilty, but we are following up on any leads like this. The two are Thomas Gould and Robert Calhoun. Do you know much about either?”

“Mr. Gould, no, I’m not well acquainted with him. But I’ve spent some time with Mr. Calhoun. Our schedules are often similar, being that we serve Lord and Lady MacKenzie. So we’ve spent some time together mending and the like. Surely you don’t suspect Mr. Calhoun. I can’t imagine him stealing from his lordship. He has a heart of gold.”

“As I mentioned, we’re not pointing the finger at anyone, but he was alone for a time the night of the theft.”

“He was ill in his room.”

Cate nodded. “Yes, but he left his room in the wee hours of the morning so as not to wake his roommate. He went to the servants’ dining hall, but no one saw him there. That left both Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Gould alone for almost two hours.”

Lillian furrowed her brow, considering the information. “Do you imagine Mr. Gould could have done it in that time? Oh, how cruel I must sound. I hate to accuse him, but I’m innocent and someone had to do it!”

Cate shook her head. “You don’t sound cruel. And you’re right. Someone did it. We have to explore every avenue!”

Jack’s return interrupted their conversation. He brought with him Officer MacCullough and another uniformed officer.

“Remove the handcuffs,” Jack instructed.

“Just a moment,” Officer MacCullough replied, holding his hand up. “There are terms Miss Murray must be apprised of.”

Cate glanced between Jack and MacCullough, confusion on her face.

“By all means,” Jack responded.

“Miss Murray, your attorney, Mr. MacKenzie has arranged for your release. During this time, you may not leave town for any reason. You should confine yourself to the estate—”

“Ah,” Jack said, holding up a hand to interrupt him.

“Calm down, Mr. MacKenzie, I said should, not must. You are still our primary suspect, Miss Murray. You’d do well to remember that.” He motioned to the officer. “Go ahead.”

The officer stepped forward, unlocking the handcuffs and removing them.

“You’re free to go, Miss Murray. For now.” The officer turned on his heel and strode from the room, the uniformed officer trailing behind him.

“Come along, Lillian, you’ll sleep in your own bed tonight. You can ride back with us,” Jack said, helping her to her feet.

Lillian stood as though in a daze, and Cate wondered if she may collapse. She hoped Jack had a firm hold of her arm. She rose, too, in the event that Lillian fainted.

CHAPTER 27

Cate winced as she watched the pale face of Lillian Murray staring into space, devoid of color. The woman stood silent for a moment before throwing her arms around Jack's neck. Tears streamed down her face, and she squeezed him tight.

After a minute she pulled back, wiping at her face. "Oh, I'm so sorry, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie. I realize how untoward that was, but I never pretended to be a high lady! If I possessed any less grace, I'd have kissed you right on the cheek! I'm ever so grateful for this. My own bed tonight, I can't tell you how that feels!"

"You're welcome, Lillian. Remember, we've got an uphill battle still to fight. But at least you'll be able to get proper rest."

"Can we go? I've no desire to stay in this place another minute."

"Of course. After you," Jack agreed, motioning Lillian to precede him. He offered his arm to Cate. She grasped it, giving it a squeeze as they stepped into the hall.

She beamed at him. "I do not understand how you do it, Jack, but you are an amazing attorney!"

"A legal genius, you might say."

"You very well may be! One thing's certain: you're that girl's hero!"

"And I nearly scored a kiss for it, too!"

"Is that the price tag for bail these days?" Cate queried.

"The smile on her face and yours was enough payment for me, Lady Cate."

They emerged from the police station. Lillian glanced up to the gray winter sky overhead, smiling at it with tears in her eyes. "Never expected to see it again. Oh, Mr. MacKenzie, I cannae thank you enough. But there is one issue."

"Issue?" Jack questioned as they crossed the street.

"I'm afraid I cannae afford your services. I've nothing to pay you with," Lillian confessed.

"Don't you worry about that. This is pro bono," Jack assured her.

"Pro bono, sir?" Lillian questioned before climbing into the car's front seat next to the driver.

"No charge, Lillian. No charge. Don't worry about it."

"Oh, but I couldn't, sir!" Lillian objected.

"Yes, you can, and you will," Jack assured her, easing her into the car and closing the door. "And I don't want to hear any more about it," he added, as he slid into the backseat next to Cate.

Lillian smiled at him but said no more as the car pulled away from town, heading toward Dunhaven Castle. Lillian offered another smile to both of them as the car swung onto the drive leading to the castle and eased to a stop outside the front door. Jack and Cate let themselves in the front door, bringing Lillian with them despite her protestations about using the inappropriate door.

"Just this once won't hurt, Lillian," Cate assured her as she led her to the sitting room. "We'll inform Lord MacKenzie you're back, wait here."

Cate followed Jack to Rory's study, where they found him reviewing paperwork for nearby land holdings.

"Jack, Cate, any news?" he asked, glancing up from his paperwork.

"Yes," Jack informed him. "I've managed to get Lillian released from jail for the time being while the case is still open. She's not permitted to leave town, but at least she can return here and sleep in her own bed."

Rory's eyes went wide. "Released? However did you manage that?"

"I've a background in law. The treatment she was receiving was beyond questionable and would ruin most of their case against her. It was in their best interest to release her pending the conclusion of the investigation."

"Have they any new information?"

"No," Jack responded. "They have pursued little beyond hounding Miss Murray for a confession."

“Poor girl,” Rory murmured, tossing his paper onto his desk. “I’m glad you got her released. Is she here?”

“Yes,” Cate chimed in with a nod, “I’ve asked her to wait in the sitting room. I wasn’t sure if you or Anne would like to speak with her before she returns to her quarters.”

“I am certain Anne would like to see her, yes,” Rory answered, pushing himself up to stand. “I shall inform her at once.”

“Good.”

They separated from Rory, who ascended the main stairs to inform and retrieve Anne. Jack and Cate continued across the foyer to the sitting room. Lillian sat perched on the edge of the sofa as though afraid to touch it.

“Lord MacKenzie is retrieving Lady MacKenzie. He’s sure she’ll want to see you before you go to your room,” Cate informed her. She sat next to Lillian on the sofa.

Moments later the doors to the room burst open and Anne rushed in, followed by Rory. “Murray!” she cried, rushing to the girl’s side. “It’s so good to have you back!”

Lillian stood as Anne reached her, grasping Lillian’s hands in hers.

“Are you well?”

“I am, m’lady, yes,” Lillian assured her.

“Oh, thank you for arranging this, Jack,” Anne gushed, grabbing Jack’s hand and squeezing it.

“You’re welcome.”

“Will this trouble Murray further?” she questioned.

“I’m afraid the case isn’t closed yet but we’re working to find more information so Lillian can put this behind her. Unfortunately, she’s still the top suspect.”

“Oh, how dreadful,” Anne lamented.

“She won’t be for long if we have anything to say about it,” Cate asserted.

“Thank you both for your help on this. We are most grateful,” Rory added.

“Yes, quite,” Anne followed up. “Now,” she continued to Lillian, “I suppose you should go straight to bed.”

“I’m all right, m’lady,” Lillian assured her again. “I can attend to you before dinner if you aren’t put off by my situation.”

“Nonsense,” Anne answered. “However, formal dinner is not being held this evening because of the uproar in the house. You can begin tomorrow if you feel up to it.”

“I shall. I am most eager to work again, m’lady,” Lillian stated.

“Then I shall see you tomorrow morning to dress for the day. Have you informed Benson of your return?”

“Not yet, m’lady. Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie instructed me to wait here and speak with you first.”

“Quite right of them. We shall inform him now and see that he is aware of the rest you require after your ordeal.” Anne approached the call bell cord on the wall and rang for Benson.

He appeared moments later and, after a brief conversation, led Lillian to the servants’ quarters to speak with the head housekeeper before returning to her room.

“Again,” Anne said once they were alone, “thank you both so much for arranging her release. I do hope she is troubled no more with this.”

“You’re welcome, Anne,” Jack answered. “Well, we will leave you to enjoy the rest of your evening. We have dinner plans in a neighboring town.”

Rory smiled at them and nodded. “I hope you enjoy them.”

They took their leave, heading upstairs to their bedroom.

“Ready to head back?”

Jack flicked his eyebrows up. “Yes. More than ready.”

“I’ll bet! You need a break after all your legal maneuvering.”

“Oh, yes. I’ve exhausted my legal muscles with all that flexing.” Jack struck his strong man pose again, eliciting a giggle from Cate.

“Okay, come on, then, let’s get you home so you can rest.”

They activated the timepiece’s mechanism, drawing them back to the present time.

Jack gave his now customary sigh of relief after returning. “Boy, I hope Forsythe gives us some good information tomorrow. I’d like to wash my hands of this mystery and my legal career.”

“Me too. Should we go with the same plan? Head back following lunch?”

“That’ll work. That seems to be an opportune hour to speak with Forsythe.”

“Okay. I’ll keep working on finding information until then.”

Cate spent the next several hours in a fruitless search for information on their two prime suspects. After dinner, she continued but gave up after an hour when she hit her thousandth dead end. She opted to stream a few episodes of a comedy show to ease her mind before bed. She found it did little to stop her brain from parsing through questions and concocting more theories.

An hour before she turned in, her phone chimed to signal a text message. She found a message from Jack: I hope you don't have any nightmares tonight, Lady Cate

Cate smiled at the message, agreeing with the sentiment. She responded: Me too... hit a dead end on my research here... hope Forsythe has some news tomorrow!

Jack typed back: Me too... I'm doing my homework over here.

Cate wrinkled her brow in confusion, responding: Homework?

Jack returned a photo message showing his laptop streaming a police procedural show. Then responded: Get some sleep, Lady Cate, see you tomorrow :)

Cate chuckled at the picture, then toggled off her phone display after wishing Jack pleasant dreams and finished two more episodes attempting to lull her mind into a restful state. She retired for the evening, sleeping without interruption after her extended day and restless prior night.

A bundle of nerves, Cate spent the morning distracting herself with her manuscript. She drummed her fingers against the table rather than adding meaningful content. But despite her distracted mind, she added two thousand words to her document before lunch.

Cate sped through her meal and changed for their trip back. She sat waiting for Jack in her sitting room, her leg bouncing up and down as she waited. After a few moments, she bounced from her seat and paced the floor as her mind spun out of control, wondering what information Forsythe would provide them.

“What do you think, boys? Will we solve this mystery today?” Cate inquired of the two dogs.

Riley eyed her, his head cocked to the side in a quizzical display.

“Yeah, I doubt it, too, Riley, but perhaps Forsythe will give us some clue that will allow us to catch a break!”

Riley gave her a small yip after her last comment.

“I’ll take that as a ‘yes,’” Cate answered as a knock sounded at her door. “Come in!”

“Hello, Lady Cate and her loyal subjects,” Jack announced as he entered the room. “Ready?”

“Beyond ready. Let’s go so I can stop pacing the floor and fretting about what we might discover.”

“Okay, let’s head back then.”

They entered the bedroom and slipped back to the bygone era.

Jack raised his eyebrows as they landed in 1925. “Here we are, let’s go straight to Forsythe. I’m dying to hear what he has to say.”

“You and me both!” Cate exclaimed as they hurried from the room to the servants’ area. When they arrived, Jack peeked into Benson’s office, finding both Benson and Forsythe inside.

“Ah, Mr. MacKenzie,” Benson greeted him. “Thank goodness you’re here.”

“Oh?” Jack replied, confused by the greeting.

“Yes,” Benson continued, skirting his desk and approaching them. “Lord MacKenzie asked that I bring you to him at once should I run into you. There has been a problem with the police and given your law background, he’d like your expert opinion on the matter.”

Jack rubbed the back of his neck. “A problem?”

“Yes, please follow me. A dreadful business, this,” Benson added at the end.

“Oh, but...” Jack began.

“Go,” Cate said, squeezing his hand. “And good luck.”

“Ah... okay,” Jack replied with a shrug, following Benson down the hall. He glanced back at Cate with another shrug, flashing his crossed fingers to her.

Cate pushed the door closed behind them, turning to Forsythe. “Is this an opportune moment to speak?”

“Yes, though, with the uproar, I only have a few moments to impart my news.”

“News? So, you found something?” Cate questioned, her voice raising to match the excitement coursing through her.

“Possibly,” Forsythe answered. “I questioned the staff very casually about both men. Mr. Calhoun seems to have garnered a stellar reputation with the staff. Most consider him to be above reproach, and I found nothing untoward in his background or character.” Cate nodded, and he continued. “But... Mr. Gould has a bit of a different reputation.”

“Oh?” Cate inquired, her eyebrows raised.

“Yes. Seems he enjoys alcohol more than he should. And he also enjoys cards. Last week during a regular card game that occurs in the stables, he imbibed quite a few drinks and told everyone he’d soon have enough money to open a restaurant. He confessed it to be a lifelong dream of his. No one could determine how he’d come up with the money for the venture, especially after he mentioned the location of the business he’d like to start.”

“Where?” Cate asked, playing innocent.

“London!” Forsythe exclaimed, raising an eyebrow. “I’m certain you are aware of how expensive a venture of that nature would be!”

“I see,” Cate murmured, deep in thought. “Yes, I understand your meaning. Thank you for the information. It’s most helpful.”

“Of course, Mrs. MacKenzie. If I learn anything else, I shall pass it along to you. I imagine this may have some bearing though, given the claims he made about coming into money.”

The door to the office burst open. “Mr. Forsythe, you’d better come quickly,” a maid said.

“Thank you, Forsythe,” Cate said to end the conversation. She preceded him through the door and ascended the stairs to the main floor as he continued in the opposite direction to the servants’ hall.

Shouts came from the sitting room. She hurried toward the room, slipping inside and into a firestorm.

CHAPTER 28

Jack and Rory stood with Officer MacCullough and two other uniformed officers. Jack shouted at them, "... ludicrous! Nothing more than a scare tactic! You're upsetting the household for no good reason."

Officer MacCullough sighed. "As I've explained multiple times, I have a warrant to search the girl's room again. Your opinion on the matter, while noted, is meaningless."

Jack snatched the paper from the officer's hands, scanning it. "Fine," he retorted, tossing it back at the man, "but don't linger longer than needed and keep yourselves to only her space. I shall observe the search."

"Fine," the man answered with a grunt. "Boys..." He shoved a finger toward the upstairs, signaling for them to proceed with their search.

Cate joined Jack as they followed the police. She offered a questioning glance his way, eyebrows raised.

"They want to search Lillian's room... again," Jack whispered.

Cate nodded in understanding as they climbed to the top floor housing the servants' quarters. The police charged down the hall to Lillian's room. The housekeeper waited outside. Lillian stood inside the door, wringing her hands. Cate approached her, putting her arm around Lillian's shoulders.

"Search it all," MacCullough grumbled to the other two officers, scanning the sparse furniture in the room. The other two officers each headed to separate corners, beginning their search. They tore drawers from the wardrobe, dumping their contents on the floor. Clothes were torn from hangers and tossed in a heap after they were poked and prodded to search for hiding spots. A small tin keepsake box clattered to the floor, startling Lillian and Cate after its contents were littered across the floor.

“Officer MacCullough, instruct your men to be more delicate, they are frightening the ladies,” Jack warned.

The man grunted at them. “Perhaps the ladies should wait outside.”

“I will not be told where I can wait,” Cate groused at him.

“Try to be a little quieter, boys,” the man acquiesced, sounding anything but genuine in his request.

They continued their search, peering behind the furniture. They ended by stripping the beds and tossing the mattresses onto the floor. Nothing was found.

“Satisfied?” Jack questioned.

“Hardly,” Officer MacCullough responded. He approached Lillian, who shook from witnessing the entire experience. “Where are you hiding them, girl? Sold them already?”

“I have done nothing!” she cried.

“That’s enough!” Jack barked, stepping between the officer and Lillian. “You conducted your search, that is all your warrant allowed. Now leave.”

“I have every right to question the suspect!” MacCullough maintained. “And if you interfere again, I’ll take her back into custody.”

“You’ll do nothing of the sort. You’ve turned up no evidence to warrant her arrest. Just because you suspect her does not mean you can do as you please. You’ve had her in custody for over forty-eight hours. In that time, you’ve turned up no evidence to support your theory. At this juncture, any action on your part to remand her into your custody is harassment. Any judge will agree.”

“You’re preventing me from doing my job, Mr. MacKenzie. Any judge will see that!”

“I’m not. If you were doing your job, you’d be considering other suspects instead of railroading my innocent client. You’ve no proof Miss Murray did anything. In fact, at each turn, you are presented evidence of her innocence that you discard! And while you continue to pursue this dead end, the real thief is getting away with a crime! No, Officer MacCullough, what the judge will see is an incompetent policeman who is failing to do his job.”

MacCullough huffed at Jack but backed down. "This isn't the end of this, Mr. MacKenzie," he answered after a breath, wagging his finger at Jack.

"I should hope not. It would be best if you actually caught the thief," Jack called as Officer MacCullough led the other officers from the room.

"Wow! Great job, Jack!" Cate whispered after they cleared the room.

Lillian glanced around the room. "Yes, thank you, Mr. MacKenzie..." she paused. "I had better clean up." She reached to pick up the tin memento box. A whimper escaped her lips as she began placing her keepsakes back in the box.

"Let me help," Cate offered, kneeling down and gathering items of clothing from the floor.

"Oh, no, Mrs. MacKenzie, please. I've got it, it's mine to take care of. You've done enough for me."

"This will take a while, Lillian. You need help! It's no problem."

"Cate's correct," Jack chimed in, heaving one mattress back onto its frame. "This is too large a job for one person."

"You are both too kind," Lillian murmured as they continued the cleanup. They had the room restored in ninety minutes. "Thank you ever so much, both of you."

"You're welcome, Lillian," Cate responded, squeezing her hand.

A gong sounded. "That'd be the dressing gong. We finished just in time," Lillian replied.

Cate nodded, taking it as their cue to leave.

"Is there anything else you want to do before we go home?" Jack inquired as they traversed the halls to the bedroom.

Cate shook her head. "No. We can discuss the information Forsythe gave me once we get back."

As they rounded the corner to the hallway continuing to their suite, they spotted Anne coming toward them. "Oh, there you are!" she exclaimed as she caught sight of them.

"Hello, Anne," Cate greeted her.

"I was just looking for you. Rory said the police had left, and I assumed you returned to your suite."

"No," Cate informed her, "the police left quite a mess behind. We helped Murray clean it up. It would have been impossible for her to restore that room herself."

“How kind. The reason I was seeking you out was to invite you to dinner. With the household restored, we’re returning to serving formal dinner. Won’t you please join us?”

“Oh, well, we were...” Jack began.

“Oh, please. I’ve been such a terrible hostess thus far. I’d like to rectify that. I’d prefer not to take no for an answer.”

Cate glanced at Jack. “Well, I suppose it would be nice to dine with the family again.”

“Wonderful! I shall see you in the sitting room for cocktails soon, then!”

Anne stepped past them, rounding the corner, and disappearing down another hallway on her way to dress for dinner.

Jack held his arms out with a shrug. “Sorry,” he confessed. “I didn’t see a way around it.”

“Me either,” Cate admitted. “It’s fine. And it’s a nice chance to spend time with my family. Sort of.”

“They are your family,” Jack insisted. “Guess I’m back in the monkey suit for the night though.”

Cate giggled as she perused her suitcase. “Yep. But like I said, I like the monkey suit.”

She selected a dress, heading for the bathroom to ready herself for dinner. She pulled on the evening dress, again heavily beaded with gold beads and sea-foam-colored frills making up the bottom. She switched places with Jack, pulling on her shoes as she waited for him to change. As she waited, she added a headband, crossing it across her forehead as was the style in the era.

“Wow, you really look the part, Lady Cate,” Jack said, emerging from the bathroom in his so-called monkey suit. “You look great!”

Cate struck a pose. “Thank you!”

“Don’t say it.”

“Don’t say what?” Cate questioned.

“I’m dashing, I already know.”

Cate shook her head at him.

“Shall we?” He extended his arm to her.

She accepted it and they made their way to the sitting room.

Anne, Rory, Amelia and Lucas were already gathered there. “I hope we haven’t kept you waiting too long,” Cate apologized as they entered the room.

“Not at all, we’ve only just gotten here ourselves,” Rory informed her.

“I’m so glad you could join us,” Anne added. She seemed in much better spirits than Cate had seen her before.

“Indeed, now we may all congratulate you on the fine work, Jack,” Lucas chimed in.

“Oh, it was nothing.”

“No, no, it was quite something,” Anne argued. “Lillian is so indebted to you, as are we all!”

“Yes, fine work,” Rory added.

“I wasn’t aware you practiced law, Jack. I thought land was your business,” Lucas mentioned.

“It is now. I haven’t practiced in years, but when the situation called for it, I used my old career to our advantage.”

“Lucky for us you did, particularly for Miss Murray,” Rory commented.

Benson announced dinner, and they filed into the dining room for the meal. Conversation continued about Jack’s legal maneuverings before turning to other subjects. Cate enjoyed the evening, becoming more relaxed with the family than she had been before.

She and Jack “retired” shortly after dinner, returning to their own time after changing from their evening clothes. When they arrived home, Jack noted they had enough time to discuss the events of the day prior to their next dinner.

“Yes, we should have time before second dinner,” Cate commented with a giggle.

“Okay, meet you in the library in a few,” Jack said.

They parted ways, meeting again after changing into their regular clothes. They sank into their usual seats as the dogs settled nearby, both weary from living through the hours that had passed in 1925 despite it only being forty minutes in the present.

“The double life is catching up to me,” Jack admitted with a groan.

“Haha, yes. Estate manager by day and land acquisitions and lawyer... also by day,” she answered with a chuckle. “You’re doing great though! That was some tough talking with Officer MacCullough today. Watching those legal dramas is really paying off!”

Jack burst into laughter. “Yes, I’ve learned quite a bit. Everyone’s always yelling and threatening. It seems to work.”

Cate rubbed her forehead with her palm. "What a mess this is. Poor Lillian. I'm convinced she's innocent, yet that Officer MacCullough will not leave her alone!"

"The man's convinced he can close the case against her."

"Why?"

Jack shrugged. "I'm not sure. Though it may be a case of pure laziness. He doesn't want to bother investigating if he expects he can wheedle a confession out of the lassie. It makes his job easier."

"That's awful. Doesn't he have any sense of justice or fair play? Or even any pride in his work?"

"Doesn't seem like it. Anyway, was there anything interesting from Forsythe?"

"Yes," Cate responded with a clear affirmative. "He asked around about both men. In Robert Calhoun's case, he found nothing untoward. Everyone seemed to agree he was a nice guy and there wasn't anything questionable about his past or present or any shady dealings."

"That doesn't seem like much help, but I suppose it knocks him down a few pegs on the suspect list if we have no motive and no reason to believe he could or would do something of this nature."

"Right. But the more interesting bit was about Thomas Gould," Cate continued. "He likes both alcohol and gambling more than he should. And he's been bragging to his gambling buddies that he's going to be out of service soon and owning his own restaurant in London."

Jack puckered his lips as he pondered it. "Hmm. That's interesting. Is it just idle chatter, do you imagine? Or is there something to this?"

"I'm not sure. Forsythe seemed to believe there may be something to it. Possibly because he let it slip while he was inebriated. Forsythe all but came out and said he stole the jewelry to finance his new career."

"So, Forsythe thinks he's guilty."

Cate flicked a gaze to Jack. "He didn't say as much, but he certainly implied it, yes."

"What do you think?"

Cate remained silent for a moment, parsing through her thoughts. "I think it's enough to consider him a suspect and move him up to the top of our list. It's not an open and shut case, but the circumstantial evidence against him is building. First, he has no alibi. And he never mentioned the absence of his roommate. So, either he lied to protect Mr. Calhoun, or he had no idea Calhoun left the room because he wasn't there. Second, he's been bragging about coming into some money, enough to start a restaurant in an expensive city."

"Yes, the evidence does point toward his guilt. We just need some proof. We can't mention this to MacCullough yet. He'll never go for it, even with the mounting circumstantial evidence, without direct proof."

"I wonder if he'd go for it if the man were standing with the jewelry clutched in his hand," Cate quipped with a roll of her eyes.

"No doubt he'd still try to blame Lillian Murray somehow."

"Funny but not," Cate responded with a chuckle. "So, we've got ourselves down to two primary suspects."

"Still keeping Calhoun on the list?" Jack inquired.

Cate shook her head. "No. Still keeping Lucas on the list."

Jack screwed up his face. "Lucas? With what evidence?"

"Anne's letter."

Jack let his head sink back into the chair behind him at her comment.

"Jack, we can't ignore that letter! What else could Anne's letter have been referring to? What other type of theft would have gotten her so upset she wrote something like that?"

"Okay, okay," Jack answered, holding his hands up in surrender, "Lucas and Thomas Gould."

"The only way I can figure to solve this is by proving one of them is innocent."

"Or both of them are innocent."

Cate grimaced, wrinkling her nose. "Which sends us right back to square one."

"No. We'd have ruled out at least two people. Progress, see."

"Yeah, progress, right," Cate commented, sarcasm thick in her voice.

Jack checked his watch. "Almost time for second dinner. You joining us servants in the servants' hall tonight?"

"I am, yes." She stood, glancing around the room in search of her furry friends. Her eyes rested on the bookshelf across from her. She narrowed her eyes, continuing to stare at it. Something nagged at her.

"Don't start with that bookshelf again, Lady Cate," Jack warned, noting the direction of her gaze. "You'll start your nightmares up."

Cate shook her head.

"Don't shake your head at me, lassie, you will so."

“No, I didn’t mean that. But something is nagging at me. Something’s off.”

Jack glanced between Cate and the bookshelf. “You mean besides the horrible nightmares that thing’s causing you?”

“Yes.”

She held up a finger as she strode to the door, opened it and glanced into the hallway. She stepped into the doorway. Her gaze flitted between the two spaces. “Does this space look right?”

“Huh?” Jack questioned, screwing up his face. He glanced around it. “Looks fine to me? Has the cleaning company done something strange? Misplaced something?”

“No. Not that, the dimensions. Shouldn’t it be... bigger?”

“Bigger?” Jack queried.

“Come stand here and take a peek.”

Jack joined her in the hallway. “Now, we’re aware of how deep the bookcases are. But consider their placement compared to where the wall is in the hall. Doesn’t it look like they should be a few feet further back toward the hall?”

Jack glanced between the hallway and the bookcases a few times. “Eh, maybe?”

“Well,” Cate added, standing against the wall for emphasis, “consider the wall being here and the bookcases coming out into the room this far.” She stepped forward to illustrate. “Now look in the library. Those bookcases would be a few extra feet deep given where they are.”

“Okay. I see what you mean,” Jack conceded. “What are you implying?”

“That the room’s dimensions are incorrect. There is something behind those bookcases! Like a secret passage.”

“Or pipes,” Jack commented. “There’s no passage listed on the original plans or any other. But when indoor plumbing was installed, perhaps that was the space they were put into. This wall,” Jack said, placing his hand against the hallway’s wall, “may have been moved out to accommodate plumbing.”

Cate considered the idea. “Hmm. Then why wasn’t it marked on the plans.”

“Mistake? Last minute change? Careless error? Someone forgot. Could be any number of reasons.”

“You may be right,” she conceded, “although that’s not very fun.”

“I find indoor plumbing quite fun, Lady Cate.”

“Funny, funny. Oh well, so much for my big discovery. Ready for dinner?”

“Come on, you two rascals,” Cate called to the dogs. “Let’s go get our dinner!”

Cate strolled around the castle the next morning, following Riley and Bailey on their morning walk.

“Good morning, Lady Cate,” Jack greeted Cate as she rounded the corner toward the back garden.

“Good morning. I see your fan club found you,” Cate noted, eyeing the two small dogs grouped around Jack’s feet as he petted them.

“Aye, they did.”

“Kind of cold to be working out here, isn’t it?”

“Spring,” Cate repeated with a smile, rubbing her arms. “That word sounds wonderful!”

“Aye. You’ve not experienced a spring in Dunhaven yet. You came almost at summertime.”

“Yes. I’m looking forward to spring here.”

“And then we celebrate your one-year anniversary with us.”

Cate glanced back to the castle. “I know. I can’t believe it. Almost a year already! Where has the time gone?”

“To 1856 and 1925, that’s where.”

“Uh-uh,” Cate argued. “You can’t count that! We get extra time to do that.”

“Oh, right. Yes, you’d think your year would have taken longer, what with our thirty-six-hour days and all.”

Cate chuckled and licked her lips. “Speaking of our thirty-six-hour days...”

“Same plan as yesterday? Head back after lunch?” Jack replied before she could finish her statement.

“Yeah, that sounds good.”

“What’s the plan? Speak with Gould? Or perhaps Benson or Forsythe again?”

Cate bit her lower lip. “My plan is a bit bolder than that.”

Jack ceased his work, narrowing his eyes at her. “Bolder? Oh, Lady Cate, I don’t like when you say things like that.”

“Yes, I know. But we’ve got to do something! We can’t just keep asking people what they think might be true. We need proof!”

“How can we get proof? Or do I want to know?”

Cate shook her head. “You don’t want to know.”

“Now I have to know.”

Cate sighed, holding her hands up . “Okay. But don’t say I didn’t warn you. I want to sneak upstairs and take a peek in Gould’s room.”

She flicked her gaze to him, eyebrows raised as she awaited his response.

CHAPTER 29

Jack's eyes widened as Cate told him her daring plan to search Thomas Gould's room.

He blinked a few times before responding. "What? Cate, are you mad?"

"No. But it may give us a clue. Perhaps he wrote a note mentioning he has the jewels, or someone replied to a request to sell them. Or perhaps the jewelry itself is hidden up there."

"And perhaps we'll get in big trouble if we're caught."

Cate waved a hand at the concern. "Oh, that's simple."

"It is?"

"Yeah, don't get caught. You be my lookout. I'll do the searching."

"Ugh," Jack lamented, his shoulders slumping.

"Jack, we're getting nowhere and soon Officer MacCullough is going to come back with some other request. As good of a fake attorney as you are, there may come a point where you can't help Lillian with your fancy but fake legal mumbo-jumbo!"

Jack sighed, his hands on his hips. "You're right. I hate it, but you're right. If we don't come up with proof soon, there may be no stopping MacCullough from pinning this on Lillian."

"Okay, so we're agreed?"

"Agreed. See you after lunch for the daring plan."

Cate nodded with a smile. "Okay, see you then!"

She spent the rest of her morning working on her book's manuscript. With the belief that only pipes were behind the library's bookshelves, Cate decided to brave it and work there. She answered a few personal emails during lunch before returning to her suite to dress for the trip back.

Around one, Jack arrived, and they slipped back to 1925.

"I am not looking forward to this at all," Jack complained after they arrived. "Do we know which room is theirs?"

"No," Cate answered. "But I have a plan to ascertain that information. I'm going to ask Forsythe in the name of following up on our clues."

"Okay. Well, it's your show," Jack said, motioning for her to precede him.

They navigated below stairs, seeking Charles Forsythe. They found him in Benson's office selecting a wine for the evening dinner.

"Excuse me, Forsythe," Cate said, knocking at the door.

"Mrs. MacKenzie! May I help you?"

"Do you have a moment? I had a few questions about our discussion yesterday I'd like to follow up on."

"Yes, please come in," Forsythe responded. "Oh, hello, Mr. MacKenzie."

Jack nodded to him in greeting as Cate closed the door. "I've informed Mr. MacKenzie of the information you passed along to me yesterday. This coupled with the fact that for several hours Mr. Gould is without an alibi has brought up a few other questions."

"I'll help in any way I can," Forsythe assured them.

"Could you tell us the location of Mr. Gould's room in the hallway?"

"The location?" Forsythe questioned, his brows scrunching.

"We're trying to determine who, if anyone, may have been able to hear someone coming and going from the room. If anyone did," Jack explained.

Forsythe nodded in understanding. "They are on the right, second door. Only my room, on the opposite side of the hall, and Mr. Benson's are between theirs and the stairway. I heard nothing that night and to my knowledge, neither did Mr. Benson. Though, the hallway is not long. Few steps are needed to reach the stairs."

"Okay, that's helpful, thank you," Cate answered.

"You're welcome. Do you expect you may have the crime solved?"

Cate paused a moment. "No. Just sorting through information and trying to determine what is best to follow up on."

Forsythe rubbed his chin. "I see. Well, I shall continue to keep my ear to the ground for any further information. I must admit, the information I found on Mr. Gould that I imparted to you yesterday, Mrs. MacKenzie, seems to have direct bearing on the case."

"It is interesting. We don't want to accuse any innocent parties, though, so we need more than conjecture."

"It seems that is all the police have in the case against Miss Murray," Forsythe insisted.

"It is. However, without direct proof, the police won't take anything we say seriously," Jack explained.

Forsythe sighed. "I wish we could ferret out some information to assist. I am uncomfortable having a thief on my staff. Perhaps a search of his things?"

Cate nodded at him, hoping to end the conversation. "I understand, though we don't know there is one. Let's hold off on doing anything rash until we can consider the information further. And if you discover any other news, please let us know. Again, thank you, Forsythe."

"You're welcome, Mrs. MacKenzie."

Jack and Cate left the room, climbing upstairs to the main floor before continuing on to the servants' quarters. At this hour, the servants would be attending to their duties, so they hoped to slip in and out unseen. Using the information from Forsythe, they located the bedroom. Like Lillian's, it was sparsely furnished.

"This shouldn't take long," Cate whispered. "Keep an eye on the door."

Jack nodded, taking a post at the door, and peering through the crack they'd left open. Cate scanned the room before diving in. A wave of guilt passed over her as she slid open the first drawer in the dresser, but she shoved it aside, pawing through the contents. She checked each drawer with a cursory scan but found nothing. She glanced behind the dresser and under each drawer. But her search was fruitless. The wardrobe search also came up empty.

Cate glanced under the bed and felt under the mattress. Under one, she found a few notes. A quick scan of them gave her no more information. She stood and approached Jack. She signaled to him with a shake of her head and motioned to ask if they could retreat downstairs without being caught. He nodded, and they hurried from the quarters down to the floor containing the family's bedrooms.

They returned to their suite. Cate slogged through the door, filled with frustration. She slapped her hands against her thighs as Jack closed the door. "Well, that didn't help!"

"You didn't expect to find the jewelry there, did you?"

"No, but at least some clue! Though, you're right, he'd keep nothing incriminating in his room. Perhaps the stables," Cate muttered, thinking aloud. "Do you think he could have unloaded them already?"

"I'm not sure. I'm not sure how we're going to solve anything. We're reaching dead-ends at every turn."

Cate made a face and nodded. She paced the floor for a few more moments, deep in reflection. After a while, she crinkled her brow, then glanced to Jack.

"What?" he inquired.

"Did you find the conversation with Forsythe strange? He seemed bound and determined to pin this on Gould."

"I suppose he's just antsy to settle this and not have a thief on his staff, as he mentioned."

"Perhaps. Although it seems he's as inflexible as Officer MacCullough."

"Why didn't you take him up on the search?"

Cate shook her head. "It seemed like a bad idea. I wanted to do it alone, without him there. I'm not sure why, but it just seemed a bad decision to involve him."

"It may not have been the best idea, you're right. If he's innocent, it could cause problems within the staff."

"So, now what?"

"Up to you," Jack responded. "What's the next trick up your sleeve?"

"I haven't got one," Cate replied, showing him her empty sleeves. "If it's all the same to you, I'd like to skip dinner with the family tonight and go home."

"Sure. We'll leave a note for Rory telling him to pass along our regrets and tell the others we've gone out to dine."

"Okay."

Jack scribbled a note to Rory, explaining they wouldn't attend dinner. He left it with Benson before returning to the suite. Cate sat on the chaise, her chin resting in her hands.

“Second thoughts, Lady Cate?” Jack asked after witnessing her glum expression.

“No. But I have no idea what to try next.”

“Don’t let it get you down, Cate,” Jack said, squeezing her shoulder. “Just let your mind relax. Something will come to you. I’ve never known you to go more than twenty-four hours without a brilliant idea.”

“Brilliant, huh?”

“I have no doubt that by tomorrow, you’ll have a new idea to pursue to solve this case.”

“Whew, pressure’s on now!”

“Oh, no, now you’ll be in overdrive,” Jack retorted. “That wasn’t a challenge, Cate. It was a vote of confidence.”

“I’ll remember that before I accuse you of being the reason I didn’t sleep all night and was up brainstorming!” Cate exclaimed with a chuckle.

“Aye, you do that. Shall we head back so you can begin your night of fretting?”

“Yes,” Cate agreed with a nod.

Jack pulled her to standing. They entered the bedroom and returned to the present.

“At least we won’t have two dinners today,” Cate said with a sigh.

“Hey, that’s my favorite part of time traveling! The double meals!”

“Wow, you have a favorite part? And here I assumed you hated everything about it.”

“I told you it was growing on me,” Jack answered, winking. “Well, I’ll leave you to begin your handwringing, pacing and worrying. M’lady.” He gave an extravagant bow before departing from the room.

Cate chuckled as he left, though her mind immediately turned to the puzzle they’d just left behind. Jack was correct, she’d likely pore over it again and again for the rest of the day. She hoped he was also correct in saying that by tomorrow she’d have a new avenue to pursue. So far all they had were unsubstantiated suspicions, dead-ends, and no leads to get them any closer to the culprit.

She spent some of her time on a long, chilly walk with Riley and Bailey, hoping the cold winter air and mindless task of playing ball with the dogs would relax her mind into stumbling onto her next great idea. She returned to the castle with no new conclusions or objectives to pursue.

After dinner, Cate spread all her materials out on the floor of her sitting room. She added any missing information to her notes, then studied each item. She considered the case they'd built against Thomas Gould and Lucas MacKenzie forward and backward. She played devil's advocate, finding loopholes, inconsistencies in assumptions and leaps of logic.

They were missing something. But what? Proof, her mind filled in. So far, any case they'd built had been circumstantial only. They could have built a similar case against any random stranger. Cate sighed.

Unless they got a break, and soon, they'd likely never solve the case. She worried Lillian Murray would be railroaded into a prison sentence for nothing. At the very least, perhaps they could help the girl avoid that, even if they couldn't finger the guilty party and recover the jewelry.

Cate's phone chimed an incoming text alert. She opened her messaging app, reading the text from Jack: Have you worn through the floorboards with your pacing yet?

A chuckle escaped her as she answered: No... no pacing, just studying. She included a picture of her messy work area with notes and papers spread all over the floor.

Jack replied: Ah... have you solved it yet?

Cate responded: No! We're missing something... and if we don't find it soon, we may never solve this!

Within a few minutes, Jack returned the text: No and our thief will get off scot free... pun intended ;)

Cate shook her head at the terrible joke and wrote back: Your jokes leave me speechless

The response to her text was: But you laughed, didn't you?

She responded with an affirmative, admitting it elicited a chuckle from her, and Jack argued the joke couldn't possibly have been terrible if it worked.

She toggled off her phone after promising to get some rest. "A few more minutes won't hurt though," she murmured to herself as she stared at the papers again.

She took two clean sheets of paper. One she titled Case Against Lucas MacKenzie and the other she titled Case Against Thomas Gould. She noted every piece of evidence and every doubt for each suspect. Nothing caught her eye. Short of a miracle or additional information from Charles Forsythe tomorrow, they were stuck. With a sigh, Cate shoved the papers back into the folder, calling it a night.

When morning rolled around, Cate found herself no closer to solving anything. There were no big ideas, no new leads to try. Short of searching any area Thomas Gould frequented or finding a witness who spotted him meeting with a shady character, there seemed to be nothing else to do. Disappointed, Cate snuggled under a blanket on her chaise as the sun crested the horizon. Fog clung to the moors in heavy patches, obscuring the view. The fog also seemed to settle in Cate's mind, removing her ability to seek a solution with any clarity.

After breakfast, Cate studied the new case sheets she'd made against each suspect. She read them aloud to Riley and Bailey. "What are we missing, Riley? Do you know, Bailey? How can we figure out who committed the crime?"

Neither dog offered an answer. With a frustrated sigh, she tucked the notes away and made her way to the library. As she settled at her desk, she received a text from Jack: So, what's the big idea for today?

Cate responded with a sigh: Sorry to be a disappointment but I've got nothing... short of searching the entire estate or Forsythe having new information I'm fresh out!

Jack answered within moments: Perhaps we should up our trip? Go this morning.

Cate considered it. Molly, ever adventurous, was using her day off to sightsee in her new country, leaving Cate alone in the castle. With no one to question Jack's appearance on his day off, she went with the plan. She responded: Okay... unless you're busy... I hate making you work on your day off!

Jack answered: Not busy... not work... see you in a few

Cate stood in the foyer waiting for Jack to arrive. The gravel driveway crunched under the weight of his car, and she flung the door open to greet him.

"Wow, are you psychic, Lady Cate?" Jack inquired, stepping from his car.

"No, just impatient."

"You are definitely that."

"Let's change and go right away. I don't want to miss Forsythe."

“Or Gould,” Jack added. “Meet you in thirty? Is that enough time for you?”

“I’ll make it enough time. I don’t want to delay this.”

“Okay, see you then.”

Cate hurried to her room, tossing on her dress, and fixing her hair at lightning speed. Jack knocked at the door as she fastened the buckle on her shoe.

“Come in! I’m almost ready,” she shouted.

“That’s a pretty dress,” Jack noted as he caught Riley mid-leap.

“Thank you,” Cate answered, glancing up at him. “Let’s hope it’s lucky in addition to pretty and we get the break we need.”

“I’ll admit, this one is tough. I swear, solving that murder was easier!”

Cate nodded as she rose to standing, smoothing her dress. “Seemed like a breeze compared to this. Even with Randolph dead set on ruining the investigation! “Ready?”

“I am, but you aren’t.”

Cate furrowed her brow, confused. “I’m not?”

“Nope,” Jack said, approaching her and sliding something off the side table.

“You’re still just Cate Kensie,” he said, holding up the plain gold wedding band. “And you’ve got to become Mrs. Jack MacKenzie.”

“Oh! Yikes! I almost forgot my fake wedding ring! Sorry, I was in such a hurry, I meant to put it on as soon as I sat down, but I went straight to the shoes.”

“Forgot? How could you possibly forget your wedding ring? Don’t forget it or we may have some explaining to do.” He took her hand, sliding the wedding ring onto her finger. “There, that’s better.”

Cate smiled at him as she stepped toward the bedroom. “Now, I am ready!”

Cate held out the timepiece, rolling her eyes at him. “Okay, Mr. MacKenzie.” They activated the timepiece, slipping back to the Roaring Twenties.

“All right, Mrs. MacKenzie, let’s see if we can track down any clues.”

They descended to the main floor, finding Rory in the library.

“Jack, Cate!” he greeted them. “We missed you at dinner last evening.”

“Sorry,” Jack apologized. “We weren’t able to make it. We were hoping to speak with Forsythe again today. We’ve been following up on a few leads.”

“You aren’t still considering him as a suspect, are you?”

“No,” Cate corrected, “he’s been helping us sort through the staff member accounts and alibis. We’re checking everyone’s stories again to see if we’ve missed anything.”

“Oh, I am pleased he’s helpful to you. He seems to be working out well in the household.” Rory consulted his timepiece; the same one Cate wore under her dress. “Hmm, at this time of the morning, he should be below stairs.”

“Thanks,” Jack answered as they turned to leave.

“Have you made any progress? You mentioned following leads?” Rory questioned before they could exit the room.

“We’re looking into a few things,” Jack hedged.

“What do you know about your groom, Thomas Gould?” Cate questioned.

“Thomas? Not much. He seems a good chap, and he’s good with the horses.”

“It seems he’s good with liquor and cards, too,” Cate confessed. “And during one of his games, he mentioned coming into some money soon. An odd admission given the theft.”

Rory offered a surprised expression. “Oh! How... odd, yes. Though I can’t imagine him doing something like this! For what reason?”

“His friends say he plans to open a restaurant in London. Perhaps he viewed the theft as a shortcut to funding his venture.”

Rory considered it, his expression changing from shock to dismay. “How disappointing if it’s true. As I mentioned, he’s wonderful with the horses.”

“Let’s hope it’s not true,” Cate responded.

“Yes,” Rory said, nodding his head. “Let us hope for that. Please keep me apprised, will you? And I hope you’ll be able to join us for dinner. Lucas and Amelia will be departing at the end of the week, and I’m sure they’d like to spend more time with you both.”

“We’ll be there,” Cate answered.

“Wonderful. Well, I shall let you get on with your investigation.”

Cate and Jack closed the doors behind them as they exited the room.

Cate shook her head as they ambled down the hall. "I swear we could catch the thief red-handed and Rory would still not believe they did it."

"Yeah, he really has an optimistic view, doesn't he? He trusts everyone to do the right and honorable thing. It's endearing in a way."

"It is. His trust is almost childlike. But it's also costly."

"No kidding. His trust has invited a thief into the household."

They descended the stairs leading to the servants' hall. They found Forsythe in the kitchen emptying a tray.

"Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie, is there something I can assist with?"

"Yes," Cate answered. "I'm sorry to interrupt, could we speak privately?"

"Of course," he said with a bow. They left the kitchen, walking down the hall to Benson's office.

Forsythe closed the door behind them. "Quick thinking requesting to speak in private."

"I expect it's best to keep our conversations private. Particularly at this juncture," Cate replied.

"Yes, especially with what I've found."

"Found?" Cate asked, excitement and hope filling her voice. "What is it?"

Forsythe removed a note from his breast pocket. "This!" He handed the note to Cate. "I must confess you would probably disapprove of my methods, but I believe the ends justified the means."

"What methods?" Jack inquired.

"I asked Mr. Calhoun to search Mr. Gould's things. Not very honorable, I'll admit. But, in these cases, when dealing with someone as dishonest as a thief, we must use extreme methods."

Jack raised his eyebrows at the comment as Cate unfolded the note. Her pulse quickened as she read the scrawled words.

CHAPTER 30

Cate stared down at the scrawled note, her heart thudding as she read it.

Thomas,

Have you got the jewelry? I have a buyer ready, just say the word. We'll have that restaurant soon!

- P

Jack peered over her shoulder.

Cate glanced up from the paper. "And Mr. Calhoun found this amongst Thomas' things?"

"Yes, in one of his drawers."

Cate folded the note, waving it in the air. "Can we keep this?"

"Yes. Though at this point, I judge it's wise to go to the police!"

Cate nodded and glanced at Jack. "Mr. MacKenzie is an attorney, so I leave it to his judgement on how best to approach the police with this evidence. We want everything above board. We don't want any issues with the case because of the methods used to obtain the evidence."

Forsythe nodded. "Ah, yes, I understand. At the very least, this clears Miss Murray."

"It does, thank you," Jack replied. He took the note from Cate, stuffing it into his jacket pocket. "And we'll use it to clear her name. But as Mrs. MacKenzie mentioned, we must do it in the proper way so it may be used to create a case against the guilty party in addition to proving Miss Murray's innocence."

"This has been so helpful, Forsythe. Thank you. And we will let Miss Murray know you and Mr. Calhoun helped to clear her name," Cate assured him.

"I didn't do it for the gratitude. It may be wise not to mention anyone's name. It may cause strife within the staff," Forsythe asserted. A knock sounded at the door. "Yes?"

"Mr. Forsythe, sorry to interrupt," a young freckle-faced maid whispered, peeking in the door. "Mr. Benson is asking for you at once."

"Thank you, Ethel," Forsythe answered. "Good day, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie." He nodded his head to them and turned on his heel, exiting the room.

Jack glanced to Cate, bewilderment on his face.

"Oh, Forsythe!" Cate called, reaching to the floor and grasping a few folded notes. The man disappeared without answering.

Cate stared down at the papers in her hand. "He must have dropped this when he pulled that note out."

"Yes," Jack answered. "You can leave them on Benson's desk to return to him."

Cate didn't respond, instead her brow wrinkled as she stared at the note.

"Lorne Peterson?" Cate asked, confusion filling her voice. "Who is Lorne Peterson?"

Jack shrugged. "A pen pal of Forsythe's?"

Cate shook her head. "No, this letter has already been posted and delivered. It's not an outgoing post. Why would Forsythe have Lorne Peterson's mail? Who is he?"

Cate puckered her lips at the envelopes before shoving them in her dress pocket. "Let's go."

"You're taking it?"

"Yes. Call it instinct but something is odd about this."

"You can explain it to me while we wait hours for dinner."

"Come on," Cate said as they stepped into the hall. "We'll walk to the loch or town to pass the time."

"How about to town? Maybe hit the pub for lunch... my stomach is growling."

"Wow, is the pub there already?"

“Yes, that pub’s been in business for most of the town’s history.”

Cate glanced to Jack, a serious expression on her face.

Concern crossed Jack’s face. “What is it, Cate? What’s wrong?”

“Do you think they have the fish and chips?”

Jack burst into laughter. “Oh, Lady Cate, I’ll bet they do, don’t you worry. Should we request a car?”

“Okay, whew, good. No, we don’t need to. We can walk.”

“You sure?”

“Yeah,” Cate assured him. “I’m good. For the fish and chips, I can walk.”

They climbed to the main level and headed for the foyer. As they approached the front door, Lucas and Amelia met them.

“Well, hello, Cate and Jack!” Amelia said in greeting. She pulled Cate into an embrace, kissing her cheek. “We missed you at dinner last evening.”

“We’ll be there this evening,” Jack assured them.

“Wonderful. We’re departing the castle at the end of the week, but we’d love to spend more time with you both,” Lucas added.

“Are you heading out?” Amelia asked.

“Yes. We’re heading to town for the afternoon,” Cate answered.

“And for lunch,” Jack added. “We’re dying to try the pub.”

“We’re also heading into town for lunch! Would you care to join us? We can share a car,” Amelia said.

“Oh!” Cate exclaimed, glancing at Jack. “That would be lovely unless you were hoping for a private day.”

“Not at all, Cate,” Lucas chimed in. “It promises to be a lovely afternoon with you joining us.”

“I’ll run up for the coats,” Jack said, beginning his ascent of the stairs.

“Don’t forget my hat!” Cate called after him.

“No, I won’t forget your hat,” he assured her.

Jack returned within a few minutes. The crunch of gravel announced the car’s arrival.

“That sounds like the car now,” Lucas added. “Shall we?”

The foursome stepped into the chilly air, climbing into the car with Jack taking the front seat and the ladies and Lucas in the rear. The trip to town was quick, and they arranged for the chauffeur to pick them up in the late afternoon near the town’s center. They filed into the pub and were seated in a booth near a roaring fire.

“Ah, this is lovely,” Amelia said, settling into the booth next to Lucas. She perused the menu. “What looks promising?”

Cate browsed the menu finding the fish and chips were listed. She smiled to herself.

“I can take one guess at what my wife will order,” Jack mentioned after a glance at the menu.

“Oh?” Amelia questioned.

“Fish and chips,” Jack and Cate replied together.

“Cate loves fish and chips at any pub we stop at,” Jack added.

“Ah, a fish and chips connoisseur, Cate?” Amelia joked.

“Something like that,” Cate admitted.

They placed their order with the waitress and settled into a conversation while waiting for their meals.

“So, Jack,” Lucas began. “Where did you attend law school?”

Without skipping a beat, Jack rattled off, “Oxford.”

Cate’s eyes widened at Jack’s lie.

“Ah, an Oxford man! Very good!”

“Why did you leave the work?” Amelia queried.

“I wanted something more challenging, more interesting. Land management allows me to use my legal skills but also travel.”

“How interesting, what a unique blending of skills,” Lucas commented.

“What about you, Lucas?” Jack inquired.

“I’m also in land, though not acquisition. I hold several different types of properties for various purposes: farms, housing, businesses. I may have to seek your expertise whenever I plan to expand my holdings.”

“Are they concentrated in one area or spread out in several locations?”

“Spread out across both Scotland and England, but the majority of my holdings are in this area. The extended holiday stay here allows me to look in on things.”

“A little cold to be touring properties.”

“Cold, indeed,” Lucas admitted, “however, not too cold to meet with tenants and discuss issues.”

“Oh, you meet with them in person?”

“I do, I try to keep up with it. I believe face-to-face dealings done with a smile and a handshake make all the difference. Many of my fellow land investors have done away with all that. They only see numbers in their books. I see people. Each person has a story, triumphs, and trials. It’s important to be cognizant of them. Several colleagues solely review their books, toss a tenant out if they aren't meeting their due. That's quite unfair if you ask me, perhaps something happened, perhaps this is only temporary. I prefer to speak with them, determine what can be worked out. Losing a tenant is an inconvenience, but for the tenant, losing their home or livelihood can be a great deal worse."

"That's a very honorable take on land management. And a more than respectable practice," Jack noted.

"We're all here to help one another. I've been rather fortunate in my life. I'd like to share that good fortune with others."

"What a kind sentiment, Lucas," Cate commented.

Amelia smiled at her. "If you gentlemen are quite finished discussing business, perhaps a change of subject is in order. Poor Cate and I are sitting here like bumps on a log!"

"Prettiest bumps on logs I've ever seen, wouldn't you agree, Jack?" Lucas asked with a grin.

"Quite," Jack answered.

"Well, what have you in mind, Amelia? We can't very well talk dresses with you ladies. We're out of our depths there," Lucas replied.

"I don't agree. One can still appreciate beauty whether or not one understands how it is achieved. Cate, you seem to have quite a sense of fashion. I've enjoyed many of your ensembles, both day and evening."

"Thank you. I suppose I inherited it."

"Was your mother very into fashion, then?" Amelia queried.

"All those preceding me have been. They've paved the way for my choices, you could say."

Cate was spared any further clothing discussion as their food arrived. Amelia spent a few more minutes discussing recent changes in clothing styles, from hemlines to dress cuts. Conversation then turned to the delicious meals and plans for the afternoon.

"And how are the fish and chips in our little town, Cate?" Lucas inquired. "Are they quite up to your standard?"

"They are," Cate assured him. "It was an excellent choice if I do say so myself."

Her comment earned a chuckle from Jack, who realized the extent of her enjoyment of the pub's fish and chips. Since Cate's arrival in Dunhaven months earlier, she'd ordered nothing but that particular dish at the pub.

The group finished their meal before emerging from the pub into the chilly winter air. Despite the nip in the air, the sun shined bright in the cloudless blue sky.

“What a delightful winter day,” Lucas commented. “Do you plan to do much shopping in town?” he inquired of Cate and Jack.

“No,” Cate responded. “Just window shopping.”

“Oh!” Amelia exclaimed. “They’re skating on the pond. Shall we try?”

“I’m afraid I’ve never skated before,” Cate admitted.

“Then today is the perfect day to change that!” Amelia replied, grabbing Cate’s hand and pulling her toward the pond. Cate allowed Amelia to drag her toward the pond, issuing a helpless glance back at Jack.

“Amelia quite likes your quiet nature,” Lucas commented as they approached the skate rental trolley. “If you’re not careful, she’ll have you racing cars next or the like.”

“That’s quite a leap from ice skating,” Amelia chided jokingly.

Lucas insisted on treating everyone to the skate rentals and they sat down to strap the blades to their feet on a nearby bench. “Are you an experienced skater, Jack?”

“Yes,” Jack responded. “Though I haven’t skated in a while.”

Amelia stood up, stepping onto the frozen lake. “Come on, Cate, put your feet right onto the ice and get a feel for your skates.”

Cate stood on wobbly legs holding tight to Amelia’s hands.

“Now, we’ll begin by just pulling you around a bit. Don’t worry, we won’t let you go, will we, Jack?”

With a grin, Amelia began pulling Cate across the expanse of the icy pond with Jack’s help.

Lucas skated toward them. “You’re doing quite well, Cate. You’ve got excellent balance.”

“Are you ready to try a bit of skating on your own? We won’t let you go. Just push a bit with your feet,” Amelia instructed.

Cate pushed a bit too much, toppling them in a heap. Cate apologized, wide-eyed and concerned about Amelia.

Amelia laughed the incident off. “I didn’t expect you to skate without taking at least one spill. I’m no worse for wear, now, come on, let’s try again.”

Jack, who had recovered from his fall already, pulled both ladies to their feet.

“Just a tiny push,” Amelia said.

Cate gave a gentle push, tempering her movement this time.

“There you go, Cate!” Jack exclaimed. “Now, you’ve got it.”

Cate offered a nervous grin. “I haven’t toppled you a second time. Yet! But I’m far from having it down,” she admitted, still clinging to both their hands.

“So, I can let go, right?” Jack joked.

“NO!” Cate shouted, tightening her grip.

Jack chuckled, looping his arm around her waist. “Don’t worry, Cate. I won’t let you go.”

Amelia grinned at them. “You’re progressing nicely, I agree.”

Cate smiled at her, gaining confidence as they looped around the pond. After two loops, Cate gained enough courage to tell Amelia she could skate with Lucas.

“Are you sure? I won’t leave you if you’re still unsure.”

Cate nodded. “I’m sure. Go have fun.”

“I won’t leave her,” Jack chimed in.

They made their way around the pond several more times. While concentrating on her skating, Cate snuck a few glances at Amelia and Lucas skating around the pond together. “They seem to be enjoying themselves.”

“Yes,” Jack responded. “Are you?”

Cate nodded with a smile. “I am, yes. I’d prefer not to fall again but I’m enjoying myself.”

“Okay, just checking. If you get tired, let me know, I’ll drag you to the bench.”

“Okay. What about you? Tired of dragging me around yet?”

“No, Lady Cate, I am not.”

They made several more passes around the pond before Amelia and Lucas joined them. Cate let go of Jack’s hand after a few rounds, skating on her own. Jack remained watchful of her, keeping her upright when she wobbled.

“You’ve made a vast improvement!” Lucas noted, approaching Cate.

“Look, no hands!” Cate quipped, waving her hands in the air as she glided along on her own.

“Getting confident!” Amelia noted, applauding.

“A tad,” Cate admitted. The foursome made another four passes, testing Cate’s new skating skills. After the last one, they collapsed on the bench together in a heap, all smiles.

“What did you think, Cate? Did you find it fun?” Amelia asked as they removed their blades.

“I did. And thank you for teaching me,” she responded.

“You’re quite a good student,” Lucas noted. Amelia nodded in agreement.

Lucas checked his pocket watch. “We should go back to change for dinner.”

“Goodness!” Amelia exclaimed, grabbing hold of the watch, “I didn’t realize how long we’d lingered. Oh, I hope this doesn’t present a problem for dinner dressing.” She glanced to Cate and Jack.

“I’m sure we’ll make it and anyway, it was good fun!” Cate responded.

“Come along,” Lucas coaxed. “Williams is meeting us at the town’s center.”

They trudged up the hill to the town, navigating down the main street. The foursome piled into the car which whisked them to the castle. As they entered, a maid passed by the foyer.

“Oh, has the dressing gong rung yet?” Amelia asked the girl.

“Aye, ma’am. About thirty minutes ago.”

“We’d better go straight away then,” Amelia answered, glancing to the rest of them. “See you soon.” She squeezed Cate’s hand. They raced up the stairs, each going to their suites.

Cate blazed a trail straight to her suitcase, digging through it and pulling out two dresses. She held one up in each hand, studying them.

Jack collapsed on the bed with his suit. After a few breaths, he sat up. “If you’re going to stand there pondering your choice all day, I’m going to call first dibs on the bathroom!”

Cate smirked at him. “I now have a reputation to maintain!”

Jack laughed. “That you do. Nice side-stepping on the conversation. ‘It runs in my family.’”

“Ha! Thank you! Although I can’t touch your seamless fabrications, Oxford man.”

“Hey, if you’re going to fib, you may as well do it right. Besides, it’s only half a fib.”

“Half a fib?”

“Yes,” Jack answered as he backed his way toward the bathroom. “I did go to Oxford. Two semesters.”

Cate raised her eyebrows. "Really? You're full of surprises!"

"Aye," Jack agreed. "I hated it and dropped out. I may have stayed if the professors were as pretty as you." He winked at her, disappearing into the bathroom.

Cate giggled, turning her attention back to the dresses. She selected the royal blue, silver beaded dress, tossing the burgundy back into the suitcase as Jack emerged from the bathroom.

"Have you made your choice? I moved as slow as I could."

"Yes, I made my choice. And I expect Amelia will be pleased!" Cate disappeared into the bathroom. She pulled off her day clothes, hanging the dress on a towel bar. She shimmied into the evening dress and took a few moments to fix her hair. Her skating excursion, while fun, left her hair a disheveled mess. She tamed it back into a low chignon. She adjusted her dress, smoothing it and adding a necklace. Satisfied, she emerged from the bathroom and sat on the bed to pull her shoes on.

"Whew, we're just going to make it!" Jack announced.

"We'll be late. This buckle can be tricky," Cate retorted, fiddling with the t-strap shoe.

"Here, let me," Jack offered, kneeling on the floor in front of her. He set her shoe on his knee, buckling the strap after his second try. "There."

"Saved the day," Cate said as he pulled her to standing. "Thank you."

"I don't want to be late. I'm hungry."

Cate pulled on her gloves as they exited the room and navigated to the sitting room. Amelia and Lucas had also just arrived. They were offering their apologies for their lateness along with those of Jack and Cate. Amelia insisted it was their fault.

"No harm done," Rory stated. "Though we should forego cocktails."

"Of course," Amelia agreed. "Shall we go straight in?"

"Yes, that might be wise," Anne agreed. They filed into the dining room, taking their seats.

"What caused you to run late, Amelia?" Anne inquired over the first course.

"We went into town earlier for lunch. Then went skating on the pond," Amelia responded.

"What fun!" Rory exclaimed. "Did you enjoy it?"

"Very much so," Amelia answered. "Cate hadn't skated before. I insisted she try. So, you see, it is rather my fault we were late."

Anne's eyebrows raised as she turned her gaze to Cate. "Did you enjoy it, Cate?"

"I did," Cate admitted. "I was unsure but found it to be enjoyable."

"Well, you are more adventurous than I, Cate," Anne admitted. "I've never tried, though Amelia attempts to talk me into it every season."

"Oh, she's exceptionally adventurous, this lassie," Jack chimed in.

"Perhaps it's the American in you," Lucas suggested.

"One day, we'll make a skater of you, too," Amelia teased Anne.

The conversation continued on to winter sports, weather, travel and Amelia and Lucas' upcoming departure. Dinner sped by, with Cate enjoying the company and relaxing with her family.

Cate and Jack stayed for one post-dinner drink before retiring for the evening. Cate cited her sore muscles for her early night. She and Jack returned to their suite, changing back to their day clothes before using the timepiece to return to their time.

"Whew! What a day!" Jack announced as they returned.

"Yeah and it's only... nine forty-eight... in the morning!" Cate announced, citing the mere forty-eight minutes that had passed in the present during the twelve hours they spent in the past.

"I'm ready for bed. And it's still morning!"

Cate nodded. "Well, perhaps you should take a nice long nap when you get home."

"Aye, though I'd like to go over the information we received today. The note Gould received... this could be the break we've been hoping for."

CHAPTER 31

“It may be a little too good of a break,” Cate said as she recalled the note Forsythe passed to them. “We can head down to the library.

We should have plenty of time to discuss it before your Sunday dinner with your grandfather.”

“Why don’t you join us for dinner. Pap sure won’t mind. And he’ll most likely be interested in our little investigation.”

“Oh,” Cate hedged, her brows wrinkling in thought. “I wouldn’t want to impose. It’s your time with your grandfather. Plus, I’ve got the dogs. I hate to leave them.”

“It’s no imposition. Pap loves you. Pap also loves your dogs. And he’s got a nice yard for them to frolic in. Besides, I won’t take no for an answer.”

Cate grinned at him, arching an eyebrow. “Oh, is that right? I suppose I’d better just agree then!”

“You suppose right, Lady Cate! Now, we’ll change and meet downstairs. We’ll head down early and help him cook.”

“Okay,” Cate agreed.

Jack left her to change.

She selected an outfit, carrying it into the bathroom. She hung her dress on the towel bar, leaving it for later to put away. She fixed her hair into a suitable style for the present time before touching up her makeup.

After exiting, she made her way to the sitting room and pulled on her boots. “How about a field trip, boys? Want to go to Jack’s grandfather’s?”

Riley agreed at the mention of Jack's name. Bailey, beginning to become excited when Riley did, leapt to his feet as well.

Cate ushered both dogs from the room. They raced ahead of her down the hall, barreling down the stairs to a waiting Jack. Cate pulled on her coat, slipping harnesses and leashes on both dogs. "I think I remember where your grandfather lives, but I'll follow you just in case."

"Nonsense," Jack said, swatting the air with his hand. "I'll drive."

"Then you'll have to bring me back, that's silly! I'm capable of driving. I even stay on the correct side of the road most times!"

"Hmm," Jack considered it, his hand on his chin. "Yes, I'd have to drive you back. That would take hours..."

Cate rolled her eyes at him, chuckling.

Jack continued, "May even have to stay overnight before I drive back..."

"Oh, stop," Cate said, batting at him. "Fine, fine, I'll let you drive."

They escorted the pups outside and into Jack's car. Within a matter of minutes, they were pulling up to the little cottage on the outskirts of town. Riley and Bailey reveled in the new scents as they explored every inch of the front yard before trotting to the front door.

"Well, Lady Cate!" Stanley Reid called from the doorway. "Hello!"

"Hello, Mr. Reid. I hope you don't mind my joining you for dinner!"

"Not at all, come in, come in! Add a little beauty to the meal. Better than staring at this big lug all day," Mr. Reid teased, jerking his thumb toward Jack. "Besides, can't have you eating cereal for dinner."

"Thank you for having me," Cate replied, stepping through the door. "And despite what Jack tells you, I don't always eat cereal for dinner."

"Eighty percent of the time then," Jack mentioned with a wink. "The kind with the marshmallows and the cartoon leprechaun on the box."

"And you brought the little pups. Hello, boys! When Jackie texted me you were coming, I set aside two bones for you pups."

"Aw, thank you, Mr. Reid, that's very kind of you," Cate said. "What a treat for you boys!"

Riley pranced into the living room, settling down next to the wall heater in the room.

"Little laddie has made himself right at home. Come on, Mr. Bailey, come over here by your buddy." Jack led him over, settling him near Riley.

“Been time traveling, eh?” Mr. Reid questioned as they headed to the kitchen. “When to?”

“Yes,” Cate responded. “1925.”

“Ah, the jewelry theft,” Mr. Reid commented, mixing a few spices together.

“That’s correct. Anything I can help with?”

“Just sit yourself down, lassie,” Jack answered, joining them. “We’ll handle it.”

“I can help, I’m not that much of a disaster in the kitchen.”

“You’ll help by sitting down and telling me what your investigation has shown so far,” Mr. Reid insisted.

Cate sank into a chair at the kitchen table. “All right, all right!”

“Who have you identified as suspects?” Stanley asked as he sprinkled his mixed spices over cubed potatoes.

“A groom named Thomas Gould is our primary suspect,” Jack replied, tenderizing meat.

“Or Lucas MacKenzie.”

“Lucas? Rory’s brother?” Stanley inquired.

“Yes, my great-grandfather.”

“Though neither of us believe he did it,” Jack insisted.

“Nay, I wouldn’t imagine he did,” Stanley agreed.

“Why do you say that, Mr. Reid?” Cate queried.

“Didn’t seem the type. I met Lucas a few times. Good, decent fellow, he seemed.”

“We arrived at the same conclusion after spending some time with him. Speaking of great-grandparents, I met Lachlan.”

Stanley Reid stopped in his tracks, staring at Jack. “You don’t say. And how was dear dad, Jackie?”

“Very friendly. We had a great conversation. Rory put all the pieces of the puzzle together pretty fast and realized we were time travelers,” Jack mentioned with a roll of his eyes. “By extension, Lachlan is also aware.”

Stanley shook his head, amazed by the experience Jack related. “Truly a gift we’ve been blessed with.”

“That’s what I said!” Cate exclaimed.

“Time traveling is growing on me,” Jack admitted.

Mr. Reid spread the potatoes on a baking sheet, popping it into the refrigerator. “Why do you suspect Lucas?”

“We found a note. Anne MacKenzie wrote it. Oh, I should have brought it!” Cate planted her palm against her forehead. “In short, it spoke to an unnamed family member about how shocked Anne was that the family member could have stolen so much from her family. She mentions a theft, and she details how angry she is about it.”

“Who is it addressed to?”

“No name,” Cate responded. “The note mentions she cannot bear to write their name she loathes them so much.”

“Odd,” Stanley replied, cutting celery for a salad.

“You know, I can chop celery. I feel useless over here,” Cate mentioned.

“I won’t have it, lassie,” Stanley repeated.

Jack issued her a wry glance.

“Really, I’m fine. I can get myself a glass of water.”

“Nay, Lady Cate, you’re a guest! We can do better than a mere glass of water.” He set about making her a warm cuppa.

“Okay,” Mr. Reid said, returning to the previous discussion as he settled down at the table with Cate after placing the roast in the oven. “Based on Anne’s note, you fingered Lucas as a suspect. But neither of you really expects he did it.”

“I hope he didn’t for personal reasons. But beyond that, after we investigated, I cannot imagine him or Amelia doing it. They both seem like wonderful, honest people!”

“Aye, I’d agree with that sentiment,” the elder Mr. Reid commented as Jack placed a piping hot cup of tea in front of him too.

“You said you met Lucas?” Cate inquired.

“Aye,” the man confirmed. “Much later than 1925, mind you, but I met him on a few occasions. He seemed a good, honest man, as you noted.”

“At the castle?” Cate questioned.

Cate’s brow furrowed. “So... Lucas and Amelia continued to travel here many years later.”

Jack sat down with his cuppa. “Which all but confirms their innocence despite Anne’s note.”

Cate remained silent for a moment, considering it. “Yeah, I must agree. Given that they traveled here for years after points to their innocence. With the rhetoric in Anne's letter, I doubt they'd have been invited back if they were guilty."

"No, they'd have become estranged," Jack added.

"So that leaves your other suspect, Thomas Gould," Stanley Reid concluded.

"Aye, Pap, it does," Jack agreed. "And the evidence against him is compelling."

"Let's hear your case against him."

"He has no alibi. And we have a rather incriminating note that's been given to us suggesting he has the jewelry and intends to sell it. Those two items along with some brash statements he's made about coming into enough money to start a restaurant in London round out our full case against him."

"How did you come about this information?"

"The police accused Anne's ladies' maid of the crime. Remind Jack to fill you in on his new burgeoning legal career, by the way! When we visited her while she was in custody, she told us Rory's valet, Mr. Calhoun, was ill the night of the theft. We then questioned the staff. During that process, we found that Mr. Calhoun, who is Thomas Gould's roommate, was out of the room for part of the night. Leaving both Mr. Calhoun and Thomas without an alibi for a portion of the night."

"A fact that Mr. Gould failed to mention to Cate when she spoke with him. So, either he didn't realize his roommate was gone because he was asleep or because he wasn't in the room," Jack chimed in.

Cate nodded as she sipped her tea. "Right. After that, we focused our time and energy on Gould and Calhoun. We asked the under-butler, Forsythe, to provide any information he could. After a few inquiries, he found that most considered it a stretch that Robert Calhoun could have stolen the jewelry given his honest nature. However, Mr. Gould enjoyed gambling and drinking."

"While it's a character flaw, it's not a reason to accuse him," Mr. Reid interjected.

"No," Jack answered, "but he tends to run his mouth when he drinks and plays. And he told his gambling buddies he'd soon be coming into money to open a restaurant in London."

Cate nodded again. "Which he opens mere months after leaving Dunhaven!"

“And he leaves Dunhaven only months after the theft,” Jack added.

Cate’s voice rose with excitement and her speech became rushed. “And... Forsythe had Calhoun search his room and he found a note asking if he was ready to sell the jewelry.”

Mr. Reid considered the information. “The evidence does point to him.”

Cate nodded, and they fell silent for several breaths.

Mr. Reid narrowed his eyes at them. “Yet something is bothering you about it.”

Cate nodded again to confirm Stanley’s suspicions. “Two things, really. First, it seems too convenient. Second, Anne’s note doesn’t fit with Gould as a culprit.”

“Too convenient?” Jack queried. “We’ve almost got him dead to rights.”

Cate shook her head. “No. Forsythe said Calhoun found the note in his room. But he found it after we searched the room!”

Jack’s eyebrows raised, and he glanced to Cate. “And the note wasn’t there when you searched his things?”

Cate shook her head again. “Nope. And besides, would you keep such an incriminating piece of evidence in your room? The police have searched the house several times.”

“Perhaps he felt untouchable. The police are focused on Lillian Murray only.”

Cate shook her head, crossing her arms over her chest as she leaned back in the chair. “I didn’t overlook that note. It’s fake.”

“By whom?”

Cate considered it. “It couldn’t have been anyone but Forsythe or Calhoun. Only they were involved.”

“That we know of,” Jack responded.

“That’s where this falls apart. Why would either of them fake the note? Or ask someone else to fake it?”

“Because one of them is the guilty party,” Stanley Reid deduced.

Cate scrunched her brow, considering his conclusion. “Calhoun or Forsythe? Hmm.”

“Forsythe was on the original suspect list, Cate,” Jack reminded her.

“Yes,” Cate agreed. “And he was adamant about pinning this on Gould. When we didn’t jump on the first tale about the restaurant, he gave us the note. Perhaps he wrote the note, in an effort to make the case stronger.”

“Looks like you two have more investigating to do,” Stanley suggested after checking his roast.

“Aye, looks like it, Pap,” Jack agreed.

The older man plopped into his chair. “What’s this about your blossoming law career, Jackie?”

Jack let out a loud laugh and shook his head. “Aye, I’m quite the legal genius. I’ve already gotten a man off on a murder case, and now I’m working on keeping Lillian Murray out of jail for a crime she didn’t commit.”

Mr. Reid wrinkled his brow, glancing between Cate and Jack. After a moment, he raised his brows. “You really are blooming as an attorney!”

“I’d expect no less from a man who graduated top of his class at Oxford,” Cate said with a wink.

Mr. Reid roared with laughter. “You do it big when you do it, don’t you, Jackie?”

“Aye,” Jack agreed, joining into the laughter. “I told Lady Cate, if we’re going to lie, might as well make it a damn good one.”

“All joking aside,” Cate added, after her laughter subsided, “he may have missed his calling.”

“What was that you said, Jackie? Legal genius?” Mr. Reid replied, still chuckling. “Ah, perhaps, but he didn’t miss his calling. His place is right here with us and you, Lady Cate.”

Cate smiled at the older man. “I couldn’t agree more.”

They continued their conversation as Jack and Mr. Reid prepared a few more items for the dinner then settled down for an early afternoon meal. Riley and Bailey gathered around the table, gnawing on the bones provided by Stanley Reid.

Cate was not only impressed by Stanley’s roast, but also by his dessert-making skills. After the meal, Mr. Reid served a delicious Cranachan, a traditional Scottish dessert. Despite it being “out of season” for the dessert, Mr. Reid insisted he make it once he learned Cate would join them for dinner.

“With cooking like this, Mr. Reid, I may come here every Sunday,” Cate said as she polished off her dessert.

“Better than your cereal?” Jack asked.

“Mmm, yes, even the marshmallow kind.”

The trio continued their conversation while cleaning up after their meal, a task Cate insisted on participating in. They settled in the living room afterward, enjoying each other's company. In the late afternoon, Jack returned Cate to the castle for the evening.

"Well, I suppose we'll try our other avenue tomorrow afternoon. Follow up on Pap's idea that either Forsythe or Calhoun are the culprit," Jack promised as they drove up the drive.

"Yes. This is quite the conundrum. Other than money, what reasoning is there? And how does it tie in with Anne's note?"

Jack shrugged as he eased the car to a stop in front of the castle. "I hope we can find out."

"Me too! Well, I'll see you tomorrow. Enjoy the rest of your day off."

"Thanks, Lady Cate. Enjoy your evening. And you too, Riley and Bailey." Jack gave each a pat on the head before they jumped from the car, racing to the front door. Cate ushered them into the castle, waving to Jack as he pulled away.

She climbed the stairs, the two pups racing in front of her toward their suite. Quietness filled the castle. Molly must not have returned yet. Cate entered the room, crossing to her bedroom and bathroom. Despite the early hour, she planned on changing for bed and relaxing for the rest of the evening. The extra twelve hours added to her day exhausted her. She turned in early, hoping for a restful night.

Cate slept straight through to the alarm. It buzzed at her, startling her awake. Groggy, she slapped the snooze button, rolling over for ten more minutes. The alarm screamed again, waking a dozing Cate. She groaned but dragged herself from her bed.

She stifled a yawn as she slogged into the kitchen. "Good morning."

"Good morning, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser answered. "Are you alright?"

"Yeah," Molly added, "you look pale."

"Aye, Molly. I noticed the same. You may be coming down with something, Lady Cate!"

"Oh, no," Cate responded, waving their concern away with her hand. "I didn't sleep well. Still waking up."

"Trouble sleeping?" Mrs. Fraser questioned. "Everything all right?"

"A little. Must be getting too much rest and not enough exercise," Cate fibbed.

“With all that walking you do with Riley and Bailey?” Molly inquired. “You get plenty of exercise!”

“I’ll sleep like the dead tonight, I bet!” Cate responded. Jack and Mr. Fraser entered the kitchen as Mrs. Fraser set out the last of the breakfast.

“Well, I’d recommend you join us for a cuppa after breakfast. It’ll help with your muddled mind from the lack of sleep.”

“I will take you up on that,” Cate agreed.

After finishing breakfast, Mrs. Fraser and Molly bustled about the kitchen cleaning up before making tea. Cate rose to help clear the table, but Mrs. Fraser put her firmly back in her seat, insisting she appeared too weak for physical labor.

Cate waited for her tea, stacking dishes, and shoving them to the edge of the table to make it easier for the women to retrieve.

“You’re bound and determined to do work, aren’t you, Lady Cate?” Mrs. Fraser asked.

“I’m not ill! I’m capable of doing a little.”

“We’ll have it cleaned up in no time,” Mrs. Fraser insisted.

It wasn’t long before Cate had a piping hot cup of tea in front of her, along with one of Mrs. Fraser’s famous shortbreads.

“Mmm,” Molly murmured, munching on one. “When are you going to teach me to bake these?”

“Soon enough. When you’re ready.”

“I’m more than ready,” Molly assured her. “I need to learn how to make these in case I eat them all before you bake more.”

Cate giggled at Molly’s statement. “How was your day trip yesterday, Molly?”

“Wonderful! I don’t expect I’ll ever get tired of this country!”

Molly discussed all aspects of her sightseeing with Cate and Mrs. Fraser. She’d done quite a bit in one day. Not put off by the cold, she scouted several nearby sights and noted several she wanted to explore further in warmer weather. Molly babbled on over tea, encouraging Cate to come with her on one of her expeditions and see the countryside. Cate promised to do that once the weather improved, ceding that the dogs would love the trip.

After tea, Cate retreated to her room, using her time to work. She stared at her computer screen with glazed eyes. Only adrenaline and anticipation for her upcoming trip kept her awake. After a while, she slammed the laptop shut, opting for a walk with the dogs to fill her time before lunch.

After lunch, Cate began her preparations to return to the past. She swept her hair into a 1920s-appropriate style. Her dress from the previous day remained hanging on her towel bar.

Cate pulled it down, and it slipped from her fingers, splaying onto the bathroom floor.

“Of course,” Cate mumbled, bending to retrieve it. She grasped it by the hem, pulling it upward. As she attempted to untangle it and turn it right-side up, something slid from the pocket, clattering to the floor. She glanced at the object, confusion crossing her face.

She set the dress aside in a heap, reaching for the envelope laying on the floor. She turned it over in her hands, recalling shoving it in her pocket the day before.

The name on the envelope read Mr. Lorne Peterson. Cate sank onto the edge of the tub. Who was Lorne Peterson, she wondered? Why did Forsythe have a letter addressed to him? He wasn’t sending the letter to Lorne Peterson, the letter had already been delivered.

With a deep inhale, Cate opened the missive and unfolded it. Her brow furrowed as she read:

My darling Lorne,

How I cannot wait to see you! Do you have them? Are they as beautiful as I’m imagining? Oh! To have such luxuries! But one day, my darling, one day we shall!

Love, please let me try them on before you rid us of them! Could we keep just one of them? Surely selling only one piece would give us enough money to live the good life! I could wear one when you take me out on the town. How lovely I would look. Like a grand lady!

Oh, but I know we can’t keep them. Sadly, we must sell them. At least once they’re gone, you’ll have something from your family beyond just a dull name. They owe you, love. You’ve been robbed of your due.

When can I see you? Please say before you sell those little beauties! I want to try it on just once, please, my love? Write when you can.

Ever yours,

Trixie

XOXOXO

Cate stared at the letter, confusion on her face. She raced into her sitting room, pulling open her folder listing all the servants in the household during 1925. She scanned the list, running her finger down the page. No listings existed for Lorne Peterson.

She wrinkled her brow and tightened her lips together. Something wasn't adding up. Why did Forsythe have this note? What did it mean? What luxuries was the mysterious Trixie referring to?

CHAPTER 32

A knock at the door interrupted Cate's musings. She rushed to the door, greeting a prepared Jack.

"Not ready?" he surmised, eyeing Cate still in her normal clothes.

She shook her head. "No, but come in."

"Change in plans?" he asked, stepping into the room and bending to pet the two dogs.

"Not really. But something interesting came up. As I was about to change, this note slipped out of my pocket. I'd forgotten about it after I pocketed it yesterday!"

"Ohhhh, the note Forsythe dropped? I'd forgotten about it, too."

"Yes. Well, anyway, it dropped out of my pocket, and I again wondered why Forsythe had it. Who is Lorne Peterson? Long story short, I read it."

"What did it say?"

Cate took a deep breath before shoving it toward him. "Here you read it. I want your take without my thoughts mixed in. I don't want to influence your opinion"

Cate paced the floor as Jack read the note. "Well?" she queried the moment he glanced up from the missive.

"I'm confused. Who are these people? And what are they talking about? And why does Forsythe have this note?"

"Same questions I had. The first thing I figured was one or both of them were servants at the house in 1925 and Forsythe, for whatever reason, confiscated the note from them. But..." Cate paused, grabbing the staff list from her folder, "there are no Lornes or Trixies on the staff in 1925."

"Perhaps Lorne is a friend of Forsythe?"

"Why give him the letter?" Cate inquired.

"Show off to his friend? Brag about his girlfriend?"

Cate shot him a glance. "That seems a bit of a stretch. I couldn't answer the who question. So, I moved on to the next obvious question: what are they talking about? What are the luxuries?"

"Could be anything," Jack replied with a shrug.

Cate paced around, biting her lower lip in thought. "Or..." she said, her mind churning in thought as her eyes grew wide, "or do they refer to something we know?"

"Like what?"

"Like the missing jewelry."

Jack stared at the note, scanning it again. "I mean it could..."

Cate sidled next to him, peering over his shoulder. "Could? It's pretty possible. Consider how she refers to these objects: beautiful, luxuries, let's sell one piece, I'll wear the other out on the town and look like a grand lady. What does a woman wear that she refers to as a beautiful luxury, that she'd wear out on the town to look like a grand lady?"

Jack shook his head as though he had no clue. "Oh, come on, think, Jack."

"Luxurious clothing? A fur coat? Yeah, jewelry. It could be jewelry, sure."

"Okay, so this note could refer to the stolen jewelry. She asks Lorne if he has it. Which means Lorne, whoever he is, is the guilty party. And it fits with Anne's note. Look here!" Cate exclaimed, pointing to a specific statement. "You'll have something from your family beyond that dull name! This implies Lorne is related to the MacKenzies somehow."

Jack remained silent, deep in thought. Cate cocked her head, biting her lower lip again. She glanced up to Jack, wide-eyed again.

"What?"

"This implies Lorne is related to the MacKenzies," she repeated. "Lorne... related to the MacKenzies... Lorne... MacKenzie. Lorne MacKenzie!"

Jack glanced around the room. "Randolph's brother?"

Cate nodded.

“Cate, he’d be ancient if he’s still alive!”

“No, he can’t be Lorne himself. That’s obvious,” Cate answered, pacing. “Lorne’s son? No... no! Lorne’s grandson! Yes, that must be it! Lorne’s grandson!”

Jack knit his brows. “You’re jumping to some big conclusions here, Cate.”

Cate shrugged. “The note references taking something from his family, so he gets more than the stupid name. His name is Lorne. It can’t be a coincidence that there is a Lorne MacKenzie in the family tree.”

“Perhaps it’s the Peterson family Trixie is referring to?” Jack questioned.

Cate shook her head, disagreeing. “It can’t be a coincidence. There are far too many of those. The note refers to something luxurious... the jewelry. It refers to taking something owed to him from the family... Lorne’s family. Lorne’s children probably received nothing in the will. We know he had a reputation as a womanizer. Victoria confirmed that to me. It’s likely they were bastard children, anyway.”

“I still think it’s a stretch, Cate. And even if you’re correct, who is Lorne? Thomas Gould? Robert Calhoun? How can we find out?”

Cate considered it for a moment. A grin crossed her face and her pulse quickened. “No. Charles Forsythe!” She grabbed her laptop, plopping onto the chaise.

“How do you figure?”

“He’s the only one I couldn’t find anything out about when I researched them online! I found no information at all. Because he’s using a fake name!” Cate’s fingers flew over the keyboard. “Just as I suspected!”

“What?” Jack moved to peer over her shoulder.

“When I search Lorne Peterson, I find results. Death date, birth date. But when I try Charles Forsythe, nothing. I mean, I get results, but there’s nothing that fits with our Charles Forsythe.”

“Hmm,” Jack mused aloud.

“He must be Lorne Peterson. He’s hiding his identity because he’s related to the family.”

“Still,” Jack replied, “it’s a stretch. So, you have the name Lorne. Do you really think he and his grandfather were the only ones with that name?”

“No, but perhaps it was still too close for comfort. Or perhaps the Peterson name is known by the family. They may have kept tabs on Lorne’s progeny.”

Jack remained unconvinced, a fact obvious from his expression.

“Okay, Mr. Skeptical, what else makes sense? Who is Lorne? What does this note refer to?”

Jack sighed, pondering her queries for a moment. “I suppose you’re right. This is the most likely scenario given the information we have.”

Cate smiled at him.

“But,” he continued, “we have limited information. This is hardly a smoking gun and we’re making a lot of assumptions about who Lorne Peterson is and how he’s related to the family.”

“You’re right,” Cate answered, closing the laptop, and jumping to her feet. She paced the floor. “We need more proof. And we’re going to get it!”

Jack rubbed a hand across his face. “I hate the sound of this.”

“We’ve got to return to 1925 and pursue this.”

“How?”

“First, we prove the incriminating note is a fake. Then we need to get proof against Forsythe, a. k. a. Lorne. Perhaps search his things?”

“Ugh. Yep, I hate this plan.”

“We must get proof. We can’t go to the police or even Rory without it. Rory will never believe us, especially if we come with the story about this being a cousin of his.”

Jack sighed. “Well, I suppose you better get changed and we better get this horrendous plan underway.”

She raced to the bathroom, pulling on her dress. She slid her ring and shoes on, hurrying to buckle them before dashing to the bedroom and calling for Jack. “Let’s go!”

“You are way too excited.”

“We’re on to something, Jack. This is the break we’ve been hoping for!” She held out the timepiece, and they activated it, traveling back to 1925. “Okay, let’s get going!”

“How do you plan to prove this note is fake?”

“Try to get a handwriting sample from Forsythe. Once we do that, we can compare them. If it matches, we’ll move on to part two of the plan.”

“Searching Forsythe’s room? Ugh. I hate taking this risk, but okay, let’s go!”

Cate grinned at him, hurrying from the bedroom, across the sitting room, and into the hallway. She charged down the hall, making her way straight down to the servant's area. She sought Forsythe, finding him in Benson's office, decanting the wine to be used for dinner.

"Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie!" he greeted them. "Have you been able to discuss the new evidence with the police?"

"Ah," Cate hesitated, glancing at Jack. "We are about to present our case to them, but we want all our ducks in a row. The police will, without doubt, want to verify any name mentioned in the note you provided us. Would you provide us with a list of all male staff members?"

Forsythe paused a moment, before nodding his head. "Yes, of course, Mrs. MacKenzie."

"I hate to be a bother," Cate pressed, "but we'd like to gather the information now and speak with the police as soon as possible. I'm sure you understand."

"Oh, yes, of course."

"Just a handwritten note will do, thank you," Cate instructed.

Forsythe offered a brief smile, pulling a piece of paper from Benson's desk drawer and scrawling a list. "This is all of them. I hope you find it helpful and that this soon is behind us." He held the note out toward them.

Cate smiled at him, accepting the note. She glanced at it. "Yes, this will be most helpful. Thank you. With any luck, we'll have this wrapped up soon!"

Cate and Jack left the man to his wine, climbing the stairs and entering the sitting room. They found the room empty. Cate pulled the note Forsythe provided yesterday and held it next to the staff list written today.

Jack peered over her shoulder. "What's it look like?"

Cate squinted her eyes, peering back and forth between both notes. After a moment, she responded, "I'm no expert, but I'd say the same person wrote both notes. What do you think?"

Jack stared a moment longer. "I'd say it's a match. And that's my expert Oxford opinion talking."

"I agree with your expert Oxford opinion. See the 'o' here and here. And 't's' are the same, crossed at an angle."

"Yeah," Jack agreed. "And the 'P' is a near identical match to the note."

"So, this note," Cate said, holding the so-called evidence up higher, "is a fake."

“A fake written by Charles Forsythe to lay the blame on someone else.”

“Which puts Charles Forsythe at the top of our list.”

“Yes, I’d agree.”

Cate tapped her chin. “Now we need more evidence of his involvement, or at least his motive.”

“This is the part I dread.”

“Well...” Cate began when the door opened across the room, interrupting her. Amelia and Lucas entered the room. Cate folded the notes, shoving them into her pocket and pasting a smile onto her face.

“Cate!” Amelia exclaimed, rushing toward her. She pulled Cate into her arms in a tight hug. “Just the person I’ve been searching for.”

“Oh?” Cate inquired, pulling back from her great-grandmother.

“Yes. I wanted to show you the dress I mentioned last night at cocktails. Do you have a minute now?”

“W-Well...” Cate stuttered. She glanced at Jack.

“Oh, it won’t take but a moment and I do want you to see it.”

“And, Jack,” Lucas added. “I had a few land questions I hoped to gather your input on. This will give us the perfect opportunity. I suspect Amelia’s ‘moment’ may last quite a bit longer than that. Women and fashion and all that!” He laughed at his joke.

Jack joined in. “Yes, I dare say we’ll have enough time.”

He winked at Cate. “Go on, dear, enjoy your fashion while we talk business.”

Cate wrinkled her nose at him but faked a laugh and told Amelia to lead the way. They left the men pouring brandies in the sitting room and sitting down to business.

“Did I interrupt something?” Amelia questioned as they climbed the stairs.

“No,” Cate fibbed. “We were going over our wish list for sightseeing!”

“Ah! Have you ticked all your boxes yet?”

“Not quite. There is one additional item left to be ticked.”

“Well, I hope you have time to visit it. If not, we’ll have to ask Rory and Anne to have you back next year for the holidays. They’ve both enjoyed your visit, as have Lucas and I.”

“We’ve enjoyed it, too,” Cate admitted, saddened that the next holiday would be near the close of the year, preventing them from visiting after the new year.

They arrived at Amelia's suite, entering her sitting room. "Isn't this room lovely?" Amelia commented, motioning for Cate to take a seat on the sofa near the fireplace. "We stay in this room every visit. I simply adore it. This side of the castle sees some amazing sunsets!"

"It is lovely," Cate agreed.

"How is your room? I hope you are enjoying it!" Amelia shouted from the bedroom.

"We are!" Cate called in. "Contrary to your room, we have amazing sunrises."

Amelia emerged from the bedroom, carrying a dress. "Sunrises? How vivacious of you to be awake to see them!"

Cate joined her across the room. "I'm not very good at sleeping."

"Poor dear. Is it something medical?"

"No, just a racing mind, I'm afraid."

"Hmm," Amelia murmured, considering Cate's statement. "You are quite clever, Cate. I'm not surprised. If I have a daughter one day, I hope she will be as clever as you, though better at sleeping!"

The women chuckled over the joke, though the comment struck Cate square in the heart. Pride surged through her. Being the woman's great-granddaughter, she felt as though Amelia had somewhat achieved her goal.

Amelia held up the dress. "Here's the dress I was telling you about. See the lovely detailing on the hem?"

Cate and Amelia spent the next thirty minutes discussing the dress, shoes, accessories, and fashion in general. Cate enjoyed the conversation, staying much longer than she expected. It relieved her mind from the turmoil of solving the mystery.

When she and Amelia parted ways, her mind returned to the pressing business of finding evidence against Forsythe. She navigated to the foyer, approaching the sitting room. Voices carried from inside, announcing with no doubt that Jack and Lucas's conversation had not yet ended.

Cate hovered for a moment outside the doorway, determining her next steps. She checked the timepiece. If the conversation lasted much longer, they may not be able to search Lorne's room before the dressing gong rang. After a moment of debate, Cate spun on her heel and hurried up the main staircase. She wound through the halls, finding one of the back staircases leading to the servants' quarters.

Cate puffed a long breath out, steeling her nerves to climb the staircase and search Forsythe's room.

"It has to be done," she assured herself with a whisper. She stared up the steep staircase for another breath. She placed one foot on the first stair, forcing her weight on it. Then she climbed to the second step. One foot after another, she forced herself up the staircase, her knees weak from tension.

She reached the top. The hallway appeared deserted. Cate stood for a moment, straining to listen for sounds. Nothing reached her ears. She tiptoed to Forsythe's door, giving it a light knock. No response greeted her. She tried again, louder this time. Again, there was no response.

Cate took a deep breath and turned the knob, pushing the door open. An empty room met her gaze. She was about to step inside when a voice halted her.

"Mrs. MacKenzie?" Forsythe called from the stairway.

Cate's stomach turned, and she jumped, startled by his presence. She spun to face the man she assumed to be the thief, swallowing hard.

CHAPTER 33

Cate stared at the man down the hall, trying to keep her breathing at a normal rate. She licked her lips and swallowed hard again.

“Oh,” she replied, her voice unsteady. “Forsythe, there you are.”

Forsythe’s brow furrowed as he stepped toward her. “Is there something you need? It must be very urgent for you to seek me out here.”

Cate swallowed hard. “I forgot earlier. You dropped this note yesterday. I meant to return it and it slipped my mind with all the turmoil earlier about sorting the evidence.” Cate held out the note marked Lorne Peterson toward him.

Forsythe glanced down at it before accepting it. “Oh, did I? How clumsy of me. Thank you.”

“You are welcome. I hated for you to have lost your personal correspondence.”

“How kind of you. However, it is not mine. It was delivered in error. I’m still sorting it out, but I’m sure whoever it belongs to will be most appreciative.”

Cate offered a nervous, awkward smile with a nod. “Well, I’ll be on my way. Good luck finding the note’s owner.”

“Good day, Mrs. MacKenzie.”

Cate’s leaden legs carried her to the stairway. She glanced back over her shoulder, finding Forsythe staring at her.

She swallowed hard as she forced herself to descend the stairs at a slow, normal pace. Every inch of her body screamed for her to run, but she slowed her pace until she reached the bottom quarter of the stairs. There she picked up her pace, stumbling down the last few steps and spilling into the hallway below. She hastened down the hall, glancing behind her, half-expecting Forsythe to be following her. His quiet, unflappable manner disconcerted her. It should have calmed her, made her less suspicious of him, but it achieved the exact opposite.

With her thoughts distracting her, Cate almost ran into Jack as she rounded the corner.

“Cate! Where have you been?” Jack stared at her, noting something was amiss. “Are you okay?”

Cate nodded, collecting her thoughts. “Yes,” she said after a breath. “I... I went to Forsythe’s room.”

“You what?” Jack exclaimed. “Oh, Cate...” he trailed off, shaking his head.

“Bad idea, I realize that. Let’s take a walk. I need some air.”

Jack removed his jacket, placing it around Cate’s shoulders. She opened her eyes, pulling the jacket around her tighter. “Thanks,” she replied just above a whisper.

“Cate, what happened?” Jack inquired, staring intently at her.

She glanced to him before refocusing her gaze on the horizon. She shook her head before plowing into her story. “After Amelia and I spoke, I came to find you. You were still talking to Lucas. It didn’t sound like you’d be finished anytime soon. I debated a moment but decided to try a quick search of Forsythe’s room.”

Jack exhaled in a huff.

“I know, I know. It was stupid. But I was afraid we’d run out of time before the dressing gong.”

A moment of silence lasted for a breath between them before Cate continued. “I climbed up to the servants’ quarters, despite my better judgment. I knocked at Forsythe’s door and when no one answered, I opened it. Just before I entered, Forsythe appeared and asked if I needed anything. I didn't know what else to do, so I gave him back the note he dropped."

"What did he say?"

"He claimed it wasn't his. Said he was trying to sort it out and get it to the correct person." Cate paused for a moment. "Something about him seemed disingenuous. He was almost too cool about it."

"Cate..." Jack began.

Cate held up a hand, stopping him. "Please, no lectures."

"I'm not going to lecture you, Cate," Jack responded. "I was going to say Forsythe seems to be an excellent liar. I don't trust him."

Cate smiled at him.

"And that I'm happy you're okay. And stop running off to investigate by yourself."

Cate chuckled at Jack's stern warning.

"Don't laugh at me," Jack scolded, giving in to a laugh too. "I'm serious."

"Yes, I know," Cate admitted.

"Come on, Lady Cate, let's get out of this cold and dress for dinner."

Cate nodded to him, allowing him to lead her back inside. They changed for dinner, discussing the prospect of sharing their suspicion with Rory about Forsythe. They decided to return the following morning to share their theory, agreeing this evening's dinner was not the appropriate time.

They returned to the present following their dinner to wait out the rest of the day. Cate paced the floor for a good part of it, nervous about her upcoming conversation with Rory. Too many unanswered questions remained. Her mind refused to cease twirling them around her head like an amusement park carousel at full speed.

Following dinner, Cate spent an hour watching a movie before retiring. Despite her longer than typical day, Cate still experienced a fitful night. Visions of being caught by Forsythe and concoctions of the upcoming conversation with Rory danced across her mind in an endless array.

Dawn finally brought a new day to Dunhaven Castle. A groggy Cate rose from her bed, lumbering straight past the rose gold rays painting the moors and into the shower. The steamy water helped awaken her. The pending conversation with Rory also added enough adrenaline to her system to keep her awake.

Cate ate her breakfast in the dining room, her mind whirling and her leg bouncing up and down with impatience. After breakfast, Cate took Riley and Bailey for a brief walk outside before returning to her room to change.

Jack met Cate at their prearranged time, and they traveled back to 1925, arriving in Cate's own bedroom nearly a century earlier.

Jack glanced at Cate. "You ready?"

Cate blew out a long breath. "I guess," she said, uncertainty creeping into her voice.

"That sounds less than ready," Jack assessed.

"There are still so many loose ends," Cate replied. "My mind hasn't stopped since we returned yesterday. So many unanswered questions are still lingering."

"Perhaps Rory can help us tie up some loose ends."

Cate nodded at Jack. "Yes, let's hope he can."

"Come on," Jack responded, grabbing Cate's hand and tugging her toward the door. "Let's get this done!"

"I never imagined I'd see the day where you were more enthusiastic than I was during one of these trips!" Cate said with a giggle.

"Me either. Now, come on, you're ruining this for me. I'm supposed to be the sour one!"

Cate chuckled as they navigated to Rory's office, finding him there going over the estate ledgers.

Jack rapped his knuckles against the door jamb. "Got a minute?"

Rory glanced up from his paperwork. "Of course! Please come in! How are you?"

Cate and Jack entered the room.

Cate pushed the door shut behind her. "We were hoping to discuss our investigation into the jewelry theft."

"Oh," Rory muttered, as though he preferred not to. "Have you found anything? Anne is most anxious to solve the matter."

"I'm sure she is," Cate replied. "We have a suspect in mind after a thorough investigation."

Rory raised his eyebrows. "Yes, I gathered as much. My groom, I believe?"

Cate furrowed her brow and shook her head. "No, not Thomas Gould."

Rory matched her expression. "Not Thomas? I understood from Forsythe the evidence against him was extremely damning."

Jack raised his eyebrows. "Forsythe told you about the evidence?"

"Yes," Rory admitted. "We discussed the matter at some length yesterday. He inquired about the result of your discussion with the police. Have you presented the evidence to them yet?"

Cate glanced at Jack. "Uh, no."

Rory answered before she spoke again. "According to Forsythe, there was no doubt. He has motive and an incriminating note stating he had the jewelry! May I ask the reason you've not shared your information with the police yet?"

"The evidence was fabricated."

Rory's jaw dropped open. "What? Faked? Who? How? Oh, my apologies for the string of questions, but I'm flabbergasted!"

"I understand," Cate answered. "But Thomas Gould was framed. He isn't the thief. Yes, he has made claims that he wants to buy a restaurant and stated he'd soon have the money, but the note that provides the most incriminating evidence was forged."

"How do you know?" Rory inquired.

"We suspected the forgery and compared it to the handwriting of the person who wrote the note. It was a match," Jack explained.

"Why would anyone do that?"

"To throw us off the scent. To pin the crime on someone else and take the heat off themselves," Cate related.

Rory shook his head, confusion crossing his face. "This is all so very confusing. How appalling that someone stole our property and then lied to place the blame on an innocent man. And you say you've identified who it is by the forged note?"

Cate's heart raced as she faced the prospect of naming their suspect. "Yes."

"Who is it?" Rory queried.

"Forsythe," Jack and Cate said in unison.

Rory gasped, his features pinching. "What?"

Cate nodded a second time. "Yes, Forsythe. He is the one who gave us all the incriminating information. He provided us with the note that he allegedly found in Thomas Gould's possessions. A comparison of that note with this handwriting shows that they match. Forsythe wrote the note to cast suspicion onto Thomas."

Rory stood from the desk, stalking to the window and staring out. "This can't be."

"I'm afraid it's true," Jack added.

"What made you check the handwriting?"

"We searched Thomas Gould's room for clues," Cate admitted. "The note Forsythe claimed Mr. Calhoun found was not there. Forsythe had the room searched after we searched it. Since we did not find it, we suspected it was a fake. We tested our theory by requesting a list of the male staff from Forsythe yesterday. The handwriting matches."

Rory gave a slight shake of his head. "Coincidence, perhaps."

"I don't believe so," Cate answered.

"But it must be!" Rory exclaimed, turning his head toward them before returning his gaze out the window.

Cate glanced at Jack, confused by Rory's reaction. "There's more."

Rory failed to respond, so Cate continued. "When Forsythe gave us the evidence against Thomas, another note slipped from his pocket. I picked it up, intending to give it back to him, but he disappeared before I could. It was addressed to Lorne Peterson. I read the note. It hinted that he had stolen the jewelry and even suggested a familial connection. The evidence from that note fits with certain facts we've stumbled upon."

"Who is Lorne Peterson? What is his involvement with this?" Rory questioned, spinning to face them.

"We believe Lorne Peterson is the real name of Charles Forsythe," Cate answered. "We also have inferred that Lorne Peterson is a distant cousin of yours, a grandson of Lorne MacKenzie, your great-uncle."

"What proof have you?" Rory demanded. "I'd like to read this note." He held his hand in front of him.

"I don't have it," Cate admitted.

"You don't have it?"

"No. I returned it to Forsythe yesterday."

"So, you don't have the note. You have no proof other than your conjecture. Is that correct?" The heat entering Rory's usually lighthearted voice surprised Cate.

"Well, it's a little more than just conjecture."

Rory slammed his hand on his desk. "It's not. What concrete proof is there? You can't even produce the note that hints at the theft!"

Cate's jaw dropped but she could not find the words to respond, thrown by Rory's sudden aggressive behavior.

"Rory, we..." Jack began but was also cut off by Rory.

"No!" Rory exclaimed. "None of this proves anything. And I find the entire story difficult to fathom. I am well acquainted with Forsythe. This doesn't fit his character, not at all."

"But..." Cate tried again.

"Jack, Cate, please. I have heard enough. You are barking up the wrong tree. Please, I assure you, Forsythe is not the culprit."

Cate and Jack stood in stunned silence.

"Look, I'd like to solve this travesty as much as you, but I cannot support your current theory. I beg you to dismiss it from your minds."

Cate glanced to Jack, giving a slight shrug at him. "All right," she agreed with a tiny nod. "All right, Rory. We'll keep searching."

"Wonderful," Rory replied, offering a slight smile. "I very much appreciate what you are doing. Oh, please don't be put off, but I am certain your theory is incorrect. I'm only trying to spare you any embarrassment."

"We understand. And thank you. Well, I hope to have more news for you soon," Cate answered. "We'll leave you to your work."

"Will I see you at dinner?" Rory questioned.

"No," Cate responded before Jack could. "We won't be able to stay for dinner."

Rory nodded, taking a seat at his desk. "We'll miss you, but hopefully tomorrow."

"Yes, tomorrow," Cate agreed with a smile.

She spun on her heel, leaving the office with Jack following her. They pulled the door shut behind them. Jack thrust his arms out, shrugging, shooting Cate a "now what?" expression. Cate pointed down the hall, signaling that they take a walk outside. Jack nodded in agreement and the two proceeded to the front door in silence.

Cate led Jack toward the loch, only speaking once they were a safe distance away from the castle. "Sorry. I didn't want to say anything in there since we don't seem to have a friend among us!" Cate waved her arms in the air with frustration.

Jack smirked at the statement. "I don't blame you."

They walked on in silence, reaching the loch. The pair stared out over the water before speaking.

“His reaction was odd, right?” Cate began.

“Yes, I agree. The moment we mentioned Forsythe in relation to the crime, his entire mood changed. He became defensive and argumentative.”

“Yes, he became combative! I found it very odd,” Cate exclaimed in agreement.

“This was more than that. His reaction just before we mentioned Forsythe’s name was that of someone who views the world through a rosy lens. But his reaction after we mentioned Forsythe’s name seemed to be more than that.”

“Perhaps he feels a friendship with him. They must work closely together, and Forsythe fills the role of valet when needed.”

Cate considered Jack’s explanation for a moment. “Still...”

“Still, it seems an over-the-top reaction,” Jack finished for her.

“Yes. Although...” Cate continued, pausing as her brain processed the idea.

“Yeah?” Jack asked when the silence persisted a beat too long.

“It’s not that outrageous a reaction if someone is accusing your family member of being a thief!” Cate exclaimed, wide-eyed.

“What?”

“Charles Forsythe,” Cate explained, “otherwise known as Lorne Peterson, Rory’s cousin.”

Jack wrinkled his brow, his expression showing complete confusion. “Rory...” he paused, piecing together the puzzle on his end, “is aware of who Charles Forsythe is? Assuming he is Lorne Peterson, grandson of Lorne MacKenzie, which is still a big if, Cate.”

“It makes sense, right? Rory realizes who he is, which is why he gives him the job here. It’s why he’s protective of him when we accused him of theft. It’s why Anne wrote the note! Well aware that he is family, she pens an angry missive after he leaves, and they both realize what has happened.”

Jack shook his head, his hands on his hips. “Those are some huge leaps, Lady Cate. If Rory and Anne are aware of who Forsythe is, why hire him? Why not help him some other way?”

“What way? It may not be uncommon to offer a struggling family member a position. There must be lots of families with poorer relations. Fast forward to our time and consider me. I was unaware of my family and the estate, and I lived a normal life as a working gal!”

“All right, so Rory hires him, thinking he’s doing his family a favor. I can buy that. But if Anne’s note refers to the theft, and they realized Forsythe was the culprit, why not turn him in?”

“Scandal. Familial obligation.”

Jack frowned, waving his hands in the air. “Bah, Cate, I don’t buy that one, no way. A servant robs you and you don’t turn him in because it might cause scandal that he’s a distant relative?”

“The MacKenzies locked a girl in their tower room because she was a bastard child, so yes, I’d believe it!”

“In the 1800s, Cate! Not 1925! Surely we’re beyond the point of hiding family secrets.”

Cate shook her head. “No. I’m not even sure we’ve reached that point in the twenty-first century! Certainly not in 1925. Plus, with this type of mentality running in the family, it’s plausible.”

Jack mulled over Cate’s explanation, rubbing his hand on his chin. “Okay, it’s a credible theory. Now what?”

“We stay the course. Charles Forsythe, who we assume is Lorne Peterson, is still our primary suspect. We have to find more proof. But perhaps we’re at a point where we can mention this to MacCullough.”

“I’m not sure he’ll listen. And we may anger Rory, although...” Jack’s voice broke off as a loud sound cracked through the air.

Instinctively, they both ducked, searching around for the source of the noise.

“CATE, GET DOWN!” Jack shouted at her, tackling her to the ground.

Another crack rang out, followed by a sickening smack as a speeding object struck a nearby tree.

CHAPTER 34

Jack glanced around, his head swinging behind them, eyes darting all over. Cate followed his gaze, spotting nothing. He huffed out a breath after a moment, returning his gaze to Cate. “Are you alright? Are you hurt?”

Cate remained silent for a breath, still collecting herself. She nodded. “Yes, yes, I’m all right.”

Fear still coursed through her as her mind caught up with the events of the past few moments. Realization dawned, and she fought to steady her nerves and trembling limbs.

Jack rolled off her.

Cate remained motionless for another moment.

“Are you sure you’re all right, Cate?”

“Yes,” Cate answered, forcing herself to sitting. “Just a little shocked. I’ve never been shot at before.”

“Neither have I,” Jack admitted. He crawled toward the tree, pulling himself to standing. His fingers dug at the bark.

Cate gained her feet, her knees wobbly but able to support her weight. She joined him, peering at the object of his attention. A bullet was lodged in the tree.

Cate’s heart skipped a beat as she stared at the object. It provided physical evidence that they had not imagined the experience. She swallowed hard, taking a step back, a hand on her head.

“Cate?” Jack questioned.

“I’m fine,” she replied. “Just thanking my lucky stars.”

“Yes, we were lucky.”

Cate shook her head, trying to shake the memory loose. “My God, we could have been killed!”

“I know. But we weren’t. Let’s focus on that.” He put his arm around her shoulders, pulling her closer to him. “Okay?”

Cate took a deep breath, nodding. “Okay,” she answered when she found her voice again.

A moment of silence passed between them before Jack spoke again. “I’m revising my previous statement. I think we need to talk to MacCullough. Even though we’re fine, someone tried to kill us or at least scare the hell out of us. To hell with Rory’s feelings.”

“Not someone,” Cate reminded him. “Lorne Peterson.”

Jack nodded. “Perhaps we should take a car to town and talk to MacCullough.”

Cate raised her eyebrows. “Perhaps we should walk. I have no interest in requesting a car from the man who just tried to kill us.”

“Good point, we’ll walk it. Let’s grab our coats and go.”

After retrieving their coats and outerwear, Cate and Jack made their way into town. Despite the cold, Cate found the fresh air calming. She drank in deep breaths. Each step further from the castle also calmed her frayed nerves.

They reached the police station, climbing the handful of steps to enter. Jack requested to speak with Officer MacCullough and they were asked to wait a moment. Cate tapped her toes on the floor as they waited. Jack placed his hand on her arm, giving it a squeeze.

After a moment, they were escorted to Officer MacCullough’s desk. “Now what?” the gruff man grunted as they approached. “I’ve done nothing to that girl, there’s no reason to come hollering at me.”

“We have information to help you,” Jack answered. “And an incident to report.”

“Incident? Something else missing?”

“No,” Cate replied. “Someone tried to kill us.”

Officer MacCullough let out a long belly-laugh.

Cate crossed her arms, glaring at him.

“Someone tried to kill you, Mrs. MacKenzie? Oh, I can’t imagine why.”

“This is no joking matter, sir,” Jack admonished the laughing man.

The man stood, wiping his eyes with a handkerchief as he stifled his laughter. “No, of course not, Mr. MacKenzie. Though I daresay your wife’s imagination has run wild. I’m sure it’s all a simple misunderstanding. Ladies can be stirred up so easily. As an officer-of-the-law, I’ve seen it time and time again.”

Frustration showed on Jack’s face. “This is no figment of my wife’s imagination, Officer MacCullough. I was with her when someone shot at us. Twice! One bullet is lodged in a nearby tree as proof!”

Officer MacCullough’s expression changed in an instant, sobering as he realized his mistake. “Shot at you?” he repeated, confusion entering his voice.

“Yes! Shot at us! Someone shot at us not an hour ago!” Jack exclaimed.

“Why would someone shoot at you?” the rather dense detective questioned.

“Because we’re getting too close to the truth,” Cate responded.

Officer MacCullough’s thick eyebrows rumped. He stared at the floor, deep in thought. “We have uncovered several key pieces of information.”

“Let’s hear them. Have a seat,” Officer MacCullough responded, motioning to two chairs he dragged from another desk.

“First,” Jack said after Cate signaled him to relay the information. “We were given an incriminating note suggesting Thomas Gould was the thief.”

“Ah, so Gould’s our man, then!” MacCullough exclaimed. “I suspected him, of course.”

Jack shook his head. “No, no, no. Gould’s innocent.”

“But...”

“The note was a fake,” Jack interrupted.

“Fake? By whose estimation?”

“Mine and my wife’s,” Jack responded. “We compared the handwriting in it with the handwriting from another note. They were a match. The note was forged to point the finger at Thomas Gould and shift any suspicion from the real criminal.”

“Who is?”

“Charles Forsythe,” Cate answered. “Who may be better known as Lorne Peterson.”

“Forsythe? The under-butler? So, he is in cahoots with Lorne Peterson!”

“No!” Jack answered with an adamant shake of his head. “Charles Forsythe is Lorne Peterson!”

The officer rubbed his chin as he disseminated the information. "All right, Mr. MacKenzie, we'll take it from here. Thank you." The man stood, pulling his jacket closed over his bulging stomach.

"But you haven't heard half of the information we discovered!" Jack argued.

Officer MacCullough plopped into his seat with a huff. "Oh, all right. Continue," he said, waving his hand in the air, motioning for Jack to proceed. He placed his folded hands on top of his stomach, leaning back in his chair.

Jack gave Cate a disgusted glance before he continued. "When we received the forged note, which came from Charles Forsythe, he dropped another letter. Addressed to Lorne Peterson. After doing some research, we are convinced Charles Forsythe is an alias."

"And, uh, why would Mr. Forsythe need an alias?"

"No," Cate interjected. "Lorne Peterson needs the alias. We're not sure why," Cate fibbed, not wanting the truth shared just yet. "But plenty of criminals use aliases."

"Anything else?" MacCullough asked, ignoring Cate's statements.

"Mrs. MacKenzie returned the dropped note yesterday to Mr. Forsythe. And today, someone took two shots at us."

"Where were you when the shots were fired? Outside? You mentioned a tree?"

"Outside," Cate answered. "Near the loch."

"Uh-huh," the officer mumbled. "Well, I appreciate the information and we'll make a full report. There's no need for either of you to stay beyond this. I'm sure you're both tired."

Officer MacCullough's nonchalance stunned Cate. She stared at Jack, her jaw hanging open in shock.

"Appreciate the information? We were almost killed!" Jack exclaimed.

"Well, Mr. MacKenzie, that remains to be determined," the officer answered. "Dinnae misunderstand. I'm not accusing you of lying. I've no doubt shots were fired. But this is rural Scotland, laddie. They could have been shooting at an animal, a bird. Hunting is great sport here."

Jack sighed and shook his head. "This wasn't..."

Officer MacCullough waved his hand in the air to stop him. "I've already promised we'll look into it, but I wouldn't lose sleep. I'm sure no harm was intended."

Jack opened his mouth to respond, but Cate stood, stopping him. “Thank you, Officer MacCullough. We won’t take up any more of your time.”

Officer MacCullough stood, smiling at Cate. “No problem, Mrs. MacKenzie. And as I said, I thank you for the information you provided. We will follow up on it.”

Jack stood next to her, a dubious expression on his face. He extended a hand toward the officer. “Yes, thank you.”

“Good day, Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie,” Officer MacCullough said, dismissing them.

Cate and Jack left the police station, beginning their walk back to the castle.

“Well, that was a bust,” Cate sighed as they trudged toward the castle.

“Is he dense or just an ass?” Jack complained in frustration.

“Both,” Cate responded. “He has no intention of continuing the investigation or following up on any information we provided him. He’s also very, very dim-witted. That’s half the reason he won’t follow up.”

Jack huffed. “Now what?”

“We’re on our own. We need more information.”

Jack stopped dead. “More information? Cate, are you sure we should pursue this? I mean, absolutely certain? This is becoming a dangerous game and we have no support from the police... or Rory for that matter!”

“Which is reason we must keep going! Unless we plan to return to our time and leave this alone and never return, which I do not want to do, we’re stuck.”

“Going back to our time and forgetting about it may be our best bet, Cate.”

Cate remained silent for a moment, her lower lip in a frustrated pout. She thrust her arms out before speaking. “Then what was the point! We’ve solved nothing! If we do that, we’ve just wasted our time.”

“Well, you did learn to skate, and you met your great-grandparents. It wasn’t a total waste. And there’s no shame in giving up, given the latest developments. Even Rory would understand.”

“I’m not giving up!” Cate exclaimed. They stood in silence for a few more moments.

“Even Rory would understand,” Cate murmured after a moment, snapping her fingers. “That’s it!”

“That’s what?” Jack inquired.

“With the latest developments, surely Rory will do something now that someone’s tried to kill us!”

“He doesn’t believe us about Forsythe, what makes you think he will now that we’re accusing him of trying to kill us?”

“This makes things more serious. Covering for the theft of your own property by a family member is one thing. Covering for them when they try to kill someone is quite another.”

“Eh, covering for murder runs in the family, Cate. Grandpappy Randolph did it.”

“For an orphaned child. Not an opportunist who’s stolen valuable property.”

“Still, I’m not sure he’ll believe it’s Forsythe.”

Cate frowned, crossing her arms. “You’re right. He’ll insist we’re incorrect and Forsythe couldn’t have done it. He’ll want to believe the best of his family.”

“Assuming he realizes Forsythe is his family. So we’re on our own. Are you sure I can’t convince you we’ve done enough?”

Cate flung her arms in the air. “We have done nothing but make an enemy! The jewelry is still missing, and we’ve brought no one to justice!”

“But how can we convince Rory or Officer MacCullough?”

“We’re going to need solid evidence. Like finding the jewelry in Forsythe’s possession.”

“I was afraid you’d say that.”

Cate checked her timepiece with a frown. “Well, there’s no sense trying today. It’s too risky to try now. Too much likelihood of being caught. Shoot!”

“Fine by me. Tomorrow’s a new day. Perhaps we can figure out a better plan. We’ve done enough for today. I need to decompress.”

“You and me both,” Cate agreed. “As much as I’d love to solve this today, I’d really love to go home. Somewhere safe.”

Jack nodded at her with a tight-lipped smile. “Let’s go, Lady Cate.”

They returned to the castle, avoiding contact with anyone and returning to the bedroom. Within moments, they had returned to the safety of their own time.

Jack breathed a long and loud sigh of relief. “Still some time before lunch. I can’t believe we’ve accused someone of theft, been shot at, spoken with the police and it's still before lunch."

"Yep," Cate agreed. "Such is the life of a time traveler."

"Call me crazy, but I liked my life before I was a time traveler."

"I could have done without the being shot at," Cate admitted. "But perhaps he was just trying to scare us off and not hurt us."

"I'm not sure what his intentions were. It was still too close a call for me. I'll be spending the rest of the day trying to forget about it."

"I'll spend the rest of the day trying to come up with a plan to solve this... and soon!"

"Happy scheming," Jack answered. "I'm going to change and breathe the fresh air while I assess a few repairs outside."

"Anything major?" Cate asked.

"No, nothing major. Just a few minor jobs to bid out before spring."

"Okay. Got to have the place in tiptop shape for the next party Mrs. Campbell springs on us. She's got her heart set on 'bigger and better' for the next event."

"Ugh," Jack groaned. "What does that mean?"

Cate shrugged. "With her it could mean anything from a larger event to a fancier event. She keeps rambling on about having the 'upper crust of society' here like the 'old days.'"

"Old days? I prefer not to recall any old days in this castle."

Cate chuckled at his subtle joke. "Tell that to Mrs. Campbell."

"I just might, Lady Cate! I just might. Now, I leave you to your day. M'lady!" Jack gave an extravagant bow before leaving the room.

Despite the earlier scare, Jack's over-the-top mannerisms elicited a giggle from her. After he disappeared through her sitting room doors, Cate changed and took the dogs for a walk. She hoped to keep her mind from dwelling on the incident earlier. Jack's assessment was correct. This was becoming dangerous. They had little choice in becoming more aggressive in their investigation before it cost them their lives.

As her eyes gazed over the loch's still waters, she shivered, reminded of the two close calls with death, both at this location. Odd that her favorite spot on the estate in her time was the source of such terrifying experiences in the past.

Cate's mind turned to the matter of the missing jewelry and Charles Forsythe, a.k.a. Lorne Peterson. They had to gain more proof against him. They needed solid evidence for both Rory and Officer MacCullough. There was no choice but to perform a search of Lorne's room with the hope of finding anything incriminating.

Cate shivered again at the thought, though she convinced herself it was only the cold causing her to shudder. She returned to the castle, spending the afternoon searching for any information she could find on Lorne Peterson. The little she found offered no help for their predicament.

She turned her attention to a mystery novel but found it unable to hold her attention. She paced the floorboards of her sitting room for a solid hour before dinner. Afterward, Cate invited Molly to watch a movie, hoping the distraction would pass the time faster and relax her.

Despite her distracted thoughts, Molly's gregarious nature diverted Cate's troubled mind to lighter topics. Cate hated for the night to end, worried that she'd toss and turn.

As Cate lay in bed, she wondered if she was becoming psychic. Even the extra hours added to her day from time traveling failed to tire her enough to sleep. She laid awake until the clock read after midnight. Finally, as she stared at the moonlit moors, Cate drifted off to sleep.

Cate awoke with a start. Both dogs barked at the foot of her bed.

"Riley? Bailey? What is it?" she questioned, following their gaze.

They stared at the ajar bedroom door. Cate climbed from the bed, her bare feet touching the cold floorboards beyond the area rug as she tiptoed to the door. As if on cue, both dogs ceased their protestations and raced, tails between their legs, to hide under the bed. She followed them with her eyes before turning her attention to the sitting room.

"Guess I'm on my own," she murmured as she peered into the darkness in the next room.

Cate spotted nothing. She returned for her robe, wrapped it around her, slipped into her slippers and padded to the sitting room door. She cracked it open, squinting into the darkened hall beyond. Movement at the end of the hall caught her attention.

"Molly?" she called, receiving no response.

Cate stepped into the hallway, following the motion.

"Molly? Is everything okay?"

She again received no response.

Cate proceeded down the hall, closing the gap between herself and the unknown figure. Before she reached the form, it fled. Without considering her actions, she followed, racing down the halls behind the running individual.

She caught up with the unidentified figure as it entered the library. She flipped the light switch, but no lights lit. She pulled the flashlight from the desk drawer, pointing it at the figure hovering on the opposite side of the room.

“Who...” her voice trailed off as she recognized the person. Her brows knit in confusion as she tried to make sense of it. In front of her, illuminated by the piercing flashlight’s beam, stood Charles Forsythe. “Forsythe?”

She swallowed hard as she recognized the object clutched in his hands. A stubby-nosed gun pointed at her. The muzzle flashed, evidencing a shot fired. Cate dropped the flashlight, shrieked and ducked, hoping to dodge the bullet.

She held her breath for a moment, eyes squeezed shut. After a breath, she opened her eyes to slits, peeking at the room. The figure across the room had vanished, and she lay alone on the library floor.

She glanced around the room, searching for Forsythe, but he was nowhere to be found. She pushed up to kneeling, checking her body. No blood, no bullet holes, no pain. What happened, she wondered? Had she imagined the whole thing? Was this the product of her overtired mind?

She sighed, grasping the corner of the desk to pull herself to standing. A rogue wind rustled her hair as she stood. She searched the room for the source. After retrieving the flashlight from where it clattered to the floor moments ago, she trained the beam in the direction of the breeze. She gasped, stifling a yelp as she noticed the bookcase missing, replaced again by a gaping hole.

She blinked her eyes several times. Convinced her eyes weren’t playing tricks on her, she took a step toward the black hole. She quickly decided against proceeding any further, retreating a few steps back and toggling off the flashlight. She spun and hurried to the door. Before she could exit the room, an unearthly groan commanded her attention. She whirled around to face the void, straining to hear any sounds.

“Catherine!” a voice called.

Cate swallowed hard. She attempted to back from the room, but the doors slammed behind her before she could exit. She turned, pulling on them as she spun the doorknob desperately in an attempt to flee. The doors did not budge. She pounded against them, calling for help. No one came. The doors remained shut fast.

“CATHERINE!” the voice boomed again.

Cate spun to face the sound again. Tears streamed down her cheeks as terror rose from the pit of her stomach. “What do you want?”

Thunder boomed overhead, lightening lit the room. The brief flash revealed a figure standing in the open space that once held the bookcase. She covered her mouth with her hand, stifling a scream.

“Who are you?” she demanded, pulling herself up to standing.

As thunder clapped again, its sound reverberating through the castle’s stone walls, the figure approached her. As he strode closer and closer, she inched toward the closed doors, pressing against them. Her eyes darted around the room, searching for an escape. She found none. She tried pounding against the doors again, but no one came to help.

The figure loomed over her; the unidentifiable features shadowed by the dim moonlight. An icy hand grasped her shoulder. She turned to face the figure. Lightning tore through the sky, lighting the room for a brief second. As the man’s features became more apparent, the room faded away to black. Cate experienced the sensation of falling.

CHAPTER 35

Cate shot up to sitting, drenched in sweat. She'd snapped her eyes open in terror, then realized she was in her bedroom. She caught her breath, glancing around the room. The two dogs slept in their beds, Riley snoring softly.

Cate blinked a few times, checking the clock. It read quarter after two in the morning. She'd managed a few hours' sleep before the nightmare woke her. Cate collapsed back onto the pillows behind her. They had to solve this crime before she went crazy.

Cate dragged herself from bed the following morning. She'd slept little, tossing and turning both before and after her nightmare. Her muddled mind found no additional solutions during that time. She slogged through her morning routine, breakfast, and a walk with the dogs.

Afterward, she met Jack as she began ascending the steps. "Lady Cate, good morning. Have a minute for some estate business?"

"Sure," Cate replied, recognizing the ruse Jack used to request her presence to discuss time traveling. "Let's step into the sitting room."

"No library?" Jack groused. "I like those armchairs."

"Sorry," Cate answered, stifling a yawn. "I'd rather avoid the library."

They ushered Riley and Bailey into the sitting room before them and Cate pulled the doors closed.

“Avoiding the library again?” Jack asked, approaching the loveseat and plopping onto it.

Cate nodded as she sank onto the loveseat across from Jack.

“Another nightmare?”

“Yes, another,” Cate admitted, slouching in her seat.

“Same thing?”

“Sort of. This one started with spotting a figure at the end of the hall outside my bedroom. When I followed it, it went to the library. It turned into Forsythe holding a gun and he shot at me. When I ducked, he disappeared. I stood up to leave, and the bookshelf was missing again. A shadowy man stood in there. He came at me, and I tried to run, but the doors were stuck shut. I couldn’t get out. He grabbed me and I almost saw his face in the lightning, but I woke up. I’m assuming it was Forsythe again.”

“We need a plan. This is having a terrible effect on you.”

“I agree. A plan that solves this mystery. I’d like to sleep again soon!”

“So, what plans did you concoct while you weren’t sleeping last night?” Jack questioned.

Cate shrugged and huffed. “None. We need proof to end this. Proof that I expect we’ll find only in Forsythe’s room. Unless you have another idea?”

“Nope,” Jack answered with a sigh. “I’m afraid you’re correct. I hate it, but I don’t see a way around it.”

“So, that’s our plan. Shall we dress and head back there? Try to settle this?”

“Sure!” Jack agreed.

Cate pushed up to standing and crossed the room to the doors.

“You going to make it through? I’ve never seen you with such little energy.”

Cate offered him a half-smile. “I’m going to make it. Don’t worry, my adrenaline will kick in as soon as I’m close to solving the mystery!”

“There’s the spirit, Lady Cate. Meet you in thirty in your sitting room?”

“Deal,” Cate agreed, calling the dogs to follow her to her bedroom.

With the promise of time travel on the horizon, Cate dug deep to muster the energy to tackle her hair and clothes, making each appropriate for 1925.

She finished with a few minutes to spare and paced the floor of her sitting room as she waited for Jack.

Within a few moments, a knock sounded at the door. Jack entered after Cate pulled the door open.

"I was thinking..." she blurted as he entered the room.

"Of course you were," Jack interrupted. "There's the Cate Kensie I know!"

Cate chuckled, smiling at him. "Anyway, even if we can get that note back that I had to give to Forsythe, that's a win. We can show it to Rory. If we can win him to our side, we might stand a chance!"

Jack nodded. "I hope he didn't destroy it after you returned it to him."

"Me too," Cate said with a shake of her head. "Only one way to find out."

She strode to her bedroom with Jack in tow. They activated the watch, slipping backward in time to 1925. After a quick change of clothes into new outfits, Cate and Jack left the suite, intent on determining the whereabouts of Forsythe.

They made it a few steps down the hall when Amelia rounded the corner. "Oh, Cate! How fortunate. I was just coming to find you. I feared missing you, that you'd left for the day!"

"No, we were about to..." Cate began.

"I hope they are plans that can be broken!" Amelia exclaimed. "You don't mind, do you, Jack? Cate and I have ladies' business!"

"Oh, well..." Jack started.

"Besides, Rory has been searching for you all day. It seems urgent. You will probably find him in his office."

"Oh," Jack said, his brow furrowing, "I suppose I should seek him out." Jack shot a questioning glance at Cate.

"And that leaves you," Amelia said, wrapping her arm around Cate's, "on your own and in need of entertainment. Search no further, Cate! I shall provide it!"

Amelia dragged a helpless Cate away as Jack headed off to find Rory. When they were alone, Amelia said, "I hope you aren't too sore at me for breaking your plans. But we are leaving Friday morning and I missed you at dinner last night! I hoped to make the most of what remains of our visit."

"Not at all," Cate assured her. Despite her desire to dive right into finding evidence against Forsythe, she, too, longed to spend more time with Amelia, her great-grandmother. The familial connection alone soothed her beyond words. "We will be leaving soon, too. It saddens me to think of it."

"But then we shall begin counting the days until we meet again here next holiday, if not sooner! We must have you and Jack out at the country estate. You'd enjoy it so!"

"It sounds very charming," Cate agreed wistfully, realizing she would never see the estate.

"I do hope Jack can carve time from his schedule. Though you are most welcome to visit on your own if Jack finds himself too busy and you find yourself alone! Women are traveling alone more and more these days!"

"Thank you. We'll certainly need to plan for it," Cate fibbed. "Now, what is this pressing ladies' business?"

"Why clothing, of course!" Amelia declared, pushing through the door to her suite. "Anne, I found her!" she announced to the woman in the room.

"Wonderful. Hello, Cate," Anne greeted her. She rose and strode to the bell pull against the wall, pulling it. "I'll ring for tea now. Amelia hoped to find you before we requested tea. She has grand plans to discuss all things fashion. And she insists she has an evening dress that makes her look gauche but would be lovely on you."

"Oh, I do, let me fetch it," Amelia stated, rushing from the room and returning in moments with a rose-colored dress in her hands. "Here it is!" She waved it in the air.

"Oh, it's beautiful!" Cate exclaimed, admiring the color and the detailed beading on the bodice.

Amelia held it out, staring at it. "It's simply ghastly on me, Cate." She held it against her. "Look, how sallow it makes me. You have handsome porcelain skin and sweet, rosy cheeks. It will look marvelous on you, I'd bet." Anne joined them as Amelia held it up to Cate. "Do you agree, Anne?"

"Hmm, yes, quite. It fits her complexion well," Anne agreed.

"Try it on? Oh, please!" Amelia requested, shoving the dress toward Cate and closing Cate's hands around it.

"Well..." Cate answered, unsure.

"There's plenty of time before tea arrives!" Amelia responded, pushing Cate toward the bedroom. "Use my room!"

Cate disappeared into the bedroom. The sounds of light conversation carried from the other room as Cate tossed the dress onto the bed and removed her clothes. She pulled the dress on, struggling to fasten it.

“How’s it coming, Cate?” Amelia called in. “Do you need help?”

“I’m just fastening it!” Cate called in response. “Or trying to!”

Amelia appeared in the doorway. “Here, let me,” she said, spinning Cate around and finishing the fastening in the back. “Oh, it’s gorgeous on you. Very becoming! The dress requires few alterations, if any. It’s nearly a perfect fit! Anne, come and see Cate in the dress!” Amelia positioned Cate in front of the mirror. “What do you think?”

Cate admired the dress in the mirror, agreeing it fit her well and was a becoming color. Anne agreed with Amelia’s assessment.

“Say you’ll take it!” Amelia exclaimed.

“Oh, I couldn’t!” Cate answered.

“Oh, please. It’s such a waste for me to keep it. I’ll never wear it! Take it, Cate!”

Cate grinned at her through the mirror’s reflection. “I will,” she answered, turning to pull Amelia into an embrace.

“Wonderful!” Amelia exclaimed. “Now, let me unfasten you so you can change. Tea has arrived! We will discuss how you shall accessorize your new dress!”

Cate nodded in agreement, and, left alone, changed back to her day dress and returned to the sitting room to join the others for tea. They spent over an hour discussing Cate’s new dress, upcoming fashions, Paris fashions, and other topics of the sort. Cate’s nerves relaxed as she talked and laughed over shorter hemlines, sporty clothes, shopping at Selfridge’s, and the advancement of the modern woman. The sense of kinship played a large role in her comfort.

After tea, Anne excused herself to finish correspondence. Amelia invited Cate to take a walk. Since she planned to search Forsythe’s room before lunch, Cate declined, also using the excuse of correspondence. With a hug, Amelia left her in the hallway.

Cate snuck downstairs when she figured the coast was clear of Amelia and crept toward Rory’s office. She listened at the door as voices carried from behind it. She considered knocking and requesting Jack’s presence, but decided against it.

A noise down the hall sent her scurrying into the library. She hid behind the door, leaving it open a crack to peer out. Forsythe passed with two footmen trailing behind him.

“... items must be moved before lunch. It will take all three of us. I hope we finish the task in time...” His voice trailed off as they disappeared down the hall.

Cate raised her eyebrows. Forsythe would be engaged for the rest of the morning. It was a perfect time to check his room. Should she disturb Rory and Jack’s meeting? Cate debated for a few moments. Yes, she decided. It was a terrible idea to go alone. Although Forsythe should be busy, so it should be safe. And how would she explain her need for Jack’s presence to Rory? She couldn’t explain their plan. Rory’s reaction yesterday suggested he’d be less than hospitable if she explained.

“You’re wasting time!” she whispered to herself.

After a moment, she harrumphed, pushing through the doors and hurrying down the hall and upstairs alone. She climbed to the servants’ floor, sprinting down the empty hall to Forsythe’s room. She turned the knob, pushing the door open and hurrying inside. She closed the door behind her, leaning against it with closed eyes, and let out of a sigh of relief.

Part one of her plan was complete. She’d made it to Forsythe’s room. Now on to part two: searching it. She opened her eyes, scanning the room. While racing toward the wardrobe, she winced as she crossed a creaky floorboard, fearing she’d be given away.

Cate flung open the doors, scanning the contents of the cupboard. She pawed through the few articles of clothing inside, squeezing each article to determine if anything was concealed in the pockets or lining. She came up empty.

She stood on her tiptoes, sweeping her hand across the top shelf. The few items on top provided no additional information. A drawer at the bottom of the wardrobe provided her last search area in the cabinet. She yanked it open but found nothing but clothing items. She sighed, pushing the drawer shut and easing the wardrobe doors closed. She peered behind it, finding nothing. The wardrobe stood too close to the wall to have hidden anything.

She spun and crossed to the bed. On her hands and knees, she peered underneath. Nothing but dust bunnies greeted her. She frowned, sitting back on her heels and shoving her hands under the mattress. She swept them around, reaching as far as she could, but found nothing.

A chest of drawers stood against the far wall. It was the final place to search. Cate climbed to her feet, crossing the room. She cursed her careless footfalls, crossing the creaky floorboard again. She began with the bottom drawers, coming up empty. The middle drawers provided no information either. She pulled open the top drawers, shoving items from side to side in a desperate search for anything. Near the back of the drawer, Cate found several letters tied together. She read the address line, finding the top missive made out to Lorne Peterson. A slight smile crossed Cate's face. Proof, she reflected, flipping to the next letter in the stack. It, too, was addressed to Lorne Peterson.

She returned her gaze to the drawer, hoping to find more when the door popped open. Startled, she whipped her head to stare wide-eyed at the doorway. She swallowed hard, shock causing her jaw to hang open as she identified the figure as Charles Forsythe. Her eyes grew wider as she recognized the object clutched in his hands. A stout-nosed gun pointed at her.

CHAPTER 36

“Something I can help with, Mrs. MacKenzie?” Forsythe growled at her as he trained his gun at her.

Cate swallowed hard, realizing she was trapped. “I...” she began, attempting to talk her way out of the situation. Nothing came to her, her mind remained blank.

“You what? You happen to be holding my personal property. Though I don’t believe you care. You clearly can’t take a hint. I attempted to scare you and your husband off yesterday. I see that did not work.”

“Scare us?” Cate exclaimed, finding her voice. “You mean kill us!”

“I wouldn’t have shed too many tears had the bullet struck you,” Forsythe admitted.

“Well, it didn’t, Mr. Forsythe! Or should I say Mr. Peterson?”

“Yes,” the man answered. “You’ve figured it out. I assumed you would when I dropped the note. I am Lorne Peterson.”

“Lorne Peterson, grandson of Lorne MacKenzie. Am I correct?”

“What difference does it make?” Lorne snapped, raising the gun.

“I... I’d like to know. If you plan to murder me, I’d like to know why. Why you did this.”

He scowled at her. “All right, Mrs. MacKenzie. You are correct. I am Lorne MacKenzie’s grandson. My mother insisted on naming me after him. For all the good it does me. I’ve no claim to the riches of the MacKenzie clan. I pay for the sins of the mother, or rather grandmother.”

“Do you mean because one of your parents was an illegitimate child of Lorne’s?”

“Oh, yes, my mother was the illegitimate daughter of Lorne MacKenzie. Still, the woman worshipped her father, always insisting he’d rescue us at some point. Give us the life we’d only dreamt of. To her dying day, she professed her infatuation for him. A foolish woman. Where my mother preferred to wait and hope, I preferred to take action.”

“Action? As in theft?”

“As in taking what is owed to me. What I deserve!” he shouted. Lorne raised his eyes to the ceiling, balling his free hand into a fist. “You rich people. All alike! You live a charmed life with no consideration of anyone outside yourselves, never considering how others long for only half of what you have. You can’t...” His voice ceased mid-sentence and Cate heard a thump. For a split second, she assumed he’d fired the gun. She braced her body for the impact. She jumped back a step when Lorne Peterson slumped to the floor, unconscious, his limbs sprawling and the gun sliding toward her.

For a moment, she remained shocked before her instincts kicked in and she grabbed for the gun. She glanced up to find Jack and Rory standing in the doorway. Jack clutched a pistol in his hand, the source of the assault on Lorne.

“Jack!” Cate exclaimed.

“Cate! Thank God.” He rushed into the room and pulled her into a hug. Rory stepped over the sprawled form of Lorne, relieving Cate of the weapon she held.

“Thank heavens you’re all right, Cate,” Rory stated, after Jack pulled back. “I’m so very sorry I didn’t listen yesterday.”

“No, no, it isn’t,” Rory insisted, pacing the room. “I forced you into this position by not wanting to believe what you told me.”

“I found the letters addressed to Lorne Peterson,” Cate said, holding them out. “Charles Forsythe is an alias.”

“Yes, I know,” Rory admitted, not even glancing at the notes. “I’ve known all along what his real name is. He’s a distant cousin. The grandson of...”

“Of Lorne MacKenzie, your great-uncle,” Cate finished.

Rory halted, staring at Cate. “Yes, you are correct! My, you are clever to figure that out, aren’t you?”

Cate shrugged. “Once I found the letter with that name, it clicked. I never met Lorne, but we spent a great deal of time with your grandfather Randolph, and we discussed his reputation. It wasn’t a leap to consider there may be children and grandchildren from some of Lorne’s liaisons.”

“Yes,” Rory responded. “When I met Lorne, he was down on his luck. I considered it a favor to employ him. And being family, I did not want to believe he would steal from us. I assumed he was grateful for the opportunity!”

Cate gave Rory a soft smile. “I’m sorry. But I don’t think Lorne is the gentleman you assume him to be.”

“I’d damn well say he’s not,” Jack chimed in. “He nearly killed Cate. He would have if you hadn’t kept him talking! Good thinking, Lady Cate.”

“Lady Cate?” Rory questioned. “So, you are the MacKenzie, not Jack! How interesting!” He paused a breath. “Though now I feel worse. My refusal to face facts nearly cost my progeny her life.”

Cate laid her hand on his arm. “I’m fine. But there’s still the matter of the missing jewelry. I’m sorry to say I haven’t found it anywhere.”

As Cate finished her statement, Lorne, still on the floor, moaned in pain. He stretched his limbs before his eyes fluttered open. He groaned again, grabbing at the back of his head.

“Easy there, friend,” Jack warned him, hauling him up to sit on the bed. “No sudden movements.”

Lorne continued to ruffle his hair, rubbing his head. “You could have killed me, friend,” he answered.

“And you nearly killed both me and my wife!” Jack exclaimed. “Now the jig is up. We know who you are and what you’ve done. Where is the jewelry?”

“I have no idea what you’re referring to.”

“Please, Lorne,” Rory begged, “I won’t press charges, but the jewelry means more than money to me. They are heirlooms from my grandmother.”

Lorne did not respond. Cate paced the floor, a nagging notion plaguing her mind. As she stalked across the floorboards, the familiar creak sounded throughout the room. Cate stopped in her tracks. She glanced down at the creaky board, rubbing over it with her toes. Her forehead wrinkled, and she bent to inspect the board closer.

“What is it, Cate?” Jack inquired, noticing Cate’s intense gaze.

As he questioned her, Lorne attempted to race from the room. Jack grabbed him and, with Rory’s help, wrestled him back to the bed.

“Where do you think you’re going?” Jack asked.

Cate continued her examination of the creaky floorboard. Using a fingernail, she traced the edge of the board. She detected subtle movement as she outlined the board. Cate tried to push on the board, but it didn’t budge. She attempted to grasp it and pull it upwards but could not.

“Do you have a pocketknife, either of you?” Cate queried.

“I do,” Jack answered, removing it from his jacket pocket. He slid it to Cate, still holding tight to Lorne. She caught it as it rattled across the floor, pulling it open and using the blade’s edge to pry up the floorboard.

“Aha!” she exclaimed as it moved upward. “This creaky floorboard is hiding a compartment.”

She pulled the board out, setting it aside and glanced into the dark hole, gasping.

“What is it, Cate?” Jack questioned.

Cate reached inside, withdrawing an object. She pulled it up, letting it dangle from her fingers. Both Rory and Jack gasped at the sight.

A ruby necklace hung from Cate’s fingers, its fine jewels catching the light at every angle. It remained as dazzling now as it had when Victoria MacKenzie wore it first at her Halloween ball.

“The ruby necklace!” Rory exclaimed, rushing to Cate and removing it from her hand.

“And the sapphire necklace,” Cate added, retrieving the deep blue necklace from the hole.

“Oh!” Rory cried out. “Both of them! Still here. Thank heavens. I’d have felt sick if we weren’t able to retrieve them. My grandmother loved these pieces.”

Rory clutched the two necklaces to his chest. “Anne will be so pleased.”

“I’m glad we found them,” Cate replied, standing and dusting her knees off.

“How?” Rory questioned, his brow furrowing as he considered the discovery. “How did you know where to look?”

“I’ve hit that squeaky floorboard every time I’ve walked around in this room. Something about it bothered me. Just a hunch,” Cate added with a shrug.

“Thank heavens for your hunch, Cate.”

“And now, Mr. Peterson,” Jack growled, pulling the man to his feet. “Time for you to head to your new home: a prison cell.”

“No, please,” Rory said, blocking Jack from moving Lorne further.

“What? We’ve found the jewelry in his possession. You can’t still believe he’s innocent.”

“No, I don’t,” Rory assured them. “But I meant what I said. I will not press charges. He is family. I’d prefer this matter to be kept quiet. As long as you’ll leave as soon as possible, Lorne. I expect no further trouble from you. I shall pay you a severance.”

“You must be joking!” Jack exclaimed, shock entering his voice. “The man’s a thief and a potential murderer!”

“I realize that. I do...” Rory hesitated, glancing to Cate. “But... I’d prefer to avoid the scandal.”

Cate offered Rory a tight-lipped smile, placing her hand on his shoulder. “We understand.” Jack opened his mouth to offer a retort to the contrary, but Cate gave him a small shake of the head to discourage him. “We must create a story that explains this to Officer MacCullough.”

Rory pondered a moment. “Couldn’t we just let it go unsolved?”

“My fear is that he’ll attempt to railroad poor Lillian if it remains unsolved,” Cate responded.

“Ah, you may be correct. What can we do? Perhaps request the case be closed?”

“He’s a stubborn man. I’m not sure that will do it,” Jack answered.

“Jack’s right,” Cate noted, pacing the floor as she pondered the options. “We need another solution. A way to close the case but not blame anyone.”

Jack knit his brows. “How are we going to do that? How can we explain missing jewelry that no longer needs to be found?”

“We have to admit we found it.”

“How do we say we found it without incriminating Mr. Congeniality over here?” Jack queried.

“We obviously can’t say we found it here,” Cate admitted.

“Perhaps we should call Officer MacCullough and be vague about the details. Let it all come out in the wash, as they say,” Rory suggested.

Cate snapped her fingers and flicked her gaze to Rory. “That’s it!”

“Do you really expect being vague will do the trick?” Jack questioned.

“No,” Cate corrected. “No, not the part about being vague. The part about the wash. We’ll say they must have been picked up with some other random garment and sent to the laundry. They were misplaced by mistake, and no one realized until the garment was repaired or washed.”

“Ohhhhh,” Jack answered, realization dawning on him. “In the confusion after the party, someone grabbed clothing to launder, not realizing they also grabbed the jewelry with it and the jewelry turned up later when that clothing was being dealt with.”

Cate nodded. “Yes, that’s right. It’s a sellable story, especially to the less-than-quick Officer MacCullough. He’ll likely be glad to close the case and find it a sufficient explanation.”

“All right. I agree. The secret remains between the four of us and Anne. I insist we tell Anne. I cannot keep this from her.”

“Agreed,” Cate answered, pointing a finger at Lorne. “And he will quietly leave and never speak a word of this to anyone.”

All eyes turned to Lorne. He wrestled himself from Jack’s grasp without a word.

“Well?” Jack asked, squeezing his shoulder. “We can make a lot of trouble for you if you don’t agree. It’s a more than fair deal.”

The man grimaced but acquiesced. “Fine. I shall leave, but I will need time to prepare.”

“I shall pay you for two months work, but you shall leave posthaste. I care not what excuse you give to the other servants.”

“Fine,” Lorne grouched.

Jack unhanded the man, and they left him to commence packing his things. Cate returned the letters to the top of the bureau before exiting, Jack’s wary eye making sure there was no more trouble as she did so. Rory placed the jewelry in his pocket, so it remained unseen by anyone until the ordeal was over.

He led them to Anne’s suite of rooms, entering after knocking to find Anne at her desk.

“Yes, darling?” she inquired before glancing up from her letters. “Oh! Cate and Jack, hello!” She stood from the desk.

“Wonderful news, Anne,” Rory began. “Clever Cate has found the jewelry!”

A shocked expression painted over Anne’s face. Rory revealed the two necklaces. “However, did you find them? Where were they?”

“I’m afraid that’s a rather sordid tale, dear. Please, sit down.”

Anne stared at him for a moment before taking a seat on her chaise. Rory explained the affair to Anne. Anne’s face was aghast as he explained the familial connection of their under-butler. She whitened further when he admitted Lorne was the responsible party and the circumstances of Lorne’s relationship to him. He finished by detailing the deal made between them and the story they would supply to Officer MacCullough to close the case.

When he finished, Anne leapt from her seat, her hands balled into fists. “Rory! How could you be so foolish? The man is a thief! He should be punished!”

“Please, Anne, try to understand. I don’t want the scandal it would bring. His connection would be revealed! We couldn’t hide it.”

“Hogwash!” Anne exclaimed. Her reaction surprised Cate, who had never seen this level of emotion displayed by Anne.

“Anne, please!” Rory begged, preferring to be finished with the matter. “I prefer not to discuss it further! The decision has been made. I expect you to abide by it. Now, if you will excuse me, I have many details to take care of, including informing Officer MacCullough. But first I will return these beauties to the safe.”

Rory departed, leaving Jack, Cate, and a fuming Anne. Anne paced the length of the room. “How could he decide this? That man should be in jail!”

“If it’s any consolation,” Cate noted, “he’ll be leaving the estate soon.”

Anne collapsed onto the chaise. “It should be, but it isn’t. How could he do this? To his own family?”

“It’s because Lorne’s family that Rory is doing it,” Cate explained.

“No,” Anne disagreed. “Not Rory, Lorne! He lived among us, performed a job given to him by Rory to help and then stabs his own family in the back.”

“I’m sorry,” Cate said, easing onto the chaise next to Anne and taking her hands.

“Oh, how unbecoming this all is,” Anne answered, glancing between Cate and Jack. “But I am so angry!”

“It will pass once the shock is worn off,” Cate assured her.

Anne shook her head. “I want to believe that, however, I’m not sure. I’m shaking with anger at this moment. How can I look anyone in the eye and lie to them about this incident!”

An idea formed in Cate’s head.

CHAPTER 37

Cate stared up at Anna, a slight smile on her lips. “Perhaps it would be helpful to get your thoughts out. In a letter. You don’t have to send it, but perhaps you should write your anger and disappointment down as though you’re speaking to Lorne. It may help ease your emotions.”

Anne sat in silence, clutching Cate’s hands for a few breaths. “Perhaps it is a wise idea, Cate. I shall consider it. Well, I prefer not to dwell on it further right now. Oh! We are late for lunch. Will you give me a moment to compose myself?” She rushed into her bedroom.

“Clever, Lady Cate, clever.”

Cate winked at Jack. “She needs to write a letter so I can find it in our time and investigate!”

Anne reappeared, and they navigated to the dining room for lunch. They spent the afternoon discussing the case with Officer MacCullough. Cate found the man’s grunts impossible to read but, at last, he agreed to close the case without assigning blame to any party.

Cate’s story of finding the jewelry amidst a laundry pile made for most of the dinner conversation. Though the group shared many laughs over the investigation and its outcome, sadness crept over Cate as she realized this was the last evening she would spend with her great-grandparents.

Over cocktails before dinner, Cate and Jack announced they would depart the next morning. Dinner was a bittersweet affair for Cate, who prepared herself to say goodbye to people she’d likely never see again.

There would be plans made to keep in touch, invitations extended, and she would make promises she couldn't keep.

But she could put those conversations off until tomorrow morning. She was determined to enjoy her last dinner with her family. She even wore the dress Amelia gifted her. She planned to keep the dress, putting it in her collection in case she ever returned to this time.

Cate and Jack turned in soon after dinner, feigning the excuse of packing prior to leaving. This wasn't a complete lie, they did pack, readying their suitcases to return with them tomorrow morning.

They returned to their time. A feeling of satisfaction settled over Cate, coupled with melancholy.

"You going to be okay, Lady Cate?" Jack asked before leaving her to change.

She nodded without speaking at first. "Yeah. I'm glad it's over in a way."

"But you'll miss everyone."

"I will. Especially Amelia. But she's leaving on Friday anyway, so she wouldn't be there to visit."

"Perhaps you'll get a nice Christmas present, and we'll visit again before the year is out."

Cate smiled at Jack. "Wow! You suggesting time travel? Are you sick?"

Jack chuckled. "I just may be, but you can hold me to this promise. I know how much your family means to you, Lady Cate."

"Careful. I have a good memory. I won't forget this!"

"I don't expect you will!" Jack said, backing out of the room. "M'lady!" He bowed with his usual gusto.

Cate rose from bed with a heavy heart. Despite solving the mystery, today she would say goodbye to the family she'd spent the past few weeks getting to know. She hated this part. It had been hard when she'd said goodbye to Randolph and Victoria. This farewell would be no easier. She'd grown fond of all the 1925 MacKenzies. She felt especially drawn to Amelia, her great-grandmother. Perhaps she imagined it because of the connection between them, but Cate experienced it all the same. Today would be hard.

Jack met Cate after breakfast in her sitting room for one last trip to 1925. After arriving, Cate and Jack made their way to the sitting room where Anne and Amelia sipped tea.

“Good morning!” Cate said, trying to sound upbeat as they entered the room.

“Jack! Cate! All packed?” Amelia inquired.

“We are,” Jack responded.

“Too bad you couldn’t stay one more evening,” Amelia lamented.

“Duty calls,” Jack fibbed. “But we’ve had a lovely time.”

“And we can’t thank you enough for the gracious welcome,” Cate added as Rory and Lucas entered the room.

“Saying our goodbyes?” Rory questioned.

“We are,” Jack replied. “And thanking everyone for their hospitality.”

“No thanks needed. We should thank you! Your sharp detective skills proved invaluable to us,” Rory said.

“Not necessary! I was happy to help!” Cate answered.

“All the same, thanks are extended,” Anne agreed. “Also, thank you for your suggestion yesterday. I took you up on it and it helped ever so much.”

Cate nodded, not responding to the comment but understanding.

Silence filled the air for a few breaths. Amelia spoke first, “Well, I suppose you two are eager to be on your way.”

“I wouldn’t say eager,” Cate lamented. “We will miss all of you and this beautiful castle! But we need to get a start on our journey.”

“Yes,” Jack added. “We have a lot of ground to cover today.”

“Well, let’s not treat it with such finality. It will not be long before we are together again,” Amelia responded.

“Yes,” Anne agreed. “The holidays will be upon us before we realize it. And Amelia tells me she plans to invite you to the country home this summer. That will be lovely. Rory and I also plan to travel there.”

Cate pasted a smile on her face, choking back her sadness as she realized this invitation would never pan out. She nodded. “That would be wonderful if we can fit it into our schedule.”

“Oh, please, Jack,” Amelia requested, placing her hand on Jack’s arm for emphasis, “if you can’t make it, let Cate come along herself. She’ll need the break!”

“As long as I don’t miss her too much!” Jack hedged.

Another moment of silence passed before Rory spoke. "Well," he said, sticking his hand out to Jack, "it has been a pleasure. We will never forget the help you've given us on your first visit. All the best to you."

Jack accepted it, giving Rory's hand a solid shake. "Thank you. It's been a wonderful visit."

Cate embraced Anne and then Amelia, lingering a tad longer with Amelia. Cate held back the tears forming in her eyes as she pulled back.

"Oh," Anne said after final goodbyes were said, "the car isn't 'round yet. Did you call for it, Rory?"

"No need. Cate and I would like to enjoy one last walk and have arranged for a car to meet us in town."

"How adventurous of you. Are you sure?" Anne inquired.

"Yes," Cate assured her.

"We've had our luggage sent into town earlier, so it will be an easy journey," Jack noted.

"Well, I suppose we'll retrieve our coats and be on our way. Thank you again," Cate said.

The group disbanded with Jack and Cate climbing the stairs and returning to the bedroom suite. Without a word, they returned with their luggage to their time from 1925 one last time.

"You okay?" Jack questioned when they returned.

Cate nodded with a tight-lipped smile. "Yeah," she said after a moment. "Yeah, I'll be okay."

"How about a post-mystery meeting? I have a few items to discuss with you for spring planning."

"Estate business... the perfect thing to get my mind off of leaving my great-grandmother in 1925!" Cate quipped.

"Roof repairs are enough to take away any of your 'missing-my-family blues," Jack retorted. Cate giggled. "See you in the library in twenty minutes, give or take?"

"How about the sitting room?"

"No, thanks, I don't think so. Library," Jack insisted. "I need those comfy armchairs."

Cate rolled her eyes at him. "Okay, okay, library it is." They parted ways and Cate changed into normal clothes, setting aside her dress. She chose not to put it away just yet, deciding she'd deal with it later.

Cate ushered Riley and Bailey to the library, finding Jack already lounging in one of the generous armchairs near the fireplace. They spent almost two hours going over the projects needed once the weather broke in the spring. After the discussion, Cate slouched back in her chair, too.

"These chairs are comfy," she admitted. "I need to overcome my fear of this room."

"Perhaps with this latest mystery solved your nightmares will subside," Jack suggested.

"I hope so!"

"By the way, you owe me twenty pounds!"

"So I do!" Cate exclaimed. "Perhaps we can go double or nothing on our next adventure."

"Okay. Just don't go finding any more adventures soon, Lady Cate," Jack quipped.

Cate grinned at him as Riley let out an earsplitting yip. She groaned, assuming they'd experience another bout of hysteria over the leaky bookshelf. Instead, she spotted Riley staring at the fireplace. She furrowed her brow, then relief coursed through her. Riley's toy moose lay on the stone in front of the hearth.

Cate chuckled as she climbed to her feet. "Oh no! Did Moose run too close to the fire?" She made her way over to rescue the stuffed toy. Riley, too nervous to approach the heat of the roaring fire, stared at his beloved toy from a distance.

She leaned forward to retrieve the moose, steadying herself on one of the large stones framing the large fireplace. As she bent over, she stumbled, catching herself before she toppled.

"Cate!" Jack shouted, rushing toward her.

"Whoa!" Cate exclaimed. "This stone seems to be loose. When I put my weight on it, it shifted."

"Perhaps that's the source of the leak," Jack surmised, staring at it.

Cate's brow crinkled, eyeing at the stone. She placed her hand on the stone again. She pushed, leaning her weight against it. A loud crack sounded, reverberating throughout the room. Her eyes widened, and she backed up a step, almost bumping into Jack.

The stone stuck in the pushed-in position. A creaking noise followed, and a gust of air rushed past them. The scent of must filled their nostrils.

Riley and Bailey barked, backing several steps away. Cate's jaw fell open, and she glanced to Jack. He swallowed hard.

When pressed, the stone on the fireplace's right side triggered a mechanism. The leaky bookcase, the source of Cate's nightmares and the dogs' trepidation, had swung open. A black hole stared back at them.

A shiver passed through Cate, though she couldn't say whether it was from the cool air emanating from the open bookshelf or the mild dread she experienced from the situation that matched her nightmares.

She swallowed hard, approaching the hole, determined to face her fears.

Jack followed, peering into the blackness. "This explains the leak. Looks like a passage. I'll grab some flashlights."

"I told you!" Cate whispered, breathless.

"That you did, Lady Cate, that you did," Jack answered with a shake of his head.

Jack retrieved two flashlights from a cabinet on the opposite side of the room while Cate quieted the dogs. He handed her one of the flashlights and they both powered them on. Cate shined her light into the blackness. The light provided a dim outline of the cavity's features.

She stepped inside, shining the light around the space. Cobwebs decorated it, and the stale air wafted to her nostrils.

"It continues this way," Cate informed Jack, shining her light to the right where the passage continued down a set of stairs.

"Careful, Cate. We've no idea the condition of those stairs. Let me go first." Jack pushed ahead of her, creeping down the steps, testing each one as he went.

Cate nodded, keeping a firm grip on the dusty handrail. She tiptoed behind him, careful with her weight on the aged stairs.

They reached a landing, and the stairs turned at a right angle. They inched down the remaining steps, spilling onto the stone floor at the bottom.

Cate and Jack shined their lights around the cavernous space. Cool, damp air surrounded them, and Cate shrugged her sweater tighter around her. Jack approached the nearby wall, focusing his beam on an object there.

Cate followed his gaze. "What is it?"

"Looks like a lamp. Kerosene by the smell of it," Jack answered. "Might help to light this and any others we find. Our flashlights aren't doing very much in a space this size."

"Good idea," Cate agreed.

“I’ll run up for some matches. Will you be okay here by yourself?”

Cate nodded. “Sure,” she muttered as she swung her flashlight beam around, anything but sure.

Jack squeezed her shoulder, hurrying up the stairs. Within a few moments, he returned and lit the lamp. He searched around the walls, finding a few others and lighting them. The warm light illuminated the space, revealing additional details.

Cate gaped at the enormous space. “What is this place?”

A large desk sat in the center of the space, piled with books and papers. Storage shelves placed along the walls held various items, some housed in crates. Trunks littered the floor and several large tables stood at various spots around the room, also covered with assorted materials. A thick layer of dust covered everything.

“I have no idea,” Jack admitted. “And why isn’t it shown on any plans? Not even Douglas’s private plans.”

“Perhaps it was added after Douglas’s era?” Cate conjectured.

“Maybe,” Jack replied.

Cate wandered toward the desk. She blew away some of the dust covering the materials. With two fingers, she lifted a few items as Jack perused the shelves.

She picked up one of the books on the desk, a thick leather-bound volume filled with script writing. She thumbed through it, dust exploding into the air as she shuffled the pages. She flipped open the cover, staring at the text written on the first page.

“I doubt this was added after Douglas’s era,” she commented, still staring at the page.

“Why do you say that?” Jack asked, joining her and peering over her shoulder at the page.

“This book,” Cate replied. “It says Journal of Douglas MacKenzie.”

Cate glanced around the cavernous space, awestruck.

Jack rifled through the materials on the desk. “There are several journals here. Looks like they all belong to Douglas,” Jack noted after opening a few.

Cate wandered to one of the tables, studying the things scattered across it. She spun to face Jack. “I think we’re standing in the private research laboratory of Douglas MacKenzie.”

“I think you may be right,” Jack answered.

“Oh, Jack, do you realize what this means?”

Jack stared at her.

A smile spread across Cate’s face, and she raised an eyebrow at him. “It looks like our next adventure just found us.”

CHAPTER 1

Cate's heart pounded hard in her chest. She puffed with exertion. Her throat parched as she raced down the hall. She risked a glance behind her. The hallway appeared empty. Where was he, she wondered?

She hurried through the doorway into the library. She tugged the train of her gown inside before closing and locking the doors.

Cate backed a few steps away. A loud pounding shook the doors. She jumped with each jolt.

"Catherine," a voice growled on the other side. Cate's breath caught in her throat at the sound of his voice. She swallowed hard as she glanced around the library. No escape routes existed. Could she climb from a window, she pondered?

Cate hastened to one window and yanked on the handle. It stuck fast. She struggled with it as the pounding ceased. She spun to face the now silent door. Her eyes widened as the doorknob turned. Would the lock hold? Not for long, Cate surmised.

Her eyes searched the space and she spotted a new feature. A gaping black hole stared back at her. Cate lifted her skirts and sprinted into the blackness.

Cate knew the space well. Additional light was not needed. She pressed against the stone wall as she crept down the stairs leading to Douglas MacKenzie's secret office. At the bottom, Cate groped the wall in the dim light. Her fingers found the trigger to close the secret passage off to the library. She pulled it. A scraping sound filled her ears as the bookshelf swung closed.

The closing bookcase shut out all light from the room. With the space plunged into blackness, Cate held her breath as she strained her ears for sounds of the library doors being breached. Silence pervaded the space.

After a moment, faint footsteps sounded on the floor above her. Cate's pulse quickened as she glanced to the ceiling. She retreated further into Douglas's office. In the darkness, Cate bumped into his desk. It made a sickening scrape across the floor.

The footsteps halted above. When they resumed, they hurried toward her location. A tear escaped Cate's eye as she rushed to hide.

Light illuminated the space she searched. He had opened the bookcase. "Catherine? Where are you hiding?" he called to her.

Cate held in a sob as she squeezed into a darkened corner. She pressed against the damp stone wall as she sank to the floor. Footfalls sounded on the wooden steps leading down to her hiding place. Cate sucked in air as she struggled to maintain her composure.

The man appeared at the bottom of the stairs, backlit by the light from above. Even featureless, his form was imposing. Cate pressed a hand over her mouth as she strove to remain silent.

The walls around her pushed against her back and side. Were they moving closer to her or was she pressing herself closer to them, she wondered? The man stalked across the room. Had he spotted her? Cate shrank further back. The walls closed in around her. She squeezed her eyes shut as the figure approached.

The damp, cold rock brushed against Cate's skin. When she opened her eyes, the stone wall filled her vision. What happened, she pondered? She felt around, finding stone surrounded her. She pushed against the cold, rough rock, searching for an exit. She found none.

Cate pounded her fists against the wall in front of her. Tears streamed down her face as she fought to escape her prison. "HELP!" she screamed. "HELP!"

Cate vaulted to sitting. She gulped in air as her heart thudded in her chest. A glance around the space confirmed her location. She sat in her bedroom. Moonlight streamed through the window overlooking the back garden.

Riley, her little black and white dog, popped his head up and stared at her. His dark almond eyes studied Cate with a quizzical expression. Next to him, his dog pal, Bailey, glanced sideways at Cate. "I'm okay, guys," she said as her breathing slowed and her heart returned to normal speed. She reached over and tousled the fur on each of their heads. "Just another nightmare. I'd better write it down."

Satisfied with her explanation, Riley let his head drop onto the bed. With a sigh, his eyes drooped shut, and he returned to sleep. Bailey's eyes closed as he drifted back to dreamland, too. Cate flicked on the bedside lamp and grabbed a notebook and pen from her night table. She flipped it open to the first blank page and began to detail her dream.

After Cate filled in the information, she closed the book, set it on her night table, and switched off the light. As darkness surrounded her, she relaxed back into her pillows. Yet another nightmare, she reflected.

The nightmares had plagued her since early December. Now, almost four months later, they were a growing cause for concern. When they started, Cate assumed they were warning her about something in the library. After she and Jack found a hidden passage leading to the secret workspace of Douglas MacKenzie, the castle's first proprietor, Cate assumed the nightmares would cease. She had been wrong.

The haunting dreams continued for months after they'd located Douglas's office. Shortly after the discovery, Jack suggested the nightmares would taper off. Instead, they had done the opposite, becoming more frequent and more terrifying in nature as time passed.

Cate now spent almost every night chased by a mysterious man whose identity she could not ascertain. After numerous discussions with Jack, he suggested she detail them in a dream journal. Perhaps keeping track of them would allow them to identify the source.

So Cate diligently wrote all the details she could recall upon awakening. In this version, the man chased her through the castle. As usual, they wound up in the library. The gaping hole represented the secret entrance to Douglas's workshop. As Cate sought safety there, the space had somehow morphed into a stone tomb, trapping her inside.

Cate spent another hour contemplating the nightmares before falling asleep. Why had they not stopped after she found Douglas's office? Were they a warning? If so, of what?

Cate pondered the meaning of the many dreams. In the two months she'd been keeping track, she'd filled half of the thick notebook's pages. Detail after detail from various versions flooded back into her mind. She recalled her heart pounding as she fled through the castle halls, the terror she experienced as the man hissed her name while chasing her, the icy air that gusted from the gaping hole in the library. The damp, cold stone that closed in around her as she hid.

Cate recalled other specifics from prior dreams. In each case, she wore old-fashioned clothing. From the notes Cate described in her dream journal, the clothing appeared to be from the late 1700s.

To the casual observer, this detail may seem nonsensical, typical of a dream. But for Cate, well-acquainted with the well-guarded secret within the castle walls, the clothing seemed indicative of something more. She stared at the timepiece she wore around her neck. At almost a year after her arrival, memories of her first few months in the castle flooded her mind.

A smile crossed her face as she remembered her first glances at her new abode and her overwhelming sense of home. A chuckle escaped her as she recalled the events that occurred over the last summer. From phantom maids to ghostly gardeners, Cate assumed ghosts haunted the halls of her new home. Little did she know she wore around her neck the key to a secret larger than shadowy specters. Imprinted with the warning ALWAYS KEEP AN EYE ON YOUR TIME, the golden timepiece interacted with various areas within the castle walls allowing the wearer to travel through time.

Amazed and excited at the discovery, Cate and Jack, who was sworn to protect the secret along with Cate as part of his duty as a Reid, had traveled to the 1850s and the 1920s to help Cate's ancestors solve various mysteries.

The smile returned to Cate's face as she reminisced about meeting her ancestors. After a few fond memories, her mind circled back to her current conundrum. She'd never traveled to the 1700s. She wasn't even aware of a spot in the castle that led to this time period.

Still, the clothing in her dream suggested the terror she lived out nearly every night pointed to this era. Did something or someone call her to that time? Was the man chasing her Douglas MacKenzie? Was he calling for help? The presence always seemed sinister to her. But she couldn't understand why she'd get that vibe from Douglas.

Cate sighed as she stroked the silky fur on Riley's back. She hadn't solved anything thus far, and she wouldn't tonight either. She closed her eyes and drifted off to what she hoped would be a dreamless state.

Red streaked the morning sky as Cate awoke. The sun peeked over the misty moors as she stretched and climbed from her bed. She teetered on the edge, her eyelids still drooping with sleepiness. Her gaze fell to the notebook on the night table. Elements of her dream poured back into her mind.

She frowned at the notebook and turned her focus to Riley. With a large yawn, the little pup stretched and climbed to his feet. His tail offered a lazy wag in her direction as he sidled next to her.

"Good morning, sleepyhead," Cate said as he licked her cheek.

Cate kissed the top of his head as he sank back down amidst the covers for a second snooze while she showered. Bailey stretched as he eyed her from his spot. His eyes closed to slits as she plodded to the bathroom.

Her mind dwelled on her dream as she adjusted the water's temperature before stepping into her shower. The warm water caressed her skin as she parsed through more details. She came to no new conclusions as she dressed for her day.

Riley shook off any sleepiness the moment the cool Scottish air hit his nostrils. He raced around the portion of the yard closest to the castle. His floppy ears bounced up and down as he bounded around in a circle with his mouth open in a giddy grin. Cate couldn't help but smile at the little pup's exuberance for life. No matter the situation, Riley could always bring a grin to her face.

A bit more reserved than Riley, Bailey trotted around the property, sniffing bushes and following the flight of morning birds venturing from their nests.

Cate collected them after their romp and entered the castle's kitchen for breakfast. Inside, she met her full staff who were preparing for breakfast. Mrs. Fraser, her current housekeeper, bustled about the kitchen as she prepared the morning meal. Close on Mrs. Fraser's heels was her housekeeper trainee, Molly Williams. Cate's former department secretary, Molly, had moved to Scotland a few months ago. When Mrs. Fraser retires,

Molly would take over as the housekeeper. That wouldn't be for several years, according to Mrs. Fraser.

Molly bent over the oven, testing cookies with a spatula.

"How do they look, Miss Molly?" Mrs. Fraser called over her shoulder as she shook raisins into a bowl.

"Eh," Molly answered, "flat."

Mrs. Fraser finished her task and peered into the oven over Molly's shoulder. "Aye, too much opening of that door and fiddling, that's why. Close it up, girl, and let them bake!"

Molly nodded and pushed the oven door closed. She switched on the oven light and continued to stare at them. "They'll cook in their own time, Molly. Leave them for a few minutes. They'll puff up again."

Cate chuckled at the scene. For months, Molly had begged Mrs. Fraser to teach her to bake the cookies she often supplied everyone with. Mrs. Fraser had finally allowed Molly to try a simple shortbread recipe.

Molly fretted over the recipe for days, afraid her attempt wouldn't measure up. She shot Cate an apologetic glance as she pulled her gaze from the oven. With a shrug, Molly mouthed to Cate, "Hope they're okay!"

"They'll be fine," Mrs. Fraser said without skipping a beat. Cate suppressed a laugh at Mrs. Fraser's almost extrasensory ability.

At the kitchen table, Cate spotted Mr. Fraser and Jack. Mr. Fraser, her head groundskeeper, sipped a cup of coffee as he read a list of tasks for the week. Jack, Cate's estate manager and time-traveling buddy, set his coffee mug on the table as both dogs swarmed him.

"Well, hello, little laddies!" Jack said as Riley leapt into his lap and Bailey stood with his paws planted on Jack's thigh. "Did we have a wonderful sleep last night?"

Riley answered in the form of a lick to Jack's cheek. "Oh, is that right, big fellow?" Jack replied to him.

"Good morning, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser said as Cate sat down at the table.

"Good morning," Cate answered. "Putting Molly to work this morning, I see."

"Aye, the lassie has earned her first attempt at the shortbread."

"Earned?" Cate inquired.

"Aye," Jack answered. "She passed her shortbread exam yesterday." He winked at Cate.

Cate chuckled at his statement. “Don’t laugh, Lady Cate,” Molly said as she placed a glass of water in front of Cate. “He’s telling the truth.”

Cate knit her brows. “There was a test?”

“Aye, there was,” Mrs. Fraser responded. “Had to memorize that recipe. I cannae have the lassie glancing at the recipe card every few seconds. The dough is very persnickety. One moment it’s perfect and the next it’s ruined. That’s what makes my shortbreads the best!

“They are the best,” Jack agreed. “When do we get to taste test Molly’s?”

Molly peeked through the oven’s window, a frown crossing her face. “You may not want to taste mine,” she fretted.

“I’ll be the judge of that,” Jack responded. “You’ve got to let us try them to know for sure.”

Mrs. Fraser peered into the oven again. “A few more minutes,” she advised. “See how they are puffy now that you’ve left them alone?”

A smile crossed Molly’s face as she gazed at the baking tray. “Yes, they do look a bit better!”

Mrs. Fraser and Molly finished all the breakfast preparations as Riley and Bailey curled up near Cate’s feet. Cate grabbed a bowl as Molly, at Mrs. Fraser’s direction, pulled the cookies from the oven. “Set them out and leave them,” Mrs. Fraser advised.

Molly nodded and placed the baking tray on the stovetop before retrieving her breakfast. The group sat down for the meal, sharing a discussion about Cate’s upcoming one-year anniversary as a countess.

Mrs. Campbell, the town’s librarian and president of the historical society, had convinced Cate a celebration was in order. With less than three months to go, the massive celebration she planned still required a fair amount of work. Though this time, everyone at Dunhaven Castle fully supported the party since it celebrated their Lady Cate. Scheduled for the sixth of June, Mrs. Campbell planned an extravaganza that would remain unrivaled for years to come.

“Will we be baking for the anniversary party?” Molly questioned.

“No,” Cate responded. “You are guests at my party! Not caterers!”

“Aye, true,” Mrs. Fraser responded. “But we will still be baking!”

Cate tilted her head to offer a confused glance at Mrs. Fraser. “But...” she began, when Mrs. Fraser interrupted her.

“Not for the party. I agree, let the caterers handle the scores of people in attendance.”

Cate’s face blanched. “I hope there aren’t scores.”

Mrs. Fraser continued, “But we shall have our own private celebration for you, Lady Cate! With a large meal and plenty of cookies. And I’d like to make another Scottish Berry Brûlée. The same dessert I made when you arrived.”

Cate smiled. “Now this is a party I can get on board with! I’ll even help with the baking!”

“No, you won’t, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser chided. “It is a celebration for you, so you can’t prepare anything for it. And given your tales of woe in the kitchen, I’d rather you didn’t, anyway.” Mrs. Fraser chuckled.

Cate giggled, too. As she approached her one-year anniversary, she marveled at the change in less than one year. Not only in herself, she reflected, but in everyone around her. When she arrived, Mrs. Fraser detested the idea of a “crass American” running Dunhaven. Now, the woman planned not one but two celebrations in her honor.

She glanced around the table. Molly grinned at Mrs. Fraser as they discussed her choice of desserts for the special occasion. Mr. Fraser, always quiet, wore a small grin as he interjected comments about sprucing up the grounds and transforming them for the party.

Cate’s eyes rested on Jack, her estate manager and, more than that, her friend. In less than a year, their lives had radically changed when they discovered time travel. Jack, ever the cautious one, always warned against anything too extreme. Even so, he typically gave in to her whims and allowed her to visit and help her family from generations past. He glanced at her from across the table, a wide smile on his face.

Cate returned his expression. She, too, had changed. While she remained introverted, she was no longer a wallflower. She’d transformed from quiet college professor to gracious Countess.

As the meal wound down, she considered her next task. With an upcoming meeting with Mrs. Campbell on Wednesday, she had many details to review. Orders were due soon on several items, and Mrs. Campbell hoped to have all decisions made within the next two weeks.

Still, with the meeting in two days, Cate could put those decisions off until tomorrow. Instead, she planned to continue her research into Douglas MacKenzie, the castle’s builder. Two months ago, they had found his secret workspace. Filled to the brim with journals, sketches, technical drawings, plans and odd devices, she had spent the first few months of the new year cataloging and sorting through much of it.

She hoped to learn more about the strange anomaly of time travel encompassed in the castle walls through Douglas's many journals. Unfortunately for Cate, she'd learned nothing thus far. Nonetheless, she was determined to continue exploring options until she made some headway.

After breakfast, she enjoyed a cuppa with Molly and Mrs. Fraser before her usual mind-centering walk around the property with the dogs. With the air still chillier than she'd like, Cate kept her walk shorter than she did in the summer months.

She returned to the castle and navigated the halls to the library. A fire roared in the large central fireplace. Tall bookcases surrounded it, stretching from floor to ceiling. They extended around three of the four walls. The only bare wall contained massive windows adorned with heavy tartan draperies overlooking one of the estate's gardens.

Soon, spring flowers would bloom just outside the window where a massive wooden desk sat. She would use them as a distraction from her work whenever a blinking cursor stared at her on her laptop screen. Her book on the castle's history stalled as her research on Douglas dead-ended beyond the standard basics recorded in the history books.

Perhaps Mrs. Campbell could tell her more. They had not discussed Douglas yet. As the town's historical society president, Mrs. Campbell may have information. As the town's biggest gossip, Cate felt certain she would have some tidbit about Douglas to share. She made a mental note to ask during their next meeting.

Riley and Bailey wandered into the library behind Cate. After their walk, a customary nap was in order. Riley wandered toward the fireplace, with Bailey meandering behind him. Bailey curled into a tight ball close enough to feel the warmth of the fire. Riley sprawled next to him, stretching his little body as far as he could before letting his head rest on the thick area rug under him.

Cate smiled at the scene before turning her attention to her target. Her eyes focused on one particular bookshelf across the room. She stalked to the fireplace and pressed the top stone. The square stone retracted, and the customary creak of the hinged bookcase filled the room.

CHAPTER 2

She opened the bookcase on so many occasions before, Riley and Bailey no longer reacted to the bookcase's groaning, nor the smell of must that followed. She stepped toward a large cord on the floor and pushed the plug into the wall socket.

Light bloomed from deep within the cavity. The temporary lighting Jack rigged for her in the secret lab brightened the dim space. Light filtered all the way to the top of the squeaky wooden staircase leading into its depths. With a deep inhale and exhale, she crossed to the opening and peered into the brightened space. What would she find there today?

"Ready to head into your dungeon, m'lady?" Jack queried from behind Cate.

At the sound of his voice, Riley bounded to his feet and dashed across the room. He leapt from the edge of the area rug, flying through the air into Jack's waiting arms. "Did I wake you, little fellow?" Jack asked as he rubbed his head. Bailey meandered over, stretching before glancing up to Jack for an ear scratch.

Cate smiled at the scene. "They were just about to nap," she informed Jack.

"That is a great idea, boys. Probably better than spending your time in the dusty dungeon!"

"It's not a dungeon," Cate corrected. "It would have been easier to assess had it been!"

"Still no progress?" Jack inquired.

She threw her arms out with a shrug. “Nope,” she admitted. “I’m still sorting through. There’s tons of stuff down there, but so far nothing beyond sorting is getting done.”

“Perhaps today will be your lucky day, Lady Cate,” Jack suggested.

Cate raised her eyebrows as she considered it. “Every day is my lucky day. I inherited a castle. Though beyond that, I expect today I’ll only find frustration in my dungeon and no answers.”

“Why do you do it?” Jack inquired.

Cate inhaled a deep breath as she formulated her answer. “It’s Douglas’s lab. The man who discovered the time travel anomaly. And the man who figured out how to control it. The information down there is invaluable. It could teach us so much about the phenomenon. It’s worth it even if we glean a tiny bit of information from it.

“If, Lady Cate, if. So far, you haven’t deduced anything.”

Cate shook her head with a sideways frown. “Nope. So far every book I’ve found has contained gibberish.”

“Perhaps they contain the rantings of a madman. Nonsensical ramblings he scribbled after losing his mind,” Jack suggested.

“I don’t know,” Cate answered with a sigh. “Once I get everything sorted, I’ll take more than a glance at the hand-written journals and determine if I can make any headway.”

“Well, good luck, Lady Cate,” Jack said with a grin.

“Thanks!” Cate answered, matching his expression. “You know, I’m surprised you’re so keen on me making any progress! You hate time travel!”

“The longer you spend deciphering those journals, the less we time travel,” Jack answered with a grin. Cate shook her head at him. “And I don’t hate it. I just don’t like it.”

“Same difference,” Cate contended.

“Not really, but anyway, I don’t want to keep you from your gibberish and dust. I just stopped by because I needed your signature on a few items before sending it to Mr. Smythe for payment.”

“Oh, sure!” Cate answered. She approached Jack, who passed her a folder. Cate grabbed a pen from the desk. Jack explained the basics of each as Cate signed off.

After collecting the paperwork, he said, “And now, I leave you to your research. M’lady!” He gave an extravagant bow before retreating from the room.

Cate shook her head at the comical display. With Jack gone, the dogs returned to their preferred morning nap spots, while she returned to the open passage. She stepped inside and hovered at the top of the stairs. The moment they had first discovered the secret area popped into her mind as she descended each step. They groaned under her weight. Just complaints from aging wood, Jack had told her, after a thorough inspection. Before she continued to traverse them on a regular basis, he insisted on ensuring their safety. With every creak, she thanked him.

As she reached the bottom, she glanced around the disheveled room. She contemplated whether she'd made any progress. Piles of a variety of items sat in various locations around the room. She had sorted them to the best of her ability. She filled the many bookshelves with the odd items which appeared to be inventions or attempts at inventions. In her cataloging, she found a prototype of the timepiece she carried around her neck, a rudimentary attempt at a lightbulb, an odd contraption shaped like a helmet and attached to a magnet, and various other peculiarities she could not identify.

In a corner of the room, a wooden staircase led to nowhere. In the opposite corner stood a metal box large enough for a human to stand in, with tubes leading at all angles from it. Next to it sat a large glass ball, stained by watermarks. Across the room, a twisted mass of tubes, beakers and pipettes formed a complicated chemistry setup.

Cate stared at the other piles. She'd used another bookshelf for reference books. In the middle of the floor stood the room's true bounty. A collection of journals written by Douglas MacKenzie. Next to that stood a jumble of technical drawings with his signature.

When Cate and Jack found the space, the journals scattered throughout the room had provided the promise of answers regarding the castle's secret. She recalled her heart skipping a beat as she'd read the words "The Journal of Douglas MacKenzie" on the leather-bound book discarded on the desk.

Only after sorting through them had her hopes been dashed. Journal after journal contained nothing more than gibberish. At first, she had searched every page for a readable entry. After the seventh journal, she gave up on the exhaustive examination of each journal's pages. Instead, a cursory glance at the first page, followed by a quick leaf through was all she completed before tossing the journal into the ever-growing pile with the others.

Even the sketches of his inventions were adorned with annotations in gibberish. Cate took her frustrations out by promising to find answers after she'd organized the space. It allowed her to make progress without requiring a search for solutions regarding the gobbledygook in the twelve journals she'd discovered.

Cate's organization goal would soon be met. With one bookshelf left to sort through, she estimated she'd finish in the next day or so. She stepped onto the stone floor and made her way to the large structure. She'd cleared the top shelf already, saving herself multiple trips up and down the stepstool today. She focused her energy on the second shelf at her eye level.

Cate pulled the first item from the shelf. A rusty spring the size of her arm, with two cup-shaped objects on either end. Cate rotated the object in her hands. She peered into the cups and placed one to her ear. With both hands, she pulled on both ends, stretching the coil before allowing it to snap back. Dust clouded the air as the ancient spring sprung back to shape. She coughed and waved at the air in front of her. She shuttled it to an empty spot on her "inventions" shelf.

She continued working her way through all the materials, polishing off two shelves before lunch. Her progress was made slower by her fiddling with each object. Some of them she recalled spotting in technical drawings. She often spent time digging through the pile to compare the sketches to the physical objects. Without any readable text, she learned little about any of the items.

"Lady Cate!"

Cate glanced toward the staircase leading to the library. Mrs. Fraser's voice floated down from above. "Lady Cate!" she shouted again.

"Coming!" Cate shouted as she climbed to her feet. She clapped her hands together to remove as much dust as possible before brushing off her shirt and pants.

"Still working in that dusty dungeon?" Mrs. Fraser inquired as Cate appeared at the top of the stairs.

"Afraid so," Cate said. "It's not a dungeon, though. There's some really interesting stuff down there, to be honest!"

Mrs. Fraser lifted an eyebrow at Cate, her eyes sliding up and down her form. "Young Jack says it's a dungeon," she said with a nod. "It's a dungeon. And look at the state you've got yourself in! I dare say we'll not get the dust out of those."

Cate glanced down at her black leggings, now a shade of gray from the powder covering them. Her burgundy tunic hadn't fared much better. A large gray streak of dust adorned her abdomen. She pulled her bottom lip into a frown. "Oh, I've really taken a beating already today."

"Aye. You'll clog the drain with the dust in your hair, too, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser said with a chuckle.

Cate batted at her hair, attempting to knock some of the dust from it. "You may be right," she answered.

"Well, dusty or not, it's time for your lunch," Mrs. Fraser said as she motioned to the tray on the desk.

"Mmm," Cate responded as she sniffed the air. "Smells wonderful! Is this your famous chicken soup?"

"That it is, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser confirmed. "Now, you'd better go wash your hands before you eat."

Cate smiled and nodded as she darted from the room to clean up before eating her lunch. "Thank you!" she shouted behind her.

"You're welcome. Don't dally! It's best-served piping hot!" Mrs. Fraser called after her.

The promise of Mrs. Fraser's famous chicken soup on a chilly day caused Cate to speed through her handwashing and hurry straight back to the library. She leaned over the steaming bowl, inhaling a deep whiff of the fragrant soup. She dug in after blowing on a full spoonful of the broth. Behind her, Riley and Bailey gnawed on soup bones, a treat from Mrs. Fraser. Today, lunch satisfied everyone.

Cate curled in the leather armchair near the fireplace for a few moments after lunch, allowing the dogs to continue their feast. Her muscles protested her return to Douglas's secret office. So did her work ethic. Though nearly complete, the lack of progress annoyed her. Perhaps the last two shelves held a breakthrough, she mused.

The promise of a discovery motivated her to return to the space after a brief walk with the dogs. Cate descended the stairs and approached the bookshelf. She knelt on the cold stone floor to assess the final two shelves of unsorted materials. Cate blew on the shelf, sending a dust cloud into the air. She waved it away and began on one end. She removed several unidentifiable items and shuttled them to another shelf.

Underneath two large glass beakers, Cate found another journal. She grasped the thick leather spine and pulled it from the shelf. As she flipped open the front cover, the sound of cracking leather filled her ears. She glanced at the first page. A random assortment of letters adorned it. With a sigh and a shake of her head, Cate flipped through the remaining pages, stopping at random to peruse the contents. None of it made sense.

Another sigh escaped her as she snapped the book shut. A cold, wet nose pressed against her cheek and a warm tongue gave her a lick. Her eyes slid sideways, and a half-smile crossed her face.

“Hey, buddy,” Cate said as Riley offered her another kiss on the cheek. “Getting bored?”

Riley stared at her with his dark brown eyes before sniffing the book she held in her hand. “Any thoughts on it, Riley? Can you read this? Maybe it’s in dog language.”

Cate flipped a page open for Riley to peruse. The pup offered no answers. Instead, he glanced to the page, then to Cate before sliding to the floor and curling near her. Cate scratched his ears for a moment. “Did you leave your brother napping upstairs?” she questioned.

She glanced around the room, spotting a small form peering at her a few steps from the bottom of the staircase. “Did you venture down, too, Bailey? Come on.” Cate held her hand out to encourage him. He bounded down the remaining stairs and trotted across the stone floor to Cate. Cate took a moment to cuddle with them both before returning to work.

“What do you say we finish this sorting, boys?” Riley gave her another kiss on the cheek for encouragement.

Cate climbed to her feet and tossed the journal on the top of the pile. She finished moving the additional materials on the shelf. The bottom shelf consisted mainly of laboratory equipment and a few sketches of lab setups. She finished by late afternoon.

With aching muscles, she herded the two dogs up the stairs in search of a much-needed shower. Before leaving the library, Cate pulled the plug on the lab’s lighting and closed the secret passage, sealing off the area for another day.

As she crossed the hall and headed toward the main staircase, she ran into Jack. Riley bounded toward him as Bailey trotted behind.

“Any luck today?” he questioned.

She shook her head. “No. But I got everything sorted!”

“Hey! Progress, Lady Cate!”

“Yes, some. Now on to deciphering the information.”

“Surely, you can take a few days off to celebrate your sorting feat.”

“I’d really like to unravel the information I’ve found. Not just the journals, but some of those inventions are interesting. I’d love to understand what’s written about them, their intended purpose or why he made them.”

“I find them creepy.”

“They’re not creepy,” Cate said with a laugh.

“They are! The giant fishbowl? The weird Iron Maiden with the tubes? I don’t want to know their purpose, Lady Cate. I’m afraid to find out.” Jack shivered in an overly dramatic display of fear.

Cate shook her head at him, a half-grin on her face. “You have no sense of adventure.”

“No, I don’t, Lady Cate. And I like me just fine that way. If I never find out what secrets the mad scientist’s lab holds, I will still live a full and happy life.”

“Well, I would like to discover those secrets. Though first,” Cate said as she glanced at her clothes, “I would like to discover the shower.”

“Aye, you look like you’ve crawled through a dusty tomb. I shall leave you to your shower. M’lady!” Jack bowed to her as she collected her furry friends and climbed the stairs in search of steamy hot water and clean hair and skin.

Cate peered from her bedroom window early the next morning. Dense fog covered most of the landscape. Early spring storms rolled through the highlands for most of the night. For the moment, the heavy clouds held the rain at bay. The overnight thunderclaps were enough to send both pups hiding under the covers and pressed against Cate. She laid awake, watching lightning tear through the sky as they huddled against her. The dreamless dozing between storms kept her nightmares at bay.

Cate stretched and climbed from her bed. As she walked the dogs before breakfast, Cate pondered the puzzle awaiting her in Douglas’s lab. Could she decipher the enigma? What discoveries lay inside the journals and sketches? Would she learn more about the castle's unique property? Would it provide a better mastery of time travel?

Cate stared into the mists shrouding the moors, her mind searching for answers. A yip several yards away called her attention back to her current situation. Cate glanced around her, finding herself alone.

"Riley! Bailey!" Cate called, not spotting the dogs. "Riley! Bailey!"

Cate heard a grumble from behind a bush in the side garden. As she navigated through the garden, she rounded a row of rose bushes and found both dogs. "There you are! What are you two doing over here?" Cate questioned.

Both dogs studied the ground. Bailey's head tilted sideways as he gave the area a curious look. Riley glanced to Cate before returning his gaze to a grassy patch. Cate stooped to peer closer at the area. Blades of green grass poked from the dirt. She spotted nothing else.

"What is it?" she inquired again.

Bailey scratched the area with his paw twice. Cate shrugged. "I don't see anything, bud."

Riley issued a whine as Bailey raked the patch again with his paw. "You guys are silly. There's nothing there. Come on, let's get our breakfast."

Cate stalked a few steps away. She spun when neither pup followed her. "Riley! Bailey! Come on! Dish!" Both dogs bounded toward her at the mention of their breakfast. Cate shook her head at them, pondering what they imagined they spotted in that grassy patch. Likely a bug, she concluded as they approached the castle.

"Good morning!" Cate called to Molly and Mrs. Fraser as she entered the kitchen.

"Good morning, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser answered, followed by Molly.

"Jack and Mr. Fraser already hard at work before breakfast?" Cate inquired.

"Aye, gathering tools for the day and tending to the fires."

"The rain seems to have stopped for the moment. Will they attempt to work outside?" Cate asked.

Mrs. Fraser shook her head. "Storms are expected to continue all day off and on. They're stuck inside. Young Jack will spend most of his day pestering me for biscuits."

"A good day to stay in and learn more baking!" Molly exclaimed as she prepared the oatmeal.

Cate agreed with a nod. "How did your shortbreads turn out?"

"Eh..." Molly murmured.

"For a first attempt, they were quite good!" Mrs. Fraser answered for her. Molly smiled at the compliment. "With a few tweaks, they'll match mine!"

"Looks like we picked the right woman for the job!" Cate answered.

"Aye, I concur, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser said with a firm nod.

"Well, I'll be upstairs," Cate said before leaving.

"Dining room?" Molly questioned.

"Yes," Cate confirmed.

"Not in your dungeon?" Mrs. Fraser quipped.

"Not today!" Cate exclaimed. "I finished all the sorting! Now I'm going to move on to Douglas's journals. I hope to find some great information for my book."

"I dare say you will. Interesting man, Douglas MacKenzie. He's a bit of a local legend," Mrs. Fraser answered.

"Local legend?" Molly prompted in a questioning voice.

"Aye," Mrs. Fraser confirmed. "The builder of this old place has quite the reputation."

Cate pursed her lips and narrowed her eyes. "Do you mind if I stay for breakfast and ask you more about him?"

Mrs. Fraser raised her eyebrows at Cate. "All right," she agreed.

Cate smiled at her as she removed the place setting from the tray on the island and placed it on the table. A second breakfast at the servants' table, she reflected. Mrs. Fraser was getting soft.

"And don't you go thinking I'm turning soft, Lady Cate. This is for the sake of your research only!"

"I wouldn't dream of it, Mrs. Fraser," Cate said as she held in a chuckle.

"And today, we will bring your bowl to you. Since this isn't your day off!" Mrs. Fraser declared.

Cate settled herself at the table, not willing to argue. Jack and Mr. Fraser pushed through the door into the kitchen. Riley and Bailey, who had curled near the door, greeted them with tail wags.

"Well, good morning, Sir Riley and Mr. Bailey!" Jack exclaimed. "What are we doing here this fine morning? Still rustling breakfast from Mrs. Fraser and Miss Molly?"

“Lady Cate is joining us again this morning,” Molly explained before Cate could.

Jack raised his eyebrows as he scratched Riley’s belly. “Again? Why, Mrs. Fraser, have you gone soft?”

Mrs. Fraser harrumphed. “Certainly not, young Jack!” she protested.

“No,” Cate defended her. “Mrs. Fraser has allowed me to stay so I can hear the tales of Douglas MacKenzie!”

“Aye, a strange duck, that one,” Mr. Fraser added with a nod.

Mrs. Fraser placed a full bowl of oatmeal in front of Cate, along with several toppings. “As I’m sure you discovered in that dusty dungeon,” Mrs. Fraser agreed.

Jack filled his bowl and took a seat across from Cate. “The lab of the mad scientist,” Jack stated with another dramatic shiver. “It’s frightening down there!”

“It’s not!” Cate countered. “It’s very interesting!”

“He has somewhat of a reputation as a Dr. Frankenstein, yes,” Mrs. Fraser admitted as she joined them at the table.

Molly gulped at Mrs. Fraser’s description. “Dr. Frankenstein?” she questioned. “What kind of experiments was he doing in that dungeon?”

Mrs. Fraser chuckled a bit. “He didn’t build a monster sewn together with dead people’s body parts. At least not to my knowledge,” Mrs. Fraser answered.

“Perhaps not, but the creepy stuff down there suggests he did some sort of strange experiments,” Jack contended.

Molly eyed them each around the table. “What kind of stuff?” she asked with a wrinkled nose.

“Mostly lab equipment and a few odd inventions,” Cate explained.

Jack shook his head as he swallowed a spoonful of oatmeal topped with brown sugar. “No. Nope. Strange contraptions, odd apparatus, disturbing devices. It’s a dungeon. A torture chamber.”

Molly’s eyes grew wide.

“It’s not!” Cate repeated. “He appears to have been an avid inventor. I’m not sure what everything is, but it seems he tried to invent some form of electrical lighting and perhaps a crude attempt at an early communication device similar to a phone.” Cate shrugged.

“Aye, an inventor,” Mr. Fraser agreed. “Many describe him that way.”

“And I’d bet many more contend he’s an evil scientist,” Jack suggested.

“Some do, some don’t,” Mrs. Fraser confirmed. “Some say he toyed with things he shouldn’t. Others claim he was an eccentric experimenter with fantastical ideas.”

“Hmm,” Cate murmured as she pondered the information. “What things shouldn’t he have toyed with?”

“They claim Douglas’s interests ran toward the occult. Some say he was a devil worshipper. Others claim he investigated the line between life and death, including attempting to restore life,” Mrs. Fraser explained.

Molly pulled her lips into a grimace. “Devil worship in the basement of this castle?” She glanced around the room as though searching for signs of the supernatural in every corner.

“And the other side?” Cate inquired.

“They maintain Douglas was nothing more than eccentric. An avid reader and researcher, he fiddled with all sorts of things to pass his time, no more.”

“Sounds like typical gossip,” Cate replied.

“There is one odd tale that persists through the centuries,” Mr. Fraser chimed in.

“Oh?” Cate inquired.

“Aye,” Mrs. Fraser agreed. “One persistent rumor has followed that man through the centuries.”

Mrs. Fraser leaned forward, her eyes alight with mischief. “That he was a warlock!”

CHAPTER 3

As Mrs. Fraser uttered the word “warlock”, lightning flashed and thunder boomed overhead. Both dogs jumped at the loud sound.

Molly jumped with them, shrinking down at the loud roar.

“A warlock?” Cate inquired, a hint of incredulousness in her voice.

“Aye, a warlock,” Mrs. Fraser said with a nod.

Molly gulped again. “Wh-Why did they believe that?” she stammered.

“Oh, they presented a whole host of evidence,” Mrs. Fraser explained.

“Claimed he could appear and disappear at will, summon spirits and he concocted strange potions.”

Molly’s forehead wrinkled, and she bit her lower lip. “S-Summon spirits?”

Cate cocked her head at Molly’s concerned expression. “Oh, Molly, you don’t honestly believe this, do you?” she asked.

Molly shrugged. Her eyes darted around the kitchen, glancing from wall to wall and then to the ceiling. “There’s usually some truth in rumors!”

“The castle isn’t haunted. There are no spirits here,” Cate assured her. “And there are no such things as warlocks.”

“How do you explain the peculiar equipment in the lab, then?” Jack queried.

Molly glanced between Jack and Cate before focusing on Cate for an answer. “He was a curious guy,” Cate answered with a shrug. “In his day and age, people mistook curiosity for witchcraft. Even into the late 1700s, the rumors of witchcraft persisted, particularly in small communities like this one.”

Cate glanced at Molly. “It’s fine,” Cate assured her. “These types of tales exist in every country. They’re used to explain away strange behavior people couldn’t or didn’t want to explain or were jealous of. There’s likely a reasonable explanation for all of it!”

“Appearing and disappearing?” Molly questioned.

Cate shrugged again. “It’s a large castle. Perhaps they lost track of him or perhaps he used a secret passage, making him appear magical when he was not.”

“Smart, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser said with a wag of her finger. “Douglas was also known to have a jovial spirit and a good sense of humor in addition to his curious nature.”

Cate nodded. “He probably liked to play tricks on people. In a castle this size, it wouldn’t be hard to do. Same with the spirits. And his supposed potions were likely his chemistry experiments.”

Molly knit her brow further as she considered Cate’s explanation. “Trust me,” Cate continued. “I’m a historian. These stories persist in every culture across the board. They are nothing more than scary fireside tales! There are no such things as warlocks.”

“She’s correct, Molly,” Mrs. Fraser added. “While you’ll still hear that rumor around town, there’re no such things as warlocks. It’s nonsense! Good for an entertaining tale on a stormy night. That’s likely how the rumor took root! Some servants chatting as lightning lit their faces and thunder boomed overhead. Likely embellished for dramatic effect and an interesting yarn. There are no ghosts here. I’ve lived my entire life on this estate, I know!”

Molly slouched a bit, easing the crinkle in her forehead. She nodded without speaking.

“Oh, Miss Molly,” Mrs. Fraser said with a chuckle as she patted Molly’s hand. “I was only telling you in jest. It’s just a silly rumor! There’s no truth to it.”

Molly straightened her shoulders and nodded again. “You’re right. I’m letting my imagination run away with me.”

“Now, we’d better get breakfast cleaned up and start our baking. There are no ghosts around here to do it for us!”

Molly cracked a smile for the first time during the conversation. "I'm glad. I'd rather bake myself. I hear ghosts use too much leavening!"

Mrs. Fraser chuckled at Molly's joke as they began to clear the table. "Well, that's my cue," Cate said. "Good luck with your baking and thank you for the entertaining stories about Douglas!"

"You're welcome, Lady Cate. Good luck with your dungeon."

Cate climbed the stairs to the main level, with Riley and Bailey in tow. Mrs. Fraser's words rung in her mind as she pulled the doors open to the library. Riley trotted toward the fireplace and collapsed in a heap near it. Cate eyed the roaring fire. The flames danced in the fireplace, keeping the damp chill of the Scottish morning air at bay. Bailey meandered toward Riley and curled in a ball next to him.

"I won't be long downstairs today, boys," Cate assured them as she opened the secret passage. "I'm just going to bring the journals upstairs and work here."

Cate plugged in the lighting and peered down the stairs. As she descended them, her eyes scanned the room. A chill passed over her. She tried to reassure herself it was merely the damp air seeping through the stone walls rather than the haunting words Mrs. Fraser had imparted over breakfast.

She chuckled. "There are no such things as warlocks," she reminded herself aloud. Her eyes found the stack of journals in the floor's center. She'd focus on those today near the warmth of the fireplace.

She gathered several of the leather journals into her arms. She'd need to make several trips to move them all. After three trips, she'd lugged all thirteen of the journals upstairs and made a pile near her favorite armchair.

Cate sank into it after retrieving a few cleaning materials. She pulled a blanket over her, even though the warmth of the fire reached her seat.

She began by dusting the books before using saddle soap to clean the leather and remove centuries of dirt and dust. She stared at the stack of newly cleaned journals. Had she spent the time cleaning to postpone the inevitable?

With a deep sigh, Cate decided she could no longer delay the task of examining the interiors of each journal. She pulled one from the top of the stack. Her first task would be to attempt to order the journals. She studied the exterior, searching for a mark or brand indicating the journal's number.

The smooth brown leather displayed no such marks. Cate flipped open the front cover. The front cover's interior contained a table of twenty-five numbers. The values, ranging from one to twenty-five, seemed to be in random order. She wondered if they may be some indication of dates, perhaps giving the time period in which the journal was written.

But why five rows of numbers, she pondered? And why five numbers in each row? Dates consisted of three pieces of information in most cases: month, day and year. Or in the case of European dates: day, month, year. Perhaps the last number in the row contained the year and the first four contained a range.

Cate glanced down the final column. No, her mind corrected. The years ranged too far apart and made no sense. She focused on the first number on the page. Seven. She'd found thirteen journals. Perhaps this was the seventh of the thirteen.

What the other numbers meant escaped Cate. However, this theory was her best so far. She glanced to the first page after the cover. Journal of Douglas MacKenzie was scrawled across it.

Cate flipped to the next page. An array of random letters filled it. Her forehead creased as she studied the writing. She searched for words within the gibberish but found none. Written with careful precision, she could not identify anything distinguishable. There were barely any breaks indicating words or other grammatical structures. What was this, she pondered?

She recalled her task of ordering the journals. Instead of searching further in this journal, Cate selected the next book from the stack and opened it to the first page. A similar inscription graced the first page, confirming this book was another of Douglas MacKenzie's journals.

She glanced to the interior of the front cover. A grid of twenty-five numbers was scribbled there. She noted the first number on the page was three. Perhaps this was the third journal, she mused. She set it on top of the previous journal and reached for the next in the stack.

She peered at the cover's interior. The number twelve sat in the first position of the grid. She set it underneath the journal marked with a seven. So far, so good, she mused. Perhaps her assumption would prove correct.

Cate pulled a fourth journal onto her lap and studied the inside of the front cover. Her heart sank as she read the first of the twenty-five numbers on the page. Twenty-one. There were only thirteen journals. At least that Cate had found. Perhaps there were more journals and she hadn't found them all. Or perhaps she was wrong about her theory.

She opened all the journals and placed them in order by the first number. If her theory proved correct, she was missing twelve journals. She considered returning to the secret office to search for them but discarded the idea. She'd been over every inch of the space. No other journals existed there.

She stared in the air as her mind processed the conundrum. Perhaps the journals were housed somewhere else. She glanced at the bookshelves in front of her. What better place to store journals than in the library, she thought? She pushed up to standing. All the journals shared the same characteristic brown leather with a burned leaf pattern ringing the edges. If other journals were stored here, she could identify them by this characteristic.

She approached the first bookshelf and examined each shelf. None of the volumes matched the journals' style. She spent the next hour searching every shelf and book for more journals. None existed.

With a long exhale, she sank back into the leather armchair. She stared at the stack of journals. She was missing something.

Cate grabbed the first journal from the stack. She studied the grid of numbers again. Nothing new jumped out at her. Cate moved to the title page. Other than the pronouncement of the journal's owner, no other marks were on the page.

She checked the backside of the page, finding nothing. This journal, too, contained a nonsensical framework of letters. She tried to read them left to right, right to left, up to down and down to up. No combination spelled anything recognizable as English.

She flipped to the next page and found a similar set of markings. She spent another ninety minutes flipping through the more than two hundred written pages. She uncovered nothing.

She turned to the final page of the journal. No words were recorded on this last page. Before closing the journal, she inspected the back cover's interior. Scrawled in the bottom right corner was a mark. She squinted at it and brought the book closer to her face. She identified the symbol as a two.

Did this indicate the order of the journals? She grabbed the next journal, pulling open the back cover and checking the bottom right corner. Her pulse quicken as she found a tiny number scrawled there. She squinted at it, making out the number seven.

She pulled another journal from the stack and opened it to the same location. The number four appeared in the corner. She worked her way through the remaining journals, finding numbers from one to thirteen.

She stared at the new stack of journals next to her, pleased with her work. If her theory proved correct, she had managed to order the journals. Perhaps this achievement would assist her in unraveling the information inside.

Cate glanced at the number grid inside the front cover. The book, marked with the number one on the back cover, contained the number seven in the first spot. What did the numbers refer to, she pondered? She stared at the lattice of numbers, but they provided no answers.

She turned the page and narrowed her eyes at the letters inscribed on the thick paper. Carefully penned in all capital letters, words made little sense. The writing appeared almost to form a grid on the page. She counted the letters across the page, finding they numbered twenty-five. What did they mean? Were the letters connected to the numbers on the interior cover? How?

A voice interrupted her thoughts. "That spot looks far more comfortable than your dungeon, Lady Cate," Molly said.

Cate twisted to face her, closing the journal and setting it on the stack. "I'll admit it is much more comfortable," Cate said. "AND warmer!"

"I've got your lunch," Molly said, raising the tray in the air before setting it on the coffee table in front of Cate. Both dogs climbed to their feet to sniff at it.

"Thanks, Molly," Cate answered. "I hadn't even realized the time!"

"Just like you, Lady Cate. Once you started working, you'd lose track of everything. What have you got there?" Molly waved her hand to signal the stack of journals.

Cate picked up the first one and opened to the first page. "These are Douglas MacKenzie's journals," she said, showing the inscription on the first page. "I found them in his lab."

Molly shifted her eyes sideways, giving the open bookcase an uneasy glance. "You mean... the dungeon?" she questioned.

"It's not a dungeon," Cate said with a chuckle. "It's just a workspace. It's really interesting! You should take a look!"

Molly peered at the open bookshelf again. She shifted her weight from side to side. “Umm,” Molly murmured, her voice an octave above its normal volume, “maybe another time.”

Cate stood. “I’ll show you,” Cate offered. “Come on!”

“No!” Molly answered. “No, no!” She held her hands out to stop Cate’s progress. “You’ve got your lunch and I should be getting downstairs to mine. Maybe another time.”

Cate held in a chuckle. “Okay, another time,” she agreed as she sank into the armchair again.

“Have a good lunch, Lady Cate. Oh! By the way,” Molly exclaimed as she backed to the door, “those shortbread cookies or biscuits if you prefer that term, are my second attempt. See what you think!”

“I can’t wait to try them!” Cate called to her. “Thanks, Molly!”

Cate spent her lunch pondering the gibberish contained in the books. Her mind tried to connect the numbers and letters, though she came to no definite conclusions. After lunch, she dodged raindrops on an afternoon walk with the dogs.

As she returned to the library following their walk, Cate ran into Jack. He juggled a few boxes of lightbulbs.

“Lady Cate!” he exclaimed. “Sir Riley and Mr. Bailey, how are you? I’d give you a proper pet, but I’ve got my hands full.”

“I see that! Need help?” Cate inquired as two boxes teetered dangerously on the top of his stack.

“Aye, I believe I do,” Jack admitted.

Cate collected several boxes from the top of the pile. “Where are these headed?”

“Ballroom,” he answered.

“ALL of them?” Cate questioned.

“Aye, Lady Cate. Those chandeliers have a good number of lightbulbs on each. I’ve got to climb that massive ladder to change them.”

“Ah,” Cate exclaimed as realization set in, “so may as well change them all at once.”

“You’re a smart lady, Lady Cate,” Jack said with a wink.

“I don’t blame you,” she said as they approached the ballroom. “I’ll help. You head up the ladder, I’ll unbox and hand these up.”

“I won’t say no, though I hope you don’t dock my pay for lack of effort.”

Cate chuckled as she shook her head. "Since you are climbing the ladder, I won't."

"Mighty nice of you, Lady Cate," Jack said as he ascended the ladder. Cate stayed below and began to pull lightbulbs from the boxes and hand them up.

"How is your dungeon project coming?" Jack inquired as they worked.

Cate sighed as she pulled another bulb from its box.

"That good, huh?" Jack said as he reached down for it.

Cate nodded. "Yeah, that about sums it up."

"What's the dead-end? Or are you just realizing how creepy that dungeon really is?"

"It's not creepy!" she insisted. "I finished all my sorting. I figured the best place to move to is reading those journals we found the first night."

"But?" Jack prompted when Cate didn't continue.

Cate shrugged. "But I can't read them," she responded. "They're gibberish."

"Old English or Scottish?" Jack inquired.

"No," Cate said with a shake of her head as she handed up another lightbulb. "No, I'd recognize that. This isn't English at all."

"Foreign language, maybe?" Jack suggested.

"Could be," Cate answered. "Though I've never seen any language like this before. And another strange thing is it's written in all capitals in almost a grid-like pattern."

Jack climbed down to the floor and dragged the ladder to another chandelier. "Perhaps he was practicing his penmanship." He grinned at Cate.

"I'm really surprised your comedy career never took off, Jack," Cate jested.

Jack climbed the ladder again. "So, it's some form of encryption, then?"

"That's what I'd imagine it is. What specific type of encryption, I'm not sure. I'll need to work on it and dig up some information to decode it. I may even need to ask a few experts."

Jack stopped his work and fixed his gaze on Cate. "Cate, those journals could..."

Cate held up her hand, stopping his speech. "I know, I know," she said. "Information for our eyes only. I can't give the text to anyone, but I may need to consult with a few people from my old university to see if they can suggest any decryption programs to help me.”

Jack nodded. “Okay, just watch how much you share with them. We don’t need any information getting out that shouldn’t.”

“I’ll be careful,” Cate promised.

“Lady Cate promising to be careful, what a leap forward for mankind.”

“Very funny, Jack.”

“Why not start with something other than the journals?” Jack inquired.

“What else would I start with? I have no idea what some of his inventions are and his sketches seem to be encoded in a similar way.”

“So, crack the code on the journals and you’ll crack the code on everything, most likely.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod. “And since the journals contain the most text, they should provide the most information for decryption.”

Jack descended the ladder and collected the empty boxes scattered around Cate. “I wish you luck, Lady Cate. I must admit, I’m rather interested in the contents of those journals.”

Cate raised her eyebrows at him. “What’s this? Jack Reid interested in something beyond estate affairs?”

“Aye, I’m hoping it contains information that will make us stop time traveling,” he said with a wink.

“I’ll keep you informed, but,” Cate said, clapping her hand on his shoulder, “don’t get your hopes up.”

Cate’s afternoon kept her busy reviewing details for her upcoming meeting with Mrs. Campbell. The work provided a welcome break from her frustrating inability to make progress with Douglas’s journals.

Despite that, she found her gaze drawn to the stack of books every few minutes. She fought to concentrate on the task at hand. The work took twice as long with her wandering mind. She finished as her dinner tray arrived.

She ended her evening curled by the fire with a book. Written in standard English, Cate was pleased she didn’t need to decode it.

Cate stared at the encoded text in the journal as she sat at the library’s desk. The black ink against the cream page stared back at her. The block letters in a neat grid gave her no clue about how to proceed. She glanced outside at the darkened sky. Rain pelted the windows as gray clouds shielded the stars from shining.

She yawned as she watched the raindrops slide down the window. She'd given up on sleep hours ago, choosing to rise from her bed and wander to the library to consider her latest conundrum.

She glanced back to the page. She swallowed hard. The letters danced across the paper. She blinked her eyes a few times. She must be too tired, she surmised, as she closed her eyes to rest them for a moment.

When she opened them, she was shocked at what she saw. The letters ceased their rhythmic motion and melted from the page. She pushed the book away as she leapt from her seat and backed away from the desk.

Lightning tore through the night sky and thunder clapped. She glanced outside. As the sky darkened again, she spotted her reflection in the glass. Her brows knit as she noticed the secret passage open behind her.

She hadn't opened it. But yet it clearly stood ajar in the reflection. As she considered it, the mirror image changed. She gasped, pressing her hand over her mouth as a figure formed at the opening.

She spun to face it. She inched back step by step.

"Hello, Catherine," the voice growled at her.

"Wh-who are you?" she asked, her voice quivering with fear. She squinted toward the opening. The man's features, shrouded in shadow, made him impossible to identify.

The man snickered at the question. His laughter grew louder and louder, roaring through the room.

The desk stopped any further backward progress she could make. She stumbled as she bumped into it. She clapped her hands over her ears as she sank to the ground. His shrieking laughter threatened to make her ears bleed as the sound howled through the room.

A tear fell to her cheek as she struggled to maintain her composure. The man's chortling died down. She glanced at the opening. Red eyes glowed back at her.

Cate swallowed hard and rose to stand. She squared her shoulders and wiped the tear from her cheek. "Who are you?"

"Oh, Catherine," the man's voice chided. He stepped toward her, still shrouded in the blackness of the gaping hole to the secret lab.

The lights flickered before extinguishing. She reeled around, pawing through the desk in search of a flashlight. Her trembling hands clawed through the drawers until her fingertips touched the cylindrical object.

She curled her fingers around the base and pushed the toggle button. No light shone from the lens. She shook the flashlight and smacked it against her hand. She pushed the button again in a desperate attempt to coerce it to light.

Lightning tore through the sky again, and the room glowed for an instant. As thunder boomed overhead, cold hands grasped her arms. She froze, her muscles tensing, her shoulders rising toward her ears.

Hot breath swept past her neck and a voice whispered in her ear. "I am your worst nightmare."

CHAPTER 4

Cate gasped for air as she shot up to sitting. Sweat beaded on her forehead. Tears stained her cheeks. Her chest heaved as she sucked in deep breaths of air.

She glanced around, finding her surroundings familiar. Soft white moonlight glowed through her bedroom window. She clutched at the bedsheets, drawing them closer to her as her breathing stabilized and her heart ceased to race.

Another nightmare, she reflected. She sniffled and wiped at her cheeks before retrieving her journal from the night table. She propped pillows behind her before switching on the bedside lamp.

She squinted as her eyes adjusted to the bright light. She paged through the journal to the first blank page and noted the date and details of her newest nightmare. Her hairs stood on end and her flesh turned to goosebumps as she recalled the final haunting words the man uttered to her.

After jotting them in her notebook, she snapped it shut, as though this would close the subject. She clutched the journal for a few more moments as she forced her nerves to settle. Cate closed her eyes and breathed in a deep, long breath.

Her eyes snapped open as a cold, wet nose nudged her hand. The corners of her mouth turned upward as her eyes met Riley's sparkling, dark brown eyes. Behind him, Bailey stared curiously at her, his head cocked to the side as he studied her.

“I’m okay, boys, just a bad dream,” Cate assured them. She set the notebook and pen on the night table and patted the bed on either side of her. Riley curled in a ball on her right, his head resting on her thigh. Bailey hopped over her legs and nestled into a spot on her left.

She flicked off the light, plunging the room into darkness. She rubbed the dogs’ heads as she settled back into her pillows. Riley offered her hand a lick before settling his head on her leg.

The calming effect of both boys with her settled her back into a dreamless sleep.

“Thanks, Mrs. Campbell!” Cate called as Isla Campbell, the town’s librarian, historical society president and party planner extraordinaire, climbed behind the wheel of her car.

After a three-hour meeting to plan details of her anniversary party, her morning was spent. Her mind swam with party nuances, from linen patterns to champagne flutes to hors d’oeuvres. Certain she could not keep track of every minor detail required, she appreciated Mrs. Campbell’s ability to oversee them all.

“Is the party czar gone?” Jack voiced behind her.

Cate jumped, startled by his sudden appearance. Details of her dream in which the man, who described himself as her worst nightmare, crept into her mind.

“Oops, sorry, I didn’t mean to startle you, Lady Cate,” Jack apologized.

She twisted to face Jack. “No problem and yes, she is.”

“Mrs. Fraser sent me up to see if the ninny was gone yet or if she needed to delay lunch.”

“No, I just need to gather my things from the sitting room and drop them off in the library and we can head down!”

Jack followed her into the sitting room off the foyer. Fabric samples, guest lists, layouts and menus lay scattered across the coffee table. She scraped them together, forcing the items into as neat a pile as she could, then stuffed them into a large file folder.

Jack grimaced at the sight. “And what outlandish requests does the party czar have this time? Perhaps she’d like us to move the castle stone by stone to the Caribbean for an island party. Or maybe she'd like us to erect seven stages across the property and invite the world's biggest musical acts."

Cate chuckled at Jack's assessment as she stuffed a few wayward papers into the folder. "Nothing that extravagant, though she's definitely scaling this up to be the 'event of the year.'"

Jack slumped his shoulders and closed his eyes for a moment. "Why is every event the 'event of the year' with her?"

She shrugged as she pulled the folder to her chest.

"Sorry, Lady Cate," Jack continued. "Ever since she asked us to bring in snow machines to ensure snow for the holiday party, I expect her requests to be over the top."

"Oh, this is going to be over the top, all right," Cate replied. "She insisted. Nothing but class, top of the line all the way around. A guest list to rival all other guest lists."

"I didn't expect anything less from Isla Campbell," Jack responded as they navigated to the library.

"You should have seen her face when I suggested an old-fashioned American picnic."

"I'm surprised the woman is still alive, Lady Cate. You could have killed her with that suggestion!"

"I may have come close," she admitted, recalling the shocked expression on Mrs. Campbell's face. Perhaps the one time she'd rendered the woman speechless. "Her expression was priceless."

"Damn," Jack muttered. "I wish I'd have been there. I would have loved to have witnessed that!"

Cate pushed the doors open to the library and crossed to the desk. She dumped the party planning materials on it. A chill passed over her as she stood facing the same window she had in her dream. She swallowed hard and glanced at the now-closed bookshelf passage.

"Someone walk over your grave, Lady Cate?" Jack inquired.

"No," Cate said, stifling a yawn. "Recalling the details of yet another nightmare involving this room."

"Another?" Jack questioned.

"Another," Cate said with a sigh. "This time I was working here in the library, trying to translate Douglas's journals. The letters started to run off the page, and I suddenly felt frightened. As I backed away from the desk, I caught a reflection of the room in the window. The bookcase was open, and the figure of a man stood in the shadows.”

“Could you identify him? Did he speak to you?”

Cate shook her head. “I couldn’t make out his features, but he did speak. He said ‘Hello, Catherine.’”

“Same as before,” Jack noted.

“Yep, same as before. He always calls me by my full name. In this dream, I asked who he was, and he laughed. Not a normal laugh. It filled the room. It was frightening, almost demonic. Then the lights went out. I raced to retrieve the flashlight, and before I could get it working, he was behind me. He grabbed me and said ‘I am your worst nightmare.’ Then I woke up.”

Jack frowned as he processed the information. “Your worst nightmare? Well, that rules me out.”

Cate screwed up her face at him. “What?”

“While I may be the man of your dreams, Lady Cate, I’m not your worst nightmare,” Jack joked with a grin.

“That’s very funny, Jack,” Cate groaned. “It’s not you, he doesn’t sound like you.”

“Douglas?” Jack proposed.

“Perhaps. It would fit. He’s tied to the bookcase and the secret room. But why would Douglas be my worst nightmare?”

Jack shrugged. “Who else could it be? Who else would be tied to all this?”

“I’m not sure. Douglas is also my guess, but it makes no sense. Unless it’s all just some strange reaction to stress or something and none of it has any meaning.”

“These have gone on far too long for them to be meaningless.”

“Perhaps when I decrypt the journals, I’ll find another clue.”

Jack knit his brows, placing his finger on his lips in thought. “It’s always been in the library, somehow related to the secret passage. To Douglas’s secret office. Now his journals show up. It must be Douglas, right?” He snapped his fingers and pointed to Cate.

“What?” she questioned.

“His accent! You wouldn’t recognize his voice. You’ve never met him...”

“Yet,” Cate added.

Jack offered Cate a flat glance. She shrugged in return. “Does he sound Scottish? Like Randolph?”

Cate glanced to the floor and pursed her lips as she recalled the voice. She gave a slow shake of her head. “No,” she admitted. She returned her gaze to Jack. “No, his accent isn’t Scottish! It’s British!”

“You’re certain?”

Cate nodded her head as she chewed her lower lip. “One hundred percent certain. That voice... it haunts me even when I’m awake. His ‘Hello, Catherine’ is so creepy. It rings in my head for hours after those nightmares. It’s unforgettable. He’s British. Upper-class, well-bred I’d say from his speech pattern.”

“Likely not Douglas, then. I’d bet my bottom dollar he had a Scottish brogue, like Randolph. Perhaps not as thick as mine given his station, but nonetheless, Scottish.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “That’s a likely bet, yes. It doesn’t prove it’s not Douglas, but it does cast doubt on him.”

“That coupled with the question as to why he’d be your worst nightmare, I’d say someone else is haunting your dreams, Lady Cate.”

She focused her gaze on Jack. “But...” She paused as her forehead wrinkled. “Who is?”

The afternoon hours waned as Cate settled in the library. She opened the first of Douglas’s journals and stared at the undecipherable text. The conversation with Jack earlier stuck in her mind. Were they correct in assuming Douglas was not the man haunting her? Who else would it be? And why?

Thoughts danced through her brain as she stared blankly at the page in front of her. Perhaps deciphering these journals would lead her to some conclusion. She couldn’t see how, but it couldn’t hurt.

She opened a browser on her laptop and navigated to Google Translate. Upon closer inspection, she identified small spaces between the letters that seemed to indicate word breaks.

She typed in the first line of the journal. On the off-chance Jack’s foreign language idea was correct, perhaps Google Translate could identify it. The translator came up with nothing. Its closest identified language produced no translation at all.

Cate spent fifteen minutes shifting letters around in case the spaces between words were not where she assumed they were. The translator was not able to offer any additional information.

With a shake of her head, she crossed “foreign language” off the top of her list of theories. She stared again at the first line:

J IDUP ZTHBESL VGPR XDVPMSD YI

Twenty-five indecipherable characters seemed to be broken into six words. Perhaps it made up a simple cryptogram, Cate pondered. She stared at the next line to determine if she could make any headway with this theory.

RIIPXGXVZ SFL DENRHQRF GQ OITLKOCXZDP

The sentence continued to the next line:

BI H QMZYIQ TCP CVJFFEB.

Cate typed on her keyboard and searched for a cryptogram solver. She entered the first sentence into the solver and clicked the Auto-solve button. The solver worked as she drummed her fingers on the desk. After a few moments, the results appeared. She scrolled through the output. The top-scoring result provided another nonsensical array of letters.

She continued down the list. A few solutions contained English words but none of them provided an entire sentence of them. With a sigh, she crossed “Substitution Cipher” off her list.

Cate glanced around the room as she considered her other options to break Douglas’s code. Riley approached, stretching as he placed his front paws on her leg.

“Hiya, buddy,” Cate said as she scooped him into her arms. She ruffled the fur on his head, tracing the white streak from his nose to between his ears. “Got any ideas on this code?”

Riley leaned back and stretched, offering only a large yawn.

“How about you, Bailey?” Cate inquired of the other small dog. He lifted his head from the rug beneath him. “Any ideas on how to break this code?”

The gray and white dog set his head back down on the rug and stared at Cate. He wagged his curly pigtail a few times but offered no other response.

“Well, you two aren’t any help! You also aren’t far behind me with ideas.”

Cate glanced at the page of letters in front of her. “This is not my area of expertise!”

Riley glanced at her as she spoke. “Yeah, I know, buddy. When in doubt, research. Which I definitely can do.” She kissed the pup on his head and set him on the floor.

“Can that research wait until tomorrow?” Molly inquired from behind her.

“Already?” Cate questioned, glancing at her timepiece.

“Yep!” Molly announced as she brandished a tray of dinner. “Over there or by the fireplace?”

“By the fireplace,” Cate requested. “Thanks. I’m done with this for the day.”

“Making progress?” Molly asked as she slid the tray onto the coffee table.

Cate flicked the journal shut and closed her laptop. “No, hence the need for research. I’m stuck!”

“Well, that shouldn’t last long,” Molly said. “I’ve never known Dr. Catherine Kensie to be stuck for long.”

“We’ll see,” Cate said. “Decrypting codes is not up my alley. I’m a historian, not a code breaker!”

“What code are you trying to break?” Molly questioned.

“Oh, those journals I found downstairs in Douglas’s lab. They are all encrypted in some way. It looks like the pages were written in gibberish.”

“Hmm, that’s weird. Why would he write his journals in code?”

Cate shrugged. Though she had a guess, it wasn’t one she could share with Molly. “He seemed eccentric. I guess just another one of his eccentricities.”

“Hmm,” Molly mumbled. “Have you asked Ken Matthews from Aberdeen Math? His expertise is cryptology.”

“Oh, right! I didn’t know him well. I didn’t remember that was his specialty.”

“He’s a really nice guy,” Molly informed her. “I’m sure he’d be happy to help. He’d probably be excited to see a real live cipher in action!”

“If I can’t make any headway, I may send him an email and see if he has any ideas.”

“Well, it can wait until tomorrow. It’s dinner time now!”

“You’re starting to sound like Mrs. Fraser,” Cate teased.

“She’ll be very pleased with that assessment,” Molly said with a grin.

“She’s already very pleased with you,” Cate said. “We’re both really happy you’re here.”

“So am I,” Molly answered. “Except now I’m afraid this castle is haunted after all that warlock talk.”

“Yeah, remind me of that when you decipher that journal, and it’s full of ghost stories,” Molly said with a wink. “Enjoy your dinner, Lady Cate.”

Cate thanked Molly again as she eased into her favorite armchair near the fireplace. Molly’s words rung in her mind. She was certain Douglas’s journals would be filled with such tales. It would be interesting to read his experiences. How had he discovered the anomaly within the castle walls? What incidents had he documented before he realized the circumstances? She wouldn’t find out tonight, she reflected with a sigh.

CHAPTER 5

Cate yawned as she stepped into the foggy morning air with Riley and Bailey. After another nightmare disturbed her sleep, she had spent the night tossing and turning. Between the mysterious journals and the nightmares, her mind could not rest.

As she lay awake, staring at her ceiling, she'd also experienced another odd event. In the quiet stillness, she heard the characteristic loud ticking of her timepiece. The noise accompanied the timepiece interacting with a time rip. It indicated the moment when the wearer slipped through the time rip and returned to another era.

She grasped the watch and bolted upright. The second hand crept by for a second before returning to normal speed. She blinked her eyes several times as she stared at the watch face. She glanced around the room. Both dogs slept on the bed. All her things remained in the room. She hadn't passed through time into 1925, where the rip in her bedroom led.

As she shivered against the chilly morning air, she wondered if she had imagined it? Perhaps she had drifted off and dreamt it. She hadn't been rubbing the timepiece, so the trigger could not have activated.

In the cold light of morning, she assumed she imagined it. A trick of her mind as she drifted in and out of sleep, she reflected. She stared at the fog in the distance as it shrouded the moors surrounding the estate.

She pulled herself from her pensive mood. "Boys! Boys?" She glanced around her, finding herself alone.

"Riley! Bailey!" Cate called as she searched the area.

A yip came from the side garden. She followed the noise. She found both dogs in the same spot they had been in two days ago. Riley pawed at the ground. Bailey stared at the spot, his front legs flat on the ground with his back end high in the air.

“What are you two doing there again?” Cate inquired of them. Riley glanced to her, then back to the spot. He dragged his paw over it again.

Cate closed the distance between them and peered at the ground. She spotted nothing. “There’s nothing there, boys.”

Bailey leapt to all fours and let out another yip. Riley continued his mission to paw at the mysterious spot.

“You guys are silly,” Cate said. “There’s nothing there. Come on, let’s go get our breakfast.” She stalked a few steps away. Neither dog followed her. “Riley, Bailey, come on!” Both stared intently at the ground.

She returned and shooed them away. “Come on, boys. Time for breakfast. Stop that before you’re both covered in mud from digging at that spot.”

She corralled the two small dogs through the castle’s kitchen door. After everyone said their good mornings and she fed her furry friends, she headed upstairs with the dogs in tow for her breakfast.

After finishing her breakfast, she settled at the library’s desk with Douglas’s journals. She hoped to make more progress today. She began her research with an internet search of popular cryptography methods in the late 1700s.

Cate scanned the list of search results before she selected a few sites and jotted down several notes. As she dug into the fourth site on her search list, a tinkling filled the air. Cate’s phone vibrated across the desk’s top.

Cate’s stomach flip-flopped as she noted the caller: Isla Campbell. “Uh-oh,” Cate mumbled as she swiped to answer the call.

“Hello, Mrs. Campbell,” she said as the call connected.

“Lady Cate!” Mrs. Campbell’s voice greeted her on the other end. “Thank goodness you answered.”

“What can I help you with?” Cate inquired.

“The samples I told you about yesterday just came across my desk. If you’ve got a moment this morning, I can run them right up to the castle for you to peek at before you approve.”

“Oh, ah,” Cate murmured as she searched for a reason to avoid the meeting.

“I just need to toss them into my car. I can be there in fifteen minutes!”

“You know, Mrs. Campbell, I really trust your judgment on this. And if you feel they are the best choice, I’m comfortable approving them sight unseen!”

“Absolutely not!” Mrs. Campbell argued. “This is the single most important party of your year, Lady Cate. We must achieve perfection. And I simply will not feel comfortable approving these choices without you viewing them first.”

Cate sighed. She couldn’t avoid it, she figured. But perhaps she could kill two birds with one stone. “Okay. I’m available all morning, though I really do trust you.”

“A fact that I am aware of and most grateful for. Nonetheless, I shall see you in fifteen minutes!”

Cate ended the call after saying goodbye and stared at her laptop screen. While cryptography was not her expertise and not her cup of tea, she’d rather spend her time with a discussion of mathematics than linen selection.

Still, Cate mused, perhaps she could retrieve some information from the town’s historian about her latest research project, the castle’s original proprietor.

Cate shut her laptop and stowed her research materials. “You boys stay here. You know how Mrs. Campbell feels about pets.”

Mrs. Campbell estimated fifteen minutes before her arrival. That gave Cate ten minutes at best before the woman arrived. After she settled the dogs by the fire in the library, she made a quick trip downstairs to inform Mrs. Fraser and Molly about the latest development.

Mrs. Fraser’s eyes went wide as Cate imparted her change of plans for the morning. She placed her hand on her hip as she spoke. “You mean that ninny has invited herself here again? Will that woman’s demands never cease?”

“She’s particularly excited about these linens, yet she won’t order them until I’ve seen and approved of them.”

Mrs. Fraser shook her head. “She’ll have you worn out before your party with her antics.”

“It’s okay,” Cate replied. “I plan to use her to gain some information about Douglas for my research.” Cate winked at them.

“Well, I suppose that’s one thing,” Mrs. Fraser admitted. “And she’ll make the perfect test subject for your cookies, Molly.”

Molly removed a tray from the oven. "Mm-hm," Molly agreed.

"Though dinnae be surprised if she makes a rude comment. That woman wouldn't know how to compliment someone if you gave her a script."

"I'd better head up," Cate said. "She told me fifteen minutes."

"That means she'll be here in seven," Mrs. Fraser said.

Cate nodded as she backed from the kitchen.

"I'll send up the tray of tea and cookies as soon as I've got it ready, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser called as Cate traversed the hallway toward the stairway leading to the main floor.

"Thank you!" Cate shouted.

True to form, Mrs. Campbell's car wound down the driveway just as Cate got to the front door.

"Lady Cate!" she greeted her as she climbed from her car. "How fortunate you were available today. Though I can't imagine what else you may be doing."

Cate smiled at her as she considered the statement. "I have the samples. They are simply gorgeous," she said as she pulled several items from her car. "Wait until you see them!"

The woman bustled around the car and pushed past Cate into the foyer. "Sitting room, I assume?"

"You guessed it!" Cate answered. "I've got tea on the way up."

"Oh, how lovely. You didn't have to given that the meeting was impromptu. I'd hate to put Emily out. I know how she hates last-minute changes," Mrs. Campbell murmured.

"No trouble at all."

"Wonderful," Mrs. Campbell replied as she plopped onto the loveseat. "I do enjoy a good cuppa."

"And some cookies fresh from the oven from our newest addition, Molly! Mrs. Fraser is teaching her how to bake some of her favorites."

"Oh," Mrs. Campbell answered with a raise of her eyebrows. "There are so many good bakers in the area, I'll bet Molly could pick up lots of new tricks here."

"As long as she picks up all of Mrs. Fraser's, I'll be more than satisfied. She bakes one mean shortbread, and her chicken soup is really the best."

"Yes, well, anyway, we really should get down to business, I suppose," Mrs. Campbell said, changing the subject.

“Sure,” Cate agreed. “Oh, and if you have a few moments after we discuss these linens, I hoped to speak with you on another matter.”

Mrs. Campbell glanced up at Cate, her eyes narrowed as her mind attempted to guess the other matter. “Of course, Lady Cate, I always have time for you,” she replied. “And if it isn’t too much, I also had a second item to add to our impromptu agenda.”

The opening of the door saved Cate from responding. Molly carried a tray of tea and cookies. “Hello, hello!” Molly set the tray on the coffee table between Cate and Mrs. Campbell. “Tea and fresh shortbreads!”

“Thank you, Molly,” Cate answered. “Mrs. Campbell is excited to try your cookies.”

“I believe these are better than the last batch. They may be closing in on Mrs. Fraser’s perfection.” Molly held up her hand, flashing crossed fingers.

“Yes, well, thank you, Molly,” Mrs. Campbell answered, dismissing her.

“Good luck with your linens,” Molly said as she exited. She paused behind Mrs. Campbell and offered Cate a dramatic eye roll before disappearing through the door, her hand covering her mouth as she suppressed a giggle.

Cate poured tea for each of them and offered Mrs. Campbell the plate of cookies. She pulled one from the plate with the tips of her thumb and forefinger. The grimace on her face suggested she preferred not to try one.

“Okay, let’s see the infamous linens!” Cate prodded as Mrs. Campbell stared at the cookie with disdain.

“Oh, yes,” she answered. She set the cookie down untouched and pulled the linens from her messenger bag. “Here we are. Aren’t they simply perfection? The classic look, the classy elegance. It screams Countess of Dunhavenshire.”

Cate eyed the linens. Gold with a simple navy-blue pinstripe, Cate wasn’t sure they “screamed” anything, but she did agree they provided a classic and elegant look. Mrs. Campbell’s ability to nail down details like these was beyond reproach.

Cate sipped her tea and nodded. “Yes, you are quite right,” she agreed. “They are perfect.”

Mrs. Campbell held them up and stared at them. She narrowed her eyes at the sample clutched in her hand. “Would a cranberry pinstripe be better? I wonder...”

“Oh, no, I really believe the blue is the better choice.”

“Well, navy,” Mrs. Campbell corrected.

“Yes. Navy. Navy and gold is a classic combination.”

“But is it boring? Classic and classy are not always the same!” Mrs. Campbell warned.

“In this case, they are.”

Mrs. Campbell squinted at the fabric sample again. She waved it around, studying it in different lights. Cate took another sip of her tea. “Yes. Yes, you are right. Cranberry simply would not do in this case.”

“They really couldn’t be more perfect,” Cate said.

“Oh, I’m so glad you agree! Well, that was easier than I expected!”

“I’m not too difficult to please!” Cate answered.

“No, though your ideas sometimes differ from mine, Lady Cate.” She chuckled a shrill cackling laugh. “Oh, my apologies, I’m recalling your suggestion of... a barbecue.” Mrs. Campbell snorted with laughter.

“They are quite popular where I’m from. It seemed like a relaxed idea and the entire town could have participated.”

“Definitely a very quaint idea, yes, but really, we need something more elegant and a bit more posh for a countess!”

“I’ll be the first to admit you are far better at planning these than I am,” Cate answered.

“While I appreciate the vote of confidence, I still prefer that we’re both on the same page with all choices.”

Cate smiled over her teacup. “Well, now that we are, you mentioned a second agenda item?”

Mrs. Campbell waved her hand in the air. “I believe you mentioned one as well. Please, by all means, ask yours first.”

“Mine may take a bit longer. I’d like to lean on your knowledge as town historian again regarding a former occupant. So, please, go ahead with yours before we move on to that discussion.”

“Ah,” Mrs. Campbell said, giving Cate a knowing glance. “Moving our interests from Randolph to another proprietor? There’s certainly no shortage of tales about any of them!”

Cate was certain there wasn’t from the town’s gossip. “That tends to be the case in places like this,” Cate noted. “Anyway, what was your other item?”

Mrs. Campbell explained. “As president of the historical society, I am a member of an exclusive group of historical society presidents across Scotland. Each year we host a large charitable event, centered around an auction. It occurs in late summer.” She glanced to Cate, her eyes narrowing as she considered Cate’s response.

“And you’d like a donation?” Cate queried as Mrs. Campbell paused.

“Well,” Mrs. Campbell hedged. “In a way, yes.”

Cate knit her brows as Mrs. Campbell responded. The woman continued. “Each year, one of the presidents organizes the event, The Presidents’ Ball. It really is the event of the year for us, and it is quite an honor to be chosen as the event coordinator. I have tried for it a few times before, but I was always overlooked.”

“What a shame,” Cate commented. “Your planning skills are excellent. They’d be foolish not to select you.”

“I appreciate the vote of confidence and in that way, there is something you can do to help me secure the spot.”

“Oh?”

“The president must have a host selected. The host is really a large part of the selection committee’s consideration. In fact, the host can make or break the committee’s choice.”

A sinking feeling filled the pit of Cate’s stomach. She’d hoped to give a donation, monetary or otherwise. Instead, she surmised she’d be offered the role of host. She felt her personality did not fit well into the circumstances. But...

Mrs. Campbell continued, “And I thought who would be more perfect to host this year’s event than our newest Countess? Lady Cate, the American college professor turned Scottish countess! I’m certain with you as our host, the country’s latest noblewoman, we’d be a shoo-in for the selection!

“And the boost it would give to the county and town,” she babbled. “Not to mention showing off the beautiful castle and the grounds!”

“I...” Cate hedged, searching for an answer. Questions flew through her mind faster than she could process them.

“The historical society would handle everything, with me in the lead. What a thrill it would be for them to work on something like this. It would be the talk of the town for years to come...”

“I’d be happy to,” Cate burst. Cate shoved all the questions from her mind. It didn’t matter. The event was important to the region, the town and Mrs. Campbell. She’d deal with whatever she had to in order to make it work. With Mrs. Campbell at the helm, she had no doubt the event would be expertly planned and run.

“Oh!” Mrs. Campbell exclaimed. Her voice betrayed her surprise at Cate’s acceptance. “Well, I will send our application in today! The moment I leave this meeting, I will prepare it and get it right to them! Thank you, Lady Cate!”

“You’re welcome. My fingers will be crossed that we hear good news soon.”

“Applications are due at the end of the month, but it never hurts to be early. We’ll hear back by April third. Oh, so many ideas are running through my head. I’ll begin documenting them all, so we’re prepared in the event we’re selected.”

“I have no doubt the event you plan will be outstanding.”

“Well, I have my afternoon cut out for me preparing our application! Now, you had a question for me?”

“Yes, I won’t take up too much of your time so you can work on the application, but I wanted to gather any stories you had about the castle’s original proprietor, Douglas.”

Mrs. Campbell’s expression changed to coy. A smirk crossed her lips, and she raised an eyebrow. She had a story all right, Cate mused.

“Ahhhh, Douglas,” Mrs. Campbell murmured with a nod. “The man who started it all.”

“Yes. I began my research for my book with Randolph after our conversation when I arrived. But now I’ve turned my attention toward Douglas.”

“Oh, there certainly are tales,” Mrs. Campbell assured her. “Douglas was quite the character.”

“So I’ve heard.”

“Of course, the first question on everyone’s mind is how Douglas came into his money. Obviously, the MacKenzies before him did not have the wealth to build a castle then suddenly Douglas did!”

“Wise investments?” Cate suggested.

Mrs. Campbell chuckled. “Well, of course, that’s what Douglas maintained, but that explanation simply did not add up.”

“Were the MacKenzies before Douglas well-off?”

Mrs. Campbell shook her head vehemently. “No. The only thing royal about Douglas’s parents was his father’s name. Kendrick MacKenzie was a simple town doctor. Douglas left the area early in his twenties and returned home a wealthy earl.”

“No one really knows,” Mrs. Campbell whispered.

“Rumors?” Cate questioned.

“There is no shortage of those! Wise investments, as you mentioned, an unexpected inheritance from a befriended nobleman, spying for the crown, alchemy.”

“Spying for the crown? Really?”

“Oh, yes, that suggestion was floated! Of course, other suggestions are far less innocuous!” Mrs. Campbell raised her eyebrow at Cate.

“Which are?”

“The most commonly agreed upon theory is Douglas involved himself in the black arts!”

“The black arts?” Cate repeated as a question.

“Yes. The rumors spring from the strange goings-on during and after the castle’s construction. His unexplained wealth suddenly became explainable.”

Cate raised her eyebrows, encouraging Mrs. Campbell to expound.

Mrs. Campbell leaned closer to Cate, her eyes darting around the room.

“Human sacrifices, ritual killings, strange disappearances, devil worship.”

CHAPTER 6

“*W*hat?!” Cate exclaimed as Mrs. Campbell’s comments about her ancestor and devil worship.

Mrs. Campbell nodded her head slowly. “Someone died in an ‘accident’ during the castle’s building. Of course, no one believes that story. Most believe he was sacrificed by Douglas and his coven to appease dark powers.”

“That’s a bit far-fetched, isn’t it?” Cate said.

Mrs. Campbell shrugged. “Is it? Considering the events that occurred here during those days? I’m not certain it is!”

“The accidental death?”

“The accidental death, strange noises, haunting sounds, Douglas disappearing mysteriously then reappearing, others doing the same. Odd shifts in the weather, unexplained winds, storm clouds appearing over the castle with no warning. Screams heard in the wee hours of the morning carrying all the way to town! Orders for odd materials by Douglas with peculiar explanations citing weird experiments. The evidence is endless.”

“That’s hardly evidence,” Cate countered. “More likely conjecture based on things townsfolk couldn’t explain.”

“Well, people then didn’t think scientifically like we do now but... there usually is a bit of truth to rumors. And there is the one story that persists throughout the ages.”

“Oh? Regarding Douglas’s ties to the dark side?”

“There’s no specific mention of devil worship or murder, but the tale is bizarre, to say the least!”

“Do tell!” Cate prodded.

“The story begins shortly after the castle’s completion. Douglas entertained several guests in the castle. Townsfolk reported the castle lit from the inside well into the night as he treated his guests to lavish dinner parties. Around this time, townsfolk reported strange happenings in the town. Mysterious attacks of madness, sick animals, dying crops.

“Then the tales take an even stranger turn. On one moonlit night, a few men walked home from the pub. As they did, a storm came out of nowhere. It centered over the castle. Black clouds blotted the moon from the sky. Booming thunder resounded, louder than anyone had heard before. Lightning brightened the night sky.”

“Sounds frightening, though the storms here can be quite powerful,” Cate noted, recalling the previous night’s storms.

“Ah, but that’s where the story gets interesting. The men swear the lightning shot from the ground up to the sky.”

Cate scrunched up her face at the twist. Mrs. Campbell nodded at her. “Yes, lightning bolts shot from ground to sky in a dazzling display. A fireball burst from near the castle and flew around the estate. A tree suddenly burst into flames with no warning. Winds formed a tornado-like funnel that twisted and twirled toward the castle. Then, without warning, everything stopped. The clouds cleared, the fire extinguished, the lightning and thunder ceased, and the winds died. The moon returned, and the night quieted as though nothing had happened.”

Cate raised her eyebrows. “That’s quite a tale. Though two gentlemen returning from the pub after a night of drinking may not be the best source of information.”

“That’s where it gets even more intriguing,” Mrs. Campbell explained. “Though those two gentlemen insisted they witnessed something incredible, their story would have likely been written off as fable.”

“But?” Cate prompted.

“But around the time the men departed from the pub, the reverend’s wife suffered a horrific nightmare in which she witnessed the destruction of Dunhaven Castle. She awoke from the nightmare and raced from her bed to the window to ensure the castle still stood. She, too, witnessed the fantastic events on the castle grounds. She woke her husband, and he also witnessed them.

“When the men retold their strange tale, the MacAlistairs admitted they witnessed the same events. Bolstered by their account, others came forward. In total, over one hundred people in Dunhaven beheld those bizarre events and their stories never wavered. Each of them told the exact same tale with the exact same details. It is those unwavering details that have persisted through centuries and part of the reason Dunhaven Castle’s reputation lingers as haunted... or worse, even to this day.”

“That’s quite a story!”

“And every word true!” Mrs. Campbell insisted.

Cate smiled at her. “Even if it isn’t, it makes for a fantastic opening chapter for my book!”

Mrs. Campbell grinned at her. “Yes, it does!”

Cate pondered it a moment. “Did Douglas entertain many guests on the estate? Related to his... black magic?”

“Oh, in those first days of the castle, Douglas entertained often! In fact, I’m certain he had quite the list of visitors from wealthy Americans to high-ranking noblemen!”

“Hmm, how interesting. Anyone in particular?”

“Bankers, shipping magnates, statesman, noblemen. Some even say your Thomas Jefferson stayed here!”

“What a colorful history the castle has! I can’t wait to continue my research into that era. Well, I shouldn’t take up too much more of your time, Mrs. Campbell. With the application due, I’m sure you’re itching to get at it and get your ideas recorded.”

“That I am, though I’m never too busy to share tales for your book!”

“And, as always, you are a wealth of information!”

Mrs. Campbell beamed at Cate as she gathered her materials. “I will forward you a copy of the application as soon as I’ve prepared it. We should begin planning even before the announcement so we can hit the ground running should we be selected.”

“Sounds like a plan!” Cate said as she stood from the loveseat.

Mrs. Campbell gathered all her materials and Cate walked her to the door. The horn sounded as she pulled down the drive.

Cate spun on her heel and collected Riley and Bailey from the library before retrieving the tea tray to deliver to the kitchen.

“Is the ninny gone?” Mrs. Fraser inquired as Cate set the tea tray near the sink.

“What did she think of the cookies? Did she say?” Molly asked with hope in her voice.

Cate set a teacup in the sink and lifted the saucer in her hands. She spun to face them. “Untouched,” she said as she eyed the uneaten cookie. “Sorry, Molly.”

Molly’s shoulders slumped. “You’re better off!” Mrs. Fraser informed her.

“Better off how? Did I just spot Mrs. Campbell’s car leaving?” Jack inquired as he entered the kitchen.

“Yes, you did,” Cate informed him.

“Aye,” Mrs. Fraser confirmed. “Another linen crisis.”

“And she didn’t even try my cookies!” Molly moaned.

“Her loss is my gain!” Jack joked as he grabbed the cookie from the saucer and stuffed it into his mouth.

“But you’re no help!” Molly protested. “You’ve already tried them! I needed an outside opinion.”

“You’re better off without hers,” Jack said.

“Told you,” Mrs. Fraser said with a nod. “Well, did you get your linens sorted, Lady Cate?”

“We did. I went with her suggestion after she second-guessed it then confirmed it was a perfect choice. And she had another request.”

“No,” Jack whined. “Another? What now? Palm trees? Bring a beach grain by grain for a luau?”

“No,” Cate answered with a chuckle. “Not related to my anniversary party. She’s vying for...”

Mrs. Fraser gasped. “The Presidents’ Ball!” she exclaimed.

“Yes!” Cate responded, impressed by Mrs. Fraser’s guess.

“What’s The Presidents’ Ball?” Molly inquired.

“Association of Historical Society Presidents annual charity event,” Mrs. Fraser answered as Mr. Fraser joined them in the kitchen. “Isla has been vying for that role for as long as I’ve known her.”

“Is it a big deal?”

“To her, it is,” Mrs. Fraser confirmed. “I imagine she figures she’ll be a front-runner with you as her host. And I suppose it is quite a big deal, in general. It's a large-scale event. Whatever town it's held in gets a big tourism boost."

"Ugh," Jack groaned. "Dunhaven will be crawling with tourists. Our sleepy little hamlet invaded by foreigners."

"Hey, I'm a foreigner!" Cate exclaimed.

"But we like you, Lady Cate," Jack replied with a wink.

"It would be a big boost to the town," Mr. Fraser chimed in.

"Aye," Mrs. Fraser agreed. "It would be. I suppose I hope she gets it."

"I'm surprised you offered to host, Lady Cate," Molly said.

"A snap decision I'm certain I'll regret at some point, but it seemed important to her and the town so I accepted. And I hope you'll all be my guests at the event!"

"Oh, I won't turn you down, though Isla will be livid when she sees us 'servants' there!" Mrs. Fraser said with a chuckle.

Jack sighed and stared at Mr. Fraser. "Another party to prepare the grounds for," he lamented.

"At the rate she's going, we'll just have to maintain. Mrs. Campbell's got a party a month here, so we're always in tip-top shape anymore!" Mr. Fraser commented. "Though for an event of this nature, I suppose we'll want the banners again."

"Dinnae count your chickens before they're hatched," Mrs. Fraser said. "She's not got the job yet!"

"With Lady Cate as host, we're bound to be a favorite."

"I don't understand why," Cate admitted.

All eyes turned to her. Jack scoffed at the question. "American history professor turned Scottish countess," Jack answered. "Who wouldn't want a colorful character like you hosting?"

"Colorful character?! Hardly!" Cate exclaimed.

"Aye, he's right, Lady Cate," Mrs. Fraser confirmed. "You'll be the talk of the ball. New blood. You'll be the most interesting host in the last thirty years!"

Cate frowned at the statement as she considered it. "Following in the line of the MacKenzies, I suppose."

"At least you haven't summoned any spirits to gain that reputation," Molly said.

"According to Mrs. Campbell, Douglas had a more sinister reputation than that!" Cate claimed.

Molly spun to face her. "More sinister than devil worship?"

Cate nodded her head. "Ritual killings, human sacrifices."

Molly gulped at Cate's admission. Mrs. Fraser scoffed. "That woman and her gossip," she said with a shake of her head. "Dinnae give it a second thought, Miss Molly. That woman tells fantastical tales just to hear herself talk."

"She told me another one, too," Cate announced.

"Oh?" Mrs. Fraser inquired.

"Yes. About a strange occurrence on the castle grounds shortly after its construction. A storm from nowhere, lightning from the ground to the sky. Fireballs flying around the estate. A tree bursting into flames and a tornado. She said hundreds of people witnessed this happen including the reverend and his wife."

Molly's eyes grew wide, and her mouth fell agape.

"Aye, that story's true," Mrs. Fraser confirmed.

"You didn't tell me about that!" Cate protested.

"There's a reason I omitted it."

"Because you didn't want to frighten Molly?" Jack teased.

"Nay, because that story is nonsense."

"But you said it was true," Cate countered.

"Yeah," Molly chimed in. "Fireballs and tornados Cate said, and you said it was true!"

"The account is true. Over one hundred people reported witnessing those strange events on the estate. But she's left out the reason."

"Because this joint is haunted?" Molly questioned.

"Nay, Miss Molly. The town had just finished a spring fair celebration. They later found out the pork pie turned before they ate it. Everyone who ate it experienced the strange phenomenon. It was the result of bad food, nothing more."

"Mass hallucination from bad pork? I'm not sure I believe that," Molly said with a wrinkled nose.

Mrs. Fraser gave her a hearty laugh. "Think of the alternative. Fireballs flying about, a fire that extinguishes itself, lightning bolts from the ground to the sky. Pshaw! Rubbish! Foolishness!"

Molly pressed her lips together and knit her brows. "I guess you're right."

“Of course, I’m right,” Mrs. Fraser said with a nod. “The very idea of such nonsense occurring is for children’s books.”

Cate held in a chuckle. If Mrs. Fraser ever realized the capabilities housed under this castle’s roof, she’d faint dead away.

“Well with that settled, and everyone aware of Mrs. Campbell’s latest venture, I will grab my lunch and excuse myself!” Cate said.

“Ah, the announcement was just a sneaky way to retrieve your own lunch tray, was it?” Mrs. Fraser asked of Cate.

“You caught me,” Cate said as she held her hands up. “Guilty.”

“Good thing we like you, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser said with a wink as she handed the tray off.

“Have a good lunch, everyone!” Cate called as she disappeared down the hall with her tray and two dogs in tow.

Cate stared at the gibberish in the notebook again. She toggled between the written words and the information on her laptop. After searching several websites, she concluded this may be over her head. Breaking a cipher, even a centuries-old one, may not be achievable on her own.

Cate clicked off the current website and typed the web address for Aberdeen College. She searched the faculty roster for Dr. Ken Matthews. After finding his email address, she opened a new email and typed a message.

Hi Ken - I’m not sure if you remember me. We met on a few occasions while I was at Aberdeen College. I used to work in the History Department. I’ve since moved to Scotland (long story) and am working on a book about the history of Dunhaven Castle, my new home.

I’ve come across some journals from the castle’s builder, but they seem to be encrypted. Code-breaking is NOT my strong suit but Molly Williams reminded me it is yours! Would you be able to provide any help to get me started on trying to decipher these materials?

Thanks! Cate Kensie

Cate blew out a long breath as the email left her outbox. She slouched in her chair, stretching her arms overhead as she considered what to fill her afternoon with as she awaited a response.

Cate stared out the window, pondering how to identify the man who haunted her dreams. As she considered how to research guests on the estate in the 1700s, her laptop chimed. Cate glanced at the screen, surprised to see a return email from Ken Matthews.

Hi Cate! Or should I say, Lady Cate? You're somewhat of a local legend on campus now. The story of your inheritance spread fairly quickly after your departure.

How interesting to find encrypted journals from a past era! I am happy to help if I can. Would it be possible for you to send a scan of a page or two so I can see what we're working with?

My mind is already listing the most likely possibilities. I may be able to rule a few out by seeing the text.

I hope you are enjoying Scotland.

Ken

Cate scanned the email, and a smile formed on her face. Maybe now she could make some progress. The only problem was sharing the information with Ken. What if the information shared gave something away about the castle's secret?

Cate pondered it for a moment. Would Douglas's first journal mention the secret on the first page or two? Cate weighed the odds. She'd never decrypt this without help.

Cate snatched her cell phone from the desk and toggled open her camera app. She snapped a picture of the first page. She shuffled through a few pages and snapped a picture of another random page from the journal. Two non-consecutive pages should make any information indecipherable for Ken.

Cate clicked the reply button on Ken's email and typed back to him.

Hi Ken - Thanks for your help! I've attached two pictures to this message with samples from the first journal. If you could point me in the right direction (or to an online solver!), I can decrypt these myself. I'm just not sure where to start!

Thanks again. I'll owe you one!

Cate

Cate drummed her fingers on the laptop after sending the email. Perhaps Ken would respond as quickly as he did the first time. Within seconds, her laptop chimed, and a new email popped into her inbox.

On it! I've already got a list of ideas to run through. With any luck, I'll hit on something in my initial list and have more information for you soon!

Ken

Cate appreciated the man's fervor. Like so many of her colleagues, he was like a kid in a candy store when faced with a puzzle in their field. She hoped to have answers soon.

With Ken on the case, Cate shut her laptop. She'd need a new project to fill her time as she waited for answers from him.

Cate stood and stretched as she pondered her options. Perhaps she'd poke around in Douglas's office for any other information she could scrounge.

She opened the secret passage and turned on the lighting. Cate wandered down the wooden steps and into the cool laboratory space. She glanced around the room as she considered where to begin.

The stack of drawings near the desk caught her attention. She meandered to them and grabbed the first few sheets from the top. Cate stared down at the drawings. Outside of the sketch, she could make no sense out of any words scrawled on the paper. She shuffled to the next page. Similarly, each written word was no more than a random selection of letters in Cate's eyes. She sighed and flipped to the next page.

After thirty minutes, Cate found herself on the floor with papers sprawled around her in every direction. Outside of the nonsensical labels, the papers shared one additional characteristic in common. Each was numbered on the backside in the bottom right corner. The location matched the numbers in the journal. Using them, Cate pieced together the order in which the drawings were created.

While it didn't help her decipher anything, Cate felt she'd made some progress. As she collected the papers into an ordered pile, she studied a drawing. She decided her next task would be to match the drawings with any of the inventions she'd placed on the shelves. Then, if she could decipher the code, perhaps she could make some sense of each of them.

The drawing, labeled number one, contained an illustration of the large wooden desk in the room's center. Cate examined it. Why draw the desk in the room? Had Douglas designed it? If so, why encrypt its design? Did it hold some secret?

Obscure labels pointed to various areas on the piece. Cate scurried across the floor to the desk and studied the marked areas. They appeared decorative in nature. Several arrows pointed to drawers on the desk. Cate glanced inside a few of them but found nothing unusual.

Stumped, she returned to inspecting the drawing. "Oh, if only I could read these!" Cate bemoaned.

"Talking to yourself, Lady Cate?" Jack inquired from the stairs.

Startled, Cate jumped. "I guess you caught me," she said with a chuckle as she recovered from her surprise. "I didn't even hear you coming down the stairs."

"Lost in thought?"

"Yes," Cate admitted.

"Any luck deciphering those journals?"

"No, that's why I'm down here on the floor. I sent a message to a former colleague and I'm waiting for an answer. I figured I'd move to a new project to pass my time."

"What project? Cleaning the floor with your pants?"

Cate shook her head at him. "No. I found all these sketches with the journals. They are encrypted, too, but I figured I would try to sort through them and match them with the objects they belong with. Then if I decipher the journals, perhaps I can decipher these and find out what each of these inventions of his are!"

Jack stared at the large glass bowl across the room. "I'm not sure I want to find out," he murmured.

"Anyway, the first sketch is of this desk."

"Really?" Jack inquired. "Douglas designed his own desk?"

"It appears that way. I can't read anything on here, but he must have designed it for a reason. All these pieces are marked. I can't read their labels, but I was trying to determine what they mean."

Jack joined her near the desk. Cate climbed to her feet and shared the drawing with him. Jack glanced from the sketch to the desk.

"Perhaps it marks specific decorative items he wanted?"

"But why mark the drawers?"

Jack studied one of the marked drawers. He pulled it open and peered inside. He ran his hand around the drawer's interior.

"Anything?" Cate questioned.

Jack shook his head with a frown. "Not that I noticed."

"No false panels or anything?"

"Nope."

Cate scrunched up her face as she studied the drawing again. “I really wish I could read this,” she murmured.

Jack grabbed the paper from Cate and took a closer glance at it. He flitted his eyes between the sketch and the marked components. Cate peered over his shoulder at the drawing. She bent down, her brow furrowing as she studied a decorative element marked on the drawing. Carved wooden leaves adorned a corner piece. She pressed her fingers against the brown leaves. They did not budge.

Cate poked at the carving. She narrowed her eyes at it before changing strategies. Her fingers wrapped around the piece and pulled. The wooden rectangle pulled away from the desk. Cate stood and stared at the piece.

Cate stared at the piece protruding from the centuries-old desk.
“You broke it, Lady Cate,” Jack teased.

She glanced at the picture before she reached to the freed piece again. She grasped hold of it and turned. A grinding noise filled the room, followed by a loud clank.

“Well, that did something,” Cate said.

“Aye, lassie, but what?”

Cate pulled the drawing from Jack’s hands and set it on the desktop. She pointed out the mechanism she’d just engaged. “Okay, this one has been activated. At least I expect so. These other marked pieces must engage some sort of mechanism within this desk.”

“What mechanism?”

“I’m not certain,” Cate admitted. “But I’d love to find out.”

Jack raised his eyebrows. “Oh, please don’t tell me you object,” Cate groaned.

“For once, I don’t. I can’t imagine this could be that dangerous.”

“Good,” Cate said with a smile.

“Until we trigger whatever mechanism is inside the desk and the castle is swallowed by a sinkhole,” Jack joked.

“Funny,” Cate said.

She identified another leafy panel marked on the sketch on the desk’s corner. Cate grasped it between her fingers and pulled. It came away from the desk easily. Cate turned it in a similar manner as she had the first. Nothing happened.

Cate frowned at it. She tried to turn it the opposite way, but it didn't budge.

"Hmm," she murmured. "Nothing happened."

Jack narrowed his eyes at the object before he glanced back to the drawing. "Wait!" he exclaimed. "Look at the label."

"What about it?" Cate inquired.

"The first one you turned has three letters. The second one you tried has five letters."

"So?" Cate asked, knitting her brows in concentration.

"This one," Jack said, pointing to another labeled decoration, "has three letters. And this one has four."

"I'm still not understanding how the number of letters factors in," Cate admitted.

Jack pushed the decorative panel back into place. "Let's try this one," he suggested. He grabbed the panel labeled with three letters. He pulled it and twisted it to the side. A scraping noise resounded, ending with a clank. Jack grinned at Cate. "And there's the second piece."

"Great job!" Cate said with a smile. "How did you know that one would work?"

"I'm a genius," Jack responded.

"Funny, come on, how did you know?"

"It disturbs me that you don't believe I'm a genius, Lady Cate," Jack said with an exaggerated frown.

Cate shot him a glance. "I realize you are very intelligent. You have saved a man from the death penalty without ever setting foot in law school. What I mean is how did you figure it out?"

Jack pointed to the labels. "Each of these has three random letters. This has five, this has four. I surmised these are numbered elements, indicating the order to engage each. You used this one: three letters labeling it as 'one.' You got lucky picking the first one. The only other one with three letters is this one which I figure is labeled 'two.' Now I suggest we try this one. Five random letters which I believe suggests the label 'three' which also has five letters."

"Way to go, Jack!" Cate grinned at him. She reached for the marked panel, released it from its spot against the desk, and turned. The familiar whirring and clanking filled the air.

“Last one!” Jack exclaimed as he repeated the process with the fourth. This produced a grinding noise followed by a clank, then a hiss.

“Now what?” Cate questioned.

They both leaned over the drawing. “The drawers?” Jack suggested.

“But what about them?” Cate mused aloud.

“One label has three letters, one has four, and two have five.”

“Five, six, seven and eight?” Cate proposed.

“That’s a safe bet, I’d say,” Jack answered. He pulled open the drawer labeled “five.” The drawer slid further than it had before. “Whoa!”

“That’s further than it slid before.”

“Aye, it is. And what are these marks?” Jack questioned.

Cate squinted down at the tiny markings. “Numbers!” she exclaimed.

“Numbers?” Jack questioned.

“We must have to open each drawer to a certain number to activate whatever mechanism is built into this.”

“What numbers? Five, six, seven and eight?”

“We can try it, though I’d bet that’s not it.”

Jack positioned the other drawers to match their labels. Nothing happened. “You were correct, Lady Cate. That’s not it.”

“That’s far too easy,” Cate admitted.

“Of course, it is,” Jack moaned. “Any other ideas?”

Cate pondered the question for a moment. “Birth year, the year the desk was created, the year it was designed, the year the castle was built, the year Douglas married,” she rattled off.

“Okay, let’s start trying them. What’s the date on the drawing?”

Cate glanced at the unreadable title and the date scrawled under it. “1792,” she said.

Jack lined up the drawers to that year. “Nothing,” he said.

“Try 1791,” Cate suggested. “Castle completion year.”

“Okay,” Jack replied as he pushed the final drawer in to ‘one’ rather than ‘two.’ “Nope.”

“Uh,” Cate mumbled as she processed dates. “Try... 1788.” Jack glanced at her with a confused expression. “When Douglas married Olivia.”

Jack moved the drawers to reflect the date. Nothing happened.

“1767, Douglas’s birth year.” Nothing.

Cate squinted into the distance. “1770.”

Jack repositioned the drawers. A popping noise sounded. “Haha!” Jack exclaimed. “You got it! How did you come up with that date?”

“I’m a genius,” Cate joked.

Jack gave her a wry glance. She shrugged. “Olivia’s birth year.”

“Good going, Lady Cate. Now, what made that noise?”

“I’m not sure,” Cate answered. They glanced around the perimeter of the desk. Cate sank to her knees and glanced underneath. “Here!”

Jack joined her on the floor, sticking his head between the two columns supporting the desk’s thick wooden top. He removed his cell phone from his pocket and toggled on his flashlight. Cate pulled open the piece of wood protruding from the back panel.

As the wooden door creaked open on rusty hinges, Jack shined the light into the new opening. Dull metal reflected the light. “It’s a safe!” Cate exclaimed.

“This guy loved security,” Jack breathed as he reached to pull the metal box from the desk’s hidden chamber.

“What in the world did he hide in here?” Cate murmured.

Jack grunted as he struggled to pull the heavy safe from its hiding spot. “What is this made out of?” he squeaked as he clenched his teeth.

“Let me help,” Cate offered. She reached in to assist in lifting the metal box. “Oof!” She breathed as they pulled it free from its location and dumped it on the stone floor.

Jack wiped his forehead before they slid the safe out from under the desk. He frowned at the metal box. Round metal buttons covered the surface of the rectangular metal box. “How do you open it?”

“This is a strongbox,” Cate explained. She knelt up and pulled open one of the desk’s drawers. She pulled a metal ring with two keys, one large and one small with a pointed tip. “One or more of these buttons should have a small divot. We use this pointy key to trigger a mechanism that will open a panel where we use this large key.”

“That’s quite a knowledge of ancient safes you’ve got there, Lady Cate. Were you a former safecracker?”

Cate checked several buttons before she inserted the pointy key. “Just a humble historian,” Cate promised. A panel snapped open, revealing a keyhole. Cate fitted the key into the keyhole and turned it. She tugged at the key to remove it.

“There must be another,” she mumbled. Cate searched the other buttons. Jack followed her progress as she found another trigger. A second panel popped open, revealing a second keyhole. Cate used the key to unlock this bolt. She pulled at the door. “Still stuck.”

Cate searched and found a third divot near the bottom of the strongbox. After unlocking the latch, she pulled the door open.

Jack toggled on his flashlight again. “I hope it’s something expensive after all this!”

Jack and Cate peered into the box’s interior. Cate’s mouth hung agape as she held her breath and identified the objects inside. Within seconds, she closed her mouth, a frown forming. Jack made a face. “That’s it?” he griped.

Cate reached inside and withdrew the two items. “A piece of paper with a list of numbers and a bunch of metal rings hanging around a bar mounted on a horizontal stand,” Jack assessed as Cate set the objects between them.

The items left Cate speechless. She stared at them. She reached out and touched one of the disks on the stand. It spun around on its pin.

“Not what you expected? It’s junk!” Jack cried. “What is it?”

Cate shrugged. “Ancient calendar?” she joked.

“Well, that had a lackluster result after all that work. Why did he go through all this trouble to hide this?”

“No idea, but it has to be something important,” Cate insisted. “I have no idea what, though. Well, at least we solved it.”

“Way to look on the bright side, lassie,” Jack said as he climbed to his feet. He extended his hand to pull Cate to her feet. She scooped the items from the floor. “Taking your bounty with you?”

“Yep! We worked hard for this. I’m going to take a closer look at it. See if I can find anything interesting.”

“You do that, Lady Cate. I am going to clean up before dinner. At least we’ve killed the time between meals!”

“I’m glad I could assist with that,” Cate said. “And at least I found a new toy to play with while I wait to hear anything back on the journal encryption!”

The heaviness of her dress's fabric weighed on Cate as she bolted down the hall on wobbly legs. As she rounded the corner, she searched for an escape. Her mind clouded as she spun in every direction, finding herself trapped. A tear rolled down her cheek, and she bit her lower lip.

Footsteps approached. A moan escaped Cate's lips as she continued her frantic search. She spotted a wall sconce. Cate lunged toward it, pulling on it with all her weight. It slid down the wall and triggered a mechanism.

A panel slid open. Cate ducked inside. She shoved it shut, collapsing against it and exhaling a deep breath.

Her posture stiffened as the footsteps closed in on her location. "Catherine," a voice sang. "Where are you?"

Cate glanced around as her eyes adjusted. She swallowed hard as she searched the darkened space for a hiding spot or an exit. She backed away from the hidden panel; her hand tracing the stone wall next to her.

A thud sounded behind her and Cate froze. Her assailant pounded against the wall. "Are you there, Catherine?" he called.

Cate's breath caught in her throat, and she backed further away from the hidden panel. The passageway sloped sharply downward. She followed it into the blackness below.

The air turned chilly and damp. Water dripped in the distance. Cate wrapped her arms around her waist as she shivered against the cold.

A scraping sound echoed throughout the chamber. Cate twirled to face the secret panel. Light streamed in from the open entryway. The figure of a man stood limned against the bright glow. Cate backed another step away.

"Catherine!" his voice called into the chamber.

Cate shrunk against the wall as she continued to inch away from the opening. Her back struck another wall. She pressed into the corner as the man stepped inside the passage.

Without warning, the man spun on his heel and faced the opening. He cursed and raced from the passage, disappearing into the hall beyond.

Cate breathed a sigh of relief, though she did not budge. Her bottom lip quivered as she strained to listen for sounds in the hall. Was this a trap? Was the man lying in wait for her just beyond the exit?

Cate held her breath as she listened. Her brows knit, and she squeezed her eyes shut in concentration. Within seconds, Cate snapped them open. Her eyes darted around the space. She frowned and tilted her head as she strained to listen again.

In the silence of the room, one sound stood out. Breathing. Cate listened as the rhythmic noise filled her ears. She wasn't alone in the chamber. Cate's heart skipped a beat, and she strained her eyes to search the darkness for the hidden individual.

Cate found no one. "Hello?" she called, her voice breathy and strained. "Is someone there?"

The breathing ceased for a moment. A rustling noise filled the air. Cate recoiled, squeezing closer to the wall. "Who is it?" she demanded again.

A burst of bright blue-white light exploded in front of her. Cate squinted against it as it pierced her eyelids. "STAY AWAY!" she screamed.

"Stay away, stay away," Cate murmured as she thrashed in the sheets.

She shot up to sitting and gasped for breath. She swallowed hard as her heart began to slow.

Another nightmare. Cate grabbed her journal and jotted down all the details she recalled. Who was the man she fled from almost every night? And what was the meaning of the latest development? Who was the other person hiding in the secret passage?

CHAPTER 8

Cate settled at the library's desk and opened her laptop. Her odd nightmare flitted across her mind and she shivered, shaking her head to clear it from her mind. She scanned her work area, strewn with Douglas's journals as the laptop booted. With a sigh, she wondered if she'd ever decipher them. Perhaps Ken would provide some help.

As the laptop's screen lit, Cate swiped at her trackpad. She navigated to her email. Her pulse quickened as she discovered a new email from Ken Matthews. Cate clicked to open it. Time seemed to slow as she waited to read his response.

Hi Cate! I hope you're doing well. I wanted to update you on my progress. (This is fascinating, by the way!) I ran your text through a few text analyzers. What I can tell you so far is that it's not a simple substitution cipher (you may know this as a cryptogram).

My text analysis has not shown that this follows the standard patterns expected in the English language. To explain a bit further, in the English language, we'd expect to see one letter making up 11-13% (this would be an "e"), 6.3%-8.7% as another ("t") and so on. So, if this was a substitution cipher, the one letter that substitutes for "e" should show up 11-13% of the time.

Now, I did adjust for the fact that this was 1700s English based on the information you provided, but even with the Old English taken into account, the text still doesn't come up with the correct percentages expected for letters.

This also rules out a Caesar cipher. This is basically a substitution cipher but instead of random substitutions (e.g. q for e, u for t), this one shifts the alphabet. For example, we may shift 4 letters to the left, meaning A would be coded as E, B as F, C as G and so on. Again, we'd notice the basic percentages of letters that show up in the English language (albeit shifted).

That's probably far too much information about the math behind it for your taste, sorry. Force of habit. Anyway, those are two of the popular ciphers from the 1700s. Which leaves only a few other options, all of which are harder to break. The fortunate thing is without technology, ciphers were quite limited, though some of them still prove difficult (or impossible) to break!

The one that's next to check on my list is the Vigenère cipher. It's a series of twenty-six Caesar ciphers, and encryption is based on a keyword. This cipher is designed to hide the letter frequencies, so that would fit with the text analysis I performed. Vigenère ciphers CAN be broken especially if we can identify the key's length. I've got some tricks up my sleeve I can use to establish this, but I figured I would check in to see if there's any identifiable keyword in your journals. If there are, this will be easy!

If not, I'll proceed with the two attack plans for breaking the Vigenère!

Ken

Cate parsed through the email. Ken's enthusiasm for the subject leapt off her screen. Unfortunately, Cate lacked his enthusiasm for the intricacies of code-breaking. With little idea what a Vigenère cipher was, Cate wondered if she may have overlooked the keyword Ken's email mentioned.

She grabbed the first journal from the desk and paged through it. She searched for any prominent words that suggested keyword status. She found none. She searched the other twelve journals, finding no traces of the keyword.

Cate swiped her laptop's trackpad to revive her laptop. She tapped the "Reply" button and began her email to Ken.

Hi Ken - I'm doing well. Thank you so much for all your work on this so far. I'm sorry it hasn't panned out yet.

I searched all through the journals and didn't see anything that may be the keyword you asked about. Each journal begins with "The Journal of Douglas MacKenzie" before it descends into indecipherable gibberish.

I don't suppose that's the key? Is the key in plain English? I searched through for an English word but maybe I overlooked something if the key is encrypted too.

Sorry for all the questions. This is not my area of expertise (as you can tell). I'm just not sure what I should be looking for.

Thanks again, Cate

Cate sent the email and checked her watch. At quarter after ten in the morning in Scotland, it would be only just after 4 a.m. across the pond in Aberdeen. She'd have a while to wait for a response.

Cate spent another thirty minutes searching through the journals. After finding nothing, she performed an internet search on Vigenère ciphers, hoping that learning about them would assist her in finding the keyword.

She poked around a few sites, learning a little more about how the cipher worked. None of the sites pointed to how to identify the keyword. Cate pinched her lips together. Another dead-end for the moment.

She glanced around the room as she blew out a puff of air. An alert sounded on her computer, drawing her attention back to it. Cate glanced at the screen. A new email stared at her from Ken Matthews.

Wow, Cate mused, Ken was an early riser.

Hi Cate - No problem, I'm having a blast! Great puzzle to solve! I'd doubt the journal title is the key, but I'll run it (and any variants) through my decryption software to see if it produces text.

The key wouldn't be encrypted. It should be a normal word that we will use to determine which shifts to use to encrypt each letter.

Let me try these words and phrases and see what I come up with. I'll get back to you soon (give me about an hour)!

Ken

An hour, Cate ruminated. Perhaps in an hour, she would have an answer. A nagging feeling suggested the answer would be no, but Cate held out hope one of those words would produce something.

Cate rose from her chair and faced the fireplace. "How about a walk, boys?" she suggested to the two dogs lounging near the fireplace.

They leapt to their feet and followed her from the room. Cate spent an hour and a half enjoying the early signs of spring in Scotland. A day with mild temperatures and sunshine provided ample reason to stay outdoors as Cate ticked the minutes down to the next response from Ken.

As they returned to the castle, they passed the side garden. Both dogs raced toward their new favorite location. “I can’t believe you two are so obsessed with this spot,” Cate said with a laugh.

“Talking to yourself again, Lady Cate?” Jack inquired as he rounded the corner.

“No, talking to the outdoor experts,” she qualified, motioning toward the two dogs.

“Oh? And what have our intrepid expert explorers discovered today?”

“Nothing,” Cate said with a shrug. “They’ve been interested in this spot near this bush for days now. I don’t see a thing there.”

Jack stooped and examined the spot. Riley glanced to him, then back to the mysterious dirt patch. “What do you see there, Sir Riley?” he questioned.

Riley pawed at the ground. Jack knelt next to him and peered closer. “Ohhhh, yes,” he muttered.

“What is it? Do you see something?” Cate inquired as she peered over his shoulder.

“Aye,” Jack admitted.

“What?”

“A giant... SPIDER,” Jack exclaimed, tossing a leaf Cate’s way.

Cate shrieked and stumbled backward a few steps. She brushed at her clothes to rid herself of any unwanted visitors on her sweater.

Jack held in a laugh.

“Is it on me? Where is it?” Cate cried.

Jack shook his head, still holding in his chuckling. “No, no, Lady Cate,” he answered as he swiped a green leaf off the ground. “You’ve dodged it.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at him. “THAT was NOT a funny joke!” Cate groaned.

Jack snickered before sobering. “Okay, okay, it wasn’t. Sorry.”

“It’s okay. I’ll forgive you.”

“Next time I’ll say it was a snake. THAT will be funnier.”

Cate shook her head at him. “Come on, you three jokesters,” Cate said to the two pups and Jack. “Let’s head back in. I’ve got to check my email.”

“Check your email? Waiting on an important email from the party czar?”

“No. I emailed a former colleague about the encrypted journals. He’s not hit on any solutions yet. And don’t worry, I was careful about what I sent. I only sent the first page and a few random early pages. I'm figuring he wouldn't disclose the secret within the first pages."

"Let's hope not. Anyway, with no solutions in sight, we're still safe."

Cate nodded. "I'm afraid without Ken's help, I'd never break that code. Even with his help, a lot of this is over my head."

"I'll admit I am interested to learn what's in those journals myself."

Cate grinned at him. "It could answer so many questions."

"I agree. It could lend us great insight!"

"Heading in for lunch?" Cate inquired as they neared the kitchen door.

"You bet! I'm starving!"

Jack held the door open for Cate and the dogs to enter. She collected her lunch tray and carried it upstairs. With any luck, an email awaited her. An email containing a solution to her cipher.

Cate ushered the dogs into the library and carried her tray to the desk. She shoved the tray onto the desk's top, nudging the journals toward the edge. Cate sniffed at the aromatic tomato basil soup as she opened her laptop.

She tapped the keyboard, signing into her email account. No new messages awaited her. She frowned at the page before refreshing it twice, to be sure. No new emails popped into her inbox. Perhaps this was good news. Perhaps Ken hit on something. Time would tell. For now, Cate would have to wait.

Dejected, she carried her lunch tray to the cozy armchair near the fireplace. Perhaps when she finished her lunch, she'd have an answer, she mused.

Halfway through her meal, her laptop made the characteristic chime, indicating a new email. Cate raced to the desk to check. A bolded email topped her email list. Cate smiled at the sender's name: Ken Matthews.

She toggled it open on her screen.

Hi Cate - Sorry for the delay, I wanted to try a few other things. As you may have surmised, nothing has worked out so far. I tried all the combinations of "The Journal of Douglas MacKenzie" as the keyword and came up with nothing.

I ran through a few different techniques to elicit the key's length (which would help us to break the code) but, again, I came up with nothing.

This doesn't mean it's not a Vigenère but what it does mean is we can't solve it without the keyword. I wanted to check back with you on the off chance you've identified anything else that could be the key. I'm not giving up yet. But is there anything else that may point to a clue to deciphering the text? Even if you don't expect it's related, send it over. A fresh set of trained eyes may be able to come up with something workable.

Thanks, and sorry I've not found anything thus far! Ken

Cate pouted at the screen. Though grateful for Ken's help, her frustration mounted with each negative result. Cate opened the first journal again, determined to scour it for a keyword. She had to find something!

Cate flipped through the first journal again. If the keyword was anywhere, it would be in the first journal, she surmised. Cate scoured every inch of the pages for the thousandth time but found nothing. She let the book fall to her lap. The pages fanned shut as she propped her head up with her hand. Cate stared down at the journal with its front cover open. The Journal of Douglas MacKenzie, she read as she stared at it.

Her eyes flitted to the inside cover. She focused on the numbers scrawled on the cover. Cate knit her brows and squinted at them. Could they help?

Cate sat straighter and clicked the Reply button on Ken's email.

Hi Ken - Thanks for your help so far. I have been over every inch of the journal and haven't found any keywords BUT I did find something curious. In each journal I have found, there are twenty-five numbers scrawled on the inside cover. Could they be the keyword? Or related to it? I realize it's not a word, but it's the only thing I can come up with.

I've attached a picture of the inside cover from two of the journals for your reference. Does this help at all?

Cate

Cate pressed send, then drummed her fingers against the desk. In five minutes, she gave up on staring at her inbox while willing the email to appear. She yawned, a sudden burst of tiredness overcoming her.

Her mind turned to another journal. Her own. She'd experienced another nightmare last night. Why was she suffering from them? What did they mean? Perhaps if she couldn't solve the mystery of Douglas's journals, she could make progress on her own.

Cate pushed back from the desk and navigated upstairs to her bedroom. She retrieved the notebook from her night table. As she tucked it under her arm, she recalled the frightening details summarized inside.

They were only silly dreams. Why did they terrorize her? As she contemplated the question, a loud ticking echoed in the room.

Cate grabbed at the timepiece hanging around her neck. She opened the cover. The second hand crept around the watch face. Her jaw dropped. She hadn't triggered the mechanism. She glanced around the room. What was happening? Her bedroom contained a time rip accessing 1925. Was she in the 1920s?

CHAPTER 9

She swallowed hard as she considered her options. Was she standing in another century? Cate raised the timepiece, intending to use it to return to the present. Her eyes widened as the second hand sped up and kept normal time.

Cate stood unmoving for a moment. She tore her eyes from the watch face and glanced around the bedroom. She recognized her things. Riley and Bailey's beds lay near her bed. Her cell phone charger poked from behind the night table lamp. A discarded cardigan hung limply over her armchair.

She was in her time. Cate ran a shaky hand through her hair as her heart settled back to normal speed. Had she imagined the incident? Was her mind playing tricks on her? Was this the product of an overtired imagination?

Cate bit her lower lip as questions flooded her mind. She shoved them to the back of her brain. It was a fluke. A trick of her mind. A reaction to the memory of her nightmares.

Still, she felt a sudden urge to leave her bedroom. Cate hurried from the room and weaved through the hallways toward the library. As she stepped into the hallway from a back set of stairs, she bumped into Jack.

"Ahoy there, Lady Cate," Jack greeted her with a salute.

"Hi, Jack," she said.

"Uh-oh, that doesn't sound like Lady Cate! Say, you're not still sore at me over that spider hoax? I really do apologize, Cate."

Cate waved at him. "No, it's not that."

"Then what is it?"

“Just tired I guess,” Cate admitted. She waved her journal in the air. “Another nightmare last night. That on top of no leads on Douglas’s journals even with an expert helping me and I’m just indulging myself in a pity party.”

“Oh no,” Jack moaned. “No. Lady Cate, please. No more parties. Soon, Mrs. Campbell will be asking us to erect a stone fountain of a weeping woman in the back garden. And install a rain machine to ensure nasty weather for the event.”

Cate giggled at Jack’s ridiculous assessment of Mrs. Campbell’s party planning requests. “Okay, pity party concluded!” Cate agreed.

“Another nightmare, huh? Care to discuss it?”

Cate shrugged. “I’m not certain I do, to be honest. These are becoming tedious. As usual, I was being chased. I reached a dead-end, but I managed to open a secret passage and I hid there.”

“Did your friend find you?”

Cate rolled her eyes. “He’s NOT my friend. That much is obvious. He terrorizes me every time I come across him in my dreams. Anyway, he opened the passage and called to me. I hid in the shadows. Something else caught his attention, and he disappeared. I waited there for a few more moments to determine if I was safe. While I waited, I heard something. Breathing. Someone was hiding with me in the secret passage. I called out to them. They didn’t answer but a blinding light exploded in the space and then I woke up.”

“A blinding light?” Jack queried.

“Yeah,” Cate answered.

“Like a flashlight?”

“No,” Cate said, with a shake of her head. “No, not like that. The light was blue-white. Almost ethereal.”

“LED flashlight?” Jack suggested.

“No,” Cate insisted. “No, it was like an orb of light. It was strange.” She shrugged again. “Anyway, this marks the first time another person has shown up in my dream outside of my strange stalker.”

“And you didn’t spot the person or have any way to identify them?”

“No, none. I never saw them, only heard the breathing.” Silence passed between them for a moment. “Then there’s another strange thing.”

“Oh?” Jack inquired, shooting Cate a questioning glance.

“Two nights ago, I had one of my now infamous nightmares. Afterward, I couldn’t sleep, as usual. As I laid in bed pondering the meaning of my dream, I swore I heard the watch slow down. When I checked it, the second hand sped up and kept normal time. I assumed I imagined it.”

“Product of an overstimulated and tired mind, perhaps,” Jack agreed.

“That’s what I thought, too. But...”

“But?” Jack inquired.

“When I went to retrieve my dream journal just now, I could have sworn it happened again. I panicked because I hadn’t even been touching the timepiece. And when I checked, the second hand crept by like I had slipped into 1925. Then, without warning, it sped up and everything was normal. My sweater was draped over the chair, my phone charger was on the night table, the dogs’ beds were near my bed.”

“And you are here with me in the good-old present day!” Jack exclaimed.

“Yes, here I am. But why did the watch slow twice without me triggering it?”

Jack shrugged. “Are you certain it slowed?”

Cate considered the question for a moment. She nodded slowly. “Yes. The first time, no, but this time, I’m sure.”

“And you’re certain you weren’t rubbing it? You discovered the anomaly because you had a habit of rubbing the watch.”

Cate wrinkled her forehead in thought. “Ah,” she responded with a shrug. “I don’t think so. But perhaps I was. I don’t remember doing it. But, I suppose, I don’t remember NOT doing it either.”

“With all these nightmares, you’re overly tired. Perhaps you did it without realizing it. A nervous habit.”

“I’ll bet you’re right,” Cate said with a nod. “I did have a bad habit of rubbing the watch like a worry stone. Perhaps it’s cropped up again.”

“Keep an eye on it. If it happens again, let me know. I’ll have Pap check it out just to be sure.”

“Okay. And I’ll try to pay careful attention to my nervous tics. Pun intended!” Cate said with a wink.

Jack’s jaw dropped. “Did you just make a terrible pun joke?”

Cate grinned and nodded. “I did!”

“Lady Cate,” Jack said with a chuckle, “you’re spending too much time with me and picking up my terrible humor.”

“Maybe soon you’ll pick up my love of time travel,” Cate said with a wink.

Jack raised his eyebrow at her.

“Don’t answer,” Cate said.

“Deal. Well, I’ll let you return to your journals, whichever you choose to study.”

“Thanks! With any luck, Ken will have some answers for me when I get back to my laptop. And I can toss this journal to the side and forget about it for a while. At least until I have another nightmare.”

“Good luck!” Jack said as they reached the library doors.

“I’ll see you for dinner,” Cate said as she ducked into the library.

Cate hastened to the desk and set her journal down. She toggled her laptop on and checked her email. A new message from Ken awaited.

Hi Cate - Okay, this changes everything! That’s not a keyword for sure which means we’re at a dead-end with the Vigenère cipher. BUT I did a bit more research into ciphers of that era. Turns out, there’s another one from the time period invented by Thomas Jefferson. It wasn’t as popular as the others. In fact, it didn’t gain popularity until it was reinvented in the early 1900s!

I digress, though. My point is: when coupled with the numbers you sent me, I began to wonder if this encryption was a Jefferson disk cipher. The numbers would indicate the order the disks should be placed on the encoder/decoder. The order itself is the cipher key. It tells you how to decrypt the message.

This would also explain why nothing we’ve tried so far has worked (no keyword length clearly apparent with the Vigenère and no frequencies matching for the substitution ciphers).

Now, given the numbers (one through twenty-five) it appears this is a Jefferson cipher with 25 disks. That’s smaller than the original version invented by Jefferson (which had 36), but still with 25, this will be extremely difficult to crack without the disks themselves.

This means we’re at a standstill unless you’ve got the decoder ring. I’ve attached a picture of what one looks like. Have you found anything like this with the journals? If you have, I can explain how to decrypt/encrypt.

Let me know and I’ll keep my fingers crossed you’ve got the decryption tool right there with you!

Ken

Cate clicked the thumbnail in her email to view the picture. She gasped as she stared at it. Cate leapt from her chair and raced across the room. She retrieved the object she'd found yesterday in Douglas's hidden desk strongbox. She counted the disks, her heart pounding as she counted twenty-five.

Cate quickly clicked the reply button.

Hi Ken - Thanks for the information! Unbelievably, I just found an item that looks like that yesterday! It's got twenty-five disks and each one of them has the alphabet on it in some random order. I've attached a picture.

I'm fairly sure this is the decoder you mentioned in your previous email. I'd be ever so appreciative if you could explain how to use it to decode the journals.

THANK YOU!

Cate

Cate glanced at the stand containing the disks. Her pulse still raced from the discovery. With any luck, she'd soon be able to decipher Douglas's journals. What would they tell her, she wondered? What secrets did they hold?

Cate performed an internet search on the cipher Ken mentioned in his email. She browsed a few sites. Pictures similar to the one Ken sent appeared on them. When Cate heard a chime, she switched browser tabs and discovered a new email from Ken.

Hi Cate - YES! That MUST be the key! We'll find out shortly once I have you try decryption on one of the journals.

I'll reference the first picture you attached for instructions.

You should be able to open the axle and remove the disks (this allows for reordering of the disks, which can provide unique cipher keys). Each disk should be numbered somewhere. You'll want to place the disks on the axle in the order noted in the cipher key. The cipher key (I think) is the list of twenty-five numbers you sent me.

In the first image you sent, the numbers are:

7 13 3 1 20 19 23 21 18 17 6 9 22 11 8 25 10 14 15 12 2 24 16 5 4

Arrange the disks on the axle so they sit in that order (4 on the right end and 7 on the left).

Now you've got the decoder set up to decode the message. This is where you'll need to do a bit of work.

Turn the disks to match the letters in the journal you're trying to decrypt. Without moving them, check the other rows on the disk. One of them should spell out a message. Often, the user selected the row above or below the cipher row to create the encrypted text, so it may be just above or below the row you created.

Sometimes, they used a larger shift in rows (maybe two or three). The good news is they would have been consistent with their choice so once you find the correct row, you'll just use that row over and over to decrypt.

I hope that makes sense. I've included a few reference sites that explain this (maybe better than I did!). If you need more help, let me know. We can also set up a video conference and I can walk you through it.

Let me know if you're able to decipher anything!

Ken

Cate read through the email twice before grabbing the decoder. She fiddled with the axle until it sprung free of the stand. Cate slipped the disks off the ring, spilling them into her lap.

She grabbed one and studied it. As Ken suggested, a number adorned one side. Cate cleared a spot on the desk. She began to line the disks in the order listed on the first journal's interior cover.

Cate spread the disks across her lap as she sorted through and searched for each number. After ordering them, she threaded them back onto the axle and snapped it shut. She turned to the first page of encrypted text in the journal.

Cate spun the disks on the axle to match the letters on the page. She worked left to right to input the nonsensical letters in a row at the top of the wheel. Once she finished, Cate took a deep breath and checked the row just above her input. Gibberish, she reflected. She pursed her lips and tried the next lineup. The line began BQ. It did not provide a solution.

CHAPTER 10

Cate snatched a blank piece of paper from the desk drawer and copied the letters from the journal with the word breaks. Underneath, she copied the letters matching the code.

J IDUP ZTHBESL VGPR XDVPMSD YI
I HAVE CREATED THIS JOURNAL TO

A smile spread across her face. She'd done it! Well, she reflected, Ken Matthews had done it, but with his help, she would now be able to decrypt the journals! Before she responded to inform Ken, Cate tried another twenty-five characters from the journal.

She rotated each wheel to match the letters in the journal. Cate jotted them down on her paper before she transcribed the plaintext from the row below it.

RIIPXGXVZ SFL DENRHQRF GQ OIT
CHRONICLE AND PRESERVE MY EXP

The twenty-five characters ended mid-word, though, from the other words in the phrase, Cate was certain she was decrypting the text correctly.

She set her pen aside and pulled her laptop closer to type a reply email to Ken.

Hi Ken! I read through your email a few times before I tried it. After a bit of work, I found the appropriate plaintext English! I was able to decrypt almost the entire first line. It appears Douglas began the journal to keep a record of his experiences as he began his life in the castle.

I'm sure this will prove fascinating for me (not only from a historical perspective but since Douglas is my ancestor!). Thank you so much for your help with this! I'd never have gotten this decrypted without your expertise. I really appreciate the time you took and how quickly you got back to me!

Well, back to decoding for me! With thirteen journals in twenty-five-character chunks, I've got my work cut out for me! At least it will keep me out of trouble!

Thanks again! I owe you one.

Cate

Cate sent the email and returned to her decryption task. As she finished decoding the first sentence, Cate wondered if typing may be faster. Copying each letter and its matching plaintext proved tedious. Cate pondered skipping the copy of the journal text, wondering if she could write the transcription only. She nixed the idea in case she made a mistake, which she figured would be likely given the sheer volume of text she must work through.

While eager to continue her translation, Cate opened a word document and began to type the first page of ciphertext into it. Cate frowned as the work went slower than she hoped. Transcribing gibberish did not make for easy typing, she lamented. And she itched to get to the transcription.

Cate stopped typing after the first page and decided to translate the text before continuing her copy task. She added the fifty characters she had already decoded, then continued with her decryption.

After a few moments, she had deciphered the first sentence.

I have created this journal to chronicle and preserve my experiences as I search for answers.

Pleased with her work, Cate smiled at the screen. "Well, Douglas," Cate said aloud, "what experiences do you have to share?"

As she pondered her question, a chime sounded from her laptop. Cate toggled open her email and found a new email from Ken.

Hi Cate - That's great! How exciting! I'm so glad I was able to help solve it. I wonder why he encrypted the journals? Maybe he's got a reference to a secret treasure or something and you'll be famous for discovering it! I can ride on your coattails as the man behind your big discovery.

Anyway, as you mentioned, twenty-five-character chunks of text will take you quite a while to decode! Not to mention, I'm sure it will be a tedious exercise to work through. On that note, I've got an idea. I'm not sure it will pan out, but I've got an email out to an associate I've worked with a few times about automating this.

I'm not sure if he'll be able to help but he's a fantastic computer programmer, and he has some knowledge of modern encryption. That would really speed things up for you, so I'm hoping he can help! I'll let you know as soon as I hear from him.

Ken

Cate chuckled as she read the first few lines. In addition to Ken's obvious excitement, he referred to a secret treasure Douglas may have discussed within the pages of the journals. He had no idea how correct his assessment was, Cate mused. Unfortunately, Cate would never be able to share those details with Ken.

The rest of his email intrigued her, though. She glanced at the stack of journals on the desk. His assessment would prove correct if she had to decrypt them by hand in twenty-five-character chunks. An automated computer program could accelerate her translation exponentially.

Cate replied to Ken and thanked him for pursuing the program, telling him she would keep her fingers crossed since it would expedite her encryption.

Cate glanced to the document on her screen containing the journal's first page then to her timepiece. Dinner approached. Cate's eyes flitted to the outside. The light was already waning. As eager as she was to continue her work, she closed her laptop.

Her stomach grumbled in agreement with her decision to abandon work for dinner. She'd spend the next day engrossed in the journals, she promised herself. Besides, perhaps Ken would strike gold with his associate, and she could speed up the entire process.

After spending the evening with her staff, as was her custom, Cate found her mind relaxed enough to sleep. As she eased back into the pillows, she hoped the dinner also had the power to stave off any nightmares.

Cate stretched as she crawled from her bed the next morning. The sun had not yet risen as she stepped into a steamy shower. Her refreshed mind swam with questions. What would she find in Douglas's journals? Would Ken be able to assist her with hastening the process? What experiences would Douglas recount? How did he discover the time travel anomaly? Would she now be able to read the text on his invention sketches? What would they reveal?

Questions crowded Cate's mind. Of course, without automated help, it may take months or longer to answer them, Cate thought as she slipped into her clothes.

Both dogs still lounged in bed when she returned to retrieve her shoes. "Look at you two sleepy heads!" Cate exclaimed. Riley repositioned his head without lifting it to stare at Cate. "Staying in bed, are we?" Bailey's tail wagged, but he refused to rise from his snug spot amidst the covers.

"All right!" Cate said as she finished pulling on her boots. "I'll go for a walk myself!"

At the mention of the "w-word," both dogs leapt to their feet and raced to Cate's side. "That's more like it!" she said as she rubbed both their heads. "Come on, boys, we may still catch the sunrise!"

Cate stepped from the castle into the cool spring air. Streaks of red painted the horizon. She strode down the path to the loch with both dogs in tow. As the red sun peeked over the distant moor, she settled on the loch's bank.

Her thoughts lingered on the castle's first proprietor again. She wondered if Douglas's experience matched hers when she had first arrived at the castle. She glanced back to the large stone-clad structure behind her. Its towers and turrets rose high above the rolling hills. Its walls held a life-changing secret. Had Douglas reacted with the same enthusiasm Cate did?

There was only one way to find out. Cate stood and brushed the dirt off her legs. The sun, now fully risen, promised to bring a warm spring day to the area. She may have to take the laptop outside to work and let the dogs frolic in the bright sunshine the day promised.

Both dogs raced ahead of her to the castle. Cate pushed through the door into the fragrant kitchen. The aroma of cinnamon filled the air.

"... told you which I preferred," Mrs. Fraser said as Cate popped through the door. Both dogs scurried to Jack's side to greet him.

"But what about..." Jack began, his voice cutting off as Cate stepped inside.

The conversation stalled, and all eyes turned to her as silence fell over the room.

“Good morning, everyone,” Cate said. “Seems I know how to make an entrance.” No one answered. “Or kill a conversation,” she added. A tangible pall hung over the room, and Cate swallowed hard. Everyone’s strange behavior disturbed her.

“No,” Molly said with a wave. “We weren’t talking about you... anything... We weren’t really discussing anything important.”

“Well, that’s... good,” Cate said. “Though I am sorry to have interrupted your conversation about nothing.”

“No problem, Lady Cate,” Molly assured her.

Cate offered a wide-eyed grin at them. She bit her lower lip and glanced around the room at each of them. “Are you all serious? You’re really not going to tell me what you were talking about?”

“Nothing!” Molly answered as Jack stated “cookies,” while Mrs. Fraser answered “dinner.”

“O-okay,” Cate stammered.

“We were discussing having no cookies for dinner. None! Nothing!” Molly filled in.

It seemed obvious they were hiding something, though Cate couldn’t fathom what or why. She decided to let it go. Whatever they were concealing may not be her business. “Well, cookies or not, I’m sure we’ll survive,” she responded.

“Got your breakfast, Lady Cate,” Molly announced. “Ready?”

“Yes!” Cate replied. “I’m hungry after that early morning walk!” She reached for the tray.

“I’ll carry it,” Jack offered, grabbing the tray from Molly. “There are a few estate items I’d like to run past you while we make the trek.”

“Okay,” Cate agreed. She called the dogs to follow her. Cate offered Jack a nervous smile as they continued down the hall toward the staircase leading to the main level. “Weird vibe in there,” she said with a chuckle.

“Huh? Really?” Jack said. “I didn’t notice anything.” Jack cleared his throat. “Anyway, about that estate business...”

“Right,” Cate said, her discomfort growing over the conversation she’d interrupted. “Estate business. What’s on the menu? Roofing? Plumbing? Or...”

They reached the staircase and began the climb to the main level. “Actually,” Jack whispered as they reached the top. “I just wanted to find out if you made any progress on your projects?”

“Ohhhhh,” Cate answered. “I have!”

Jack raised his eyebrows, prompting her to continue.

“Yeah, Ken Matthews, a former colleague of mine from Aberdeen College, helped me. He did a ton of analysis on the cipher bits I sent him. None of the standard channels produced any results. But then I sent him a picture of the numbers written on the inside of the cover. It gave him another idea about the cipher that might have been used to encrypt it. Remember the old-school calendar we found?”

“The letter wheels from the safe in the safe in the safe.”

Cate chuckled. “Yes. It’s an encoder-decoder wheel for a Jefferson disk cipher! You thread the wheels on it in the order given in the journal. Next, you input the letters from the journal, and you read the lines above or below that one. The one that makes sense in English is the plaintext.”

“Okay, I think I’ve got the idea. Did it work?”

“It did!” Cate exclaimed as they reached the library. “I tried it last night before dinner. I decrypted fifty whole characters, too!”

Cate retrieved her laptop from the desk and popped it open as she carried it to Jack. She opened her document and showed him the decrypted line.

“I have created this journal to chronicle and preserve my experiences as I search for answers,” Jack read.

Cate grinned at him. “And so it begins!”

“I must admit, I am a teensy bit interested in his experiences,” Jack admitted.

“Because you’re starting to like this time travel stuff.”

“I wouldn’t go that far, Lady Cate. But I am curious to learn how this all began,” Jack admitted.

“And we soon will! Well,” she qualified, “maybe not soon. Translating this in twenty-five-character chunks is slow-going.”

“Oh, good!” Jack exclaimed.

Cate wrinkled her nose. “Good?”

“Yeah, it’ll keep you busy in this time period for a long, long time!”

“With any luck, it won’t!”

“Got a plan to speed translate, do you?”

“Maybe,” Cate said. “Ken mentioned a friend who may be able to help automate this. I’m waiting on an email to determine if that’s an option or not. If it is, we may be able to discover Douglas’s experiences much faster!”

“Oh, Lordy,” Jack said with an eye roll. He backed to the door. “Hey, send me a copy of that translation once you have it. I really do want to read through it.”

Cate gave him a half-smile. “Will do.”

He stepped through the door but spun to face Cate again before disappearing down the hall. “Oh, Lady Cate, one more thing.”

“Roofing?” she questioned.

Jack chuckled. “No. For once, I have no real estate business. Any more nightmares?”

Cate shook her head. “Nightmare free last night! Maybe the journal decryption relieved them!”

Jack held up his hand, sporting his crossed fingers. “Have a good breakfast, Lady Cate.”

“You too!” Cate called.

Cate set her laptop next to the tray and plopped into the armchair. After a spoonful of her oatmeal, she clicked on her email program. Cate found several emails, including one from Ken Matthews. She clicked to open and read it.

Hi Cate - I got a response from my guy and he's happy to help. He considered it a fun challenge to create the program. He thought the easiest way would be to create the numbered disks within the program and the line offset to the plaintext, then all you'd need to do is input the order you want the disks in and enter the text and it'll spit out the decrypted text.

In order to do that, he'll need to get the details of the disks. We considered it easier for you two to communicate directly so he could gather the details he needs and give you any support for any bugs you may find in the program. Is it okay for me to pass your contact information along to him?

Ken

Cate clapped her hands in excitement, rousing both dogs from their lazy morning near the fire. “Sorry, fellas! It looks like Ken’s friend can help me after all. Got a little overexcited, I guess!”

She typed a return email, giving her permission to send her details along. Cate eyed the decryption ring across the room. Given the new development, this would prove much faster. Was it worth it to continue decoding by hand?

But what if the program took months to construct? Then it may be worth it to continue. Cate's mind overanalyzed the situation, as usual, creating backup plans for her backup plans.

As she finished her breakfast, she decided she'd wait to continue her decryption until she had a better handle on when the program may arrive. She had plenty of smaller pieces of text she could work on.

Cate's mind turned to the stack of technical sketches still in the office downstairs. They each contained encoded text. Maybe she could work on those.

Her lips formed a frown as she pondered how difficult it may be to decrypt them without knowing the order of the disks. As she recalled Ken's statements about the difficulty of breaking the cipher, a new thought popped into her mind.

She dropped her spoon into her bowl and set them back on the tray. She hurried across the library to the desk. Cate shoved the journals aside, searching for a specific item.

Buried under three journals, Cate struck gold. She pulled the paper out and studied it. "Ah-ha!" she exclaimed, rousting the dogs a second time. Riley cocked his head at her. "This list," she explained to them, "that we found with the decoder gives the disk order for decrypting the drawings downstairs, I'd bet. They were all numbered. I'd bet these numbers correspond to each drawing!"

Cate chewed her lower lip as she stared out the window, her mind racing. She could make good progress on those sketches while she waited for Ken's contact to reach out to her.

She considered grabbing them, but the bright sunshine persuaded her to postpone her work. "Let's go for another walk, boys!" Cate proposed.

Cate approached the gardens in the rear of the castle. She spotted Jack tending to the rose bushes there. "They should bloom in time for your party, Lady Cate,” he shouted.

Cate sauntered to him, fingering an infant leaf springing from the plant. “If I remember correctly, they were in bloom when I arrived.”

“You remember correctly.”

“I remember because I found you tending to them after you pulled a disappearing act on me. Little did I know I was in 1856, and not the present time.”

“I’m glad we cleared that up. Speaking of the past, I’m shocked you’re out walking and not working hard on your journal decryption.”

“Cabin fever, I suppose. It’s such a beautiful day. And to be honest, I am waiting for an email from Ken’s associate. He’s agreed to create a computer program to decrypt the journals. So, I’m just being lazy and hoping he creates it before I have to tackle those journals twenty-five letters at a time.”

“Ahhhh,” Jack said with a nod, “lazy Lady Cate. You’ve gone soft! You’re losing your edge!”

Cate held her hands up in defeat. “I know,” she said with a chuckle. “And on that note, I suppose I’d better get back and at least do some work.”

“Good luck, Lady Cate.”

“Thanks! Come on, bo...” Cate’s voice cut off mid-word. She frowned and scratched her head. “Where did those rascals go?”

CHAPTER 11

“Uh-oh,” Jack answered. “The last time Sir Riley pulled a disappearing act outside, he found a new friend.”

Cate nodded. “If there’s another dog hiding out on the grounds, I may have to rename this place Dunhaven Rescue Castle.” She called for the dogs. “Well, I suppose before I continue my work, I’ll search for those two imps.”

“Need help?”

“I’m sure they’re around here somewhere,” Cate assured him. “If I can’t find them, I’ll be back.”

“Okay. Golly, I hope they haven’t found any other secret passages.”

Cate chuckled as she meandered away. She searched the rolling hills for the two small pups. She called to them again, peeking behind bushes and glancing over shrubs.

“Riley! Bailey!” Cate called as she rounded the corner. Two shrill barks sounded from the side garden.

Cate headed toward the noise. “Oh, you two! What have you done?!” Cate exclaimed.

Muddy smudges covered their faces and front paws. Cate stared at the culprit in front of them. A shallow crater dented the earth. Disturbed dirt sat in a pile around it.

Riley nosed the cavity and Bailey scratched more dirt from it. “Stop that!” Cate scolded. “Look at you two. You’re filthy! Come on, you both need baths!”

Cate took two steps away. Neither dog followed. “Riley, Bailey! Let’s go!” After another forlorn glance at the partially dug hole, the two dogs trotted after Cate. She collected both into her arms before pushing through the kitchen door and into the house.

“What happened here?” Mrs. Fraser asked as Cate entered with the dirty dogs.

“They decided to dig a hole in the side garden,” Cate responded.

“Uh-oh,” Mrs. Fraser scolded. “Young Jack won’t be happy with you digging holes in his landscaping.”

“Neither is Cate,” Cate replied. “These two are going straight into the laundry tub!”

With clean pups, Cate headed to the library and settled the two dogs by the fireplace. She swiped at her laptop’s trackpad to wake it. She found several emails awaiting her. Cate clicked into the first from Ken. He wrote he would pass Cate’s email along to his associate and to expect an email from Damien Sherwood who would create the program for her.

Cate scanned the other emails in her inbox. A smile crossed her face as she spotted one from Damien Sherwood. She clicked to open it.

Hi there, Lady Cate or Dr. Kensie or Lady Kensie or whichever you prefer, I’m not sure how to address someone in your position, what with both a title AND a Ph.D. At first, I thought the education trumped the title, but then I wasn’t sure. Anyway, let me know which you prefer!

My name is Damien Sherwood, Ken Matthews may have mentioned I would be emailing you. He contacted me about writing a program to help you with some decryption. I took a look at the materials he sent over and it seems fairly straightforward to achieve. I will need two pieces of information from you first! Specifically, I’ll need the order of the letters on each disk. To make this task easier, I created a spreadsheet with the disks listed (twenty-five, right?) in each row. In the first position, I put the letter A. We’ll use that as our anchor letter. Then, fill in the rest of the row with the order of the letters after A. (When I say “after,” I mean if you have the disk so “A” is in the 12:00 position, list the letters going clockwise around).

The second thing I need to know is the offset from the ciphertext to the plaintext. Let's again work clockwise. So, tell me how many letters beyond the ciphertext moving in a clockwise position gives you the plaintext.

I hope this all makes sense. Once I get this information, I'll get this guy up and running for you (I've already started putting together some of the backbones of the program!). I should have it for you in a few hours or by tomorrow at the latest!

If you have any questions, let me know!

Looking forward to hearing back from you.

Damien

Cate grinned at the email. She clicked to download the spreadsheet Damien attached and popped it open. Dozens of cells filled her screen. Damien had already typed in numbers representing the twenty-five disks. He placed an "A" in the first column, next to each number. Columns across the top listed spaces for letters two through twenty-six.

Cate appreciated his organization. She grabbed the axle containing the disks and clicked it open. The disks slid off into her lap as she spun it sideways.

Cate sorted through disks in search of the first. She spun it until she located the "A" then input each letter after it into the spreadsheet.

She spent the next hour working through the spreadsheet. She double- and triple-checked each row before saving it and opening a reply email to Damien Sherwood.

Hi Damien - Please, call me Cate. I really appreciate your help on this! Codebreaking is NOT something I'm very familiar with (though I have managed to decrypt fifty characters!). And working twenty-five characters at a time is very tedious.

I've filled in the spreadsheet as you described and attached it.

In terms of ciphertext to plaintext, the plaintext is one row below the cipher row on the disks.

If you need any additional information, please let me know. There's no rush on the project, so please take your time. In the meantime, can you let me know your fee for the program?

Thank you! Cate

She attached the spreadsheet before sending the email on its way. Cate stared at the mess on her desk. Disks and journals lay sprawled across it. She grabbed the journals and stacked them in order next to the desk. She wouldn't tackle those until she received the program from Damien. It would speed the process tremendously.

Instead, she'd try to decode the sketches. She studied the list of drawings and the associated disk order. She threaded the disks onto the axle in the order listed for sketch one. As she slid the last one on, her laptop chimed to signify a new email. Cate glanced to the screen, finding a response from Damien.

Hi Cate - Thanks, everything looks good. I'll get started right away. One other thing that might be helpful would be to send a sample of the ciphertext and the plaintext that matches it (I think you said you had a small bit done). Then I can double-check my program before sending it over to you. Wouldn't want any crazy stories popping up because of my incorrect program, haha!

To answer your question, no charge. I'm happy to do it! It's a nice little challenge. I think it'll be fun!

D

Cate raised her eyebrows at the message. No charge? She'd definitely need to send Damien something for this. She'd put her thinking cap on if he continued to refuse any fee. She opened her text document containing her decoded message and copied the cipher and plaintext into a message back to Damien.

With the message sent, Cate needed to retrieve the drawings from the office below. She pushed back from the desk and crossed the room. She opened the bookcase and stared into the darkness below. She pondered if she could hurry down and grab the sketches without needing the lights.

Cate took two steps into the blackness before reversing her course. She plugged the lights in before continuing downstairs. The sketches sat in the middle of the floor where she'd left them, except for the desk sketch. It laid where she and Jack discarded it on the desk's top.

Cate grabbed it first, figuring she could use it for practice since they'd already cracked it. As she picked up the sketch, she heard a loud ticking. The timepiece, tucked under her sweater, couldn't have come in contact with anything to have triggered the mechanism.

Her brow furrowed as she grasped the chain and pulled the timepiece toward her. As her hand clasped it, the office plunged into darkness.

Cate's breath caught in her throat. Had one of the dogs knocked the plug loose? She glanced around as her eyes adjusted to the absence of light. Cate toggled on her cell phone's flashlight and took one step toward the stairs when noise sounded overhead. An unfamiliar voice carried down the stairs and reached her ears.

Cate's heart skipped a beat at the sound. She swallowed hard as she processed the situation. The voice, with a light Scottish accent, did not belong to Jack or Mr. Fraser. Another Scottish accent answered. She quickly doused her flashlight's beam.

The bookcase scraped against the floor as someone pushed it shut. Footsteps sounded on the stairs, which she noted no longer creaked. A dim, bobbling light glowed in the stairway.

The urge to hide overcame her. She gnawed her lower lip and glanced around the darkened space. As the light approached, Cate scurried toward the desk. She ducked under the top and curled into the space between each pedestal. As she settled as far from view as she could, she spotted the desk sketch on the floor. In her mad scramble to hide, she had dropped it. Her heart pounded as she weighed her options. Footsteps scraped on the stone floor. She couldn't risk retrieving it now.

Cate pulled her legs close to her chest and held her breath. The footsteps approached her hiding spot. A thud sounded overhead as their owner set something on the desk. By the smell of it, it was an oil lamp.

A figure reached down to the floor and snatched the paper Cate dropped moments earlier. "What the devil is this doing out?" he questioned. He slapped the paper against the desk's top as he approached it. Cate shrank back further. He stood mere inches from her.

With a trembling hand, Cate grasped her timepiece. The second hand crawled across the face. She'd slipped back in time.

"These are the types of incidents I'm referring to," the voice continued as Cate weighed her options.

"Misplaced paperwork?" the other voice answered.

"No, no, no, of course not. This sketch was filed away. How did it get out?"

"Merely a trick of your mind, surely, Douglas."

Cate's eyes widened. Douglas? Was this Douglas MacKenzie? Had she slipped back to the 1700s?

"There are too many tricks of the mind here. There is something more."

"What do you propose?"

“I have several theories. However, I do not wish to impart them until others have reviewed the evidence and offered opinions.”

“Evidence?”

“Careful observation. Experimentation. I have kept track of all incidents, every detail.” The man shuffled and pulled open a drawer. Cate spied the item he removed: a brown leather journal. She heard it thud against the desk above her. “I am keeping a journal. I’ve filled one already.”

“May I peruse it?”

“Yes.” The man bent again and opened a door on the desk. He withdrew the cipher wheel. “You will need this. I have encrypted the entire thing.”

“Encrypted?” the other man inquired.

“Yes,” Douglas responded.

“Was that really necessary?”

“If my theories prove correct, yes. This is larger than the both of us, Jaime,” Douglas responded. “We must ensure this secret does not fall into improper hands.”

Jaime, Cate reflected. Jaime Reid? Jack’s ancestor? This must be Douglas MacKenzie and Jaime Reid, the castle’s original proprietor and his estate manager.

Cate heard the journal’s pages fan. “Perhaps you should recount the tales to me yourself,” Jaime suggested with a chuckle.

Douglas joined in with a laugh. “Not up to the game, old man? If you prefer to be regaled with the tales minus my enhanced security, join me in three days hence for my dinner party. Bring Aria, Olivia would love it.” He bent and shoved the cipher wheel into the desk’s cabinet.

“You plan to share them at the dinner table, do you?” Jaime inquired.

“Of course not, though I do plan to share them. Grayson arrives in two days. My hope is he can shed some light on the strange goings-on.”

“You plan to share these odd and unusual tales, yet you suggest extreme caution.”

“Grayson is no stranger to the odd and unusual.”

“If the incidents represent something as monumental as you suggest, perhaps we should leave well enough alone,” Jaime suggested.

Douglas groaned with a sigh. “You’ve no sense of adventure.” Silence fell between them.

“All right, Douglas. I shall plan to attend.”

“Good man,” Douglas said. His feet shuffled away from the desk. He circled it and clapped Jaime on the back. “Now about that estate business...”

“That we can discuss outside the confines of your dingy lab.”

The voices began to fade as Cate overheard their shoes clatter against the wooden stairs. The room descended into darkness as the light faded away. Douglas chuckled. “This space is far from dingy...”

The bookcase doorway scraped against the floor as it opened and closed. Silence fell over the room. Cate breathed a sigh of relief. Her head fell back against the pedestal behind her as she gulped her fear down. She stayed still for several more moments, too afraid to move lest someone spring out at her.

After several moments, she surmised the coast was clear. She’d heard nothing. Cate crawled from under the desk. Her head rose slowly, and she risked a glance. The darkened room revealed no one. She toggled on her flashlight.

Cate grasped the desk’s sketch from the blotter. She couldn’t leave it. She stuffed it into her cardigan’s front pocket.

She pulled the timepiece into her hand. She stared at its face. How had it activated? Cate rubbed its face, intent on returning to her time. Nothing happened.

CHAPTER 12

Cate's heart sank, and her stomach turned. She tried again. Nothing. Blood rushed into her ears as she swayed on unsteady legs. Somehow, she had returned to the 1790s. And now she was stuck here.

Her mind swirled with questions. They crowded into her brain all at once. What would she do? How would she return? Could she? One question settled among all the rest. She blanched as panic hit her. And brought tears to her eyes. What would she do if she couldn't get home?

Cate spun as she searched the darkened space for answers. She placed her hand against her forehead. "Think, Cate, think!" she whispered to herself.

Perhaps she needed to move to where she had been when the timepiece slowed. She hurried around the desk and tried to find the spot she'd stood in when she'd slipped to the bygone era. With shaky hands, she rubbed the watch's face again. The secondhand continued to crawl.

A sob escaped her. She chewed her lower lip as she considered the few options that sprung to mind. Could she navigate to the back hallway? The one that provided universal access to the watch wearer's time. Perhaps. Would it work? Maybe. With few other options, it was worth a try. Though escaping from this secret area may prove tricky. She had no idea who may be waiting on the other side of the bookcase at any time.

There must be a way to tell, Cate ruminated. Douglas wouldn't leave that to chance. He must have built in a peephole so he could enter and exit his laboratory discreetly. Cate nodded to herself. She'd search for the eyehole and use it to make her escape.

Cate turned toward the stairs. Bright light blinded her. She squinted against it, raising her hand to shield her eyes.

"Lady Cate! Are you there?" Mrs. Fraser's voice called.

Cate knit her brows, her pulse quickening. Her heart leapt into her throat.

"Lady Cate?"

"I'm here!" Cate squeaked out. She cleared her throat, attempting to steady her voice. "Coming!"

Cate swallowed hard as she glanced around the room. Jack's temporary lighting glared into the space. The paperwork she'd come to retrieve sat stacked next to her. Riley wandered down the stairs and stared at her. A tear fell to her cheek as she spotted him. He meandered over, pausing to stretch mid-walk. Cate bent to collect him into her arms. He offered her a warm lick to the cheek.

Cate wiped the tear away as she sniffled. On shaky legs, she wobbled to the staircase and ascended it. With each step, Cate attempted to compose herself. She hoped her upset did not show. As she reached the top of the stairs, Cate plastered a smile on her face. She stepped into the room, finding Mrs. Fraser fussing over her tray.

"THERE you are," she said. "I thought you planned to stay in that dungeon forever!"

"Sorry," Cate breathed. "Got caught up with my work."

Mrs. Fraser frowned at her. "You'd better be careful with that work," she warned, waving a finger at Cate.

Cate gulped. How did she know? "You're going to work yourself sick! You already look awfully pale, Lady Cate."

Cate offered a nervous chuckle. She had no doubt she was white as a sheet after her experience.

"Not enough sun, I guess," Cate said with a shrug.

"And too much work. That makes Lady Cate a dull girl! Now, take a break and eat your lunch. My roast beef sandwich will give you some strength."

"Thanks, Mrs. Fraser."

Mrs. Fraser smiled at her and, with a nod, spun on her heel and strolled from the room. Cate collapsed into the armchair and sank her head into her hand. After a moment, she blew out a long breath. "It's okay, Cate. You're okay."

"Talking to yourself again, Lady Cate?" a voice inquired behind her.

Cate leapt in her seat, flailing her arms in the air. She nearly knocked her lunch tray from the table. She shut her eyes for a moment and pressed her hand to her heart. "Oh, Jack," she murmured. "You startled me."

"My apologies, Lady Cate. Wow, Mrs. Fraser wasn't lying," he said as he approached her. "You are terribly pale." He carried a steaming cup on a saucer. "She sent hot tea up. Said you needed it. She was afraid you were coming down with something."

"Thanks," Cate said with a nod.

"You okay?"

Cate bit her lower lip and glanced at him. She shook her head. "No."

Jack sank into the armchair across from her. "Cate, what happened?"

"Ah..." she began in a shaky voice.

"Is she okay?" Molly inquired from the door.

They spun to face her. "Yeah, yeah, I'm fine, Molly. Thanks."

"I didn't mean to startle you. I came up to see if you needed anything else with the tea."

"No," Cate answered. "The tea's fine and the sandwich. I just need some food. I'm fine!"

"Okay," Molly said. She hovered in the doorway.

"Oh, I had a quick estate question I'd forgotten to ask Lady Cate," Jack fibbed.

"Well make it quick, your lunch is getting cold, and Lady Cate needs to eat."

"I will, thanks," Jack said with a grin.

Molly smiled at them as she disappeared down the hall. Jack hurried across the room and pushed the doors closed. "Cate, what's wrong?" he asked, his forehead wrinkled with concern.

Cate sipped at the hot tea, her nerves settling with each sip. "Remember I told you I thought the timepiece slowed twice without my interacting with it?"

"Yes."

"Well, it did it again." Jack raised his eyebrows at her. "And this time I got stuck in the 1700s."

“WHAT?!” Jack exclaimed. He leapt from his seat and paced the floor. “Tell me every detail.”

Cate nodded. “Well...” she began.

A knock sounded at the door and Molly stuck her head in. “Are you going to be much longer? Mrs. Fraser said your hot roast beef will soon turn to cold roast beef. I can bring your lunch up if you plan to stay awhile.”

“That might be best, Molly. Thank you,” Cate agreed. “This is going to take more discussion than we anticipated.”

“Okey-doke! I’ll run it right up,” she said with a grin.

Jack collapsed into the armchair next to Cate. He wrung his hands as he waited.

“I’ll wait until Molly brings your lunch,” Cate mentioned.

Jack nodded without speaking. Within a few moments, Molly had the second lunch tray delivered. “Here we are. I hope it’s nothing too serious!”

“No, just unexpected,” Cate fibbed. It was only half a fib, she figured.

“Enjoy and don’t work too hard!” Molly said as she left the room.

Cate waited as Molly pulled the doors closed behind her before speaking again. Jack beat her to it. “Okay, start at the beginning,” he prompted.

Cate nodded. “Okay.” She blew out a long breath before launching into her tale. “I told you earlier Ken helped me to decrypt the journals. And that he asked someone to automate the process. His contact got in touch with me and will have a program for me soon.”

Jack perched on the chair, bobbing his head up and down to acknowledge her statements. “How does this relate to being stuck in the 1700s?”

“Given that this guy, Damien, is going to provide me with a program to speed decryption of the journals, I decided I would work on decoding Douglas’s sketches while I waited since they seemed less tedious. I went downstairs to retrieve them. Oh, I never got them.” Cate’s mind began to feel less frazzled as she talked through the circumstances.

“While I was there, the timepiece started its loud ticking. I grabbed it to check, and the lights went out. I heard voices. Unfamiliar voices. So, I hid under the desk. Two men came down the stairs and spoke to each other. They called each other Douglas and Jaime.”

“Douglas and Jaime?” Jack questioned. “As in Douglas MacKenzie and Jaime Reid?”

“That’s what I’m assuming! Douglas was discussing writing the journals! He told Jaime he experienced strange things and wanted to get to the bottom of it. Jaime asked about them but seemed less than keen on decoding the journals when Douglas suggested it. Douglas told him to come to a dinner party he was hosting in three days. He planned to explain it to someone else then. What was his name?”

Jack rubbed his forehead and shook his head. “Wait, wait, wait, back up a minute. Why did you activate the timepiece?”

“I didn’t!” Cate exclaimed. “That’s what I was getting at. I went down to retrieve the papers and without warning, I was in 1790-something. I never touched the timepiece. That’s the third time it’s happened. And this time I can confirm I didn’t absentmindedly rub the watch. It was under my cardigan. My hand was nowhere near it!”

Jack’s jaw went slack. He swallowed hard. “So, it activated itself?”

Cate shrugged as she took the first bite of her sandwich. “I guess? I’m not certain. All I know is I was studying the desk schematic one second and the next the room plunged into darkness, and I was in the 1700s.”

Jack shook his head as though he could not comprehend it. “Okay, I’m sorry, one minute you’re glancing at the desk drawing the next you’re in the 1700s without ever touching the timepiece?”

“That’s right.”

Jack shook his head in disbelief. “You’re sure you weren’t touching it?”

“Positive,” Cate answered.

“Okay, okay, so then what happened again?”

“Douglas and Jaime had a brief conversation. They were discussing strange incidents, and Douglas said he was recording it all in journals. He invited Jaime to a dinner party in three days. He told him he planned to discuss the incidents with someone else. Someone familiar with strange goings-on. Who? What was his name?” Cate questioned aloud.

Jack bit into his sandwich and considered Cate’s statements as he chewed.

“Grayson!” Cate exclaimed.

“What?”

“Grayson was his name. Douglas planned to tell someone named Grayson. I need to jot that down.”

Cate scurried to the desk to retrieve a pen and make a note of her discovery.

“Okay, so, then what happened? Did you use the timepiece to return mid-conversation from your hiding spot?”

Cate shook her head as she returned to her armchair. “No, they left after a bit. I waited until I heard nothing before I climbed out. I had dropped the sketch of the desk and needed to retrieve it before I returned. This is where the story gets weird.”

“THIS is where the story gets weird?” Jack questioned in an incredulous tone.

“I climbed from under the desk and grabbed the sketch. The timepiece was still slow. I rubbed it to activate it and return here. But it didn’t work.”

Jack’s eyes went wide. “It didn’t work?”

“No,” Cate confirmed. “It didn’t work. I tried it again and still nothing.”

“How did you get back?” Jack inquired.

“I wasn’t sure what to do. I wondered if I could make it to the back hall to try the universal time rip but then, suddenly, the lights lit and I heard Mrs. Fraser calling me.”

Jack shook his head again. “So, you didn’t activate the timepiece in either instance, yet you slipped through a time rip and back? How?”

Cate shrugged; her eyebrows raised. She shook her head. “I... I don’t know.”

Jack rubbed his chin. “Cate, this isn’t good.”

“I know!” she agreed. “It’s not good. And this is the third time it’s happened. Is the timepiece broken? Malfunctioning? Is it no longer controlling the rips? Are the time rips morphing?”

Jack shook his head, his eyes wide. He paused, searching for an answer. “Perhaps Pap can help. At the very least, he should check the timepiece.”

“Good idea,” Cate agreed.

“The sooner the better,” Jack proposed.

Cate nodded. “Okay.”

“We’ll go right after lunch. I’d go now but I don’t want to raise any suspicion with the others.”

“Right,” Cate said with a nod. They ate for a few moments in silence before Cate added, “I can’t believe this happened. I’m still shocked I was somewhere in the 1790s for a few moments.”

“You’re damned lucky, Cate. You could have been trapped there!” Jack exclaimed, his tone incredulous.

“I realize that. I do, but for once, I had no control over it. I didn’t ask to go back. I didn’t even impulsively try the timepiece there to determine if a rip existed.”

“Yet now we know one does,” Jack answered. “And it goes somewhere into the 1790s.”

Cate nodded. “Early in the 1790s, I’d guess. Around when Douglas started the journals. And he was about to have visitors. A man named Grayson.” Cate stared ahead as she parsed through the information again. “Oh! My accidental trip did tell me one thing.”

“What?”

“The voice haunting me in my dreams belongs to neither Douglas nor Jaime!”

“So, we were correct in that assumption,” Jack responded.

“Yes! But we still can’t identify who it is,” Cate lamented.

“If the timepiece is malfunctioning, we may have bigger problems on our hands,” Jack replied.

Cate sighed as she finished the last bites of her roast beef sandwich. Jack’s assessment was likely correct. The mystery of the malfunctioning timepiece took precedence over her nightmares.

Jack finished his meal, and they returned their trays to the kitchen before making the excuse of errands in town. They arrived at Stanley Reid’s cottage on the outskirts of Dunhaven shortly after.

Jack let himself in through the front door, calling out to the older man. Cate followed him into the living room. “Jackie?” Stanley called.

“Yes, and Lady Cate,” Jack replied.

Jack’s grandfather ambled into the room from the kitchen. “Lady Cate! To what do I owe the pleasure?”

“Nice to see you, too, Pap,” Jack joked.

“It’s good to see you, Jackie, but it’s far better to see Lady Cate!” the older man quipped. “Can I offer you a cuppa?”

“I’d appreciate that,” Cate responded. Despite recovering from her earlier scare, her nerves remained raw from the experience.

Stanley motioned for them to follow him to the kitchen. He bustled about the small room as he set the kettle on the stove and retrieved teacups. “What brings you by? Another mystery?”

“No,” Jack countered. “Well, yes, although it’s more of a problem than a simple mystery.”

“Oh?” Stanley inquired as he set cookies on a plate.

Jack swallowed hard before he launched into the story. “Cate ended up in the 1790s earlier today. Without activating the timepiece.”

Stanley ceased laying out cookies. He twisted to face them. His brows knit together. “What?”

Cate nodded. “It’s true. I went into Douglas’s secret office and the next thing I knew I was in the 1790s. I hadn’t touched the timepiece. It slowed on its own. And that’s not the first time it’s happened.”

Cate described the other two instances to a stunned Stanley. He sank into the chair across from her as she finished the tale.

“Ever heard of anything like this happening before, Pap?” Jack inquired.

His eyebrows raised, and he shook his head in response. He blew out a long breath as he struggled to find words to respond. “Ah... I... No, I’ve never heard of anything like this,” Stanley admitted.

“Would you mind taking a look at the timepiece to determine if anything is wrong with it?” Jack asked.

“Not at all,” he answered.

The kettle screamed its alert across the kitchen. “How about that cuppa first?” Cate suggested with a smile.

Stanley returned her smile. “Whatever the lady wants, the lady gets,” he said.

“I’ll get it,” Jack offered.

“Now, explain this time travel trip again,” Stanley said to Cate as Jack poured the steaming water into their mugs. “Every detail.”

“Goodness, you two really are alike,” Cate said with a chuckle as Jack settled at the table again.

“We are, though I am more roguishly handsome,” Jack responded with a grin.

“Obviously, I’m the humbler one,” Stanley retorted. He sipped at his cup of tea. “Now, you ended up in Douglas’s time. How?”

Cate recounted the details of her experience. His brow furrowed as he considered her tale. “And the timepiece didn’t work to return either?”

“It didn’t. At least not when I attempted to use it. Perhaps it was a delayed reaction?” Cate questioned.

He rubbed his chin. “I’ve never heard of anything like this. It certainly never happened in Lady Mary’s or Lady Gertrude’s time.”

“Perhaps the timepiece is reaching the end of its life,” Cate suggested.

“Let’s take a peek and determine if anything is malfunctioning on it,” Stanley said.

Cate handed the timepiece to him. She and Jack followed the older man into his living room. He attached a magnifier to his desk and removed a jeweler’s toolset from his drawer. He carefully opened the timepiece. The mechanism inside whirred away. Jack peered into the magnifier next to Stanley.

“Anything?”

The older man cocked his head at several angles, moving the timepiece under the magnifier multiple ways.

“The mechanism controlling the general keeping of time seems to be working properly,” he murmured.

“But?” Cate inquired, reading further into his comments.

He closed the watch and handed it back to Cate. He pulled his glasses from his face. “But,” he answered, “beyond that, I couldn’t say.”

“What do you mean, Pap?” Jack questioned. “I thought you took care of this and kept it in working order for both the previous owners?”

“I did. But our maintenance never went beyond basic repair or the cleaning of it. We never had a problem with the time travel component.”

“Is the time travel component working?” Cate asked.

Stanley puckered his lips and glanced between Jack and Cate. “That I can’t help with. No one understands how that element works.”

Cate’s eyebrows squished together, and she glanced sharply to Jack. “What do you mean?”

“I mean, no one beyond perhaps Douglas and possibly Jaime understands how this timepiece controls the time rips.”

“What?” Jack questioned. “He never told anyone? Never passed on the secret in case something like this happened?”

“Not to my knowledge, no,” Stanley admitted. “No one understood how he managed to harness the power, only how to operate the timepiece.”

“Well, that’s just great!” Jack fumed, throwing his arms in the air. “So, we’ve got a malfunctioning time travel instrument interacting with time rips all over the castle.”

“It’s now vital that we decrypt Douglas’s journals,” Cate said with a sigh. “Perhaps those along with his sketches will tell us how he managed to control the time rips with the timepiece.”

Stanley raised his eyebrows. "Have you made any progress on that?" he questioned. "Jack told me about your find."

"Yes," Cate responded. "A former colleague of mine helped me identify the cipher and how to decrypt it. And, in the good news column, he put me in touch with someone who promised a computer program to make decoding it much faster. I'll make it my priority to work on those. Perhaps we'll find something there."

"I'm sorry I can't be of more help," Stanley said with a shrug. "The secret of that timepiece went to the grave with Douglas and Jaime from what I understand."

"Are there any elements inside the timepiece that aren't in a normal watch?" Jack inquired.

"No," Stanley said with the shake of his head. "That's what makes it even more enigmatic. There're no special components, no extra pieces. How this timepiece interacts and controls the rips is a mystery."

"Until we find out, perhaps you shouldn't wear that," Jack said to Cate, glancing at the timepiece hanging around her neck.

Cate considered it as Stanley responded. "It wouldn't matter."

"Because the timepiece could interact with any time rips near it wherever I leave it?" Cate suggested.

He shook his head. "No. No, it's not that. Because the watch controls the time rips. They stay closed unless you open them by activating the timepiece. But from what you've told me, the timepiece is no longer doing that. They are opening and closing at random, regardless of the timepiece's presence."

Cate's eyes widened as her jaw dropped open. Jack's eyebrows raised as he blinked in disbelief. "So, what you're saying is," Cate answered, her voice slow as she pieced together the puzzle, "the time rips can open and close at any time sucking in anyone in their vicinity and sending them to another era."

"And we now have no control over this at all," Jack finished.

Stanley stood and swallowed hard. "That's exactly what I'm saying."

CHAPTER 13

Jack ran his fingers through his hair. “You can’t be serious.” Cate sank into an armchair, speechless from the latest development. “What are we going to do?”

“I don’t know,” Jack admitted.

“Just a moment,” Stanley cautioned. “All is not lost yet.”

“Are you kidding, Pap? We’ve got a castle full of people with time rips opening and closing whenever they want and no means to control it! This is a disaster waiting to happen.”

“No,” Stanley argued, “the timepiece is still controlling them somewhat. You’re not slipping in and out of eras at every turn. And when you do, it corrects, eventually. It’s still exhibiting some control.”

“Not enough,” Jack said with a sigh and a shake of his head.

“No, I agree. But they are still held somewhat at bay. We need to determine how the timepiece does that. Perhaps then we can rectify the situation,” Stanley suggested.

“And you’re sure you have no idea?” Jack inquired. “No mention of even the slightest clue of how this thing works?”

Stanley shook his head. “No, none. As I said, this secret seems to have gone to the grave with Douglas and Jaime. No one understood how they harnessed the power with a simple timepiece.”

“I can’t believe they told no one,” Jack said, scrubbing his face with his hands.

“It’s likely,” Cate chimed in. “Randolph didn’t seem to possess an understanding of it either beyond the existence of time travel and the timepiece’s relevance to it.”

“Perhaps he recorded it in the journals,” Jack suggested.

“So, you’ll need to decode them and see if it provides any answers,” Stanley said.

“That seems a tall order,” Jack lamented.

“Maybe Damien will have the computer program for me, and we’ll find an answer in Douglas’s journal.”

“If not, we may be doomed.”

Stanley raised his eyebrows at them. “What?” Jack inquired.

He shrugged. “Well...”

“If you’ve got something to say, Pap, say it,” Jack encouraged.

“The journals aren’t the only source of information.”

Jack screwed up his face. “What are you suggesting?”

Stanley shrugged again. “You seem to have found access to Douglas himself.”

Jack’s eyes went wide and his jaw slack. “You aren’t actually suggesting we travel back in time with a malfunctioning timepiece.”

“To be fair, it seems to be malfunctioning only when it’s not in use,” Cate argued.

“We don’t know that,” Jack countered. “And I don’t want to find out mid-trip that it doesn’t work.”

“Better than finding yourself suddenly stuck in the 1790s without ever having intended to travel there,” Cate retorted.

“All right, all right, just calm down, you two,” Stanley said.

Jack rubbed his face with his hands. “Okay, you’re right,” he answered. “Let’s start with the journals and go from there. If we can’t get them translated fast enough or they don’t give us any information, we...” He paused. “I can’t believe I’m about to say this. We head back to the 1700s and search for answers there.”

“Agree,” Cate answered. “I’ll check for that program as soon as I get home. I’ll do my best to decipher everything in the next few days. If there’s no concrete information in those, we may need to consider attending that dinner party Douglas mentioned.”

Jack shut his eyes and shook his head. “I can’t believe time travel may be our best option.”

“Speaking of Douglas,” Cate said to Stanley, “do you know anything about a man named Grayson who visited the castle in the 1790s?”

Stanley glanced around in thought. “Name doesn’t ring any bells. Do you have a last name?”

“No,” Cate admitted. “Douglas mentioned wanting to tell Grayson about the unusual events at the castle in his upcoming visit. I was curious about his involvement in this.”

“Sorry, lassie, it doesn’t ring any bells.”

Cate shrugged. “Oh well, I suppose we should head back, and I can get a start on those journals.”

“Do you think you should stay at the castle, Cate?” Jack inquired.

“Where else would I stay?” Cate answered.

“Anywhere,” Jack answered. “Just not there!”

Cate shook her head. “I can’t do that! There’s Molly and Mr. and Mrs. Fraser to consider. How would we explain it to them?”

“Gas leak?” Jack offered with a weak smile.

She shook her head again. “That story won’t pass muster.”

“The lassie’s correct. You can’t avoid the time rips. Your best bet is to seek a solution as quickly as possible.”

Jack frowned and took a deep breath. “Then I’m afraid unless there is a clear answer in those journals, we will be attending a 1790s dinner party in three days.”

Cate and Jack returned to the castle. Silence filled most of their return ride. “I’ll start on the journals even before I receive that program from Damien,” Cate murmured as they traveled.

Jack nodded, providing no additional response.

“I should recover the sketches from Douglas’s office, too.” She paused for a moment. “Though I’m loath to go down there.”

“I’ll go with you,” Jack offered. “At least then if you get stuck, you won’t be alone.”

“Thanks,” Cate said with a nod.

Cate stared at the castle rising on the hill. Nothing appeared amiss. Inside the walls, though, danger lurked. Trouble brewed under the surface.

Her new home had become perilous. Perhaps this had been the source of her nightmares. Perhaps they were a warning.

"I'm sorry, Jack," Cate said as the turmoil bubbled to the surface of her mind.

Jack glanced sideways at her. "For what?"

"This," Cate said with a shrug. She gestured toward the castle looming on the hill in front of them. "The danger, the uncertainty. I—"

"Cate," Jack interrupted. "It's not your fault."

"Perhaps if I hadn't been so headstrong in jumping around in time since we discovered the secret this wouldn't have happened."

"And perhaps it's just an anomaly regardless of the timepiece's previous usage. Perhaps the rips are modifying in some way as you suggested. We know so little, you can't blame yourself for this."

She nodded, biting her lower lip.

"Cate," Jack continued, reaching over to grab her hand. "It's not your fault. And besides, those trips were worth it."

Her brow crinkled, and she glanced at him. "They were?"

"Certainly. We saved a man's life on one and we caught a jewel thief on the other!"

"I thought you hated time travel and thought it was best to leave well enough alone. Not mess with the past and change things."

"Sometimes I'm a stick-in-the-mud," Jack admitted.

She chuckled at his comment.

Jack continued, "Someone very wise once told me the universe has a way of correcting itself. So, perhaps we can't irreparably damage things. And besides, my duty is to protect my MacKenzie counterpart. If I don't do that now, I've really failed as a Reid."

Cate squeezed Jack's hand. "Thanks. I'm glad you've had a sudden change of heart. Because we might be visiting another time period and meeting more of my ancestors."

"And mine!" Gravel crunched under the tires as Jack swung the car onto the drive.

"By the way, speaking of visiting the past, what's with your interest in the man named Grayson?" Jack asked as he pulled the car parallel to the castle.

"Douglas mentioned him. He said he's no stranger to unusual things. I wondered if he was the man haunting my dreams."

“Ahhh,” Jack answered as they climbed from the car.

“Let’s grab those drawings and I’ll get to work.”

“Okay,” Jack agreed.

They navigated the castle halls to the library. The bookcase remained open from Cate’s previous trip downstairs. The blackness beyond yawned at them as they entered. Cate plugged the lights in, hovering at the top of the stairway.

“Ready?” Jack asked.

Cate shook her head but responded, “Yes.”

“That’s not convincing at all.”

“Let’s just do this as quickly as possible.”

“Deal!” Jack exclaimed.

Jack held out his hand. Cate grasped it, and they hurried down the wooden stairs, hand-in-hand. She raced to the pile of sketches and scooped them up in her free hand. “Okay, let’s go,” she stated.

She preceded Jack up the stairs. As they hastened into the library, both Cate and Jack blew out a sigh of relief. “Made it,” Jack said.

She nodded as she pulled the plug, dousing the lights in Douglas’s office. Jack pushed the bookcase shut. “Don’t go back down there until we have to, okay?”

“Okay,” Cate said with a nod.

“Wow! No objections from Lady Cate!”

Cate shook her head at him, a smile forming on her lips. “Don’t get used to it.”

“Good luck with the journals,” Jack offered as he approached the doors.

“Thanks, with any luck, all we’ll need to do is wind the thing backward and blow on it twice and it’ll be fixed.”

Jack stopped in his tracks. “Wind it backward and blow on it?” he asked with a chuckle.

“Don’t say anything,” Cate warned.

Jack held up his hands as a smirk formed on his face. He motioned his lips were sealed as he backed from the room.

His levity lifted her spirits a bit. The tense situation weighed on her, though she hoped a solution lay in the stack of journals at her feet. She piled the sketches next to her laptop.

Before she began, she toggled her laptop on and checked her email. Her heart sank as she found no new messages from Damien Sherwood in her inbox. It didn't matter, she reflected. She had to make a start on the information.

She pushed her laptop away and pulled the stack of sketches over. She shuffled through them. She located the sketch showing the timepiece. She identified the number in the corner and matched it to the disk orientation written on the list she'd retrieved with the decoder disks.

Cate reordered the disks and began her translation of the marked components. Perhaps one of the marked pieces controlled the time rips. She dialed the wheels around to form the first cipher. The row underneath read: CASE SCREW.

She puckered her lips, certain this wasn't the component controlling the time rips. She tried another. It read CROWN WHEEL. She jotted it down and moved on. The next decrypted item read REGULATOR. Cate's pulse quickened. Regulator, her mind questioned? Perhaps this component regulated the time rips! She put a star next to it and tried the next. A smile crept across her face as she decoded this piece: ESCAPE WHEEL PIVOT.

She raised her eyebrows at the last two names. This must have something to do with the time rips! Cate grabbed her phone and tapped around until the line rang.

"Lady Cate!" Stanley answered on the other end. "Long time, huh?"

"Hi, Mr. Reid," Cate said. "Funny. You may rival Jack with your joke-telling skills."

"I think I've got that young laddie beat by a mile! What can I do for you?"

"I found a sketch of the timepiece," Cate explained. "Encrypted. I've been decrypting it and I stumbled upon a few components I wanted to run past you as potential time rip managers."

"Go ahead, Lady Cate, what have you found?"

"Okay," Cate said, shifting the phone to her left hand as she pulled her notes closer. "The first piece says 'regulator.'"

"No, that's a standard component for a timepiece like that."

"Oh," she said, a note of disappointment in her voice. "Okay. The next one I saw that might relate is 'escape wheel pivot.'"

"No, this allows the time to move forward by a fixed amount of time."

"Really?" she questioned. "Both of those are standard components?"

"Indeed, they are, Lady Cate."

"Any others?"

“I haven’t decrypted any more, I thought I’d hit upon something. Do you mind waiting while I try a few more?”

“Not at all!” Cate input a few more, checking each with Stanley.

“I’m sorry, Lady Cate, all those are standard pieces of a pocket watch.”

Cate huffed. “Shoot! That leaves us nowhere!”

“Sadly, it does. It appears Douglas did not list the components controlling the time rips on the sketch.”

“No,” Cate lamented. “Well, I won’t take up any more of your time. Thank you for your help!”

“No trouble at all, lassie. If you stumble upon anything else, don’t hesitate to call.”

She thanked him and ended the call, tossing her phone on the desk in an expression of her frustration.

Cate checked the time on her timepiece, which apparently contained no components beyond those in normal pocket watches, as Stanley mentioned. She frowned at it as she noted the later-than-expected hour.

She dug through the sketches in the hopes of making some progress today. She found a few other drawings with limited text. She spent most of the late afternoon decrypting them but found nothing to help with their current predicament.

With a huff, she shoved the paperwork to the back of the desk. She took a brief break with the dogs outside before dinner.

Upon her return to the library, she rushed to her laptop to check her email. Nothing new popped into her inbox. She frowned at the laptop as the library doors opened.

“I’m just finishing up,” she promised, assuming Molly or Mrs. Fraser delivered her tray.

“Don’t stop on my account,” Jack’s voice answered her.

Cate spun in her chair. “Are you trying out a new job?” she inquired as he waddled across the room and struggled to set the tray on the table.

“If I am, I’m sure I’m failing miserably,” he said as he nudged the tray further onto the table.

She chuckled at him. “Is anything the matter downstairs?”

“No,” Jack admitted. “I volunteered to bring the tray up since I wanted to discuss something with you.”

“I haven’t made any progress if that’s what you hoped to ask about. I decrypted the timepiece sketch, but it revealed nothing but normal watch components. I called your grandfather and discussed each piece with him, and we found nothing beyond what a normal watch would contain.”

Jack grimaced. “That’s too bad, though that wasn’t what I wanted to discuss.”

“Oh,” Cate answered, her brows furrowing.

“I’m not comfortable with you being in this castle with these haywire time rips. I told everyone there was some problem with a potential water leak. Said we’d noticed it in Douglas’s office. I wanted to keep an eye on it until we could determine the source and repair it so I would be staying in the castle.”

“Oh!” Cate exclaimed. She gave Jack a soft smile. “I appreciate that very much.”

“I probably can’t do much, but it makes me feel better being here.”

“Somehow it’ll make me feel better, too.”

“I’ll just run home and grab a few things and be back. Molly’s preparing my usual room.”

“Great. Thanks, Jack.”

Cate dug into her dinner as Jack departed. His presence in the castle may help her sleep tonight. She considered swapping bedrooms since hers contained a time rip. However, they did not have an exhaustive list of all the time rip locations. She worried about slipping into an unidentified time rip and returning to a time with which she was unfamiliar. At least the rip in her bedroom led to a time she’d already visited.

As evening turned to night, she dawdled in the library with a mystery novel. She kept a constant eye on her email, hoping one from Damien Sherwood popped into it any second. Nothing came.

She retired to her suite. Both dogs leapt onto her bed, more than ready to go to sleep. She was less inclined. She eyed the bed with a frown as she kicked off her slippers. Would she lay awake or fall asleep and have another nightmare? Either way, the night promised misery for her.

She crawled into bed and shut off the lights. Moonlight painted the room and cast long shadows on the floor. In the darkness, she strained to listen for any sounds, especially the characteristic ticking of her timepiece.

After an hour of tossing and turning, Cate rose from her bed and shuffled to her sitting room. She collapsed on the chaise. Worry crowded her mind, along with potential scenarios and questions. Would the time rips continue to misbehave? What if they ended up in another time period? Would they find a solution before something tragic happened?

Her mind spun in an endless cycle of unanswerable questions. She pulled her laptop onto her lap. Perhaps a movie would relax her mind. Or at least pass the time. As she toggled on the display, she wondered if Jack had any luck sleeping in the castle tonight.

Her display brightened the room. Her email program still sat open on the screen. She swiped at her trackpad. As she pushed the pointer toward a new tab, the email list updated. A new email topped her inbox.

Her heart skipped a beat as she recognized the sender: Damien Sherwood. She selected the email to open it.

Hi Cate! Attached is a shiny new program for you! I tested it and it seems to work fine. If you have any issues let me know!

Once you open it, you'll first need to tell it the order of the disks. There are drop-down boxes to select the disk number. Once you have that in, click DECODE! That will open an interface with two windows. The first (on the left) is where you'll enter your ciphertext. Then click the GO! button and it will give you the plaintext in the right window.

I wanted to get this to you asap, so I didn't spend a lot of time checking efficiencies (I'll keep working on it). So, for now, maybe only do a page or two of text at a time. It should work fine with more, but it'll be really, really slow, and might take a long time to complete. It'd be faster to work in small chunks and copy the results over to a larger document to compile everything. Well, I'm sure you don't need to be told that! You're obviously very intelligent and capable.

Anyway, good luck and have fun! I hope you find some interesting things encoded in the text! Let me know if you have any questions or problems!

D

Her pulse raced as she downloaded the program file. After a brief install, a window popped up on her laptop.

DECODER EXPLODER appeared in colorful letters across her screen. She chuckled at the program's name. As it loaded, she carried the laptop down to the library, where the journals still sat in a stack next to the desk.

As promised, the first screen requested the order of the disks. She pulled open the first journal and input the disk order before clicking the DECODE button.

The next window presented itself. A blank page stared at her, awaiting a text input.

She opened her word document as she flipped to the first page of the journal. She copied the text and input it into Damien's program. She waited with bated breath after clicking the GO! button.

CHAPTER 14

Eate gnawed her lower lip as the colorful circle spun around. Her heart thudded as she waited for results from the decoder.

After a few minutes, text appeared in the right-hand window along with a pop-up window declaring success. She dismissed it and copied the plaintext into a new word document.

I have created this journal to chronicle and preserve my experiences as I search for answers. Strange encounters have met much of my brief time within Dunhaven Castle. I often ponder over the warning I received when walking the property prior to the castle's construction.

"Cursed," the old woman said. Her tattered clothing hung loosely on her frame. One crystal blue eye stared at me from a wrinkled face. The other eye clouded over in a grotesque fashion. Her wrinkled skin sagged on her face and neck. She pointed a gnarled finger at me. "Dinnae you build here. You and your kin shall be CURSED!"

I ignored her. Perhaps I should not have. Indeed, odd occurrences followed us from acquisition through building, eventually enveloping us as we settled into our new home.

Strange weather patterns were reported by townsfolk on the site we proposed for building. As the foundation was laid, a load of bricks shifted without warning, killing a poor soul crushed beneath their weight.

During construction of the west wall, one worker disappeared. Of course, foul play was suspected, but no traces of him, nor his body, could be found.

This would prove minor compared to the disturbances we would endure as residents of the finished castle.

The page ended. Cate hurried to input the next page of text. Within a few moments, she read the next piece of the entry.

It seemed to begin with minor instances. A vase out of place. A book moved. Then, occurrences became more disturbing. As the intensity increased, I vowed to determine the source of these hauntings. I have recorded and will continue to record all instances on these pages.

After living with these happenings for over one year, I have concocted several theories regarding their origins. I shall also detail these within the pages of my journal.

I shall begin at the beginning.

Good fortune smiled upon me, the son of a country doctor. Several wise investments allowed me to rise in wealth and station. Perhaps my wealth cursed me. I sought to create a grand home for my family, one worthy of the newest title I carried: Earl of Dunhavenshire.

At the center of Dunhavenshire sat the small town of Dunhaven, my home as a youth. I left Dunhaven a man of simple means; I returned an earl. Determined to erect the grandest building overlooking the town, I was immediately drawn to the hill overlooking the hamlet.

Even as a child, the hill held a reputation among the townsfolk. Tainted land, they called it. Strange manifestations occurred there. Weather shifted suddenly, without warning.

Hushed whispers suggested the undead roamed the grassy knolls. Others suggested underground rivers flowed with blood. Even more, advocated the existence of a gateway to Hell.

The rumors did little to sway me from my desires to build a structure such as Dunhaven had never seen and such that would never be rivaled by the small town for centuries to come.

"There are other properties to consider," Jaime Reid informed me as we discussed the prospect.

"There are none that hold my interest," I insisted.

"Lord Mackenzie," he countered before I interrupted him.

"If we are to work together, Mr. Reid, you must understand I am a man with specific ideas and desires. I am not easily put off by nonsense and superstition."

“Still,” the man urged, “consider the others. What holds you back on them? Why do you desire the piece of land you mentioned?”

“Simple,” I explained. “The land sits at the highest spot overlooking the town.”

“And you, as Lord of the county, desire to be a constant reminder to the town of your presence and authority?” he inquired.

“I desire to be a constant source of inspiration. I left this town a pauper. I returned a lord.”

Jaime smirked at me. He did not agree yet he did not challenge me on it.

Jaime and I had been school chums before my departure. “You threatened you would, and you have done it, Douglas.”

“And I intend to make good on my promise,” I assured him.

“We were but children, Douglas. I expect nothing.”

“I am a man of my word, Jaime. Do you recall the promise I made?”

“I do.”

Under a cloudless azure blue sky, we lay in the field. The cool grass beneath us tickled our bare feet. I had sworn there to make something of myself. “I shall be more than a simple country doctor,” I vowed.

“’Tis nothing wrong with a country doctor,” Jaime countered. “It is an honest living.”

“Indeed, it is,” I agreed, “yet it is not very grand.”

“Perhaps stability is preferential to grandeur.”

“Perhaps stability is an excuse for complacency,” I suggested. “Have you no grand aspirations?”

Jaime shrugged. “I strive to make an honest living to provide for my family.”

I rolled to my stomach and faced him. “Have you no dreams beyond that?”

He shrugged again. “I suppose not.”

“Well, I have,” I informed him. “Mark my words this day, Jaime Reid, I shall strive for more than the mundane. I shall be someone one day. Everyone shall know my name. They shall say ‘there is Douglas MacKenzie, a man among men!’”

Jaime let out a belly laugh as I continued. “I shall, Jaime. You shall see. And when I do, I shall always remember our friendship. I shall take you under my wing and ensure your family is provided for with that honest living."

Our conversation flitted through my mind as I responded. "And now I have achieved my success and returned to Dunhaven a man among men! And my offer stands. Your family shall be provided for easily with the sum I offer you."

"To build and oversee a castle on cursed land?"

"To build and oversee a castle on PRIME land," I argued. He hesitated. "Oh, Jaime, those rumors are merely the prattling on of superstitious townsfolk. Join me. Take the first step on this adventure with me!"

A smile crossed his face, and he extended his hand to me.

"A wise choice," I said with a grin as I gave him a strong handshake.

Perhaps Jaime had been correct. Perhaps not. Perhaps this, too, is part of my destiny.

Her body trembled. She stiffened, her head darting up and her eyes snapping open. She squinted against the light in the room as she searched for the source of the disturbance.

"Cate," Jack's voice whispered. "Cate!"

"Huh?" Cate murmured as she began to awaken.

"Hey, sleepyhead," Jack said with a grin. "What are you doing down here?"

She glanced around the room, recognizing the library. Her laptop, its screen blank, sat on the desk in front of her. Douglas's first journal lay open next to it. She blinked a few times before turning her attention to Jack, who knelt at her side.

"Uh," she mumbled. "I couldn't sleep. I planned on watching a movie but when I opened my laptop, I found an email from Damien with the decryption program, so I decided to head down here and start working."

Jack smiled at her as he pushed a lock of hair out of her face. "Care to share your discoveries over one of Mrs. Fraser's shortbreads?"

She brightened at the offer. "There's not much to share, but I won't say no to a shortbread!"

She rose to her feet.

“I’ll bring them to you. Why don’t you curl up on your armchair and relax?” Jack suggested.

“I’m not going to fight you on that suggestion,” Cate answered. “I’m exhausted.”

Jack grinned at her as she slid into the chair. He disappeared and returned a few minutes later, shortbread tin in hand.

Jack sank into the armchair next to Cate. “Okay, have you fixed the timepiece yet?”

She grabbed a cookie from the tin and scoffed at the statement. “Not even close.”

Jack dropped his head onto the chair behind him in a dramatic display. “You’ve got to be kidding! You haven’t solved this yet?”

She giggled, despite her exhaustion. “Nope, sorry. I fell asleep way too fast. I only decoded about five pages.”

“So, this Damien guy’s program works, huh?”

“Like a charm! I decoded everything I already had typed in. But focusing on that gobbledygook made my eyes cross and apparently put me right to sleep!”

“Okay, so no solutions yet. Did you find anything else interesting though?”

“In my estimation, I did!” Cate raced to the desk and retrieved her laptop. She detailed her findings to Jack.

“Cursed. CURSED!” Jack shouted.

She chuckled at his “old woman” voice. “Not funny, they probably did assume it was cursed!”

“You laughed, didn’t you?”

“I did, yes.”

Silence fell over them. She finished her cookie and snapped the lid on the tin. She stretched and yawned. “I guess I should get back at it.”

“You should get some rest.”

“I’m okay. I had a little nap there,” Cate insisted. “And I really need to make more progress on these. I’ve got thirteen journals to get through and...”

“Cate,” Jack interrupted. “You need to get some sleep. The journals can wait.”

“No,” Cate argued. “We need to figure something out before this time rip problem gets worse.”

“We’ll handle it, Cate. We can deal with this. Get some rest. Start fresh tomorrow.”

She bit her lower lip as she glanced at the stack of journals. After a moment, she nodded. “Okay. I am tired. I’ll call it a night and start first thing tomorrow morning.”

Jack smiled at her. “Good night, Lady Cate.”

“Good night, Jack. Oh, you’d better put this tin back before Mrs. Fraser finds it missing!”

“Don’t worry, I’ll put it back before I return to bed. There’s no way I’m getting us caught!”

Morning came sooner than Cate hoped. Her alarm screamed in her ears as she groaned. “Ugh,” Cate moaned as she climbed to her feet. At least, she reflected as the hot water cascaded over her in the shower, she’d slept without a nightmare. She frowned at the current solution to her predicament. Perhaps she’d find a resolution for her nightmares within the pages of Douglas’s journals.

Following breakfast, she settled in the library for another work session. Before she began, she typed an email to Damien and informed him the program worked like a charm.

She settled in for a long session of tedious typing. After five more pages, she decided to take a break from transcribing and decrypt the new entries. She dug into the entries as the program output them.

Jaime and I toured the property the following day. I stood on the hill and overlooked the property. “Here,” I asserted.

“Here?” Jaime inquired.

“On this very spot!” I declared.

Jaime spun as he scanned the area. “It is the highest spot. View of the town below. Though, perhaps...”

“Perhaps nothing. It shall be this spot!” I tapped my cane on the ground.

“Cursed!” a gravelly voice growled from behind us.

I spun to face the sound. The old woman stared at us. Her leathery skin wrinkled across her forehead and cheeks and around her colorless lips. One eye, crystal blue, stared at me from beneath that wrinkled forehead, the other milky and clouded. "Cursed," she repeated.

"Whatever are you on about, old woman?" I inquired of her.

"Cursed, this land is. Dinnae build here. You shall bring a terrible scourge on your family."

"Foolhardy rumors, nothing more," I assured her.

She shook her head. "Nay," she snarled at me. "Bad, this land. Cursed. You shall suffer a terrible fate if you continue with this folly."

"I do not give in to foolish gossip. Now, begone, woman, allow us to conclude our business."

"You have been warned," she muttered.

"She will not be the last person to say these things," Jaime said as she wandered away.

"I am certain she will not be. I care not. Now, where shall we place the stables?"

My mind often returns to that moment. I have spoken with the woman several times since that day. She maintains her warning. And I have grown to believe it.

We began construction on the castle three months to the day from when Jaime and I stood on that hill. I have already mentioned the unfavorable circumstances surrounding the castle's construction. I am certain one if not both of these incidents are related to the quirks we continue to experience.

After the castle's completion, we took up residence in the fantastic space. Not long after, we began to feel the effects of the castle's peculiarities.

I still recall the first night in our new home. Unable to sleep, I roamed the halls. Moonlight cascaded through the leaded windows. How wrong that old harridan had been! The only scourge brought upon us with this castle was that of a beautiful, stately home. Olivia and I had discussed at length the guests we'd invite to our new home, the parties we should throw, the generations of MacKenzies who would grace these halls.

As I sauntered through the back hall, I spotted a shadow. I squinted into the darkness. It appeared to be the figure of a person. "Hello!" I called. We were not yet fully staffed, though we had brought several staff members from our previous home to the castle. I assumed it to be one of them, perhaps unable to sleep and wandering the halls.

I received no response to my inquiry. "Hello?" I called a second time. The figure stood unmoving at the hall's end. Hidden in the shadows, I could make out no more of the person than his or her form. I took a step closer. A rhythmic noise filled the air, which I guessed to be breathing. "See here, who are you?" I demanded.

After two more steps, the figure backed from me. "Stop! Who are you?" Shadows surrounded the figure as I continued my approach. I hurried down the hall but found no one. I continued around the corner, glancing into the next hall. Empty. I rushed to each door and peered into the darkened rooms. I found no one in any of them.

I returned to the hallway and stalked to my original spot. I stared into the darkness where the figure stood. Perhaps my eyes deceived me, I reflected. The moonlight cast strange shadows. I must have mistaken the distortions as a figure. Still, the old woman's words rung in my mind. I pushed them aside. They were likely the source of my hallucination.

Cate leaned back in her chair. Douglas's first experiences within the castle walls echoed her own. Odd to share so much with a man separated from you by centuries. She stretched as she contemplated the latest round of entries.

She switched to her email before continuing her decryption. A message from Damien awaited her.

Hi Cate - That's awesome, I'm so glad it's working! I'm still playing with the efficiencies and if I get something better, I'll send a new version to allow you to decrypt more text at once.

Are you learning anything interesting from the journals? You don't have to answer that. I was just curious what was so important the author felt the need to encrypt it. Though, I suppose it could be out of some odd eccentricity. Well, anyway, I'm rambling.

Keep decrypting!

Cate smiled at the email as she clicked the reply button.

Hi Damien - The program is working great! I'm working my way through the journals. The longest part of the process is typing in the random letters! No rush (or even need) for a more efficient program, the current version is more than sufficient and MUCH faster than working twenty-five characters at a time by hand!

To answer your question, Douglas (my ancestor and the castle's builder) was quite an eccentric! He was an intellectual and an inventor, so he had some interesting quirks. This seems to have been one of them! So far, the stories have been entertaining at least! It makes the work to get them worth it.

Thanks again for all your help!

Cate

With a deep sigh, Cate turned to the next page in the journal and began the tedious task of typing more ciphertext into Damien's program. After deciphering several more entries, Cate continued to read Douglas's experiences.

It would not be long before I had more fodder from what I initially thought to be my overactive imagination. As I entered the library, intent on working in my hidden laboratory, I noticed a vase out of place. I would attribute a minor event such as this to Olivia or one of the servants changing its location. However, the hour was too early. I had read only the night before in this room. The vase had stood on a bookshelf near the armchair I occupied. On this morn, I found it across the room on a side table.

I approached it and studied the object. How had it moved across the room? I had been last to bed and awake before any servants came from below stairs. How had this moved? I chided myself for my silly behavior as I descended to my lab. Vases did not move on their own. There existed some reasonable explanation, I assured myself.

I descended the stairs into my study. When I returned to the library, the vase had returned to its original location. My brow furrowed as I stared at the object in its original location. Befuddlement filled me. As I considered the matter, the library doors opened.

"Oh, excuse me, m'lord," Lucy, one of our maids, muttered as she entered. "I came to tend to the lighting of the fire."

Lighting the fire, my mind pondered? Then no one had entered the room prior to this. I must be sure. "Lucy, has anyone been in the room tidying before you?"

"No, m'lord," she assured me. "'Tis only half-past six. No one has begun daily chores yet."

"Thank you," I mumbled to her as my eyes fell to the vase. How had it completed its journey 'round the room without human assistance? My mind could find no answers.

I had almost forgotten the incident until I experienced it again. This time within the confines of my own laboratory. Weeks later, I descended the stairs to find my work in disarray.

I had left my papers stacked in a pile on the right side of my desk. When I returned the following morning, they lay scattered across my desk. I stood with my jaw agape. I had not left my work in this manner. Few people were aware of my lab's location or how to enter it. Hidden by a bookcase in the library, my lab sits deep within the heart of the castle. I had hidden the lab and its entrance from almost everyone except those involved in its construction. Outside of Jaime, no one on the estate knew the location, not even Olivia.

I narrowed my eyes at the mess as I set the lantern on the desk and collected the papers. I would speak with Jaime about it. There must be an explanation, I assured myself.

But I would find none. When I inquired later, Jaime insisted he had not entered my lab nor parsed through my papers. Who had, I queried?

"I've little idea, Douglas," he answered. "Though there is surely a reasonable explanation."

"Name it," I challenged.

"You forgot the state in which you left them. You worked late and assumed you had tidied them, but you hadn't."

"Nonsense," I argued. "I left them neatly stacked on the right side of the desk. Not the left, not the center, not sprawled."

"Douglas, papers do not move on their own," Jaime assured.

I pursed my lips at him, unable to argue, though still unsatisfied by the explanation.

Unexplainable events would continue to present themselves. More items moving about with no explanation and no human intervention. I began to wonder if I was going mad. Or someone was playing an elaborate game with me. The incidents occurred with such regularity, I became accustomed to them and paid little attention after a while.

Even with the ever-moving articles, castle life became routine. I stopped questioning the occurrences and began to settle into my new home.

Then things became more disturbing.

Cate frowned at the “cliffhanger” in the journal.

“Of course it would stop there,” she sighed aloud as she turned the page to continue her typing. A knock sounded at the door, and the door popped open.

“Lunchtime!” Molly sang as she flitted into the room.

“Already?” Cate questioned as she checked her timepiece.

“Lost in your research again, huh?” Molly asked with a laugh.

“Yes. It’s fascinating. I’m reading through journals from Douglas.”

“Devil-worshipper Douglas?” Molly teased.

“Yes, him,” she replied.

“Has he sacrificed any animals or small children yet?”

“No,” Cate assured her. “Just detailing his early life in the castle.”

“You know I’m only teasing, right?” Molly inquired.

“I know,” she said with a smile. “And you know he wasn’t a devil worshipper, right?”

“Yeah, I know! What a fanciful tale though, huh? I bet he really hated the town gossips that spread that around.”

“I can imagine that would be frustrating, though Douglas seemed to be a good sport. An eccentric. Perhaps he even enjoyed the rumors and found them entertaining.”

“He’d be a way better sport than I would be!”

“Of course, I could be completely wrong. Perhaps he hated the rumors and was an old curmudgeon who frowned down at the town every day.”

“Perhaps you’ll find out in those journals! Enjoy your lunch!”

As she ate, she checked her email, finding a new message from Damien.

Hi Cate - Wait, there’s a castle involved? That’s cool... and creepy. Is it haunted? Sorry, I had to ask, haha!

Here’s a new version of Decoder Exploder with better efficiencies. If your eyes (and fingers) can stand it, you can now input multiple pages into the program (I’d say no more than five for best results) to decrypt at once!

Enjoy!

Damien

Damien’s first line made her giggle. If he only understood the extent of what these castle walls housed. Ghosts, however, did not haunt these halls.

She responded to thank him for the new, more efficient program and to assure him there were no ghosts. As she finished her lunch, another knock sounded at the door.

“Come in! Perfect timing, I’ve just finished.”

“Oh, good. I’d hate to interrupt your lunch,” Jack’s voice said.

“Jack!” Cate exclaimed, spinning in her seat to face him. “Are you trying out tray retrieval as a new job?”

“I’m here to check on our ‘leak,’” he responded. He slid through the opening in the door and pushed it shut behind him. “Anything from the journals about the time rips and how the timepiece controls them?”

Cate shook her head with a sideways frown. “Not yet. He’s describing his first few months in the castle and the odd occurrences he experienced. He hasn’t even mentioned the timepiece yet.”

Jack frowned.

“But,” she added, “Damien just sent a new version of the program capable of translating more text at one time, which may speed things up a tad. Though my typing is woefully slow with the random letters. But I’ll do my best to make progress this afternoon. Right after a quick walk with these guys!” She motioned toward the two dogs at her feet.

“I’ll walk you out,” Jack offered.

She stood and ushered the dogs from the room and into the hall. “How far have you made it in decrypting the journals?” Jack inquired.

“Only about fifteen pages,” Cate admitted with a sigh.

Jack didn’t respond.

“I should be able to—” Her voice cut off. “Jack!”

Cate blinked several times, her eyes growing wide. She reached out, attempting to grasp Jack's hand.

"Cate?" he questioned. "What's happening?"

"I'm not sure," Cate admitted.

She focused her attention on Jack, who faded in and out of her vision. He disappeared for seconds at a time, only to reappear next to her. Her pulse quickened, and her heart pounded. Lights flickered. Noises distorted. Dimensions stretched.

As Jack reappeared, Cate reached a trembling hand toward him. Jack's hand squeezed hers tightly, and he pulled her closer to him. After a moment, the hallway settled. She glanced around. Candlelight flickered throughout the space. They were alone. Both dogs were missing from their new surroundings.

She focused her attention on Jack. "Where are we?"

Jack swallowed hard. "I'm not sure."

She stalked a few steps away, keeping a tight hold on Jack's hand. "Candles."

"Somewhere without electricity," Jack confirmed.

She pulled the timepiece from around her neck. The second hand crept along. Jack groaned. "As I suspected," Cate said.

"So, we're stuck somewhere!" Jack exclaimed.

She nodded. "Yes, keep your voice down. We don't want to call any attention."

"Perhaps we should find somewhere to hide," Jack suggested.

"No," Cate countered. "We need to stay here. If we want to return, we need to stay near the rip we came through."

"You don't know that for sure."

"No," she admitted. "I'm not certain, but it makes sense. If we move from this spot, we may be stuck here."

"Can you try to activate the timepiece?"

"I'll try," she answered. "Put your hand around mine so if it works, we can go back together."

Jack wrapped his hand around hers, and together they rubbed the timepiece's face. Nothing happened. They tried twice more.

"It's no use," she said with a sigh. "It won't work. This is exactly what happened the last time when I got stuck in Douglas's time."

“You planned to try the back hall, the universal rip. Should we try that?” Jack inquired.

Cate pondered it for a moment. “I don’t—” she began.

Bright lights flashed for an instant before blinking out. She inched closer to Jack. He wrapped his arm around her. The lights flashed again before dying. She squeezed her eyes shut as they flared again in an almost blinding display.

Tiny paws pressed against her leg, and a cold nose nudged at her hand. Her jaw unhinged, and she slid her eyes open to slits. Her heart skipped a beat, and tears formed in her eyes. “Riley!” she cried as she spotted the tiny pup standing on his hind legs. Bailey stood next to him. “Bailey!”

Jack sucked in air and glanced around. “Are we back?”

“Yes,” Cate said, scooping both boys into her arms as a tear fell down her cheek.

Jack slumped against the wall, a sigh of relief escaping him. Silence filled the hallway. “You okay?” she inquired.

Jack ran a shaky hand through his hair. “Yeah, yeah, I think so,” he responded.

“Let’s get some air,” she suggested. She ushered the dogs down the hall after setting them down. She reached for Jack’s hand and tugged him toward the door.

They exited into the fresh, warm spring air. Jack blew out a long breath. “Feel better?” she asked.

“Yeah. Nice fresh Scottish air does the trick every time,” he said with a weak smile.

Cate squeezed his hand and smiled at him, giving him another moment to recover. “That was...” he began, his voice trailing off.

She nodded. “Yeah, I understand. All too well.”

Jack shook his head as he stared at the horizon.

She said, “I’ll keep working on the journals. I’ll try to speed up my decryptions...”

Jack shook his head again, holding up a hand to stop her. “That’s not going to work, Cate. Even if you work twenty-four seven on those things, it’ll take a while to get answers.”

“But perhaps the answers are in one of the early journals. We can hope...”

“We need to do more than hope. We need a solution, and I don’t like pinning all my hopes on the journals. What if you translate all of them and find nothing? Then we’re days behind pursuing anything else.”

“So, what are you suggesting?” she questioned, her brow furrowing as she glanced at him.

Jack turned to her and studied her face for a moment before speaking. “We need to travel to Douglas’s time and search for answers.”

Cate nodded but didn’t respond.

Jack’s brow crinkled. “I figured you’d be happy about that suggestion, Lady Cate.”

“I guess I’m still in shock,” she admitted.

Jack nodded. “I understand. That experience was enough to shock anyone.”

She glanced up at him. “No, I meant because you actually suggested time travel as the solution to a problem.” She pursed her lips in a half-grin at him.

He narrowed his eyes. “Very funny, Lady Cate. I didn’t realize you hoped to join me on the comedy circuit.”

“Anyway, you’re right. Douglas somehow harnessed these time rips. He’s the best source of information we have.”

“Do we just go back and ask him?”

Cate shook her head. “He doesn’t realize or understand the scope of what’s happening yet. Let’s get the lay of the land first and go from there.”

“Now I’m in shock. Cate Kensie suggesting caution? What did that slip in time do to us?”

“Perhaps it switched our personalities,” she joked.

“Are you looking forward to time traveling?”

Cate pondered it for a moment. “Yes, I have to admit I am. A brand-new castle and the chance to meet its builder. Yes, it’s an exciting moment!”

“And I’m dreading it, so we’re still us.”

She chuckled at the admission.

Jack continued, “And I hope we can trust that bloody watch to behave itself and return us when we want!”

She glanced down at it. “As much as I’m looking forward to the occasion, the 1790s is not where I want to stay on a permanent basis.”

“When do you want to do this?” Jack inquired.

Cate considered his question. "It would be nice to attend his dinner party. The one he discussed with Jaime. He's planning to discuss the occurrences with someone named Grayson. With others there, it might be easier to blend in. The focus won't be on only us. And we may get information if he's planning to share it with the people in attendance."

"What are the chances he shares it with two newcomers there?"

"Perhaps small, but maybe we'll learn something by overhearing it. At least we can assess Douglas and his mysterious guest who has experience with the strange and unusual."

"Do you imagine this Grayson is the character chasing you around in your sleep?"

"I'm not sure. But one or two spoken words from him may be enough to tell me. That's another reason I'd like to get to that dinner party."

"It may be a tall order. It's in, what, two days?"

"Yes," Cate admitted. "Day after tomorrow. We'd need to move fast. Visit tomorrow and hope we score an invitation."

"What's our cover?"

Cate shrugged. "The old distant cousin bit?"

"Again? We've gotten caught every time with that one!"

"Last time we got caught because Randolph told Rory the story about us. Douglas should never have heard of us before. Plus, posing as a married couple explains away my American heritage in the easiest way possible."

Jack pursed his lips and narrowed his eyes. "I imagine there's another reason you suggested it."

She glanced at the horizon, her brows furrowing. "It makes the most sense for a man and woman traveling together, particularly in that era?" she suggested.

Jack smirked at her. "Oh, come on, Cate. I'll bet you enjoy posing as my wife. I do make a fine husband if I say so myself." He raised his eyebrow at her and offered her a sly grin.

"Yes, that's it," Cate said with a chuckle. "You've caught me. I love posing as your wife. It's the entire reason I love time travel, in fact."

"That explains so much," Jack joked.

"Are you planning to go with the lawyer bit again or do you prefer to avoid that profession?"

"Eh, I may as well continue. I am quite a good attorney after all," he reminded her.

“Very true. You’re almost as perfect an attorney as you are a husband.”

“Oh, you flatter me too much.”

They turned their attention to the yard where the dogs frolicked in the luscious spring grass. “I suppose we have our plan,” Cate said after a few moments of silence. “What time tomorrow?”

“Afternoon? Following lunch, perhaps,” Jack suggested.

“All right. Tomorrow after lunch, we make our first trip to the 1790s!”

Cate collected the dogs and returned to the library. Despite their upcoming time travel trip, she preferred to make more progress on the journal decryption. Given the new, more efficient program, she spent the afternoon copying ciphertext.

It took her several hours to recreate the text from the first journal before she began decoding it. Cate read the next set of entries before her dinner.

The matter of moving vases and unkempt paperwork seemed a harmless quirk of the castle. I had grown accustomed to it and paid no mind to the odd and ongoing circumstances.

Two months passed before the next incident. This event would raise the stakes along with the hairs on the back of my neck.

On the night of the twenty-fifth of October, I roamed the halls as the midnight hour approached. I had always struggled with sleep, and tonight proved no exception. At least in a castle this size, I possessed plenty of space to amble about in an effort to relax my mind.

I strolled through the foyer and toward the library. As I strode down the hall, the sound of music reached my ears. I stopped and strained, listening for more. Lilting orchestral music floated down the hall. No orchestra played in my home at this hour! What could produce the sound?

I stepped toward it, following the sound as I navigated through the halls. I arrived outside the ballroom. Closed doors met my gaze. I narrowed my eyes at them. Did they hide the source of the noise? How could they, my mind questioned? Yet I could not deny the irrefutable sound of music emanating from behind those wooden barriers.

My heart leapt to my throat as I inched toward the doors. I know not what I expected to find beyond them that produced such a reaction, yet my body urged caution as I approached.

I stood mere fingerbreadths from the door. My hands reached for the knobs. My fingers caressed the cool handle. My close proximity now revealed another sound coupled with the music, chatter. Voices floated through the air with the music. The din of an ongoing party lay behind those doors.

I swallowed hard as I twisted both doorknobs and flung the doors open. My brow furrowed as I stared at the scene inside. My footsteps echoed as I stepped into the darkened space. The ballroom was empty. No guests chatted; no musicians played. Weak moonlight streamed through the many windows, revealing only empty floorboards.

No. I had heard music. I had heard voices. From where? What was the source? I rushed into the hall. Perhaps I had miscalculated the location. I strained to listen, but only silence met my ears. Where had the odd music come from?

The incident haunted me for several days, though I mentioned it to no one, fearing they may accuse me of being mad. I returned to the ballroom twice after. I searched for information, for some sign of a gathering. I found none.

I decided after three days to remove the incident from my mind. I would not dwell on it. Perhaps it had been the product of an overtired mind, I assumed. At least that is what I imagined Jaime would tell me had I imparted the information to him.

The occurrence would come to the forefront of my mind a fortnight later. Though I was not involved personally, I recount it here as more evidence. Elsie, a maid in our service, fell ill. Wilson, our butler, brought the girl's condition to my attention. He had dismissed her from her duties for the day and sent her to bed. The nature of her illness, however, prompted him to discuss the matter with me.

"Sick in the head?" I queried after he informed me.

"Yes, m'lord, quite. Babbling on with nonsense."

"Is she delusional with fever?"

"She appears to suffer from no fever, m'lord."

"What nonsense was she babbling?"

Wilson licked his lips and swallowed hard as he prepared to impart the news. "Well, spit it out, man," I encouraged.

"She... She returned to the kitchen mid-morning, pale as a ghost. She collapsed into a chair at the table in the servant's hall and told a most fantastical story. She had been tidying the sitting room. When she entered the foyer, she spotted a woman in the hall on the opposite side. The woman she claims to have seen dressed in a most obscene manner, most unbefitting of a lady. I, myself, was shocked at the description and will not repeat it. Elsie then asserts the woman... ” He paused.

“Yes?” I prompted.

“M’lord, she says the woman vanished into thin air!”

CHAPTER 16

Elate bit her lower lip as she continued reading Douglas's account of events.

I mulled over the story Wilson conveyed. "What shall I do, m'lord? Do you prefer I dismiss her entirely from her position or should she be seen by a doctor before we settle on a course? Of course, the doctor's fee may be deducted from her wages."

"I would like to speak with the girl," I responded.

Wilson's eyebrows raised at my request. He stammered for a moment before he said, "Of course, m'lord. I shall fetch her at once."

"No," I countered. "If the girl is ill, I shall go to her. Please, lead the way."

Wilson led me to the servant's quarters, collecting our housekeeper, Mrs. Carter, along the way. We descended upon the poor girl in her chambers.

"Elsie," Wilson said as we entered. "Lord MacKenzie would like to speak with you."

Elsie lay under a sheet, her face as pale as it. Her hands still trembled as she clutched at the fabric. Her eyes darted around as we approached. As she spotted me, she flung the sheet away and attempted to climb from her cot. "M'lord!" she squealed in surprise.

"No, no, madam, please, there is no need to rise on my account," I assured her. "I understand you are ill."

She nodded as she settled into a seated position on the bed.

"Though the source of your illness is not physical. Is this correct?"

Elsie bit her lower lip and lowered her eyes. "A figment of my imagination, m'lord. I am certain it's nothing more than that. I shall be able to perform my duties for the day." She glanced to Mrs. Carson, who offered her a nod. She had been coached, I deduced.

"Please, may I speak with the girl alone for a moment?" I requested.

"Of course, m'lord," Wilson agreed, ushering Mrs. Carson from the room.

"There," I said in what I hoped to be a soothing manner, "now you may speak freely."

"I have spoken freely, m'lord. I suffered from some delusion, though I am certain it shall dissipate. And it shall not affect my work."

"You do not need to worry about disguising the incident. I wish to learn the truth." She glanced at me as she again bit her lower lip. "I do not believe there to be some defect in your character. I, myself, have experienced something similar and wish to learn the circumstances of your encounter so I may compare them."

"Something similar, m'lord?" she squeaked.

"Indeed," I assured her. "As I wandered the halls late one eve, I heard music and voices. When I followed them, I found no identifiable source. Yet I am certain I heard them. I did not imagine it."

"I did not imagine the woman either, m'lord. She was there! She was real!" Elsie exclaimed.

"Please, tell me all the details you recall."

She nodded, and her forehead pinched in recollection. "I tidied the sitting room. As I departed to move to my next duty, I stepped into the foyer. In the hall beyond, I spotted movement. I glanced in that direction and saw the figure."

"A woman," I prompted.

She nodded in response. "Yes, m'lord. A woman. In a most curious choice of clothing."

"What do you mean?"

"She wore trousers, m'lord."

"Are you certain it was not a man?"

She shook her head. "No, m'lord. A woman. With her hair flowing down her back, not pulled up. And wearing trousers."

"Could it perhaps have been her underthings? Was she undressed?"

"If so, I have never in my life laid eyes upon underthings like these, m'lord." Color rose into her cheeks as we discussed the matter.

While I hoped not to embarrass her, I preferred she continue. I lifted my eyebrows to prod her, and she added, "They were dark trousers, tight to her skin. And a brightly colored woolen top."

"Did she wear shoes? Was she barefoot? Do you recall?"

"She wore riding boots," Elsie responded.

I pursed my lips as I considered the information. "Where did this oddly dressed woman go?"

Elsie swallowed hard. "Well, m'lord, as I stared at the curious scene, the woman... simply vanished!"

"Through a doorway? Into a room?"

"No, m'lord. As I followed her journey down the hall, a bright light flashed. It blinded me. When it subsided, the woman had disappeared."

I nodded. "All right, Elsie. Is there anything else you can recall?"

Elsie furrowed her brow again as she considered the question. "No, m'lord. Except for the bright light, it only flashed for a moment. She couldn't have disappeared through a door in that time."

I smiled at her. "Thank you, Elsie. You should rest given your shock. You may take the day off and return to your normal duties tomorrow."

"Thank you, m'lord. It is most gracious of you."

I offered her a curt smile and a nod before spinning to leave the room. "Oh, m'lord?" she called after me.

"Yes?" I inquired.

"Do you believe... that is, do you imagine... Was that woman a ghost?"

"No, Elsie, I do not believe so. There is some reasonable explanation. We shall find it. Your candor in explaining your encounter helps toward this goal. Do not let it trouble you further."

She nodded as she pulled the bedcovers over her. I stepped into the hallway with Wilson and Mrs. Carson. "I have given Elsie permission to remain abed. She will resume her duties tomorrow. You may leave the incident rest. I do not wish this tale to spread throughout the staff."

"Very good, m'lord. I shall see Elsie rests and the staff does not repeat the story."

"Thank you, Wilson."

I pondered the information as I walked the halls, intent on returning to my office. Instead, I found myself in the foyer. I peered into the hall opposite the sitting room. What I expected to find, I do not know. It remained vacant at this hour. I strode down the hall and examined the floor and walls. No secret passages existed here. The woman could not have disappeared into a hidden passage. Though the music and voices I heard could not have vanished either; yet I could not find the source. Were these incidents related?

I would not wait long before another event confronted us. As November waned and gray skies filled our days, I sat reading in the library one afternoon. As I read, I overheard voices in the hallway outside. I did not recognize them. I rose from my chair and crossed the room. The voices continued on the opposite side of the door.

I threw the doors open and peered into the hall. I found it empty. I swung my head from side to side, glancing up and down the length of it. Not a soul graced the area.

Incidents like this would continue. Phantom noises, disembodied voices, footsteps with no owners. All these would haunt the castle halls on an increasingly regular basis.

Lily, one of our chambermaids, would also become the victim of these manifestations. She claimed a man roamed the halls near the west bedrooms. When she called to him, he fled into the hallway overlooking the back gardens. There, he disappeared after consulting an object clutched in his hand.

The poor girl never recovered from the sighting. She remained abed for two days before we found her meager belongings missing and her bed not slept in one morning. A simple note propped on her pillow read, "I cannot bear another moment in these cursed halls."

Rumors began to spread like wildfire through the staff and into the village. The old woman's curse rang through my mind on a regular basis. What misfortune had I brought upon my family, I wondered?

The occurrences happened so frequently, I mentioned them to Jaime. He suggested there was a reasonable explanation, though, after a lengthy discussion, we could arrive at no logical conclusion. This is when I began to document the incidents.

I have recorded all known instances of these strange manifestations and their locations. I shall continue to monitor them and record them in these journals.

Cate sighed as she reached the end of the first journal. She had learned no more about the workings of the timepiece. It appeared in Douglas's time, the time rips also opened and closed at random, as they were doing now.

How had Douglas tamed them? So far, she was no closer to a solution.

Cate sat at her desk, poring over Douglas's second journal. She finished inputting several pages and pressed the button to decrypt them. The progress wheel spun in a colorful circle. As she awaited the results, she drummed her fingers on the desk.

The program completed its run. Deciphered text appeared on the screen. Cate leaned in to read it.

Strange incidents continue to manifest. We cannot ascertain the source of these disturbances.

As Cate read, the cursor began to move backward, deleting the text as it went. There must be some bug in the new program, Cate assumed. She attempted to stop the deletion by pressing the escape key. It did nothing to halt the progress of the cursor. It continued to march backward, erasing all text in its path. She pressed a random selection of other keys before swiping at her trackpad. She clicked the button to close the program. She attempted to minimize the window. Nothing worked. The program failed to respond. As soon as it finished whatever it was doing, she would send an email to Damien and ask him about it.

When all words in the decrypted text disappeared, Cate attempted to close the program again, but it remained frozen.

The cursor blinked at her on the blank page. After a moment, words appeared. Character after character paraded across the screen.

Hello, Catherine...

With a gasp, Cate leapt from her seat and backed several steps away. The library door creaked open on its hinges. She spun to face it. Emptiness stared back. A grinding noise sounded on the opposite side of the room. Her breath caught in her throat as she twirled toward the sound.

The bookcase slid open. A figure stood in the cavity.

"Hello, Catherine," his British accent called to her.

Her pulse quickened as she recognized the voice. She raced toward the open door and into the dark hall beyond. Her footsteps pounded along the hall's runner as she fled from her assailant.

As she neared the foyer, she skidded to a halt. Her mouth gaped open, and her eyes widened as she stared in front of her. A wall blocked the normally open passage into the foyer. Candles burned in sconces, their feeble light flickering in the large hall. She glanced downward. Her tunic and leggings transformed into a light pink gown. A full, floor-length skirt with lace ruffles hung from a tight silk and lace bodice.

"Don't run from me, Catherine," the voice called behind her.

Her heart pounded in her chest as she flung herself against the wall. She pounded her fists against it in a desperate attempt to escape. She tugged on one of the sconces, and the wall swung open.

Cate pushed through it and fled across the foyer and into the sitting room. She closed and locked the double doors behind her. As she inched several steps back, she ran her hand over her clothes. She now wore a drop-waist peach dress with a sailor's bow.

Her brow crinkled. "Amelia's dress?" she questioned aloud as she recognized the dress her great-grandmother gifted her when she visited 1925. Was she now in the 1920s?

"Why do you run from me, Catherine?" the voice asked from behind her.

She whirled to face him. He strode through the shadows across the room, his features indistinguishable in the darkness.

"Who are you?" she asked as she backed toward the door. Her fingers reached behind her, searching for the key. She struck cool metal and her fingers tightened around the head as she turned it. The lock unlatched, and she spun to fling the doors open.

She fled across the foyer and up the main staircase. Her steps slowed, hindered by the sudden appearance of a domed hoop skirt. She reached a hallway of bedrooms. The man rounded the corner behind her.

"I will always find you, Catherine," he warned.

Cate ducked into one of the bedrooms, closing and locking the door behind her. The handle turned and twisted as he attempted to open the locked door. The door shook as the man pounded against it.

The noise ceased. She held her breath as she strained to listen for sounds beyond the room. An earsplitting boom resounded moments later, knocking her down. The room plunged into darkness. The door creaked open, and the silhouette of a man stood inside.

The man stalked toward her. She crawled backward on her rear as he approached.

He reached for her. She squealed as icy hands grasped her shoulders.

“I will always find you,” he hissed as he drew her closer to him.

CHAPTER 17

Cate gasped and lashed out at her assailant. She attempted to shake loose of his grasp.

“Cate! Cate!” Jack’s voice called.

She opened her eyes and glanced around the room. “Jack?” she breathed, her voice hoarse with sleep.

“What happened?” she inquired.

“I found you asleep at your desk again. You were whimpering and moaning. I assume you had another nightmare?”

Cate nodded as she pushed her hair behind her ears. “Yes.”

“Come sit over here,” Jack directed, motioning toward the armchair across the room. “You’re still shaking.”

“I’m okay,” she insisted as she stumbled to the armchair and slouched into it. “It just takes me a few minutes to recover from the physical effects.”

Jack sank into the chair next to hers. “What happened this time?”

“Same thing, more or less. I’m being chased by the same man. Only this time the new twist was I seemed to be jumping around in time. I started in my normal clothes then I had a dress from the 1790s, then the 1920s and then the 1850s.”

“So, basically, you’re melding the reality of these misbehaving time rips with your nightmarish friend.”

“It seems so.”

“Any more information about him? Did you see him this time? Or the other person you were hiding with?”

“No. I was alone this time. And he’s always hidden in the shadows. Just beyond my field of vision. It’s so frustrating.” Her head fell into her hand as she sighed.

They sat in silence for a few moments before Jack asked, “How are you feeling now?”

“Better,” Cate admitted.

“Can you sleep?”

“If not, I’ll do a little more work.”

“No, that’s a terrible idea.”

“I haven’t gotten anywhere yet and I’ve decrypted the entire first journal. He describes all the weird stuff happening around the castle, but not even a hint of how to control the time rips. I don’t even think he knows what’s going on yet.”

“It’s fine. You’ll keep working on that and we’ll go back to Douglas’s time later and start working that angle. We’ll figure this out, Cate. But you must rest. Starting tomorrow, we’ll have extra hours in our days. You’ll need the sleep.”

“Of course, I am,” Jack teased.

“Okay, I’ll head to bed and get back on those journals in the morning. With any luck, we’ll find something to help us during our trip.”

As Cate eased into her desk chair, memories of her nightmare flooded back to her. She hoped she had better luck decrypting the journals than she’d had in her dream. An overwhelming urge to glance over her shoulder coursed through her as she opened the second journal. The decryption program loaded on her laptop as she studied the numbers on the journal’s interior cover.

With the program loaded, she updated the order of the disks for decoding. She opened a document and began to copy the encoded text. She hoped to make it through at least one-quarter of the journal before their trip to Douglas's time.

After an hour of typing, she set the program to work. Within minutes she had text from Douglas's next entry.

I continue to keep a careful record of the strange manifestations within the castle walls. I have even begun to explore the areas in which they occur on a regular basis.

I, myself, have been party to a number of these strange incidents. On several more occasions, music has filled the air with no identifiable source. In each instance, the music emanates from the ballroom. Noises typical for a large party always accompany it. In every instance, I am unable to locate anyone. I have even attempted to spy through the keyhole.

To make sense of the events, I have also begun to record everything surrounding the occurrences. Each time I have heard the music, I have been in the foyer and hall leading to the library. My first journal confirms this to be the case for the first incident of this type.

However, not all incidents occur in this way.

As we approach spring in Dunhaven, I now have a diverse array of odd and somewhat disturbing events to study. In addition to the music I overheard, several servants insist they have encountered figures wandering the halls. They claim these people, when followed, disappear, either dissipating in a brilliant flash of light or turning a corner and vanishing.

Until December, I had never experienced anything beyond the sound of music floating through the halls. However, on one chilly winter night, something rather different presented itself.

I gazed over the frost-covered back garden. Moonlight cast a bright glow across the winter landscape. An otherworldly silence filled the air. It was this quiet solitude that drew me to this parcel of land.

It was also this quiet solitude that made the incident apparent. Hushed voices cracked the silence. Distinct whispers filled the air. Who else was awake at this hour, I wondered as the voices reached me?

I strained to listen. It sounded like a male and female conversing, perhaps arguing. Were two members of the staff engaged in a clandestine meeting? I followed the noise, creeping down the hallway as noiselessly as possible.

Their voices grew louder as I approached the corner leading to a hallway of bedrooms. I made out a few words as I hid.

“... should go before anything else happens,” the male said.

“No! We need more information!” the female answered.

“At what cost?”

“Shh!”

“What is it?”

“I heard something.”

I pivoted around the corner, intent on determining the identity of the conversants. An empty hallway met my gaze. I scanned it, searching for any signs of life. I found none.

“Hello?” I called.

I received no answer. I squinted into the darkness but found nothing. I ambled down the hall, checking in the various bedrooms, but discovered no living souls.

This incident was my first to involve more than scattered, unintelligible voices and music. In this case, I could identify two speakers and even part of their conversation. I had been in the back hall overlooking the back garden, NOT the foyer or near the library.

This marked the second incident that occurred in or near that back hallway. This is where I had also spotted the figure.

As the year came to a close, I would encounter more bizarre incidents. One week after I overheard the whispered conversation, another strange happening occurred.

I traversed the hallways in the mid-afternoon. My brothers, Alistair and Duncan, and their wives visited for the holiday season. I hoped to invite them for a winter walk around the property. As I turned the corner, I spotted a woman. Her clothing shocked me. Her dress, several inches above her ankles, hung in a boxy form around her figure. Her hair, cut short, fell only to her chin. She proceeded down the hall in front of me and into a bedroom.

I dashed after her and flung the door to the bedroom open. I scanned the room. Emptiness greeted me. Where had she gone?

This incident forced me to confide again in Jaime. He could offer no explanation. I began to wonder what sort of specters roamed the halls of my new home.

As the new year rang in, I began to search the halls for more apparitions. Convinced a reasonable explanation existed, I scoured the castle for more signs of these ghosts. More evidence of their existence continues to pour in. Misplaced items. Phantom voices. Figures that roam the halls, then disappear. Brilliant flashes of light with no source.

I have lost count of all the events but have kept a record of all of them within the pages of one journal, which I have devoted to simply detailing each occurrence, its date, location, and other pertinent details.

In these pages, I began to parse through the information I have at hand.

I have now encountered multiple individuals wandering the halls. I have noted several patterns occurring. Attire on the individuals varies from location to location. Though WITHIN a location, clothing is consistent. Women in the bedroom hallway always wear dresses above their ankles. Men there wear trousers and coats much different from the current style.

Women in the hall off the foyer often wear trousers! Men there wear odd, loose-fitting trousers and shirts that bare their arms.

I have spotted some figures in clothing closer to our own, though dissimilar enough to be obvious to me.

These patterns suggest some ordering of the events. That they do not occur randomly.

I have read much on the subject of spectral disturbances, hauntings, and ghosts. Often, phantoms are described as appearing in the same clothing. For example, a woman appears in the same red dress to all who see her. And she appears over and over in that dress.

This is not the case in our manifestations. A variety of similarly styled clothing appears even on the same individual. This suggests the passage of time wherever these souls are, rather than the specter being stuck, glued to the earth in some form.

I postulate they are not ghosts. Ghosts imply a departed soul, someone who has lived and died on this earth and whose souls remain tethered to this world. My theory is that these sightings are of individuals who have yet to live. It may sound wild, and I dare not say it aloud to anyone as yet, but I wonder if I am in some way peering into the future.

I plan to discuss these events with a man with considerable knowledge of an otherworldly nature. For the first time since we settled here, we have welcomed guests beyond family. My dear friend, Grayson Buckley, and his wife, Celine, both have experience with unexplainable supernatural events. I hope to determine if he has any explanations for these occurrences.

I shall broach the matter at a dinner party tomorrow evening. I have also invited Aria and Jaime, a voice of cautious reason to temper the wilder discussions. One other couple shall be in attendance. Cousins of mine have arrived in town only today.

I shall only bring the matter up to the men of the party, as the subject may prove too vexing for the ladies. In particular, I am concerned about our newest additions to the party. While I am certain my cousin, Jack, will take the matter well in true MacKenzie style, I fear shocking his wife, Catherine.

Cate's heart leapt into her throat as she read the last line. She stared wide-eyed at the screen. Douglas's journal entry discussed his upcoming dinner party, the same party she and Jack hoped to attend. It outlined the attendants and mentioned Jack and Catherine MacKenzie. This must refer to them.

As she considered the entry, detailing the past but also seeming to detail her future, a knock sounded at the door. She leapt from her chair, her nerves on edge.

"Lunch!" Molly announced. She breathed a sigh of relief. "Still hard at work, huh?"

"I've made it all the way to journal two!" Cate announced.

"Wow! Any child sacrifices yet or have we only made it to animals?" Molly inquired with a wink.

"Just discussing entertaining at the castle in the early days," Cate fibbed.

"Eh," Molly murmured, "that sounds... far less interesting but much safer."

"It is fairly interesting," Cate admitted. "It's fascinating how different life was back then. How entertaining others provided entertainment, too!"

"I suppose without any modern amenities, it would! No TV or radio or email for easy contact. Events were probably a fanfare for everyone involved."

She nodded in agreement. "I think I'll do a bit more work over lunch and learn a bit more about Douglas's life."

"Yeah, get it in before Jack steals you away for those estate headaches after lunch."

Cate chuckled. "I'd hardly call them headaches. Not when I live in a place like this!"

"Good outlook. Enjoy, Lady Cate!"

"Thanks, Molly. Have a great lunch."

Cate spent the majority of her lunch typing additional text into a document. Her progress remained slow; her mind continually returning to the last piece of decrypted text she read.

Molly collected her tray as Jack entered the library. “Ready for that estate business?” he inquired.

“You bet!” Cate exclaimed as she closed her laptop.

Molly skirted through the door, tray in hand and Jack closed the doors behind her.

“Got my clothes ready?” he asked.

“I do, but first, you need to look at this,” Cate said. She popped the laptop open again and pulled up her decrypted document.

“Did you find something on the timepiece?”

She shook her head as she handed the laptop off to Jack. “Here,” she said, pointing to the screen, “here he is postulating about what the cause of the strange apparitions and phantom music and all that is. Start there and go to the end.”

Cate bit her lower lip as she waited for Jack to finish reading the entry. She shifted her weight from leg to leg as she watched his eyes scan the text. After a few moments, he ran his fingers through his hair, and his eyes went wide. He glanced up at her. He drew in a deep breath. His lips moved but no words came out.

CHAPTER 18

Cate nodded in understanding as Jack gaped at her. “That was my reaction, too.”

Jack swallowed hard. “Is this... is this us?”

Cate shrugged one shoulder. “How could it be anyone else? Jack and Catherine MacKenzie? Jack, Douglas’s cousin. Who else could it be?”

“It must be us,” Jack admitted. “But this is... bizarre.”

“It gave me a shock when I read it, too.”

“A shock? Cate, we’re reading our futures!”

“And our pasts, technically,” Cate added.

“Well, the past, our future if we’re going to get technical. This is wild!” Jack closed the laptop and set it on the desk. He paced the floor for a few moments. “Cate, I’m not sure you should continue decrypting these journals.”

“What?” Cate exclaimed. “The solution to our problem may be in these! I have to continue!”

“I’m not certain that’s a wise idea. You’ve just read our future.”

“Yes and no. We realize we’re going to the dinner party. Is that a shocking surprise? It’s the outcome we hoped for.”

“But what if we learn something we shouldn’t. What if he continues to detail events in our lives?”

“I’ll stop then. If we continue to come up in these journals, I’ll stop reading. But this could contain the answers. We agreed to work both angles!”

“Until you started reading our futures, Madame Fate.”

Cate gave him a wry glance. “Very funny, Jack.”

“The implications of this...” Jack began.

“Let’s not dwell on it. It may prove overwhelming.”

“Perhaps we should dwell on it! Overwhelming or not!” Jack argued.

“Why? We’ll drive ourselves crazy. And end up in an endless discussion of fate and predestination. The fact is, I found mention of us in journals from Douglas. It matches what we plan to do. Let’s leave it at that and get after doing the thing we intended. Let’s secure our invitation to this dinner party.”

“Just a minute,” Jack said.

She raised her eyebrows at him.

“This other fellow mentioned. Grayson Buckley. That’s the name you overheard during Douglas’s conversation with Jaime, isn’t it?”

She nodded. “He mentioned a Grayson, yes. He didn’t give his last name but that must be him. It’s got to be the same dinner party discussed in the journal.”

“Do you imagine he’s your dream guy?”

“My dream guy? I thought you said you were the man of my dreams.”

“Well, with my roguish good looks, my charming nature and my stellar sense of humor, I assumed so. I’m hard to resist. But apparently, some other bloke’s been chasing you around in your sleep. Perhaps I should be jealous.”

“You forgot your overwhelming modesty. All joking aside, that’s what I’m hoping to find out. Which is why we must secure an invitation to that dinner party! Now, let’s go!”

Jack blew out a long breath. “All right. I’ll meet you outside your bedroom suite when you’re ready.”

Cate and Jack parted ways to dress for their immersion into 1792. Cate swept her hair up, allowed several tendrils to frame her face. She slipped into the centuries-old clothing. She adjusted the striped dress and fussed with the blouse top. The overskirt in the rear trailed behind her as she ambled to the door.

She pulled the doors open as she gathered the train over her arm for the trek to the library and Douglas’s laboratory. She found Jack pacing the halls in his cutaway overcoat topping his shirt, vest, and dark breeches.

She bit her lower lip as she held in a chuckle. “I’m ready.”

Jack spun to face her. "Are we sure we can't wear normal clothes?" Jack questioned.

She giggled. "I'm certain. You look... great!"

"In my tights. Oh, yes, I look fabulous. I must say, you look sensational as always. This outfit gives new meaning to my nickname for you! M'lady!" he said with an extravagant bow.

Cate curtsied. "Thank you, kind sir."

"Well, I guess there's no delaying it!" Jack held out his arm to Cate.

They navigated to Douglas's secret study. Cate held out the timepiece and, with a shaky breath from both, they activated it. As the temporary lighting dimmed to darkness, she glanced around.

"I guess we made it," she whispered.

"Yeah," Jack agreed. "Now we need to sneak out of here, through the library and out of the house."

"There's a spy panel at the top of the stairs. I found it after I was trapped here. We can use it to make sure the coast is clear."

"We should have brought a flashlight," Jack complained as they stumbled toward the stairs leading to the library.

"I'm not certain introducing modern conveniences into this era is wise. I can't believe a Reid suggested such a thing."

"I'm a MacKenzie right now, remember? Wild and impetuous."

"Right," Cate said with a giggle. They reached the top of the stairs.

"At least those things don't creak in this time period. They'd be a dead giveaway."

She inched the spy panel open and peered into the library. "Empty. Ready to make a run for it?"

"Yes, let's get this party started," Jack confirmed.

They unlatched the secret panel and slid the bookcase open. Cate took another glance around before they emerged into the library. Jack shut the bookcase and they raced across the room.

With the door open a crack, Jack peered into the hallway. "Clear," he whispered. He grabbed Cate's hand as he pulled the door open wider. They dashed down the hall and out the side door.

Jack breathed a deep breath as they inhaled the fresh outside air. "Made it. Now, let's hope we can get back in through the front door."

They strolled around the castle and approached the heavy wooden entry doors. Jack drew in a deep breath as he used the lion's head door knocker to summon the butler.

A tall, wiry man pulled open the door. "Yes?" he inquired in a nasally tone.

"Mr. Jack MacKenzie and his wife to see Lord Douglas MacKenzie," Jack responded.

The man raised his eyebrows at them as he glanced between Jack and Cate. "Are you expected, sir?"

"Yes, we are. I have written ahead so my cousin may expect my arrival."

The man bowed his head at them and gestured for them to enter the foyer. He signaled to the sitting room. "You may wait inside. I shall inform his lordship at once."

"Thank you," Jack answered.

They strode into the sitting room. "Different era, same sitting room," Jack noted.

"Yep. Let's hope third time's the charm."

They waited for several tense minutes. Jack fussed with his cravat. "This is like a noose around my neck," he complained.

"Here, let me see," Cate said. She adjusted the collar, loosening it and fluffing it.

"Thanks," Jack said as he wiped a bead of sweat from his brow.

"Don't sweat this one, Jack," Cate replied with a wink. "We know how it works out."

He offered her a half-smile as the doors burst open.

A tall man stood in the open doorway. His dark unruly curls tamed back into a low queue with a ribbon. He narrowed his eyes at Jack and Cate. After a moment, he raised one eyebrow as he strode across the room.

"Jack MacKenzie, I presume?" he inquired as he eyed Jack.

"Indeed, sir," Jack said with a slight bow. "In the flesh. What a pleasure to meet you, Lord MacKenzie."

"Douglas MacKenzie," he said, extending his hand. "Very pleased to make your acquaintance. May I offer you a drink?"

"No, sir, thank you. May I introduce my wife, Catherine?"

Cate offered Douglas a smile. "Mrs. MacKenzie, how very charmed I am to welcome you to my home."

"Thank you, Lord MacKenzie. How very gracious of you to take the time to make our acquaintance."

“Please, sit! Are you certain I may not offer you a drink?”

“Very kind, sir, but no,” Jack said as he and Cate sank onto a loveseat near the fireplace.

“Wilson tells me you assumed you were expected. I am very regretful to inform you of having no knowledge of your arrival.”

Jack glanced to Cate. “I am terribly sorry, m’lord. I sent word ahead of business in the vicinity and my intentions on visiting. I am most regretful the correspondence did not arrive.”

“As am I! I should have had rooms prepared and waiting to welcome family! As it stands, you shall be forced to wait until one can be readied.”

Cate noted the release in Jack’s posture at Douglas’s invitation. In true MacKenzie style, the man proved gracious and welcoming. “Oh, how kind of you, Lord MacKenzie, however...”

Douglas waved his hand in the air. “Oh, please, call me Douglas. As proud as I am of my title, it isn’t meant for family!”

Jack offered a slight smile. “Douglas. Again, how kind of you, however, it is not our intention to impose on your household.”

“No imposition at all! Do you imagine I built this home for only myself? It is to be shared and whom better to share it with than one’s family. And you come at a most fortuitous time! We are entertaining friends. It will prove most delightful to expand the house party! Olivia shall find it most acceptable, I am certain.”

“Your invitation is very kind.”

“Then you accept it, yes? Yes, yes, you do. Now, who is our common relative? Are you Uncle Frederick’s son? No, no, he had no son Jack,” he said as he placed his finger on his lip.

“No, sir,” Jack answered. “I’m Broderick’s grandson. Our grandfathers were brothers.”

“Ah, of course, Broderick’s grandson, yes,” Douglas responded. “Good, good. Wonderful to have that side of the family in! How is your father?”

“Getting on, though still doing well enough. Same with Mother.”

“Excellent. And what brings you to Dunhaven?”

“Business,” Jack answered. “My law practice does a great deal of land management. It often involves travel on behalf of my clients.”

“An attorney! Good man! Where did you study law?”

“Oxford,” Jack fibbed.

“And you work with land management? Scouting property in Dunhaven? I warn you, I have the best property in the county!” Douglas let out a loud laugh.

“I would concur. It is a beautiful plot and a beautiful castle. The moment I realized my business would bring me to the area, I sent word ahead to visit. I am sorry you did not receive my post.”

“No matter. As long as you aren’t trying to purchase the property, there shall be no trouble at all!”

Jack held up his hands in defeat. “I wouldn’t dream of it.”

The butler entered the room, taking a post near the door in silence.

“Oh, Wilson!” Douglas said as he glanced toward him. “Have you everything prepared?”

“Indeed, m’lord. I had a bedroom prepared in the west hall for Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie.”

“Excellent! Thank you, Wilson,” Douglas said as the man departed. “Shall we send for your things?”

“That isn’t necessary,” Jack replied. “We had them sent ahead, though there was a delay. The bags should arrive tomorrow.”

“Well, then we shall see you have what you may need for this evening! We shall not be dining formally. The Buckleys are arriving late this afternoon. We shall host a formal welcome dinner in their honor tomorrow evening. We would be most pleased if you would attend.”

“We will be looking most forward to it,” Jack answered. “Again, thank you.”

“I apologize about dinner this evening...”

Jack interrupted Douglas’s response. “We are quite tired from our travels. We shall be most happy to retire to our rooms with a light meal and rest. And on that note, we should take up no more of your time this afternoon.”

“No trouble at all,” Douglas answered. “Though I am certain Mrs. Mackenzie would like to put her feet up.”

Cate smiled at him. “Thank you. The journey has been a little taxing. I would very much like to retire.”

“I shall have Cook prepare a light meal to be sent up. And I shall have Wilson fetch anything else you may need.”

Everyone stood as Douglas rang for Wilson, instructing him on attending to the items he mentioned.

Before arranging for clothing and their meals, Wilson showed Cate and Jack to their room. She sank onto the bed as he departed. She raised her eyebrows at Jack.

“Well, we did it!”

“Indeed, we did,” Jack agreed. “It was easier than I thought. Either we’re getting better at time travel or the MacKenzies are just incredibly nice people.”

“Both?” Cate surmised in a questioning tone. “We MacKenzies are incredibly nice.”

Jack narrowed his eyes at her as he chuckled. “Very true, Lady Cate, very true.”

“I suppose we have a few hours to kill here while we make it look good.”

Jack flopped onto the bed next to Cate. “Yep. We’ll eat our meager meal before we ‘retire’ for the evening. Then we’re off the hook until tomorrow night.”

“Well, off the hook for time traveling. I plan to continue working on those journals.”

“Reading more of our future? I’m still disturbed by that, you know. It’s just odd reading about it.”

“I must admit, I found it jarring, too.”

A knock sounded at the door. “I’ll get it,” Jack offered. He bounded off the bed and pulled the door open.

A maid carried a tray with sandwiches and a decanter of wine. “May I bring you anything else?” she asked in a thick Scottish accent.

“No, thank you,” Cate answered. “This is perfect.”

Another knock sounded, announcing the arrival of a second maid. She delivered nightclothes for both Jack and Cate.

Jack bit into one of the sandwiches as the door swung shut behind both maids. “Mmm, these are good. Here, try one!”

He handed a wedge to Cate. “Eat up, gotta make it look good,” Jack said with a mouth full of sandwich.

“I’ll leave the bulk to you,” Cate said as she nibbled a corner. “We just ate lunch!”

“So? This is dinner!” Jack answered.

“First dinner,” Cate reminded him. “We’ll still have a second dinner when we get home.”

Jack raised his eyebrows at her as he poured himself a small glass of wine. "I know. I can't wait! Mrs. Fraser's making tuna salad melts!"

"You and your stomach," Cate said with a shake of her head and a chuckle.

As she nibbled on the light fare, Cate wandered to the window.

"Anything exciting?" Jack answered as he joined her.

"A carriage," Cate answered. A cloud of dust billowed down the front drive as a horse-drawn carriage trundled down the gravel path.

"The Buckleys?" Jack inquired.

"I'm not certain," Cate said with a shrug, "but if I had to guess, I'd say so."

Four chestnut horses rounded the circular fountain before the coachman urged them to a stop outside the front door. The household waited outside as their guests arrived.

"That must be Olivia," Cate said, pointing to the woman next to Douglas. Dark brown curls cascaded around one shoulder from her swept-up style. Her fair skin revealed delicate features with deep-set eyes.

"Why are they all out there?" Jack inquired, pointing to the staff. "Mr. Smythe asked us to be there when you arrived, but I assumed that was because you were the lady of the house and our new employer."

"It's a custom," Cate informed him. "It's the lady of the house's decision, but it's often to make the guests feel welcome and to give a special feel and presentation of the entire household. Kind of a way to make them feel important and give them a grand entrance."

"Hmm," Jack murmured. "These Buckleys must be special people."

"I need to research them when I return home. I didn't have the chance before we came here."

Douglas stepped forward as the coachman opened the carriage door. A tall man with dark hair stepped from the carriage. Cate studied him as he strode forward, grasping Douglas's hand in a firm handshake. A broad smile formed on his lips, and he clapped Douglas on the arm.

"Is that your guy?" Jack questioned.

Cate stared down at the man who emerged from the carriage. She studied his features for any indication that he had been the one haunting her nightmares.

After a moment, she shrugged. "I wouldn't know unless I heard him speak. It could be."

“Douglas seems to know him well,” Jack surmised.

“He referred to him as his good friend. They must be close if Douglas would mention the ongoings in the castle to him and seek his advice on it. He also said he has knowledge of the supernatural. I wonder what that means?”

“Knowledge of the supernatural?” Jack repeated. “Is he a witch-hunter or ghost-hunter or something?”

“I’m not certain. I wish he would have expounded on that in the journal. It could mean so many things.”

“Perhaps he’s one of those hysterical reverends. Like the Salem people, burning witches at the stake and the like.”

“And Douglas plans to tell him he sees ghosts in the house because he’ll perform some ceremony to drive them away?” Cate offered as a question.

“Could be. He’ll be sorely disappointed when that doesn’t work.”

“That doesn’t add up.”

“Why not?”

“Douglas figures out the secret. He creates the timepiece to control the time rips. He has to realize it’s not ghosts. He mentioned as much in his journal. No, he wants the Buckleys’ opinion for another reason. But what?”

Silence fell between them as they continued to watch the scene unfold outside the castle. The man waved his hand back toward the carriage. He reached toward the inside. A gloved hand grasped his and a woman emerged. Her light blonde hair was swept up under a sapphire blue hat. Even at this distance, her sparkling blue eyes were piercing. Her porcelain skin and rosy cheeks lit up as her full lips formed a smile.

“Wow,” Cate murmured. “She’s beautiful.”

“Yeah,” Jack answered after retrieving another sandwich. “Real looker, if you like blondes. She looks kind of young, doesn’t she?”

“She’s probably seventeen, eighteen,” Cate answered. “Not abnormal for this era.”

“He looks close to thirty!” Jack exclaimed.

“Again, not abnormal. And if he is my nightmarish friend, judging by his accent, he’s likely high ranking in the nobility.”

“Ah, married him for the money, huh?”

She shrugged. “Might not be the only reason.”

“Huh?”

“He’s a handsome guy. She really scored if he’s a high-ranking nobleman with that face.”

Jack froze and stared at Cate for a moment. “Lady Cate! I can’t believe what I’m hearing. As your husband, I’m terribly jealous over your gushing about this man.”

Cate chuckled. “I’m hardly gushing. Just making a point. She could have married him for money or looks, perhaps both. Assuming he’s my well-bred friend.”

The couple chatted for a few moments with Douglas and Olivia before Olivia motioned toward the interior of the castle. The two women stepped forward, Douglas and Grayson followed them. The female staff retreated around the corner to a servants’ entrance while the men began to unload the carriage.

“Douglas told Jaime that Grayson was no stranger to odd and unusual phenomena. Wonder what that means?”

“Perhaps we’ll find out tomorrow at dinner.”

Cate wandered back to the bed and plopped on it.

“You okay?” Jack questioned. “You’re not daydreaming about your dream guy, are you?”

She shot him a wry glance. “No, I’m not. Just anxious to get to tomorrow’s dinner.”

“You’ve got a long wait,” Jack said as he sank onto the bed next to her.

“I know,” Cate said with a sigh. “I just feel like we’ll finally make some progress on this time travel thing. Plus, I can hear Grayson Buckley speak and find out if he’s the one haunting me.”

“And you can ogle him up close and in person.”

“Oh my goodness! That’s the last time I comment on someone’s appearance with you around!”

“Not someone. Some other man’s appearance. And your dream guy no less.”

“I’m starting to think you really are jealous.”

Jack changed the conversation’s course. “What’s your gut say? Do you expect he’s your guy?”

“Why would a good friend of Douglas be chasing me? There’s no reason for it, so I can’t imagine it’s him. Then again, I can’t figure out who else it would be. Perhaps we’ll never find him and he’s just a figment of my imagination.”

“He’s quite a figment. He visits you every night. There must be some reason behind it.”

“We shall see,” Cate answered before sipping her wine.

“Until then, we may as well enjoy this!” Jack said as he filled Cate’s glass then his own.

“Wow! Are you actually enjoying time travel?”

“It’s growing on me. Maybe it’s not so bad.” He grinned at her.

They spent another two hours waiting for the household to settle before they snuck to Douglas’s secret lab to return to their time.

Jack wiped a bead of sweat from his brow as he wrapped his clammy hand around Cate’s. He flicked his gaze to her and cocked his head. “Let’s hope this works.”

Cate pressed her lips together in a thin line and nodded. They rubbed the face and held their breath as they waited to see if they would be returned to the present.

CHAPTER 19

They stared down at the timepiece, their eyes fixed on the slow-moving second hand. After a moment, it began to speed up before it returned to normal time.

Jack breathed an extra-long sigh of relief as they slipped back to the present. “Whew, I have spent the entire trip worried that thing wasn’t going to work!”

“It did! Your grandfather was right. Well, we spent about four hours in the past, so it’s been sixteen minutes here. I have plenty of time to decrypt more of Douglas’s journals.”

“And I have plenty of time to feed the shrubs in the back garden before second dinner.”

“Check in after dinner? We can discuss anything I’ve found and plan for tomorrow.”

“Sounds good, Lady Cate,” Jack agreed. “See you then!”

They parted ways after climbing the stairs into the library. After greeting the dogs and slipping into her modern clothes, Cate settled into her seat at the library’s desk to continue her work with the journals.

Before tackling the rest of journal two, she performed an Internet search on Grayson Buckley. The search turned up little. She tried a few alternate searches including Celine Buckley, Grayson and Celine Buckley and Buckley 1792. The final search produced a Wikipedia article on a town named Bucksville in the state of Maine.

Bucksville, Maine is a small seaside town on the Maine coast with a population of 564. It was founded by the Buckley family in 1754. The Buckley family is still the largest landowner in the town and its surrounding areas, owning both personal property and commercial ventures including the town's shipping fleet and cannery.

Cate scanned the second paragraph of the article and glanced at the location shown on the map. It gave no confirmation of a connection to Grayson Buckley.

Unable to dig up any information on the couple staying at the castle centuries ago, Cate turned her attention to the journal, spending the better part of the afternoon copying and decrypting the remainder of the journal's contents.

As Cate's dinner arrived, she settled into her armchair with her laptop balanced on the wide arm to read the rest of journal number two.

The arrival of Grayson and Celine brings hope that I will soon discover the answer to our strange manifestations. However, I have grown suddenly reluctant on the morn of our dinner party to bring the subject to conversation. It is not fear over the resulting discussion nor any explanation (or lack thereof) that may be offered. Perhaps I am taking advantage of my guests by thrusting this discussion upon them shortly after the eve of their arrival.

Still, I suppose the task must be done. And what better time than our welcome party when I shall have not only Grayson but Jaime in attendance. My cousin, Jack MacKenzie, will also be present. A man of the law, perhaps he will offer insight the others cannot.

I shall pen a summary of the conversation and any discoveries or theories provided from it following our dinner party.

The conversation was struck over brandy and cigars following our meal. Olivia and the ladies went through, leaving us to discuss business. After a brief discussion of our recent fortunes, I posed a question to the group.

"Gentlemen," I began, "I hoped to trouble you all with a delicate matter I have stumbled upon in the months since we have taken residence within these walls. Jaime is already aware of some of this, but I shall begin fresh for you, Jack, and you, Grayson."

"Certainly," Grayson answered.

"I must ask before I begin that this discussion remain in confidence. Though rumors will abound despite my best efforts, what I am about to reveal I ask you do not reveal to anyone outside of your circle."

"That sounds ominous," Jack answered me.

"Indeed," Jaime said as he refilled our brandies. "It may, in fact, send you fleeing from this castle if you are faint of heart."

Jack raised his eyebrows at Jaime's admission. He turned his attention to me. "Now, I am more than curious."

"As am I. Proceed, old friend," Grayson imparted.

"Thank you, gentlemen. Since we arrived, we have been party to strange occurrences."

"Even prior to your arrival," Jaime interjected. "From the onset of the property acquisition through the building if we are to present all the facts."

"Quite right," I agreed. "As we surveyed the property, an old woman insisted the land was cursed and would bring nothing but woe to my family should I build here."

"Certainly, you did not believe her?" Grayson questioned.

"We would not be sitting in this castle if I had. Though I have often wondered if the woman may have been correct."

"What has happened to make you wonder that?" Jack asked.

"Many things." I retrieved my first journal from the buffet where I had placed it earlier and waved it in the air.

"Douglas has kept a record of the happenings," Jaime informed them.

"It began with small occurrences. A misplaced item, a missing thing. Vases moving across the room, papers appearing and disappearing from different spots."

"Vases floating across the room?" Jack inquired.

"No," I corrected. "The vase would be positioned here." I motioned with my hand at a vase on our buffet. "In the next instance, here." I motioned to a spot across the room. "In the time between which I had spotted it there, no one had entered the room, yet the same vase had moved there."

"I see," Jack said as he leaned back in his chair, his finger rubbing his chin in thought.

"What else?" Grayson prompted.

"You suspect more?" I inquired.

"You did not ask for our discretion over a transient vase," Grayson said.

"Clever," Jaime replied.

"Indeed," I answered. "And the reason I asked for his input." I swallowed another gulp of brandy before imparting more of my story. "The next incident would go beyond a transient vase, as you put it, Grayson. As I roamed the halls late one night, the sound of music reached my ears. I followed it to its source. My ballroom. As I approached, the sounds of a lively party emanated from behind the closed doors. Chatting, laughing, music.

"I inched to the doors. And all the while, the music and chattering continued. I flung them open." I paused, a bit for dramatic effect and also to read the expressions on the others' faces.

"And?" Jack questioned, his eyebrows raised high in anticipation.

"Nothing," I reported. "An empty room."

"And what of the music?" Grayson questioned.

"Absent, as was any strains of conversation," I responded.

Jack puckered his lips at the admission.

"Hearing things in your old age?" Grayson quipped.

I narrowed my eyes at him. "Hardly. These incidents would continue. In one instance, I overheard part of a conversation between two individuals."

"Two individuals? Did you see them? Or merely hear their voices?" Grayson inquired.

"In the events I've just described, no, I did not spot them."

Grayson raised his eyebrows at me. "Have there been others where you have seen people?"

I nodded. "Several to this moment. To be completely candid, the first apparition was not spotted by myself."

"Who?" Jack inquired.

"A chambermaid. She had taken ill one day, and Wilson said it was not a normal illness. I inquired after the girl's condition to find she had insisted she spotted a woman in the front hall."

"Another of the staff, perhaps," Jack suggested.

I shook my head. "No, the woman she described could not have been a member of this household, staff, or family."

"How do you know?" Jack asked.

"Her attire," I responded. "It could not have been the attire of anyone within this house. The woman she described wore trousers!"

The room fell silent for a moment at the admission. "Tell them about the others," Jaime instructed.

"I questioned the girl about the details and recorded them. Though we would have many additional occasions by which to assess them. On several more occasions, I along with other members of the household would encounter other apparitions."

"Were they always of the same trouser-clad woman?" Grayson asked.

"No," I responded. "There were different individuals. Some men, some women. All dressed differently and with different appearances."

"A variety of ghosts?" Jack said in a questioning tone as he scratched his head.

I pointed at him. "A starting theory that I postulated myself. I began to take careful notes to test the hypothesis." I patted the journal on the table in front of me. "I recorded every instance and began to notice a pattern."

"A pattern?" Jack questioned.

"Indeed. The people we spotted in similar attire were always in the same area. And these occurrences tended to happen when I had been in specific areas of the castle."

"Tell them your theory," Jaime prompted.

"One may assume specters roamed these halls when considering the incidents separately and occurring at random. However, when the information is studied, it presents a rather different picture. Ghosts, as you suggested, Jack, are an implication of a past individual still lurking on the property in some alternate form.

"My theory is quite the opposite." I paused and scanned their faces. "I propose we are viewing some window into the future."

My theory reduced my companions to silence. Grayson grasped his brandy glass and stood. He stalked from the table, his eyes narrowed, and his lips pursed. I allowed them a moment to consider my proposal.

Several more minutes passed before I prodded the group for some response. "Has no one any response?" I inquired.

"I must say, sir," Jack began, "it is a most fantastical theory. I am not certain what to make of it. I have never encountered anything of this nature."

“And you, Grayson?” I said, turning to him. He stared out the window. “Have you encountered anything of this sort in your dealings?”

He remained silent for a moment. He puckered his lips and raised his eyebrows as he stared into his brandy. “Not much,” he admitted. “I’ll give your theory consideration, run it past Celine. Perhaps she has had an experience of this nature. Shall we join the women?”

“Just a moment,” I said. “I would like to hear Jaime’s reaction. The theory is new to him, also.” I spun in my seat to face Jaime.

He swallowed hard and leaned forward in his chair. “I am afraid it has rendered me rather mute,” he answered. “Though my initial sentiments lie close to Jack’s statements. Most fantastical. Could it even enter the realm of possibilities? To glance into the future?”

“Grayson, you may be the best of us to answer that,” I suggested.

He swallowed the last of his brandy. “Anything is possible,” he responded. “Shall we?” He motioned toward the door.

“Of course,” I answered. We left the conversation behind in favor of rejoining our wives for after-dinner drinks.

I must admit, the result of the conversation befuddles me. I did not expect an answer but rather a more spirited discussion about the nature of the strange manifestations. While Jaime always errs on the side of caution and even Jack suggests several plausible theories, Grayson’s silence on the matter baffles me. With his experience with supernatural occurrences, I expected some idea or at least an assessment of mine. I have never known him to be so mum on a subject. Perhaps it was the addition of our fourth member, Jack, that prompted his reticence. I shall make it a point to discuss this further in private.

Until then, I have no more answers than I had before the conversation.

Cate sighed as she closed the laptop. She had learned nothing new other than Douglas planned to discuss the thus unidentified time-rips with his male guests.

A knock sounded at the door. Jack and Molly entered. Molly collected Cate’s dinner tray and said her goodnights before heading off for her final duties of the day.

Jack collapsed into the armchair next to Cate. “How’d the research go?”

Cate frowned at her closed laptop. “It didn’t. I tried a search on our newest housemates Grayson and Celine Buckley.”

“And?”

“Nothing. I found an obscure article on a town in Maine founded by a Buckley family but I’m not sure if they are related. I didn’t delve too deep into searching records. If we can finagle more information from them, it would give me a starting point for more research.”

“Anything else on our future?”

Cate offered him a smile and a chuckle. “The entirety of his final entry in the second journal is the discussion you’ll have following dinner. It should be an interesting conversation for you.”

Jack raised his eyebrows. “What, that’s it?”

Cate shrugged. “You didn’t want to know too much about your future.”

Jack shook his head at her. “All right. I’ll go in unprepared. Nothing but genuine reactions here.”

“Guess we have our mission then. More information on the Buckleys and one wild, but genuine conversation.”

“1792, here we come!”

Cate paced the floor of her sitting room as she waited for the sunrise. Unable to sleep since she experienced another nightmare and with her upcoming time travel trip, she climbed from her bed in the wee hours of the morning, settling on her chaise after noting the details of her nightmare.

Again, she was chased by an unidentifiable man. Again, she raced through the halls with her heart pounding. Again, she found herself unable to sleep afterward.

Instead, after recording the details, she had turned her attention to fretting over their upcoming trip. She had found nothing in Douglas’s journals to assist with the growing problems of the time slips. Would they make progress tonight? If they didn’t, what would it mean for them moving forward? Would the time slips continue? Would they grow worse? Would they become what Douglas described in his journals?

Who were Douglas’s mysterious guests? What supernatural experience did they possess? What was Douglas referring to? And would Grayson Buckley be identified as the man haunting Cate’s dreams?

Cate’s mind spun out of control. Questions crowded in. Questions with no answers. She had hours to wait before their journey would begin. Prior to leaving yesterday, they had left a note for Douglas informing him they planned to travel to town early and request their luggage be sent on to the castle then finish some business in the area.

With their excuses made for earlier meals, they would spend most of their day in the present. She planned to work on Douglas's third journal. She hoped she could keep her mind focused on the work.

Her nervous energy drove her outside for a walk following her breakfast. She spent the early morning hours at the loch. After pondering her questions again while waterside, Cate meandered up the path toward the castle. Riley and Bailey raced ahead of her. She was in no hurry to return, frustrated with the events of late.

As she approached the castle, Jack emerged from around the corner. He carried a dog under each arm. Her eyes widened at the sight.

"Riley and Bailey! What have you two gotten into?" She eyed the two dogs. Mud covered their front legs and faces.

"Dug another hole in the garden," Jack said.

"I'm sorry," Cate answered as she hurried to relieve Jack of the dogs.

"No problem. The little rascals seemed to thoroughly enjoy their hole digging. I've got Sir Riley," he answered as he passed Bailey to Cate. "I'll carry him in for a bath."

"Thanks," Cate said.

They entered through the kitchen door.

"Uh-oh," Molly said as she spied them with the dirty dogs. "A few cute pups got themselves in trouble again."

"Yep," Cate replied. "And they're going to get a bath for their antics!"

"Ooooooh! Naughty puppies!" Molly teased. She grabbed Riley from Jack's arms. "Need a hand?"

"I've got it," Cate answered. "You two have enough work already!"

"Nay," Mrs. Fraser argued, "Miss Molly can help you bath the pups. And then I've got a nice juicy bone for them. A reward for their bath!"

Cate chuckled. "They are only getting their bath because they dug another hole in the back garden!"

"No matter to me," Mrs. Fraser insisted. "I plan to spoil the little monkeys."

"Your plan is working. This is their third time with their dig-fest!"

After their baths, Cate settled the dogs in the library with their prize. She spent what was left of her morning inputting cipher code from journal number three. With her mind distracted, she made slow progress.

After lunch, she packed several items to be laid out in their bedroom in the 1790s before preparing for her trip. She pulled her hair into a style similar to Olivia's with curls cascading over her shoulder. After dressing in her day dress, she gave both Riley and Bailey a kiss on their head and promised to be back as soon as she could.

She met Jack in the hall, and they returned to 1792. They skipped the front door, sneaking straight to their bedroom from Douglas's lab. Cate unpacked the items she brought as Jack hid their suitcase under the bed.

"That should do the trick," she said after completing the task. "Time to dress for dinner."

"I will be in the sitting room area," Jack said.

"You sure you don't want to change first?"

"No, thanks. I'd rather not spend a second longer in the ancient monkey suit than I have to."

"Because that ensemble is so much more comfortable?" Cate inquired of his breeches and overcoat.

"Much. Like my comfy pj's."

After they both dressed for dinner, Jack escorted Cate to the castle's front sitting room. Her pulse quickened as they trekked through the halls and descended the main staircase. Soon, one of her questions would be answered. Was Grayson Buckley her nightly visitor?

They proceeded into the sitting room, finding only Douglas and Olivia inside. "Ah, Jack, Catherine!" Douglas said. He poured brandy into a glass and handed it to Jack as they approached the sofa. "Can I get you something, Catherine?"

"Sherry, please," Cate answered as she eased onto the couch.

Douglas poured the cocktail and handed it to Cate before he introduced them to Olivia.

"Jack and Catherine MacKenzie, this is my wife, Olivia."

Jack bowed to her before he joined Cate on the sofa. "Lady MacKenzie, it is a pleasure to meet you."

"Olivia, please!" Olivia said in an even and easy tone.

"And how was your morning business, Jack?" Douglas inquired. "I was shocked to find you'd already gone this morning when Wilson delivered your note! And Catherine, too! You must be quite the adventurer!"

“Yes,” Olivia chimed in, “I quite expected you’d like to rest after your journey.”

“I wanted Catherine to experience a bit of the Scottish countryside,” Jack answered. “I did not give her much choice about joining me. The business proved fruitful.”

“Excellent,” Douglas responded. “And how did you find the surrounding area?”

“Beautiful,” Cate answered.

“Is it much different than where you are from?” Olivia questioned. “You are American, yes?”

“Yes,” Cate said. “Quite different, though I was raised in the city, not the country.”

“And were you able to sort your luggage? Wilson did not seem to think it was delivered.”

“Yes,” Jack answered. “We had it sent on this morning.”

With a broad grin, Douglas rose from the couch opposite Jack and Cate as Jack finished his statement. “Welcome! Wonderful timing!”

Cate twisted in her seat as Jack stood. A dark-haired man with spectacles escorted a red-haired woman.

“Come in, come in!” Douglas encouraged, pouring additional cocktails for each.

He joined everyone near the fireplace. “Please meet my cousin, Jack MacKenzie, and his wife, Catherine. Jack, Catherine, this is my estate manager, Jaime Reid, and his wife, Aria.”

Cate smiled as she noticed Jack’s posture stiffen as he gripped the hand of his ancestor. Greetings were given all around before the couple who had arrived in the carriage yesterday appeared in the doorway.

“There they are!” Douglas said, welcoming them into the room. “Come in, I have several introductions to make. Jack, Catherine, Jaime, Aria, please meet one of my oldest and dearest friends, Grayson Buckley, and his wife, Celine. Gray, Celine, this is Jaime, my estate manager, and Aria.”

“Yes, I believe we met once, Mr. Buckley,” Jaime said as he shook Grayson’s hand. “At a gathering in London, though I am not certain you’ve met my wife, Aria. And I haven’t met Mrs. Buckley.”

“And this,” Douglas said after Jaime finished, “is my cousin, Jack, and his wife, Catherine.”

Cate’s heart rose into her throat as she waited to hear the man speak.

CHAPTER 20

“Pleased to meet you, sir,” Jack said as he grasped Grayson’s hand. Cate offered a wavering smile.

Grayson Buckley grinned broadly at Jack. “Certainly a pleasure to meet Douglas’s family.”

Cate’s chest collapsed in a long breath at hearing him speak. American. Not the man haunting her nightmares, she noted.

“Grayson, you and Catherine share a common nationality. I may begin to worry about an insurrection,” Douglas said followed by a boisterous laugh.

“Oh? American, are you?” Grayson said, his stormy blue eyes studying Cate.

She nodded. “Yes. I, too, hail from the other side of the pond.”

“Whereabouts?”

“Philadelphia,” she fibbed. “And you?”

“Massachusetts, north. A small town named Bucksville. I doubt you’ve heard of it. You’re from a far more civilized region,” he said with a laugh.

So, he was related to the family she’d read about in the Wikipedia article, Cate mused. Perhaps she could use this knowledge to track down more information on him.

Wilson announced dinner and they filed into the dining room. As was custom, Olivia took her seat one place left of the head of the table, Grayson found his place to her right at the table head. Jack sat to Olivia’s left. Aria sat on Jack's other side. She found herself placed between Grayson and Jaime with Celine next to Douglas, who sat opposite Grayson.

Cate glanced to Olivia for her cue on the direction of her first discussion. Olivia faced Grayson to begin a conversation. Following her lead, Cate turned to her right to talk to Jaime.

"Good evening, again, Mrs. MacKenzie," Jaime said with a broad grin. Cate couldn't help but notice how similar his smile was to Jack's.

"Please, call me Catherine," Cate instructed. "Have you lived in Scotland your entire life, Mr. Reid? Your accent is distinctly Scottish, it reminds me of Jack's."

"Indeed, I have. And please call me Jaime. I grew up in the town of Dunhaven. With Lord MacKenzie."

"Oh!" Cate exclaimed as she pretended not to know. "I did not realize Lord MacKenzie grew up in the area."

"Aye, born and raised in the town of Dunhaven. We were schoolmates."

"How interesting!" Cate responded. "And have you worked with him since?"

"No, Lord MacKenzie left the area, made his fortune then returned. He hired me on then."

"And do you enjoy the work? Managing the estate?"

"I do," Jaime answered. "I find it most interesting. And what about you, Catherine? How are you enjoying Scotland? Do you find it a large change from Philadelphia?"

"I am enjoying it very much. There is a vast amount of natural beauty to be appreciated here. It is quite different from my urban life."

"How did you meet Jack?"

"We were seated together at a dinner party my aunt hosted while Jack was in town on business. How did you meet your wife?"

"Aria is also a resident of Dunhaven. We knew each other for much of our lives. It was a good match since we both wished to stay in the area near our families."

Cate smiled at the statement as she caught Olivia turn toward Jack out of the corner of her eye. This signaled for everyone to turn their attention to the person on their left for conversation.

"Hello again, fellow American," Grayson said as Cate turned toward him.

“Hello,” she said with a smile. “I hope no one suspects we are planning a revolution. Seating the two Americans next to each other is quite a risk.”

“Indeed,” Grayson said with a chuckle. “We may be making them nervous.”

“Good fortune for them we are separated from your wife. Is she also American?”

“No,” Grayson informed her. “French, actually. Though, she lost most of her accent after our marriage.”

“Oh, how interesting. And what does one do in Bucksville, Mr. Buckley?”

“Grayson, please,” he said with a broad grin. “My family owns a fleet of fishing ships there.”

“And is the town very large?”

“No, quite small. Very similar to Dunhaven. And nothing compared to what you’re used to in Philadelphia. In fact, my father would argue that Philadelphia is woefully overcrowded.”

Cate chuckled at the comment, more because of the definition of overcrowded in the 1790s. As they finished their conversation on their hometowns, the staff arrived with the first course.

The conversation turned to include the entire table.

“How are all our visitors enjoying Dunhaven?” Olivia prompted as she lifted her soup spoon to her mouth.

“I am enjoying it very much,” Cate assured her with a smile.

“As am I,” Celine answered. “The countryside is most beautiful. It reminds me of Massachusetts.”

“And do you enjoy it there? It must be quite a change for you,” Douglas followed up.

“But a welcome one,” Celine answered.

“Celine is originally from France, though she spent most of her life in Martinique,” Grayson explained.

“Oh, the island? Was life very different there?” Aria inquired.

“Yes,” Celine admitted. “Island life is quite different in some ways, and in others, no different.”

“Do you miss it?” Jack questioned.

Cate glanced at Celine as she answered. “No. After my father’s death, Martinique held no charm for me. I much prefer Massachusetts. Or wherever my husband may be.” She shot a glance to Grayson with a smile.

“Oh, yes, terrible shame about Marquis Devereaux,” Douglas answered. “Our deepest condolences, Celine.”

“Thank you,” she answered with a curt smile.

“Grayson, how is your cousin, Alexander? Still enjoying life across the pond?” Douglas asked, changing the subject.

“Indeed. He is quite well. The exterior of his new home was nearly complete when we departed. He anticipated it to be finished before winter set in. Then they would begin work on the interior.”

“And it is a replica of your estate here, is it not?” Olivia inquired.

“Yes, of the country estate. He has copied every detail. A piece of England in his new home, he says.”

“How interesting,” Cate added.

“Yes. If you and Mr. MacKenzie venture back to your home, you must visit with us. Though I warn you the journey to upper Massachusetts may prove arduous.”

“Thank you,” Cate replied. “I am certain the excursion is well worth it.”

The conversation turned to the weather and the surrounding area. Cate learned little more about the Buckleys or the time rips. Douglas’s plan to bring it up after the ladies left the party meant she would likely learn nothing.

As the meal ended, Olivia suggested the women retreat to the sitting room, leaving the men to discuss business. The ladies settled on the sofas near the roaring fire.

“How long were you at Grayson’s home, Celine?” Olivia inquired as they settled.

“We stayed a short while. Gray’s mother fell ill. We departed shortly after her recovery.”

“To leave again so shortly after all the traveling you did for your honeymoon, you must be quite worn out!” Olivia answered.

“I do not mind,” Celine answered. She turned her attention to Cate. “Catherine, it seems you do a fair amount of traveling also.”

Cate nodded and smiled. She swallowed hard, trying to compose herself. The women’s ice-blue eyes seemed to gaze through her. “Yes. Jack’s business requires a fair amount of traveling. Though I do not mind it either.”

“I am afraid Aria and I are rather homebodies,” Olivia admitted.

“Yes, I have barely traveled to London,” Aria admitted. “Though I believe I much prefer the Scottish countryside. I am afraid I am not fond of larger cities. I suppose it is what one becomes used to.”

“Grayson’s father expresses a similar sentiment about cities,” Celine answered.

“Douglas and I traveled a fair amount, though I prefer to remain settled. At least at this stage of life.”

“You certainly have a lovely home to remain settled in,” Cate offered.

“Douglas spared nothing when it came to the building of Dunhaven Castle,” Olivia answered. “The result is quite lovely. I wondered, or rather worried when he told me of this grand plan what the outcome may be.”

“It is quite lovely,” Cate agreed.

“I agree,” Celine added.

Olivia paused a moment then sighed. “I hope the loveliness outweighs the oddities.”

“Oddities?” Celine questioned.

“Yes,” Olivia informed her. “Some of the castle’s occupants, including Douglas, have experienced strange events. The town is stirring with rumors of a haunting or cursed land. One of our maids claims she saw a woman wandering the halls. She fled in the middle of the night, leaving a note behind calling Dunhaven Castle a cursed place.”

“Surely nonsense,” Cate said. “Stirred by the enormity of the castle. It must produce illusions.”

“I quite agree,” Olivia answered. “I hope the matter soon is closed with a simple explanation.”

The conversation ceased for a moment before turning to spring blooms and flower shows. The men rejoined them after another forty-five minutes. Conversations remained light until the post-dinner drinks broke up.

After wandering through the upstairs halls to make it appear they were going to bed, Cate and Jack snuck to Douglas’s secret lab and returned home.

They returned to their time exactly thirty-two minutes from the moment they departed. Jack breathed his customary sigh of relief.

“Whew!” Jack exclaimed. “Another successful mission.”

“How did your post-dinner discussion go?” Cate inquired.

“Wow, right into it, huh? Do I at least get to change my clothes?”

Cate raised her eyebrows at him. "Okay, okay. I'll let you get out of the monkey suit."

"Thanks. And besides, shouldn't you already know the outcome, Madame Fortune?"

"I want to hear it from the horse's mouth."

"I hope you'll return the favor and let me in on the secret women's meeting."

"Of course. The floral shows will blow your mind."

"Ooooh, I'll change as fast as I can!"

They parted ways with the plan to meet in the library after changing their clothes. Cate wandered into the room long after Jack had slumped into his favorite leather armchair. Riley bounded toward him and leapt into his lap. Bailey followed, choosing to remain on the floor but propped his front feet on Jack's legs for a petting.

"Hello, boys," Jack said. "I'm glad you missed us even though we were only gone for half an hour."

"Crazy, isn't it?" Cate said with a sigh as she collapsed into the chair next to Jack.

"And exhausting. So, post-time travel analysis. What have we learned?"

"We have learned that Grayson Buckley is NOT the man haunting my nightmares."

"Right, he's American! I did not see that coming! So, he's innocent."

"He is," Cate answered.

"You don't sound happy about that."

Cate sighed as she considered the statement. "I guess I'm not. We've ruled out Grayson Buckley, the only suspect we had for this guy's identity. So, we're no closer to finding who this is. Which means we're no closer to solving that mystery."

"We're also no closer to solving the mystery of the time rips turning into time slips," Jack added.

"Nothing came out of your meeting of the minds following dinner?" Cate inquired.

"I'm going to point out again that you know the outcome of this conversation. You've read it already, haven't you?"

"Perhaps his account wasn't accurate. Besides, I'd love your take on what happened."

“Douglas laid out the odd events, beginning with misplaced items. Then he overheard phantom music and conversations. And finally, the events escalated to physical manifestations. A maid witnessed a woman in the front hall and then Douglas also began to see people.”

“Did anyone offer any explanation?”

“I went with the standard haunting scenario.”

“And Douglas did not agree.”

“He did not. It’s almost like you know what happened.”

Cate narrowed her eyes at him. “Please, continue.”

“Douglas said ghosts were windows into past lives, but he believed the events they experienced were windows into the future.”

“How did Grayson Buckley react to that?”

Jack shook his head and pursed his lips for a moment before speaking. “He didn’t say much. He offered to run it past Celine, then suggested we join the women.”

“Did his reaction seem odd?”

Jack shrugged. “I suppose in thinking about it, yes, it did. Though perhaps he doesn’t know anything about it.”

“This is the man Douglas pinned most of his hopes on. He wanted to run this past Grayson because of his supernatural experience. What does that even mean? And why was Grayson so quiet on the subject?”

“In retrospect, yes, it seemed like he wanted to avoid the subject. Perhaps he didn’t want to speak candidly in front of Jaime and me. And, yes, Douglas asked if Grayson ever ran across anything like this in his ‘dealings.’ That’s an odd statement. What type of dealings does someone have that involve time travel?”

“That’s exactly what I wondered!” Cate answered. “What supernatural dealings do the Buckleys have?”

“You talked to him at dinner. Did he say anything interesting?”

“Not much. He is from Bucksville. I found a Wikipedia article about the town before we left. Maybe I can use that to track down more information about him.”

“And his wife is from Martinique.”

“Yes, and the daughter of a Marquis! She must be someone. What supernatural dealings could they have? Perhaps he’s referring to the island customs, voodoo.”

“Voodoo? Like pins in dolls?”

"It's a bit more subtle than that, but yes. Caribbean islands were well-known for voodoo customs."

"Could be that, then. But why would Douglas assume that could help with his glimpses into the future?"

"I'm not sure," Cate admitted with a sigh.

"Did you learn anything interesting from the women?"

"Not really. Olivia mentioned the supposed hauntings. She hoped it would die down soon. Rumors are abounding in town."

"That's it? Nothing else?"

"Not really," Cate said with a shrug. "Though..." Her voice trailed off as she crinkled her brow.

"What?"

"It's nothing," she said as she waved her hand in the air to dismiss the idea.

"What? Come on, Cate. Don't hold back now."

Cate shrugged again. "It's probably stupid but... there's something odd about Celine."

"She's French. It's how they are."

Cate giggled at the statement. "That's not true. No, it's something else. She asked me a question and when she looked at me it was like she could see right through me."

"It's the voodoo."

"I guess time will tell."

"Well, if you get any odd pains anywhere, we'll know who to suspect first."

"Very funny," Cate said with a groan. "I certainly hope not."

"I certainly hope we get more information and soon. The way Douglas talked, the uncontrolled time rips seem to escalate. We need a solution and fast."

"I'll work more on the journals tomorrow. I'm not sure I can concentrate after our double day."

"Tomorrow's a new day, Cate. Get some rest. Besides, it's nearly time for dinner!"

"Second dinner, you mean," Cate corrected.

"Yep, second dinner. The best part of time traveling. Repeat meals!"

"Speaking of time traveling..."

"We should go back tomorrow. We need to keep searching for answers."

“I agree,” Cate answered. “I’ll translate journal three in the morning, and we can travel back for dinner again. How’s that?”

“Works for me,” Jack said with a groan as he pushed himself out of the armchair. “I’d better be heading down for that second dinner.”

“Enjoy,” Cate said as he moseyed across the room.

Cate ran through the castle’s halls. She stumbled down the main staircase in a desperate attempt to flee. She pushed through the sitting room doors, tugging her dress’ train behind her. With wide eyes, she searched for a hiding spot.

Footsteps followed her. Cate raced across the room and sank behind the sofa. She crawled under the slim console table, realizing its narrowness would fail to hide her completely.

Men’s shoes clacked across the hardwood floor. They stalked into the room slowly and deliberately. The noise stopped. Cate held her breath. Her pulse raced and her hands trembled as she bit her lower lip.

The footsteps commenced again. They approached her hiding spot. She spied legs coming around the sofa. The man stopped again. After a moment, he spun, his footsteps receding across the room.

“Soon, Catherine, soon,” the man said. His footsteps departed into the foyer. As the front door banged shut, Cate awoke.

Another nightmare, Cate reflected as her heart returned to normal speed. This one came with a warning. The man’s words rang in her mind.

Soon, Catherine, soon.

CHAPTER 21

Cate set her cup of tea next to her laptop as she blew out a shaky breath. Her nightmare last night still bothered her, particularly the ominous warning. His words rattled through her mind. Soon, Catherine, soon.

Cate shuddered as she pulled a shortbread from the saucer, a preemptive reward for her decryption work this morning. She nibbled on one as she popped her laptop open, shoving the nightmare from her mind, forcing herself to concentrate on her work.

She'd spent yesterday morning entering ciphertext from the third journal into a document but hadn't decrypted it yet. She planned to begin that process now. With any luck, she'd learn more about how to control the time rips, the curious Buckleys, or anything that may help them.

Cate copied several pages of text into the decipher program and clicked the "GO!" button. A colored circle spun around and around as she waited for decoded text to appear. She took another sip of tea and enjoyed more of the shortbreads. Molly's latest batch tasted fantastic. She made a mental note to pass her sentiments along to Molly when she saw her next.

After another few moments, text filled in on her screen. She copied it to her decrypted document. She started another round with the program as she read the next journal entry.

Having a laboratory in the castle is simply glorious! I have spent several days working on my inventions. With my own space, Olivia can no longer lament my materials lying about. It has caused something of an awakening in me. Ideas now swirl in my mind constantly. I have the room to draft their sketches and work on multiple projects at once.

And I have finally begun on my larger projects! Projects for which our previous abodes did not provide sufficient space. Indeed, my stairway project is shaping up quite nicely, though it has produced no results yet. And my seclusion chamber is nearly ready for use. I wonder if results will be more readily forthcoming from it.

I shall try it soon. Jaime insists I should not, but I cannot see the harm in it. Today's project is something quite different. I am attempting to produce a light source without fire. I believe it would be a most useful invention as using flame for light can be tedious.

Cate's brow furrowed as she read the start of the entry. She glanced at the journal from which she'd copied it. She paged to the back cover. Had she selected the wrong journal? Was this not the next journal?

She narrowed her eyes, spotting the small "3" penciled into the bottom corner of the interior back cover. She checked the other journals but found no other threes among them. This must be the correct journal. The opening entry made no mention of Grayson Buckley, the time rips, or anything related to the final entry in the second journal.

Cate scanned the remaining text in the passage. It discussed Douglas's first attempt at creating a lightbulb and his findings. No mention of anything that could help them existed in what she had decrypted.

Behind her text document, the decryption program announced the completion of the next set of text. Cate skimmed the text. She offered a frustrated sigh as none of it related to Douglas's discussion of the time rips.

As she considered her next move, Cate reached for her teacup. She took a sip, but no warm liquid reached her lips. She frowned down at the empty cup and saucer. Perhaps a refill would assist her in planning.

With her empty cup and saucer collected, she wandered the halls to the kitchen, lost in thought. Why had the journal jumped? Why did Douglas behave as though the time rips were suddenly unimportant? Why did his focus shift? And would she find more in the subsequent journals? Perhaps she should decode a portion of each of the remaining journals to determine if any additional information existed in them.

Cate resolved to try that tactic as she moseyed down the hall to the kitchen.

She found Mrs. Fraser and Molly enjoying their cuppa.

“Oh, Lady Cate! I could have collected the teacup,” Mrs. Fraser said as she entered.

“I’m actually looking for a refill,” Cate answered.

“Research going that good, huh?” Molly joked.

Cate nodded as she set the kettle on with fresh water to boil. “That’s about the size of it. Oh, Molly, this latest batch of shortbread is really good!”

“Thanks!” Molly exclaimed.

“Aye, I quite agree, Lady Cate,” Mrs. Fraser answered. “The next test is to bake them with no supervision!”

The tea kettle whistled on the stove and Cate poured herself a fresh cup. As she dunked the tea bag into the steaming water, Jack entered.

“Okay, she’s all ordered. I got the one you liked and...” His voice stopped mid-sentence as he stared at Cate. “Lady Cate! What are you doing here?”

“My, that’s some greeting. It is her castle,” Molly teased.

“Aye, it is,” Jack answered. “But I don’t often find her in the kitchen of her castle mid-morning.”

“Just making a cuppa,” Cate responded.

“Didn’t you have one already?”

Mrs. Fraser guffawed. “When did you become the tea police?”

Jack ran his fingers through his hair and offered a nervous chuckle. “No tea police here,” he said with another chuckle. “Just... well, anyway.”

“So, what did you get ordered?” Cate inquired.

“Huh?” he questioned.

“When you came in you said you had gotten something ordered.”

“Oh, right,” Jack answered. “Manure. Yep, ordered the manure for the garden.”

Cate knit her brows and frowned.

“Not a pleasant conversation, you’re right,” Jack added.

“It’s not that. You mentioned you got the one someone liked. Who likes manure?”

“Oh,” Jack said with another nervous chuckle. “I meant the one the flowers like.”

“Oh,” Cate answered. “Got it. Yes, the plants probably do like manure. Well, I’ll leave you to your day!”

“Okay, bye!” Jack said. Cate offered him a confused glance, her eyes narrowed as she collected a few more shortbread cookies and returned to the library.

She spent the rest of the morning copying excerpts from half of the remaining journals. None of them mentioned any references to the timepiece, time rips, time travel, or the Buckleys. She slouched in her desk chair. Unless something changed in the second half of the journals, they’d learn nothing from these. Their only hope remained with traveling back to Douglas’s time.

The news would not sit well with Jack, she reflected, as a knock announced her lunch. She left the journals in favor of her favorite armchair during the meal.

Jack joined her following lunch. Molly departed with the lunch tray as he sank into the armchair next to Cate.

“Ordering that manure really wore you out,” Cate teased.

“Aye,” he admitted.

Cate narrowed her eyes at him.

“What?” he questioned.

“That conversation just seemed... strange.”

“Strange? No, just... I never talked to Gertrude about manure.”

“I see,” Cate murmured.

“Anyway, how’s your research going? Anything to help us?” Jack responded before Cate could say anything further.

“Well...” Cate began. Molly’s reappearance in the library interrupted the conversation.

“Molly?” Cate questioned. “Is everything okay?”

Molly stumbled into the room. Cate’s lunch tray remained clutched in her hands. White knuckles wrapped around each handle. Her jaw hung agape. Her eyes stared ahead without seeing. Her skin, normally golden and warm, was an ashy white.

“Molly?” Cate asked again as she climbed from her chair. Jack followed Cate as she approached Molly who stood unwavering in the doorway. “What’s wrong? What is it?”

Molly’s bottom lip quivered as she attempted to form words. Jack tugged the tray from her hands and set it on the desk as Cate guided her to an armchair.

Molly eased into it, still staring straight ahead. Her brows pinched together, and she frowned. Cate glanced at Jack as she perched on the chair's arm. She rubbed Molly's shoulders. "What is it, Molly? Are you not feeling well?"

Jack rejoined them, sinking into the chair next to Molly. "Molly, are you okay?" he questioned.

Molly took a deep inhale. Her eyes darted around the room before settling on Cate. She grasped Cate's hand then glanced between Cate and Jack. "I think... I think I just saw a ghost."

"What?!" Cate exclaimed. She shot a look to Jack. "Where?"

"I-In... in the hall," Molly stammered.

"Okay, Molly. Take a deep breath and calm down. Then tell us everything."

Molly nodded and pushed her hair behind both ears. She took a deep breath and blew it out before she continued. "I picked up your tray and stepped into the hall. I started down the hall toward the kitchen and... there she was!"

"She?" Jack questioned.

"Yes. Wearing a long dress. Old-fashioned. And her hair was swept up." Molly waved her hand behind her head to demonstrate.

"What was she doing?" Cate inquired.

"Walking. Just... walking. Toward the foyer."

Cate nodded. "Did she see you?"

Molly shook her head. "No, I froze. I didn't know what to do. I... I..."

"It's okay," Cate said, grasping Molly's hand and squeezing.

"I'm not crazy!" Molly burst out.

"I didn't say you were," Cate replied.

"Bu-but you said the castle wasn't haunted, but I think it might be!" Molly cried.

"Let's not jump to conclusions just yet," Cate soothed.

"I saw a ghost, Cate!" Molly shouted. "I'm sorry," she said in a trembling voice. "I'm sorry. I just... I saw something, Lady Cate. I saw... No, not something. A woman. I saw a woman."

"Funny trick of the lighting?" Jack suggested.

Molly shook her head but didn't respond. "We believe you," Cate assured her. "But I wouldn't get too worked up just yet. If you see her again, please tell us. I want to keep track of this."

“What are we going to do if she’s a ghost?” Molly breathed.

“Let’s cross that bridge when we come to it,” Cate said.

“She didn’t harm you,” Jack answered. “Even if she is a ghost, and I’m not saying she is, it may just be a nuisance, not a problem.”

“Yet,” Molly added.

“Molly, let’s not get too worked up. This could be anything.”

Silence fell over the group. Cate glanced at Jack. He gave a slight shrug.

“Let me get you a cup of tea,” Cate offered.

“I can run down for it,” Jack said.

“No,” Molly insisted. “No, I... I’m okay. You’re right. I saw something. I don’t understand what it was, but I definitely saw something. But it’s no reason to panic. It’s an old house. It could be anything. And even if it was a ghost, so what?! So I live in a haunted castle. At least I live in a castle.”

Molly stood on wobbly legs. She took a deep breath as she steadied herself. Cate leapt to her feet with her arms outstretched toward Molly in case she fainted.

“I’m okay,” Molly insisted as color returned to her face. “I better get this tray downstairs. Mrs. Fraser will be wondering what happened to me.”

“I’ll walk you down,” Jack said.

“No, no, I’m okay. I don’t need an escort.”

“Are you sure?” Cate asked. “If you’d feel better with someone going with you, one of us can walk you down.”

Molly shook her head and firmed her jaw. She squared her shoulders. “I’m good,” she stated with a nod and a snuffle.

“Okay, if you’re sure,” Cate said.

“I am,” Molly assured her with a smile. She retrieved the tray from the desk and stood in the doorway. After another deep breath, Molly disappeared into the hall. Cate snuck to the door and popped her head into the hall. She followed Molly’s retreating form.

As Molly vanished around the corner, Cate returned to the armchairs. Jack raised his eyebrows at her. “That’s not good,” he said.

“No kidding,” Cate answered as she collapsed into her armchair.

“These time slips are growing worse. Tell me you found something in those journals.”

“Nothing?” Jack sighed as he paced the floor. “How far are you from finding something do you think? Is he mentioning anything close to a solution?”

Cate remained silent for a moment. “That’s where things go from bad to worse.”

“What do you mean?” Jack questioned as his pacing ground to a halt.

Cate glanced up at him, fixing her eyes on his. “Douglas’s writing has ceased to mention manifestations, time rips, time travel, Grayson Buckley or anything relating to our problem entirely.”

“What?!” Jack cried. His eyes darted around the room as if searching for an answer. “What is he detailing in the journals?”

“His inventions. Journal three discusses his attempt to make a lightbulb.” Cate sank her head into her hands with a deep exhale.

“Oh, you’re kidding. Are they out of order? Did you miss a journal?”

“I checked! And I started to randomly pull excerpts from the remaining journals. I made it through half. Not a single reference.”

Jack collapsed into the armchair next to Cate. He shook his head in disbelief. Jack’s head dropped onto the chair behind him.

“I’ll keep checking both the other journals I haven’t tried and more excerpts from the ones I checked already,” Cate continued.

Jack shook his head at her statement. “We can’t depend on those,” he admitted. “We need another solution. We’ve got to step up our game in the past.”

Cate paused before responding. “But how? Douglas has his suspicions, but it doesn’t seem like he’s formed any final conclusions yet.”

“Perhaps we can nudge him in that direction,” Jack suggested. “I could tell him I agree with him. That I’ve been considering it and have concluded he is correct.”

Cate pondered Jack’s suggestion. “We could try. I’d be interested in finding out Grayson Buckley’s response to that. Both you and Douglas judged his behavior to be odd.”

“Perhaps he deems Douglas is crazy.”

“Douglas seemed to expect Grayson to be his biggest ally in this. Or at least for him to offer some solution, perhaps even have some experience with these situations.”

“If I reopen the subject after dinner tonight, perhaps we’ll get a clearer picture. If he ignores it again, we may have something. If not, perhaps we’ll finally figure out what supernatural experience this guy has.”

“Okay, there’s our plan. Our very weak plan,” Cate said with a sigh.

“At least it’s a plan. We’ll try our best to push Douglas’s discovery so we can find out how he controlled these time rips and hopefully use that information to fix our problem.”

“Before Molly sees another ghost.”

“Aye, before Molly or anyone else ends up in a time period not their own.”

“Meet you around four to head back?”

“Sounds like a plan,” Jack agreed.

Cate pulled on her eighteenth-century attire as worry creased her brow. Would they make any progress today? If they didn’t, what would happen? In both other instances when she and Jack had investigated in the past, it hadn’t spelled disaster if they failed. This time it may. The future of the castle may depend on their success. If they failed, the time slips could worsen. The castle could become uninhabitable, leaving anyone who chose to stay in it prone to trips to other centuries with no warning.

She finished fastening her dress and fussed with her hair. For the first time since her arrival at the castle, reluctance to time travel coursed through her. She feared failing. They would not fail, she promised herself. They could not. She pushed her shoulders back as she cemented the idea in her mind. They would solve this.

She gathered her train and navigated to the library where she found Jack.

“Ready?” He inquired.

“Yes,” Cate said, resolute. “Let’s go solve our problems.”

“There’s the spirit, lassie,” Jack said with a grin as they descended into the laboratory.

“Well, I suppose the burden lies on you. It is you who will be privy to those secret meetings of the male minds.”

“Complete with billowing clouds of cigar smoke and decanters of brandy,” Jack answered. “And don’t discount your work, Lady Cate. Flower shows are serious business!”

Cate narrowed her eyes at him as she suppressed a giggle. She held out the timepiece. "Here we go!"

They activated the timepiece and the second hand slowed to a crawl. The lights blinked out, replaced by the blackness characteristic of the closed-off, secret room. They snuck from the lab, through the library, and into the foyer before climbing the stairs to their bedroom.

Once inside their bedroom, Cate discovered a note addressed to them both. She flipped open the folded paper.

Jack and Catherine - I hope your business is progressing well. You are going to run poor Catherine ragged with your traipsing about the countryside! I jest, though I'm certain Olivia would enjoy seeing Catherine for tea.

I do hope we shall see you today for dinner. We have another guest joining us. Quite unexpected but it should prove most entertaining for the group! I should very much like for you to meet him.

If you return in time, please do not delay in presenting yourselves for dinner.

- Douglas

Cate read the note aloud as Jack peered over her shoulder at it.

"Ohhh, a mystery guest!" Jack exclaimed. "Wonder who this guy is that Douglas is so interested in introducing us to?"

She pursed her lips as she considered the note. "Another relative?"

"I hope it's not someone who needs a land attorney."

Cate giggled at the prospect. "Tell him you have too many clients already."

"Good plan, Lady Cate. Plus, my real talent lies in criminal law, not land."

"If it's a relative, I hope it's not someone who knows the family well. Our cover could be blown!"

"Let's keep our fingers crossed it's someone who needs a land attorney." Jack held his hand out. "Sorry, fellow, my client list is full," he practiced.

"Convincing! Well, I suppose we shouldn't delay dressing for dinner!"

"Don't want to be late to meet my newest client," Jack joked.

After changing for dinner, Cate and Jack arrived at the sitting room to await the meal. Olivia, Douglas, Aria, and Jaime awaited them.

“Good evening, Jack and Catherine!” Douglas greeted them. “I am so pleased you could attend!”

“We received your note,” Jack replied. “I am glad my business concluded in time.”

“As am I. We are most fortunate...” The arrival of Celine and Grayson Buckley interrupted Douglas’s statement. “Celine, Gray, good evening.”

“Good evening, Douglas,” Gray answered with a broad smile. “I understand we have more company this evening.”

“Indeed.”

“Additional family?” he inquired.

“No,” Douglas admitted. “Though I am most enthusiastic about this unexpected development!”

“Care to elaborate?” Jaime inquired.

“In due time, my good fellow, in due time.” Douglas poured cocktails for everyone. It appeared he intended to keep mum regarding the surprise dinner guest. Not family, Cate ruminated. Their cover should remain intact then. She pondered as she sipped her sherry who could induce this giddy reaction from Douglas.

As the dinner hour neared, Wilson entered from the foyer and offered a slight nod to Douglas. “Won’t you all excuse me?” Douglas said in a gleeful tone. “Olivia, would you please?” He motioned for her to join him in the foyer. With a grin on his lips, he hurried from the room with Olivia.

Cate stood and approached Jack. “Moment of truth,” she whispered.

“At least he’s not family,” Jack breathed.

Cate gave him a nod, her eyebrows raised to acknowledge the win.

Within a few moments, Douglas returned with another man. The man stood a bit taller than Douglas. Perfectly tailored clothing evidenced his lean form. His dark hair, tied back in a queue, topped his chiseled, regal features.

Cate witnessed a shared glance between the Buckleys. Were they familiar with the new arrival, she wondered?

“Ladies and gentlemen,” Douglas announced. “We have the wonderful fortune to have a duke join us under our roof. If you would all join me in welcoming Duke Marcus Northcott! Duke Northcott, please.” Douglas motioned into the room. “Allow me to fix you a cocktail and introduce you to our other guests.”

Duke Northcott offered a tight-lipped smile as he surveyed the room.

“Who the heck is this character?” Jack whispered to Cate as their eyes followed him across the room.

Cate glanced to the Buckleys again as she answered. “I’m not sure.” She narrowed her eyes as she noted the set expression on Celine Buckley’s face. Her husband wore a matching unimpressed look. “But it seems as though our new friends, the Buckleys, know him.”

Aria and Jaime joined the Buckleys near the fireplace as Douglas handed a scotch to Duke Northcott. They spoke a few words before Douglas motioned toward Cate and Jack.

He sauntered toward them with Duke Northcott in tow. “Duke Northcott, I am so pleased for you to make the acquaintance of my cousin, Jack MacKenzie, and his wife, Catherine.”

The man’s dark eyes flitted to Jack then focused on Cate. He studied her, a smile bordering on a smirk formed on his lips. His stare disconcerted her, but she forced a smile onto her face. Jack’s hand hung in the air as the Duke ignored it, directing his attention solely on Cate.

She offered him her hand, which he accepted. His fingers brushed hers, sending a shiver down her spine. Cate ignored her instinctive response. “A pleasure to meet you, Duke,” she said.

His eyes met hers. “Hello, Catherine,” he said in a crisp British accent. Cate’s heart leapt into her throat and blood went cold. Her stomach somersaulted and her knees went weak. Her hand trembled in his and her lower lip quivered as she struggled to pull herself together.

That voice. That haunting voice. The same voice from her nightmares. In two words, she had identified the man who had chased her, tormented her, haunted her for months. Duke Marcus Northcott.

CHAPTER 22

Cate swallowed hard as she forced a weak smile onto her lips. Jack cleared his throat and thrust his hand out further. “Duke Northcott, how fortunate we are to dine with you,” he said.

Duke Northcott offered him a displeased glance and murmured, “Yes.”

“Allow me to introduce you to the rest of the group,” Douglas offered, signaling for the Duke to move toward the group near the fireplace.

“Friendly guy,” Jack murmured. Cate gulped the rest of her sherry as she spun away from the newest member of their group. “Cate? Are you all right?”

Cate shook her head without answering. She bit her lower lip, her forehead creasing. “What is it? Are you sick? Do you need to sit down?”

Cate met Jack’s gaze. “It’s him.”

Jack’s brows knit for a moment before his eyes went wide. “Him? As in the guy in your nightmares? That’s him?” Jack whispered.

Cate offered a clipped nod and she swallowed hard.

Jack studied the man across the room as he greeted Jaime, Aria, Grayson, and Celine. “Our new friends seem to share your sentiments regarding Duke Northcott,” Jack commented.

Cate twisted to face the scene as she recovered from her shock. “Celine looked less than pleased when Douglas announced him.”

Jack surveyed the scene a moment longer. “Who is this character? Why would he be lurking around your subconscious?”

“And what history does he share with the Buckleys?” Cate added.

“Would you prefer to go? I could make our excuses. Say you felt ill. Caught the vapors,” Jack said with a wink.

Cate shook her head and squared her shoulders. “No. We need answers. We must see this through. Perhaps we’ll get a twofer! Solve both mysteries in one fell swoop.”

“You sure?” Jack inquired.

Cate nodded and let out a deep breath. “Yes.” She narrowed her eyes at the Duke as he chatted with Olivia and Douglas. “I need answers. WE need answers.”

“If you want an escape just shout “PICKLES” and I’ll make an excuse.”

Cate swung her head to face Jack, an incredulous expression on her face. “Pickles?”

“Yeah. It’ll be our signal word.”

Wilson entered and announced dinner before Cate could respond to Jack’s escape word plan. The group entered the dining room and found their seats. Cate’s muscles stiffened as she noticed her seat to the left of Duke Northcott.

She met Jack’s eyes across the table and offered him a grimace as she stepped toward the table. The chair slid in behind her. She turned to find Duke Northcott easing it toward her. She offered him a curt smile as she lowered to her seat.

The man took his seat next to her. Olivia turned to her left to speak with Grayson. Cate breathed a sigh of relief as she faced Jaime for their pre-dinner conversation.

“Good evening, Mrs. MacKenzie,” Jaime said.

“Mr. Reid,” Cate greeted him. “And how are you this evening?”

“Splendid,” he responded. “A most fortunate turn of events to welcome a Duke!”

“Yes, Douglas seems thrilled with the development,” Cate agreed.

“Aye, to welcome a Duke to his humble country estate in the highlands!” Cate held in a chuckle at the description of the large, ornate castle as humble.

“Duke Northcott is well-traveled. He should provide a most entertaining evening,” Jaime babbled. His enthusiasm brimmed.

“It seems the Buckleys are acquainted with Duke Northcott,” Cate began when Olivia turned to her right to speak with Jaime.

Their unbalanced party had left an awkward conversation between Douglas, Duke Northcott, and Celine, though from the corner of Cate's eye she noticed Celine remained silent. As they turned, Celine took the opportunity to speak with Jack, seated to her right.

Cate swallowed hard and forced a smile onto her lips as she faced Duke Northcott.

"Good evening again, Catherine," he said.

Cate found the tone of his voice disconcerting. After hearing it on a near-nightly basis, the mere sound garnered a fear reaction from her. She fought to keep her heartbeat steady and not shiver as he spoke.

"Good evening, Duke," she answered. "I trust your travel here was pleasant?"

"Rather tedious, however, I am most pleased to have arrived in this unique location. I imagine your journey to have been quite a bit more taxing."

Cate's brow furrowed at his statement.

"Your accent," he continued. "You are also American."

"Also?" she questioned.

"Yes, Buckley is also an American."

Cate noted the tone he used as he spat out Grayson's name and the lack of salutation that accompanied it. What history did they share, she wondered?

"Oh, yes," Cate answered. "Yes, though we are from very different parts of the country."

"Oh? You are not also from Massachusetts?"

"No, Philadelphia."

Duke Northcott narrowed his eyes at her. "Hmm," he murmured as though weighing her statement for its truthfulness. "And you married a Scotsman."

"I did, yes."

"An odd lot, you Americans. And how remarkable that two Americans should arrive at Dunhaven Castle at the same time."

"A happy coincidence in my opinion."

He narrowed his eyes at her statement. "Yes, well, you Americans are rather easy to please. Though..." He paused as his dark eyes studied her face. "There appears to be something unique about you, Catherine. I should look forward to speaking with you further during my stay."

Cate suppressed a shudder at the statement. The serving of the first course postponed any further conversation, much to her delight.

The dinner proceeded with light conversation. Celine remained quiet for much of the meal. Grayson interjected comments here and there, mainly aimed at Douglas. Duke Northcott's descriptions of world travel dominated much of the conversation. True to Douglas's word, his colorful stories passed the time despite Cate's trepidation about the man.

Halfway through the meal, she began to wonder why her subconscious mind seemed so terrified of him. He possessed an old-fashioned charm that made him rather likable. Still, she reflected, something about him distressed her. What?

She glanced up as she pondered the question to find Jack's eyes on her. He raised his eyebrows at her. She nodded to answer his silent question. She was okay.

As the meal ended, she found herself relieved to leave the men behind and escape Duke Northcott's side. As they settled in the sitting room, her mind remained in the dining room. Jack planned to brooch the subject of the manifestations haunting the castle with Douglas. What response would he receive, she ruminated? Would Duke Northcott's presence hamper their plan?

Aria and Olivia chattered about the Duke's colorful tales about a remote region in Africa. Their voices provided little more than background noise for a distracted Cate. Celine also remained silent.

Within moments, Grayson entered the room. The other men trailed behind him.

"Oh!" Olivia exclaimed, unprepared for the sudden entrance of their male counterparts.

Grayson stalked to Celine. "How are you feeling, darling? Would you prefer to retire early?"

"Yes, if you wouldn't mind. Olivia, I am so terribly sorry, but I am rather under the weather."

"Not at all!" Olivia responded. "I do hope you are feeling better tomorrow."

"Thank you," Celine answered as she clutched Grayson's hand and stood.

Jack entered as the two crossed the room to depart for the evening. He shot Cate a confused glance. She answered with a shrug.

“Leaving?” Douglas questioned as he entered with Duke Northcott.

“Yes, please accept our apologies,” Grayson responded. “Celine has been feeling unwell. I suggested she rest.”

“Of course. I hope you improve soon, Celine,” Douglas said.

Jack poured himself a drink as the Buckleys said their goodnights to their hosts. Cate joined him at the drink cart. “That was quick,” she whispered. “I’m guessing you had no luck.”

“Not a shred,” Jack answered. “I didn’t even get the words out before I was interrupted.”

“Grayson seems intent on getting Celine out of here.”

“Is she that sick, do you imagine?”

“No,” Cate answered. She narrowed her eyes as she followed the departing forms of Grayson and Celine Buckley. “No, I don’t think she’s sick at all.”

The group spent another forty-five minutes chatting before Duke Northcott announced his departure. Cate and Jack spent another few moments with the remaining group before taking their leave, feigning fatigue from their business earlier.

“Should we head straight to the library?” Jack inquired as they stepped into the foyer.

“Yes,” Cate agreed. “While the remaining group is still accounted for.”

As they proceeded toward the library, angry, hushed whispers carried down the hall. Cate ceased walking mid-step. She held her finger to her lips and signaled for Jack to listen.

The voices seemed to come from around the corner. Cate tiptoed toward the other hallway. Jack crept behind her. She ducked into a parlor and hurried across the room. Two large double doors on the adjacent wall opened into the other hallway. She eased the door open a crack and peeked out. Jack hovered behind her, peering over her head.

“Is that...” he began.

“Celine Buckley,” Cate answered. “With Duke Northcott.”

Celine’s posture was stiff and her jaw set. “Why did you follow me here, Marcus?” Celine demanded.

“You already realize the answer to that question, Celine,” Duke Northcott answered.

“Leave, Marcus. Stop making a fool of yourself.”

Duke Northcott grasped her by the arm and dragged her toward him. Cate shrank back from the door, her eyes wide as his quick and fierce actions startled her.

“Do not presume to tell me what to do, Celine. I shall be thought no more a fool than you who cannot settle in one place for more than months at a time. People will begin to wonder, dear, what you are running from?”

“Or who,” Celine spat at him.

“Unfortunately for you, my reputation precedes me. It opens doors for me. Yours does not.”

“You overestimate your appeal, Marcus. Though you always have.” Celine wrenched her arm from his grip. “There is nothing for you here. Go.”

Duke Northcott straightened his cravat and smoothed his jacket. A smirk crossed his lips. “Au contraire, my dear. There is something odd here. There is a reason you came here.”

“To escape you!”

Duke Northcott rolled his eyes at the statement. “When will you cease this charade and take your rightful place? Your behavior is childish.”

“I will never stand beside you.”

“Very well, Celine. Insist all you’d like but you know the score. I shall not leave unless you are at my side. Besides, something draws me here. There is something that intrigues me. And I shall not leave until I determine what it is. I suggest you learn to manage your emotions, though, unless you plan to embarrass Buckley by leaving every dinner party early.”

Celine set her jaw. “There is no managing my enmity toward you!” she hissed before she stormed down the hall.

Duke Northcott stared after her for a moment before he retreated in the opposite direction. “Wow,” Cate whispered.

“Yeah, no kidding,” Jack answered.

“Those two definitely have a history.”

“Must be a humdinger, too!”

“Come on,” Cate urged. “Let’s get back home and discuss what we’ve learned so far!”

They checked the hallway before darting down it to the library. They descended into Douglas’s unoccupied laboratory and returned to the present. After changing into their normal clothes, they met in the library to discuss the dinner party and their next steps.

Jack collapsed into his favorite armchair with Riley in his lap. Cate collected Bailey and eased into the chair next to him.

“Well,” Jack began. “One mystery down, two to go.”

Cate reflected on his statement. “Duke Marcus Northcott. So, he is the man haunting my dreams.”

Jack nodded. “That’s the one solved.”

“But why?” Cate questioned.

“And that’s one of the mysteries yet to be solved. The other is the time rips and how to control them.”

“Yeah, what happened at your man meeting? Grayson popped in way earlier than anyone expected!”

“I’m afraid that may be my fault,” Jack responded.

Cate raised her eyebrows. “Really? What in the world did you say?”

“Nothing!” Jack exclaimed.

Cate puckered her lips at him, prompting him to continue. “Really, nothing! We settled at the table after you ladies left. Well, most of us did. Grayson wandered around the room and settled in front of a window to glare out of it.”

“Glare out of it?” Cate questioned.

“That’s putting it mildly. If looks could kill, whoever stood on the other side of that window would have been dead.

“Anyway, I started to bring up the discussion from last night. I got the words, ‘Douglas, about your theory from last night’ before Grayson interrupted me.”

“What did he say?”

“We shouldn’t dwell on that. Not with someone as illustrious as Duke Northcott in our midst. I propose, gentleman, we disband and rejoin the ladies. And with that, he was out the door. Douglas seemed a bit puzzled, and he stammered around a bit but suggested we follow Grayson’s lead.”

“So, you did not speak about anything involving the time rips at all.”

“Not even for a second,” Jack admitted.

“Ugh,” Cate groaned. “This is frustrating. We’re making no progress on any front!”

Jack nodded as he stared at the crackling fire in the fireplace. “We need to keep at it. Before Molly ends up in another century again.”

Cate sighed. “I suppose we’re back at it tomorrow with another dinner party.”

“Should I try to bring it up again?”

Cate pursed her lips in thought before shrugging. “Maybe?”

Jack slid his eyes toward her. “You okay?”

“Yeah,” Cate admitted.

“You sure? You seem... distracted. Perhaps your midnight visitor is still rattling around in your mind?”

“That’s another front we need some progress on. I’m going to do a little more research on him and both Buckleys. See if I can find anything. Why is he chasing me around in my sleep? Who is this guy? And what is his connection to me?”

“Did you learn anything from him during your dinner conversation?”

“Nothing other than he’s quite a snob. And he seems to hold a heavy dislike for Grayson Buckley.”

“Not surprising. It sounds as though he has a history with Grayson’s wife.”

“Unrequited love? You imagine he was after her and she turned him down for Grayson Buckley?”

“It seems likely,” Jack answered. “Celine asked him why he followed her.”

“And he told me they were well-acquainted.”

Jack raised his eyebrows. “Ooooooh, now we get all the bawdy details!”

“And he seemed to be quite surprised that Grayson and I were not acquainted.”

“Really? He can’t possibly think America is that small. He’s well-traveled, he seems to have a good understanding of the world.”

“Yes, I found it odd, too. He acted almost as though I was being disingenuous with him.”

“All right, so tomorrow’s plan is to learn more about this Duke Northcott guy and see if we can push the time rip conversation to a place where we can gain some information.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “And in the meantime, I’ll continue to work on researching these people and deciphering a few more excerpts from the journals.”

“Sounds like a plan. Same time, same place tomorrow?”

“Same time, same place!”

Cate pulled her laptop onto her lap after dinner. Her eyes threatened to close with each blink, but she was determined to seek information on the people visiting the castle in 1792. With a deep sigh, she opened her search engine and began searching for information on the people she and Jack had recently met.

Her previous searches on Grayson and Celine Buckley had resulted in very little. She used the additional facts they'd learned, however minimal, to tease any information she could from the internet.

Douglas had mentioned the Marquis Devereaux's untimely death. Cate entered his name into her search bar. The first result was a Wikipedia article detailing the governors of Martinique in colonial times. Cate scanned the list finding Marquis Gaspard Devereaux listed from 1774 to 1786. She clicked his name and scanned the brief article.

Outside of detailing his major accomplishments as governor, the article also described his untimely death. The man was murdered on 1 August 1786 as he traveled to board a ship bound for France by a seaman in a botched robbery.

While intriguing, the article provided no information about Celine or any of the others. With heavy eyelids, Cate pushed the laptop closed. She'd try when she was fresh in the morning. Despite the early hour, her extended day caught up to her. She took one final walk with the dogs as the setting sun painted the western sky.

Cate stared at her laptop the next morning. She'd performed a variety of web searches to seek information on her new old-fashioned friends. Outside of a handful of obscure references, she found nothing.

She stared out the window with her chin cupped in her palm. She'd need to try a new avenue. She toggled her laptop screen on again and navigated to several historical records databases.

She began her search with Grayson Buckley. After several moments of searching, the database returned a birth record from the year 1760. The details on the record appeared to match with the Grayson Buckley she'd met.

Cate searched for his death certificate but found none. She expanded her search beyond the state of Maine, formerly Massachusetts, to cover the entire United States. After several moments the screen showed NO RESULTS. She tried again, this time using a worldwide search. The search wheel spun in an endless circle before the screen indicated a failed search.

She sighed and dropped her head. Missing records were not surprising though the result, or lack thereof, still proved frustrating.

She moved on to Celine Buckley née Devereaux. Cate found no records of her birth in Martinique. She tracked down a record in Lyon, France, but again, she found no death certificate. Where had Grayson and Celine lived at the end of their lives, she pondered?

Cate moved on to the third person of interest: her nightmare companion. She searched the United Kingdom for records on Duke Marcus Northcott. The search returned none. She knit her brows. No records at all, she ruminated? A man of his ranking surely was recorded. She expanded the search to other likely areas for his birth. She found no record of the man. Odd, she brooded, no documentation about Duke Northcott's life could be found. It was as though he didn't exist.

Cate sighed as she slouched in her chair. At a dead end with the investigation of the people of 1792, she moved on to processing excerpts from the remaining journals. After an hour of work, she had decrypted portions of three more journals. None of them mentioned the time rips or the timepiece.

With a frustrated groan, Cate slammed the laptop shut. She rubbed at her tired eyes. At the rate they were going, this would never be solved. She glanced around the room wondering how much longer they could inhabit Dunhaven Castle.

CHAPTER 23

Cate blew out a long breath as tears threatened. If the current state of events continued, her home would become uninhabitable. She bit her lower lip as she blinked away her tears.

“Time for a break,” she announced to Riley and Bailey.

Cate rose from her chair and stretched. She rolled her head around, easing the kinks from her neck. “How about a walk, boys?”

Riley leapt to his feet and raced to Cate’s side. Bailey climbed to all fours and leaned into a stretch before trotting toward them.

Cate strode down the hall and out the front door with both dogs in tow. They wandered to the loch.

Cate perched on the bank as the dogs frolicked nearby. She stared out over the calm water. It reflected the surfaces around them like a mirror. Cate spotted the castle’s image in the pond. Was she losing her home, she wondered? What would happen if they made no progress with controlling the time rips? Her mind went one step further. What happened if she made no progress in determining why Duke Marcus Northcott haunted her dreams? Would she not only lose her home but her mind as well?

As tears threatened, Cate stood from the bank and called the dogs to her. They would solve this problem. With a determined stride, she set off toward the castle. She wound through the back garden. Jack pounded in a few stakes to train a set of rose bushes.

“Good morning, Jack,” Cate called to him as the dogs dashed ahead to greet him.

“Good morning, Lady Cate,” he answered. “On a break?”

She nodded without speaking. “Well, that doesn’t sound good. Any progress?” Jack inquired.

Cate shook her head. “Not really,” she admitted. “I can’t seem to find any information on any of our new friends. And I worked on three of the six remaining journals and found no references to the time rips or the timepiece.”

“I wasn’t holding my breath on the journals giving us any information, but I thought at least you’d find something interesting on the Buckleys or that Duke. He seemed fairly well-known.”

“That’s where this gets weird,” Cate said. “It’s not that I can’t find anything interesting, it’s more that I can’t find anything at all.”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean there are no records of them. Nothing.”

“None of them?” Jack inquired.

“I found a birth record for a Celine Devereaux in Lyon in 1770 and one for Grayson Buckley in 1760 in Massachusetts, now Maine. But I can’t find any death records on either of them.”

“Is that odd?”

Cate shrugged. “Given the years they lived in, it’s not entirely surprising that records are missing. But I’m surprised to find nothing on them. Especially with their wealthy status.”

“And how about our newest snobby friend, Duke Northcott?”

“He’s even stranger. I can’t find a single record on him anywhere. It’s like he never existed. And that’s even more surprising than the elusive Buckleys. He’s a Duke. His lineage would have been kept track of! Those types of things were important to people in that era.”

“And still is to some!” Jack exclaimed. “But you’re right. This is odd.”

“So, we’re stuck. Yet again.”

Jack shook his head. “We’re going to have to step up our efforts in the past. I hate to pin all our hopes on Douglas, but he’s all we’ve got.”

“I agree one hundred percent, but we’ve got no choice. We have to get our information straight from the horse’s mouth.”

“And hope it solves our problem.”

Cate nodded in agreement. “So, I’ll see you at four for the next round.”

“Yep,” Jack agreed.

“All right, until then, I’ll try the last few of the journals. Come on, boys, let’s...” Cate’s voice trailed off as she glanced around. Neither dog was in sight. “Now, where did those two get off to?”

“Probably chasing each other around the garden,” Jack suggested.

Cate narrowed her eyes. “Or digging around in it.”

Jack winced. “Oh, yeah. They have their spot they love to dig.”

“And I’d bet that’s where they are,” Cate said with a sigh. “I know two pups who are going to need a bath.”

“Need help fetching them?” Jack questioned.

“No, finish your roses. I can get them.”

“Well, it’s almost time for lunch,” Jack responded. “I’ll finish this after.”

Cate began her walk to the side garden in search of the dogs. Jack trailed behind her. “Ah, now I understand,” Cate teased. “Lunch is calling your name.”

They rounded the corner and strode across the lawn toward the side garden. “Riley! Bailey!” Cate called.

Cate navigated to their favorite spot. There they found two dirty dogs. Riley crouched over a small indentation in the earth while Bailey pawed at it further.

“THERE you are!” Cate exclaimed in an exasperated tone. “What is it about that spot that is so intriguing?”

“Perhaps another dog buried a bone there in another era.”

“Maybe. If we ever solve the mystery of the misbehaving time rips, this is the next one we need to solve.”

“Lady Cate, I will happily solve this mystery if we can stop slipping in and out of other eras,” Jack said with a grin.

“You grab Riley, I’ll get Bailey.”

“And straight to the washtub for you both,” Jack said as he scooped a dusty Riley into his arms.

Cate spent her early afternoon hours translating more passages from the remaining three journals. The selected excerpts she processed made no mention of anything beyond odd experiments.

Cate sighed as she tossed the final journal onto the desk. She closed her laptop and headed to her bedroom to change for their upcoming trip to 1792. With any luck, they'd learn something there.

When she was dressed, Cate met Jack in the library, and they returned to the past. "Whew," Jack said as they arrived in their bedroom in 1792. He tossed himself across the bed. "I get nervous every time we have to use that timepiece."

"It seems to be working for normal time travel."

Jack picked his head up to stare at her. "Say that again."

"Huh?" Cate asked.

"Normal time travel. I never thought I'd hear a statement where we referred to time travel as normal. Yet it oddly makes sense."

Cate chuckled despite the dire situation they discussed. "I get nervous every time Molly retrieves my meal tray. I may have to walk it back to the kitchen myself."

"And incur the wrath of Mrs. Fraser? You're taking your life in your hands there, Cate."

"Better that than have Molly slip into who-knows-when again!"

"That doesn't solve the problem, anyway. You could slip into who-knows-when and then what?"

"At least I'd know what happened!" Cate countered. A moment of silence passed between them before Cate asked, "Hey, you're not wandering around the castle at night, are you?"

"Me?" Jack inquired in an incredulous tone. "No way. You couldn't pry me out of my bed with those time rips opening without warning! Are you?"

"No," Cate responded. "Not since the last time you found me asleep in the library. Although, a time rip exists in my bedroom that has opened twice already so if I don't show up for breakfast one day..."

"Look in the 1920s," Jack answered.

Cate nodded. "How you'll get there is another story."

Jack crinkled his brow. "That's a good point, Lady Cate. What if you did disappear? We'd have no way of retrieving you. You're the only one who has access."

Cate sighed. "I'd love to duplicate this," she said, dangling the timepiece in her fingers, "but we have no idea HOW it works."

“No, we don’t. But with any luck, we will soon, lassie. But not if you don’t get dressed for dinner.”

“Jack Reid. The picture of optimism. Whoever would have thought?”

“Time travel changes a man.”

Cate and Jack changed for dinner and convened with Douglas, Jaime, Olivia, and Aria in the sitting room. Absent from the room were the Buckleys and Duke Northcott. Perhaps one or both of them departed, Cate mused.

“Ah! Jack, Catherine, welcome!” Douglas greeted them. “Catherine, I am beginning to worry about you.”

“Oh?” Cate inquired, uncertain of his meaning.

“It appears my cousin, Jack, is running you ragged every day! You’re both gone before breakfast!”

Cate smiled at the comment. “I quite enjoy seeing the countryside.” Douglas raised his eyebrows at her. “I’m an American,” Cate continued, “we are quite a sturdy stock!”

Douglas burst into laughter at Cate’s comment. “And very good sports,” he replied. His eyes turned toward the open doors. “Ah, here is the lion’s share of our remaining party.”

“Don’t let Northcott hear you say that,” Grayson answered. “He would argue he, himself, is the lion’s share of any party.”

Cate turned her gaze to the door as Grayson and Celine entered. Behind them trailed two men. Both tall, one with sandy blonde hair, the other with medium brown. The man with the brown hair glanced to Cate and offered a shy smile.

“And how are you both settling in? I trust your rooms are sufficient?” Douglas inquired of them.

“More than sufficient, very comfortable, Lord MacKenzie,” the blonde answered. “Thank you again.”

“No trouble at all, sir! What a joy to fill these rooms with our friends!” Douglas responded. He turned to Cate and Jack. “Catherine, Jack, please meet our newest arrivals! We have been most fortunate to receive so many unexpected but cherished guests! This is Michael and Damien Carlyle, Celine's cousins. Michael, Damien, this is my cousin, Jack, and his wife, Catherine."

Everyone greeted each other and Douglas offered drinks to the newcomers. Cate noted their American accents. She sipped her sherry as she eyed the newest members of their party. Michael and Damien Carlyle, she repeated mentally. Two new names to search. Perhaps these cousins would provide her with some lead.

Jack raised his eyebrows at her as the conversation flowed in the room. She returned the gesture. "Curiouser and curiouser," she whispered as they sat together on the loveseat.

The arrival of Duke Northcott interrupted much of the cocktail conversation. Cate surveyed the reaction of the Carlyles to his arrival. From their stiffened postures and lack of conversation, she judged them to share the same sentiments as their cousin, Celine. Their sudden appearance almost seemed as though she had summoned them for support. Of course, Cate reflected, that idea was ridiculous. In 1792, it would take months for word to even reach the American shores, let alone for them to travel to the highlands of Scotland.

"May I introduce you to Celine's cousins..." Douglas began as Duke Northcott entered the room.

He offered a smirk, adding, "We are acquainted."

"Oh. I hadn't realized," Douglas answered.

"More Americans," Duke Northcott grumbled. "We are beginning to be overrun, Douglas."

"Indeed, indeed," Douglas said with a hearty laugh, though Cate deemed Duke Northcott's comment less of a joke and more his actual sentiments.

Wilson announced dinner and everyone filed into the dining room. Much to Cate's relief, she found her seat between the brothers Carlyle. As Olivia chatted with Duke Northcott to her right, Cate and Michael discussed life in America.

"Also, an American," Michael noted as Cate turned toward him.

"Yes. From Philadelphia. And you?"

"Damien and I hail from New York," Michael answered.

"And you are cousins of Celine's?" Cate inquired.

"Yes. Rather distant, though since she has recently spent some time in the States, we have had the opportunity to spend more time with her."

“She is originally from France, is that correct?”

“Correct, from Lyon.”

“Life for her in the States must be quite different from both France and Martinique.”

“I would imagine so, yes.”

“And what brings you to Scotland, Mr. Carlyle?” Cate questioned.

“Business,” Michael responded. “Damien and I are furthering our fortunes with various investments.”

“What is your business?”

“Ship-building, mainly, though we are expanding our interests,” Michael responded.

Cate smiled at the response as Olivia turned, prompting her to begin her conversation with the man on her left, Damien Carlyle.

Damien smiled at her as she turned toward him. “Good evening, Damien,” she greeted him.

“Hello,” he said. “How fortunate to meet you.”

Cate furrowed her brow at the statement. “Because we are both Americans. We share that in common,” he explained further.

“Ah, yes,” Cate answered. “And you are from New York?”

“Yes, New York. Though we have recently spent a great deal of time on Gray’s family’s estate in Massachusetts.”

Cate nodded. “I have never traveled that far north.”

“You would very much enjoy it, I presume,” he said. “Perhaps one day, you shall.”

“Perhaps,” Cate answered. “How fortunate you were able to travel to Dunhaven when your cousin is visiting.”

“Yes, very. Gray mentioned a business venture to pursue when they left Massachusetts for Scotland. Michael and I decided to pursue it and traveled behind them.”

“Was your journey very taxing?”

“No, we enjoyed calm seas for most of the voyage.”

“How fortunate. Which ship did you travel on?”

Damien’s eyes widened and he glanced away from Cate. He stammered for a moment before Wilson arrived with the footmen to serve the first course. They did not return to the conversation. His hesitance stuck in Cate’s mind. Why had he reacted so strangely, Cate wondered?

As light conversation proceeded through the main course, Cate's mind dwelt on the new circumstances surrounding them. The arrival of the Carlyles threw another monkey wrench into the works. The larger party meant less ability for Cate and Jack to discuss the time rips with Douglas. And by extension, less chance they would retrieve the information they needed.

The rate at which new guests arrived, they would never have the opportunity to discuss this with Douglas. Cate found the dinner tedious given the new arrivals.

At the meal's conclusion, Grayson suggested everyone reconvene for nightcaps in the sitting room. It seemed he hoped to avoid the private conversation amongst the men once again this evening. No one objected.

As they filed from the dining room, Jack rejoined Cate. "Well, this is going to be tricky."

"You've read my mind," Cate breathed. "The Carlyles are a bit strange. And their presence doesn't help our cause."

"No. Neither does Grayson Buckley actively destroying any chance we have to discuss the time rips."

"We need a new plan."

"Yeah, and fast. But for now, it appears our night is a bust."

The group spent another hour making stilted conversation over post-dinner drinks. During the course of the nightcaps, Cate swore she caught Duke Northcott staring at her more than once. His gaze unnerved her more than she liked to admit.

After a tedious sixty minutes, the party broke up. Cate and Jack followed the other guests upstairs and navigated to their bedroom. They waited several moments before sneaking downstairs. After creeping down the hall and into the library, they accessed Douglas's lab and returned home.

"Whew," Jack exclaimed as they slipped back to their time.

"Not quite the sentiment I am ready to express but I suppose it's good to be home," Cate said with a sigh.

"Yeah, I'm frustrated, too," Jack answered.

"Change and discuss?" Cate asked.

"Yeah," Jack answered.

He took a step toward the wooden staircase leading from the lab when a quiver raced through the room. Jack stopped in his tracks and spun to face Cate.

Cate stared at him. He seemed to shimmy in front of her. "Jack!" Cate shouted.

"Cate?" he exclaimed.

Cate rushed toward him and grasped his hand. He pulled her close to him as the room shuddered around them. The lights flickered on and off, then began to appear and disappear. Darkness consumed them over and over.

Cate clutched at Jack, wrapping her arms around him. After a moment, darkness surrounded them. In the dim light, Cate glanced around then at Jack.

"Are we stuck?" he inquired.

"I think so," Cate said in a shaky voice.

CHAPTER 24

Cate pulled the timepiece from around her neck and listened. “I don’t hear any ticking. I can’t see the face to confirm it’s slow, though.”

“So, we’re back in 1792.”

“Yeah,” Cate agreed.

“And the timepiece won’t work, right? This is what happened to you before and it didn’t work.”

“Right.”

“So, now what? Do we just wait here until the time rip opens again?”

“We could try the universal rip. I never assessed whether or not that portal would work.”

“Okay, let’s try...”

A scraping noise sounded above them. “Shh!” Cate warned.

They glanced upward. Light shone at the top of the stairs.

Jack glanced at Cate, his eyes wide. “We need to hide!” Cate whispered. Cate searched the room for a hiding spot. “There!” She pointed to a partially built wooden staircase. She pulled Jack toward it and crawled underneath. Jack followed her. Together, they crammed into the tight space as footsteps descended the stairs.

“...interesting turn of events,” Douglas’s voice echoed throughout the space.

“Quite. A bevy of unexpected guests,” Jaime responded. “Olivia must be at sixes and sevens with the sudden change.”

The two men reached the bottom step and entered the space. Cate and Jack pressed as far under the wooden structure as possible. They peered between the risers as they held their breath.

"I have explained to her no one expects her to balance the party on such short notice."

"Not to mention the upset to the household, though. The poor woman must be overwhelmed with her first major house party turning into a widespread event."

"You've no sense of adventure, Jaime," Douglas answered.

"You've too much. How you take these things in stride is beyond me."

"There's not much else to be done, is there? And I do not mind the added company, though it rather impedes the conversations I intended to have with Grayson."

"The arrival of Jack MacKenzie did not stymie your crusade for information. What's changed?"

"Several things," Douglas replied. "The arrival of our additional guests for one."

"Two of whom are related to Celine Buckley. I shouldn't expect them to be shocked or bothered by the discussion."

"Perhaps, though there is Duke Northcott."

"You assume he will find the conversation ridiculous. Perhaps spread a nasty rumor about you?"

"No," Douglas responded. "It is something Grayson said."

"Oh?"

"Yes. He seemed most insistent we do not discuss it in his presence. You witnessed his reaction after dinner yesterday. And this morning he mentioned being cautious in retelling my tales in our expanded company."

"He seems to have a strong dislike for Duke Northcott."

"Yes, I gather it has something to do with Celine."

"A love triangle?" Jaime questioned.

"Something of that sort. I did not inquire after the details as I believe them to be none of my business."

"Indeed," Jaime answered. "And perhaps best left as a private matter. Though given the circumstances, perhaps Grayson's caution stems from his dislike of the man rather than any real concern."

Douglas pursed his lips as he pondered it. "I trust Grayson's judgment. We proceed with caution until we can discuss the matter privately."

“All right,” Jaime agreed. “I shall follow your lead.”

“Good. I hope to be able to discuss this further with Grayson soon.”

“Please keep me informed in the event he has any conclusions.”

“Yes, I will. Well, I suppose I should allow you to depart for the evening. The hour is growing late.”

“Aria will thank you,” Jaime said with a chuckle.

“Poor woman, I should not have kept you this long! Allow me to walk you out.”

The two men disappeared up the stairs. A scraping noise signaled the closing of the secret passage above. The room descended into near darkness. The dim flicker of a single lit wall lantern did little to fight back the blackness.

Silence consumed the dimly light space surrounding them. Cate let out a breath, realizing she’d been holding her breath for much of the conversation.

“Do you suppose it’s safe?” Jack whispered after several moments passed.

“Yes,” Cate answered. “At least I hope so.”

Cate grasped Jack’s hand and they crawled from under the wooden structure. “We have to go back, Cate, we have to go back! Should we make a run for the back hallway?”

“I guess so,” Cate answered.

“Okay, come on. Be careful.” Jack tugged her toward the staircase. They inched along in the shadows.

As they crossed the room’s center, a low-pitched vibration resounded throughout the room. Jack stopped dead, causing Cate to bump into him. “What is that?” he inquired.

“I’m not sure,” Cate admitted.

The noise sounded a second time before lights burst across the room. Cate squinted at the blinding glare, holding her hand in front of her eyes to shield them. Jack stumbled back a step as the brilliant flash seared his eyes.

After a moment, Cate removed her hand from her forehead. She gasped. “Jack!” she exclaimed, tugging on his arm.

“What is it?” he inquired, his eyes still slits.

“The lights!”

“Yeah, they’re blinding!”

“We’re back!” Cate cried. “We’re back!”

Jack opened his eyes and glanced around. A smile crossed his face. "The lights!" he shouted with a grin. "Come on, let's go before they disappear again."

"Agree," Cate answered.

They dashed to the stairs and climbed them two-by-two. Cate plowed into the library above with Jack right behind her. Each let out a sigh of relief as they glanced around the modern library.

"Oh, wow. Thank heavens," Jack blurted as he caught his breath.

Cate puffed with exertion from their race up the stairs. She nodded in agreement.

"We need a plan, Cate," he said after another moment. "This can't continue."

"I agree. It appears to be getting worse."

"Change and meet here to discuss an updated plan," Jack repeated.

"This time, let's hope we stay in this century-long enough to get that far," Cate responded.

They parted ways to change and returned to the library.

"We made it," Cate said as she hurried through the double doors, finding Jack lounging in his usual armchair.

"Yes, thankfully," Jack answered as Cate slumped into the chair next to him.

"Now for the plan," Cate replied.

"Do you have anything in mind? We need to speed up our information-seeking before this wobbling between centuries worsens."

Cate's shoulders sagged. "Not really. I can search for records on the two new additions to the group, perhaps. I'm not certain that will help us."

"No," Jack answered. "I'm not sure it will either. We need real information about the time rips. And that Duke guy and why he's stalking you in your dreams."

"The larger problem is the time rips. Let's focus on fixing that problem first."

"I'll take answers on either front, to be honest."

"Let's go over what we've learned."

"That's easy. Nothing," Jack retorted with disgust.

Cate shook her head. "That's not quite true."

"Were we at the same dinner party? The one hijacked by loads of new people so we couldn't discuss anything with Douglas."

Cate offered him an unamused glance. “Yes, smarty-pants, we were at the same dinner party. But we learned several things there and during Douglas’s conversation amidst our accidental trip back to 1792.”

“Care to enlighten me? Other than Douglas lamenting the inability to learn anything about the time rips, I didn’t glean anything. By the way, I am totally on his wavelength with that.”

“Douglas confirmed what we already suspected. Grayson Buckley does not want to discuss this with others around. Specifically with Duke Northcott present.”

“Right,” Jack said. “He neither trusts nor likes Northcott. Due to some love triangle with his wife.”

“We also learned that Douglas trusts Grayson’s judgment. Implicitly, it seems. He’s following his suggestion to keep mum on the subject.”

“How does this help us?”

Cate shrugged. “It helps us identify who we can trust. We can trust Douglas. And probably Grayson. Douglas trusts Grayson, so by extension we can trust Grayson.”

“What if Douglas is wrong? Perhaps that’s why there’s no more in the journals about his trusted friend, Grayson.”

“Even if that’s true, we can still trust Douglas. We’ve got to speak with him about the time rips.”

“But according to Douglas, he hasn’t learned anything from Grayson because he’s not been able to speak with him about anything because of the new arrivals.”

“No, but we can give him support for his theory and perhaps spur him to create the timepiece.”

“And tell us how he does it,” Jack added.

“That, too,” Cate agreed.

“As much as I hate to say this, we need to go back earlier in the day and try to catch him alone.”

“I agree, but can we do it?”

“With the time differential, yes. We make the excuse of errands in town or the like. Even if we’re gone twenty-four hours, that’s only a little over ninety minutes. No one would miss us.”

“Okay, so we go back earlier. What if we get nowhere with Douglas? From the sounds of it, Douglas doesn’t know anything more than when he brought it up to us a few nights ago.”

“Then we move on to Grayson and hope we can trust him. Douglas seems to be waiting on some information from him.”

“Do you expect he knows anything?”

Jack shrugged. “I’m not sure. Perhaps not. That may be why he hasn’t given any clue to Douglas.”

“Someone has to know something!” Cate groaned. “Douglas figured this out! We wouldn’t have this timepiece if he didn’t.”

“And no one seems to understand how,” Jack lamented.

“No, not even Randolph, his grandson, knew the secret. Why?”

Jack remained silent for a moment. “Perhaps...” His voice trailed off. “Eh, never mind, I’m just tired.”

“What?” Cate prodded.

“Perhaps Douglas never figured it out. Perhaps someone else did and gave him the timepiece.”

“Like Grayson Buckley?” Cate inquired.

Jack nodded and pointed at her. “You got it.”

“Even more reason to speak with Grayson Buckley,” Cate advocated.

“What about his cousins-in-law?” Jack inquired. “Do you imagine we’d have any luck trying to get information out of them?”

Cate shrugged. “I’m not sure. They are a bit strange.”

“Strange?” Jack questioned. “What do you mean?”

Cate considered the question a moment as she puckered her lips. “Something just seemed off. Nothing specific, just a gut reaction, I guess.”

Jack smirked at her.

“What?” Cate asked.

“Perhaps it’s the younger one. What was his name, Darren?”

“Damien,” Cate corrected.

The crease in her forehead deepened. “So, he’s friendly. So what? No, it’s not that. Here’s an example, I asked him what ship he and his brother crossed on. The question seemed to make him nervous, and he couldn’t answer it.”

“So?” Jack said.

“So, it’s 1792. They would have spent weeks if not months aboard that ship. You would expect they would recall the name. Especially given that he and his brother are in the business of ship-building!”

“Perhaps he’s terrible with names. Though I expect it’s nerves that has got him tongue-tied not lack of memory.”

“He seems friendly enough, but perhaps he’s backward,” Cate suggested.

“Or perhaps it’s the company,” Jack countered.

“You mean the Duke?”

Jack rolled his eyes. “No, I do not.” Cate pursed her lips. “Oh, come on, Cate. He’s always stealing glances your way, grinning at you, nervous when he speaks to you. He’s got a crush on you!”

“What? That’s ridiculous!” Cate argued. “We’ve just met. He doesn’t even know me.”

“It’s not. And he’s got eyes, hasn’t he?”

Cate offered a dubious glance in Jack’s direction. “I don’t agree. And even so, it’s too bad for him I’m a married woman,” she said with a wink.

“Darn right you are! Would be a terrible shame to ruin that perfect marriage to that perfect man.”

“And all over a dalliance with a ship-builder,” Cate joked.

“But perhaps that flirtation can elicit some information,” Jack suggested.

“Are you actually proposing that I flirt with Damien Carlyle to get information?”

Jack shrugged a shoulder. “I’m merely suggesting that if the opportunity presents itself, you may try talking a bit more to him. In an effort to impress you, he may slip up and say something useful.”

Cate raised her eyebrows. “If the opportunity presents itself, I’ll see what I can do. No promises, I still think he’s just the nervous type.”

“We’ll see. All right, so our plan is we return tomorrow, maybe after lunch. We seek out Douglas and speak with him. If that fails, we try to get any information we can from Grayson and his friends.”

Cate nodded. “Okay.”

“We should also inquire about Duke Northcott. Solving our time rip problem may not resolve your nightmare issues. We need to work on that, too.”

“I’ll admit he gives me the creeps. I caught him staring at me a few times after dinner.” Cate shuddered as she recalled his eyes on her. “He’s even more intimidating in person.”

“That’s why we need more information on him, too. Tomorrow afternoon. We start solving both our issues tomorrow afternoon.”

After eating a second dinner, this time in her own time period, Cate grabbed her laptop from the desk. Despite extreme sleepiness, she hoped to gain some information about the newest arrivals at Dunhaven Castle in 1792.

She forced her eyes to focus on the screen in front of her as she typed into the records database. A search for Michael Carlyle in eighteenth-century New York revealed nothing. A similar search for his brother, Damien, also yielded no results. She expanded the search to include other areas within colonial America but again found nothing. She tried a search of French records, wondering if they hailed from the same area as their cousin, Celine, but she found no evidence of that.

On a whim, Cate entered their names into the search bar of her browser. She turned up little more than a reference to a Michael Carlyle of Carlyle Industries, a multinational and modern corporation, not the shipbuilders of the 1700s. No mention of Damien Carlyle existed.

Cate slammed the laptop shut in frustration. They’d go back to 1792 blind. Again.

Cate stared at her open laptop as she ruminated over the lack of information she found on anyone they'd encountered in 1792. She puckered her lips as she stared into space, her finger tracing the rim of her morning cuppa.

A shrill jangling cut through her brooding. She grasped her phone and focused on the screen. The caller ID display read Isla Campbell.

Cate swiped to accept the call. "Good morning, Mrs. Campbell, how can I..." Cate began as Mrs. Campbell's excited voice interrupted her. Cate held the phone a short distance from her ear, afraid the noise may damage her hearing.

"Lady Cate!" she shouted on the other end of the line. "Oh, thank HEAVENS you answered. I took a chance calling you this early in the hopes I would not be forced to postpone my announcement. I have the most wonderful, exciting, outstanding news!" Mrs. Campbell paused a moment as she caught her breath.

Before Cate could speak, Mrs. Campbell gushed, "We have been selected to host the President's Ball!"

"Oh!" Cate responded as she processed the news.

"Isn't it simply wonderful? Oh, after all these years, I have finally achieved it! The President's Ball! Oh, we must start planning immediately! I've already created a list of items we'll need to discuss. With your anniversary party only six weeks before the ball, we'll have our hands full!"

“Well, congratulations, Mrs. Campbell! I hadn’t expected to hear the news until next week!”

“Oh, thank you, Lady Cate, thank you! I couldn’t wait to tell you the news! I had to call the moment I hung up with the selection committee. Apparently, they were so thrilled with our application, we clinched the spot without much discussion! Of course, we were the first to be informed.”

“YOU clinched the spot with YOUR application, Mrs. Campbell,” Cate corrected. “I can take no credit for it. I know you poured your heart into it before you submitted it. And your ideas are wonderful.”

“Well,” Mrs. Campbell said with a chuckle, “I’m sure your name added to it. Though I believe the ideas I’ve presented are exceptional, particularly compared to some of the previous events.”

“I have no doubt they are. You are a master of creating an event.”

“Why, thank you, Lady Cate. Now, when shall we begin our planning? I’m tempted to begin today, though I really need to vet through my ideas more carefully and gather some materials. In short, I am unprepared for today as tempted as I am.”

“That’s fine, Mrs. Campbell. Today is quite busy for me, anyway. Perhaps next week?”

“Yes. Yes, that should work nicely. Perhaps Wednesday if your schedule suits? That gives me several days to gather materials, samples, and the like. It’ll give us a nice start.”

“That’s perfect. Shall we plan for 9 a.m.?”

“Excellent, Lady Cate. I shall see you at 9 a.m.! Have a wonderful rest of your day. I know I will!”

Cate said her goodbyes to Mrs. Campbell and the line went dead as Mrs. Campbell disconnected the call. The woman’s excitement was obvious even over the phone.

Cate leaned back in her desk chair as she pondered the event. She imagined Mrs. Campbell flitting around, overseeing every detail. Guests meandered through several areas of the castle as they perused auction items. They commented on the beautiful backdrop the Scottish castle provided.

As they wandered among the displays, the room shuddered. A low boom resounded in the halls. Thunder sounded overhead. Rain poured from the skies. Shouts and startled screams emerged from the crowd as people began to fade away. Specters from previous centuries replaced them, stalking among the group as though they belonged.

The remaining event-goers shrieked in horror as friends and family vanished. Panic ensued. People raced from the castle in various directions. Chaos reigned as people fled from any exit they could find.

Cate bit her lower lip. They must solve the problem of the time rips before hosting any events. Before tragedy struck. She shook the disturbing images from her mind as she swallowed the last of her tea.

Instead of dwelling on them, Cate traversed the hallways and descended to the kitchen. “Knock, knock,” she said as she rapped her knuckles against the door jamb.

“Oh, Lady Cate! Need a refill?” Mrs. Fraser inquired.

Cate shook her head. “No, just returning my teacup.”

“There was no need for that. We could have grabbed it when we brought your lunch!” Mrs. Fraser assured her.

“Well, I have some news I thought I’d share, so I made the trek.”

“News?” Molly inquired.

Cate nodded. “Yes. I just got off the phone with Mrs. Campbell.”

A sigh escaped Mrs. Fraser’s lips at the mention of the librarian’s name. “What did the ninny want? I suppose to clutter your schedule with a discussion about linens. Or perhaps to debate lady locks versus eclairs.”

Cate chuckled at the assessment, all of which was plausible with Mrs. Campbell. “No,” Cate responded. “She called to inform me that we have been selected to host the Presidents’ Ball.”

Mrs. Fraser raised her eyebrows. “She finally did it.”

“That she did,” Cate said. “And she is more excited than I’ve ever heard her!”

“I can imagine,” Mrs. Fraser replied. “She’s talked about hosting this event for years.”

“We begin our discussions next Wednesday.”

“Next Wednesday?” Molly inquired. “I’m surprised she waited that long.”

“Aye, I cannae believe it either.”

“She aims to be prepared with various things before the meeting.”

“What meeting?” Jack asked as he pushed through the kitchen door.

“Isla has landed herself the Presidents’ Ball,” Mrs. Fraser informed him.

“Oooohhh,” Jack answered, his face a mask of dismay. His shoulders sagged as he processed the news. “You’re kidding?”

“Doesn’t sound like it,” Molly answered.

Jack grimaced, his lips forming a pout. “There will be no managing her on this one,” he muttered.

“We’ll have to do the best we can,” Cate said. “Oh, while you’re here, Jack, do you have a minute to discuss something?”

“Aye, whatever you need, lassie. Unless it’s a roller coaster suspended from the tower roof for the Presidents’ Ball.”

“No, it’s not that,” Cate assured him.

He followed her from the kitchen as she retraced her steps to the library. After a proper greeting to Riley and Bailey, Jack sank into his armchair. “This conversation isn’t regarding some outrageous request from Mrs. Campbell for her latest venture, is it?”

“No. So far, no outrageous requests. But we’re not meeting for a few days, so that gives her plenty of time to come up with a few.”

“Oh boy,” Jack groaned. “That’s more than enough time. I fully expect a rollercoaster that circles the castle and dives from the turret roof.”

Cate chuckled at him. “You may prefer the Dunhaven Castle Coaster to the information I have.”

“What is it?” Jack inquired. He snapped his head in her direction and stared at her. “You didn’t disappear into another time again, did you?”

“No,” Cate assured him. “Nothing that dramatic. Just more of the same. I searched for some information on our newest friends last night.”

“And?”

“And nothing. I couldn’t find a thing on them. No birth records, no death records. Nothing. It’s like they don’t exist.”

“Like Northcott,” Jack noted.

“Well, we don’t have nothing. You’ve got your beauty and witty charm to use with Damien,” Jack said with a wink.

“Oh, right,” Cate said. “No worries at all then.”

“Only a couple more hours to wait.”

Cate nodded without responding.

“What’s this? Cate Kensie not looking forward to time travel? Is this the first time I’m less nervous than you?”

“It might be,” Cate admitted. “I feel like no matter which way we turn, the walls are closing in on us. When I hung up with Mrs. Campbell, all I could imagine was people disappearing right and left from the party into various time periods. And people from those time periods popping into our party. Partygoers ran screaming from the castle and Mrs. Campbell's efforts were all for naught."

Jack leaned forward in his seat and reached for Cate's hand. He gave it a squeeze. "We'll get through this, Cate."

Cate's face scrunched with upset. "I feel like I'm losing my home."

"That's not going to happen," Jack assured her. "We'll get through this. We'll solve this. Together."

Cate took a deep breath and squeezed his hand. She nodded and offered Jack a weak smile. "You're right. Douglas figured this out once. We just need to get that information from him."

"And we're going to. In the next few days, if not today."

"Okay! Thinking positive," Cate said, broadening her grin. "See you at one-thirty?"

"One-thirty! Then we get answers!"

Cate spent the rest of her morning decrypting passages from the remaining three journals. Nothing pointed toward a solution to their problem. With a sigh, Cate closed her laptop, leaving any hope of a solution behind.

After lunch, Cate dressed for her trip back and met Jack in the library. "Let's go get some answers!" she exclaimed as they descended into the lab below.

"There's the Cate Kensie I know!" Jack said with a grin.

They activated the timepiece and returned to 1792. They tiptoed up the wooden stairs and peered through the peephole into the library.

"Olivia is there!" Cate whispered.

"Shoot!" Jack hissed. "Any chance we can sneak out without her realizing?"

"The bookcase makes a loud grinding noise when it opens and closes. She'll hear it. We'll have to wait."

They settled on the staircase to wait. "We really can't catch a break, can we?" Jack grumbled. "So much for our big plan to come back early!"

Cate grabbed his hand. "We'll catch one," she said.

The cold dampness penetrated through Cate as they huddled on the stairs waiting for an opportune moment to sneak from their hiding spot. A shiver passed through her, and Jack pulled her closer to him.

"Cold?"

“A little,” Cate admitted. “I didn’t prepare to be down here this long. I should have brought a sweater.”

“A famous Cate Kensie cardigan?”

“Something a little more period-appropriate, maybe,” Cate answered.

“With any luck, we won’t be down here much longer.”

They waited a few more moments before the sound of a door closing reached them. Cate leapt from her seat against the hard wooden stair and peered from the peephole.

“She’s gone!” Cate exclaimed as Jack hovered behind her. “Let’s go!”

They pushed through the secret passage into the library. “Now to find Douglas,” Jack murmured as they stepped into the hallway.

“The office?” Cate suggested.

“Let’s try it.” The pair hurried through the halls to the castle’s office space. They knocked at the door but received no response. Jack twisted the knob and pushed the door open a crack. “Douglas?”

He received no answer. He pushed the door open further. An empty chair sat behind the desk. “He’s not here,” Cate said with a sigh.

“Any other ideas?”

“Sitting room? I’m not sure.”

“We’ll head there and try,” Jack agreed. They backed from the office and navigated the halls. As they retraced their steps past the library, Wilson appeared in the hallway.

“Oh, Wilson!” Jack called.

“Yes, sir?” Wilson inquired as he ground to a halt.

“We are searching for Douglas. Would you happen to know where he may be?”

“Lord MacKenzie is away on business. He will not return until just before dinner, sir.”

Cate’s heart sank at the news. They really couldn’t catch a break, she lamented. “Is there something I may do for you, sir?” Wilson prodded when he received no response.

“No, thank you, Wilson,” Jack answered. “We’ll speak with him later.”

“Very good, sir. If you require anything, please do not hesitate to ask.”

Jack nodded to him, and Wilson continued his trek down the hall away from them. Jack shook his head at the development. “Unbelievable,” he muttered.

“Now what?” Cate inquired. “Should we wait for Douglas? Or try to find Grayson?”

“Maybe. Let’s... Let’s sit down and regroup. Discuss the pros and cons of moving on to Grayson without talking to Douglas first.”

“Okay,” Cate agreed.

Jack grabbed her hand and pulled her toward the sitting room. As they entered the foyer, the sitting room doors swung open. Grayson, Michael, and Damien strode from the room.

“Oh, Jack,” Grayson said. “How fortuitous to run into you. I had hoped to discuss some business with you. Do you have a moment?”

Jack glanced at Cate before clearing his throat. “Well...” he stammered. “Ah... actually, Mrs. MacKenzie and I were about to enjoy a walk around the property.”

“Might we ask you to postpone for a short while? My apologies, Mrs. MacKenzie.”

“Ah, if I may interject,” Damien said, “perhaps I could escort you on the walk. While my company may pale in comparison to Mr. MacKenzie’s, we can still take in the beautiful grounds.”

“Oh, well...” Cate hesitated as she glanced at Jack. He offered a slight shrug and a nod.

“We’ll walk the property tomorrow, dear,” Jack promised. “I am certain you’d enjoy company other than mine for an afternoon after all the business I’ve dragged you on.”

Cate forced a smile on her face, uncertain if this was the best plan. She glanced at Damien who offered her a wide smile.

“Excellent!” Grayson exclaimed as he motioned for Jack to follow him into the sitting room. “I appreciate your patience, Mrs. MacKenzie.”

Grayson clapped Jack on the back and slid his arm around Jack’s shoulders as he guided him through the sitting room doors. “Now, we have several questions for a man of your skills, Jack,” he said as Michael closed the doors behind them. He offered Cate a curt smile as she gazed at their disappearing forms.

Damien stepped into her line of vision. He still wore a large grin on his face. “Shall we?” he said as he offered his arm to her.

Cate gave him a soft smile as she wrapped her hand around the crook of his arm. “I have not yet walked the property,” Damien said as they stepped into the cool spring air. "Though the view from my bedroom window seems picturesque. Quite lovely. Rolling hills and all that."

The gravel crunched under their feet as they stepped onto the circular driveway. Damien scanned the horizon. "Which way? Do you have a preference?"

Cate did not so she suggested the path toward her favorite spot on the property in modern times: the loch. "Perhaps this path."

Damien nodded as they set off around the castle. After a few moments, Cate noticed his eyes sliding sideways to glance at her. She forced her mind to come up with conversation to fill the awkward silence. "So," she began as he said, "Have you..."

"Oh, my apologies," Damien said.

"No, please, Mr. Carlyle, no apology needed."

Another awkward pause passed between them. "You were saying?" Damien prompted.

"Oh, please, I believe you were trying to speak," Cate answered.

"No, no, please. Ladies first!" Damien said with a clumsy chuckle.

"Oh, ah," Cate stumbled as she sought to recall her inquiry. "So, you are from New York but your cousin, Celine, is from France?"

"Yes, just outside Lyon, though she moved to Martinique at a young age. French though, definitely. Not like me. I am American. My brother and me. Both of us. Americans." Cate held in a chuckle at his babbling. Perhaps Jack had a point. Was he nervous?

"How fortunate that she has moved to the States and nearer to you."

"Yes. We visited her once in Martinique, but Massachusetts is much closer."

"Indeed," Cate answered.

Silence spanned the next several steps. "It seems you are very well-traveled," Damien said to Cate.

"Oh, not very, no. Only from the States to Scotland."

"How did you meet Jack?"

"He was seated next to me at a dinner party."

"Oh, in Philadelphia?"

"Yes," Cate answered. "He was in the States on business."

Damien nodded at her. "And your business is ship-building?" Cate inquired.

“Yes, shipbuilding, that’s it. That’s my business. The building of ships! Big ships, small ships. All sorts of ships.” He offered another nervous chortle.

Cate scrunched her forehead at his statements. His behavior seemed odd to her. Something about him struck her as strange though she couldn’t put her finger on what it was. They reached the loch and Cate gazed over the water. This spot brought her such comfort in her time. In this year, though, her mind raced in a thousand directions.

How was Jack faring? What questions was he fielding? Could he fake his way through them? Would he learn anything that would help them? How long would she stand here with Damien before they returned? What could they discuss on the return trip? Could she elicit any information from him? Jack suggested she use an opportunity with Damien for this purpose. She felt unprepared to do so.

Cate pretended to gaze out over the water at the moors beyond.

“What a beautiful spot,” Damien declared after a moment.

“Yes, quite.”

“You’ve selected well,” Damien said.

“I’m certain every path leads to a beautiful spot,” Cate answered.

After another moment, Cate suggested they return.

As they meandered the path back toward the castle, Cate took a chance with a random question. “Are you well-acquainted with our other guest as well? Duke Northcott.”

She studied Damien’s reaction to the question. She swore his muscles stiffened and his jaw tensed. Did the dislike of the Duke extend beyond Grayson to the Carlyles as well?

“Yes, we are acquainted,” he said in a clipped tone.

“Have you...” Cate began as Damien interrupted her.

“You would do well to stay away from him,” he blurted.

The reaction surprised Cate, though she agreed with the sentiment. Duke Northcott unnerved her. But what bothered the Carlyles about him, Cate wondered?

“That is a bold statement, Mr. Carlyle. Is there an explanation behind it?”

Damien stopped walking and spun to face Cate. “He’s not a nice man. You’d be wise to stay off his radar.”

Cate's brow furrowed at his statement. She gazed at him with narrowed eyes as he resumed walking, tugging her up the path with him.

"How long do you and Mr. MacKenzie plan to stay?" Damien questioned, changing the subject.

"We are uncertain of our plans," Cate answered, her mind still pondering his previous statement.

As they approached the castle and rounded the corner to the front, Cate spotted a large carriage pulled by four jet-black horses stopped in front of the door. Damien's jaw tensed again. He ground to a halt.

"Perhaps you'd care to view more of the property," he suggested.

Cate shook her head. "I should return to ascertain if Jack's business is concluded."

"I am certain it is not. Grayson had several questions to discuss. My bedroom overlooks this side of the castle, and the gardens appear quite lovely. Let us..."

"No," Cate argued. "I am quite tired. I would prefer to return."

Damien hesitated. He glanced at the carriage again before he returned his gaze to Cate. He nodded and motioned for her to precede him into the castle.

They stepped into the foyer. The sitting room doors stood open. The room was empty. Cate's heart beat faster. Where was Jack?

"Catherine!" Duke Northcott's voice called. "Is that you?" She glanced down the hall to their right, noting a man's figure approaching in the shadows. Details of her many nightmares flooded her mind. Damien's reaction added to her sense of fear.

"Quick!" Damien whispered as he grasped her arm and guided her into the sitting room.

He pulled her through the room, his pace fast enough to cause her to trot to keep up. They exited through the other doors into another hall. Damien continued to tug her down the hall.

"Catherine?" Duke Northcott's voice called to her again.

"Come on," Damien encouraged.

Panic filled Cate. Her pulse raced and her head swam. Her breathing turned ragged as they continued their race through the halls.

Damien ducked into the tearoom. He eased the doors shut, locked them and backed away. He held his finger to lips.

Cate's apprehension grew. While the Duke caused unease, so did Damien Carlyle. He was not who he pretended to be. His comment earlier gave him away. He warned her to stay away from the Duke. He warned her to stay off his radar. An interesting choice of words, Cate ruminated, since radar would not be invented until the early twentieth century. One question burned in her mind as she stood behind locked doors, hiding from Duke Northcott. Who was Damien Carlyle?

CHAPTER 26

Cate stared at the man in front of her. He took a step toward her, and she inched backward away from him. His brow furrowed at her reaction. He stepped forward again. She backed up several steps.

“Stop! Don’t come any closer!” she warned.

“What’s wrong?” he asked.

“Who are you?” she demanded.

“Damien,” he answered.

Cate shook her head. “No, that’s a lie. You’re not telling me the truth.”

“I am,” he insisted. “I...”

“No!” Cate interrupted. “No, you’re not. Tell me who you really are, Damien Carlyle.”

“I...”

A noise interrupted Damien. The doorknobs on the doors Damien locked moments earlier twisted and turned.

“There’s no time for this,” Damien argued. “We need to go.”

Cate shook her head again. “I’m not going anywhere with you until you tell me the truth!”

Pounding sounded on the door outside. “Catherine!” Duke Northcott’s voice called.

Damien gulped in air before he rushed to Cate. He grasped her hands. “I can explain. I promise. I’m not lying, not really. But you must trust me. We can’t let him find us.”

Cate frowned. She had no desire to be near Duke Northcott, but she did not trust Damien either. Her eyes darted around the room as she considered her options.

“Please,” Damien continued, “please, you must trust me. We need to go.”

The doors rattled in the jamb as Duke Northcott again attempted to open them. Cate caught her breath as she saw the doorknobs twisting again. Then the room went silent. With slow precision, the key Damien used to lock the doors withdrew from the lock and clattered to the floor.

Damien twisted to identify the source of the noise then spun to face Cate again. “Now or never, you’ve got to make a call.”

Cate swallowed hard. Her stomach rose to her throat and her knees felt weak. She glanced between Damien and the door. After a moment, she nodded. “Let’s go.”

Damien squeezed her hand in his and pulled her to the doors on the opposite wall. He swung them open and peeked into the hallway. “Clear,” he announced and pushed Cate ahead of him.

They hastened down the hall away from the tearoom as the doors burst open. “Catherine!” Duke Northcott called again.

They reached the end of the corridor. A door to a small parlor provided the only exit from the hall.

Damien moved toward it. “No,” Cate said. “It’s a dead end. We’ll be trapped there.”

“We’re trapped now anyway. Perhaps we can hide.”

Cate shook her head. Panic crowded her mind as she scanned the hall. In her nightmares, this man had chased her all over the house. In one of them, she had landed in this exact situation, stuck in a dead-end hallway.

“Catherine,” a sing-song voice called behind them.

Cate groaned as her mind ran through their limited options. Her heart skipped a beat as her eyes focused on an object. The candelabra hung just above her eye level. She reached out and grasped it, tugging hard toward the floor.

The candelabra gave way, sliding down the wall as a panel swung open. “In here!” Cate exclaimed. She hurried inside the dark tunnel. Damien followed her, pushing the panel shut behind them. They inched back a few steps into the darkness.

Damien clutched at Cate's hand as they overheard the door to the parlor swing open on creaky hinges. Cate held her breath and bit her lower lip as she waited in the darkness. She strained her ears for signs of Duke Northcott's retreat.

Instead, another sound reached her ears. Breathing. The breathing emanated from behind her, not next to her. Someone else was hiding in this passage. The scenario was identical to her dream where she hid in a dark passage with another unknown individual.

Cate squeezed Damien's hand. He wrapped his arm around her. Cate stood on her toes and leaned toward Damien's ear. "Someone's here," she whispered.

She felt Damien's muscles stiffen. He ceased breathing for a moment. The slow rhythmic breathing from behind them continued.

Footsteps sounded in the corridor beyond. Damien pulled Cate back a few more steps, bringing them closer to the other person.

"Is someone there?" he breathed.

"Damien?" a woman answered. Cate recognized Celine's voice.

"Celine?" Damien whispered back.

"Yes, it is me."

"Celine, what are you doing down here?"

"Searching for the source of the anomalies."

The footsteps in the hallway outside circled but did not retreat.

"Marcus," Celine huffed.

"Yeah," Damien answered. "He followed us here. He's after Cate."

Cate's brow creased deeper, and a frown formed on her face. She had only been introduced as Catherine. Yet Damien called her Cate, her nickname. Who was this man?

"We must leave. He cannot learn what these walls house," Celine answered.

"I agree. Could you give us some light? Maybe there's a way out of here beyond the secret door."

Celine did not respond. She pondered the meaning of Damien's statement. Perhaps Celine carried a candle or lantern, though Cate did not understand how Damien knew this.

A loud pounding sounded against the wall. Cate jumped at the sound, startled. Her heart skipped a beat before it sped up.

"Celine, come on!" Damien insisted.

“This may not be wise,” Celine answered.

“She’ll be fine. Come on, we’re running out of time.”

A bright blue light burst in the dark space. Cate shielded her eyes. What type of lantern did Celine carry that produced this light? Cate blinked a few times and lowered her hands. She peered with narrowed eyes at the light now illuminating the space.

“Thank you,” Damien breathed as he began to search the walls surrounding them.

Cate stood speechless. In her dream, a blue light blinded her before she awoke. Was this the source of that light? What was it? Who were these people?

Cate stumbled back a step as her legs threatened to betray her. “Whoa,” Damien said, grabbing Cate to steady her. “You okay?”

Cate shook her head. She attempted to pull out of his grasp. “It’s okay, we aren’t going to hurt you,” Damien insisted.

“Who... What...” Cate’s eyes darted around the room. “What is she? Who are you?”

“It’s difficult to explain...” Damien began.

“Try!” Cate insisted. “You... first you mentioned radar, which isn’t invented yet, then you called me Cate, and now... this! Who are you?” Cate signaled toward Celine’s floating ball of light.

“Damien. You know me.”

“I don’t!” Cate insisted.

“Yes, you do. Just not as Damien Carlyle. But you know me. As Damien Sherwood. You know... Decoder Exploder guy! I’m not from this time. But neither are you, right? You’re Cate Kensie, aren’t you?”

Cate’s mind raced at his words. Damien Sherwood? Her email contact for the decryption program? But how? How had he time traveled here? And why?

The pounding on the wall sounded again. “I’ll explain everything but now we need to find a way out of here.” He tugged her forward.

Cate shook her head and pulled back again. “No. What...” Cate began, unable to finish her thought. She motioned toward the floating ball of light.

“She’s a very special woman,” Damien answered. “And a good friend to have.”

“I won’t harm you, Cate,” Celine said as she placed her free hand on Cate’s arm. “Marcus, on the other hand, may. He is a dangerous man. We must go.”

Cate swallowed hard as she glanced between the two of them. A scraping sounded behind them and candlelight began to flood in through the opening panel. Damien cursed under his breath. Celine whipped the ball of light toward the secret door. It exploded against the panel, sealing it shut with a crackle of electricity.

Celine pulled another light ball from thin air and waved it in front of her. “There!” she exclaimed.

Cate squinted her eyes and detected a small opening in front of them. Damien clasped her hand in his and dragged her toward it. Using Celine’s light, they navigated through a series of passages, winding deeper underground.

The air grew cool and damp. The walls turned from manmade to natural stone. They continued to follow the winding path. After several more yards, the path sloped upward.

“We must be close to the end,” Damien surmised.

“Yes,” Celine agreed.

“Wonder where we’ll come out.”

“Hopefully far from Marcus,” Celine answered. “Then we have many things to discuss.”

Cate’s mind still swam with questions as they climbed upward in the stone tunnel. She began to wonder if she was trapped in one of her nightmares. None of this made sense. Nor was it possible. People couldn’t generate fireballs from thin air.

She stopped walking for a moment.

“Are you okay?” Damien inquired. “Do you need a break?”

Cate shook her head and squeezed her eyes shut.

“Cate?” Damien questioned.

Cate opened her eyes and glanced around. Her circumstances hadn’t changed. Perhaps she wasn’t dreaming. “This can’t be real,” she murmured.

“She is in shock. She is panicking,” Celine assessed. “Can you carry her?”

“No, don’t,” Damien countered. “She’ll be okay.”

Cate’s eyes grew wide at the conversation. What were they suggesting? She backed a few steps away, intending on retreating through the passage as fast as she could.

“Cate! Wait!” Damien shouted. He raced ahead of her and blocked her way. “It’s okay. No one is going to harm you.”

“No?” Cate questioned. “What is she proposing to do to me that requires you to carry me afterward?”

“To put you to sleep,” Damien said. “That’s all. She’s got this ability to just touch your cheek and BAM! You’re asleep. It can be handy at times. It doesn’t hurt, she’s used it on me. She...” Cate blinked and shook her head at his babbling. “Anyway,” he continued as he noticed the mask of confusion and shock on her face, “she won’t hurt you. Let’s just get out of this place and then we’ll explain everything.”

“O-o-okay,” Cate stammered.

Damien smiled and nodded to her. They continued up the passage. The walls changed again from natural stone to blocks.

“This looks manmade,” Damien noted. “We must be close to the end.”

Within a few moments, they entered a large, cavernous space. Still cool and damp, stone walls surrounded them. No obvious exits existed. The remaining three sides looked solid.

“What is this place?” Damien inquired.

Cate’s mind churned. She pushed aside the questions plaguing her and focused on the question at hand. Where were they? Her mind combed through the structures on the estate.

“There’s a private cemetery on the grounds with a crypt. Could this be it?” she pondered aloud.

“Oh, maybe!” Damien exclaimed. “Is there a way out of it?”

“I’m not sure,” Cate answered. “I’ve never been inside it. I spend most of my time at the loch.”

“Wait,” Damien said. “Wait, your castle... the one you mentioned in your email is this castle? You own Dunhaven Castle in our time?”

Cate cocked her head as she stared at him. Her mind returned to the oddity of the situation facing her. “Yes. How did you know me?” she questioned.

“I recognized you.”

“We’ve never met.”

“No, but the internet is a wonderful thing!” Damien answered. “I searched you when Ken emailed me about you. Your picture was still on Aberdeen College’s website. I recognized you the second I saw you.”

That explained his odd grins at her, Cate mused. "Okay," she responded. "And you're Damien Sherwood. But how are you back here? In 1792?"

"Michael and I traveled back to help Celine with the Duke. He's really bad news, Cate. I wasn't kidding."

"How? Using the time rips?"

"We can continue this discussion once we've safely returned to the castle," Celine argued. "We must search for an exit."

"Right," Damien agreed. "Can you shine your light in the corners?"

Celine held the fireball higher and stepped toward the corner opposite them. She and Damien wandered around the chamber, scanning the walls. "There!" Damien shouted.

A small ring protruded from the block above their heads. Damien reached up, grasped it, and pulled downward. A screeching filled the space and a clanking sounded as a portion of the block wall swung toward them.

Fresh air rushed in as daylight streamed into the chamber. Celine extinguished her ball of light and they stepped into the outer chamber. Several stone coffins filled the space. Empty markers accompanied them. Prepared for Douglas and his family, the crypt sat empty awaiting its occupants.

"The castle is this way," Cate said as she stepped out of the mausoleum.

"We should go there straight away," Celine suggested. "We have much to discuss."

"I must find Jack!" Cate exclaimed.

"He is with Gray," Celine assured her.

"Yes," Damien agreed. "Gray will ensure he is okay."

"I'd like to see for myself."

"We'll hurry," Damien promised.

They set off on the most direct route to the castle. As they approached, Cate noted the obvious absence of the carriage and its four jet black horses.

"Marcus has departed," Celine stated, "for the moment."

"I'm sure he'll be back for dinner," Damien said. "Can't wait!"

Cate detected the deep antipathy in their voices. Their history with Duke Northcott must be long and painful, Cate surmised. Celine pushed through the front door of the castle. She crossed the foyer and ascended the stairs.

"Wait!" Cate called. "I must find Jack! He was in the sitting room with Grayson and Michael."

“He will have moved to our suite when Marcus arrived,” Celine called without stopping her climb. “Come.”

Damien offered his hand to Cate with a wide smile. “Come on,” Damien said. “It’s okay. I’m sure he’s fine.”

Cate eyed them both before accepting his hand. They climbed the stairs and followed Celine to their suite. Celine pushed open the doors to a large sitting room.

“Celine, are you alright?” Grayson inquired.

“Yes, I am fine.”

“Where is Catherine?” Jack demanded.

“Here!” Cate called as she released Damien’s hand and pushed through the door.

Jack offered a relieved sigh as Cate joined him near the loveseat. Damien closed the door behind them. Cate noted Michael standing near the fireplace.

“Did you find anything?” Grayson asked Celine.

“Yes and no,” she answered. “Damien was correct.”

Grayson side-eyed Jack and Cate before continuing. “Do you imagine they can help?”

“That is what I plan to find out.”

Michael tugged at his collar, loosening and removing his cravat. “Can we dispense with some of these formalities now that we’re all on the same page?”

“Apparently, I am not on the same page. I’m not even sure I am in the same book! Would someone mind cluing me in on what’s going on?” Jack questioned. “We’ve been discussing odd business questions for over an hour. And we moved to your suite for some strange reason which I still do not fully understand. I am starting to suspect you have an ulterior motive.”

“You are correct, Mr. MacKenzie,” Grayson admitted.

“Oh, come on,” Michael grumbled. “You’re not from this century. You’re time travelers.”

CHAPTER 27

Jack's eyes went wide, and he collapsed onto the loveseat behind him. "That does it!" he exclaimed. "We really are terrible at this."
"Don't sweat it," Damien said. "We're not that good either."

Jack's jaw went slack at the admission. "You...You are..." Jack's eyes scanned the room as his unfinished sentence hung in the air.

"Time travelers," Damien said with a grin. "Oh, just Michael and me. Celine and Gray are really from this time."

"I hate time traveling," Michael murmured as he shook his head.

Jack glanced up at him sharply. "Me too!"

"Wandering around in centuries that aren't your own. It's just... there are no bathrooms, people died of typhoid and other diseases. What part of this makes you grin like that?" Michael asked Damien.

"It's fun!" Damien countered. "Immersing yourself in another time. When people viewed the world in a far different way."

A smile formed on Cate's lips. "That's exactly what I said!" Cate exclaimed.

"Can we stick to the subject at hand rather than our love or lack thereof for the art of time traveling?" Grayson interjected.

"I still don't understand how you time traveled," Cate said. "Are there time rips in other locations?"

"Time rips?" Grayson questioned.

"Yes," Jack answered. "The phenomena Douglas described a few nights ago after dinner. They are the result of time rips. People shifting in and out of their own time and into others.”

“Several exist in the castle,” Cate explained further. “They all lead to different years.”

Celine nodded. “These are the aberrations in time-space I detected. But how did you use them?”

“We control them with this,” Cate said, holding up her timepiece.

“A watch?” Michael questioned.

“Yes,” Cate responded. “I’m sorry, I’m still confused as to how you two time traveled.”

“Through a time portal,” Damien answered. “Celine possesses the ability to open time portals.”

Cate glanced at Celine, her mouth agape. Damien informed her she was a special woman. He wasn’t kidding. Jack slouched further down the sofa as shock settled around him.

“How do you use a watch to time travel?” Michael inquired.

“You go to the location of the time rip leading to the year you want to travel to,” Cate explained, “and you rub the face. That triggers the time rip to open and allows you to slip through it.”

Damien peered at the timepiece.

“May I see it?” Celine requested.

“Sure,” Cate answered. She slipped the chain from around her neck and handed the gold timepiece to Celine.

“Why is the watch stopped?” Damien asked. “Is time paused in your year when you use it?”

“It’s not stopped,” Jack informed him. “It keeps time in the present. But time there moves more slowly than it does here.”

“Really?” Damien said.

“Yes. Fifteen minutes here is only one minute in our time,” Cate explained.

“Yes,” Celine answered, handing the timepiece back to Cate. “These distortions do not behave as normal time portals. They are distended in some way. It’s what twists the passage of time at different speeds.”

“Is that not the case when you time travel?” Cate asked Damien.

“No, though Celine can open portals to whenever we’d like so we can, essentially, defy time passage in some cases.”

“How does the timepiece interact with the distorted time portals?” Michael inquired.

“We don’t know,” Cate admitted. “Which is why we’re here. There are no extra pieces inside that we could identify. For all intents and purposes, it appears to be a normal pocket watch.”

“It is enchanted,” Celine answered.

“By whom?” Grayson asked. “Can you tell?”

“Me,” Celine replied.

Cate’s eyes went wide, and she sank onto the loveseat next to Jack. “So, that’s how Douglas did it,” she murmured.

“So, your enchantment allows them to control the time rips?” Michael asked.

“Yes,” Celine answered. “It keeps them closed until activated. Then, they open.”

“Which solves Douglas’s problem,” Grayson added. “His supposition that he was glimpsing snippets of the future was correct. Though he had no way to control when he would see them. That timepiece gives him the ability to close them.”

“Marcus must never find out about this,” Celine stated. She glanced at Cate and Jack. “You two should return home at once.”

“No,” Cate argued. “We can’t.”

“We’ll handle things with Douglas,” Grayson assured her. “Celine is correct. The Duke is dangerous. You shouldn’t be here.”

Cate shook her head again in disagreement. “We cannot leave for two reasons.”

“Which are?” Grayson fired back.

“In our time,” Jack explained, “something is going on with the time rips. They are popping up randomly. We can’t control them anymore.”

“Right,” Cate answered. “Which is why we’re here. To learn how Douglas controlled them so we could solve our problem. And second, we must ensure Douglas invents the timepiece and Celine enchants it, so we can travel to this time in the first place.”

Celine pursed her lips at the admission. “The timepiece has ceased to function in the future?”

“Not exactly,” Cate answered. “It still interacts with the time rips, but it doesn’t always keep them closed. At times, we’ll slip into another era despite not activating the timepiece.”

“And the timepiece won’t work to get us back when that happens,” Jack added.

“Yes, that’s right. If we don’t get this fixed, the castle will become unlivable,” Cate said.

“Can you help them, Celine?” Damien inquired.

Celine shook her head. “Not from here. Not from this time. The enchantment that exists on that timepiece works with the aberrations I studied here. It should work.”

“So, these time rips have morphed in some way in the future?” Michael proposed.

“It appears they may have if this enchantment no longer holds them closed,” Celine responded.

“Then you’d need to study the distortions in the future to create something that would control the new rips,” Damien suggested.

“Yes,” Celine said with a nod of her head.

“Would you return with us to our time to study it?” Cate inquired, her voice filled with hope.

Damien shook his head. “No need,” he said. “We live in that time. We’ll just meet you there!”

Jack shook his head. “You and Michael live in that time,” he said. “We need her though.” He pointed to Celine.

“No, we all live in that time.”

“But you said only you and Damien were from our time.”

“I mean, technically that’s true,” Damien answered. “This Celine and Grayson are native to this era, but they also exist in our time period. It’s complicated. The point is we can help you. You can return home now, and we’ll be there to help.”

Cate sank onto the couch again as the complex discussion threatened to cause her brain to implode. “Come on; you time travel, you have to be open to the possibility that things exist that are well beyond your comprehension and knowledge,” Damien said as Cate remained silent.

“All right. I’ll trust you,” she answered after a moment.

“Good!” Damien answered. “Then we’ll plan to meet you tomorrow.”

“For now, you should go home,” Celine repeated. “You cannot stay here. It is far too dangerous with Marcus.”

“Who is this guy? Why is he such a concern?” Jack questioned.

“He is a very dangerous man,” Celine answered.

“Yeah,” Damien chimed in. “He’s really bad news.”

“Evil,” Michael added.

“Which is why you must go and leave the rest of this to us,” Grayson insisted.

“But...” Cate began.

“No,” Grayson argued. “This is not up for debate. It’s far too dangerous. And this secret must be protected. At all costs. We will discuss the problem and solution with Douglas.”

“We’ll tell him to leave you a note in one of those journals you’re decrypting!” Damien exclaimed. “And then we’ll see you tomorrow in your own time and we’ll solve your problem, too.”

Damien took her hands in his. “Trust me, Cate,” he said as he stared into her eyes.

Cate scanned their faces. She hated to leave things to chance. She wanted to ensure everything worked properly. What if something went wrong? These people had more experience with this man, though. He haunted her for months in her dreams. Perhaps this was why. Perhaps staying was a mistake and would lead to more trouble. If she continued to have nightmares, she could discuss them with Celine and Damien in her own time. She would trust them. She had to.

She twisted to face Jack. He shrugged at her, suggesting the decision was up to her. “Okay,” she agreed with a nod. “I’ll trust you. We really need your help. And I’ve had terrible nightmares about that man. I have no desire to be near him.”

“You’ve had nightmares about the Duke?” Damien inquired.

Cate nodded.

“Even more reason for you to leave,” Grayson chimed in.

“Please give Douglas our apologies,” Cate said as guilt washed over her. She’d leave her ancestor without saying goodbye. She could visit again when things settled down, she promised herself.

“We will. We will explain everything to him,” Celine answered. “Now go. Collect your things and return to your own time.”

The group said their goodbyes with the promise of seeing one another the next day. Cate and Jack stepped into the hallway as Grayson closed the door behind them. “You okay?” Jack asked Cate once they were alone.

“Yeah,” she said with a slight nod.

“You sure? You’re certain you’re okay with this plan?”

“I am,” she answered with a sigh. “It’s not what I would have picked first but I agree we should leave. Duke Northcott spotted me with Damien earlier and chased me through the house.”

“What?!” Jack exclaimed.

“It was just like my dream. I felt as panicked as I did in my nightmares. I’d prefer to be away from him.”

“All right. Then we’ll gather our things and get out of here.”

“Plus, I trust Damien. I know it sounds odd, but they are time travelers, and he happens to be from our time. He’s the one who helped me with the journals.”

“The decryption program guy?”

“One and the same. Odd coincidence, huh?”

“Or not,” Jack suggested. “Either way, let’s get out of here.”

They threaded through the halls, heading to their room. As they rounded a corner into another hallway, Cate spotted Douglas coming toward them.

“Catherine! Jack! How fortunate I bumped into you both. I was just searching for you.”

“You were searching for us?” Cate inquired.

“Indeed. I hoped to have a word with Jack. Oh, I hope you do not mind, Catherine. I expected you would be resting before the dressing gong, and I could steal Jack for a few moments.”

“O-oh...” Jack stammered. “Catherine and I were just...”

“I promise not to take too much of your time, cousin Jack,” Douglas promised.

“Go on, dear. I am perfectly capable of returning to our room to rest on my own,” Cate said.

Jack smiled at her, and Cate gave his hand a reassuring squeeze. “I promise not to keep him too long, Catherine.”

“Take your time,” Cate answered.

“See you soon, dear,” Jack said as he allowed Douglas to lead him toward the main stairs.

Cate watched as they disappeared around the corner before continuing to their bedroom. Perhaps Jack would be able to pass along a few sentiments before they departed to explain their sudden absence.

Her mind spun with the latest developments as she rounded the corner into the hallway housing their bedroom. With her mind distracted, she failed to notice the man there until it was too late.

Cate stopped short just before she ran into him. A smirk crossed his face. “Hello, Catherine,” Duke Northcott hissed.

Cate's eyes grew wide, and she swallowed hard. Her pulse quickened and her knees threatened to buckle.

"Oh my! Have I left you speechless?" he questioned.

"Duke Northcott," Cate said, her voice a hoarse whisper. "You startled me."

"Did I? My sincere apologies, Catherine. Though I hoped to speak with you. Perhaps I would not have been forced to seek you out here had you not disappeared earlier this afternoon."

"Disappeared?" Cate repeated. "I am not following."

He narrowed his eyes at her. "You did not hear me call to you earlier when I was on the estate?" he said, phrasing it as a question.

"No. My apologies. I did not."

He stared at her as she fibbed about their near encounter earlier this afternoon. She wondered if he could tell she was lying. Perhaps, though there was something else about his eyes. Something that disturbed her. She swallowed hard again.

"Though I cannot imagine what you desired to speak with me about," Cate added as the silence became unbearable.

"Really? Can't you?" He raised an eyebrow at her as he left the statement hang in the air for a moment. "I find you a most interesting woman, Catherine."

He pressed closer to her. Cate inched backward. "Oh," she murmured. "I assure you I am not very interesting."

"Oh, but you are! You do yourself a disservice speaking in that manner."

"Perhaps we can continue our conversation over dinner," Cate suggested in an attempt to end the conversation.

"But that simply won't do," Duke Northcott countered.

"I am very sorry, Duke, but I do not have a moment now. I hoped to rest before the dressing gong."

"You avoid me, Catherine," he said, catching her arm as she attempted to skirt around him. "Why?"

"I do not. I am only tired and wish to rest before dinner."

"There is something very strange about you," Duke Northcott said. She held his gaze a moment. Perhaps he would let her go now. "I am determined to find out what it is."

She forced a weak smile onto her face. “Perhaps over dinner,” she suggested again.

“I already told you, Catherine, that will not do.”

He tightened his grip on her arm and yanked her closer to him. His other hand reached for her face. Her eyes grew wide as she stifled a scream. The cool flesh of his fingertips brushed her cheek. A strange sensation came over her entire body at once. The hairs on her neck stood on end, her stomach somersaulted, her knees buckled, and her vision began to close to a pinpoint. Cate felt her body slumping to the floor as the world crashed around her.

CHAPTER 28

Cate's eyelids fluttered open. She blinked several times to clear her blurred vision. She laid on her side in an unfamiliar room.

Candlelight flickered its dim light across the small room from the table next to the bed on which she lay. She inhaled a sharp breath as she recalled the details of her last memory. She stood with Duke Northcott in the hallway leading to her bedroom. He had approached her. They had disagreed about the timing of a conversation, and she had fainted. Where was she now?

Cate pushed up to sitting as she glanced around her new surroundings. Her body ached with fatigue and her mind was clouded. Random thoughts crowded her brain though she could not process them. Still groggy, she attempted to swing her feet to the floor below her. A wave of nausea passed through her as she tried to stand.

She collapsed back onto the bed behind her as she swallowed the bile creeping up into her throat before she attempted to stand again. On wobbly legs, she hovered for a few moments next to the bed before she stumbled across the floor. She fell against the door as she attempted to twist the handle and pull it open. It did not budge.

Her fists pounded against the door. "Help!" she called. Tears streamed down her cheeks, and she choked down a sob. Cate spun to scan the room. A small window adorned the wall across from her. Darkness stared back at her from beyond it. She raced to it and attempted to pull it open. The window was stuck fast.

Cate peered at her surroundings. She spotted lights in the distance on the moor. From the vast area the lights stretched over, Cate assumed the structure was Dunhaven Castle. After another sob, Cate struggled with the window again, rattling it in its frame. It did not open. She scanned the area closer to her. The moonlight cast shadows across the fields. It appeared she was nearer to town than the castle, perhaps on the outskirts. If she could escape, she could run to town for help.

Footsteps sounded on the floorboards outside the small room. Cate's breath caught in her throat. She searched for an object she could use to defend herself. She found nothing in the sparsely decorated room.

The clank of a key sounded, and the door swung open. Cate pressed into the opposite corner, her breathing ragged. A dark-skinned man stepped into the room. He carried a small tray. A teacup and several biscuits sat on it. "Hello, Miss Catherine," he said, his accent sounding South African, "I have brought you some food."

Cate's brow furrowed at the statement. He slid the tray onto the small wooden table near the door and spun to depart. "Wait!" Cate called. "Please wait!"

He turned back, his hands clasped in front of him, a calm expression on his face. "Yes, Miss Catherine?"

"You must help me! I... I do not know how I came to be here. I must return to Dunhaven Castle. My husband is expecting me."

"I am sorry, Miss Catherine, Duke Northcott requests you to remain here. Please if you would like something more to eat, simply request it from me. My name is Dembe."

"No!" Cate shouted as he departed from the room. The lock engaged, leaving Cate trapped again. She banged against the door as she pleaded for help. None came.

Cate returned to the bed and collapsed onto it. With a frown, she stared at the tray of food across the room. Her stomach growled. She wondered about the time. How long had she been gone? Had Jack sought her and found her missing? Were they searching for her?

She pulled the timepiece from under her dress and stared at it. The second hand crept around the face. Tears stung her eyes as she realized she was not the only one trapped. Without the timepiece, Jack was stuck in 1792. If they never found her, he would be trapped here forever, doomed to live and die in an era centuries before his birth.

She, too, was trapped. She would never see Riley and Bailey again. What would become of them? Of Molly? Of Dunhaven Castle?

Tears rolled down her cheeks. She gave into her panic and wept. After a few moments, Cate swallowed hard and wiped at her cheeks. Crying helped nothing and would solve none of her problems, she reminded herself.

"Pull yourself together, Cate," she told herself. "You need to think."

She swallowed hard again and took a deep breath. Squaring her shoulders, she stood and lifted her chin and strode to the door. She pounded against it. "Dembe!" she called. "Dembe?"

Footsteps sounded on the stairs leading to her second-story room. The lock clanked and the door pushed open. Cate backed a few steps away.

"Yes, Miss Catherine? May I retrieve something for you?"

"What time is it?"

"It is 2 a.m." He glanced at the tray. "You have not eaten."

Cate shook her head. "I do not want it."

"Please, Miss Catherine, eat some food."

Cate set her jaw. "I demand to see Duke Northcott."

"He is not available. He plans to visit you in the morning." The man's cool demeanor rattled Cate. While he seemed kind, nothing she said seemed to affect him. Appealing to him to assist her would not work.

She tried anyway. "Dembe, please. People must be searching for me. They are undoubtedly worried. You must help me. I am here against my will."

"Please, eat, Miss Catherine. It will help settle your nerves."

"Settle my nerves?" Cate shouted. "I have been kidnapped and am being held prisoner here! Tea and cookies will not settle my nerves!"

Dembe opened his mouth to answer when a shadow loomed behind him. "What's this? Catherine's awake already?" Duke Northcott skirted around Dembe and stepped into the room.

Cate stumbled backward a step as he entered. "Yes, Duke Northcott," Dembe answered. "She awoke several minutes ago. I brought the food as you instructed." He motioned toward the tray.

"And yet Catherine has not touched her food. Tsk tsk, Catherine. You must be hungry. You've missed dinner!"

"I do not want your food. I want to go home."

"You Americans are always so onerous. You demand this. You insist on that. Though the simple truth is we cannot achieve everything we desire, dear. You must learn this lesson. Now, eat the snack Dembe has prepared for you and go back to sleep. We shall discuss things further in the morning.” Duke Northcott lifted the teacup on its saucer and offered it to Cate.

“No!” Cate insisted.

“Oh, come, Catherine. Dembe has gone to great trouble to prepare you a nice cup of hot tea with fresh biscuits in the middle of the night.” He picked up a biscuit and waved it at her.

Cate knocked it from his hand. It skittered across the floor leaving a trail of crumbs. Duke Northcott raised his eyebrows at her and set his jaw.

“Obstinance is not a quality I prize in women, Catherine. If you refuse Dembe’s treat, then you shall go hungry.”

“Then I shall go hungry,” Cate stated despite her rumbling stomach.

“How unfortunate for you,” Duke Northcott answered. “And for poor Dembe who waited to prepare it.”

“And poison it?” Cate shot back.

Duke Northcott roared with laughter. “Poison it? Whatever for, my dear?”

“To kill me,” Cate suggested.

“Why would I go through the trouble of bringing you here to poison you? There are so many other more interesting ways in which I could achieve this feat. I’d not resort to the mundanity of poisoning someone with a cup of tea.”

Cate’s brow furrowed as she considered the question. “Do not tax yourself, dear,” Duke Northcott continued after a moment. “Dembe did not poison your biscuits nor your tea. Did you, Dembe?”

“No, Duke,” Dembe answered in his soft voice.

“Then why did you bring me here?” Cate demanded.

“As I’ve already told you, we shall discuss it in the morning. Now, eat.”

Cate eyed the teacup perched on the saucer in Duke Northcott’s hand. He raised it toward her again. Cate set her jaw as she accepted the saucer. She sipped from the cup at the sweet, creamy English tea. Duke Northcott passed the plate of remaining cookies to her.

Cate set it on the small night table. She sank onto the bed as she nibbled the cookie’s corner.

Duke Northcott smiled at her as he caressed a lock of her hair. “Good girl,” he said. “I trust you will be able to sleep after you’ve eaten. I shall see you in the morning. Good night, Catherine.”

He spun on his heel and exited the room. Dembe stepped toward the broken cookie strewn across the wooden floorboards. “I’ll do it,” Cate offered, rising from the bed.

“No, Miss Catherine. Please eat. I shall clear the mess.” Dembe removed a handkerchief from his pocket and collected the crumbs and the discarded cookie. “Is there anything else, Miss Catherine?”

“No, Dembe, thank you.” He nodded his head and stepped to the doorway. “Oh, Dembe?” Cate added.

“Yes, Miss Catherine?” Dembe asked as he twisted to face her.

“I’m very sorry about earlier.” She raised her teacup to him. “Thank you. The tea and cookies are very good.”

“I am pleased you are enjoying the meal. Good night, Miss Catherine.”

He pulled the door shut and Cate heard the lock engage. She sipped at the warm tea, finding it brought her more comfort than expected. Her mind reeled. Why had Duke Northcott brought her here? What did he want from her? And what would he do to get it?

Her mind wandered through frightening scenarios as she finished the cookies and tea. She set the dishes on the tray and wandered to the window. Light from Dunhaven Castle danced in the distance. Cate pressed her hand against the glass as she stared at it. Her forehead rested against the cool windowpane as she continued to study the lights. They must have noticed her absence by now. Poor Jack. “Jack,” she moaned. “I’m sorry.”

Another few moments passed before exhaustion crept over Cate. Her eyes became heavy and her limbs felt like lead. Had the tea contained a sleeping draught? Or was her adrenaline from the distressing situation waning?

She wandered from the window and collapsed onto the bed. With drooping eyelids, she stared at the flickering flame of the candle. What would become of her, she wondered, as she drifted off to a dreamless sleep.

Cate awoke the following morning to bright sunshine streaming through the room’s single window. The candle’s wick smoked after having burned down to its end. Melted wax stuck to the table under the candleholder.

Cate rolled onto her back and stared at the ceiling for several moments before she rose and ambled to the window. In the daylight, the clear outline of Dunhaven Castle dominated the landscape in the distance.

She scanned the property closer to the house. No defining features stood out. If she could manage to escape, she spotted nothing to hide her flight.

Cate jimmied the window again but could not open it. She crossed to the door and tried the knob. Still locked, she realized, as she tugged against it. She paced the small area between the door and the bed as she considered her options.

A knock sounded and the lock disengaged. Cate spun to face her visitor. Duke Northcott strode into the room.

“Good morning, Catherine!” he said with a wide smile. “Up and about already? I should have thought after your rather taxing experience last evening you would prefer to sleep late.”

“I prefer to be informed as to why I am here,” Cate countered. “Why did you abduct me?”

“Abduct is such a strong word. I prefer to say I strongly and enthusiastically persuaded you to leave with me.”

“But you didn’t!” Cate argued. “You dragged me here, unconscious and against my will!”

The corners of Duke Northcott’s mouth turned down as his bottom lip raised in an upside-down smile, forming a mouth shrug. “A rather trivial difference in the description of the event.”

Cate’s eyebrows shot up and her jaw fell open at the statement.

“Well, shall we put aside the debate on how you happen to be here and go to breakfast?” He offered her his arm.

Cate’s expression remained unchanged. “No!” she exclaimed after a stunned moment.

“Oh, really, Catherine! Must you continue to be so obstinate? You surely do not object to a well-prepared meal! Dembe is quite a good cook, I promise.”

“I demand to know what is going on!”

“Tsk, ts,” he clicked his tongue at her. “You are in no position to demand anything, dear Catherine. Let us try to be congenial, shall we? There is no reason for this bitterness between us.”

Cate blinked at him as she attempted to understand the request for cordiality from her kidnapper. She would learn nothing from him unless she complied with his demands. She bit her lower lip and sighed as she reached for his arm.

“A wise choice, Catherine,” Duke Northcott said with a nod.

He led her down a narrow stairway and through another hallway before they entered a dining room. Cate’s eyes scanned every area, memorizing as much as she could, searching for an exit. As they approached the table, he pulled her chair out and seated her before sitting across from her.

Dembe waited in the corner of the room. As Duke Northcott sat down, he scurried from the room and returned in moments with a tray. He set it on the sideboard and lifted two plates which he placed in front of Cate and Duke Northcott.

Cate eyed the poached eggs on her plate with the side of cured bacon. “May I bring you anything else?” Dembe questioned.

“No, Dembe, not unless Miss Catherine requires anything else. She appears unimpressed with her meal.”

“No, it looks most appealing, thank you.” Cate picked up her fork to begin eating. Dembe retreated to his corner. Cate took a few bites of her food before setting her fork on her plate. “Now will you tell me why I am here?”

Duke Northcott raised his eyebrows at her. “You are a most impatient woman, Catherine,” he answered.

“I often find myself impatient when kidnapped, yes,” Cate answered.

He grinned at her. “Your sense of humor is most entertaining. Perhaps, first, we shall discuss why you ran from me yesterday and where you managed to disappear to.”

Cate returned to her meal, focusing her gaze on her plate. “I do not know what you are speaking of,” she insisted.

“Yes, you mentioned that yesterday. I do not believe you. I believe you were very much aware that I called to you. And that you deliberately avoided me. With the assistance of that stooge Damien Carlyle.”

Cate’s fork clattered to her plate. “What difference does it make?”

“It makes a great deal of difference to me, Catherine. As I’ve told you, you are a most interesting woman. Your actions intrigue me.”

“I am not that interesting,” Cate contended.

“I shall be the judge of that,” Duke Northcott countered. “Tell me about yourself, Catherine.”

“There is little to tell. I lived in Philadelphia for most of my life until I married Jack. After our marriage, we traveled to this country for Jack’s legal practice.”

“A Scottish lawyer won your heart? Oh, dear Catherine, you have settled poorly. With your beauty, you could have attained a better match!”

“I love Jack,” Cate answered.

“Love is for fools and ladies’ novels. And I do not take you for a fool, Catherine.”

“I do not agree,” Cate said.

He shrugged. “Either way, your marriage is most odd to me.”

“Your opinion on my marriage does not concern me.”

“Fair enough. What brought you to Dunhaven?”

“My husband’s business. He is a distant cousin of Lord MacKenzie and we hoped to visit family whilst here.” Cate glanced up to find his eyes on her. She held his glance as she slipped the knife from the table and into the folds of her dress.

After a moment, he raised his eyebrows. “Are you certain that is all there is to the story?”

“What else would there be?” Cate inquired.

He narrowed his eyes at her. “I conjecture there is more.” Cate remained silent, tending to the food on her plate. “Why were you walking with Damien Carlyle yesterday?”

“Grayson Buckley requested a moment to discuss business with my husband. Mr. Carlyle kindly offered to escort me on a walk around the property in my husband’s stead.”

“How well do you know the Buckleys?”

“I have only just met them when they arrived at Dunhaven Castle.”

“And the Carlyles?”

“The same,” Cate answered.

“Damien Carlyle seems oddly protective of you for someone he’s only just met.”

“Duke Northcott, I do not know what you are referring to.”

“I am referring to your wild fugue through the castle with Damien Carlyle yesterday resulting in your strange disappearance in a dead-end hallway. Where did you go and why is Damien Carlyle so invested in protecting you?”

Cate was running out of answers that skirted the truth. She shrugged. "I cannot answer that. After our walk, Mr. Carlyle offered to show me an interesting trinket he'd spotted in the castle. I followed him to another room to view it. I did not hear you calling to me and I certainly did not disappear."

He held her gaze for a moment before speaking. "No. There is more to the story. There is something odd about you, Catherine. I cannot put my finger on it, but I believe there is something you are hiding."

Cate returned her attention to her plate and finished the final bites of her meal. "I have ways of gaining information, Catherine," Duke Northcott warned.

"There is no more information to gain," Cate informed him.

"We shall see," he answered as Dembe cleared their dishes.

Cate wiped the corners of her mouth and set her napkin on the table. "Shall we?" Duke Northcott asked as he stood from the table.

Cate swallowed hard and rose, anxious about what may happen next. Duke Northcott led her to the hallway and toward the cottage's front door. "Perhaps you would care to read in the sitting room for a time."

Cate rubbed the back of her neck at the statement, and she did not respond. Her focus remained on the door in front of her. Freedom lay on the other side. It stood mere yards from her. Could she make it? If she could make it to the grass beyond, perhaps she could call for help. Perhaps someone would spot her and help her.

Cate considered her options. This may be her only opportunity for escape. She must try, she determined. Her hands trembled as she slid her arm from his. She shoved him against the wall and raced to the front door. She clutched at the doorknob, twisting and turning it as she tugged. No key sat in the keyhole. The locked door prevented her from any escape. Tears streamed down her cheeks as she realized the situation.

Behind her, Duke Northcott recovered. He smoothed his cravat and jacket before approaching her. He clapped his hands in a slow, methodic manner. "Bravo, Catherine, Bravo."

Cate spun to face him and pressed against the door. Her breathing turned ragged as he stalked toward her. "Oh, do not cry, dear," he said. "It was a brave though gravely miscalculated move." He removed a handkerchief from his pocket and offered it to her, waving it between two fingers. "Take it."

Cate snatched it with a trembling hand. She pressed it to her face, drying her tears. "Let us resolve this matter once and for all. You cannot escape, my dear." He pulled Cate away from the door and swung it open. He motioned toward the outside. Cate smelled the fresh air and felt the cool breeze on her damp cheeks. She glanced to Duke Northcott then through the door. "Well, go ahead, my dear, try to depart."

Cate's brow furrowed and she stepped forward. As she attempted to step over the threshold, she ran into an invisible barrier. She lifted her arm and pressed her hand forward. Her hand could not breach the doorway.

She twisted to face him. "There. You see? It is quite impossible for you to leave. Not until I allow you. Resign yourself, Catherine. You are stuck here."

A fresh wave of panic and nausea swept over Cate. Her breakfast threatened to fly back up her throat. She bit her lower lip, and her hand found the cool metal of the knife hidden in the pocket of her dress. She clutched it, wrapping her fingers around the handle. She had no other options now. She had to strike.

CHAPTER 29

Cate slid the blade from the folds of her dress. She raised her arm high and swung down. Duke Northcott caught it mid-swing. The knife grazed his hand but clattered to the floor as he gripped and squeezed her wrist. Blood trickled from the small cut which seemed to disappear almost as soon as it opened.

“Ow!” Cate shrieked.

Duke Northcott slammed the front door shut. “Do not do something you will regret. I will not tolerate these games, Catherine,” he roared at her. “I have been a most accommodating host. Yet you attempt to harm me?” He drove her back against the wall. She crashed into it as he pressed against her.

“Let me go,” she wailed.

“Come, Catherine, you have not earned any favors.” He yanked her up the front stairs and dragged her down the hallway to her room. He pulled the door open and tossed her inside. She stumbled a few steps before collapsing to the floor in a heap. “There you shall stay until our next conversation. Perhaps by then, you shall have learned to behave.” He swung the door shut and the lock engaged.

Cate climbed to her feet as tears stained her cheeks. She threw herself against the door and pounded on it. “Let me go! Let me go!”

Her sobs went unanswered. She slid down the door and crumpled to the floor. Within a few moments, a sound reached Cate’s ears. She sniffled as she lifted her head, straining to hear.

Hoofbeats resounded. Cate pulled herself to standing and hurried to the window. She searched the landscape outside. A carriage approached, pulled by two chestnut horses. The carriage slowed to a halt outside the front door. The coachman dismounted and opened the door for the occupant.

Celine climbed out. Cate's eyes grew wide. She banged against the windowpane. "Celine! Celine!" she called. "Celine, I'm here!"

The woman stormed to the front door, oblivious to Cate's pleas. Cate raced to her door and pressed her ear against it.

"Marcus! Marcus!" Celine's voice called in the foyer.

"Celine," Duke Northcott answered. "What a pleasant surprise."

"Where is she?" Celine demanded.

"Where is who, my dear?"

"You know very well who. Where is Catherine MacKenzie?"

Cate's heart leapt. Jack must have told Celine she was missing. Celine must have deduced Cate's location. She was saved! Cate hammered her fist against the door. "I'm here, Celine! Celine! I'm up here! Help!"

"I have no idea what you are talking about, Celine," Marcus answered.

"Don't you?" Celine countered.

"No, I do not. I am sorry to hear the poor girl is missing. Though perhaps there is a more reasonable explanation than accusing me of some involvement in her disappearance."

"You are the reasonable explanation, Marcus. You chased her through the house yesterday. You've taken her. Where? I demand to know."

"A tale you've no doubt gathered from that dimwitted ally of yours, Damien Carlyle. I grow weary of these accusations, Celine. First, I am responsible for Elizabeth Buckley's strange illness and now an ocean away, I am the responsible party for a missing woman. It is most likely she's run off to escape that dullard of a husband she has. It really isn't that surprising, Celine."

"That's a lie!" Celine screamed at him.

"It's not," Duke Northcott retorted, his voice calm and measured, bordering on taunting. "He is rather dull. A useless man if I've ever met one. He may even make Grayson Buckley seem appealing."

Cate overheard a scuffle. "I wouldn't if I were you, Celine. I suggest you depart before you say or do something you'll regret."

"I will find her, Marcus. And she had better be unharmed." Cate heard footsteps retreat from the house.

“Oh, Celine! I hope she is found. What a terrible shame it would be if anything were to happen to a beautiful woman like that!” he called, his voice raised.

Cate rushed to the window. Celine emerged from the house and approached the carriage. She climbed aboard without a glance back. “No, wait!” Cate shouted. “Celine, wait!”
